Ivan turned to find Wade standing in the door, phone held up to display a news story. With a click of a button, the image transferred onto the meeting room’s screen: an anchor desk and several images of the publicly released demands. It was the first communication from the kidnappers since Tori had been taken, and Ivan read each word painstakingly.

The demands weren’t especially complex. It was a gauntlet-throw: the gang was calling out the New Science Sentries. They were to arrive at noon the following day to a location that would be revealed soon, alone. Any other capes in attendance would lead to the hostage being killed—or at least, that was their claim. Ivan had his doubts that Tori would go along with that option, though ideally, he’d prefer she not have to fight her way out single-handedly. The whole thing might have had Ivan feeling nostalgic, if he weren’t so angry.

“A call-out? All this for a damn call-out? Those miserable wretches stole a civilian off the streets and stirred up the entire AHC in order to have a grudge match with a team that’s barely even a week old?” Ivan pressed his hands against one another. He’d learned a long time ago that one of the few things he could hold with any real force was himself, a helpful trick in times of stress. “It makes no sense. Someone with the equipment to foil both the guild and the AHC using it like this...”

“It’s a beta-test,” Wade interrupted. “Someone is using a gang with more ambition than sense to see how their equipment holds up. I’m not sure if they knew Tori was with us, or if this was purely targeted at the AHC. My hunch is the latter, mostly because the few enemies both organizations shared were world-ending threats that have been dealt with.”

Now that, Ivan could wrap his head around. “Enflame the AHC publicly so they have to respond, all in order to make sure the system is being tested against the best they can offer. See how long it takes for them to crack through, and figure out how they do it to develop countermeasures. The girl and the gang don’t actually matter; they’re just a setting for the experiment.”

On screen, the anchor vanished, replaced by a map of Detroit. It was impossible to miss the Guardian’s Tower, a massive memorial commemorating those who’d died during the Korot Spider outbreak in the sixties. They’d managed to kill the hive queen, but not without terrible losses, and the city had chosen to honor them for their sacrifice. Most cities had some sort of feature like the Guardian’s Tower, in truth. The world had been a scarier place, before it gained a nigh invulnerable last line of defense.

“We’ve found her general area, and Xelas made contact with the locals to get the ball moving on her end. I predict that before the night’s end, we’ll have Tori’s location and some bodies to leave behind as a misdirect. Do you think she’ll give the order, or let the capes deal with it?” Wade didn’t seem especially concerned either way. He was asking with the same academic curiosity he addressed most subjects. A lot of people took that to mean that Wade didn’t care, but Ivan knew better. Wade was simply the kind of man who functioned best when calm, and he preferred to be at the top of his game as often as possible. Especially in a crisis.

For his part, Ivan didn’t have an answer at the ready. “It’s hard to say. Tori wants to stay out of the spotlight, and going our route will put more attention on her. At the same time, she understands what this guild does, and why it’s needed. She knows that if these sorts of kidnappings become commonplace again, there’s no predicting the fallout. Today, it was a capable member of the guild who can handle herself. The next one snatched probably won’t be so lucky. Besides...”

Ivan looked down at his hands. They were clean tonight, not so much as a speck of blood. He could still see it, though. Still feel it, smell it—taste it, if he wasn’t careful. “Tori has a hole in her where her parents and childhood are supposed to be. She’s filled it with anger because that was the only fuel that would keep her moving, and while she’s grown tremendously since trying to rob us, that fury is layered in deep. Most people couldn't order the execution of an entire gang, not even in her situation. But people with that chunk of themselves missing... well, we're another story."

"I thought so, too," Wade agreed. "Pity we can't bring the armor and let her participate. Then again, I suppose there's no rush to add to these kids' kill counts. I'll stick to those more comfortable with getting their hands dirty."

"You should consider bringing her armor anyway." Ivan wasn't sure where the unsettled feeling in his gut was coming from, only that he trusted it. "Something's off about this whole fiasco. I think you've got the right idea on what's really happening, but whoever our opponent is, they've been exceedingly competent so far. Let's not fall into the cape habit of presuming ourselves better than our enemies. Be ready for more surprises."

Wade glanced down at his watch, checking the time. "I could send someone over to access her lab; if Bahamut is there, she can help get things loaded." A pause, as Wade further considered Ivan's words. "In fact, let's have Bahamut just bring it over herself. You make a good point. This is an official guild operation. We'll risk over-preparing rather than go in under. I'll put Bahamut, Pest Control, and Glyph into a rescue team. If anything goes wrong, they'll be tasked with extricating Tori while the rest of the responders do the bloody work."

Despite the fact that it had technically been his suggestion that led to the idea, Ivan wasn't sure how he felt about that plan. "Aren't they a little young to risk bringing to that violent of a scene? We've already made them watch one code enforcement."

"They won't be young forever. One day, they'll be the ones making these calls, so I'd like them to start building experience in the hopes they'll make the right ones. Would you rather they have their first extraction with us around to watch their backs, or wait until they have to do it because everyone else is out of commission?"

That was the trouble with arguing against one of the world's greatest minds; Wade could make everything he did sound completely logical. On this account, he had a valid point. Neither man planned to run this guild forever. The more they could teach the ones coming up behind them, the more competent the hands that would one day steer the organization. That didn't mean they had to be reckless about it, however.

“I’ll take that team in, if it’s needed,” Ivan said. “Just in case they run into any hidden surprises, I should be more than enough to ensure they make it through unscathed.”

“Some thought you’d want to be leading the slaughter.” On his phone, Wade punched in a few inputs. “Glad to see my way of thinking was correct. You were already slated to be in charge of that group, and I just sent through the confirmation.”

Another night, Ivan might have been genuinely annoyed by being called predictable, but given the day’s events, the most he could manage was mild curiosity. “How’d you know I’d go that route?”

“Because I know you, Ivan. When pushed, you’ll always put the few things you care about first. No matter how many corpses you might create in the process.” Wade hit a few more buttons, then read something on his phone’s screen. “Estimates say we could have a location on Tori by dawn. Get some rest if you need it, but be down with Mind Mirror an hour before sunrise. Once we know where she is, Tori will have to make her choice.”

There was no chance Ivan would be sleeping that night, yet he did force himself to calm down. Rest would be good. Centering himself, getting mentally prepared, those were better uses of his time than pointless worrying. When the time to rescue Tori came, Ivan intended to be at the top of his game. Much to the misfortune of any poor piece of shit that got between him and his former apprentice.

Hearing the door unlock, Tori expected to see Darius step through. So far, he’d been her only visitor, releasing her hands for three bathroom breaks and one short meal. Conversation had hit a dead end, unfortunately, as no amount of prodding would get Darius past a general sense of worry. He didn’t believe in the threat enough to force action—a thing Tori was trying hard not to dwell on. She wasn’t a fan of where that realization had led for her impending decision. The more she saw them ignoring guild rules, the harder it was to deny the need for a concrete lesson.

As it turned out, she was partially right. Darius indeed came through, only with him was the leader and the reptile-looking guy.

Her broken-nosed abductor walked right up to Tori, plainly intent on taking control this time. “Good evening. Maybe morning by now—who can keep track? Since the hour is late, and you’re no doubt exhausted, this seemed a good time to get to know one another better.”

Interrogating someone while they were tired wasn’t a bad move; it was just this guy’s misfortune that he’d chosen a prisoner used to pulling back-to-back all-nighters. True, Tori would have killed, almost literally, for an espresso in that moment, but she was nowhere near the point of true exhaustion.

“Sure. Let’s do you first. I’m guessing you come from some two-dog, who-gives-a-fuck town, where you had a minor meta-advantage over the humans. You became the lord of Shitdelphia, bought into your own hype, and tried to take your show on the road to the big city. Only to discover that, oh no, your half-baked criminal mastermind crap doesn’t cut it in the real world. Now, you’re just scrambling to hang on to what little power you’ve got before everyone realizes the emperor has no clothes.”

Unlike last time, he took the verbal assault in its entirety. Some time to compose himself had evidently done the kidnapper quite a bit of good, as he was barely even ruffled by the end of the tirade. “Such colorful language. You should work on that, if you expect to be taken seriously.”

“Suck my dick,” Tori shot back, earning herself a look of confusion from the snake-guy. “It’s metaphorical. And it’s huge.”

“Ignore her, Emory. Miss Rivas is talking tough because it’s all she can do, and she’s scared.” Her kidnapper leaned in closer, enough that she could almost taste the red-stained gauze covering his nose. “With her arms tied, she’s only bravado and curse words. Her courage will soon—FUCK!”

Since the kidnapper had been kind enough to get close, Tori took the opportunity to quickly rock her neck back and then jerk it forward, slamming her skull directly into the already broken nose. He reeled back, hand going to cover the fresh font of blood bursting forth. At his side, the snake-guy—Emory, he’d been called—yanked out an already blood-coated towel.

“Hang on, Deacon. Let me get pressure on it.”

At least Tori now had a name for her captor, although Deacon seemed less pleased than she was with this turn of events. That composure he’d come in with was already slipping as he leapt to his feet, stalking over to her and glowering down, trying to use his height to scare her while also keeping a safe distance, which rather undermined the already pathetic intimidation.

“What the hell is wrong with you? I have given you every chance to cooperate, to be a model prisoner, and yet you do nothing but make trouble. Is force really the only thing that you’ll respond to?”

“Oh, if you try force, you’ll definitely find a response waiting.” Tori grinned up at him, a wider smile than she’d ever actually sport—but just like at the office, this was about putting on a show. “Let me break this down for you, Deacon. Whatever you think you’re doing, you have no concept of how deeply fucked you are. Do you know why no one uses hostages to go for capes? Because it doesn’t work. At best—absolute best—they show up and throw you all in jail. More likely, the capes arrive to find you all in puddles and pieces.”

“Yes, yes, I’ve heard the rumors, as well as the lies you fed my bodyguard.” Deacon leaned in closer, though not so close as before. He was capable of learning, if nothing else. “Now, let me give you an ultimatum. The next time I come in here, you’re going to tell me everything you know about the New Science Sentries, and you’re going to be a good, placid little hostage. We know more than just your name, after all. Maybe you’d like us to scoop up one of your roommates for company. I doubt both of them have your same resolve.”

That was where a world without limits would lead, plain and simple, laid out before Tori’s eyes. If they couldn’t beat their true enemy—be it a troublesome prisoner or a legendary cape—they’d go after the target’s allies. Beverly would be fine, and Chloe’s power was unpredictably dangerous, but that wouldn’t be true for every case. This wasn’t even something connected to the guild. It could just as easily have been a normal human sitting in this room, hearing these threats.

Whatever optimism Tori had for finding another way out died as she looked into Deacon’s eyes. Capes gave the world hope, yet that wasn’t enough. The world also needed fear. The darkest parts, where the light couldn’t reach, would obey terror where decency fell short. They had to know there were consequences to stepping outside the rules. It wasn’t society’s law they should fear, it was the guild’s code. Her code, because she was one of them. After tonight, that would be truer than ever before.

“Darius, you’ve been a pretty decent guy throughout all of this. If there’s anyone here you care about, evacuate both them and yourself soon.

When the shadows come, they won't be making exceptions." Though the words were for Darius, she leveled Deacon with her gaze. "As for you, oh great and terrible leader, feel free to crawl back in here and beg for your life once your entire crew is slaughtered. Seems like the way a coward like you should die, does it not? Groveling in his shit-filled slacks."

"Let me assure you, on the off chance your little prediction did come true, the only reason I'd be coming in here would be to kill you myself," Deacon shot back.

"Promise? Don't threaten me with a party and then stand a girl up."

Deacon gave her another pointed stare before the dripping from his nose required attention once more. He motioned for the bodyguards to follow, Emory going first, Darius in the rear to lock the door behind them. As he closed it, the big meta looked right at Tori, uncertainty looming wide in his eyes.

"I'm serious. Go. Now. After what your boss just said, there's no other way out."

The door closed in place, leaving behind a Tori who was far less conflicted than she'd been moments before. Unfortunately, conviction didn't help the churn in her stomach as she pictured all those dead bodies. It didn't matter, though. The standard had to be set. For the civilians, for her friends, for the world in general. Those rules, that code, it kept everyone safer, whether they knew it or not.

People needed to remember what happened to those who crossed the guild, and some messages could only be delivered in blood.

---

Chapter 28

---

The huge man in a leather jacket reared back, ready to slam the stop sign he'd torn from the ground through the brightly-masked head of a cape. He swung with everything he had, only to feel the entire thing come to a halt inches from contact. The searing glow gave it away an instant before Lodestar used her grip on the sign to pop him in the head with his own weapon. The blow merely knocked him unconscious, sending him collapsing to the ground rather than dead.

"Flame Fist, keep your eyes on a swivel. A battleground is an ever-shifting entity. What you knew two seconds ago is already old news. Nice kick on the guy with pipes, by the way."

Then she was gone, zipping over to another part of the battlefield, stopping some other crook from landing a serious blow on one of the capes. Not many people could see what she was doing, the way she was controlling the entire fight. Searstream, however, was part of the aerial team for this fight. Between his willful disregard for gravity and the potent blasts capable of firing from his hands, Searstream was largely picking off targets engaged with other capes in melee, making himself as useful as possible.

Seeing Lodestar run the entire show was an unexpected benefit to pitching in. This was insane, really. What they'd arrived upon was a meta-brawl between Chicago gangs. From what little he'd pieced together in the reports, Searstream knew only that one of them had tried to make a violent push for more territory while the capes were supposed to be busy, and the whole thing had spun out of control. It was violent, dangerous, and in any other situation, he'd have felt like this was getting in too deep for the mass of largely rookie superheroes who had been called in. But being up here, Searstream understood. They weren't at any risk whatsoever.

Lodestar had turned a horrible situation into both a teaching opportunity and a reminder to everyone out there of what happened to those who disregarded the AHC. TV cameras were sending images of the fight—if one could even call it that—across the world: dozens of gang members going down, and the AHC hadn't taken so much as a scratch. While much of that was due to Lodestar's protection, the other capes were proving that their months of effort hadn't been for naught. Tachyonic was zipping around, aided by shots from Bloopston's water cannon, slapping a pair of cuffs on the criminals most recently taken down by Agent Quantum.

A woman with glowing eyes was moving up on Bloopston, Searstream noticed. He took careful aim, zooming in with the screen and camera system outfitted to his flying goggles, and fired a shot intended to stun without risking lethal damage.

Unfortunately, she turned out to be tougher than her appearance let on. Her eyes glowed brighter as they turned upward, searching the sky. Too bad for her; she didn't hear Lodestar's advice about watching a battlefield. Agent Quantum caught her from behind, pointing her eyes downward just before the beam appeared. Given the way it was eroding the concrete, Searstream was glad not to have taken that one.

A blur of golden light zipped past, and the eye-woman was unconscious. Agent Quantum set her down, giving a short wave to the sky. Not knowing if the other cape could even see him, Searstream waved weakly back, sweeping the battlefield for more targets.

They were in short supply. This fight, like the others tonight, had been short-lived. Get in, get the situation handled safely, evacuate civilians, and move on. True, Lodestar could have ended the fights in seconds herself, but that wasn't the point of the evening. As much as this was about the AHC showing the world that they could still keep it safe, it also appeared to be about teaching the newer capes how to handle fights like these.

"Hey, everyone!" Lodestar's brisk, clear voice rang through their comms. "Headquarters just called, looks like we've got some metas in Connecticut trying to assault a jail and spring their buddy. Find your teleporter and get over there now. I'll go ahead to protect the staff."

A flash of light, and she was gone. Searstream scanned the area on through his goggles, no longer looking for targets. This time, he was hunting for the hooded woman he'd been assigned to teleport with. This many capes required more than one method of transportation. That was the nice thing about working for the AHC; they'd been at this so long that it was a polished machine. Issues Searstream would have never considered were already planned for well in advance. Between that and having legends like Lodestar and Professor Quantum, Searstream wondered why anyone chose a life of crime knowing the AHC was out there, ready to stop them.

When the world began to crack this time, Tori was ready. She forced herself to relax, mentally searching for Ivan's presence. It made the process go much faster. A break in reality, showing that star-filled void, appeared in seconds, with Ivan soon hustling through like he hadn't quite been ready.

"You have to do it." These were the first words out of her mouth by necessity. Much as she understood why this had to happen, the long-reaching effects it would have and the idea of ordering the elimination of an entire group of people still ate at her. Part of Tori feared that if her words weren't her decision, she would falter and defer to the capes. "We have to send the message that the guild is still here. That the rules still apply."

No judgment from Ivan, not that he'd have much room to throw stones. He accepted the words with a nod, then made his way over to her side. "Are you sure? The capes won't be long now. By noon, I expect they'd have you."

"Good for me. Not so good for the next person some crooks snatch." She tried to scratch her face, remembering for the umpteenth time that her hands were chained. "For me, this has been frustrating, annoying, inconvenient, and only occasionally scary. If I were a normal human... this is the sort of thing that traumatizes people. Besides, the ringleader here threatened my friends. If anyone deserves to be made an example of, it's him."

A moment of hesitation, then Tori continued. "There is one guy who was nice to me during this. Big fellow, named Darius, seemed to have his head more on his shoulders than the rest. He at least clocked the danger in what they were doing, even if he didn't buy the rumors. I can take a reasonable guess on how this will go, and if there's no survivors, then that's the choice I made. But if there's any wiggle room, Darius probably doesn't deserve to die."

"Your suspicions are no doubt spot on. That said, the guild recognizes that allies can come from unlikely sources. I'll pass the word along. No promises—these things are chaotic by nature—but you've given him a chance. Luck and Darius himself will decide his path from here."

Ivan hunkered down next to Tori, not truly here, yet so real, she'd have tried to pluck an eyelash if her hands were free. "Let's focus on your part now. Ideally, you'll stay right where you are, hear only the barest of sounds through the door, and be discovered by the capes with no story to tell. Less ideally, things go awry and you have to evacuate. Bahamut, Glyph, and Pest Control will be on hand with me and your armor. On the off chance that things get truly out of hand, it's best people see Hephaestus escaping with known villains rather than Tori."

Her nose wrinkled; something smelled off. "Ivan, tech aside, these people are a rinky-dink crew that could barely pull off a bank heist. Why are you talking like they're going to pull out some secret weapon that can knock the fucking guild for a loop? It took Apollo using most of the AHC's forces to manage that."

"True or not, they have access to incredibly high-level concealment technology. Given that they called out a team of capes, we have to assume they've got some offensive gear on that same level. It's only prudent."

After what Tori had watched Fornax do when Ivan let loose, she wasn't quite sure what level of tech would be necessary to stop him, but she was fairly sure these mooks didn't have it. Then again, not everyone in the guild was Fornax, or even Pseudonym, so she supposed a bit of circumspection might be in order. Especially if Ivan was stuck babysitting the newbies.

"Do we need to work out our story ahead of time?"

"Not really a story to give, so long as you tell the truth," Ivan replied. "You were stuck in a room, unable to move, until the AHC arrived to free you. If you heard a strange noise around dawn, what of it? You've got no context for the sound, and no known ability or need to help them, even if you did."

Tori looked around, examining the fractured space they were once more in. "Let me guess: if I mention this part at all, I just say I had some weird dreams."

“I’d avoid it entirely, but that’s up to you. My point is you’ll be able to tell the truth and walk out of here without issue. The key is in how much truth you tell.” Ivan stood from his kneeled position, moving to brush off his slacks, only to realize he wasn’t actually there to get dirt on them.

“But that also means we can’t loop you in on anything. If all goes well, you’ll never see or hear us. Once the AHC releases you, we can fill you in on what happened.” Something unusual flickered in Ivan’s face. Fear? Shame? Tori couldn’t tell. She just knew it was an expression she’d seldom even seen hints of. “One more thing to keep in mind: while, officially, Ivan and Fornax have only the slenderest connection in the form of sealed paperwork stored in a government vault, some of the AHC’s higher-ups would know my real identity, since they were around to battle Fornax. If you deal with anyone on the Champions’ Congress, stick to the plan, but be aware that they might know the truth about you.”

Tori’s eyes went wide. “Wait, what? That feels like a pretty damn essential detail to fill me in on. How does that not fuck the entire plan?”

“Because what they know personally and what they can prove in a court of law are different things,” Ivan reminded her. “Just don’t go offering more than you intend to. That’s why I brought it up. Ignorance is a weakness. You’ll now be fully abreast of your situation.”

Forcing herself to calm down, Tori leaned hard on her logic. It wasn’t entirely Ivan’s fault; she’d known she was signing on with Fornax from day one. Learning from a legend had come with plenty of perks and a few downsides—this was just one more notch in the latter column. Part of her was chapped that she was only just now getting this variable, but it didn’t change things in the larger picture.

The underworld needed a keeper. A limit. A code. And it would have one, a code built by those who knew how to walk the line of criminal and civilian, enforced by some of the most deadly monsters to claim the Earth’s surface as their home. Bad a mastermind as he was, Deacon had created the perfect stage to send a message. He thought it would be some pissing contest with the capes; instead, his gang would be the warning to the underworld. The monsters were still here, and their claws had a very long reach.

“Appreciate the heads up, though I wouldn’t have minded it sooner. Go ahead with the plan. I’ll take my chances with the Champions’ Congress. Won’t be my first time bullshitting my way out of trouble.” Ivan nodded, but before he could turn, Tori kept going. “Any advice for that scenario, if it comes up?”

Ivan took his time responding. This was likely the last moment they wouldn’t feel the pounding of the clock until the rescue was done. “Quorum will see through any lie or deceit—only use the factual truth around him. If you cannot answer a question in that way, then refuse. You’re a victim, not a suspect, at least so far as the public knows. Professor Quantum is unlikely to notice or care that you’re in the building beyond a cursory handshake. Don’t try to draw his attention, and you won’t have it. Lodestar...”

His voice trailed off for a moment, like Ivan’s tongue had gotten lost in the journey. “Lodestar will have your best interests at heart. That doesn’t mean you should tell her everything, mind you, only that she very rarely uses subterfuge. It makes her both entirely predictable, and incredibly dangerous. No matter how sincere or kind she is, remember that you’re still a criminal talking to one who bows to the law. Get too honest, and there’s only so many ways it can end.”

“Thanks.” Had it been anyone else, Tori would have let the conversation end there. But Ivan was her mentor, her teacher, and as her fake uncle, he was the closest thing to family she had left. “This will go well, right? I don’t need to worry?”

Sometimes, Ivan let himself forget that Tori’s bluster was often just that, the outward lashings of someone who’d had to grow up young and fast. She was less than a decade older than Rick, and already out here facing these kinds of situations with a locked jaw. Of course she was scared deep down; she’d been taken off the damn street and trapped in a strange room. Ivan’s blood tried to boil, but he held it in check. Anger was not the tool for this occasion.

“Tori, I don’t have much in this life I care about. My children, the guild I helped found, and the few friends I’ve made along the way. I count you in that last group. You have only seen me fight when I thought someone had taken two of those from me. That is nothing compared to the hell I bring when fighting to keep one of those few people safe.”

Ivan didn’t approach her again, but he did hunch slightly, making sure they were at eye level across the room, the sea of stars to his back. “You don’t need to worry one bit. I know this isn’t what you’re used to, but the guild is more than a code and a warning of what happens to any who cross it. We are a unified organization, filled with people who want you back for both personal and pride-based reasons. This isn't just your fight anymore. You're part of something bigger. We've got your back."

"Well then, don't keep a lady waiting. These cuffs are starting to chafe."

Just before he disappeared back through the hole, Ivan paused long enough to deliver a quick parting, one last reassurance to tide Tori over.

"See you soon."

---

Chapter 29

---

Dawn was coming. Those who lurked in the night knew this feeling well. Night's energy began to wane, the chaos under the moon calming, growing still. Madness and shadow were preparing to fall away, yielding ground to the cleansing light of day. Soon, the sky would turn gray, evening's final grip faltering once more... but not yet. There was darkness left to burn, still time to do things that had no place in the sunshine.

While a large show of force might have been more impressive, that wasn't what tonight was about. This was a mission and a message, which might have tilted it toward a bigger entry team if not for the fact that no survivors would remain to talk about what they saw. For this to work, there couldn't be anyone left to talk, to contradict the guild's fabrication. No, what remained of these overly confident kidnappers would be the message itself, along with the rumors they sent running through the shadows.

Ivan stood in the late summer air, watching a group of what felt like nervous children whispering amongst themselves a small distance off. That was unfair. Tori's fellow new guild members were all adults, and it was hardly their fault that this was their first time rescuing a kidnapped colleague. Nevertheless, he was glad they'd been placed out here on the sidelines. They didn't need to be part of what was coming next. Not when the guild had such talented options to call upon.

Technically speaking, assembling Morgana, Xelas, and Arcanicus, on top of having Ivan dressed as Pseudonym waiting in the wings, was massive overkill for a job of this level. Were they simply sending a message out of responsibility, there would never have been a need to call upon so much power in a single location. However, this was not just about keeping crooks in line. Someone had dared to touch a member of the guild. For the safety of everyone who depended on its protection—both the villains and those they loved—such a thing could not stand. Even if no one knew who Tori was now, that might change down the road. One slip-up, one show of weakness; that was all it took to embolden the dumbest, most dangerous of the lot. They would allow no such failing in the guild.

“Credit to them, whatever shit they’re using works ‘til the end. I can’t get a scan on the building,” Xelas said. “We’re going in blind, unless magic decided to come through.”

“Sadly, they appear to have brought in some sort of localized mana disruption generator.” Arcanicus, unlike Xelas, seemed slightly pleased by his discovery. “I’d assumed they were using actual magic to shield or obscure their location, but if they’re leaning on a tool like that, then odds are strong that none of them wield arcane talents. We can also be sure they don’t have anything enchanted in there. The disruption generator would erode the magic over time and turn such items unstable.”

Everyone looked a tad relieved. Even having two magic-users of their own, keeping the mystic arts out of battle made things more predictable. A potent magical-meta could really throw normal fights for a loop, their results often only outdone by the reality warpers like Captain Bullshit. Despite that, technically speaking, his power wasn’t magic. He’d once turned almost the entire world into living stuffed animals for an hour, though, so it was certainly something.

“No magic means we can sling a few spells ourselves, unless that generator will cause you issues?” Morgana wore her blood-red armor tonight, markedly different simply in that she was the only one of the three who had come to this soiree in different clothes. Xelas favored the natural steel look, and Arcanicus seemed like the kind of man born in his draping wizard robes. Sometimes Ivan wondered where Morgana got the blood to start her costumes, but he’d been around long enough to know that there were questions best left unanswered.

The question earned a scoff from Arcanicus. “I am no paltry practitioner just learning his spells. My magic can more than hold up to such technology, certainly long enough to see the task through.”

While Arcanicus was showing his age, and had been for some while, no one questioned the claim. In his prime, he’d been one of the most formidable casting metas the world had ever seen. Even weakened by the bastard known as time, his arcane knowledge was among the most well-developed in the world. Whatever estimations he made of his power, they were going to be accurate.

“Two entrances. Let’s assume both are guarded. Morgana goes with Arcanicus, who magics them sneakily up to the front while I come tearing in through the back. We punch in, taking out enemies and hunting the package. Pseudonym stays out here with the rescue team. Any enemies get out, he picks them off. If we discover the package is in danger, we relay a location to Pseudonym, who will secure it and then hand it off to the rescue team, covering their exit while the rest of us finish the job. Any questions?”

New members sometimes wondered why an entity as seemingly half-cracked as Xelas was in a position of leadership. The older ones knew better. They’d been around long enough to see what happened when Xelas stopped laughing. Once she got serious, the bodies piled up fast.

“Do we have any more information on the one we’re supposed to spare besides the name and the fact he’s big?” Morgana asked.

Pseudonym shook his head. “That was all she had time to tell me. From the footage of the kidnapping, there appears to only be the one. If it becomes a problem...”

“I know. Nicety, not a priority. He’s still lumped in with these blood sacks.” Morgana held out her hand, a chunk of red armor on her arm re-liquefying and curling up, shaping itself into a sword before it hardened once more. “Councilors, are you ready?”

“Ready.” Arcanicus already had a spell half-woven in his hands, tendrils of blue light winding around him and Morgana both.

“Ready.” Xelas’s eyes lit up, and several panels on her body shifted alignment. When the assault came, few even had a chance to see which of her weapons was the one that struck them down.

“Ready.” Pseudonym cast his eyes to the new guild members. Bahamut was clutching a suitcase tightly to her scaly chest. They were scared for their friend, and not without good reason. But they were also scared for what was about to happen. Large-scale slaughter still affected them. Deep down, Ivan envied that.

Morgana tilted her blade toward the building. “Let’s go show these bastards what happens to any who challenge our guild.”

A pair of twos. All day playing intermittent poker to pass the time, and this was one of the better hands he'd gotten. Darius was starting to wonder if he'd busted a mirror recently, because luck did not seem to be with him.

With one eye always on Deacon, as a good bodyguard should, he raised some paperclips. Playing with cash was impractical, especially around other criminals, so cheap office supplies had long ago become the stand-in. One of the many tricks he'd found in his years doing this sort of work.

TV was favored by many to pass the hours, but Darius found it too dangerous. Anything that lulled a brain into complacency was working against them. Games, especially ones with stakes, kept minds active and sharp. Losing focus meant losing money, and this was not the sort of crowd to easily part with their pennies. Sometimes, punches were thrown, yet even that was good to keep the blood pumping, so long as the tussles were ended swiftly.

Across the table, his opponents were examining their own options. Did they look nervous? Keeping his expectations in check, Darius wondered if this might actually be a stronger hand than he'd known. If they were weak, this could be the time to push, to put that luck of his to the test for—

The explosion came from the rear entrance without warning. Too loud, far too loud for what would have been required to knock out that door. And if something had been approaching, unless it was coming stupid fast, their guy watching the cameras would have noticed. Had... had someone fired a missile into their door? That seemed crazy, yet it was the only explanation that made immediate sense.

Moving on instinct, Darius was already up, shielding Deacon with his considerable size. "Boss, we need to go."

"One explosion doesn't mean the fight is lost," Deacon protested. "We've got weaponry these capes aren't expecting; our battle has only just begun." As he spoke, the others were already scrambling for their borrowed gear—heaps of cobbled-together components shaped roughly into usable tools. A few were already turned on, letting out low-level hums or gaining glows along their blades.

Maybe, if it had been capes, Deacon would have been right. It didn't matter, though, as something that used to be a person came stumbling into the room before Darius's eyes. Half its flesh was roasted off; crackling sparks ran along its exposed bone, until balance failed and it landed in a heap of smoking bones and meat. The final vestiges of life faded as its skinless hand reached for them, finally falling limp.

“Capes don’t kill people like that. We have to go now.”

Not waiting for permission, Darius scooped his employer up and raced deeper into the building. He was just around the corner when he heard the front door—in the room where they’d been playing cards moments before—slam heavily open. After that, it was hard to make out anything over the screaming. Instant, horrific, and impossibly sustained. Whatever was happening, someone was making it hurt.

“She was right. Fuck me, she was right the whole time.” Rumors. Whispers. Stories that big crime bosses tell up-and-coming conquerors to keep them in line. Except this wasn’t a cape raid. Darius had seen plenty of those, had even been rounded up in a few. The AHC didn’t come in melting flesh and exploding doors. This left only one plausible explanation: the stories were true, and the guild wasn’t as out of commission as he’d thought.

“That woman did this?” Deacon snapped, trying to look up from his position under Darius’s arm.

“More like she knew it would happen.” Zipping around a corner, Darius heard horrified yells coming from the left, and silence from the right. Right it was, then. He took the turn with minimal loss of momentum. Without realizing it, Darius had put himself on a path to Emory’s quarters. As the only two decent metas and bodyguards, they had the best chance of fighting their way out, minimal though that was starting to seem.

Perhaps there was another way. Tori hadn’t been especially subtle, hinting that she knew more than she was letting on. If it wasn’t all fake, wasn’t all just shit-talking, then maybe she could do something, say something. He was grasping at straws and was perfectly aware of that, but straws were all he had to grab in the moment.

Darius slapped open Emory’s door, shattering the lock and revealing a room with a spray of clothing and bedsheets coating its floor. The noise must have woken Emory up, and he’d gone looking for them. Damn it. No time to search, not without a lead. They’d head for Tori’s cell and hope to run into him on the way.

“Don’t worry, boss, I got you. We’ll make it through this.” Wishing he felt even a fraction as sure as his voice sounded, Darius sprinted off once more, hoping against hope that his shitty luck had worn itself out on the poker table.

The clucking “tsks” sounded not quite right as Nexus strolled along the near empty hallway, stepping over a smoldering leg. Too easy, that was the problem. These goons might have had top-tier concealment tech, but the weapons they’d been sold weren’t nearly of the same caliber. Against average metas, sure, a double-chamber anti-ion blast would do some real damage. Facing down three councilors of the guild? A white flag would give one a better chance of survival. In some versions, they got the really good stuff, and while those fights ended the same, they were at least more fun to watch.

Reaching a hand out, Nexus ran his fingertips along the walls. Where they touched, a seam opened, revealing a swirling mass of colors and chaos not unlike his kaleidoscope eyes. From the shifting realms came a form, big as a wolf, long like a snake, armored like an insect, and with many-toothed mouths at both ends. One end opened, firing a stream of pink liquid that bubbled and hissed the moment it touched concrete, dissolving the material in seconds. More beings followed, some locking mouths, working together, rolling and slithering in a wholly unnatural way as they scattered throughout the building.

These would certainly not be enough to make any difference in the fight. Nexus reeled at the memories of what it actually took to put down these three. Other worlds, other days, he’d seen the carnage they could call upon when threatened. Eventually, they wore down, yet the results always had major, lasting consequences on that iteration. Universes like this one, versions with multiple Singulars, had to be managed more delicately. One true indulgence today might cost years of entertainment down the line. This was just something to add a little spice to the morning’s events.

Nexus continued along the hallway, ignoring the sounds of slithering invaders as he headed to his next viewing location. There were still a few turning points left to observe, and he loathed coming in late to these things. It never felt as good as catching it from the start.

---

Chapter 30

---

Picking off survivors was far from Morgana's idea of a good time, or even a sporting challenge, but then, that's why this wasn't a job for the heroic metas.

From behind a wall, two men came leaping, both holding technological weaponry. It made no difference. She'd already felt the blood in their veins long before drawing close, and as they moved, she took control of it, turning their inner liquid into blades and spears that came bursting out of their flesh. Morgana took care to mangle their bodies, ensuring that an autopsy would give nothing away. There was a time to work in secret, a time to leave a trace, and knowing the difference often defined who went to jail versus who walked free.

A new noise came from behind her. Whipping around, Morgana formed a shield of blood out of the two bodies' contribution to her pool. Pink liquid struck, popping and sizzling, actually managing to burn through some of her defenses.

"What in the hells...?" A single glance answered her question. Three unnatural creatures, slapping and rolling and slithering with disgusting speed, were coming to join a fourth with a drip of pink liquid falling from its front mouth—or at least, the mouth that was in front at this particular moment. Neither seemed especially dominant, and worse, whatever was in these otherworldly creatures wasn't blood.

"Arcanicus, looks like we've got interlopers. Maybe part of their defense, but it wouldn't be my bet. Can you send word out to Pseudonym that things might get complicated?"

“Of course.” Arcanicus raised his hands, creating a circle of white fire around the four monsters. In moments, the fire rushed inward, surging over all of them. It took a full minute for them to burn, by the end of which Arcanicus had completed sending his mystical message. Given that they were walking into a place blocking all tech, magical relay had made the most sense for communicating.

His gaze turned worried as he looked on, noting the smoldering remains. “These things are harder than they look. Bonfire would cook a normal human in seconds, someone like Thuggernaut in a half-minute, tops.”

Sudden, strange creatures appearing on the scene fit several old metas’ methods, but those would all be a stretch. The most obvious answer was usually right, and with this, Nexus may as well have signed his name on one of the creatures. He very well might have, in fact; it wasn’t like he cared much for subtlety.

“Should we find Xelas?” Since their robotic colleague was entirely formed of technology, her ability to interact with magic was limited, and that included mystical messages. It was a risk they’d realized going in; however, given the limitations of the job, there was no avoiding it.

Arcanicus stroked his beard twice, then his head shook. “If I can handle them, she’ll be fine. The larger job is purging these things before any make their way to the package. I doubt they will show a kidnapper’s restraint.”

“Pushing on it is.” Morgana reached out, feeling the next sacks of waiting blood. She’d have to be more careful now; there were entities in the mix she couldn’t instantly destroy. There might have been, perhaps, a hint of a smile on Morgana’s face as she adjusted the grip on her sword.

Now this was a little more entertaining.

The clang of the door unlocking startled Tori. She had no way of gauging the time precisely, but it had been long enough that she knew the moment was drawing close. Though this felt early, it was also a good sign. The capes must be here to set her free. Affecting a weary, scared expression was harder than she expected, especially when she had to hurry to compose herself as the door pushed open. She didn't end up doing a very good job, not that it mattered. The man standing before her was certainly not a cape.

"They put you in this one? Curious. Usually, you're a few doors down." Nexus stepped back, checking the hallway like a lost tourist, then shrugging in acceptance. "Oh well. The surprises are what make it interesting."

"Why do you always show up at the worst times?" Tori wasn't sure when the madman's presence had turned from shocking development to occasional annoyance. Maybe she just didn't have the spare energy to spend on him right now.

He wagged a finger at her, something she'd only seen from old professors and bad television. "Not the worst parts, the fun parts. The bits worth seeing. True, some are better than others, but even on the rewatch, I don't like to skip anything... especially since the details are never quite the same. Don't worry. You rarely die in all this."

The door began to close once more, going just slow enough for her to hear Nexus's parting words. "Of course, I also don't usually bring along acid-spitting friends. I wonder how that will impact things."

The door shut loudly; however, there was no sound of it locking. Nexus wasn't worried about her escaping—wasn't worried about anything at all, most likely. More force of nature than person, he was a long-standing thorn that countless wanted to pull out, yet no one had succeeded. Today wasn't the time to worry about Nexus. More concerning was whatever it was he'd let loose, and how it was going to impact the rescue mission.

Taking a deep breath, Tori forced herself to stay calm and ignore her now unlocked door. This wasn't about escape; a door could never have held her if she'd opted to leave. It was about building a story, a message, and an alibi all in one go. The others had her back. She just needed to trust that they'd be able to handle whatever bumps Nexus put in the way.

It wasn't a terribly hard leap of faith, knowing her guild and its power. If anything, she started to wonder what was taking so long.

"Come on... come on... finally!" Xelas pulled her finger from the massive computer tower, a USB port vanishing as her digit reformed. Though there were receivers and components spread throughout the building, she'd needed to find the digital heart for her side mission. There was no shame in someone else creating tech that rivaled the guild's; such was the nature of progress and innovation. However, there was no way they were dealing with this a second time. Xelas had just downloaded all the software and schematics, her ocular sensors scanning every component that wasn't shielded. They'd have to do a little guesswork here and there, but that was no major hurdle for her and Doctor Mechaniacal.

One piece caught her attention in particular. Directly at the center of the machine, buried deep in its core, was a box that read like a black hole. It was so shielded and dense that it had to be intentional, some sort of lure meant to draw in the too-curious. Another time, she might have probed further. Today was not the time to risk a trap, however. One of their own had been taken, and they needed to make clear why that was a horrendous idea.

Xelas turned the corner just in time to see a pair of tube-like monsters joined at the mouth slide past the door she'd exited. The pair slapped around, what looked like nine tongues coming out of each mouth to taste the air, walls, and concrete. No reaction. Probably didn't distinguish her as a life form. It wasn't uncommon with interlopers; they reacted to the biological because it was what they were familiar with.

Choosing a midrange weapon, Xelas shot the one on the right, the bolt from her shoulder searing and wounding it, but not finishing the job. Tough little bastards; that would have gone clean through a car. Pink liquid shot out from the left one's mouth, a stream that Xelas easily dodged. This time, she picked something with more stopping power. A flash of yellow as the beam struck, and now the one on the left was sliced cleanly in two.

More pink gushed from its insides, ruining the flooring. Another blast to finish off the right one, which was unhooking its connected mouth from its now dead cohort. It never had time to finish before her beam hit.

"These'll liven things up." Xelas was already moving, acutely aware that the introduction of an unknown factor could spin their plans out of control. She moved so fast, in fact, that Xelas missed what came only half a minute after the monsters were killed.

That's how long it took for the new flesh to start growing.

Careening down a hall, Darius ducked into an alcove to catch his breath. He set Deacon down, eyes peeled for whoever was cutting down their gang at a rapid clip. They were still a ways off from Tori's cell—some of the screaming had forced them on a circuitous route. Not knowing what they were up against, Darius couldn't risk engaging, especially with the boss in tow.

"You need a break already?" Despite his people being roasted and butchered, Deacon was somehow more angry than sad or scared.

"If I'm gassed and need to defend you, we're as good as done." A noise caught Darius's ears: movement, action... was someone fighting? They were directly across from the room with some free weights and chairs, jokingly called "the gym" by everyone here. Was it possible one of the others had survived? "Hang on, we might have backup."

Darius had only gotten a few steps when Deacon's hand grabbed his arm. "Absolutely not. Whatever is happening in there is none of our concern. Do your job, bodyguard. Get me to the girl so we can put an end to this."

While both a professional and a veteran at working for dickheads, Darius did have his limits. Suddenly finding himself fighting for survival stole a lot of the energy he usually dedicated toward patience. Perhaps that was why he snapped up Deacon by the neck and pinned him to the wall.

"Put an end to this? Look around, you egotistical nut. This is over. It's been over from the moment you convinced us to steal a civilian off the street. Do you think we're coming back from this? Those screams aren't just noises. Those are your people! My friends! And it's your fault we're in this mess."

Only... was it? Deacon was ignorant of the rules or blinded by ambition. Darius had neither excuse. He'd known the risks, heard the warnings, and still hadn't managed to turn Deacon from these tactics. If anyone was responsible for all this, it might very well be Darius himself.

Releasing his grip, the big meta allowed Deacon to drop back to the ground, where he immediately scrambled to his feet and dashed off. Most likely to his death, though there was always the chance he'd wriggle free. Rats had a talent for survival.

With Deacon out of the way, Darius's attention was drawn back to the noises from the gym. He ripped the door clean off, unveiling a very curious-looking fight. Emory was darting around, avoiding a trio of two-headed nightmare snakes spitting sizzling pink goo. Occasionally, he'd whip a free weight at one, but the damned things could dodge with hideous grace.

Not one to waste time, Darius hefted up the first weight he could find and slammed it down onto the nearest snake head.

It definitely left an impact—cracks along the head were dripping pink goop—however, the blow wasn't enough to crush the head completely. Given Darius's size and strength, that said a lot about how durable these things were, as well as how fucked the gang might be. If his strength wasn't enough, and Emory's venom would presumably be limited on their anatomy, then this was a bad fight. There was no way to win; they'd just wear down until someone made a mistake.

"Emory, we need to go." At his words, the monsters seemed to grow more active. Did they understand, or just realize more prey was in the room?

"Tried that. They spray down the exit if I get near. I think they've locked in on me as prey."

The dissolved sections of room made it obvious what that pink stuff did, even if Darius couldn't see it happening for himself as one sprayed toward Emory. Four of them, two mouths apiece, with only one being a little smashed up. Too many streams. The creatures could cover every angle. This was a fight they couldn't win, or escape, especially presuming that there were more enemies still to account for—unless these creatures could also create explosions and roast skin.

"I've got an idea!" Darius leapt into the room proper, dodging a spray of pink as he arrived at Emory's side. "Give me your hand, quick!"

Just like a good student, Emory did as instructed. Darius didn't hesitate. He jerked Emory into a bear-hug, wrapping his sizable heft around the smaller crook. After that, Darius was running. He heard the sounds of the jaws opening while he was still ten feet from the door. The first stream hit as he was crossing through, with a second and third right on its heels. Pain came quickly, his clothes turning to nothing, exposing his flesh. Like most burly metas, Darius was tough on top of being big, something he was counting on to buy them both extra steps.

Unfortunately, one of streams hit his left leg, slowing the run down considerably. Darius could hear the monsters following, slapping and slithering as they gave chase, fresh sprays of pink searing his back. The acid was stronger than he'd expected, a realization that came as his legs began to buckle.

No. They weren't far enough yet. They needed to get away, to give Emory a head start, a fighting chance. Darius was still trying to push himself forward when his legs suddenly went numb. The goo must have gotten a piece of his spine. Part of Darius wanted to see how much of his back even remained, but he knew it was a sight that would haunt the short remainder of his life.

Legs gone, arms wrapped around a struggling Emory, and monsters drawing close. This was looking bleak. Then came a flash of yellow to his left and squeals of pain from behind.

Glancing back, Darius saw all the monsters sliced up, carved neatly down their centers. Looking forward again, he discovered himself looking up at the form of Xelas. Famous for many reasons, not the least of which was her affiliation to the guild at the center of the Ridge City Riots.

It was all true. The legends, the warnings, the secret cabal patrolling the underground. All of it real, and Darius had ignored the warnings. He was already dead, his body in the process of dissolving from interloper acid. He wasn't gone just yet, though. There might still be time to save one.

"Please... he's just a kid. My fault all this happened. I knew. I knew, and I ignored, but he didn't. He was only starting... didn't know... my fault. My fault."

Darius continued to whisper the words as his voice grew hoarse. They slipped from his mouth while Xelas leaned down, chose a precise spot on the skull, and struck. No more words, or pain, as he dropped limply to the ground. Big guy, showing concern for others; this was definitely the one Tori said to spare if they could.

Flipping him over, Xelas revealed another meta, one with serpent-like physical markings. He was scared and panicked, not shocking since a friend of his had just died on top of him. Snap judgment time. They didn't owe this guy shit, especially considering the circumstances. But Darius had been the one Tori asked be spared, and he'd given his life to save the kid. Logic said the smartest path was to kill him here and get on with the job. Xelas was more than a mere robot, however. She could see past the simple logic, taking into account that Darius had been decent enough that Tori wanted to save him, and that he'd died helping a friend.

Humans talked a lot of crap about love, loyalty, and honor. Most of it was just that, too: pure shit, fantasies to make themselves feel like better people than they were. Every now and then, however, one would actually live up to those lofty ideals, if only for a moment. Seeing those instances was one of Xelas's favorite parts of being around their kind, watching their own self-serving fiction catalyze into reality. Maybe this guy was worth saving, most likely he wasn't. That would be up to him to decide, though.

One shot from the mini-injector canon was all it took to knock the new prisoner out. Xelas slung him over her shoulder, preparing to resume the search for Tori. However, getting positioned took long enough that by the time she was ready to move on, Xelas noticed movement coming from the bisected monster corpses. Specifically, she noticed the new limbs and body parts growing at an incredible rate.

"Oh, fuck me. I just had to pick today to get a pet." Emory still unconscious on her shoulder, Xelas ran off down the nearest hall, wondering if she'd find a way to warn the others.

---

Chapter 31

---

“Sir.”

The aide stood at the door, waiting for permission to enter the office. When Professor Quantum was working, he loathed to be interrupted; however, this was a Priority One message. No wiggle room on these. It had to be brought to a member of the Champions’ Congress. Quorum and Lodestar were out in the field, meaning that only Professor Quantum was immediately on hand.

It took a full two minutes before Professor Quantum looked up from the desk where he was tinkering with some curious device. Silently, he waved the aide in. He didn’t even make eye contact, instead staring at the place where the messenger would stand.

She took the order, striding over and opening the page in her hands. “Sir, there was a wild dimensional breach detected. Seems to have come from Michigan, near the Detroit area. Something interfered with the reading, so we’re having trouble pinpointing the location.”

“Interesting.” That wasn’t just a canned reply. For the first time, Professor Quantum appeared to be paying attention to the conversation. “Our dimension doesn’t experience wild breaches anymore. The most common instances now are metas accidentally creating rips, and Nexus, with the latter considerably outweighing the former.”

The aide’s face paled. “Oh no. Not today. We still haven’t recovered that woman, and now Nexus is on the move?”

“Unlikely. His big displays are more overt. Nexus is like a carrion fly, drawn to the scent of blood.” Professor Quantum considered for a moment longer. “Push some of our resources into searching Detroit, and start moving assets there. I have a hunch that might just be where we find our missing civilian.”

“Yes, sir.” The aide paused, looking at the Priority Three alert also on the page. Technically, this one didn’t require immediate attention, but if she told him now, she could skip going through this again later. “One more thing, probably not related. Some of our monitoring tech caught a message being fired into space less than an hour ago. We couldn’t see what it said, only that one went out.”

“Not many terrestrial devices capable of that. I’ll consider it.” Professor Quantum went back to his project, a not-so-subtle way of ending the conversation.

That was fine by the aide. She was more than ready to leave. It wasn’t even dawn, and this was already shaping into a hell of day.

“Holy crap!”

Morgana spun around to find Arcanicus staring at two hideous monsters. A mound of grasping claws, with a body covered in mouths endlessly opening and closing, one head rising off the back like a scorpion’s tail. A familiar head, at that. It looked like one of the snake creatures, only hacked in half and stuck on top of something even more disgusting.

“Sweet sorcery, that made my heart skip a beat.” Arcanicus gestured and a wall of Bonfire appeared between him and the creatures. It was just in time as the body’s dozen mouths opened, firing streams of pink liquid in every direction. The bits that hit his magic walls sizzled and hissed. Potent acid though it might be, the defenses of a guild councilor were not so easily broken. “Do you think they’re evolving?”

“Adapting would be my guess. Maybe they’re like worms, regrowing a body that’s been cut in half. Only they do it in their own terrible way.” Morgana looked through the flames. The first versions had been the size of normal dogs. These ones were closer to mastiffs. “Burn them to ash. We can’t take chances. Then give Pseudonym the update. These things probably won’t stay in the building for long.”

“Should we adjust the plan? Might not be safe to leave the package for extraction.”

That was a damn good question, one Morgana wished she had a quick answer for. Nexus had, as Nexus often did, fucked things up considerably. They still had dead gang members to put in place, but the tale they’d been spinning was muddled. First, they needed to make sure Tori was safe. After they’d completed the rescue, they could decide how to manage the spin.

Though Morgana didn’t know it, the interlopers had already begun to spill from the building. Much as Ivan wanted to leave them be, knowing that dead creatures outside the building would raise questions, he couldn’t risk one of them escaping into the night. These entities couldn’t last long here—even getting through to this plane of existence was only thanks to Nexus—but they were capable of serious destruction with the time they had.

“Glyph, seal off the back door. Pest Control, get us some eyes. Bahamut, set down the suitcase. You’re with me.”

In a blink, both literal and magical, Ivan appeared in front of the first creature. A spray of pink shot out, just as Arcanicus had warned. He didn’t even bother to dodge, letting it fizzle ineffectively off his wards. Picking up the nearest monster, Ivan grabbed both heads and squeezed. It took more force than he’d been expecting, but both soon popped like he’d gripped a juice box too hard. More pink dripped down his hands, not that it mattered. The wards were just to protect his costume; this sort of attack wasn’t even capable of hurting him.

“Bahamut, do you have any sort of immunity to acid?”

“Not that I know of.” She was almost to his side already, quite fast in her green dragon form. “Just kind of tough, in general.”

Expected, but not ideal. “Then you’re on crowd control. Dodge the acid, but keep them corralled. Throw them back toward me, if needed. Once Glyph seals off the rear exit, this will be the funnel they all come through. Be ready for a rush at any time.”

“Shouldn’t we be going after Tori? You know, now that there are crazy acid monsters, it seemed like maybe the plan might be scrapped.”

“Perhaps, perhaps not. We needed a scapegoat for the capes to look at. Nexus works as well as the gang did. Better, in some ways, since he was actually part of this.” Ivan grabbed another creature and popped both heads. He was going faster, now that he knew the amount of strength required. “Regardless, that’s up to the ones inside. We help by clearing them a safe exit, and ensuring the message isn’t muddled by one of these things escaping and melting a hospital.”

That seemed to placate her, for a moment. “What if she’s in trouble? What if she calls for help?”

“Then I’ll rip the building in half and be at her side in an instant.” No laughter or ego in that statement. It was purely factual, and Bahamut could see that. Just because they were using the delicate method now didn’t mean they could switch to force if needed. They were both excellent tactics in a villain’s toolkit.

Darting past one of the creatures, Bahamut gripped it by the middle and hurled it toward Ivan, who snagged it from the air and crushed it between his hands, seemingly without effort. “If that happens, bring me along.”

“Sorry, but no. Not how we work. You want to be there with me in a moment like that?” Ivan dropped the mangled corpse to the ground, where its pink blood immediately began to dissolve the grass, despite leaving Ivan’s hands unblemished. “Become strong enough to get there yourself.”

This time, there was no preamble or warning. The door swung open, not quite powerfully enough to bang against the wall. To be fair, it was a heavy one, and Deacon was not a man burdened by excess muscle.

He looked like hell, which was honestly still better than Tori had expected by this point. She’d assumed he’d be crushed, melted, skewered—really it was just a question of who the guild had sent that would determine what form his death would take. Yet somehow, here he was, panicked and trying his damndest to get the door shut once more.

“Things not going great? Feels early for another bathroom break. You don’t want to spoil me.”

“Shut the fuck up!” Deacon whipped around at her, snapping the words. He was way off-kilter, not that he’d seemed overly stable to begin with.

This was a step beyond, though. Between Nexus popping up and the guild being there, she didn't know exactly what was going down, but she could make some fair assumptions.

Behind her back, Tori phased her left wrist into fire form for a split second, letting the metal cuff slip through, catching it in her right hand before it could fall and rattle the chain. This felt like a situation where having both hands and not being stuck to a chair might be advantageous, but she didn't want to play her cards just yet. If she was doing this, then she was going all the way. And there was one major question she wanted answered before Deacon was off the board.

"Seems like it's just you and me. No underlings or goons to impress. Be honest: how did you get blocking equipment good enough to stall the AHC?"

"Why the hell would I tell you that? Why I would help you at all?" Deacon was scouring his pockets, refusing to face the harsh realization that he didn't have a key to lock the door with.

"Because it's pretty obvious that whoever gave you that tech knew you'd fail. They were using you. No idea for what, but this plan was doomed from the jump, and anyone smart enough to build that kind of shit could probably see it."

Fury boiled up in Deacon's eyes as he stalked across the room, glowering down at Tori. "I have had enough of your mouth, enough of your hollow courage, enough of you. You may very well be right; I probably will die here with the rest of my crew. But at least I can take those flapping gums of yours with me."

And just like that, he reached in to choke her.

It might have scared Tori, if he'd been faster or more aggressive, but ultimately, Deacon didn't have any practice at this. Anger was carrying him past where his normal boldness would have faltered. Tori let him come, adjusting her grip on the cuff slightly, pushing the ratchet all the way through until the cuff was open again. She let him get his hands around her neck, waited until he'd begun to squeeze in earnest. His eyes locked, he was set on the task at hand.

That was when Tori struck, driving the sharp ratchet arm of her open cuff directly into Deacon's left leg. She yanked it out just as his screams began to bubble forth and his grip loosened, which made her kick to his stomach land all the harder.

He stumbled back, coughing and clutching his wounded leg, while Tori stood from her chair.

“You... bitch...”

“Hey, count yourself lucky. I was aiming for your crotch, my angle was just shit.” At long last, Tori’s own rage could show itself. These people had taken her off the street, threatened her life, the lives of her friends, and even tried to kill her at the end. Worst of all, because of them, she’d had to see something she’d have been happier not knowing. This incident had shown Tori the truth of their world. Capes weren’t enough. It needed horrors, demons, unfathomable monsters who still had things to protect. People outside of morality, yet not ones who’d completely lost their humanity.

The world needed villains.

Tori let the other half of the cuffs phase off her wrist, setting them down on the chair. “It’s funny that you’re blaming me for all of this. How many different ways did I say to let me go or everyone would die?”

There weren’t even words this time, just a guttural scream as Deacon charged, swinging wildly. He was better than she’d expected, but that didn’t mean he was good. Not compared to someone with guild training and Tori’s own experience.

She sidestepped the charge, tripping him and pushing his skull so he went careening into the chair. Both landed with a clatter, though the chair wasn’t bleeding from its head.

“Not so easy when you have to throw the punches, is it?” Tori stalked closer to him. “I always hated your kind. The ‘mastermind’ who sits on a throne of inactivity while everyone else gets their hands dirty. I’ve seen so many gangs like this, so many kings of tiny kingdoms who mistake their groups’ power for their own.”

“The fuck are you talking about?” Deacon had stopped rubbing his stomach and was trying to stand once more. “You work in a downtown office.”

Tori made no move to stop him from rising. She wanted him back on his feet. “People have secrets. Some you can’t find through even the most dedicated web-browsing. You’re supposed to be a smart one. Have you pieced together mine yet?”

Slowly, Deacon found his balance, standing despite his wounds and exhaustion. Had Tori liked him, she might have found the gesture inspiring.

Instead, it just made for a more convenient position. This time, she planned to get her angles right.

“Meta-human, obviously.” He spit blood from his mouth a few times. Evidently, he’d gathered quite a bit during that chair collision. “Of all the fucking luck, we ended up taking a meta.”

“Oh no, that would have been much better for you.” Tori walked closer. “See, there was only one true lie I told during the so-called interrogation. It was never them coming from the shadows to get you. It was us.”

She grabbed him by the back of the head, leading Deacon to struggle. One punch just below the sternum put a quick end to that, however. He was gasping now, trying so hard to draw in breath. Perfect. Lifting her right arm, Tori turned the entire appendage into living flame.

“You didn’t just kidnap a civilian, or a meta, or a cape’s friend. You stepped into the ring with real villains. This was the only way it could have ended.”

Her arm rammed past his lips and teeth, down the throat, reached all the way down into his lungs. The air inside them roasted instantly, the organs themselves soon catching fire, along with the rest of Deacon. Tori held it like that until he was truly alight—this was no time for half-measures—then pulled her arm out, returning it to normal form.

The burning body of Deacon collapsed. Mostly likely, he was already dead. If not, he’d cross over soon. Just in case, Tori decided to leave him with some parting words.

“Sorry, pal, but you know the expression: if you can’t stand the heat, don’t fuck with Hephaestus.”

---

Chapter 32

---

No sleep, barely any food, and eyes blurring between blinks. Donald had stopped short of donning a diaper, but he'd also waited so long between bathroom breaks that there were a few close calls and one photo finish. It didn't feel especially dignified or heroic to be locked in his room with Ren playing Constable Fluffers nonstop for hours on end, yet it was without question the best way Donald could spend his time.

Deep down, he was kicking himself. All these months, his efforts had been targeted toward field work, leveling up items and training skills he needed to be out there fighting the good fight. Only today, faced with his own utter helplessness, did Donald realize how much more there was to doing his job. Finding people in need, getting to them, securing and transporting criminals, helping the injured—it was never-ending the more he thought about it. He'd fallen into a pattern without realizing it, gotten too comfortable in the routine. It was time to widen his training scope, add some new abilities to the arsenal. After Tori was safe, of course.

It was just at the cusp of dawn when Donald stumbled into the room where he and Ren had met with the Champions' Congress less than twenty-four hours prior. Professor Quantum was the only one of the main three there, though there was a flurry of other members zipping around him. Donald was too exhausted to even recognize masks, let alone recall names. He only had eyes for the man at the top.

"Sir, Mr. Professor Quantum..."

No response, or even a glance in his direction. What the hell was going on? Turning, Donald saw Ren talking to another cape. Normal Donald might have found the patience to wait until he was called upon. This version of Donald, the one running on no sleep and wracked with fear for his friend, wasn't quite so willing to wait.

"She's in Detroit!" He yelled the words, not especially concerned with the stares coming his way. Only one set of eyes in this room mattered, and mercifully, they did indeed swivel in his direction.

Stepping away from his conversation, Professor Quantum was there in only a few of his long-legged strides. "I see. And how did you come to this conclusion?"

"Just like I said I would. Played my game all day, got the magnifying glass, and used it." Donald didn't even have the strength to be intimidated. He just rattled off the truth as coherently as he could. "I checked it twice, same results. She's somewhere in Detroit."

Professor Quantum looked hard at Donald, giving him true attention in a way that made the younger meta uncomfortable. "This is your one chance. If you've spoken to someone, gotten an inside track, I assure you, I'll uncover it. Now, for the last time: you're saying you found her, even when the entirety of the AHC's methods had failed?"

"No. I'm saying she's in Detroit. That's a long way off from finding her."

"Hmm." One wave of Professor Quantum's hand and an aide was at his side. "This is the second time your power has accomplished something past what I'd expected. I dislike giving credit when not well-earned, but I detest being wrong. It seems I must adjust my measurement of your capabilities, Cyber Geek. We shall deal with that at another time. For now, you're heading to the med bay for recovery."

Donald almost reached out to touch Professor Quantum, then thought better of it. "Please, no. I want to be there. I want to help save her. I want to make sure she's all right."

The stare that met his pleas was unyielding. No pity, no sense of understanding, an absolute denial. The voice, however, made at least an effort toward comfort. "Your wish to be there is misguided. Given your condition, putting you in the field is more likely to cause problems than help solve them. You want her safe and saved? I cannot promise what her condition is. However, I can say this much: Lodestar and Quorum are both standing by for the moment we have a location."

There was nowhere left to take the argument. Donald certainly couldn't claim that, even at his peak, he'd be a contributing factor when two members of the Champions' Congress would be there. At Donald's current skill level, Professor Quantum was honestly right. It was more likely he'd be a liability than any sort of help. It was just... he'd finally become the kind of person who could jump in to make a difference, but when it was personal, he was on the sidelines.

"Donald, you gave them a location. You made a difference."

The fact that he hadn't even noticed Ren approach proved Professor Quantum's point, even as the older man was shaking his head. "Actually, we've known about Detroit for approximately twenty minutes. But I expect we'll be calling on that ability of yours in the future. While I had my doubts, it shows promise to be useful."

Someone called out what sounded like random numbers, drawing Professor Quantum's instant attention. He didn't even look at them, simply turned and walked away. As the aide gently took Donald's arm, leading him off toward the med bay, the bespectacled man leaned in, whispering in Donald's ear.

"For reference, 'useful' is one of the nicest things he says about anyone. Believe it or not, I think you impressed him."

Nice as that was to hear, Donald didn't feel especially impressive. He wanted to be there, part of the rescue, to see her safe. One all-nighter, and he was down for the count. Too weak, again. This couldn't keep happening. Cyber Geek was going to have to get stronger.

The plan was good and well-fucked, that much was obvious. Between Nexus being here and the smoldering corpse in her room, the original cover story was going to need some tweaks. Tori turned toward the door, making it only a few steps before it felt as if the ground fell away. Her head swam, a sensation almost like pain hitting her right in the forehead. Initially, she tried to push it away, before remembering the last time something like this had happened. Not a hard recollection to call upon, seeing as it had only been a few hours.

Mentally relaxing, Tori felt the not-quite-pain flare, then vanish. Moments later, she heard a familiar voice. Not in her ears, however. This was purely in her mind.

Listen carefully. This is Pseudonym. Arcanicus is acting as a magical relay from inside the dampening field, but we still need to make this quick. Nexus showed up unexpectedly, complicating matters. After a quick discussion, we only see two paths forward. You can leave with us now; we have your suit. Or you could destroy the dampening equipment, summoning the AHC. With Nexus in play, you can claim to have escaped in the chaos.

What a choice. Leave now, and risk all the questions that point might raise with the capes—to say nothing if the media ever found out that Tori had magically gone missing from her own kidnapping. Or fight her way past whatever it was Nexus let loose and hope to make it through an AHC interrogation. Tori examined the situation, taking in as many factors as she could account for.

Ultimately, it was her status as a kidnapped civilian that made the call. Right now, she was a victim, someone who'd been targeted because of her association to the capes. That would make it difficult for them to push her too hard. She'd have the public's sympathy, and the AHC was already working to win back the people. If she changed the dynamic, it almost certainly wouldn't be as favorable: Plucky victim who saved herself beat vanishing mysteriously from the site of a slaughter.

Closing her eyes and thinking the words hard, Tori hoped she was successfully talking back. Magic was messy and imprecise in her experience, which was all the more reason she preferred science.

I'll break their system. Can you give me any sort of guidance? Info on what Nexus brought is also appreciated.

In response, she got images, flashes of two-headed, pink-spitting serpents, and the more horrifying version that looked like a mound of mouths—one that was tough, spewed acid, and had recovered from being torn in half. This would be a game of dodge more than anything. She wasn't sure if dimensional acid worked on fire and would prefer to run such tests in a structured laboratory environment. Stay quick, move fast, and hope she found her goal soon.

Only Xelas found the room, and she doesn't know where you are to give directions. North side of the building, the door is torn down. If you're sure this is the right course, we have to start pulling back. Once the capes know where you are, she'll be here in seconds.

It didn't escape Tori's attention that he said "she" instead of "they," but by now, his former apprentice had accepted that to Ivan, there was only one real threat the capes had to wield. For him, solely Lodestar was of concern; however, Tori still had to worry about the rest of the bunch, all of whom would be descending upon her with confusion and questions. It said a lot about Tori Rivas that she was more anxious about the impending discussion than dodging deadly monsters to secure her freedom.

I'm sure. Get everyone out of here. I got this.

They'll be gone within minutes. I'll be here to the end. Just in case.

The connection snapped off without warning, leaving Tori alone once more. No, she'd always been here by herself—that was an important distinction to keep in mind for later. Stick to the truth wherever she could. Her eyes drifted down to the smoldering corpse behind her. Well, he had been trying to strangle her, so at worse, that counted as self-defense. Probably best to avoid bringing it up, if possible.

Since the door was unlocked, there was no need to break out. She eased it open gently, ears perked for sounds of movement. There were loud thuds and noises coming from all over, yet none sounded particularly closer than the others. That meant there weren't any creatures near, or they were all right on top of her. Didn't change what she had to do next either way.

For someone without an internal compass, who'd been knocked out during her entry trip, knowing that her goal was in the north part of the building meant fuck all. The broken door part was more helpful, but as Tori checked the first such instance, it became clear that there was more than one busted barrier in this place. This one looked like a room where someone had been either hiding or resting. Neither had saved them from the eroding pink goo that appeared to have melted through half the room, occupant included.

She pushed the image away. In truth, Tori had been holding a lot of things back during this whole ordeal, and was starting to notice the strain. Good as it had felt in the moment, killing Deacon was running back through her head. This wasn't like with Rust Tooth, or some of her dodgier fights in her thief days. Those were about survival, her versus them. But she was much stronger than Deacon; he'd never been an actual threat.

More mental shoving. This was not the time for an ethical self-examination.

Focusing on the task at hand, Tori burst around a corner and skidded to a stop. Standing before her was one of the many-mouthed monsters, the larger version that nearly blocked the whole hallway. Its tail/head/whatever-the-hell whipped in her direction, letting off an instant blast of pink spray. Tori backpedaled, shooting off a blast of fire into the thing's center of mass. No visible reaction whatsoever. Guess it took more oomph to hurt these horrors. What she wouldn't give for her suit and its weaponry.

A fleck of acid hit her left arm, the pain sharp and immediate. Tori shifted to fire instantly, watching in horrified fascination as the droplet kept on eating through the flames. After a second or two, the heat caused it to boil off, finally freeing her from the droplet. Unfortunately, that was more than enough data to show she was vulnerable to these creatures, even in fire form. Enough of that pink goo could theoretically dissolve her before she could boil it off.

Speed had just become more important than stealth. Nowhere to hide in this concrete warehouse, so getting to the security room quickly was her biggest concern. Leaping into the air, Tori focused her flames, using the flying trick she'd learned during her first real test with the guild to get next to the ceiling. At least up here, they'd have to aim to hit her, and she could zip around without worrying about obstacles.

Her next burst of speed got her clear just in time, as a wave of pink burned the concrete right where she'd been. Sounds of movement kept her attention, and she realized the creature was giving chase. Its mouths weren't spitting acid, curiously. Instead, they seemed to be spitting out an array of unnatural, guttural slurping noises, like listening to pigs eat a trough full of yogurt. Only the tail/head kept firing, likely because it was the sole one with a chance of hitting her elevated position.

It wasn't until the next hallway that Tori understood. Three of the two-headed version and one more mouth mound were all waiting, letting loose a coordinated series of streams the moment she came into view. Only training and reflexes saved her. She shot down below the arc of the streams, putting on a burst of power and charging directly through the monsters. Their acid might hurt, but physically, they were still flesh and she was fire, meaning they couldn't actually block her path.

However, they could, it turned out, give chase. Suddenly, she was seeing pink coming from all angles, and the tight confines of the building made it impossible to break away completely. She couldn't build up speed with all the turning and checking, so Tori was forced to dodge with all she had. For the most part, she was holding together well, though she'd taken more than a few hits to the flames serving as her legs.

A big splotch got her in the back, nearly sending Tori spinning all the way to the ground, where she had no doubt a tidal wave of death was awaiting her. Ivan's lessons about pain and focus weren't for nothing, though. Leaving scorch marks on the wall, she slowed her descent, putting all her energy into heating up one section of her form. More shots came, thankfully missing, albeit barely. If she'd had teeth, they'd have been gritted as Tori gave one last push of effort and successfully turned the acid to steam.

Blasting forward, Tori took the next three turns she could, trying to buy a few inches of breathing room. Sadly, she could still hear them on her tail, but a new sight stole the entirety of her interest. A room with a broken door, and the telltale blinking twinkle of technology. She roared in, looking over the setup.

There was a massive amount of gear crammed into a single space, all of it incredibly dense. With a glance, she could recognize some of the components, yet far more were totally unfamiliar, or bore only the slightest resemblance to tech she was familiar with. Her hands, not even flesh at the moment, itched to tear it apart, see how it worked, what she could add to her own designs. The thunder of slithering following her down the hall made it clear that wasn't happening, much to her chagrin.

Raising a hand to roast the tech, she had a brief second thought. No reason to leave evidence if she didn't have to. Instead, she moved deeper into the room, her fluid form unbothered by the lack of space. In seconds, the pursuers had arrived, trying to force their way through the door all at once.

"Hey, you nasty shits. I'm right here. Maybe you can manage to hit a standing target."

The taunting probably didn't affect them—it just felt natural as Tori waved, drawing their attention. Sure enough, sprays of pink rained down. Instantly, Tori dropped back, falling behind one of the massive electronic towers. Sizzling met her ears as the goo began to tear through intricate systems and equipment. Working carefully, she began to solidify part of herself, shoving the equipment around until she'd made a small area in the back where a human could fit.

Sitting down to present as tiny a target as possible, Tori turned back to human form. Her arm was fine, but her back and legs still stung. More time was needed to regenerate fully, it seemed. While she'd still prefer that to being human and vulnerable, there was no choice. If the AHC was going to be swooping in as fast as Ivan expected, she couldn't very well be showing powers when they arrived.

More hissing, more noises, and Tori noticed the creatures were making progress. They'd cleared out a section near the front and were slowly pushing their way toward the back where Tori was holed up. The tower in front of her took several fresh sprays, and she began to wonder if it would even last long enough for help to arrive.

Her heart pounded. This was crazy. She couldn't sit and wait. She had to move, had to get free. They were getting closer. It was just a matter of time until they—

Tori shrieked as the tower blocking her from the rest of the room vanished, almost summoning fire on instinct. But this was no dimensional monster coming to melt her flesh. They didn't even have hands, so they couldn't effortlessly lift a huge piece of electronic equipment like it was nothing, and they certainly didn't glow.

Looking up, Tori found herself gazing into one of the AHC's greatest heroes and legends, the one superhero her teacher seemed to respect, as well as fear.

“L-Lodestar?”

“That's right, Tori. Don't worry, you're safe now.” She reached out a hand, and Tori took it without thinking.

In what felt like a blink, they were in the air, Tori effortlessly cradled in Lodestar's arms. From this high up, she could see the rainbow of capes arriving on the scene. Part of her wondered if Ivan had escaped in time, but she realized that there would be far more excitement if anyone spotted Fornax here. Adrenaline fading, the toll of a sleepless night and regenerating several wounds finally hit Tori full force.

She passed out before Lodestar had even gotten them out of Michigan.

---

Chapter 33

---

Every channel was talking about the rescue, some praising the AHC for recovering Tori safely, others wondering why it took so long. The destruction at the scene raised minimal eyebrows, as identical anchors with the same plastic smiles repeated the most salient point of that event: Nexus had been there. After so many decades of his presence, the public had accepted that they lived with one more form of natural disaster than they used to. No one was especially happy about it, but just like hurricanes and earthquakes, their feelings weren't a factor in the equation.

The pale, bald man sitting alone in his lab watched the screens. It would have been better if no one had gotten involved; he'd wanted to see how long his invention could keep the capes guessing on its own. That was an ideal test, something in a controlled environment; he'd run too many of those. Field data was essential, and until it had crapped out, his system had sent back quite a useful amount. If nothing else, he now knew his devices could buy at least twelve hours.

All in all, a successful beta-trial. The only hiccup had been those idiots kidnapping someone from the guild. While not a member himself, this man knew of them quite well. A bit too blunt for his tastes, they tended to be more chainsaw than scalpel, yet that didn't mean they could be ignored. That was the thing about blunt objects: they often hit quite hard. Another factor to keep track of, though he wasn't worried. There had been more elaborate schemes in the past, albeit not many; this was well within his capabilities.

Behind him, an odd, lumpy device began to chirp and squeal, soft lights cascading across its surface. Turning away from the television, his slender fingers ran across the mechanism, drawing out more horrifying noises. Perfect timing. With phase one wrapping up, he needed to turn his sights onto what came next.

Neither the guild nor the AHC had any idea what they were truly in for.

Tori sat in a conference room, coffee and chips in front of her, trying to stay calm. So far, things had gone smoothly. Lodestar saved Tori, bringing her to the AHC, where a doctor was waiting to check her over. Dr. Miraculous didn't have the most professional name; however, she'd quickly inspired competence. Professional, observant, and with an impeccable bedside manner. After some thinking, Tori put it together. Of course the AHC's doctor was good at helping people coming fresh from traumatic situations—that would be almost exclusively what she dealt with.

Afterward, Tori had been offered a shower and fresh clothes, which she accepted. There was no reason she could come up with to explain why she would rather stay in her dirty ensemble. While the jeans and shoes were fine, Tori was slightly less thrilled about the “Ridge City Loves the AHC” t-shirt they'd provided. This felt like the sort of thing the rest of the guild wouldn't let go of if they caught sight of it... not that she didn't have bigger concerns at the moment.

Soon, someone would walk in this room and try to coax a story out of her. What she said next, or didn't say, would determine how successful the rescue truly was. It was only a good one if the whole guild got out clean. Tori couldn't let them down, especially after they'd shown up to save her. Setting her resolve, Tori was braced for any lawyer or interrogation specialist to step through the door.

She was somewhat less prepared when the glowing form of Lodestar strolled in, however, nearly choking on a chip. There was something about her, a sense of power that announced itself even as she humbly walked over to the table with a gentle smile. It didn't escape Tori's notice, even through her starstruck shock, that Lodestar shut and locked the doors.

In a way, Lodestar seemed stranger here than she had in the warehouse. Seeing Lodestar mid-rescue, busting through a skeezy lair—that felt right. Watching her amble through a conference room was bizarre, like seeing a T-Rex napping in a park. Or Fornax working in an office, she reminded herself. Tori had seen past the curtain; she knew the legends were more than their reputations or powers. Still, that was easier to remember when the reputations weren't quite so looming.

“Tori, if you're up to it, there are some questions I have to ask you.” She took a seat, her inherent glow lighting up the chair's dark material.

“However, before you answer, there's something that needs to be said. I know you don't want to talk to us, and I know why.”

Having been prepared for hours of probing, verbal bait, and linguistic trickery, Tori felt dumbfounded as Lodestar dropped that kind of bomb so casually on the table. Was she bluffing? No; Ivan had warned Tori that anyone on the Champions' Congress could be clued in on her secret.

“That puts us in something of a pickle, you see,” Lodestar continued. “There are questions it is vital you answer. Pieces of information that will help us strengthen our detection abilities and figure out how this gang blocked us. I can't risk you lying about anything and tainting that intel. Whatever else we might disagree on, I think we're together on one point: neither of us wants to see this happen to someone else.”

Tori's hand tightened into a fist involuntarily. Finally out of danger, she was starting to process everything that had happened, a rush of emotions, many of them anger-adjacent, whirling up at merely the thought of her ordeal. The legendary cape had hit the money there: Tori definitely didn't want to see anyone else experience this.

“Here's how I'd like to proceed,” Lodestar continued. “We both know there are things about your life that you're not comfortable sharing with me. Today, they are irrelevant. You were stolen off the street against your will. I'm not here to treat you like a criminal. If, in the course of this debriefing, we hit one of those areas, just stay silent. That's fine. It's a right the legal system offers even to those under arrest, which you are not. All I ask is that you not lie to me. Whatever you say to me, make it the truth. Can you work with that, Tori?”

When Ivan told her Lodestar was both more predictable and more dangerous for her lack of subtlety, it hadn't exactly made sense to Tori, but there had been larger issues demanding her attention at the time. Now, sitting across this table from her, Tori understood. Lodestar was, despite her insane power, disarming. There was something in the gentleness of her tone, the sincere concern in her eyes, that made Tori feel inherently safe. A great quality during a rescue, less optimal for an interrogation. Nevertheless, this was happening, and Tori couldn't repress her own curiosity about the living legend.

"I think I can live with that. Do you mind if I ask you a few, too, as we go?"

"Of course. I'm sure you've got so much you must be wondering about. But may we start with your version of what happened? Studies show that the sooner we do these, the more accurate the recollection tends to be." From a hidden pocket on her costume, Lodestar produced a small device. She set it on the table, pushing a button and getting a red light.

Interesting. So she'd left the first part of their talk off the record. Tori mulled that over as she began her tale. The kidnapping part she skimmed through, seeing as that had apparently been on the news. Most of what she relayed was factual, going through the way she'd been treated by her kidnappers, her bathroom arrangement, and so on. It wasn't until she got to Nexus that Lodestar looked worried, though she said nothing, allowing Tori to continue spinning her yarn. Only in the last bit of the chronology did Tori have to skip some details, recounting her wild run from the monsters without mentioning she'd been living fire at the time. The tech room, Tori relayed as best she could, mentally pulling up the way the machines had been interconnected. Much as she'd have loved to take them apart herself, the acid had done too good a job. If Professor Quantum could get information out of that rubble, he deserved it.

"You've been through quite the ordeal," Lodestar said at last. "Not many people would have kept such a cool head on them during that kind of situation."

"Benefits of having practice. I saw the importance of staying calm during the attack on my office a few months ago." Tori had kept that one locked and loaded, an explanation for her competence and a reminder that one of their own was her friend.

Lodestar nodded. "Yes, I just finished speaking with Cyber Geek, actually. He wanted to be in here, you know, but I felt it was best to keep things private until we had a better idea of your condition. Plus—" Her eyes darted to the recorder for a split second "—he hasn't had training for this yet, and we wanted to be sure to collect your testimony as soon as possible. I have more questions about the computer room where I found you, but why don't we take a brief pause so you can rest your voice."

Reaching over, she tapped the recorder once, ending the red light's blaze. "If you wanted to ask me questions of your own, this is probably the time."

"You don't want your answers on the record?"

"Tori, I have no idea what you're about to ask. Some of what you might know is technically classified as Top Secret, though honestly, after the whole Apollo kerfuffle, I'm not sure where a lot of that stands. Point is, unless it's germane to the kidnapping, it doesn't need to be on that tape."

That hadn't occurred to Tori, but Ivan had made it clear the government was the one who set the villains free. Heck, even the tool they'd used for it, the Orion Protocol, had a clandestine-sounding name. Lodestar made a good point, though. They were working at an information disparity. Tori probably wasn't going to change that, but she might be able to figure out what tidbits were off-limits.

Double-checking the recorder out of habit, Tori sat up a little straighter. "I guess my first question is what do you know?"

"A lot less than I can prove, which might as well be your organization's motto," Lodestar replied. "Pertaining to you, I know you're a meta-human, I know you're wading into very dangerous waters, and I know the man you call uncle has no blood relation to you. Though my understanding is he's still been something of a mentor."

Okay, so, as it turned out, Lodestar knew quite a damn bit. She'd even called him a mentor, was that word a coincidence? No, she was laying it out just like she had the entire time. At least Tori didn't have to worry about slipping up and accidentally revealing too much. Outside of the rescue, anyway.

"I've got one for you now, and we can leave the recorder off," Lodestar said. "The New Science Sentries told me what happened, that you learned their civilian identities. I'm sorry I have to ask this, but forewarned is very much forearmed in these cases. Did you tell the gang who they are?"

With some relief, Tori realized that this was one where she had nothing to hide. "Nope. We didn't really get into much grilling. I mostly just kept pissing the head guy off until he stormed away. I haven't told anyone their secret."

That earned her a surprised look from Lodestar. “Anyone?”

“Not a soul. I like it when people respect my privacy, so I’d be an ass not to do the same.” Tori realized she was supposed to be asking questions, but the sudden enormity of the opportunity had struck her. This was someone who’d been around since the mid-eighties, had seen untold powers and threats. Someone who knew the guild leadership in ways Tori likely never would. There was so much to ask, yet her tongue found itself dazed with options. Scrambling for something to keep the talk moving, Tori fell back on a question that had nagged at her for quite some time.

“Why does my uncle trust you? I get why he respects you—as the only person to ever put him down, that gels with who he is. But you threw the man in jail, yet I’ve never heard him say a single bad word about Lodestar. The exact opposite, in fact. I know you helped talk him into the... work release program. I know you showed him that pic of his kid. But this is more than that. He trusts almost no one, yet has total faith in you.”

From her slightly glowing mouth, Lodestar let out a perfect whistle, like the start of a songbird’s symphony. “Wow, you really jump right into the complicated stuff, huh?” She leaned back in the chair, staring up at the ceiling and beyond, looking to a mental destination where Tori’s eyes couldn’t follow.

“Here’s the thing you have to understand about Ivan and me.” Evidently, Lodestar really had killed the recorder, as she was comfortable using real names. “For a good stretch of years, he and I were in our own power category. Both of us unbeatable, untouchable most of the time—until we met each other.”

There was a flicker in Lodestar’s eye, hinting at so much more than what was escaping her lips. Still, even the words were precious, so Tori listened closely.

“We were the strongest metas in the world. Back then, we didn’t even know for sure who was more powerful. The only ones we had to battle, to truly test ourselves against, were each other. For a long time, we kept up the dance; he knew how to stay off my radar, but we usually ended up in brief skirmishes. Until we finally had it out for keeps and discovered who the strongest really was.”

While it might have been Tori’s imagination, she thought Lodestar seemed almost sad about that. Perhaps she’d enjoyed the mystery, too.

“I can’t tell you why Ivan trusts me—that’s his choice. All I can say is that we know each other in a way you can only know someone you’ve fought against, and alongside. For years, we were among the few constants in one another’s lives. The crook I couldn’t catch, the cape he couldn’t beat. I’m not sure if that made us friends, nemeses, or a combination of the two, but it made us something. That would be my guess as to why Ivan trusts me as superhero. I hope it answers your question.”

“And then some,” Tori replied. “While also raising countless more. Not going to be greedy, though. That was a lot. We can do more debrief stuff.”

Lodestar lowered her eyes back to the table, focusing on the moment at hand. “Before we go down that road, there is one more thing I’d like to broach with you. Just something to consider. You have shown adaptability, intelligence, and resolve over and over, without factoring in your less savory efforts. This is the second incident you’ve publicly been in, and last time, you helped one of our most promising new members. Between your mind and your powers, you make a potent threat. The kind that could be dangerous, when properly nurtured. If you were any other person, I’d be making this offer, and I see no reason not to give you the same opportunity.”

Flaring up a tad brighter, Lodestar met Tori’s eyes, the full force of her gaze nearly causing the younger woman to blink. “Tori Rivas, have you given any thought toward using those talents for good? We could use someone with your abilities at the Alliance of Heroic Champions.”

---

Chapter 34

---

“Look, I know we were using a lot of double-talk here, but I’m kind of... spoken for, in that department.” Tori wasn’t even certain she’d heard Lodestar right, and she damned sure didn’t know how to respond to that sort of suggestion.

“Two types of people join your current organization,” Lodestar replied, utterly unfazed. “Criminals who were caught then won their freedom, and the ones getting educated before they make any major slipups. I know you’re in the second group, and even the crimes I suspect you of are fairly minimal. People make mistakes. What matters more is their ability to grow and learn from them. You wouldn’t be the first player to change teams, especially so early on.”

Could that be true? Sure, she’d heard of a few former crooks turning over a new leaf—just no one on the guild’s level. But a new costume and codename could easily transform plenty of metas into functionally new people. In the end, Lodestar was probably telling the truth. That seemed to be her style. This was a point to make certain she understood clearly, however.

“I’m not even sure that would be allowed,” Tori said weakly, trying to get her bearings.

“Oh? I’m pretty sure one of the first rules in your code is not to go around messing with superheroes. Especially ones with the AHC. Which is what you would be if you made the switch, Tori. Yes, it’s allowed by the code’s own wording. Even if that wasn’t the case, you could still come over. I’ve made my position on that policy clear to your leadership.”

She paused, looking Tori over more closely. “I think that’s all we need to say on the matter for tonight. You’ve been through a lot, and there’s still more questions to ask, so let’s leave this question there. I don’t need or expect an answer right away; these are the sorts of choices you should fully consider.”

A glowing hand moved toward the recorder, then stopped. “There is one more thing. Part of why I’m comfortable making this offer to you is that you haven’t crossed my major lines. There’s a reason the guild largely preys on other criminals; not even I can protect people from their own actions. Tried at one point and things went bad. Keep that in mind. Because if you bring civilians into the equation, you bring me in as well. Don’t cross that line unless you understand the consequences.”

“I get it. Keep the fight on the playground, it’s fine. Spill into school, and the teacher becomes involved.”

“Your school needs more involved educators,” Lodestar told her. “That is the thrust of it, though. Are you ready to get back to the debrief?”

“Honestly, at this point, that sounds like a nice break.”

Tori hadn’t planned to say that any more than she expected Lodestar to laugh: quick and melodic, like the sweet refrain of a lovely song.

Chuckling to herself, Lodestar hit the record button. Time to get back to business.

It was a shame they couldn’t take any of the physical materials from the cloaking system, but Xelas had managed to come back with quite a bit of data. She’d copied the entire software system, along with a few stored schematics, as well as scanned the actual tech itself. Some parts of the machinery had still been cloaked; however, all in all, she and Wade had managed to assemble a reasonable mock-up on the holographic display table in front of them.

He was in his normal clothes, simple and professional, the sort one might expect a quaint local librarian to wear. Except Wade was a billionaire genius supervillain, and there was nothing placid or quiet in his expression as he looked everything over. Someone had bested him on the field of technology. Maybe only for a day, but it had still happened. While he’d accepted long ago that Professor Quantum and Tyranny were peers at or past his present level, being thwarted by some new upstart grated on his nerves. Especially since they'd taken one of his people in the process.

As he looked over the holographic facsimile, formed of data and sculpted light, he zoomed in on a section. Some of this equipment was too homegrown to puzzle out the purpose of with just his eyes, but the power unit was using an electron looper, a standard tool for powering massive equipment off standard wall outlets. Wade had seen and made more than he could count through the years, and something about this one was off.

"Xelas, check the southern east quadrant, the power source. Why run nineteen thelmian micro-rings for stabilization when a simple boron buffer does the job better and cheaper?"

"Better question, where did they even find thelmian ore? Records show only a few meteors of it hit in the late fifties, and the majority of that wound up with the AHC or private collectors. Oh, guess they robbed a collector—answered my own question." Though she was smiling, there was a focused gleam in her eyes as she followed Wade's gaze. "Interesting. I just ran a full check through my archives, and this actually used to be the standard way to make an electron looper. Professor Quantum invented the boron buffer in the mid-sixties, and it soon became the standard, but before then, this was the design."

Old tech, using materials that were supposed to be scarce. Wade mentally laid out the situation once more. A gang with tech lightyears beyond their grasp kidnaps a woman off the street, one who was famously saved by the New Science Sentries. They call out that same team publicly, keeping the woman hidden to force the capes' hand. Had the New Science Sentries complied, they'd have been walking in to a trap full of advanced weaponry. It couldn't be a coincidence that everything centered on a new version of the world's first superhero team, yet the tech in use was dated.

"The good news is that I suspect Tori's kidnapping really was a coincidence. All of this seems to be about Professor Quantum's old team. My money says that someone he pissed off is out for payback."

"Good news because it isn't our fight?" Xelas seemed confused, if not disappointed.

The malicious gleam in Wade's eye put any doubts she had to rest even before he spoke. "Hell no. This is absolutely our fight. We've needed something to focus the guild members on, a task that keeps them busy without risking too much AHC wrath. After one of our own was taken, they're all itching to show some dominance. No, that's good news because it means neither side will be paying us much attention. With Tori saved, they'll expect us to go back to minding our own business."

The metal fingers danced along his shoulder, finding their way to the back of Wade's neck, where they spread out and wrapped around, gripping gently. Xelas pulled him in closer, only inches separating them. "And what will we really be doing?"

"Waiting for the right opportunity to strike."

"You do know how to talk to a gal. Well, this one, anyway." She kept the kiss brief. Much as she loved Wade when he went on the warpath, they still had a lot of work to do breaking down her data. Big talk didn't mean a damn thing if they got caught with their pants down again.

By the time they were done talking, Lodestar having asked about every detail and tidbit she could regarding the cloaking system, Tori's head was starting to feel fuzzy. Her brief nap in Lodestar's arms hadn't been a full rejuvenation by any means, and the day's compounded stress was causing pain above her temples.

To Lodestar's credit, she soon noticed and wrapped things up, leaving the caveat that Tori might be called back if they thought of new questions to ask. All things considered, it had gone well. Tori managed to avoid implicating herself or the others, and she'd escaped without being seriously wounded. The best she could have hoped for, really.

As they were about to leave the room, Tori realized that there would be others waiting to see her. Donald, certainly, and probably the New Science Sentries as well. They would be concerned, caring, and way more than she could handle at the moment.

"Is there a private exit? I'm... I need some time before I see anyone."

"Of course." Lodestar smirked, a strangely mischievous feature on her face. "Close your eyes."

Normally, Tori would have balked, or at least asked some clarifying questions. It was a demonstration of her exhaustion's growing dominance that she merely did as instructed. A brief feeling of wind and weightlessness washed over her, and when Tori opened her eyes once more, she was at the AHC's entrance—a massive door with various tourists and workers streaming through. The first floor was a museum dedicated to superhero exploits, so it saw quite a bit of foot traffic.

“Moving at those speeds will make you nauseous if your eyes are open, unless you have practice,” Lodestar explained from behind her. Already, the crowd was looking over, though none of them had even a glance to spare for Tori. “Go on ahead. I’ll sign some autographs to keep everyone distracted. Your ride is waiting for you.”

Tori looked out the sliding doors and realized there was a familiar form outside on the sidewalk. Amidst a sea of chipper families and excited kids, the stoic man standing stock-still stood out like neon. It was odd to think she could be so happy to see that dull expression, but as her eyes fell on Ivan, Tori felt something inside her relax, something she hadn’t even realized was tense.

Much as she wanted to rush out, Tori took her time. Almost against her better judgment, she looked back to Lodestar. It could have been Tori’s imagination, but she was almost sure she caught Lodestar sneaking a few looks out the door as well. Since meeting Ivan, she’d assumed his odd reverence of Lodestar was one-sided; after today, she wasn’t quite so sure. Whatever this complicated mess was, it certainly appeared to be going in two directions.

With the crowd occupied, Tori made her way forward, out the sliding doors and into the summer’s fading heat. She made her way down the smooth entrance lined on either side with topiaries carved into the shapes of famous capes, and walked up to the man who was a legendary villain, and one of the few people who’d proven he gave a real shit about her.

“How do you feel?” Ivan asked.

“Tired. Numb. Drained.”

Scared. Guilty. Lost.

His hand landed gently on top of Tori’s head, heavier than she remembered. “Let’s get you some rest. You’ve more than earned it.” A moment of hesitation, his hand almost pulling away. “I am very glad you’re safe, Tori. We were all worried, but we also had faith you’d pull through.”

There was no way to say why—it wasn’t a particularly emotional thing to say—but that was Tori’s breaking point. Picturing the guild, her friends, her life, knowing how close she’d been to losing everything. All the fear she hadn't let herself feel, the horror of what she'd done to Deacon, the helplessness of being taken against her will, it all came crashing down at once.

Tori buried her face against Ivan's chest as she wound her arms around him, hugging him with all the strength her body could still manage. She wanted to weep, to let everything out, but Tori wasn't practiced at letting her guard down to that extent. Instead, she just held on, her whole body shaking. Here, she finally let herself feel at ease. Nothing could get her. Nothing could hurt her. She didn't even have to hide parts of herself like she had with Lodestar. Tori was safe.

It took her a few minutes to realize that Ivan was gently hugging her back. A few minutes more, and Tori realized people were staring, not that she gave any semblance of a shit. But sooner or later, they'd recognize her, take some pictures, and the media cycle would begin anew. She gathered her composure, the shakes dying down as her breathing stabilized.

"Sorry. Probably not a reaction befitting somebody like us, huh?"

"Tori, you have nothing to apologize for." It was an occasion where Ivan's blunt tone worked to his benefit, making it clear he thought the very notion ridiculous. "You did well, better than anyone had the right to ask."

"Yeah, sure, but I gotta stick the landing, right?" Tori finally managed to pull away, releasing her grip on Ivan. "Can't get weighed down by all of this."

This time, Ivan was the one who initiated the hug, though he kept his short. "I'm the one who owes you an apology if you think that. There's something I've owed you for a while now, and when you're ready, I hope it will help you get some clarity on that front. It's something I should have told you already, something I avoided because it means dredging up the past."

Together, they walked away from the AHC's headquarters, Ivan taking her to a spot where Tunnel Vision was already waiting with a portal. It was hard to beat the guild in terms of treatment options and general safety, both of which were very relevant for Tori. The plan was to get her some food and rest, letting her return to the world at large when she was ready. Ivan hadn't expected to add a story in there, but holding Tori as she shook was too familiar for him not to see the need. It was time to pay what he owed her for reaching graduation.

It was time to tell her about the origin of Fornax.

---

Chapter 35

---

No aides or other members of the AHC would be walking in on Professor Quantum in this room. He'd established a private laboratory at the inception of the entire organization, a place where he could perform delicate experiments without worrying about interruption. Security had been upgraded—by him—regularly until he'd moved the bulk of his work to the island of Vomisa. Even with years of lapses, it was fortified enough for the moment's task.

Laid out before him was a simple cube. That's how it appeared, at least. According to the recovery reports, this had been one of the things found in a pile of pink goo, surrounded by melted parts, yet it showed not so much as a scratch. The tech who recovered it had been puzzled, but Professor Quantum understood as soon as his fingers touched the smooth metallic surface.

Keltrine was a synthetic metal he'd once thought to have world-changing properties. Inventing it was one of Professor Quantum's earlier projects; exposing various natural materials to different meta-elements had resulted in many strange new compounds, and Keltrine was the most promising. Many of the early Science Sentry gear had made use of the seemingly indestructible metal, until they discovered its weakness.

From his pocket, Professor Quantum produced several packets of sugar taken from the breakroom. He sat down across from the cube, helping himself to a bottled water from the small refrigerator built into the desk. As a man who often got lost in his work, nutritional elements had to be kept on hand. He'd tried to get other labs on board with bathroom buckets as well; however, that suggestion had so far failed to take hold.

Taking no care or measurements, Professor Quantum tore into the first sugar packet, dumping it into the water bottle. He did this six more times, until the water had turned milky. Finally satisfied, Professor Quantum emptied the entire container onto the cube, slowing pouring it out to cover every section. As soon as the liquid hit, the cube hissed and bubbled, turning to a crumbly, sand-like substance. For as durable as Keltrine was, they'd learned fighting Wrath-Taffy that sugar created an immediate, destructive chain reaction. It was Professor Quantum's introduction into the unstable world of working with these strange new elements and the unusual side effects they produced.

The larger issue at hand was that anyone was able to create this particular bit of Keltrine in the first place. Only a few had figured it out when it was in use, one industrious tinker making an entire tiny army before the flaw was discovered. Most who knew the creation method were dead, and even the Mini-Murder Marquis was long retired. There was only one way to interpret this cube's existence: it was a message for him. Hidden in something they couldn't miss, and made durable enough that it would be near impossible to destroy.

As the water bottle reached its end, the last of the cube crumbling, a shiny new surface came into view. This one was metal, as well, though it merely shone in the sugar-water rather than melting. Unconcerned about mundane worries such as poison, Professor Quantum picked up the item, rubbing it clean and examining it carefully.

A commemorative pin. 1955 Original Edition, one of the first superhero souvenirs to ever be sold. Of course, that was largely because meta-humans had only been around for a few years. This was a big moment, for the world and Professor Quantum. These marked the launch of the Science Sentries, the world's first superhero team, precursor to the League of Metas. All five members stood there, staring at the camera, their likeness captured in the metal circle.

Last Professor Quantum had noticed, these sorts of items retailed for hundreds of thousands of dollars among collectors, which made it all the stranger that this one had been defaced, quite literally. Of the five, only Professor Quantum and Rex Reverb were still recognizable. The rest of the team's faces were scratched off. No coincidence that he and Rex were the only ones still presumed alive—that was obvious. But if the implication was that the sender had been responsible for the deaths, then that was ludicrous. They'd fallen years apart and to very different threats.

The message was clear, at least. Someone was targeting him, someone with a shocking knowledge of his prior work. The cube and button were clear hallmarks of the past.

For a moment, a single horrible moment, he thought of the mad-grinning skull, then put it out of his head. As a man of science, he knew better than to spend his time chasing ghosts. Focus on the current threats rather than ones already beaten.

To that effect, he wondered if he should give Rex a warning. He was on the button, too, and would make a compelling target to someone sending a message. After a moment of contemplation, Professor Quantum decided that perhaps Rex would be more useful in the dark. If they put a protective detail on him, he'd be the perfect bait—acting completely natural, drawing out potential attackers. It was risky, true, but that was the life of a superhero. He was sure Rex would understand, or, barring that, was sure he wouldn't care if an old teammate was mad.

Professor Quantum was a man who concerned himself with results. It wasn't as if they had the option to sit back and wait, anyway. This was an opening move. He'd seen far too many not to recognize one on sight. Whoever had made this cube wasn't remotely done. But their next move wouldn't come quite so easily.

Now that Professor Quantum knew there was a game afoot, he intended to crush everyone who dared challenge him.

“What’d they tell you?” Chloe asked, red-eyed on the edge of the sofa.

“She’s safe and sound, just like the reports are saying.” Beverly sounded deeply relieved, and that was with some effort to keep her tone neutral. Thuggernaut’s rundown was quick and concise, but hit all the points he knew she’d be worried about. After wrapping up the rescue, they’d been taken home immediately. With capes buzzing about, any time in mask was dangerous. Since then, she’d just been waiting with Chloe to find out how the rest of Tori’s morning went.

“Lodestar scooped her up, she did a few hours at the AHC making a report, and now, she’s resting somewhere safe. My contact wasn’t sure when she’d be back, probably a day or so, but physically, Tori came through fine. We’ll have to see how hard it hit her upstairs.”

“I just feel so bad. First, she ends up all over the news for being saved by Tachyonic, then this. Tori hates attention, and now, she’s going to get it nonstop.” From her side, Chloe pulled out a spiral notebook with a pen jammed in the top. She flipped through several of the pages, idly chewing on the pen’s cap as she mulled them over. “I keep thinking there’s something I can do. Unfortunately, the closest I’ve gotten is ‘Better seen than heard,’ which is both gross and the opposite of what Tori needs.”

While Beverly wasn’t sure this effort would bear fruit, she also couldn’t dispute that Tori was going to loathe the limelight. Worse, this wasn’t just some quick news story anymore. There hadn’t been a kidnapping like this in years upon years; adding in her existing fame momentum and the fact that the story appeared to end in a Nexus slaughter would only make the story more salacious. This might no longer be a thing they could simply wait out.

But that was getting far too ahead of herself. First, they needed to help Tori the person, then they could worry about her elevated profile.

“We’ll figure something out. In the meantime, I’m going to make a grocery store run. At the very least, we can have her favorite beers and snacks when she gets home.”

Chloe’s eyes lit up. “Great idea! If you don’t mind getting ingredients, I can make a nice comforting soup.”

Mentally flashing back to Chloe’s most recent stovetop culinary attempt that wasn’t grilled cheese, Beverly could still taste the half-cinders passing as pork chops. Mercifully, the logistics of their situation made for an easy out. “That’s a lovely idea, but why don’t we wait until we know when Tori will be home? No sense in buying ingredients only for them to go bad.”

She hustled out the door before the conversation could go any longer, in such a hurry that Beverly nearly crashed into the sizable form of Austin, who’d clearly been walking down to their apartment. Reflexes saved her from a full collision, bringing her up a few inches short of his chest, causing a quick backpedal.

“Sorry about that. Should watch where I’m going.”

“Please no, it’s my fault.” Austin looked nervous. He was fidgeting in place, actively avoiding looking into her eyes for too long. “I... I didn’t even have a good reason for coming over. I just wanted to apologize in person, if she’s ready to see anyone. We promised protection, and then, only a few days later, completely failed to keep Tori safe. I don’t expect her to forgive us, especially since it’s our fault she got targeted in the first place, but she deserves an apology all the same.”

It took Beverly a few seconds of mental gymnastics to put everything together. Right; Austin would have heard from the AHC that Tori was released. Since this was her home, he’d expect her to be here, resting and recovering. It was tempting to sell that delusion, pretend that she was being a shut-in, which wasn’t much of a stretch for Tori, anyway. Too complicated, she quickly realized. Better to stick close to the truth, if she had to deviate at all.

“I respect that sentiment, but Tori isn’t here. After everything that happened, she’s staying with her uncle. Family support during trying times and all. She’ll be back when she’s ready.”

“When that time comes, may I impose on you to let her know I’d like to talk?” Austin’s eyes, still largely avoiding Beverly’s, seemed to be sinking floorward the more they talked. “Though I understand if Tori has no desire to see any of us again, and I will respect the choice. My duty to apologize is not her obligation to hear it.”

For a huge guy with legs like phone poles, Austin looked curiously unstable. His first few weeks in Ridge City didn’t seem to be going to plan, for sure. Messing up their debut, getting put on protection duty, then fucking that one up on a national-story level—much as Beverly held a grudge against the AHC and Professor Quantum in particular, it was hard to pile all of that onto the nervous guy before her. Plus, she needed to lay a little groundwork for Tori. Otherwise, these four would be up her ass the minute she got home.

“Look, this is my opinion and should not be construed to reflect how Tori will feel, but I don’t think the kidnapping is entirely on your team. No one expected some gang to try a street snatching. As far as you knew, Tori was going to work. Following her would have been weird, bordering on harassment. When it happened, did you do everything you could to get her back?”

“Sadly, yes, and what we could do was nothing.” His jaw tightened, and for a moment, the nerves vanished. She saw the face of a leader angry at his own limitations, forced to the sidelines while others did the work. Sometimes, her parents wore that expression when talking about their harder missions, the darkest tales they’d share with their kids. Wanting to help, and lacking the power to do something was hard. Being on the sidelines while people they cared about were in the fight was magnitudes worse, apparently. “We spent our night out on the streets, keeping the peace. Useful work to be sure, just not helpful to Tori.”

Beverly checked her watch. After a night spent out as Bahamut, hanging around a Detroit warehouse and helping Pseudonym kill Nexus’s pets, she should be exhausted; however, the thrill of combat still had her blood pumping. It would be a little while before she could sleep. May as well put it to good use. The more she could do to ease Austin’s guilt, the less he’d try to bother Tori with it. After the rescue, Beverly had been feeling somewhat useless herself; this was finally one way she could help.

“All night fighting, huh? With a body like that, disregarding any meta-influence, I’m guessing that means you’re famished. Have you tried the Mono-Mart’s counter-service yet? They make a mean breakfast burrito, and I’m heading over there on a grocery run, anyway. You can tag along, if you like.”

Just like that, the nerves were back. For a moment, she thought he might spit out gibberish; his tongue seemed uncertain of its intended use as his jaw twitched within his mouth. Beverly had other shit to do with her day, so she threw him an excuse to move things along.

“After all, my roommate was just kidnapped. Might not be safe to walk out there so early alone.” Even without her powers, Beverly had mace, a taser, and a lifetime in a family with a strong Marine service history. There was no mugger on this block she couldn’t handle, but Austin didn’t know any of that yet. If it got him out his head and moving, that was all that mattered for now.

It not only worked, it worked so well that Beverly was caught off guard. The shift was immediate, like someone had thrown a switch. His nerves vanished, spine straightened, and his gaze became direct. Whatever personal failings Austin had, they weren’t shared by Agent Quantum. Once upon a time, she’d have found it strange. That was before the guild; before she understood the roles people played, and the way they could shift between them.

“You’re absolutely right. It would be my honor and pleasure to escort you on your errands.”

“Dial it back a notch, big boy.” Beverly patted him on the shoulder, noting how solid it was. “We’re just going on errands and breakfast. Why don’t you tell me about your fake job on the way?”

Though he didn’t slip back into his less confident posture, this question did cause his eyebrows to knit in confusion. “My fake job?”

“Yeah, your cover story. What you tell people when they ask you what you do, since you obviously can’t tell them the truth.” She looked at Austin, who stared right back at her, until realization finally dawned. “You don’t have a cover story?”

“In the initial plan, we weren’t going to be interacting with normal people as ourselves very often,” Austin admitted. “It’s possible we were undertrained for this type of scenario.”

That was putting it shockingly light. They were going to blow their identities again any day now, and the next time, it might not be to a room of people with incentives to keep quiet. Worse, if people realized Tori was living a few doors down from the New Science Sentries, context be damned, she would get a fresh dose of fame. Possibly end up linked to them forever in the public’s eye.

Which meant that if Beverly wanted to protect her friend, she had to help a team of capes blend in. Or find a new apartment. Given their specific needs and the current Ridge City real estate market, aiding Austin seemed like the easier task, even if she’d have preferred the latter.

“Okay, new idea. We figure out some fake jobs for you all while getting breakfast,” Beverly declared. “Which you’re paying for. I don’t do consultations for free.”

---

Chapter 36

---

Her new room had a window. That would have been impossible at the old base where they'd been tucked away in the middle of the city, hiding themselves in plain sight. One of the upshots to moving the guild's operation out of Ridge City was the change of limitations, not to mention the scenery. Volcanic lair or not, Tori had to appreciate the amazing view of the island and the glittering ocean that stretched beyond it.

The sun sat low on the horizon; she'd been asleep for most of the day. Looking down, Tori realized with a small trickle of embarrassment that she was still wearing the AHC t-shirt Lodestar had provided.

It was a passing thought that floated away as her eyes went back to the window. Looking at the ocean was pleasant, soothing—a vast improvement over the images replaying in her mind. Being chased by the spitting monsters was scary, getting kidnapped had filled her with rage, but it was Deacon that kept popping up the most. She could still feel the flames of her arm torching his throat as it slid down, still see the horrified pain as the fire caught. There was no regret in Tori—she'd done what she had to. Yet the images kept coming. Killing Rust Tooth hadn't hit her nearly this hard, though perhaps it was because it was a mere blip in a day of mad chaos.

Even that recurring memory was better than the choice Tori could feel resting on her shoulders. What next? When she left this lair, she'd be facing serious decisions. Her life had changed, and not in the fifteen-minutes-of-fame way. This was too big; it wouldn't flare out overnight. In a few years, sure, she might be able to get back to some manner of normalcy, but her face and name being all over the news would stick in people's minds, especially given the context.

Staring out at the lapping waves, she considered staying here. The facilities were all top-tier, she'd never have to hide her face or her true identity, and everything she needed was on this island. Tori frowned, a sight she was able to catch in the window's slight reflection. This place might have everything Hephaestus needed, but not Tori. She had plans and ambitions beyond the guild, the kind she'd have to be in the real world to execute. Besides, Beverly and Chloe were counting on her to help cover rent. She wasn't ready to say goodbye to that life quite yet.

She contemplated a shower and a change, but a loud rumble from her stomach skewed priorities. Whatever waited down the line, Tori at least knew her next move today. Leaving her room, Tori realized a moment after the door closed that she still hadn't change t-shirts; however, her capacity for caring had already maxed out. It wasn't worth the time to go back.

The halls were largely empty as she made her way through, arriving at the room number Ivan had left for her. It opened to reveal a sizable area, probably meant to be a conference room, though she doubted there was often so much of a spread. Sandwiches, stew, seared fish, and a few dishes Tori didn't recognize—all of it fresh and steaming. She dove right in, not even caring that the room was otherwise empty. If anyone in the guild wanted her dead, they'd pick a more direct method than poison.

After a minute or so of eating, Tori saw Ivan enter. Truly Ivan, no Pseudonym mask, and certainly no Fornax one. Just the unassuming middle manager who was easy to overlook. How was he so good at keeping a low profile, especially considering what Fornax was like? Maybe it was just a matter of practice; he'd been at this much longer than her.

"I hope you like the food. Made it earlier today, and had Dabbler throw on a seal to keep it fresh until you arrived."

"Guess the room also sent an alert." Tori managed to get down her mouthful of turkey leg before speaking, but it was a photo finish. "Or were you hanging out in a hallway, waiting?"

Ivan said nothing at first. He headed over to the drink area and fixed himself a simple cocktail of vodka mixed with ginger ale. Once that was prepared, he pulled out a beer and set it down next to Tori, who popped the cap immediately. "How are you feeling?"

The food-shoveling paused momentarily. Tori could feel the memories trying to rise up, perhaps bringing her meal with it, and she halted them through sheer force of will. This was not the time to lose herself. “Like, I really don’t want to talk about it. Not right now, at least. I think I need some time to get my head around everything.”

“After what you’ve been through, that is a completely reasonable sentiment,” Ivan said. “If you’d like to push our talk back and stick to less serious topics, that is fine as well.”

“No.” The word came out a tad too fast and strong. Tori tried again, taking more care. “No. I could use something else to think about. Different place to put my mind. Plus, I’ve been waiting months for this; no take-backs now.”

Despite Ivan’s neutral expression, he was actually quite conflicted. Tori was clearly spinning; he’d seen it happen to younger metas more than enough times to recognize the signs. He wasn’t entirely sure this story would make things better. It wasn’t one he cared to share often, and never in circumstances like these. Ultimately, upholding his word seemed to be the best choice, though he planned to keep an eye on how Tori was coping at various points in the tale.

“The first thing you have to understand is that you and I grew up in different worlds,” Ivan began. “I don’t mean that I’m from another dimension or universe—I’m from this planet, this realm, same as you. But it wasn’t always like this.”

His expression hardened, memories flashing already. “You live in a world with a backstop. A ceiling. A limit on how bad things can get, called the Champions’ Congress. Professor Quantum has one of the keenest, hungriest minds, paired with cutting-edge meta-human knowledge and potent abilities. Quorum has over a thousand people working in perfect unison in that head of his, seeing every situation from more angles than entire organizations could hope to. And of course, there’s Lodestar. The strongest meta. The true superhero. Together, they represent a functionally unstoppable force. Look at your own kidnapping; the people who took you had cloaking equipment beyond what most world governments could fashion, and it wouldn’t have even bought them a full day before the AHC arrived. Against any threat, they have the mind of Professor Quantum, the insight of Quorum, and the power of Lodestar. Every villain in this world, every criminal and thug, every goon and crook, understands that if they make too much trouble, that's what is waiting for them. The sky is the limit, because to rise that high means catching their attention."

"I once asked some of the council members who would win in a fight: us versus the AHC. They said it would be a pretty even match," Tori interrupted. She didn't necessarily doubt Ivan, but conflicting data was something that itched in her brain.

"You didn't ask me." Ivan paused, mentally doing some math. "But unless you somehow stole some councilor time at our relaunch, you must have asked that during your apprenticeship. Before Lodestar was back."

Part of Tori wanted to rebel at that idea, that one cape could turn the tides so greatly as to change the answer entirely. Except, when she thought back to Ivan's breakdown, to when he returned to being Fornax, the way he'd batted around the AHC's top capes like toys, Tori could understand how a truly powerful meta might swing things in a fight. Especially one that could lead on the front lines, inspiring her allies to battle.

"My point is, this world has limits. No fleet of Destrucoblimps will try to take over Utah, because the AHC will put them down. No random genetic monster can wipe out a city, because again, the AHC will stop them."

"There were capes before the AHC," Tori pointed out.

"Yes. Ones that saved the day many a time. But never without risk, and often not without loss. They were not unbeatable—that is the very point I'm driving toward. Here, there are no real worldwide threats, because in your heart, you know anything that dangerous would draw the capes' attention. Most beings who are smart enough to actually be a threat to the world are also capable of seeing the odds stacked against them. It means fewer people ever try to take things that far because they'll never succeed. And most realize it. That creates a different world than one where power is up for grabs, and the strongest can claim it."

Some of the food settled heavy in Tori's stomach. "That was your world?"

To her surprise, Ivan slammed the rest of his drink, went back over to the bar, and fixed himself a double. When he spoke again, there was an ache in his voice she'd never even caught a whisper of before. "That was our world. Mine and the others'. There were lots of organizations out there chasing meta-powers, some with science, others through training, and a few that went the magical route. A cult favored that last option to great success: the Order of the Final Dawn.”

The crack that appeared along Ivan’s glass was telling—largely because Tori knew how much emphasis he put on self-control. For him to slip already didn’t signal she was in for a cheerful story.

Making his way back to the table, Ivan set his cracked glass down. “I never knew my parents. None of us did. Some were bought. Some were stolen. Most were unwanted. That’s what I’ve pieced together through the years, anyway. Back then, it didn’t matter. Nothing mattered, with one exception: combat. From my earliest memories, we were fighting. We fought for meals, fought for clothes, fought one another even for the simple right to use a toilet. The cultists would use magic to keep us healed afterward, but they always let the pain linger. They considered it to be an excellent teaching aide.”

Lifting his hand, Ivan made a fist. Such a simple gesture, yet Tori could feel the power contained within, even across the table. “Much as I hate them, I think they might have been right on that front, a fact that makes me despise them all the more.”

“I’m sorry, Ivan.”

He smiled at her, though there was no joy in the gesture. “Thank you, but I fear the tale has only just begun. That was my early life, you see. Nonstop scrapping, until they began to educate us on how to fight properly. Trainers were brought in, men and women I now suspect were killed as soon as they finished imparting their lessons. Creating monsters was all the cultists cared about, that and their dogma. I doubt they would have taught us to read, write, or speak if not for the weekly ceremonies chanting from the holy scrolls. That was life, until the year we turned ten.”

The story petered out momentarily as Ivan looked into his drink, making no move to touch it. “I had a pair of friends back then. Thick as thieves—pardon the phrasing. I was a little better than them at fighting, a touch of natural talent and a growth spurt giving me a slight edge. Vlad was the smartest of us all; he had a clever streak too wide for his own good. More than a few fights he won were through trickery and deception, though he got good at an old-fashioned low-blow, too. Our third member doesn’t have a name, for reasons that will become clear. He was... soft. Kind. Not made for that world. Although, in hindsight, I wonder if perhaps it was more impressive that after ten years living like that, he still managed to hold on to some spark of gentleness.”

In one gulp, Ivan downed his second drink, however he made no motions to fix a third. Whatever he’d been gathering courage for, it seemed they’d arrived.

“At age ten, we finally realized what we were doing there. That was when we had our first Trial of the Worthy. That day was the first time our numbers were halved.”

Tori had thought she was bracing for where this would go, but her appetite faded suddenly as realization set in. “They killed half the kids?”

“No. We killed each other.” Ivan made a point to meet her eyes; there could be no miscommunication on this front. “They put us in rings of magical, closing fire. Ones that could burn you for hours without leaving so much as a sear. Neither could leave until one was dead. Supposedly, the assignments were done randomly, but to this day, I never believed that. Pitting me against one of my only friends seems too cruel, even for fate. Only humans sink that low.”

Ivan didn’t need to say more. The outcome was obvious by the fact that Ivan was here, rather than killed at age ten. Still, he pushed on. Perhaps he wasn’t able to stop upon reaching this point; it certainly didn’t appear to be a topic he had much practice dealing with.

“He begged me not to hurt him. I didn’t want to. I held out for so long, but burning alive without rest or relief... he cried as I choked him. Never tried to fight back, though. Just kept staring at me, staring as he went limp, staring as the flames faded, staring as they dragged his body away. I can still feel him, decades later. His gaze, his tears on my hands, the softness of his neck. To this day, I don’t know why Kristoph didn’t try to take my head the moment we met.” Ivan took a long, steadying breath, his hands pressed against one another. “After that, after I killed one of the two people in the world I loved, they named me. Because I had earned one, in their eyes. I had taken the first step toward their great prophecy, become a contender for their highest honor. That was the day I got the name Ivan. If Vlad’s moniker didn’t give it away, we were named for warriors, kings, and conquerors.”

Breaking his hands apart, Ivan forced them onto the table. “I wanted to tell you that the first kill with your own hands is always going to leave a scar. You feel like you should be unfazed, but what happened to you today threw all of us for a loop when it was our turn.”

“I killed Rust Tooth during the Ridge City Riots.”

“No, Hephaestus killed Rust Tooth. Today, Tori killed someone. Even if you don’t know why that feels different, it’s okay that it does. What you’re experiencing is normal. How you proceed is up to you, but know that it does get better with time. For as horrible as that story I just told you was, my life went on. I’ve found people and moments that bring me sincere joy, something I could have never imagined inside that pit.”

Tori shoved her plate away; she’d had her fill. The words felt true, even if it was hard to believe them just yet. There was a lot to think on, but that would come piece by piece. In the meantime, she was eager to keep the discussion going, especially since there was a major point yet to be covered.

“Is that how you became Fornax?”

A dark chuckle slipped Ivan’s lips, close enough to Fornax’s mad giggle that she felt a sliver of nervousness before reassuring herself with his controlled expression. “That day was the start, both literally and metaphorically, of me becoming Fornax. Just the start, however. You see, every year, there was a Trial of Worthiness. Every year, our numbers shrank. Sometimes, we fought three times. Sometimes, a single match was enough. All in service of their prophecy—the coming of the being with many names. The God of Endings, the Onslaught of Death, the World-Razer, a bunch of awful shit like that.”

“No one ever told them less is more, huh?”

“Clearly,” Ivan agreed. “Not that it mattered. The name wasn’t the point. Getting it here was. According to myth, its body was too great to enter our realm, so only its soul and power could make the journey. To exist on our plane would require a host, a form with which to use all that terrible strength. That was the purpose of our raising. They wanted to breed a mighty body, strong and honed, to serve as their great monster’s vessel. When the last Trial of Worthiness ended, I was the one left standing. I was the last survivor.”

A flicker of a pause, like he was steeling himself. “I was chosen as the host of an entity whose sole purpose is to destroy this world.”

---

Chapter 37

---

Half-watching the television screen out of the corner of his eye, Rick clicked on some programs hidden in a folder buried deep in his computer. A nice, law-abiding kid shouldn't have any of these sorts of programs—bootleg hacking software bought in internet back rooms and from a skeezy guy outside a computer repair shop. Rick didn't fancy himself competent enough to get into anything truly secure, nor would he want to. As a boy with dreams of working at NASA, he understood there was a line between childish mischief and serious crime that it was important he not cross. Besides, he hadn't gotten this sort of software because he wanted to hack the school, or break into a bank's system.

No, this was a personal project, one he'd been working on for a few years now. A secret from his friends, and especially from his family. What would Beth say if he shared his findings? As though he could even call what he was looking at "findings" in the first place. It felt more like insane conspiracy theory than actual hypothesis—one that Rick would have dismissed, if every new bit of information he found didn't support the suspicion.

It had all started with a simple school report on genealogy. Getting their mother's information was easy—a long line of professors, laureates, and other highly documented careers made it possible to see the heights of their family tree. Dealing with their dad's past was another matter, in that he didn't seem to have one. It was no secret that their father had been abandoned as a child. He didn't talk about the experience in depth, but it was one he shared with his own kids, if only to explain why they had no relatives on his side.

That was where it should have ended: an in-depth report covering one half of his family, and a sad story on the other. More than enough for a good grade. Except, Rick was his mother's son, and once a project had his mind, he was loath to let it go so easily. So he'd kept digging. Hunting for foster records, old school photos, any sort of documentation from his father's childhood. When that had come up dry, Rick had shifted gears to young adulthood, searching for any signs of Ivan Gerhardt prior to meeting their mom.

Nothing. Oh, there were documents saying he'd existed—rental receipts and leases—but it was only a paper trail. Rick had gone so far as to search a database of old photos of capes in action, hoping to spot Ivan in a background of the city where he'd supposedly lived. Even that, he could have brushed off... until he'd decided to test it.

Just a drive for ice cream. That was the pitch, a simple request. An excuse to get them driving around an old neighborhood of Ivan's, one where he'd supposedly lived for years. Jamming the GPS was easy enough—like most parents, Ivan didn't exactly have a stellar grip on technology. Such a simple test, and yet, once his guidance was gone, Ivan had immediately become lost. Despite having an address, and being in an area he should know by heart. Shops might change, but street signs weren't so malleable.

That was the day Rick's silly side project had gone from a flight of fancy to a sincere suspicion. He'd begun to dig deeper, even taking a few real risks, yet it all circled back to the same result. On paper, Ivan Gerhardt was and always had been a perfectly normal, almost boringly mundane, sort of man. In reality... Rick wasn't even sure that was his father's real name.

His working theory was a witness protection program, that Ivan had seen something he wasn't meant to and gone on the run. Occasionally, when Rick really thought about it, his mind would drift to the scent of the ocean, though why that was he couldn't begin to guess. Today, however, he was less concerned with Ivan himself and more so with Tori, the nice coworker of their father's they'd once met who'd been all over the news. She'd also had a surprising lack of personal information leak out, despite being plastered on every channel. Given that she was one of the few people outside of family and existing friends he'd seen Ivan show interest in, Rick suspected that she might be part of the same witness program.

Getting into Vendallia's real systems were well beyond what Rick could manage, back-end programs or not. Luckily, he'd long ago learned to chase the human element rather than a purely technological one. People often didn't think to clear out the file logs on their scanners, which hosted a treasure trove of useful information.

Wielding his programs and a few passwords lifted from his father's office, Rick made his way onto the server, clicking on the scan log files. For the most part, it was boring stuff. Evidently, they must use something more secure for financial or proprietary information. All he was finding were low-tier HR forms, including several well-deserved complaints of an employee microwaving fish. Then he caught it: Ivan's name finally present on a document. Rick enlarged the image, leaning in to peruse the small lettering.

He read it twice more before finally leaning back and clicking a print button. As the pages appeared, he turned toward the screen once more, looking at Tori in a new light. Who the hell was this woman? And why was their father, a man who'd spent his whole life claiming to have no known blood relations, filing an HR declaration form listing Tori Rivas as his niece?

Rick still didn't have much to go on regarding the mystery of his father, but this was the first major clue in years. Whatever Ivan's secret was, Tori Rivas could be the key to unlocking it.

"Last time we talked about this, you said your powers came from eating a god." Tori didn't mean it as an accusation—she had confidence the two tales would line up eventually. It was more her trying to put the story together in her head, connecting dots that were still too far apart.

"It's the best word I have for what happened," Ivan replied. "I was eighteen during the final Trial of Worthiness. So were the few who remained. My last fight was a lot like my first one, in that I was against an old friend. Thankfully, Vlad and I hadn't been the same since I killed our third, and tricky as he could be, I was the better fighter. When it was over, when I'd killed the last person I grew up with, the cultists came."

There was a detached tone to Ivan's voice; he was powering through, getting the facts out without slowing to deal with all the inherent emotions that came with such a topic. Tori made no requests for details. She understood the need to run through some discussion points far too well.

"We went to a chamber I'd never seen before. I was stripped, covered in arcane symbols and oils, then placed in a warded circle when the ceremony began. After they started chanting, I fell away from the physical world, into the place where minds and souls dwell. How long I was there, I truly have no idea, but the next thing I felt was it breaking through."

Ivan shook his head, glancing at the empty glass with a dash of desire, followed by self-imposed restraint. "That monster was everything they'd wanted. Massively powerful, with an appetite for chaos that can never be sated. It exists only to destroy. Which is what it tried to do. Devour me, my soul, my essence, and then take over my body to use as a vessel."

"Clearly didn't know what a stubborn bastard you are," Tori interjected.

"You joke, but you're not far off from the truth." A smile was forming on Ivan's face. Dark, twisted, and cruel, yet a smile all the same. "The cultists made a mistake, you see. Only the body was meant to be tempered and prepared, not our minds. By placing us in that crucible, they forged our wills—forcing us to face constant death sharpened our desire to live. Their monster was expecting a soft-headed morsel ripe for the plucking. Instead, he met a man who had fought with every drop of blood in his veins to make it that far, with no intent of letting his hard-won life slip away. The thing about the realm of minds is that willpower is what matters most. You can't take muscles or magic in there, only your strength of self."

Now that she had the missing piece, Tori could see how the story components fit together, though she said nothing yet. Ivan clearly still had more to get through.

"That devouring of the soul thing is a two-way street. Magic tends to balance like that. In order to cross over, the monster also had to become vulnerable. Turns out, he didn't want this body quite as much as I did. It was still one of the hardest fights of my entire life, mind you—one I'm not sure I could ever win again. But I did manage to triumph, wolfing down that massive intruder, making his power my own."

Ivan's smile sharpened further at the corners. "You should have seen the looks on those cultists' faces, for the brief instant they still had heads."

"Payback?"

"For a childhood spent living as a caged animal, forced to fight the only people I cared about? No. Not even close." His expression hardened, eyes looking back into the past. "Not even the next few years felt like enough revenge, and I spent those keeping a promise to wipe out the Order of the Final Dawn."

"Here I thought a man seeking revenge was supposed to dig two graves," Tori said.

"Oh, I dug a lot more than two. Or rather, I would have, if there was ever enough left to bury, and I cared." Ivan took a moment to compose himself, idly nibbling on a chip from the corner of Tori's massive buffet. "I gave the Order of the Final Dawn exactly what they'd wished for: a destroyer. A god of death. They just didn't realize it would be coming for them instead of the world."

"About that..." Tori trailed off, trying to think of the best way to broach this topic. Knowing now what she did about Ivan's power, there was a fairly salient concern to address. "Are we to the point that explains what happened with you and Apollo? Because that's one I'd really like to have a better handle on."

Something flashed on Ivan's face... shame? He turned away quickly, leaving Tori with only a glimpse to work from. His voice, however, remained steady and constant. "That came much later. The thing about devils is they always leave an escape clause in their contracts. I have the raw, destructive magical power of the god, but little knowledge on how to use it. In all these years, even with tutoring, I've only managed a few consistent spells. Some aspects come easier; the host body is meant to be nigh indestructible, and I have a natural aptitude for drawing out the physical magic. But I'm nowhere near as dangerous as what this body could do in the intended owner's hands. Hence why the option to ask for a little help is always there. A bit more influence, in exchange for greater power. One way for the devil to worm its way back in."

Turning her half-eaten turkey leg around on the plate, Tori considered the situation. "I'm kind of surprised you took that option. Doesn't seem like you'd want anyone else having control over you."

“For a very long time, I didn’t. Until there was a fight that had to be won. That’s another long story, though, one I doubt either of us has the energy for. You don’t need to worry about it, anyway. If I ever do truly lose myself, Lodestar will stop me.”

“Are you sure she can? I get that she’s the strongest out there right now, but you just said the full-power version of you is a big step up. That might be too much even for Lodestar.”

“It isn’t,” Ivan replied. “Understand something, Tori. I know it might seem silly, the amount of deference I show to her power, but it is wholly warranted. As one of the few people to see Lodestar’s true abilities, I know how strong she really is. But as one who loves science, you can simply turn to the data for proof. I am not especially unique. If one has access to multiverse tech, it’s possible to look out into the mirrors of our worlds and see how many things turn out consistently. Some events appear locked, going the same route nearly every time. Others are malleable, with shifting outcomes. One thing that is constant, in essentially every world: when the world is at risk, Lodestar wins. Even if it costs her the ultimate price, she wins.”

Now that kicked Tori back a few mental feet. “Hang on, there are worlds where Lodestar dies?”

“Of course not. In so far as we were able to detect, no one has ever successfully killed a Lodestar. But the power is a mantle. A mask, like the ones we wear. Lodestar never dies; however, the person filling that role is vulnerable. If she goes too far into her own power, or loses her will to fight, there’s no way back. It moves on, shifting the mantle to a new wielder. Like if your meta-suit could find a new wearer after you had a heart attack in battle.”

“Sounds terrifying,” Tori admitted.

Ivan nodded. “Which is why I would greatly prefer not to directly cause the death of the current Lodestar, the woman who helped me gain my freedom and my family. One of the many reasons I place such emphasis on self-control. Lessons my apprentice took well, based on her performance tonight.”

For the first time in several minutes, Tori touched the beer to her lips. She’d wanted something to think about besides her kidnapping, and on that front, Ivan had more than delivered. Bad as her own upbringing had been, she at least hadn’t been locked away and forced to kill for survival. The memories of Deacon still kept flickering to the surface, but they weren't as powerful now that Tori knew it was okay to be rattled. Even Ivan still visibly felt the weight of his first kill, and she certainly wasn't going to fare better than someone who'd had decades to deal with it any time soon.

"Thanks. For the compliment, for sharing, and for never letting me feel like I was in there alone. My big question now is: what's next? I can't go back to being another face in the crowd, not for a while, if ever. But I don't want to run and hide here on the island, either."

"Let me ask you this: if there was no fame or kidnapping to deal with, where would you be?"

"Work. Or barring that, home with my friends. Maybe working on my suit—though honestly, this last day has me thinking that it might be time to break ground on some new tech. Things that are portable, that I can carry with me at all times, just in case... of... huh." Abruptly, Tori stood from the table. "I actually think I know what I want to do. Can you get me a meeting with Wade in a couple of days or so? And yes, I used that name on purpose."

"That'll be up to Wade's schedule, but you'll get an audience when he has a window," Ivan said. "Dare I ask what sort of idea you're pondering?"

It was Tori's turn to smile, though hers was more mischievous than terrifying. "I think I just hit on a way to turn this kind of fame into an opportunity. Figured it was only right I give our leader the first bite at the apple."

---

Chapter 38

---

For the most part, it was a quiet drive home. Tori had spent a few hours at the volcano lair, taking advantage of the privacy and lack of distractions to work on some initial designs and inquire into material availability. The guild's network of underground suppliers had been diminished by their public outing, but not wiped out completely. While some of the more exotic components might take a bit, there was plenty to get started on what she considered the more simplistic options.

By the time Tori crossed back over to Ridge City via the country club and caught a car back to her apartment, it was the dead of night. Even the bars were closed as they rolled along the quiet streets. Tori watched the light posts go by, ignoring her body's desire to shiver when they passed isolated stretches. She wouldn't give this new fear any purchase. Her life was too dangerous to be afraid of something as simple as walking down the street. It helped to remind herself that, if she'd been willing to accept the consequences, escape had always been an option. Next time, she wouldn't have to make that choice, though. Next time, she'd be ready as Tori.

As the car pulled up, she noticed a figure waiting in the shadows not far from her building. Too public for a fellow villain, oddly shadowy for a cape. Maybe someone had decided to take a run at her already, while she was a hot commodity? Tori expected to feel no more than exhausted at the proposition, but an ember of rage quickly took light. This shit was not going to fly, and if she'd learned anything from the guild, it was the importance of sending a message. Maybe some broken bones and pulped testicles would give the next dipshit pause.

No sooner was she out of the car than the figure was moving, however. The shock of copper hair gave away the surprise seconds before she reared back for a punch.

“Fucking hell, Donald! I thought you were another damn kidnapper.”

“So you were coming toward me?” Donald emerged fully into the light, clad in his old civilian clothes. Slacks and a wrinkled plaid button-down made him look like the easier nighttime target. Once upon a time, that would have been an accurate impression, too, but months with the AHC had affected Donald. From the width of his shoulders to the way he stood straighter, being a cape was changing him. Into what, Tori suspected she’d have to wait to find out.

“Sorry, I’m not here to scold. I just wanted to make sure you were okay. And that you got home safe. And to say that I’m... I’m sorry, Tori. You’re my friend, you helped me when I needed it most, and I couldn’t be there to return the favor.”

Occasionally, she wondered if it was wise, having a friend on the other side of the line. Donald was a liability, someone who could turn on her once he learned the truth. The more she saw of Fornax and Lodestar’s odd dynamic, the more Tori had begun to suspect that these things might be inevitable. Ultimately, it didn’t really matter. Donald was her friend, and even if this appearance was creepy as shit, it obviously came from a place of concern.

“Hey, buddy, little perspective: the motherfucking Alliance of Heroic Champions, including all three members of the Champions’ Congress, worked together to save me as fast as they were physically able. I know you’re having a good debut year, but in no way do I hold you to a higher standard than Quorum or Professor Quantum.” Tori crossed the rest of the distance between them, gently taking his hand. “No one expects you to save the world yet, Donald. Just keep doing the best you can with the power you’ve got. That’s all anyone has the right to ask.”

He met her eyes for a long moment before glancing away. “Sweet lord. I came out here to apologize, scared you instead, and now you’re comforting me after a day of being kidnapped.” Donald sighed, shaking off some of his reticence. “I wanted to tell you not to worry, that we’re going to make sure you’re covered—not just at home. We’ll—”

“Hard pass.” Tori cut him off, but didn’t let go of his hand quite yet. She didn’t know how it would go over, but she could always elevate to a firm sell if the amiable approach failed. “Donald, for a multitude of reasons, some of which will become clear soon, it is vital that the AHC not put a protective detail on me. The New Science Sentries can stay, since they’re already moved in and I don’t hate the idea of our home being protected, but in no way, shape, or form do I want capes on my tail every time I leave the house.”

“Tori... you’re a target now. You’re famous. Even if it won’t actually hurt the AHC, there are people who will go after you because they think it makes us look bad. I’m not trying to scare you more; I just want you to understand that it’s dangerous. You’ll need protection.”

“I’ll have it.” Tori released Donald’s hand, jamming her index finger into his chest. “But not from the Champions’ Congress, not from the normal patrol capes, and yes, Donald, not from you. This is my life, and if the AHC can’t respect that, then you’re not giving me much more agency than those kidnappers did.”

Though Donald looked like he’d been slapped, he made no counterargument. “I don’t want to force myself into your life. If that’s how you feel, I’ll stay away. I’m sorry, I just wanted to make sure you were safe.”

Before he could turn, Tori grabbed his shoulder. “Hang on there, drama king. Cyber Geek doesn’t have permission to tail me, but my friend Donald is still welcome to come around. Just call first, and leave the shadow skulking to the criminals. Do pass what I said on to the capes. I’m serious about that.”

Despite smiling as she stopped him, Donald’s smirk faltered at her order. “I’ll pass the word along. But... well, I don’t really have the authority to tell everyone else what to do.”

“That’s fine. I have plans if it comes to that. So long as you can respect the boundaries, I don’t hold you accountable for whatever else the AHC does.” Tori dearly hoped Donald remembered that sentiment if the tables were ever turned and he learned about her organizational ties. “In fact, let’s do lunch next week. By then, I might have something fun to show you. Until then, I think one of us has a city to save.”

It didn’t escape Tori’s notice that Donald hung around on the street until she was through the door, but he was gone by the time she looked out the window again, so they seemed to have reached an understanding. Tori was feeling quite pleased with herself as she ascended the stairs, mentally replaying the conversation and unable to catch any major slip-ups or reveals.

Her good mood evaporated as she arrived on her floor to find Kyle leaning against the stairwell, a pile of empty test tubes accumulated by his side. His eyes were fluttering open as she put her last foot onto the wooden floor, the creaks calling Kyle out of slumber's clutches.

"Hrugh?" Kyle shook his head, slowly moving to stand. For her part, Tori kept on walking, making a beeline for her apartment. She felt like she'd made good progress, only to hear her name from a few feet away. Damn speedsters. "Tori? Tori!"

"Oh holy fuck, I do not have the energy to do this twice." She whirled around, catching Kyle by surprise. "It's fine that you didn't protect me; that's not your real job, and we both know it. I don't care that you weren't there at the rescue; nobody was going to do a better job than Lodestar, anyway. You don't owe me an apology or an explanation. I'm the penance case you got stuck with after a fuckup, and no one actually expected any of this to happen. We good now? Because it's a few hours from sunup and some of us have had a real shitberg of a week so far."

It was only as she spoke that Tori truly looked at Kyle, noticing the sway in his posture and his wavering vision. By the time she was winding down, Tori had a hunch, but it wasn't until he finally spoke that she got confirmation.

"You... do not like us." Kyle seemed almost relieved by the words, slurred though they were.

That definitely sealed it: Kyle was drunk. A quick look over at the test tubes gave Tori a working hypothesis, one that was easy to check. "Did you get liquored up on some kind of hooch for people with super-speed metabolism?"

Her response was Kyle lifting a finger to his mouth and blowing out sloppily, in what was probably supposed to be a "shhh" gesture. "Don't tell the others. This is such an Ike move."

"Is that why you're drinking in the hall? Didn't want your friends to find out?" Now that she knew he might not be out here for her, Tori's annoyance level sank considerably. A drunk night during a hard week was hardly something she had room to get judgmental about.

"Started out at the roof pool, watching the stars." Kyle looked around, knitting his brow in concentration. "Crud, when did I get down here?"

“No idea, but let’s get you home.” Taking his shoulder, Tori guided Kyle down the hallway and the short walk to his actual door. She moved to knock, but it slid open before her fist was even fully raised.

To Tori’s surprise, it was Ike waiting at the door, looking up at the both of them. “Thanks. I was going to peel him off the floor within the hour if he didn’t come in soon. Come on, you bossy cock, let’s get you some water.”

Ike led his taller teammate inside, laying Kyle on the couch, then teleporting to the kitchen to grab a bottle of water from the fridge. Tori watched him work, realizing that this was the first time she’d been around Ike or Presto without a constant torrent of noise pouring from his mouth.

“Does this happen a lot?”

“Maybe twice a year,” Ike replied. “Austin is the team leader, but Kyle’s got a lot of responsibilities that weigh on him. Every now and then, it gets to be too much and he tries to go wild. Once caught him listening to old techno music on the beach, attempting to get drunk off stolen wine coolers. Much of a pain as Kyle can be, all that uptightness comes from a desire to be good at this job, to be a real superhero. Occasionally, that thought makes him more tolerable.”

It was strange to see Ike so matter-of-fact, a complete swing from the crass personality he usually donned. Unnerving, too, because Tori hadn’t really considered him past that depth. She’d taken his surface level for the real thing, a mistake no self-respecting villain could rightfully excuse. Perhaps this night was a happy accident; better to know about a threat than to be caught unaware.

“What’s your role, then? Austin’s the leader, Kyle is the clear second. Seems like you and Ellie would have parts to play as well.”

“I’m the scapegoat. She’s the tits.” The words were delivered almost neutrally, save from a touch of fire in Ike’s voice toward the end.

“Wow. Sorry, I thought the ‘piece of shit’ thing was more of an act. My bad.” Tori looked toward the door, but Ike teleported over, offering her a water bottle as well.

“You think I picked those roles?” Ike asked. “Don’t ask a question you don’t want answered. What I said was the truth. You could find any number of metas with adequate powers to fill my spot. I’m on this team because no one will ever really like me, so if something ever goes wrong, I’m the one who takes the heat. I’m not being cute, or funny. This is the job I have.”

She accepted the water, eyeing Ike uncertainly. Tempting as it was to head home, learning more about the capes down the hall was probably an opportunity worth pursuing. If she was stuck with them anyway, understanding their inter-team dynamics couldn't hurt. "Why take a job like that?"

The question earned her a genuine laugh out of Ike, a harsh bark that trailed off quickly. "Look at me, Tori. I'm short, not personable, and at my best, I've got a plain face. Despite a power that kicks all kinds of ass, I'm never making it to the big leagues on my own. Does playing the scapegoat role suck? For sure. Is it also my only chance at touching true greatness? Hell yes."

"And Ellie?"

Ike's face darkened for a split second. From his pocket, he produced a cell phone, cycling through the pictures until he stopped on one of a younger Ike and a dark-haired woman smiling on a beach. Actually smiling, in Ike's case. There was something familiar about the woman, too, though Tori couldn't quite place it.

"That's before she made the cut. Before the 'profile enhancements' deemed necessary for someone representing the New Science Sentries brand."

Holy shit. Now that Tori looked closer and squinted, she could see the resemblance. It wasn't easy, though. Cheeks, lips, chest, hair, everywhere she looked, there were only hints of the Ellie she knew now in the picture. The woman had practically been rebuilt with plastic surgery, despite how natural she still looked. An advantage of Professor Quantum's tech, no doubt.

"She agreed to this?" Tori asked.

"It was a chance to be on the New Science Sentries, a team founded and funded by the world's first superhero. Yeah, she took the deal. We'd spent years trying to earn the opportunity. Eleanor became Ellie, who then took the title of Plasmodia. Or did you think her costume's cut was a coincidence?"

The more Tori saw of Professor Quantum's team-building methods, the gladder she was that there were other capes in the Champions' Congress. If Beverly's family history hadn't already clued Tori in to the fact he was a bastard, this certainly would have tipped her suspicion.

“I suppose she had her reasons, just like you did,” Tori said at last. “As for me, I need to rest. Take care of Kyle, and try not to let him drink in the hallway like that. I’ll see you all around.”

“Something tells me you’ll be seeing us all sooner than you might think.”

She was back into the hallway as she heard Ike’s words, and by the time she turned to investigate, the door was shut once more. Too wiped to sincerely care, Tori trekked down the rest of the hallway, turned the lock, and stepped inside.

After days that felt like years, Tori was finally home.

---

Chapter 39

---

The high-pitched whine pattered out, echoing through the office's vast space for several seconds before fading completely. Setting up shop in a hidden cave lair had many privacy benefits, but the acoustics weren't anything to sneeze at, either. A pale, gaunt hand scratched out the final bits of the message as the sound turned into a ringing in the ears, before finally transitioning into a persistent memory of a noise.

It was the final transmission he'd expect until the arrival neared. Once they were moving, non-emergency communication would be too risky. Even this had required years of research to create specialized concealment equipment, and worked largely because few even bothered to scan for these sorts of signals. The longer he could keep his presence, and plans, a secret, the greater his chances of success. Time had taught him patience, a very useful skill, especially when one played a game that ran for decades.

On this occasion, patience was hardly required. About a month. That was how long he had until the party could properly begin, based on travel calculations. One month to get everything in order. Much of the groundwork had already been laid; being thought dead for decades made it possible to work easily unseen. The big players were accounted for, as they had been since the plan's initial conception. It was the newer, smaller fish that represented the capacity for chaos. Some chose to ignore fresh metas, believing the true challengers aged into their power. But the world was not a fair place, and some were born with more strength than others. Being experienced, he'd seen too many undone by such hubris.

The next step was securing fodder. Lozora's contacts were of a specific type, those with established reputations. It was essential to have a known element approach the other criminals; they weren't exactly the openly trusting sort. However, numbers still counted for quite a lot, especially where the game of distraction was concerned. Dealing high-tech weapons to various criminal outfits was a dual-pronged tactic: it not only allowed him to test designs before the big day, it gave him an in with the unsavory enterprises.

This task was best handled by someone with no past, origins, or true identity. Moving from the repaired communications array, the man ambled over to a drawer, producing a small square box. Popping it open, he thumbed through the array of IDs for his various identities. Some were fresh; others had been in use for decades, building up legitimate histories. Those were suited to other tasks. Today, he sought something fresh.

A pair of Ws jumped off a card at him, and he smiled. The names were left up to chance, so one must have come out that way by coincidence. Or, perhaps, serendipity. Either way, the search was over as he pulled the card up from the ranks of its brethren, promoting it to a position of usefulness.

"I suppose I shall be Wendel Worthington, then. For a few weeks." Wendel took the card over to his computer, where the identity's other information could be researched. A name with alliterating Ws might not mean much to most people; however, for Wendel's purposes, it was a perfect moniker. A tribute, in a way, to one of the only other people who'd managed the same accomplishment.

There were, after all, only so many people who Professor Quantum truly hated.

After the long week she'd had, Helen was aching for a few minutes of relaxation. Penelope was still sleeping, other members of the AHC were keeping the world safe, and she'd just finished a long night flying the skies. The sound of hot water pouring into her bathtub was like a siren's song of rest.

While she didn't really feel pain outside of serious attacks from major metas, Helen could still carry tension. Her back especially was ready for some treatment. She paused in the kitchen long enough to grab a mug of coffee and warm it with a quick blast of her thermal-breath, then headed for her sanctuary. Unfortunately, before she could reach the peaceful palace of porcelain, the phone rang. Not her home phone, of course. Life could never be that simple.

From the pocket of her robe came Helen's AHC-issued device, packed full of technology. It wasn't quite on par with the Quantum Utility Tool she kept on her as Lodestar, but was far less conspicuous, as to the outside observer, it was little more than a phone like countless others.

"What's up?"

Quorum's voice was waiting for her—another bad sign. "Quite a great deal. The world is restless, and Captain Bullshit has just unveiled another exhibition. Concerning you—however, there is specific business that needs addressing. On a rescue mission last night, we had a team suffer heavy civilian losses. While they still saved a great many, the pain of their failing is undeniable. They need to see The Grove, and historically, you liked to be contacted in those situations."

Standing in the door of her bathroom, Helen stared at the soft steam steadily rising from the tub, practically forming a hand and crooking a finger to invite her in. There were others who could do the job, who had been doing it for years while she was gone. Except it wouldn't be the same. When the speech came from the strongest meta, when Lodestar said that nobody could save them all, the newer superheroes listened. Twisting the knob, Helen killed the water and popped open the drain, letting her planned moment of peace go swirling into the sewers.

"Let me drop Penelope with a sitter, and Lodestar will be there."

It was a surprise to wake up and find snow falling from the sky. For one thing, the season was still late summer. For another, snow wasn't usually blazing purple and electric blue in color. Lastly, Tori was pretty damn sure snow didn't turn into flowers when it landed. True, they died after a few minutes, but it still had the effect of letting Tori look out her window and see Ridge City caught between a blizzard and a jungle.

“Oh good, you’re up. I was coming to get you.” Beverly pushed the bedroom door fully open, having already turned the knob.

“Is this something we should be concerned about?”

“Nah, the news says it’s just a Captain Bullshit exhibition.” Making her way across the room, Beverly joined her friend by the window. “I’m not great with meta-history, but he can change reality, right? With a power like that, he kinda sticks out.”

“As I read it—and this was in an article from years and years ago—the consensus is that he can reshape reality, but only to create what he deems to be art. Not sure what the exact term was—I think he called his style ‘absurdist creative expressionism,’ assuming that isn’t just word-soup. Never much of an art gal.”

The two of them stayed like that for several minutes, watching the multicolored snow fall and coat their city in a sea of flora, which died and was replaced in fairly quick succession. One thing was apparent, however: no one would be driving in this. A car might make it ten feet before becoming overgrown, and that was being more than a little generous.

“The city invoked a meta-holiday, so most businesses are closed,” Beverly supplied, her own eyes tracing the empty streets. “Chloe is home all day, and I’m ahead of schedule on work. After what happened, if you want to be alone, I get it, but if you wanted to have some company, we’re here for that, too.”

A reassuring hand landed on Tori’s shoulder, almost causing her to flinch. After a moment, she let herself relax. Or at least as relaxed as she was capable of being.

“I know you well enough to guess you might want to shove past the whole kidnapping thing, and if so, then we can respect that. Just know that if you do decide to talk about it, I’m around.”

“Thanks,” Tori said, her voice stiff despite her best efforts to soften it. “Maybe once I’ve had a little time. For now, I need to feel like a normal person, you know? Just for a day, leave all the other stuff on the sidelines and rest.” Burning as her ambitions where, Tori could also feel her own exhaustion, the kind sleep would do nothing to fix. She needed to reenergize, and drudging up that recent horror-show wouldn’t help.

The hand on her back clapped her once before removing itself. “Good time to want normality, though. We can turn this into a snow day: watch winter movies, make hot chocolate, enjoy a mini winter break.”

Pressing her hand to the window, Tori could feel the heat coming through the glass. If anything, it felt warmer than it had lately. Maybe flower-rain warmed things up, since normal rain cooled the temperature down? It was hard to put too much logic into this sort of thing; reality had literally been momentarily warped, so making sense was largely optional.

“I think we might want to go the other way with that. By noon, this whole place’s AC will be fighting to keep up.”

Beverly followed her lead, a momentary blip of surprise on her face as she felt the warmth. “Huh, not a bad point. Okay, so... beach day? Make margaritas in the blender, go make use of the rooftop pool before fall really sets in?”

Ordinarily, Tori would have happily chosen a day working in her garage lab, but this week was anything but ordinary, even by supervillain standards. A day with her friends sounded like just the right change of pace. Some normality to balance out all the extra crazy she’d been dealing with of late.

“I’ll tell Chloe once she’s out of the shower,” Beverly offered. “You get dressed. We’ll figure out a game plan.” Beverly almost went to leave, before stopping herself. “Look, we don’t have to talk about this right now. I just want to tell you so you don’t think I’m springing it on you later: I sort of ended up inviting our neighbors over later this week. Austin and I ran into each other. We got food, and by the end, I’d somehow offered some basic socializing lessons so they can stop blowing their cover so often. Don’t feel obligated to attend by any means—I got myself into this—but also, please be aware we’ll be hosting capes on Sunday.”

Although even twelve hours ago, that might have been of greater annoyance, Tori wasn’t quite so bothered by the idea as she’d expected. Seeing Ike and Kyle’s more vulnerable sides had offered useful insight into their personalities and the team’s dynamic. If they were going to be her protectors, she should probably understand their limits. And if they were going to be Hephaestus’s enemies, she should definitely know their weaknesses. Either way, Tori always held to the belief that more information was a boon, and this sounded like exactly the sort of scenario where such tidbits might be spilled.

“Let me know once the details are pinned down. Can’t make any promises, but I’ll try not to leave you on your own to deal with them.”

“I appreciate it. Given their current track record, I can only imagine what sort of state secrets they’ll accidentally reveal,” Beverly said. To her, that was probably a joke, though Tori wasn’t so sure. “Get dressed. I’ll get things started on our snow day, but for sun. Sun-day? No, crap, that’s obviously a day already. I’ll figure it out by the time you’re done.”

Beverly marched out, momentarily more concerned with her naming dilemma. As for Tori, she took her time getting ready, starting with a short shower that was closer to boiling than hot, the sort that a human would have shrunk from. It felt good to be in her own shower, getting ready like it was another day heading to Vendallia. Most of the time, Tori fit well into her extraordinary life, but on occasions she too needed the comfort of routine.

Post-shower, getting ready was a simple affair, with no cumbersome work clothes to bother with. A simple t-shirt and shorts would see her through until it was time to head to the roof; the apartment’s dress code was minimal on its best day. Running hands through her hair, Tori checked the mirror and found a normal, everyday woman in her mid-twenties staring back.

She paused, looking the image over with a critical eye. What she was planning would mean using the spotlight that had been thrust upon her, but in doing so, she’d likely never escape it again. Image was going to be a thing she’d have to care about, inasmuch as it furthered her goals. Controlling the perception was key, especially at the start. How she looked would be the first thing people noticed, and the furthest she might get, if her choices were not calibrated properly. It wasn’t that she was looking to tart things up, more that she needed to project a specific image. This was a matter to consult on with Beverly, once things were a bit further along. For today, Tori was happily resigned to some much-needed mundanity.

With the mirror-check done, she stepped out of her room and into the kitchen. To her shock, she entered to find Beverly halfway shifted into her green dragon form, glaring at a strange woman shivering in a bathrobe, kitchen knife clutched tightly in her shaking hands.

It was such an insane scene that she genuinely thought her mind was mistaken, improperly processing the visual information being sent. But a few quick blinks changed nothing, except to bring a few more details to Tori’s attention. For one, the woman was absolutely breathtaking, the sort of inhuman beauty it took celebrities and special effects to achieve. Her looks clashed with the worn, lime-green bathrobe that didn't fit her statuesque body. In fact, it didn't look right on her at all, because Tori knew that robe.

That was when it clicked, and while Tori was making some serious deductive leaps, she also trusted her gut as she stepped forward, quickly putting herself between Beverly and their apparent intruder.

"Calm it down," Tori ordered, very nearly reaching forward to pop Beverly on the nose. "You're scaring the piss out of Chloe."

That earned a pause in the glowering as Beverly's already green eyes, tinged with a hint of magic, scanned the shivering woman once more. This time, she was probably taking in the fact that their "intruder" had come unarmed, as that was their kitchen knife, and was dressed in a bathrobe that also happened to belong to a roommate who wasn't present. One with strange, hard-to-define powers, capable of truly unpredictable effects.

"That's Chloe?" Beverly sounded normal, so evidently, her tongue hadn't gone dragon-shaped yet.

"Of course, it's me!" Chloe sounded much the same, a slight husk to her voice lost in the near terror. She looked down at herself, eyes widening. "Shit! Sorry. I came in here to show you this, but then you whirled on me, and I sort of panicked."

The three of them stood like that for a moment, until Beverly's body started to shift, slowly morphing back to a fully human form. "Apologies. I'm a little on edge, given everything. How did you change your entire body, though?"

A sheepish look came over the stunning face they were looking into. "I was in the shower, thinking about phrases, and one I hadn't tried popped into my head. Turns out, once you say that beauty is only skin deep..."

As Chloe explained, Tori turned her attention to putting on a pot of coffee. Day off or not, the way things were shaping up, she was definitely going to need it.

---

Chapter 40

---

“At first, nothing happened. Then I noticed some of my skin peeling a little in the water. Not much, not even sunburn level—just like the dead, dry skin coming off. Soon, more was coming, and after a few seconds, the whole top layer washed away to reveal... this.”

Chloe spread her arms, pulling the bathrobe to dangerous heights. Her new form filled it out far more fully than the original, with ample hips and chest, capable shoulders, and toned limbs. Flowing chestnut hair, pouty lips—it was like she’d been built using photo manipulation software. “Neat trick, right?”

Neat was one way to put it. Terrifying was another. Chloe’s power was like Captain Bullshit’s, in that it played entirely by its own rules and logic. Sudden shower-shapechanging like that should be harder, should take some kind of toll, but all Chloe had needed was to find the right words. This was one just more innocuous trick, yet Tori couldn’t help wondering how long it would be until Chloe found the words to something dangerous, the sort of ability that would put her on the wrong people’s radar.

“Here’s my thing, though, isn’t beauty subjective? Like, yes, you are a stone-cold knockout right now, but what part of your ability determines what we value in the looks department?” Beverly had shifted from attack to analysis as soon as the situation became clear. She leaned across the kitchen counter, nearly knocking over her own mug of coffee, scanning Chloe more closely.

“I hadn’t considered that,” Chloe admitted. “Maybe based on what I consider to be beautiful? Or an average of everyone in the area’s general preferences? It's a good point. You never really know what one person will like over another."

Tori said the words on reflex, not fully considering the implications. "Beauty is in the eye of the beholder."

Silence filled the room. Eyes turned to Tori first, then to Chloe, as the same thought echoed simultaneously through all three heads. Beverly broke the word embargo, tapping her finger against the counter. "You don't think..."

"No reason I can see why it wouldn't," Tori replied. "Then again, I'm not the expert."

"But you're right. It makes sense in theory," Chloe agreed. "Same principle, and I can see how it would work. What the hell—let's make a morning of it. A penny saved is a penny earned."

It seemed like nothing happened. Then Tori blinked, and Chloe was back to her old self again. The core limit of Chloe's power appeared to be that she could only sustain a single saying at a time. Changing it up canceled out the lingering effects of her last one—in this case, at a rapid pace.

"Figured I should set myself back to normal for a first test. Okay, here we go. Beauty is in the eye of the beholder."

Taking a cue from the last minute, Tori voluntarily closed her eyes, giving the power time to work. Ideally, this would make for a smoother transition, and Chloe hadn't accidentally summoned a fantasy monster by mistake. Slowly, Tori peeked, scoping out the new-new-Chloe.

At first, she thought it hadn't worked, but that was only because she'd been expecting another complete overhaul. Instead, this Chloe looked more like a relative of the original. Same basic structure, only everything had been elevated: flawless skin, defined muscle, her face reshaped slightly, and her white-blonde hair now well past her shoulder.

"Oh, neat. You look good as a brunette." Beverly was also staring, though based on her comment, they weren't getting the exact same picture.

"Interesting. She's still blonde to me," Tori said.

Chloe hopped up from the counter, a gleam of excitement in her eye. "Hang on, let me get a pen and paper. You can both write down what you see, and then we'll compare. Let's test what this new saying can do!"

While it wasn't technically a very normal start to a day, Tori was spending her morning goofing around with her friends. That part mattered more than staying within the confines of the mundane. Besides, the scientist in her was always piqued by experimentation.

In terms of this project, there was a nuclear option—one that Rick was hesitant to pull, fearing both the blast and the fallout. He contemplated that as he typed on the computer, keenly aware these efforts were largely fruitless. So far, his research had gone nowhere. Whoever had hidden his father's true identity was skilled far beyond anything he could manage with some scrounged-up hacking programs. Each bit he'd pulled for Tori was the same. Everything lined up. Every document, every piece of history, all of it told a cohesive story of a young woman who'd lost her family young, fallen into drugs, and finally gotten her life together with the help of a distant uncle. Except there was no link between her family and Ivan, because Ivan had either been lying to them their entire life, or he truly had no family to speak of. Or both.

That didn't mean he was entirely out of paths forward, however. Rick was old enough to read between the lines; he knew his parents didn't have the most amiable relationship post-divorce. They were good about keeping that behind the scenes, always presenting a united front to their kids, but there were too many seams for some not to show. Whatever this secret was might impact his mother's willingness to share it with him. Alternatively, there was a chance this could be something bad. Something that would paint his father in a new light, the sort of thing she might agree not to tell, yet would confirm if he figured it out on his own.

Crazy as that idea seemed, his dad was so boring, and the mystery was stirring up all sorts of confusion. Finding out Ivan had kept this secret their whole lives... it was hard not to wonder what else he was hiding. Rick was a curious, determined boy; however, he was still a child. The possibility of changing the way he viewed his father scared him in ways he wasn't entirely capable of processing. Like all teens, he felt a healthy sense of rebellion and resentment toward those who held control, but Ivan was still his dad. If pressed, and placed into a state more capable of emotional honesty, Rick might have even admitted that he was a good father, at that, supportive and caring in his own way. Despite the distant demeanor, Rick had never for a moment wondered if he had his father's love. Ivan was always there when it counted, and often when it didn't. Firm, but never harsh or cruel. He couldn't even remember Ivan ever yelling at either him or Beth. Misbehavior was met with disappointment and stern discussions.

The mental image of his dad teaching Beth to swim at the community pool didn't quite mesh with the idea of a whole secret life... except for a moment, when Rick's mind flickered. It wasn't the pool anymore. It was a shoreline. Sand, waves, the screech of gulls in the distance. The water was wrong, though. Seawater didn't have viscous streaks of purple woven through it.

Just like that, the image was gone, leaving only a headache in its place. Rick realized his hands had gone still, and sweat dripped from the bottom of his chin onto the keyboard. Hopping up, he ran into the bathroom and noticed the shine on his entire face. He grabbed a towel and wiped away the excessive moisture, then splashed himself with cold water to cool off.

What the hell? A chunk of some image caused that kind of reaction? An image of someplace he wasn't even sure he'd ever been, at that. Rick felt his whole mind rebel at that thought, bringing him up short. No, it was a memory. Every part of his brain insisted that it was authentic, ignoring the utter lack of supporting evidence he could produce.

Whatever he was seeing, it rattled him. Despite the cooldown, Rick's heart was still racing as he sat once more at the computer. All he knew for sure was that it was tied to memories of his father, and the ocean. A new idea poked his brain, slithering up from the terror of his sudden near-panic attack.

Closing out the web browser, Rick instead began rooting around the home's shared folder. Three years prior, Rick's stepdad had digitized all the family's old albums as a birthday gift for Janet. They now lived on a folder tucked away on the massive memory bank connected to the network, and after a couple of clicks, Rick had pulled them up.

A few from his birth—only mom in those. Ivan had allegedly been stuck across town due to a meta-attack. Skimming ahead, Rick noted that the timeline seemed to jump from birth to his first birthday, where Ivan was presenting a lopsided, homemade cake. Under his breath, Rick resisted a snort. His father was usually a much more fastidious cook than that. Skimming ahead again, he was looking at himself as a child, next to a baby Beth just brought home from the hospital. Both parents were there this time, Janet presenting Beth to Rick while Ivan looked like a pack mule who only hauled baby supplies.

The more Rick skimmed, the sillier his concerns seemed. This was ridiculous. He knew who Ivan was. Some strange parts of the man's past didn't change the dad he'd always been. Rick was very near giving up, ready to switch over to college prep, when a new picture popped up on screen. Ivan and Janet waving at the camera. Rick looked about four or five, which would put Beth near one. They were all smiling, the sun shining down overhead—onto hot sand. It was a beach.

No... it was the beach. The one Rick had just seen. His whole stomach seized up, and his hands began to shake. He couldn't even look at it without feeling his brain spasm. Something was off. Wrong. Something had happened there, a memory his brain very clearly didn't want him dragging to the surface. Rick's determination set at that realization. When it had been a mere curiosity, that was one thing. But the deeper he dug, the more serious things were growing. It was starting to feel like this was bigger than he'd realized.

Perhaps it was time to go nuclear after all.

It wasn't often they met in the day. Work, life, and general habits meant they tended to find their time free in the evenings, at least until duty beckoned once more. Sometimes, however, circumstance demanded speed over convenience. There were issues that couldn't wait until the time was right; they had to be dealt with as quickly as possible.

“—and that's all we've managed so far. Vernon is working to analyze the remains of what we brought back, the whole AHC is in a tizzy over getting caught with our pants down, and consequently, I'm probably going to have to do a mass evaluation this weekend. Real crapshow all over the place.”

“About the same,” Ivan agreed, helping himself to a donut from the sizable box he'd brought. The sugary ones were for Penelope when she was back from day camp. He stuck to a simple kruller. “Not the evaluation part, but Wade is bothered by the fact that someone managed to beat him at tech, even if only for a day. Nobody is taking it lightly.”

Helen dipped into the box as well, grabbing a donut so filled with cream and sugars she could have never allowed her daughter to eat it in good conscience. Since she, on the other hand, was functionally immortal, the carbs weren't quite such a concern. She did pause to grab a paper towel off her counter before diving in, though, managing to spare her kitchen island from the first errant blob of cream.

"The real question is: what's their next move? Tori was a test run; pretty sure we're all on that same page. Nothing we saw spoke to a sincere attempt by a legitimate threat. When whoever was really running things starts playing for keeps, I don't think the stakes are going to be one civilian snatched off the street."

This was, by Ivan's estimation, the hardest point in dealing with a new enemy: figuring out what they wanted. Power, skill, competence, all of that could be handled in the moment, but knowing an opponent's goal was the greatest power one could have. It was a compass, guiding him toward them at every turn, showing the things they cared about. Until he knew that, he was playing at a disadvantage. Worse, there was a chance that someone this good knew his real identity, and that put Ivan's own family at risk. Odds that they were coming to pick a fight with a murdering legend were slim, but it had happened before. Plus, as much as they wanted to assume Tori was a coincidence, there was always the chance it wasn't.

"I've got nothing, and I hate it," Ivan admitted. "No clues, no hunches, not even a direction to punch in. Which is a shame, because my fists are positively itching."

From across the kitchen island, Helen's hand landed daintily on his forearm. "Keep a leash on it, tough guy. Tearing up every hideout and den in the underworld isn't actually going to help, especially with someone this careful."

"Be assured, I have no intent to dole this anger out where it isn't deserved." Ivan paused to tear off a sizable chunk of kruller that he swallowed in a single gulp. "But they stole my apprentice off the street, lashed her to a chair, and threatened her life. Whoever set that in motion will answer to me."

"Only if you get there first." It was said teasingly, yet both clocked the seriousness in one another's eyes. She would strive to bring the threat in, while Ivan would fight to put it down. "Maybe you could come on board and team-up for this one. I bet we can find you a costume with a big helmet to hide your face, sell you as some new heavy hitter.”

Helen’s eyes lit up as the idea took hold. She even rubbed her hands together, a habit she’d long ago had to break while in Lodestar form. “Oh my god, this weekend is the mass evaluation—we could totally smuggle you in with the other rookies! Now that would be a hell of a way to drive home the ‘don’t take any threat lightly’ point, some newbie managing to go a few rounds with Lodestar.”

“Aside from the myriad of reasons that’s already a bad idea, I’d never be able to actually fight you without displaying a sizable amount of my power, enough to endanger bystanders.”

“Ivan, I’m not actually going to have you throw down in front of a bunch of new superheroes. It’s just a fun thing to imagine,” Helen assured him. “I mean, don’t get me wrong: I would love to have a chance to let them fight Fornax in a controlled environment, really drill in the difference in power levels without me having to do it.”

Once, Ivan might have missed the flicker of sadness in Helen’s eyes at the prospect. To most of them, she was more legend than person, known for her world-saving exploits. However, what came soon was going to be worse. Right now, the stories were just stories, myths that many no doubt took to be exaggerations. After a mass evaluation, they were going to understand the gulf between where they were and where the top was far, far better. It was a good lesson, one villains needed as much as capes, yet one that weighed heavily on Helen. Because after they understood, they’d grow more distant. Rarely out of fear or malice; it was just the way people behaved among those that were so much stronger than they.

It was lonely at the top. For a brief time, they’d gotten to share that position, but those days were long past. Now, all Ivan could do was remind her that no matter how many people called for Lodestar, some still preferred to spend their time with Helen.

“While Fornax might not be a good fit for an AHC event, you and I also have some business to discuss regarding this week’s Starscouts meeting. The End of Summer Shindig is coming up in a couple of weeks, so we’ll want to make sure to go over that at the top, as well as have handouts for the parents with relevant information. I think they changed the location and fee structure this year, so we’ll want to make sure to highlight those points.”

Helen groaned with such theatricality Ivan half suspected she was stealing the technique from Penelope. “Geez, it’s all work, work, work, with you. Don’t you ever—”

A bright, blinking light appeared on Helen’s wrist, atop what appeared to be a perfectly normal watch. In a literal flash, Helen was gone, replaced by the glowing form of Lodestar. She disappeared in a blur, already changed before zipping through a secret tunnel that led out of the house. By the time Ivan took another bite of kruller, Lodestar was already in the sky, racing to respond to whatever threat the AHC deemed appropriate.

In the meantime, Ivan got to work making a rough outline of the Starscout End of Summer Shindig information for the other parents. Lodestar could handle whatever she was facing alone, but Helen would be glad to have the job started when she got back.

---

Chapter 41

---

By the time they made it up to the rooftop pool in the early afternoon, Captain Bullshit's strange snow had finally ceased, and the flowers growing on every external surface had wilted to nothingness. All that remained of his exploit were the memories, and the heat. Despite the fact they were cusp on fall, the thermometer read like they were summering in the desert. A weather shift like that would have ample effects, many of them negative, but one upswing was that it made for perfect poolside weather.

As Chloe mounted her pink-and-black umbrella onto a stand, creating a shady spot to protect her pale skin, Tori watched her work. She looked normal now, but the morning's experimentation had confirmed that her new phrase allowed her to look different to each person viewing her. Tori and Beverly's descriptions were hardly worlds apart, yet if someone had been taking witness statements, they'd never think both women had been talking about the same person. It was a potent talent, one Tori could envision countless espionage uses for.

Instead, Chloe would probably only ever use it as a party trick, or maybe as a way to boost tips if the coffee shop was running slow one day. And the more Tori thought about it, the happier she was that this unpredictable power was in the hands of someone like Chloe. Flying and fire, even magic, that was all one thing. The powers that fucked with the very foundation of how the world worked scared Tori; she much preferred them in the hands of people who saw them as novelties rather than weapons.

Together, the three women got settled on the far side of the pool, occupying some of the faded and sagging loungers provided by the apartment complex. Once Chloe was under her shade, she began the process of liberally applying ample sunscreen, easily triple the amount that Beverly was using. Tori got to skip that step, since she didn't burn—one of the handier side effects of fire-based abilities.

For the first ten minutes, it was peaceful. A quick dip, a little muddling about, the afternoon breeze stirring up their overheated city. Tori lay in the sun, her mind drifting, contemplating new ideas for her next project. She had to do this right. She only had one chance to launch, and she'd be capitalizing on the kidnapping, so time was a factor. Whatever she kicked off with would have to be just right; there probably wasn't going to be a second chance. Not like this.

Bam. The rooftop door slamming open jarred Tori out of her contemplation and drew a squeak from Chloe. Seconds later, a familiar voice rumbled out from the shadows. "Sorry! I thought it was heavier."

Austin walked into the sunshine, clad in board shorts and a large t-shirt, a suitably shameful expression on his face. No sooner had he actually scanned the roof than his whole body changed. Seizing up, the relaxed ease left him, and he barely managed to take a few steps forward to let his roommates out. "Hello, neighbors. I didn't expect to see you here."

Yeesh, Tori could even hear the tension creeping into his voice.

"Who the shit are you talking to? Wait, why am I back here? I can see the light." In a pop, Ike appeared in front of Austin, while Ellie worked her away around through the doorway. "Ohhh, it's the cute neighbor girls. I gotcha."

"By this point, shouldn't you know our names?" It wasn't an especially barbed comment, but that might have just been thanks to Chloe's constant casual demeanor.

A quick slug smashed into Ike's shoulder, courtesy of Ellie's fist. "Yes, he should, and I'm sure he does." She, unlike most of the attendees, had walked up in her swimsuit without any sort of cover up. It wasn't absolutely risqué, but it was definitely more skin-forward than anything Tori would have chosen. Then again, as she was in a simple red one-piece designed for lap-swimmers, that wasn't saying much. It was probably about on par with Beverly's bikini, which still meant it was well outside Tori's comfort zone.

On Ellie, however, it was stunning. Tori watched the woman, remembering Ike's picture of the old her. Whoever had done the work was good. There were no signs that her beauty was anything but natural. Part of Tori wondered if that made the whole thing better, or worse.

As Kyle followed Ellie out, shoving Austin another few inches forward, Ike teleported over to their area, hunkering down next to Chloe. "You know, some people would be complimented by being called cute."

Lowering her oversized vintage sunglasses slightly, Chloe met Ike's eye, then reached out and gently ruffled his hair. "Sorry, bud. I had my sad-boy-hiding-his-pain-through-asshole-behavior phase already, and I'm not looking for a do-over. Why don't you aim your words in the same direction as your heart?" Pointedly, Chloe glanced over to Ellie, whom Ike had thought he was carefully ignoring.

It was the first time Tori had seen Ike absolutely flattened, and Chloe had done it with a comforting tone. He stared at her, ignoring the rest of his team settling in on another set of chairs, mouth opening twice before he finally responded. "You're dangerous, aren't you?"

"Like you wouldn't believe. So play nice." With that, Chloe popped her sunglasses back up and laid into her chair, signaling the conversation was done.

For a few minutes, peace returned. The New Science Sentries unloaded their own gear—towels and coolers and the like—while the two secret villains and a not-so-secret barista lounged in the warm air. As their neighbors finished getting ready, attention turned to the pool. Kyle went in first, popping his shirt off, and Tori was unsurprised to see the usual build of a super-speed meta. The man ran lean, toned to the point of being shredded thanks to nonstop cardio and training. Austin was close behind him, pausing only to remove the oversized t-shirt hiding his torso.

"Oh my." The words had slipped from Beverly's mouth without warning, earning her a cocked eyebrow from Tori.

"Was that a George Takei impression? I didn't know you watched any Multerion Collection flicks, let alone the sci-fi stuff."

"Never got into movies from other universes, so I have no idea who you're talking about," Beverly admitted. "I, um, must have been thinking and something nonsensical slipped out."

"Come on now. That's not even my particular flavor of ice cream, and I can admit it's a well-made sundae," Chloe chimed in.

She wasn't wrong. Austin was nothing if not properly put together. He'd always been large—that went with the territory of physical strength more often than not—but this was the first time they could see just how well conditioned he was. What he wielded wasn't simply mass, built by repeatedly lifting heavy objects. It was the honed muscle of someone who put their strength to work, constantly and continuously.

Unfortunately, Ellie had chosen that moment to get near enough to overhear. “Hang on, if that isn't your flavor, what is?” The hungry look she tossed over her shoulder left no question about Ellie's own appreciation for her leader's physique.

“What's the ice cream equivalent of pansexual? Rainbow sherbet? I'm going to say rainbow sherbet,” Chloe decided. “I more meant I'm not into the huge look. My preference leans toward people closer to my size.”

Though she didn't say it, on that point, Tori and Chloe were agreed.

Ellie, however, merely shook her head. “No accounting for taste, I suppose. At least this gal is with me.” Ellie held up a hand for Beverly to high-five, which she did, after noticing it a few seconds too late to not get chuckled at. Clearly, Beverly had no such qualms about the muscle-bound physique.

It wasn't long past then that the heat drove more of them into the water, forcing dips to cool down. Although she was unaffected, Tori did the same, careful not to draw too much attention to herself, even for something as simple as high heat tolerance. This game they were playing was dangerous. The closer they got to the New Science Sentries, the worse the blowback could be if they learned the truth. But the rooftop pool was a shared space, and ultimately, Tori was finding she didn't mind the quartet entirely. Outside of the costumes, they made decent company. When not hallway drinking, that was.

By the time Kyle finally approached Tori on his own, waiting until the rest of the group was distracted messing with a portable charcoal grill, she was already waiting for him. His nervous, shamed glances had been coming her way all day, and while they'd spoken, it had only been in brief, passing snippets of casual conversation. She'd seen him gathering his courage, and even gone off on her own to present an opportunity. Better to get this done with, especially while everyone was in a good mood.

“Hey,” he greeted her, as if they hadn't just spent several hours together. “I, uh, wanted to talk to you about last night.”

“Good news: you didn’t take a swing, use a slur, or try to grab my ass, so we’re fine.”

That stunned him for a moment; Kyle moved in silence as he took a seat on the unoccupied lounge next to Tori, resting in the shade of Chloe’s curiously colored umbrella. “Nice to know, I guess, but I didn’t think I’d have done any of that in the first place.”

“Makes you a nicer drunk than most people I’ve known,” Tori shot back. “Look, I know you feel bad, but really, why? You got weekday drunk? Big whoop, we both know you cleared a hangover within the first ten minutes of waking up, so there’s no long-term consequences. All you did with me was apologize, so nothing bad there. Unless you took a piss in this pool last night and are only just now revealing it, I truly don’t get where all this guilt is coming from.”

“But I’m a superhero,” Kyle protested.

“So the fuck what? It’s a job. It doesn’t define who you are, or what you can be. Hell, if you want to get technical, you’re only a superhero when you’re in costume, and last night, I saw Kyle getting hammered. No Tachyonic in sight. The reason capes wear masks is so they can take them off and be normal people when the day is done.”

In truth, this was some of her own villain education being repurposed and repackaged, but the point was a sound one. Ivan had helped her build multiple identities for a reason, beyond just secrecy. Different feelings, different ambitions, they might not all fit the same side of her. Some things were for Tori, others for Hephaestus. The villain in her, for example, realized how much work time she was wasting sitting in the sun, comforting a cape, but she made no attempt to leave. The human part of Tori deserved her downtime.

“When I go running in costume, people cheer. They scream my name, try to slap my hand if I’m passing close. They’re already looking up to me. I saw kids wearing Tachyonic shirts yesterday, but it feels like I’ve just been fucking up nonstop since we got here. Last night was one more log on the guilt fire, I guess.”

“How many people has Tachyonic saved?” Tori asked. “Since arriving in Ridge City, I mean.”

Kyle took a moment, doing some mental calculations and perhaps a few ticks on his hands. “Rough estimates, about seventy-five, though I’m rounding a little on how many people were on the bus I stopped a few days ago.”

“Sounds to me like you’re doing fine. It’s not your job to inspire, or be a perfect symbol, or some flawless beacon of justice. Showing up when people truly need you is a superhero’s only real job. Be there, help people, turn certain deaths into near-misses. Give people their futures back.”

“And don’t forget the receipt in the bag.” The smirk on Kyle’s mouth was tentative, yet distinct.

Despite herself, Tori laughed. “Look at that, you’re already learning. A proper rescue protects them from all threats, meta as well as meta. Cat’s out of that bag now, though.”

As peace settled between them, Tori thought their conversation had reached its end. Based on the bursts of flame shooting up from the grill, dinner would go from raw to burned in rapid succession, so they’d likely be eating soon. She was expecting Kyle to get up and mosey over. Instead, he settled deeper into the lounge.

“You know, for someone who acts like she doesn’t give a crap about superheroes, you’ve sure given a lot of thought to their purpose.”

“Not especially. But I’ve seen what happens when there is no last-minute miracle... no cape swinging in with a power to fix everything, no sudden shift in a seemingly inevitable fate.” Warm air be damned, Tori could still feel the chill from that damned hospital room. “You only have to witness that once to know the other version is better.”

A glance at Kyle showed her a man conflicted. He clearly wanted to know more, but was also perceptive enough to notice that this wasn’t some hypothetical situation she was describing. After a brief struggle, he formed his next words carefully. “Tori, I’m still getting to know you, and I feel like half our chats end with me saying the wrong thing, so I’m just going to be plain. If that was cryptic because you don’t want to talk specifics, we can end it there. If it was to get me to dig deeper, I’m happy to listen.”

“Asking was the right call. It’s definitely the former,” Tori confirmed. “But by this point, I know you have it in a file somewhere, so let’s just get this done. My parents died due to an accident at a lab that made them violently, briefly ill. Their only hope was someone with meta-tech or powers, none of which came through. And that is the maximum I want to talk about it.”

Another pause in the conversation, this one shorter than the last.

“My parents gave me away,” he told her. “My mother was part of a prenatal setlium exposure test to see if powers could be reliably created by introducing it early. The answer was no, it didn’t work reliably, but some of us did beat the odds. When she produced a meta-human baby, Professor Quantum made an offer. That was it. I don’t even know their names. He says he destroyed all records for security, to make sure no one could use our biological parents as leverage. I don’t want to talk about it, either, mind you. This isn’t something I go around tossing out as a fun fact in interviews. But it only felt right to square us up.”

That was not the origin story Tori had expected; however, she was hardly blown away. After hearing Ike’s story, she was getting a sense of Professor Quantum, and it didn’t paint the kindest of pictures. The positive work he did for the world was undeniable. It was his methods that gave Tori pause.

If these were the projects people talked about, what kind of dealings went on behind the scenes?

Luckily, Professor Quantum was an Ivan-level issue, the sort of thing she didn’t have to bother herself with. No, today, Tori’s primary concern was unwinding and having fun with her friends. Along with the New Science Sentries, apparently, which didn’t annoy her as much as it would have just days prior.

“Thanks,” Tori said, climbing up from her chair. “That’s probably enough time in the sad-sack corner. Burgers and beers?”

In a blur, he was at her side, eyes already trained on the smoking grill. “You think any of those will be edible?”

“What the hell, just this once, I’ll try being an optimist.”

---

Chapter 42

---

After the strange snow that blanketed Ridge City on Thursday, the city got too hot for crime. That was Donald's working theory, anyway. It explained why they'd had such a light Friday, and apparently, the AHC expected so few issues on Saturday that the entire class of rookies was being gathered together for a training exercise.

Making his way down the halls, he tried not to fiddle with his Cyber Geek costume. Despite having worn it for months now, being crammed in around so many others in similar outfits had him nervous. Something was up, and he had a hunch it was more than just training. From the tense way Ren was moving at his side, the feeling was mutual. Irene had a steely gaze as well, and even Lucy seemed to be aware things weren't as they seemed.

Every rookie member of the AHC—those from the last confluence, as well as some who'd picked up powers haphazardly in between—gathered together in a vast hall clearly meant for larger audiences. Donald even noticed the New Science Sentries not too far off; apparently, this really was an all-hands-on-deck kind of meeting. Waiting there, at the center of the hall, glowing as expected, stood Lodestar. She hovered a few feet above a raised stage, making herself impossible to miss.

"File on in, everyone. We've got a lot to get through and never enough time." Motioning, Lodestar directed them to move to the front so as to open the entrances for those still streaming in. By the time all of them were there (somewhere around ninety aspiring superheroes), Lodestar had drifted back down to the stage's level.

“Thank you all for coming today,” she said, as though the meeting hadn’t been listed as mandatory on all of their schedules. “I’m sure you’re wondering what this is about, and I’m not much of one for needless suspense. To put it bluntly, some of you have grown beyond the roles you are filling. With the betrayal of Apollo, our training system was severely weakened, yet you have continued to flourish even as our efforts have gone toward larger threats. We have decided to recognize that effort by offering those who wish to take on harder, more dangerous threats the opportunity to do so.”

At his side, Donald could hear Ren’s tail flex at the words. While he’d never publicly complained, Donald knew his friend was craving a greater challenge. After starting off with fighting villains and a gang riot, dealing with muggers just didn’t offer the same ways to test one’s self.

“However, that does not mean we can simply hand you harder tasks. Because the truth is, while some of you are ready to move on, some of you need more time to hone your fundamentals. I confess, right now, I don’t even know with certainty which of you is which. I’ve been too absent from your training to know what you can do, really do, when everything is on the line. That is my failing, and it is one I intend to remedy today.”

Stepping forward, Lodestar walked closer to the stage’s edge, one foot actually going over and planting itself in the air like it was solid ground. “There is no shame in continuing to train your fundamentals, either. Some of the most famous heroes you know spent years doing these tasks, and a lone person being attacked in the night would be just as happy to see you as the person strapped to an out-of-control bus full of dynamite. The threat doesn’t matter. The person you’re helping does. That said, if there are some of you who feel as though your talents could be better utilized by taking on greater threats, then I can certainly respect the sentiment. Anyone who wants to find out if they’re ready, come see me in five minutes. As a team, as a person, talk it over and make your choice. Just know that whatever formation you choose is the one you’ll be given assignments as moving forward.”

Her feet didn’t even move this time. She just slid back, floating to the rear of the stage as conversation burst forth from the barely contained crowd.

Donald took his time turning to face Ren, keenly aware of the enthusiasm that would be waiting for him. To his surprise, Ren was scratching under his cheek whiskers, a sign that he was lost in thought.

“I think we should do it.” In a twist, Irene was the one who spoke up first. “It’s been weeks since the street-level crime was an actual threat. There has to be a better way to use us.”

“For the record, I agree,” Ren said. “But it has to be mentioned that taking on more dangerous jobs also means playing against potentially serious threats. We all saw Fornax beat the living shit out of Apollo, who was way stronger than any of us. If we do this, we have to be okay with going up against someone substantially outside our weight class.”

“That could happen just as easily doing street work. There are always new metas to discover. I’m on Team Go-For-It. Even if we don’t pass, we’ll see areas where we can improve.” Lucy had been Donald’s final expected holdout. With her voicing support, the will of the team was clear.

He certainly wouldn’t be the one to stand in the way. “Okay then, I guess we’re going for it. Whatever ‘it’ is, in this case.”

They didn’t have to wait long. Making their way to the front of the hall, they joined the place where many of their peers were already waiting for Lodestar. A quick scan of the room showed that while a large percentage of the rookies were taking the challenge, there was also a sizable group hanging back. Some were new; others had joined after the same confluence as Donald and the majority of his team. There didn’t seem to be much rhyme or reason to the sorting; people were making the choice based on where they were in their own journey. It didn’t escape his notice that the New Science Sentries were, of course, among the first ones to accept the challenge.

“Everyone who wants to skip this, thank you for coming. Enjoy a Saturday off to spend however you like. The rest of you, follow me.”

Chatter rose up on the wind of whispers as they trekked out of the room, down a hall, and into what looked like an airline hangar. Set before them was a massive metal rectangle, easily the size of a small airplane cabin, and with a single door open at the front.

“File on in and buckle up. Seriously, you do not want to ignore me on that. Anyone who falls outside of standard, human-sized parameters, there are some more varied restraint options toward the rear.” Lodestar waved them forward, and they complied.

The interior felt sort of like a commuter bus, if every seat was ultra-secure and triple reinforced into the framing. Donald followed Ren to the rear, where different styles and sizes of seat options began to pop up. After a moment or two of searching, Ren found one that was large enough for his shoulders and also had a slot in the back where he could fit his tail. Donald, Irene, and Lucy all took spots nearby.

In only a few minutes, they'd all been packed into the strange box, with ample seating left over. Through the door, they could make out Lodestar's form as she gave them one final warning.

"Okay, everyone, get ready for some fun. Make sure you are locked and stowed, because once I start moving, you're going to feel it, even with all the dampening tech Professor Quantum put into this thing. All buckled in? Hope you peed already, because there are no pit-stops on this road trip."

The door slammed and sealed, leaving them with only the artificial lighting that clicked on moments later. At Donald's side, Lucy leaned over and whispered.

"She's not... is she going to carry us? Is that what she meant?"

Before Donald could answer, they felt the box shift, as if it had been pulled upward forcefully.

"I think you might be right." With a gulp and a wish that he had actually used the bathroom before they left, Donald tightened his grip on his seat. Being something of a superhero nerd meant that he had at least a passing familiarity with most of the major capes' core abilities, so he knew that Lodestar could go fast. Even assuming she wouldn't use her full speed, they were in for a hell of a ride.

After a Thursday spent with friends around a pool and a Friday composed largely of brainstorming coupled with catching up on life—such as touching base with Vendallia's offices—Tori was ready to use her weekend to get a jump on her new project. Armed with a few mugs of coffee in her veins and some of Chloe's breakfast bubbling in her stomach, Tori made her way down to the concrete parking units serving as her lab.

It was a mess, as always. To an outsider stepping in, it would seem impossible that Tori could find anything in this chaos. While, if pressed, she would protest that there was a system, that was also part of why Tori didn't generally allow others into her workspace. Less explaining to do, in general.

Her first task was unpacking the Hephaestus armor. Beverly had done a good job throwing everything into a bag, but Tori took her time cataloguing every component as it was removed. She still needed to give the updated flight functions a proper test—one more task for the ever-growing list before her. Only when Tori was fully satisfied that her suit was complete and undamaged did she move her attention to an empty table.

Style would come later, with input from someone with Beverly's skills. Today was about function. The units would have to be small, portable, easy to carry and conceal. Capable of dealing with single targets as well as groups. Too much to pack into one unit—there would have to be multiple options. That worked better from a business perspective, as well: more products to roll out as time ticked on. Her methodology would be the real hurdle. She couldn't very well fill these with enhanced tech. The mere fact that no truly advanced technology ended up on the open market spoke to some sort of limiting force, be it governmental or the AHC. It had to be low enough tech to fly under the radar, while still offering a unique function.

Thinking back to her kidnapping, Tori let the sense of fear she'd been pushing down take hold. This was more than just her next venture; it was the way Tori chose to cope with what happened. She didn't get better by just talking. Her solution was to ensure that no bad experience would ever get the drop on her twice. It was part of why she'd cut off human contact after losing her parents, and why the fear in her mind was spurring her creative thinking, not hindering it.

Tori felt what it was like to be back in that moment. Uncertain of what was happening, or how to respond. What would have saved her, back then? She didn't need to entirely beat them; even just a little distance could have made escape possible. Something distracting, then, and if it slowed them down, then that was icing on the cake. An aerosolized compound in a proper vessel could do that, assuming she found the right material. The obvious fix would be pepper spray, except that didn't affect most metas with any sort of enhanced toughness.

A rogue memory floated up, and Tori began to dig through what one might have taken to be a random stack of junk. While most of her possessions had been purged by the guild during her recruitment, they'd been smart enough to save the essentials. Tori's photo of her parents that sat at the far end of the lab, watching her work, was one such item. Another was a leather-bound book with three different mechanical traps built in. After some searching, she produced the tome, walking it over to the desk as she disengaged the various security measures. When she'd built them, they'd seemed airtight. A few months with the guild, however, and she couldn't believe how lax these safeguards were. Another task for the list, though much further down than the more pressing matters.

Tori perused the pages, looking through her own handwriting as she scoured for the formula in question. Finally, she found the spot she was looking for: a chemical compound created by some meta-tech dealer out in Oklahoma. The substance adhered to skin on contact, creating burning, itching, numbness—and that was assuming none got into the eyes. It might have been the new tear gas, except that the effects only lasted a few minutes before fading entirely. Plus, the fact that it had been cooked in a trailer and sold in old milk jugs meant that not many folks had buying opportunities.

This was one of the many tidbits Tori had scooped up in her years on the road. She was, after all, a thief on top of being an inventor, and there was no sense in recreating something when another person had kindly done the work for her. It was a good thing she'd stolen this one, too, since the original creator had died in an entirely predictable lab explosion. There would need to be testing to make this on a large scale, both in the formula itself and the effects; however, that would have to occur in guild facilities. Tori felt reasonably sure her power would protect her from an explosion, but the lab and building above wouldn't be so lucky.

In the meantime, she could start work on a small sample and the aerosolization device before today's meeting. Getting an idea of the mandatory schematics would inform the device's size and shape, which would have to be accounted for in the aesthetics phase. There was a lot more to consider than when she'd designed her Hephaestus gear, but Tori found she didn't mind. After months of training, testing, villains, and capes, it felt nice to be back on an old-fashioned build. That it presented new challenges only made it all the more enticing.

Grabbing her tools, Tori sat down at her worktable with a new, hungry gleam in her eyes. She had an invention taking shape in her mind, one that would only fade when she'd formed it in the real world. Time to fire up the metaphorical forge and start proving why she'd chosen her codename.

---

Chapter 43

---

“The most important thing you need to understand is that this is not a test.” Those were the first words they heard after the metal container mercifully came to a stop and they were allowed to file out. What had greeted them was a harsh, rocky terrain that constantly shifted in elevation. It looked as if they were in the foothills of some mountainous region, one that had not been particularly touched by civilization. A few of them noticed the fact that all nearby trees in the area had been cleared out, but most had their attention stolen by the floating form of Lodestar, who spoke once they were all emerged.

“A test implies that what matters most is the pass or fail, that the results come first. That is not what we’re doing today. This is an evaluation above all else. What matters to me is how you think, act, fight, flee, and generally cope with challenges as I throw them at you. Some of you might very well fail the task and still be moved up based on the skills displayed. Conversely, it’s possible to succeed so recklessly that you prove yourself not ready for added responsibilities. This is just a structure to let me see what you can do. Still, with all of that said, success sure doesn’t hurt your case, so I expect everyone to give it their all.”

In a blur, she vanished, reappearing with a large hunk of stone grabbed from elsewhere on the mountain. Before their eyes, she ran her hands along it, smoothing off the rough surfaces, shaping it into a sphere with casual ease. Her position in the sky shifted higher and further back; she was moving so everyone could see her.

Once the rock was smoothed, a task that took only seconds, she held it aloft. “This is the target. About a hundred and fifty pounds of stone. Your task is to get it away from me. There are more complex versions of this same drill we use at every level, so I’d learn it well. Sometimes, we have actual targets that have to be treated like they were alive, all the way up to human dummies that can report injuries. Today is the simplest version, though. Get the rock. Everyone, stay put for a moment.”

With a toss, Lodestar hurled the stone straight up into the air. Once it was gone, she zipped further off, to an area with several rocky outcroppings. Floating higher, a pair of beams fired from her hands as she spun around in place. Once the searing lights faded, they could all make out a near perfect circle that had been scorched into the ground, even from so far off. The trails of smoke rising from the rocks certainly helped.

Satisfied with her work, Lodestar floated back over to where her charges were waiting.

“The rules are straightforward: take the rock out of the circle. I don’t care what powers you use—nothing is off-limits—but you have to make physical contact with the target before manipulating it. Conflict is the point of this, so tricks from the sidelines won’t tell me much. You can come on your own, or as teams, but before you deci—”

Lodestar paused to catch the rock she’d tossed up, the stone sphere having fully completed its airborne journey. “Sorry, as I was saying, before you decide, there are some factors you need to know from my end. So far as base physical attributes go, I’m going to match the best of what your teams offer. That means I’ll move as quick as the fastest members, hit as hard as the strongest—you get the idea. The caveat being that I’m obviously not going to seriously injure you. I also can’t exactly hold back my own toughness—not that it would be smart to, anyway—but I’ll try to react to attacks as if I’m your hardest member. That means, the more team members you add, the higher my different levels could be. Past that, I’m only going to use flight and energy blasts. I want you to have a sincere challenge, not an insurmountable one.”

She didn’t use her super-speed this time. Instead, Lodestar flew purposefully to her seared circle, dropping down to deposit the stone in the dead middle. Now that they were looking at the spot with analytical eyes, a few of the capes realized she’d chosen an area with lots of natural features that facilitated stealth. They had the ability to attempt surprise, or could come in swinging.

Once the rock was in place, she zoomed back, taking a lower position this time that allowed for a more casual volume.

“Here’s how it’s going to go: I’ll give you ten minutes to decide your teams and your order. When I call for time, you tell me who’s coming. They have ten minutes to try to get the stone. At the end, we clean up, and I’ll call for the next group. We go like that until everyone has had their shot.”

She was met with understanding nods. For people who had been doing actual superhero work already, this was an easy enough concept to grasp. There was still one more component to drive home, however. Sometimes, it was a tough sell; other occasions went easier. Lodestar had no idea what to expect from this group—she’d never evaluated one that had survived an attempted rebellion. It would be a learning experience on both ends.

“One last thing,” Lodestar added, softening her voice carefully. “As I mentioned, I can’t turn down my own levels of invulnerability, so I want you all to come at me full force. Fight like your life is on the line, because that very well might end up being the case. Even those of you who hadn’t joined us yet saw the Ridge City Riots. I try to always choose compassion over violence, but if someone has decided that only one of you is walking away, I know which I’d prefer to see victorious. Give me all you’ve got. I want to know the limits of your abilities, and how you push them.”

Something like mischief danced in her eyes as she gave them a knowing smile. “Besides, this job is all about restraint, control, and constant awareness of how much force you’re using. It’s not often you get a chance to go all out. I bet a few of you will be glad for the chance to show what you’re truly capable of.” She lifted her arm and tapped the empty spot on her left wrist where a watch would normally go. “Ten minutes starts now. Figure out your teams and your order.”

With a casual grace, Lodestar floated off, back to her circle, where she drifted down and landed on the rock, taking a seat to wait. The moment she touched down, chaos burst forth among the rookies as they hurriedly scrambled to figure out plans.

Cyber Geek, Medley, Cold Shoulder, and Hat Trick all grouped up immediately on the far end of the metal container. Hopefully, Lodestar either couldn’t hear the discussions or was choosing not to listen, but it still wasn't wise to give strategic hints to the other teams. They formed a huddle, minimizing the distance any individual voice had to travel.

"Quick rundown: if she's matching our top stats, that means she'll be as quick and strong as Medley, right?" Cyber Geek had no idea if this was really the best place to start, but the firm time limit meant jumping in was better than worrying about efficiency.

"I think my giant ice-armor form might hit harder," Cold Shoulder pointed out. "Potentially be tougher as well, at least up front. I can't match Medley's recovery."

"Farts, I forgot about that," Hat Trick muttered. "So even if we technically hit hard enough to 'hurt' her, she won't have to sell it for long."

The complexities of Lodestar's rules were readily becoming apparent. Teams, normally their greatest strength, also now came with liability. For every added member, they risked increasing how much power Lodestar could use in the fight. On the upside, since most of the physical strength was concentrated on Medley and Cold Shoulder, it did present a natural formation.

"We're all thinking the obvious, right? Medley and Cold Shoulder take melee to distract her, Hat Trick and I make a run for the rock?" Cyber Geek could see the lack of surprise on their faces; they'd all arrived at the same conclusion. "Unfortunately, obvious means Lodestar will see it coming, too. We need to have some curves to throw her."

Hat Trick lit up, her wide eyes practically shining. "I could put the target in my hat—get rid of the weight entirely, plus I can control it." Forehead creased in effort, she focused, and the top hat perched on her head lifted up a few inches before dropping back down. This was a new talent she'd found recently, and while it wouldn't be zipping around the battlefield, a floating hat might very well prove useful.

"The problem is, she knows about all the skills we've shown so far. Our best shot is something new," Cyber Geek said. Hat Trick's idea did stir something in his mind, a curiosity he'd held but never put to the test. Firing up the menu in his vision, Cyber Geek began to zip through his options. After Tori's kidnapping, he'd been putting more effort into utility items, and one in particular leapt to mind. The Self-Swap from Battle Buds would be perfect, except it only lasted for ten seconds.

"I have an idea, but we need to test something first." Motioning for his team to lean in, Cyber Geek explained the loose collection of half-thoughts they would optimistically refer to as a plan.

This was an optimal opportunity. Beth and Juan were at the store, leaving Rick and his mother alone in the house. No work to steal her attention, no upcoming meetings to suddenly run off to. If he started this conversation, her excuses to stop it were limited. At this point, Rick was no longer sure what he was expecting. After several days, the thought of oceans and examining old photos no longer triggered attacks, but the knot of unease in his gut refused to yield.

Sitting down at the kitchen table across from her, Rick tried to see his mother as a person, rather than the role she filled in his life. Janet was working on a crossword, a favorite weekend activity. Given her levels of self-assurance and intelligence, would she really get mixed up with someone who had that much to hide? Maybe—if she hadn’t known the whole score up front. Perhaps that was even what had soured their marriage in the first place... which meant he might be about to blunder into a very sensitive topic.

Rick shook the notion from his head. He was preparing to accuse his parents of lying to him for his entire life—it would be a sensitive topic regardless of how it was phrased. The smart move would be to walk away. Except that Rick was not only the son of Ivan; Janet’s blood ran in his veins as well. Her same obsessive need to solve a complex formula burned through his mind, refusing to let go of the mystery now that it had properly taken hold. Bad as things might get, he had to push forward.

That realization was almost freeing, in a way. He didn’t have to worry about finding the right angle of approach; this was going to be a shitshow no matter how he went in. May as well cut to it, then.

“I want to know about Dad.”

Janet glanced up from the crossword, a brief squint of confusion as she noticed the serious expression on her son’s face. “Did you have a particular topic in mind? Might be best to speak to him directly.”

“I’d try that, if I thought he’d give me the truth.”

The confusion faded from her eyes as she quickly adjusted to the situation, her Saturday afternoon ease slipping away. “I see. What is it that you're concerned he would lie to you about?"

This was it, the edge of the cliff. Once Rick started down this road, there wasn't a way back. Whatever he learned, he'd have to live with it. No matter if, or how, it changed things with his parents.

"Well, for example, there's the fact that he spent his whole life saying he has no family, only for Vendallia to list one of the other employees as his niece."

Rick waited for his mother to be shocked at the revelation. Instead, she merely threw him a gaze of pure consternation. "Oh, is that what this is all about?"

"You knew?"

"Of course I knew. He had to reach out in case anyone checked with me for confirmation," Janet replied. "For goodness' sake, Rick, you're making a conspiracy out of simple charity. That girl was on her own. Life had given her a real kicking, and Ivan saw potential. They fudged the relationship to get her an internship so she could find her footing. You aren't the one your father lied to."

It certainly wasn't a perfect story, opening more questions than it answered, but it did sound far more like the Ivan Rick had always known. Even the other evidence, such as Ivan getting lost in his old neighborhood, suddenly felt flimsy under Janet's reassuring gaze. His will might have broken, allowing himself to believe the lie, if not for those damn flashes from the beach.

"Okay. That explains one thing, Mom. One of a thousand inconsistencies. He's never been to the places he's supposedly lived. There are no pictures of him before you were married. I'm not even sure his age lines up—for a man in his forties, he sure doesn't seem to be showing it."

"He's a private man with a bad memory and a good metabolism. What are you digging for here?" Janet was starting to look more concerned than anything. Rick knew he was feeding that, he could already feel the sheen of sweat on the back of his neck.

"Answers. I want to know why my own dad has been hiding something. What's so bad that he couldn't even tell us? Why do I keep having these horrible flashes from some damn beach?"

It was the last one that landed. Until then, Janet's façade had remained firmly in place, but at the word "beach," the mask slipped away. He could see it then, laid bare. The horror in her eyes, the terror at the idea he remembered. Something had happened.

To her credit, Janet didn't bother trying to reaffix her false expression. Instead, she walked around the table, pulling her son close in a display of affection that left him immediately uncomfortable.

"You were never supposed to see that. We tried to spare you, but the block works based on desire. When you wanted to forget, you could. If you keep trying to remember, you will."

"I don't need a hug." Rick tried to squirm away, only to be gripped tighter. "I need to know what the hell happened."

She clung for a few minutes longer, then returned to her side of the table. "I'm not so sure about that. Yes, Rick, something bad once happened at a beach. Yes, there is more to our family than meets the eye. And yes, your father has secrets he's not shared with his children. But most of what you know is true. Ivan and I are your parents, we love you more than the world itself, and we would do anything to keep you safe. Even what you know about Ivan is true. No blood relations, works a middle-management job, all very real. None of it was false. There were just more truths than what you were given. Sometimes, knowing more makes you miserable. You think you want those memories back, but you'll wish they were gone as soon as you succeed. You think you want to know the whole truth about this family, yet if I were to tell you, would that really make things better?"

For a moment, he'd been able to delude himself, thinking his mother had been duped as well. Hearing her speak, it was clear as could be what the actual truth was. "Whatever this is, you're in on it, too. You've been helping him lie."

"Watch it, young man. I'm still your mother." Her voice was momentarily firm, though it was short-lived despite her mounting frustration. "We both know you came to me with this because you think I'll flip on Ivan and give up the goods. What you fail to understand is that it has never been your father that I was protecting. It was you and your sister. Some truths can't be unlearned. They burrow in and chew you up from the inside."

"What makes you so sure I couldn't handle it?" Rick demanded, voice rising.

His mother's hand slapped the table, shocking him backward. "Because I do remember that goddamn beach, Rick! I remember every detail, every scream, every death, and it wakes me up in a cold sweat to this day.” Only after the words had burst forth did Janet seem to realize what she’d said, calming down slightly. “Why would I ever want that for you?”

“Screams?” Rick was processing her words, trying to make sense of what she’d described. “Deaths? What the hell happened out there?”

“Maybe you’ll get the chance to find out,” she said, rising from the table once more. This time, it was not to embrace him, and Rick noticed she seemed to move visibly slower, like she was weighed down. “This is his secret to keep, and his to share if he thinks you’re ready.”

With one last look to her son, Janet reached into her purse and pulled out her cell phone. “I’m calling your father.”

---

Chapter 44

---

Breaking into teams went smoothly—every cape present had been working in the field, leaning on one another and figuring out who they worked best with. In no time, they'd split apart, mostly binding themselves into units, with only a few choosing to go it alone. No one expected the solo attempts to do well, but as Lodestar had said, this was an evaluation, not a test. While winning alone might be impossible, demonstrating competence was an entirely more achievable goal.

The trouble came after the groups were split up, when the natural question arose.

"Who do you think will go first?" Lucy was staring out at the clusters of their peers, most of whom were bunched up having a similar conversation.

"First is good and bad. No standard has been set, so there's nothing to live up to. Downside is you're also the canary in the coal mine; everyone else gets to see what happens to you and adjust accordingly." Ren's voice was quiet, calm. He was mentally prepared to jump in whenever the time arrived, already focused on victory.

Irene didn't bother looking to the others. Her eyes had never left Lodestar's battlefield, committing every feature to memory while there was still time. "I'd be fine with going first, but given our team's situation, it's best if we let someone else take the spot."

It was a very polite way of pointing out that there were still some pockets within the AHC who weren't completely convinced Apollo had no corrupting influence on the capes he'd taken special interest in. They'd been his favorites from the last confluence, and all the bitterness such a role had stirred up had found an easy outlet once he was outed as a traitor.

Personally, Donald was content to take a spot further down the list. He was better at learning and adapting, so walking in with a few samples to pull from would make the task more achievable. The trouble was, he could also feel the stares of other teams on his own. People were waiting to see if they jumped on the first spot's opening, and Donald already knew there wasn't a right answer to give. If they attempted to claim it, people would say they were trying to grab more glory. Wait for a later spot, they'd be accused of making others do the hard part while they sat back learning. Even offering to slot in wherever worked best for the groups as a whole could be read as them being so confident they didn't care when they tried. No matter what move they made, fault could be found.

That realization lessened his case of nerves slightly. If people were looking for a reason to dislike them, there would always be an angle to find. Donald should concern himself with what was best for the team and their training, which meant hanging back to let a more eager squad have first crack.

He was just about to voice that thought when the bright blue costumes of the New Science Sentries stepped into view.

"Fear not, everyone, you no longer need to worry. The top team is going to take the opening spot, sparing you all from having to face Lodestar without watching someone else show you how to win."

Presto was as untactful as usual, but to the teleporter's surprise, that actually did get quite a few chuckles. Unfortunately, he and the rest of his team noticed the laughs had all come when he announced them as the top team. Even without being able to see his features through the mask, Donald noticed the small body tense slightly. Presto didn't care for being part of the joke, it seemed.

The New Science Sentries, who had been striding forward confidently seconds prior, suddenly lost a step as the laughter hit. Donald could see it coming, like a slow-motion car crash. He'd been a target often enough to know how this dance played out. Strong people didn't like having their egos challenged, and the realization that their team being seen as the current best wasn't just wrong, but laughably wrong, was hitting most of them in the sorest of spots. Pain turned to anger, which was funneled into action, as they scanned for some outlet or place to redirect the attention.

Just as he knew they would, a pair of eyes settled on Donald and his team. When lashing out, people usually went for the easiest, most obvious target, even when it could potentially work against them.

Tachyonic stepped forward, narrowly avoiding a hand from Agent Quantum that was meant to yank him back. “Oh, I’m sorry, perhaps we should have shown a bit of deference first. My apologies, Team Apollo, did you want to display for us some of the amazing tactics he imparted? Maybe you can show us the one where superheroes lie to and betray each other.”

“I guess now we know why ‘tacky’ is part of your name.”

Had it been from Irene or Ren, Donald would have been fine. The trouble was that the line had slipped out of Lucy, who leaned more toward diplomacy and kindness. The joke, silly as it was, caught Donald completely by surprise, eliciting a sincere laugh that peeled off of him, echoing through the empty surroundings. That would have been bad enough, but this was the contagious sort of laughter. Like a giggling plague, it swept through those in attendance. With Presto, there was wiggle room to interpret what had earned the minor mirth; this time, there was no such comfort. The New Science Sentries were being laughed at, and Donald could see two faces reddening. He’d have guessed that under the full mask, Presto probably wasn’t looking too keen, either. Only Agent Quantum was keeping it stoic, though he was starting to appear visibly concerned about the situation. On that point, they were agreed. This needed to get handled, fast.

Holding up his hands, Donald stepped forward, slightly outside of his group. “Okay, that’s enough. They took a shot, we took one back. How about we all focus on the task at hand? New Science Sentries, please take the first spot. We look forward to seeing your skills. By all accounts, you’ve got quite a set of powers. I’m sure there will be a lot we can all learn.”

It was a good effort toward peace, in Donald’s opinion. Acknowledge the exchange and move past it, offer some ego-stroking as recompense, end by giving them the spot they’d wanted.

Unfortunately, the crowd was still in a chuckling mood, and some chose to interpret his words with less sincerity than they’d been spoken. More laughter sprang up, spreading once more, and with it, the faces of Tachyonic and Plasmodia both set in rage, all of it aimed at Donald.

“No, no, please, we didn’t mean to offend,” Tachyonic said. “We were trying to bite the bullet and take the worst place in the order, but since you're so fucking sure of yourself, let's see what your team can do. Assuming you try-hards can manage anything without villains around for help."

The snort from Ren was pronounced and loud, something only his inhuman snout could manage. "You would think that's an insult. That the idea of effort, of trying, of striving to improve is something to be ashamed of. We didn't all get handed our team and titles from Big Daddy Quantum. The rest of us worked to be here."

Something in Ren's verbal jab hit home, and hard. Tachyonic looked like he was seconds from racing over to throw a punch, but was stopped by Agent Quantum forcibly shoving his way past.

The leader of the New Science Sentries locked eyes with Donald as he moved, a clear enough hint of what to do. Donald mirrored the movements, striding forward, away from his team, into the unoccupied space between the groups. In no time, the leaders met, surrounded, yet alone.

"One minute warning! One minute until someone's time starts!" Lodestar's voice echoed from her position on the boulder, a reminder that there was only so long to deal with this issue.

"Well, this went to hell pretty fast, huh?" To Donald's surprise, Agent Quantum had a friendly tone, despite the tense situation. "Sorry about Tachyonic. I realize that you were trying to defuse things, and I appreciate it. We need to put it to bed now, before it gets into either team's head. We're facing a hard enough task as it is. Distractions aren't going to make things any easier."

In a flicker, Agent Quantum's eyes went to Lodestar, who was perched unassumingly on her boulder as she waited. Limited or not, the idea of taking on a living legend was terrifying. If anyone wasn't fully in the fight mentally, the whole team would fall.

"No argument from me. The question is, what do we do? I'd like to find a resolution that puts this to bed, rather than potentially making it worse down the line."

"In under a minute? Sorry, I'm not that quick of a thinker," Agent Quantum replied. "Best I've got is this: you take the first slot. I know you don't want it, which is how I'm going to sell it to my team. I'll tell them we let you go first so you could fall on your face in front of everyone, and then we can go put on a better display. You could tell yours that you're going to show these egotistical jerks—that's us—by going first and scoring a win, or whatever lights a fire under them best. We can't undo this, so let's at least make it motivational. Fallout will depend on whether you do well or not; this will get us through the evaluation, though."

For someone who'd just described himself as "not that quick of a thinker," Agent Quantum had certainly managed to come up with a comprehensive plan on the fly. It had the potential to cause more drama down the road, but Donald had to get them past one issue at a time. With the time limit bearing down, this was better than any of his own half-formed notions.

"Guess it'll have to work. Thanks for not making this harder than it had to be."

"My team is the one who started it. I'm only sorry you have to change your plans to accommodate the issue. For what it's worth, I've watched your team work, and I don't think Apollo had much influence at all. You've saved a lot of people in the time your team has been active, and I'm glad to have you counted among the superheroes."

Agent Quantum offered his hand, and Cyber Geek shook it. Their teams might have friction, but they could find mutual respect for one another. Eventually, the egos would smooth down and people would find common ground, so long as they saw that attitude flow from their leaders.

While Agent Quantum walked back to his own team, Cyber Geek motioned for his to come forward.

"Looks like we're taking the lead," he announced, loud enough for others to hear it, too. As they crowded in close, Cyber Geek summed up the situation as quickly as possible. They had to be nearly to the starting time by now.

"We're going first. Partly to keep the peace. Partly to test our limits. And partly because, if we go first and succeed, it sends a message about exactly why there was interest in us to start with. If we can win, that is. Are we good with that?"

The team nodded, almost in unison. It was a good thing they'd chosen a silent response, because seconds later, Lodestar's voice came bursting over the terrain.

"First team, your ten minutes starts now!"

Despite the yell, they didn't immediately scramble off. Ten minutes wasn't long, but it also wasn't a total time crunch given the terrain they had to cover. Moving carefully, going slowly to be sure of each action, offered superior chances of success than going as fast as possible. That might get them more bites at the apple, but they'd all be long shots. Better to have fewer chances with higher potential for success. That was the idea, anyway. Whether it worked or not was yet to be seen.

“Medley and Cold Shoulder, head on in. I'll start with ranged as soon as I get to the position. Hat Trick, don't move until I've got suppressing fire going. This is Lodestar—even if she's holding back, we should assume it's going to take everything we have to keep her distracted. Once you're on the field, it's speed over everything. Keep moving. We'll have you covered.”

The eyes of his team, and all the other superheroes, were so heavy that Cyber Geek could feel them as he stood up straight. What would it be like, to have the eyes of an entire city, country—even the world—trained on him, pitting the entirety of their hopes on his power? It was a weight impossible to imagine, yet the woman they were going up against had carried it many times over. If he ever wanted to reach that level, be capable of hauling such a burden, then this was the first step in getting stronger.

To his own surprise, there was a bit of excitement in his gut, mixed in along with the nerves. Impossible task or not, he was about to spar with one of history's greatest superheroes, one he held a deep personal admiration for. Terrifying as that was on many levels, part of him was still Donald enough to appreciate that it was also fucking awesome. From this day on, he'd be able to say he'd tested himself against Lodestar.

The only thing better would be getting to say they'd passed.

Determination set, Cyber Geek began to move, and his team followed.

---

Chapter 45

---

While her hearing was exceptional from a human perspective, Lodestar had to actually focus to tune in to more distant sounds. It was a small mercy that allowed her some peace, because the louder the world grew, the harder it was to find the voices asking for help. Information had always been her limitation. She might win every fight, but that wasn't much help if she didn't know where the opponents were. That was part of why she enjoyed this method of training. Binding down her skills, limiting the information she had: this was a way to push her own capacity for quick thinking and improvisation.

She hadn't been listening to the rookies as they made their plans. It would have given her forewarning, which worked against every aspect of the evaluation. Even without words, though, she'd caught the exchange between Apollo's old favorites and the New Science Sentries. She didn't need super-hearing to understand that friction; it was a dance every cape eventually grew familiar with. Egos and pissing matches were unavoidable when you were dealing with people this powerful. Sometimes, they laid the groundwork to amazing friendships. Other instances were the start of very long, dark rivalries. It was an issue she'd have to keep an eye on, one of the million things piled atop her plate.

Seeing Medley and Cold Shoulder burst into view, coming at her simultaneously from opposite sides, Lodestar was slightly relieved. If they were opening with a coordinated strike, they must not be too rattled from the exchange. Medley was moving faster, and Cold Shoulder hadn't summoned her ice construct yet, so despite their timed arrival, they were likely trying something other than pure melee.

There was no more time to speculate as Medley charged right at her, opening with a swing that could have cracked a telephone pole. She'd told them not to hold back; it was good to see this group understood she wasn't kidding. The blow whipped mightily through the air, but landed on nothing, as Lodestar easily jerked her head to the side, countering with a punch of her own to Medley's stomach. It sent him back a few feet, drawing coughs from his inhuman mouth.

"You're getting bad habits. Don't fight like you're always going to be stronger and tougher than the opponent. Eventually, you won't be, and you'll realize that learning some actual skills would have been really helpful."

Medley leapt in again, launching an uncoordinated flurry. Cold Shoulder, meanwhile, was getting closer. Lodestar could see the blue power building up in her, could practically feel the chill radiating through the air. Was she going to try and encase Lodestar in ice? With these parameters, it might buy them a few seconds. That seemed like a waste of a strategy, unless one knew how powerful a few seconds in battle could truly be.

As it turned out, Cold Shoulder was going for something even stranger. Leaping up just as Medley tried to charge at Lodestar (only to be knocked aside), Cold Shoulder came slamming down with both hands. A tremendous wave of blue energy washed out along the ground, quickly solidifying into ice. The southeast quarter of the battlefield turned into a makeshift skating rink, running right up to the edge of the stone sphere without quite making contact.

Just as Lodestar was wondering what the hell that was about, she caught the first shot in her shoulder. Not bad. Decent power, good aim, and strong enough that even Cold Shoulder would have been knocked back in her armor. This team wasn't taking her lightly, thank goodness. There was nothing quite so demoralizing as having to fail a capable squad because they couldn't adjust to the challenge.

She allowed herself to fall slightly back, toward the boulder, rubbing where she'd been hit like it stung. Cyber Geek was up on a ridge; she could catch sight of his usual armor, along with the giant, oversized videogame blaster responsible for the shot. That made three out of four, and the trickiest card had yet to be played. Magic never quite made sense to Lodestar, regardless of how often she saw it in action. It was finnick, had few rules and even more exceptions—easy to underestimate, until it wasn't. Something to watch for, between her more immediate concerns.

Leaping onto the ice, Medley's claws sank in, giving him full traction. At the same time, Cold Shoulder let loose another blast of blue energy, surrounding herself with a living construct of ice. More shots rang out from Cyber Geek, but they went wide. Probably trying to avoid hitting his teammates; Cyber Geek was hardly a sniper. They'd gotten into a decent formation. Now, they were trying to turn up the pressure.

"Two on one isn't a bad idea, but the trouble with fighting a single target is that, if they know what they're doing, they can use your own numbers against you."

That was the extent of Lodestar's warning before Medley raced in, swinging wild again. Rather than swing back, she opted to drop low, ignoring gravity for a few moments as she swept her legs between Medley's, turning him into a tumbling ball of fur and scales. With one shove to his back, Lodestar reoriented his momentum, rolling her opponent directly at his chilly teammate.

It should have ended with him slamming into Cold Shoulder's ice-construct legs, except Medley was instantly scooped up in the gigantic ice-hands that were dropped low and waiting. With the smooth expertise of someone who'd practiced this move for hours already, Cold Shoulder caught her teammate and chucked him directly back at Lodestar, claws first. Her short, terse reply as she hurled was all the explanation Lodestar needed:

"We know."

A Medley-sized projectile was enough to drive Lodestar back—when she had to play at this level, at least. It didn't stop with the launch, either. He came at her like a true wild animal, a fury of scratches and fangs. If not for Cold Shoulder's durability, Lodestar would have had to fold down under the assault.

More shots rang out, most going wide, one taking her in the back. Cold Shoulder was right. They did know the risks of fighting a single target in a confined area, and had clearly trained for it.

At last, Lodestar spotted what she'd been waiting for. Hat Trick appeared from behind a rocky outcropping, exactly opposite of place near the boulder where Lodestar was holding her ground. Three for distraction, one to make the run. Not a bad play, especially since their runner had the wildcard of magic to work with.

With a quick motion, Lodestar fired a beam of energy into Hat Trick's legs, sending her tumbling over. That done, she floated a few inches off the ground, neutralizing Cold Shoulder's terrain trick. Medley's eyes went momentarily wild, but that was his own fault. She'd told them what powers were on the table; part of the challenge was planning around them. It did no team any favors to hold back, because the people who fought with blood on the line surely wouldn't.

A blast of ice energy nearly took her, but Lodestar dodged away in the nick of time, putting herself in the path of another energy shot. Dropping down like she'd taken a painful hit, Lodestar counted to three as she estimated how long Medley would need to recover from such an attack. The pause offered Cold Shoulder the chance to come in swinging, huge fists of ice smashing down on the ground.

This was the greatest challenge of the group, in Lodestar's original estimations. Her ice construct was durable, thick, and could be repaired if she had time to focus. Worse, none of the other members hit hard enough to do serious damage. Thankfully, Cyber Geek had offered just the tool she needed.

Dodging the huge fists, Lodestar took aim at the construct's knees, ensuring Cold Shoulder's actual body was nowhere near them. Firing off beams of energy at precisely the same intensity as what she'd been receiving, she saw cracks form immediately. The entire thing tottered precariously to the left for several seconds.

"Being big and strong is useful, but it also makes you the easiest target. Reinforce your weak points, or change the design to get around them."

Just as Lodestar prepared to knock her over, Medley rushed in from the side. She readied for another flurry—only, this was different. Instantly gone were the wild, animalistic strikes. Suddenly, Medley was holding himself carefully, entire body tense and waiting, even his tail extended, ready to attack. He came with a pair of punches that fell short, only for that tail to whip around and catch Lodestar in the leg. While the blow wasn't powerful enough to earn a serious reaction, he'd still scored it.

"Not bad, although I wish you'd started off like this. Would have let me see more of what you can do." Eyes darting to Hat Trick, Lodestar noted that while she was staying low, the team's fourth member was still crawling steadily closer to the boulder. If she fired at this angle, Lodestar was most likely to hit Hat Trick's head—much too dangerous for a simple evaluation. But if she flew over, Medley and Cold Shoulder would have a clear path to the boulder. Once someone made contact, her job grew far more difficult.

“Now!”

She heard the order ring out just before she saw Medley drop into a ball, covering his ears and eyes. Turning, Lodestar made it just in time to witness Cold Shoulder falling out of the ice in the same position as Medley. That was all she got before the giant ball of light overhead exploded.

This had to be something from a video game. No real-world item created a perfect sphere of noise and sound, crashing over victims in an effort to leave them helpless. Add in that it had clearly been fired from the ridge where Cyber Geek was perched, and the explanation was almost too obvious. None of it actually worked on Lodestar, of course, but based on what she knew of the others, they'd definitely be feeling the effects.

Still, even with an attack like this, Medley's regeneration meant the impacted ears and eyes would heal rapidly, especially from such superficial damage. They'd earned roughly ten seconds of “stunned” Lodestar with that maneuver.

Medley was the first up, to no one's surprise. He motioned to Hat Trick, who hopped up from the ground and sprinted for all she was worth. This was it, then. The muscle races in to occupy her, while Cyber Geek adds to the pressure with his ranged skills. Hat Trick comes running, knowing she'll be spotted, and gains ground slowly while the distraction team keeps up its work. When they can't hold the line anymore, Cyber Geek launches the stunning blast, giving Hat Trick a window of opportunity to make the big play. If she got the boulder inside that hat, they'd be able to move it with no concern for weight.

While those two moved, Cold Shoulder leapt into action. Freed from her construct, she immediately fired blue energy at Lodestar, sealing the living legend to the ground and weighing her down with as much ice as possible. Smart: more delay, even when the stunning effects faded. It was a good, sound strategy overall.

The only trouble was, the team didn't quite grasp their own strength. Much as she disliked this part, Lodestar had to impart the lesson—otherwise some criminal would, and not in so nearly kind a manner. With the ten seconds up, Lodestar sprang into action.

“Medley’s recovery means that even at full blast, the lightshow has already lost effect.” She tore loose from the ice, slamming Cold Shoulder once in the gut, sending her tumbling over. “That was your strength I used to break free and hit you back. Don’t make yourself vulnerable in a fight unless there’s a true need for it. Most enemies won’t give you a chance to recover.”

With a burst of speed, she flew over to Medley, slamming him to the ground. She landed heavy, buying herself some time with fewer opponents. “Cyber Geek has some rapid movement options, too, making it easy to get around the battlefield.”

That only left Lodestar and Hat Trick for the moment, the latter covered in dirt and panting from her undignified crawl. Lodestar respected that appearance; it was the look of someone who chose victory over vanity. In a way, she hated to do this. Showing the martial ones their failings was educational; she wasn’t sure what lessons Hat Trick could take from this exchange.

“It was a good effort,” Lodestar said. “Much more competent than most teams manage on their first go-round.”

“Maybe so, but we aren’t here to put in a ‘good effort.’ We’re here to give everything.” Hat Trick reached into her pocket and produced a classic magician’s wand, black with two white tips. It was the element of her powers she’d used the least, which meant Lodestar had minimal information on what that magical implement was capable of.

Lodestar darted forward, just as Hat Trick exclaimed, “Doveakazam!”

An explosion of birds blasted Lodestar in the face, white feathers smacking into her nose and mouth, causing genuine annoyance, if not pain. She hacked and spit as the avian attack dissipated, her attention broken until the last of them cleared. By the time she could see properly, Hat Trick was nearly on top of her, a deck of cards in her hand.

“Fifty-two hundred pickup!”

A torrent of playing cards washed over Lodestar, like a firehose of rectangular plastic. The deck either didn’t end or had some other enchanted elements, as card after card battered Lodestar’s vision. All the others had gone for damage, whereas Hat Trick, their supposed runner, was using distraction. Something was wrong. She’d missed a detail, and it tickled the edge of her brain as she lunged forward, grabbing Hat Trick’s wrists and angling the stream of cards away.

“Impressive,” Lodestar admitted. “That first one genuinely took me off balance for a few moments.”

“Thanks. I’m not much of a magician yet, but I have worked really hard on mastering the most important part.”

Her hat was gone. That’s what was off. As Lodestar looked down at the cape named Hat Trick, clasped in her grip, Lodestar noticed that the meta-magician’s most distinctive accessory was missing. Spinning around, Lodestar realized something else a hair too late. She hadn’t gotten shot in a few minutes.

Already knowing what was waiting for her, Lodestar saw Cyber Geek land a few feet from the boulder, the giant jumping boot dissolving back into electricity and numbers. He scooped up the unmistakable top hat from where it was sliding gently along the icy ground, slamming his hand against the boulder to establish physical contact.

“Misdirection,” Lodestar muttered. “The heart of illusion is misdirection. But now, it’s just a matter of catching him before he hauls it across the line.”

Even as she was speaking, Lodestar caught something else. Cyber Geek wasn’t trying to put the boulder in the hat. Instead, he held his hand out underneath it. Hat Trick wiggled in her grip, making some sort of motion, and a silver device fell from the hat into Cyber Geek’s extended hand.

Not knowing what it could do, Lodestar opted to sprint. They’d clearly built their strategy around making this part work, so she had to assume it would end the session. To her own shock, Lodestar realized something as she ran: they’d baited her out to just the right distance. While she might be able to cross this far in a blink, none of them were fast enough to do the same. They’d estimated their own best speed, and specifically worked to draw her out farther than that. She definitely couldn’t knock this group on self-analysis.

Pushing as fast as she felt appropriate, Lodestar rushed forward while Cyber Geek wrapped his arm around the boulder and pressed the silver device. There was a flash of purple, and suddenly, he was gone, along with the stone sphere. An identical flash appeared over on the ridge where Cyber Geek had been shooting from, and seconds later, she saw him leap from the edge, boulder clutched in his hands as jets fired from the Blaster Bros armor. From that far back, he easily cleared the line before Lodestar could even properly lift off the ground.

“Cyber Geek has an item that splits in two, and lets you jump back to wherever you leave the anchor. The issue was that it had a ten-second timer, but objects in my hat come out the same way they go in. Down to the second.” Hat Trick was dusting herself off as Medley and Cold Shoulder staggered to their feet, shaking off those last blows. “Was that okay? Are we allowed to combine powers like that?”

“Not only are you allowed, it’s exactly the sort of thinking these evaluations are meant to encourage,” Lodestar replied. Awareness of their own abilities, and that of their team, to the point where they’d started developing combination techniques. While they might be low on raw power, this group had worked on their coordination to an incredible degree.

Floating up into the sky, Lodestar saw the crowd milling around Cyber Geek and his prize: the boulder, dragged barely past the line in the ground. “Attention, everyone: the team of Cold Shoulder, Cyber Geek, Hat Trick, and Medley has successfully retrieved their target! Big round of congratulations to our opening group. I know it’s never easy to be the first in a situation like this one. Everyone else, take five minutes to update your plans based on what you just saw while I reset the stage.”

She looked down, noting the looks of hope and determination. Now that they knew victory could be achieved, that should make for some bolder, interesting plays in the evaluations to come. Perhaps a part of her was excited by that. Playing with limited stakes was the closest she got to a challenge anymore. No harm in enjoying herself, so long as the education and evaluation continued to come first.

“After that, have the next team ready to go. Our day is only getting started.”

---

Chapter 46

---

Deep down, Ivan had always known this day would come. In a world of secret identities and masks, he'd long ago learned that few things truly stayed hidden forever. Part of him had even imagined giving the talk to his children when they became adults in an attempt to get ahead of the eventual revelation. He wondered if he'd have really had the strength to go through with it, or if this was always the way it would have gone down: backed into telling the truth, his hand forced, the secret pried from his grip.

He and Rick sat in the living room, Ivan in a chair, his son on the couch. They both had drinks in front of them, because Ivan had needed to fill the minutes between getting Janet's call and her dropping off Rick. That had been a hell of a half hour, picturing what it would be like to come clean, all the horrified reactions it might garner. Yet upon Rick's arrival, they'd fallen into silence. Both knew what came next, and neither felt entirely sure of how to proceed.

Ultimately, Ivan pushed things forward. He was the parent. It was his job to take the harder role. "Your mother told me you have questions, and she let me know what they were about. I don't want to lie you, son. I've never wanted to lie to you. What you're digging near isn't something minor, though. I hope you can understand that. But I also don't see what's to be gained by lying at this point. So, here is my bargain: I'll answer the questions you ask. There will be details I might leave out, and I think that once we're deep enough in for you to really grasp the situation, you'll understand why. That said, there is a caveat to this. What we discuss here can be talked about with your mother, and no one else. Especially not Beth.”

Rick bristled, pulling his back up straight. “She’s your daughter. If I have a right to know, then so does she.”

“Beth is twelve years old, a child; she is in no way ready to grapple with this kind of topic.” Ivan didn’t need to sit straighter; he’d already been positioned properly from the start. “This is nonnegotiable. What we’re going to discuss could put you in serious danger if the wrong people found out. You have to promise me, Rick. Look me in the eyes and swear you will not tell anyone else about this. After the fuss you’ve kicked up over me keeping you in the dark, I can’t imagine you’d be hypocrite enough to break your word.”

The stubbornness in Ivan was reflected back at him in Rick’s eyes. For a moment, he thought obstinance would win the day and the whole talk would fall apart; however, Rick also had his mother’s skill for seeing the bigger picture. Swallowing his annoyance at being forced into something, he met Ivan’s gaze. “I promise, what we talk about here stays between me, you, and Mom. Maybe also a therapist, depending on how bad it is.”

“That’s a reasonable concession, and I know some people if it comes to that,” Ivan agreed. “All right, what do you want to know?”

“Who are you?”

That came fast; it had been on a hair trigger. Ivan considered the question, and how to honestly answer it while still easing Rick into all of this. “Ivan Gerhardt. The first name came from the monsters who raised me, the second was chosen by the first real friend I ever made. I’m a manager at Vendallia Industries, father to two children, and as of a few weeks ago, a Starscout cluster leader.” He paused. That was part of who he was, and for a time, it would have been the whole truth. But even if he counted Fornax as who he’d been, there was still Pseudonym, who’d been too active as of late to entirely discount.

“Past that... I work with an organization that helps recovering criminals. Let’s leave that there for the moment; it might be easier to discuss once some of the other holes are filled in.”

There was a sheen of sweat on Rick’s forehead, despite the climate control in the townhouse. He rubbed his hands on his jeans, wiping away more perspiration. That question had been an easy one. He was still gathering courage for what he deemed truly scary.

“And who is Tori Rivas?”

“No.” Ivan halted the conversation midstride. “Who I am, what I’ve done—these are things that might impact your life, so I concede that you have a right to know them. The secrets of others don’t fall under that umbrella. Tori is a friend and a coworker, someone I trust. Anything past that you can find out by asking her directly, though I’m not sure I would recommend it.”

The denial had brought Rick up short, but Ivan had left him little room for rebuttal. More hand-wiping, a little frantic now. Reaching over, Ivan put a hand on his son’s shoulder. “Ask me whatever it is that’s eating at you. You’ll feel better when it’s out.”

“That’s not the impression I got from Mom,” Rick muttered under his breath. “Guess there’s no point in avoiding it. I want to know what happened at the beach. I don’t know which one, but when I was around four or five—”

“You were five. It was a small coastal town named Sandshire, down in Florida. We used to go there on family trips. Janet’s parents took her there as a child. It was something of a tradition. I liked that town.”

When Ivan’s pause stretched into true silence, Rick leaned forward. “Interesting as that is, it’s not the part I’m asking about. What happened there? Why do I start to freak out when I think about it too much? Why can’t I remember anything besides flashes of purple in the water?”

No more room for dodging. It was time to start giving Rick what he thought he wanted.

“While we were at the beach that day, some creatures appeared. A new species created by the Carp Conqueror, this aquatic, meta-human criminal with dreams of grandeur. They were mounting an assault, you see. Trying to take over the land-world, as they phrased it. In the end, none of the details really mattered that much. They made a very crucial mistake early on that sent it all to hell. They threatened my family.”

He could still feel the warm air as Carp Conqueror’s odd, wet laughter echoed over the sounds of fleeing beachgoers. First came the offer: help lead the charge. Then came the mistake: daring to cast a finger at Ivan’s then-wife and children, implying they might not survive the tide that would wash along the lands. Ivan couldn’t remember things so well from that point on, just snippets. The rest of the details required diving into the Fornax side of himself, which this was definitely not the time for.

“What did you do, when they threatened us?” Rick was leaning forward so far, Ivan feared he might tumble from the couch. The poor boy looked ready to pop from nerves. This must have been eating at him for a long time.

“I neutralized the threat.”

“That’s not an answer! Tell me what happened already. Dad, please.”

With a quiet farewell to the simple, normal relationship they’d had, Ivan forced himself to tell Rick the truth.

“I slaughtered them all. One by one. First, they died fighting. Then, they died begging. By the end, it mostly just screams. I tried to be quick, as merciful as possible, but when dealing with a new anatomy, you have to pulp everything to be sure they’re dead. Within three minutes, the water was stained with their oozing purple blood.”

It was a strange progression, the emotions on Rick’s face. Relief swept in, brief and beautiful, as his father’s words confirmed that Rick wasn’t, in fact, crazy. Then came the horror as the implications followed. With every word, the point was driven home harder, and the possibility that it was all a joke shrank. By the end, Rick no longer looked like he’d swallowed a live bee. Instead, he was growing pale, staring at Ivan like he’d unveiled himself as the avatar of Death itself. Which wasn’t as far from the truth as Ivan might have liked.

“What you’re feeling right now is natural, son. The shock. The disbelief. The terror at what it all means. Understand this: it only gets harder from here. If the truth is really what you want, make sure you’re ready to hear it. We don’t need to do all of this in a single round.”

The expression on Rick’s face grew more neutral as his mind went to work, properly adding in this new information to whatever he’d already been working with. “If you really killed an invading force of meta-humans, does that mean you have powers?”

“Yes. Though not the kind that can be passed down. They’re nothing like your sister’s—those truly are a mystery. I’ve got a few tricks, but by and large, I mostly lean on my physical skills.”

“Kind of bummer. I was really hoping graceful aging was part of our genetics,” Rick admitted. He was falling into a familiar pattern with his dad, momentarily forgetting the revelation. Ivan could actually see when it popped up again in his perception; Rick’s whole body shifted to a closed-off position. “Must be pretty strong, to kill that many.”

“Slaughtered,” Ivan corrected. “You can’t call that meager resistance they offered a fight. I was a blade cutting through a field of wheat. Yes, Rick. I am strong. Not what I once was, but still quite dangerous.”

Rick was retreating a bit now, pushing into the couch’s back cushions. “If you killed that many people, shouldn’t you have gone to jail?”

“Details matter. I pushed back an army that was invading our soil and publicly declaring war. Can’t prosecute on that without setting a dangerous standard for the capes.”

The room was growing tense. Reality had started to sink in for Rick. His father was a killer: proud and efficient, at that. Still, the boy had courage. He pushed on, determined to get his answers.

“Is that why I can’t remember? It was so bad I had to block it out?”

“Partially, but you had some magical assistance.” Ivan reached into his pocket and produced a small crystal bottle with pink liquid inside. “This potion helps you forget things you don’t want to remember. We gave you some that night, after hours of hysterical crying and fits. You saw something unimaginably terrible, and worse, you saw it committed by someone you loved. It would have been a lifelong trauma, so we gave you an out. But magic is tied to willpower, and the more you tried to remember, the weaker the effects became.”

“Are... are you going to make me drink that?” There was nothing subtle about it now. Rick was visibly moving further down the couch, away from Ivan.

Carefully, Ivan picked the bottle back up and tucked it away. “I was going to offer it, though that seems like a no. Even if I did force you to drink it, that wouldn’t matter. As I said, it helps you forget things you don’t want to remember. It could never do more than what you desired.”

“Oh, yeah, I’m sure at age five I was making great decisions about which memories I might need to hang on to. And how convenient that keeping your secret worked out to be the best thing for me.”

Much as Ivan wanted to smack that train of thought aside, this was already a precarious situation. Anything less than true honesty in the moment might do more damage than could ever be mended, especially with the issue of eroded trust.

“In my heart, I really do believe that you were better off forgetting. But I’m far from a perfect person. It’s very possible I allowed my own selfish desires to cloud my judgment on the issue. Because you’re right, Rick. I didn't want you to stay that way. You wouldn't even get in the car with me. You screamed and screamed if I even came close. That... this... was the last thing I ever wanted."

"For me to know the truth?" Even through the anger Rick was trying to project, Ivan could still see the true emotion lurking in his gaze.

"For my child to be afraid of me. For you to think, even for a moment, that I would ever hurt you, turn that side of myself in your direction. Almost everyone who knows me is scared of what I can do, what I represent—sometimes, just me in general. Not you two. You ran to me for comfort whenever you were scared or hurt. You understood that there was nothing in this world I wouldn't do to keep you safe."

Ivan stared at the fear in Rick's face, the terror he'd seen so many times in so many expressions. Never had it cut him so deeply. Things were going to be different from now on, but that didn't mean he wouldn't still try his best for as long as there was parenting left to do. "Whatever you're thinking and feeling about this, understand that fundamentally, nothing has changed. To you, the discoveries are new; however, I've been this man all along. I'm the same Ivan you've known your whole life. It's just that now, I'm also more. None of that matters more to me than being your dad. I would tear the moon in half to keep you from harm."

To Ivan's surprise, Rick uncoiled from his ball in the corner of the couch slightly. The boy looked dazed, and no wonder. With the roller coaster of emotions he was on, his brain was probably fried. After a moment of consideration, he spoke in a more controlled voice than any sixteen year old should be able to manage, given the circumstances.

"I think I need a break. We're not done. I want to know the rest, just maybe... not today."

"A wise decision. One step at a time is the surest way to walk the path you're on." Ivan started forward to comfort Rick, but stopped when he caught the wince. No mistaking it, the shadow of fear now lay between them.

Even though it broke his heart, Ivan pretended not to notice. That was his burden as the parent. And he intended to play that role for however long Rick would still let him. However, Ivan had a sinking suspicion that those days were severely limited.

---

Chapter 47

---

Tori hadn't been to the main offices of Indigo Technologies before. She'd robbed a lab they owned, worked in a subsidiary, and rubbed elbows with the owner at the guild; however, she'd never had occasion to come see Wade Wyatt in the most official capacity of his civilian identity.

What amazed her from the moment she touched foot in the lobby was the security, and the knowledge of how few people would be able to spot it. Sonic disruptor cannons masquerading as modern art, pulse bombs worked into the pot of every lush plant in the space—even the floor tiles gave off the telltale sheen of electro-bind coating. Nothing here was entirely what it seemed, nor designed to serve only one purpose. Wade had built a fortress and made it look exactly as bland and unassuming as every other corporate office she'd had the misfortune to end up inside. Outside of the high-tech defenses, it was still aesthetically pleasing, if one went in for that sort of thing: lots of metal and glass, loads of natural light.

Today it hosted a fairly brisk crowd despite it being Saturday afternoon. After a morning whipping up some samples, Tori hoped she had enough progress to bring before Wade. It made sense to knock this out early—no point in redoing the work that was already out there—but she also felt somewhat underprepared. Perhaps she should have waited until there was a fully functional prototype. She shook the thought from her head. They needed to act fast, while Tori was still a news item. Once the spotlight faded, this became less effective.

At least on that front, there was little need for concern. She'd caught sight of several photographers lurking near her apartment, though they seemed hesitant to get too close. Given the phrases Chloe used whenever she spotted one, the paparazzi probably thought it was cursed by some meta, which actually wasn't too far from the truth. It wasn't enough to deter them entirely, a fact that Tori found annoying overall, but would be useful in the short term. She'd even made sure not to slip away when coming here. Let them speculate what she was up to. It would only add more attention when she made her move.

Making her way through the plush lobby, Tori strolled up to security, a thick-necked man with a sharp look in his wary eyes.

He glanced up, taking in her oil-stained jeans and t-shirt that was only slightly cleaner. "Name and appointment?" No sense of judgment, which she supposed did track. Working in a cutting-edge tech firm, he'd no doubt seen plenty of the type who put work above things like fashion or hygiene.

"Tori Rivas, here to see Mr. Wade Wyatt."

She'd been braced for skepticism, a furtive glance to be sure this really was the name on the appointment list. Not so much as a flicker. He absorbed the name like he'd been waiting all day to hear it.

"Identification." He held out a hand, into which she deposited her driver's license.

The problem, Tori quickly realized, was that she'd been thinking of this encounter like she was visiting someone high in the company. But Wade wasn't high, he was the top. They knew his visitors' names already; those were likely memorized as soon as the appointment was logged.

"Come with me." Handing back her license, the guard hefted himself up, walking around the side of the thick security desk that Tori noticed was covertly reinforced. Something told her these guards were more than mere muscle, but then, she'd be reckless to assume anything different, knowing where she was.

Together, they walked past the first bay of elevators, where a crowd of people in expensive clothing waited to board. They continued through a locked door that the guard buzzed them past, into a small, lush room with another guard and a single elevator.

Unlike her first one, there was nothing front-desk appropriate about this guard. He was bald, with tattoos running up and down his flesh. There was something else, impossible to put her finger on. Tori could simply smell her own kind. This one had seen danger. He might even be a guild member she had yet to encounter.

The first guard left as soon as he'd deposited her, hustling back to his desk. Her new escort rose slowly from his chair. His eyes were virtually peeling her, scanning for any danger, threat, or other potential issue. Finally, after a full minute of wordless staring, he reached over and tapped the elevator's button.

"Go ahead." His voice was raspy, but surprisingly warm.

"Thanks. Do civilians get to meet you, too, or is it only the folks using my channels?"

In response, the tattoos flowed across his skin, stretching and warping, even rising from the flesh. Seconds later, she was looking at a respectably dressed fellow in a well-tailored business suit. "I give them the professional face. It's uncomfortable to keep up, though, so I didn't bother with you." With a release of effort, the tattoos shifted back to their starting positions.

"Neat. Got a name I should know?"

He shook his head just as the elevator dinged its arrival. "If you ever get my name, it means you've royally screwed up. Or we're friends, I suppose."

One of those, then. Not a shocker, given the role he was filling in his downtime. Tori wasn't surprised. She'd seen Ivan get dispatched to slaughter an entire gang who'd crossed them; she was well aware the guild had operations like that. Still, didn't hurt to sow her own seeds of danger, while she was around.

"Then I hope I get it the friendly way. And to prove it, I'll give you a piece of friendly advice: if I ever do fuck up, don't try to come calling. Let's just say someone already has dibs on that particular task, and they aren't the sort of person you want to jump in line."

"Warning noted. Good luck with your meeting." Those were the last words before the elevator doors whispered shut.

The chrome elevator moved fast, especially considering how tall the building was. In shockingly short order, another ding sounded her arrival. The top floor of Indigo Technologies: the office of one man, Wade Wyatt. It was strange that Tori felt nervous, like she was meeting him for the first time again. She'd known him for months now... except, that wasn't quite true. Tori knew Doctor Mechaniacal. She and Wade Wyatt had barely interacted. Those dynamics were always different, and she'd never been especially adept at rolling with social challenges.

Putting the doubt out of mind, Tori strolled onward through a set of frosted glass doors that could likely withstand a missile and into the large waiting area outside Wade's office. It was filled with high-end furniture that also still managed to be comfortable—greater proof than anyone should need that Wade was a super-genius inventor.

Sitting at a vast, white stone desk, was one of the most unassuming women Tori had ever laid eyes on. Short, curly hair that already looked disheveled despite so much of the day remaining, an oversized cardigan with intentional cats and unintentional cat-hair as decoration upon it, huge glasses that evoked the image of a dragonfly—she looked like the person who'd be trailing after her boss with an armful of falling receipts and a cup of half-spilled coffee.

Tori was immediately suspicious. Big, musclebound guard? That made sense. So did the scary dude watching the elevator. But this? This set off every villain instinct Tori had. All those checks to make it this far, and the woman Wade had running the actual entry point was a normal, put-upon secretary? When someone worked that hard to appear mundane, it usually meant they had a hell of a secret tucked up their sleeve.

Approaching with care, Tori put on her most respectful voice. "Good afternoon. I have an appointment with Mr. Wyatt."

The secretary whipped her head up like she'd just noticed Tori's entrance, large eyes made even bigger by those comically oversized glasses. As she leapt up, her knees smacked the underside of the desk, eliciting what had to be a painful thump underneath.

"Of course! Miss Rivas. Security radioed to let us know you'd be heading up. Wade will be done in a few moments, just some private work to wrap up now that he knows you're here. Can I get you anything while you wait? Water, soda—we even have one of those fancy coffee machines in the breakroom."

"A water would be great." Much as she might like a bit of caffeine, her nerves were cranked up as things stood. Better to stay calm for what came next, and besides, she didn't want to be a bother. Not with someone this suspicious.

From somewhere under the desk, her greeter popped open a concealed fridge and produced a small, cold bottle. "Have a seat anywhere you like, and if you need anything, just give me a shout. Name is Dolores, and it's a pleasure to meet you."

Handing over the bottle, along with a handshake, Tori accepted both, then retreated to a white leather couch to wait for her appointment. She kept one eye on the door and one eye on Dolores, not quite sure what to expect from either.

Not a bad day so far. After the first team succeeded, Lodestar had stopped three in a row before the next team scored victory. Of that failing batch, she'd probably still promote one of them up to harder tasks; their failing had been execution more than planning, and that was an easier fix. Interestingly, despite kicking up a fuss at the outset, the New Science Sentries hadn't taken a turn yet.

Lodestar already knew why; she could practically hear Professor Quantum's voice ringing in their heads. He'd have told them to make a strong impression, so if they couldn't open the show, they'd try to close it. First or last: both tended to stick in people's minds the most when they did something memorable. Of course, that was precisely the sort of thinking that was holding the New Science Sentries back, so perhaps this would be a good chance to demonstrate their failings.

They weren't a bad team, not by a long shot. They were just working to catch up with everyone else. Because Professor Quantum had taught them his way, via the old methods, he'd built a team on pure strength and crowd appeal. Everyone else had come up through the new system, where the focus was placed on being the most effective superhero possible, especially when it came to protecting civilians. Until they thought about their image second and the job first, they would always end up a step behind.

It galled her to imagine what sorts of feats those four could accomplish if they'd been properly instructed. With their power, they should be knocking out tasks several degrees past what anyone else here could be saddled with. Given how stressed the AHC was getting as it was pulled in direction after direction, she could have really used the help, too. Thankfully, after this evaluation, there would be a few more to pitch in. Perhaps the New Science Sentries would be among them. She'd have to see what sorts of tactics they employed.

On the other hand, part of her felt bad for the team. This evaluation was going to be harder for them than anyone else, because their collective abilities were that much more powerful. Between Tachyonic's speed, Agent Quantum's toughness, and Plasmodia's raw power, Lodestar would have a lot more juice to wield during their session.

The five-minute rest was almost over, so Lodestar called out a quick warning, letting the next team know they'd be starting soon. There shouldn't be a whole lot of teams left; they had to be getting near the end. Once this was done, she'd have a debrief with Quorum to get his impressions—he'd been watching the whole ordeal back at base—then a few hours of patrol, and home to pick up Penelope. Ivan had said he might swing by, as well, so that meant a decent meal she didn't have to—

A blast of searing energy tore across the battlefield, on a direct course for Lodestar. Having been lost in thought, she sped up her perception and considered for a moment whether it was appropriate to dodge or take the shot head-on. Once Lodestar realized who was firing, though, the decision became simple. Using speed on par with Tachyonic's, she zipped aside from Plasmodia's blast, arriving at the boulder a split second before Presto appeared just above it.

"Out of the gate, Big Fini—hrrrmphh!" Presto's declaration of success was cut short as Lodestar's hand wrapped around the back of his skull before he could lay a finger on their prize.

"I'm pretty sure you can deal with this, but call if you need help." Lodestar grabbed Presto by the belt on the back of his costume, her free hand still holding his skull, which was pointed directly up to the open sky. "You've got a whip-smart mind under there, so try being less predictable. Also, while teleportation is great, yours is limited to line of sight. So don't ever let yourself get into a position like this one."

With that, Lodestar hurled Presto into the sky, face first. He would eventually manage to spin around, hopefully killing off his momentum and recovering, but this would buy her some time without having to watch for rips in space.

She could already see Tachyonic racing across the field, with Agent Quantum following behind at a considerable distance. It was time for Lodestar to test the New Science Sentries.

---

Chapter 48

---

She wasn't kept waiting long. In under ten minutes, Wade called for her, and Dolores ushered Tori into an office with aspirations of being a museum. All along the walls were famous designs and inventions from great minds through history. Some were from the pre-meta creators—Tori spotted a Da Vinci diagram in a proud place of honor among the displays. There were also stranger, clearly meta bits: harder to identify, unless one was the sort of person who knew which meta first discovered and broke the Althusian temporal limits. Wade had even displayed a pile of ashes labeled "Edison Contracts." Apparently, he held history's great credit-thief in the same regard as most educated inventors. Tori could identify nearly every piece displayed in the huge office; she might be a woman of few passions, but this was definitely one of them.

In the center of the room sat the man whose own creations outshone the displays by orders of magnitude. What Wade had built could have quite literally changed the world. Part of this meeting was to find out why it was that he hadn't, in fact, done just that. Tori was smart enough to clock that there had been several great meta-geniuses through the decades, some on the side of capes, some on the side of villains, yet the amount of technology available to the public remained steady: a slow, gradual increase like one would expect in normal development, with only a few errant spikes. That couldn't be a coincidence, and much like the guild's code, Tori needed to know the rules before she started playing the game. Not because she necessarily planned to abide by them, but because it was important to know where the lines were. Breaking rules worked best when it was intentional, not due to ignorance.

“Tori, a pleasure to see you,” Wade greeted her. He rose from his desk to shake her hand, then settled immediately back into his lush chair. She took one of the pair in front of his desk while Wade continued. “The room is fortified, secured, and warded, so feel free to speak plainly. In these walls, I keep a tight schedule; we don’t have time for double-talk. Now then, Ivan said you wanted to consult with Indigo Technologies on something. I’m going to be straightforward: I took this meeting out of courtesy and respect, but understand that it is very unlikely I’m going to bring something from that world into this one. Splitting them apart is how I protect both.”

Concise, informative, and bluntly honest; it was so nice to be dealing with a fellow science-minded colleague. Much faster than playing the societal games of small talk and niceties.

Reaching into her bag, Tori produced a small vial of green liquid, a small circular device, and a stack of pages covered in scrawling and sketches. “Go ahead and look over the specs while I explain. You’ll be able to figure them out quickly.” Making sure she had everything set out, Tori started on the pitch she may or may not have rehearsed a few times in the mirror that morning. “I’ve been thinking about what to do with my newfound sense of celebrity. There’s no getting around it, not for some time, and while I was originally tempted to hole up and hope it faded, I’ve been considering another tactic. One to make use of the attention.”

Wade’s face creased in momentary confusion as he flipped through the pages, then vanished as he found whatever detail had eluded him. Tori kept on going, sure that he was still taking in every word. “I’ve made no bones about what my long-term goals are. I want to build my own company, turn my designs into reality. For a long time, that was it—I just knew I wanted that place to exist. But now, I think I’m starting to see the shape of it: a market I can serve, a need I can fill, and a way to leverage all this bad luck into exactly the right launching platform.”

After one last scan, Wade put the pages down. “The device is interesting, though not especially groundbreaking in complexity. I find the compound you intend to fill it with far more fascinating, if it works as described. But what I find most interesting of all is that you’ve brought me such a proposal in the first place. Miss Rivas, outside of Ivan, there is likely no one in the guild who is more familiar with your past than me, so I am keenly aware of the lengths you've gone to avoid putting your work or trust in the hands of other people. To have you suddenly show up, asking for what I'm assuming to be help, if not outright partnership, is a tad confusing."

He wasn't wrong. Tori's entire history was essentially example after example of fucking herself out of potential opportunities to avoid situations almost exactly like this one: handing off her work to a huge corporation to do whatever they pleased. Even now, the notion riled up part of her, causing a brief churn in her stomach. Thankfully, because it was such an obvious point, Tori had come prepared with an answer.

"Part of it is me learning from the guild. If I truly took nothing else from my education, I saw that even the most powerful metas need people they trust to lean on. And the guild is also why I'm taking it to you. Frankly, if you were a normal business, this would be a non-starter, but I would hope there's going to be a level of respect here not present in most business dealings. Past all that, though, you're right: this is still very hard for me to do. That's why I brought you the product and pitch that I did. Alone, that's a neat gadget, one I'm sure you could easily rip off. It's only when you pair it with me that it becomes a highly marketable asset."

Wade lifted an eyebrow. She'd captured his interest. "Explain."

In response, Tori's expression shifted. She wasn't much of an actor, but she could tap into real feelings well enough. There was no shortage of rage to be had at any moment, a lasting gift from the tragedy of her childhood, yet today, she needed something harder to show. Tori permitted a touch of fear onto her face, along with the rising tide of fury.

"When those bastards took me off the street, I felt helpless, like many of you out there watching have felt. Self-defense classes, training, awareness: I did everything right, and I still got snatched. The capes made it in time, sure, but what if they hadn't? How long are we going to trust our safety to people who might show up, if you're lucky? I'm tired of feeling helpless. Tired of being afraid. That's why I've partnered with Indigo Technologies to develop the Rivas line of personal defense devices. Non-lethal, unobtrusive tech designed to get you out of danger right away, not force you to wait for when a cape happens to be around."

Understanding came swiftly. It wasn't an especially obtuse concept, especially for a mind like Wade Wyatt's. He muddled it over for several seconds, lifting up the vial of green liquid and turning it around in his hands. What he was searching for, she had no idea. All Tori could do was wait as he contemplated the proposal.

“It’s not just the tech, it’s the sales pitch. The capes got caught with their pants down on the civilian side, and as the first public kidnapping in so many years, you have a unique platform to speak on the failings of relying on superheroes. Based on the designs, you’ve got quite a few ways to weave these into compact mirrors, so I take it to mean we’re targeting a predominantly female demographic, which would make your story all the more compelling.”

“We start with a targeted demographic, then grow it outward,” Tori corrected. “Beginning there will play the best, given what happened to me. Then there’s Beverly’s designs, and the fact that women over forty are currently the audience buying the least Indigo Technologies products. This gets you a way into their pockets and starts building brand loyalty. I didn’t come in here expecting a handout. This strategy opens up doors to a whole new market.”

“Yes, I see you have quite a developed plan. So developed, in fact, I wonder where it is that I fit in. Your prototype is rough, yet plainly on the right path, and if this compound does as indicated, it will be extremely effective. You have the funds from your museum caper to handle the build, and national attention for free press. What do you need from Indigo?”

Despite Wade’s assurances, Tori still swept the room, making sure no one was around to overhear them. “Resources would help speed this along while I’m still a hot topic, but more than that, I need guidance. I’ve seen what you can build versus what you release. There’s obviously some sort of unspoken cap on the technology we let out into the world. I kept this one as basic as possible to be safe, but more complex ideas will demand more complex designs. I don’t want to start off with the FBI up my ass because I released some gizmo with a forbidden latch.”

Wade snickered, hiding it poorly behind his hand.

“Yes, I’m sure a latch is the device you’d want to squeeze more tech into. You aren’t wrong, Miss Rivas, there are certain checks to ensure humanity doesn’t get tech it isn’t prepared for; however, a fair amount of it is simply the fact that the best inventors also have secret lives. I hold my top work back for the guild, because to release it publicly would make it available to my enemies. Same for Professor Quantum, and Tyranny... I presume.” Wade didn’t look uncertain often, yet at the mention of the mysterious ruler, his brow creased for a flicker of a moment.

Part of Tori wished Tyranny had greater affiliation with the guild. All she knew of the woman were rumors, admittedly, but they were quite impressive rumors nevertheless: genius inventor who ruled an entire island nation with the strength of her mind and the power of her creations. Were her work more public, Tori might have picked a different inventing idol, but it was Doctor Mechanical whose creations were on display for all to see during his criminal enterprises. The same person she was on the verge of partnering with for a project, something Tori was actively working to keep from getting overly excited about.

Wade soon continued. “Occasionally, some inventor will start dealing matter liquidators out of a van, but they never have the reach or infrastructure to last long, and reverse engineering meta-tech is essentially a discipline in itself, one that very few have mastered. That is to say, it will be some time before you brush against the real technological ceiling; however, you should still give careful thought to the products you create. To steal one of Ivan’s favorite turns of phrase: think of it like you’re baking a cake. Once something goes in the mix, you can’t take it out. Introduce new technology to society, and there’s no undo function. Accidentally wreck an industry or bankrupt a country? Too bad. Whatever happens, you have to live with.”

“That’s an aspect I’ll weigh seriously moving forward,” Tori replied. “But for today, the design in question, do you see any major issues? The big trick there is the liquid, and good luck to anyone who tries to break that down. We can keep it proprietary. Very limited risk it would enter society at large.”

“This one works... in theory.” Wade tapped the half-formed prototype, setting down the vial next to it. “I get why you came to me early. You needed to see if I was on board and had feedback about any lines you were crossing. But if we want to do your pitch, you need something in your hand. Something tangible, to show you mean business. While we’ll need to negotiate the details, I’m open to the idea moving forward. The sooner, the better, though. We need the story to be fresh. Get me a working prototype, and we can see where that leads.”

Tori was so thrilled, she nearly knocked her chair over climbing up to shake his hand. Not only was her idea getting backing, Tori would be receiving help from one of the few other minds she genuinely admired. As she and Wade grasped hands, however, he continued speaking.

“Once we have that done, you’re going to enroll in business courses. I know some online ones you can squeeze into your spare time. Given your brain, I imagine you’ll be able to clear the coursework at an exceptional rate.”

She kept on shaking, even as the curious demand hit home. “I’m not saying I won’t—you don’t ask for pointless tasks—but do you mind explaining why?”

“Happily. First and foremost, if you intend to run a company one day, you should have that education, and potential investors will expect it from someone in such a core leadership role.” He paused, a dark, more Doctor Mechanial look sliding across his face. “The other reason is that if we’re working together, I’m going to do my best to make the project a success. In the course of that, it’s entirely possible you might see my leadership techniques, and we want a ready excuse if anyone asks you where some of your more... creative problem-solving tactics come from.” Those brilliant eyes were shining, countless schemes forming in the mind behind them, each waiting for the right chance to be turned loose.

It had been a long few weeks, with more lows than highs, but standing in Wade’s office, seeing the danger in his eyes, Tori found herself unexpectedly happy about the curious directions her life could often turn.

---

Chapter 49

---

With Presto momentarily neutralized, Tachyonic was the next impending threat. He tore along the ground, breaking all sorts of rules of the universe to truck along at impossible speeds, all without destroying the environment or himself. She could see it all, since Lodestar was more or less matching his speed perfectly. It took a touch of effort on her part; the kid was fast, at least when he was using his suit accessories for the power boost. It seemed like not many of the other capes had caught on that Tachyonic needed the help, and evidently, he wasn't going to give the secret away during evaluation. The guy was coming full speed.

Until, he wasn't. At the very end of his approach, Tachyonic suddenly skidded to a halt, digging his feet in to send a massive spray of rubble and dirt at Lodestar's face. It was similar to Hat Trick's move with the doves, except no one on that team had provided Lodestar with access to super-speed. She didn't dart back, though, as he was no doubt predicting. Instead, Lodestar went up, directly over the wave of dirt. Behind, a searing blast of plasma tore through the space where she should have been.

That was impressive. There was no way Plasmodia could track Tachyonic's movements, so they must have both been counting down to make the attacks line up. This was definitely a team accustomed to working together, and their refined techniques showed it. Not that it mattered much when Lodestar went an unexpected direction, but adapting was part of a fight. Besides, by this point, she'd flown against every other team. They should have accounted for the possibility.

Landing in less than a second, Lodestar retook her same position, waiting for Tachyonic to approach. It wasn't much of a delay. He zoomed in the moment Plasmodia missed, launching a series of blows that were fast, efficient, and well-aimed. Lodestar only dodged a few, letting the rest fall ineffectually on her. "Sorry, you're going to need to hit harder if you want to beat Agent Quantum's durability."

"Obviously." With that, Tachyonic hopped back, landing at the side of Agent Quantum, who had just finished an incredibly fast sprint that still left him looking like a slowpoke.

More or less the same composition as the first team, and many that followed, Lodestar realized. One at range, one to grab, two for melee. Would this have been their move if they'd gone first, or were they mimicking a successful team's tactics? There was nothing wrong with learning on the fly; however, testing unfamiliar formations often wasn't worth the tradeoff. Better to stick with what the team could do well.

On that front, Lodestar realized she might not need to worry, as Agent Quantum and Tachyonic launched a perfectly coordinated attack. Tachyonic went low, aiming for her legs and base, while Agent Quantum stayed high, ready to handle her fists and knock her down if she started to fly. An excellent strategy, with both of them holding near-perfect form. If nothing else, Professor Quantum had taught them to fight. Unfortunately, he'd taught them to fight his way, which was part of why Lodestar expected this evaluation to be especially tough on the New Science Sentries.

With a casual movement, Lodestar stepped back, catching Tachyonic as he pulled slightly ahead, hurling his whole body into the charging form of Agent Quantum. The two went down in a spray of limbs, hurrying to untangle themselves.

While they struggled, Lodestar dashed back over to the boulder. A moment later, Presto appeared once more, hands outstretched. "Again, when you suddenly stop screaming and cursing, that tips me off that you've recovered. Be less predictable."

Into the air Presto went once more, a fresh flurry of swears spouting out of his ascending lips.

Another shot of energy rang out, this one weaker and wide. Plasmodia was trying to add pressure, but wasn't sure what to do when the melee attackers fell apart. Their team was built to run like a machine; it didn't hold up well when cogs started coming loose. Two of said cogs were back on their feet, looking a tad embarrassed about the tumble they'd taken.

"I can tell you your problem right now," Lodestar informed them. "You attack from a position of strength."

Tachyonic looked momentarily confused; however, Agent Quantum let the words roll right off of him, his whole mind focused on the task at hand. Single-mindedness could be a boon at times—she'd known Ivan long enough to see that prove useful—but it also limited how much one could adapt in the moment. In this case, it was a positive, as seeing his leader unbothered gave Tachyonic his own sense of assurance back. They weren't getting better, but them fighting while shaken would hardly have improved things either.

Another team attack, though this time, they stayed more in sync, arriving in perfect unison. This tactic was shockingly close to a choreographed dance, two men filling the space of one by expertly weaving in and out of the other's way. For a moment, it was as if Lodestar were fighting a four-armed monster, blows raining in from all directions. The trouble was, no matter how much they worked together, they were still ultimately two separate people. Agent Quantum's fists were too slow, and Tachyonic's were too weak. She let the attack run for several seconds before deciding she'd seen all it had to offer. A single blow to the gut sent Tachyonic staggering back, and with a burst of motion, Lodestar slipped behind Agent Quantum, knocking him off balance with a hard strike to the spine.

"You're used to fighting people weaker than you, maybe ones on your level. When Professor Quantum tests you against harder opponents, they're always mechanical, and not the sentient type. That means they're limited, predictable, easy to defeat once you learn their patterns."

A rapid series of shots from Plasmodia tore through the air, ones that Lodestar easily sidestepped, seemingly unbothered. "This might feel unfair, but understand, I'm not even using your team's full capabilities right now. If I was hitting with Plasmodia's stopping power, you'd both be down already. Our world isn't balanced in how it gives out abilities. Some get the strength to shake mountains, others can turn soda into water. You cannot assume your position will always be that of the stronger fighter. This is just what it will be like to fight someone who is both fast and strong, a combination you'll eventually find if you fight enough metas."

Tachyonic let out a dusty snicker as he rose to his feet. “You might be right, but it’s a little rich to get that advice coming from Lodestar.”

“I wasn’t born with these powers.” That was all she managed before another blast ripped through the air. Unlike prior shots, this was closer to target, and far more dangerous. A nearby mesa got clipped, resulting in a hole bored through the rock.

Plasmodia was stepping things up... or was she? Come to think of it, Lodestar hadn’t heard much swearing for a few moments. Zipping around to the opposite side of the boulder, she was waiting when Presto appeared, crouched low and with a hand already outstretched.

“A distraction, a new angle of approach, and you didn’t even yell a catchphrase? Much better. Keep this up, and you all may just pull off a win.” She thought Presto seemed a tad less surly as she hurled him into the sky yet again, perhaps because he’d been recognized for improving. Knowing Professor Quantum, the kids probably hadn’t gotten much of that during their time under his tutelage.

No sooner was Presto gone than Tachyonic was on her. This time, he’d increased the speed of his punches, hoping to cause enough damage to slow her down, or at least have her put on the act. Since Presto was in the air, Agent Quantum was moving at mortal speeds, and Plasmodia would need time to aim, Lodestar decided this was a fine opportunity for a more personal lesson. Rather than using higher levels of strength, Lodestar dialed in her speed to precisely the same as Tachyonic’s, resulting in a world stuck in slow motion while they moved as normal.

That done, Lodestar didn’t brush aside the coming attacks. Instead, she blocked, returning a jab to Tachyonic’s unprotected ribs. Not enough to take him down: it should feel like a normal blow, meaning that it would hurt without injuring. He appeared momentarily stunned, then came in swinging again. There was some form there, he’d had training, but it was all too evident that he’d grown very used to his speed advantage.

Lodestar easily avoided the wide swing, countering with another short jab, this one directly to Tachyonic’s nose.

“Ow!” He staggered, nearly slipping into normal time, as a wave of wetness washed over his eyes.

“No matter how good you are, getting hit in the face, at least when it causes damage, is going to rock your focus. Hands up. You should be guarding. This isn’t a match where you can dodge everything.”

Slowly, Lodestar was getting a feel for this team. Agent Quantum had the right makings for a leader, but he could be a bit too set on his path to change when needed. Tachyonic was stuck in the classic super-speed trap—he'd tried to learn to do everything faster, rather than better. Plasmodia possessed easily the most stopping power but was kept on the backlines due to her supposed vulnerability, never mind the fact that she had plenty of defensive options. As for Presto, he might actually have the sharpest mind of the four. Pity he seemed intent on concealing and misusing that potential.

Sure enough, Tachyonic proved her theory by racing in once more. He was going faster this time, because of course he was. That was the Professor Quantum method for overcoming a hurdle: stronger, faster, tougher, better. Dominate, win—all that idiot crap Lodestar had been forced to dig out by the root when starting the Alliance of Heroic Champions. Had Tachyonic taken a moment to truly consider the situation, he'd have remembered that Lodestar was only ever matching his speed. Going faster changed nothing. This wasn't a fight that could be won by adding more power.

More punches, though these were at least a tad tighter than before. Lodestar blocked the first two swings, feinted a third jab that Tachyonic fell for, and came around with a right hook to his jaw. She tried to hold back; however, moving at those speeds made it difficult to entirely pull the blow. She still sent Tachyonic stumbling back onto his butt.

With his landing, their time in the land of super-speed came to an end. Lodestar decided to reengage with the other recovering members of the team. Agent Quantum was mostly to his feet, but she could still hear Presto whistling through the air above them. Plasmodia would fire when given a chance; however, by this point, she'd yet to land a single shot. Hopefully, she'd realize that with Tachyonic's speed in play, Lodestar could dodge most ranged attacks and come in closer. She'd love to see what Plasmodia could do when truly pushed. Unfortunately, knowing the training they'd gotten, Lodestar highly doubted the young woman would break formation. Professor Quantum drilled those lessons in especially hard.

As Agent Quantum looked her over, she wondered if he was going to step up. This plan wasn't working, not unless they had a secret reveal prepared for the last moment. There was still time to change things, to try something new, but that would demand throwing away their current tactics. It was a hard call to make for any leader: stick with what they knew, even though it was failing, versus rolling the dice on an untested strategy. With a team this developed, there would be other tactics they could shift to, ones they'd no doubt drilled and polished as much as their current formation. The question was, would any of them work against an opponent as strong as their own team, and could Agent Quantum figure out which?

"Plasmodia, switch to rapid shots. Let's keep her dancing. Presto, pick a number between one and a hundred. Count to that, then make your jump. She can't predict your timing if it's randomized. Tachyonic, switch to support. Use that speed as a surprise. Don't let her see you coming. I'll take her on in melee."

"That a fact?" Lodestar liked that he'd changed things up; however, he'd only shifted the variables, rather than the strategy as a whole. While it could still work, she wasn't holding her breath on that making the difference.

In response, Agent Quantum raised his own fists. "Since you gave Tachyonic a real sparring session, care to teach it to someone who has been more thoroughly trained in hand-to-hand combat?"

"Nope." Lodestar dashed over, sweeping Agent Quantum's legs and knocking him in the stomach on his way down. "The point of that lesson wasn't that he needs a boxing tutor. It's that you all have weaknesses. Knowing what they are allows you to plan around them. Ignoring them leaves opponents an opening to exploit."

Although she could see Tachyonic preparing for another charge and Plasmodia building up energy to shoot once more, in her heart Lodestar knew this test had likely reached its conclusion. Much as she'd been hoping they'd think on their feet, it appeared they were continuing on with trying the same thing, only more powerful. It was an issue she'd expected when taking on Professor Quantum's team, and one she dearly hoped could be trained out of them.

The other way that lesson sank in wasn't pretty. It came in the field, when a team fought someone truly beyond their abilities, and usually ended in several funerals. Lodestar would do all she could to educate this group before that day came.

In the moment, that lesson probably required leaving them publicly defeated. A blow to the ego was far, far better than what awaited them if they didn't learn their lessons during training—even if it meant one more set of superheroes that resented her. She could already see the frustration in their eyes catalyzing into anger, know they were thinking it wasn't fair, this gulf of power between them. They were right, but it didn't change the fact that they'd eventually fight a stronger opponent.

She could bear their resentment, their distance, if it meant they'd be able to survive. One more burden added to the countless on her shoulders. This one, at least, she'd been prepared for since the evaluation started. It was how these things always turned out, sooner or later. Admiration turned to jealousy, annoyance, or frustration as attempt after attempt to surpass her power failed.

Standing at the top meant standing alone.

---

Chapter 50

---

The worryingly thin woman with skin the color of an old lime moved quietly through the front door, causing a large bell overhead to tinkle loudly. Inside the unremarkable door was a wood-paneled hallway leading deeper into the well-aged building. From down the expanse, music drifted along. Nothing remotely modern, this had a peppy, bouncy rhythm. One might have used the word jaunty, even if it weren't normally within their vocabulary.

For Lozora, the sound conjured dim memories of her time in the lab. One of the scientists used to leave a television on for her brood at night, believing it would better socialize them with humans. That one had favored older works, some dating back to the days before color. This wasn't a tune she could particularly recall, it was merely in the style of those programs. Lozora was never sure if that scientist was eaten during the escape, or if they'd been out on the fateful day. As the lone survivor, there was no way to ask the others which humans they'd torn apart in the dash to freedom.

At the end of the hall, there was a single turn. Down a bit further, another door waited. This one hosted a huge glass pane in the center, marking the business as "Vaudeville and Toon: Destructive Indestructibles" in elaborate gold lettering. She was in the right place, moving silently along the weathered floor. No need to turn the knob, she realized, since the door was cracked. That explained how the music was traveling so well.

Pushing her way inside, Lozora found herself looking directly at a desk with a woman behind it. A very distinctive woman, at that: pants held aloft by suspenders, starched shirt, bow tie, a flat-topped straw hat, and a plainly plastic mustache that came to absurdly curly points at each end.

The moment she saw Lozora enter, the curiously dressed woman sprang to her feet, tipping the straw hat and knocking a bottle of ink Lozora hadn't seen seconds prior onto the floor. It spread across the wood in a dark, oozing puddle, yet the woman paid the spill not the slightest of mind.

"Good afternoon! Welcome to Vaudeville and Toon, Independent Disaster Contracting. As you might have guessed, I'm Vaudeville, in the flesh. What can I do for you today?"

"My employer is interested in your services." She wasn't entirely sure what to make of Vaudeville, having only ever known the woman by reputation. She didn't seem like much outside of an oddball, but that meant nothing. According to reports, she and Toon were among the highest-ranked metas in existence for survivability. The latter had supposedly even survived a scuffle with Fornax. That was the sort of power it was useful to have around.

"Of course, you did walk into our office. Services must be in demand, so tell me the skinny. Boss have a competing bar we need to go for a dance at? Maybe a business we should patronize? Tell us where you need the chaos, and that's where we'll be." She paused, looking Lozora over more carefully. "With some exceptions, by matter of policy."

Best to start with the caveats. Lozora might save herself some time. "What sorts of exceptions?"

"The expected sort. Ya see, Toon and I occupy a niche in the laws and protections around meta-humans. We exert influence on the world around us simply by existing in it. We cause chaos and trouble no matter where we go. The reason that's legal is because we can't control it, and jailing us for effects outside our control crosses several legal lines. That said, we're also not stooges. Laws can change, ya know. It's why we avoid anything related to or around the Alliance of Heroic Champions. Not looking to pick a fight with people who can put the kibosh on our business."

About what Lozora had expected. It was standard practice among those who'd been around long enough to build a reputation in the first place. Steering clear of the capes was just good sense, which was what made her employer's aspirations all the rarer. Not many were left who'd challenge the AHC directly. Luckily, he'd also found places for assets that were technically unconnected from what the capes would be dealing with.

“That won’t be an issue,” Lozora replied.

“Tickled as a hog in hosiery to hear it.” Another look, this one more probing. “I’ll ask your forgiveness for the uncouth addition, but given your overall deadly demeanor, feels prudent to mention we also don’t tango with the other side of that equation. Vaudeville and Toon are strictly a civilian service. We avoid the major leagues.”

Here, unfortunately, they had an issue. From a door on the left, annoyed ranting could be heard. Seconds later, it could also be seen, as actual scribbles and blurred-out symbols manifested in the air. That was the only warning before the door slammed open and a new man ambled through.

He had a strange movement to him, a constant bounce, like he was never truly still. His intense expression was a sharp contrast to the bright, cheerful hues he was clad in, and the coifed bobbing hair swaying atop his skull. It was hard to place this person’s age. His skin was off in texture, somehow just... not right, but it lacked any signs of aging. Older than a teen, younger than what most would consider a true adult, the man was a shifting tapestry as he took long, unusual steps through the room.

“Your partner agrees with that, or does he make his own choices?”

“Toon isn’t one to get bogged down in details. He prefers the fun,” Vaudeville replied.

“He’s also out of beer. Turned into milk again.” From a small mini-fridge, Toon produced a brown bottle, then very carefully eased the door shut.

As soon as it clicked, a stack of books fell from literally nowhere, smacking Vaudeville in the cranium one after another. With every blow, she teetered more and more off-balance, until the last one sent her to the ground. Then, moments later, Vaudeville was back up as if nothing had happened. That was the thing about these two: easy to hit, near impossible to hurt.

Looking mildly embarrassed by the bookslide, Toon managed a repentant expression, albeit not well. This was a bit too commonplace for the pair to feel bad about. “Sorry, didn’t mean to do that in front of a client.”

“That’s quite all right, Toon,” Vaudeville assured him. “Our guest was leaving anyway, seeing as she’s clearly here recruiting for some sort of larger caper, and we don’t fit in. Besides, she just tried to play us against each other. I'm not fond of working with those who can't respect the bond between partners."

While Lozora was technically here diplomatically, she still felt her spine tense. Perhaps this woman didn't quite realize who she was talking to. Lozora was no mere lackey to be drummed out when someone else's patience wore thin. Tapping her hands against the arms of the chair, Lozora began to rise.

"Oh goody and gumption. Toon, looks like you might get to have some fun today after all."

Toon looked from Lozora to Vaudeville, then dropped the beer into a wastebasket, where it somehow made a sound like a ringside bell. Putting his right thumb to his mouth, Toon began to blow. As he did, his entire fist swelled in size to absurd, comical proportions. A literal gleam twinkled in both of his now wide eyes, the first signs of genuine excitement he'd shown, all pointed directly at Lozora.

"Step right on up, my bold challenger. I promise, you ain't never had a fight like me."

Helen took her time putting Penelope to bed. They sang songs, had a long tub time, and even did rereads of some favorite stories. It felt good to be here—human, and home. She reveled in being around someone who had little care for Lodestar, powers, superheroes, any of it. To Penelope, Helen would be Mom above all other titles, and after days like this, she needed that. As all children do, however, Penelope eventually gave in to slumber.

Part of her—no, much more than a part—wanted to call Ivan. He understood what it meant to be at the top. The solitude, the distance, the pressure. But it wasn't fair of her to add to his burdens. He was already carrying enough. She was the Lodestar; she could haul her own mental crap around. Setting her resolve, Helen wandered into the kitchen and poured a glass of wine.

The last drops were nearly fallen when her phone chirped. She knew the sound—not many people had their own custom tones, but there were those who warranted the distinction. Yanking it out, she prepared for Ivan to tell her something about the Starscouts, or perhaps offer some insight into Tori's kidnapping.

Are you free?

Well... that was unexpected. Blunt, which did fit Ivan, though he tended to err on the side of formality, at least since taking on his civilian role. Her thumb wavered, unsure of what to write back. Yes, she was free. Yes, she wanted to see him, to share the events of her day. That was the trouble. She liked Ivan, liked being around him. When she'd been living as just Helen, that was one thing. Now, the issue was more complicated. In the end, Helen decided that since there was a chance this could be related to official business, she had a duty to investigate.

Even Lodestar was allowed a small bit of self-delusion.

For the moment. Something up?

She didn't even have time to put the phone down before his reply came.

In person.

Damn. If he couldn't talk about it even over their secured lines, then this was indeed serious. All thoughts of relaxation and light flirting bolted from Helen's mind as she tried to predict what threat they might be facing.

Come over and read me in.

Again, she didn't set the phone down in time. Another chirp, another message. Reading it twice, Helen lifted an eyebrow and walked through the house to her back door. Popping it open, she stepped onto her porch to find Ivan already sitting there, staring out at the night sky. There was something in his expression, a pain she'd seen prior incarnations of, though never to this degree. A joke about personal property faded on her tongue. This was no laughing matter.

"Ivan, what's wrong?"

She expected him to need some time, but that made little sense. Ivan had come to her to talk. He wasn't going to hold back when the chance finally arrived.

"Rick has started to remember the beach. Enough that he asked about it, and I told him the truth of that day. He still hasn't asked the big questions yet, but it's only a matter of time." Lowering his gaze, Ivan pressed his hands against his forehead. "My son is going to see me as a monster, and I don't know how to stop it. Or even if I should stop it. He has a right to know my history; the people with grudges certainly will."

Taking her time, Helen went into the house, scooping up a pair of old quilts. Stepping back out, she hunkered down in the chair next to Ivan, handing over the blanket. “Summer is ending. The nights are starting to chill. Remember, have to look human.”

While Ivan worked out which part of the quilt was the top, Helen continued. “I don’t know what to say about the Rick stuff. That bites the big one? No, bad call, forget that. It just... sucks, Ivan, and I wish I could say something to make it better. Except, the truth is, this was always a hurdle you two had to climb. Eventually, our kids will find out we’re more than just their parents. Some have an easier adjustment to make than others, but Rick is smart. He’ll be able to see the bigger picture. Whether or not he can make peace with it... that’s up to him to decide.”

“Sadly, I am all too aware.” Ivan had finally managed to get the blanket oriented appropriately, letting it sit at his waist like an elderly man at a chessboard. For a moment, Helen tried to imagine old Ivan. It didn’t work. He, like her, was largely unchanging, save only for when he made the big changes. She couldn’t imagine Ivan living to an old age any more than herself. Superheroes and villains alike, they were both fated to go out with their masks on.

“The only upside is I can offer comfort on one level: you don’t need to worry about Rick or Beth being targets. Not from the AHC, and not from anyone within punching distance of me. We don’t ever talk about how much you’ve done for me and Penelope—”

Ivan interrupted her. “I was paying back—”

“Cut the crap,” Helen interrupted right back. “Paying me back for helping you get the freedom you’d earned doesn’t entail a tenth of what you’ve done over the years. From the very start, you were the one who gave me the downtime to have her, and since then, you’ve been a constant help, one I probably leaned on too much during the rough times.”

It was always surprising when Ivan could somehow manage to look even more serious than he normally did, yet as he stared Helen down, she was nearly captured by the gravity in his gaze. “Trifles and pittance. Everything I love, I have in my life because of your help. There is no way to repay that debt, though I owe you a lifetime of effort in trying.”

“Guess what, that feeling flows both ways.” Finally fiddling with her own blanket, Helen snapped it out in a single movement, letting it settle naturally over her chair and body. “After all you’ve done for Penelope, I owe at least that level of care to your kids. So whatever else you might be scared of in all of this, try not to worry about their safety. I'm not perfect, nor infallible, but so long as the power is mine to wield, your kids will always have Lodestar in their corner."

It would have shocked most people, to see Ivan relax at those words, even slightly. He was not a man of casual ease, nor one prone to trusting. But he knew more than most of the world; he'd seen how much power Lodestar could truly wield, when the need arose. For the moment, Ivan allowed himself a minute measure of peace. Likely the very thing he'd come here hoping to find.

"Much as my pride wants to decline the gesture, for the sake of my children, I thank you sincerely." Ivan lowered his head, almost managing a bow despite their seated positions. "And I'm sorry for interrupting your evening so abruptly."

"Given the situation, I get it. Honestly, I'm sort of glad you showed up. My day was a pain, as well. It's nice to sit with an old friend."

An old friend, an old enemy, an old rival, an old asset, even an old partner for the occasional shared adversary. After all these years, there were few roles they hadn't filled for the other at some point along the way. Only a few were left purposefully, willfully, untouched—no matter how much either of them might wish to be sharing a single quilt.

"Anything interesting? I could use a distraction."

This question, thankfully, Helen had an easy response to. "I got shot in the face by a bunch of birds."

A sincere, contemplative look fell over Ivan's face. "Do you mean you were hit by a large amount of birds, or a flock of them banded together to actually shoot some sort of tiny guns at you?"

There was no particular reason why that got her, but seeing the man once known as Fornax ask such a question with a straight face sent Helen into convulsions of laughter that took a full minute to fade.

---

Chapter 51

---

Sunday evening arrived too soon for Tori, who'd spent nearly every spare second since her meeting with Doctor Mechanical down in the lab, hard at work. She needed to get a fully functioning prototype built so she'd have actual specs. Until they knew the exact size and shape, she couldn't very well tap Beverly to start much of the design work. It had been one thing when this was all an idea, just some fun notion to sink her energy into rather than dwelling on everything that had happened. Having Indigo Technologies provisionally on board changed things. Now, it had the potential to be real, and Tori was determined not to let the chance slip away.

When Beverly finally dragged her out of the lab, it was a blessing. She'd been at it for a long time without any breaks and was starting to slow down mentally. Changing gears would give her brain time to rest. It wasn't as if game night with the New Science Sentries would demand the same level of intense focus.

After a shower and a few cups of coffee, Tori was more or less as functional as she got outside of things that interested her. She expected to coast her way through the evening in a subdued manner, letting the more boisterous members of their social circle pick up the slack.

Once the knock on their door came, however, the flaw in that plan became apparent. It was a weary foursome that arrived at their door. None looked especially well rested, and their overall energy was somewhere on Tori's level, which was worrying. The sole member putting up the appearance of pep was Austin, who greeted Chloe cheerfully when she let them in.

“Good evening, and thank you again for having us. We brought some playing cards, wine, and a batch of homemade cookies for dessert.”

“Oh, perfect! We just ordered pizza for dinner. I didn’t know everyone’s preferences well enough to cook.” Chloe accepted the cookies from Austin while Tori ambled over to help with the wine. Beverly was still getting ready, or maybe wanted to make an entrance. Tori never understood the rules of the fashionable.

Taking both wine bottles from Kyle, she noticed he was especially subdued, even by the group’s current standards. The easier play would be to let it go unsaid, leave the issue alone since it was almost certainly cape-related. Except, she was supposed to be friendly, and this was way too obvious to pretend it wasn’t there. Ultimately, Tori opted to split the difference. She’d give Kyle a window; if he didn’t use it, that was on him.

“Come help me uncork these bad boys. With this many people, we’ll go through both fast.” Leading Kyle over to the kitchen, leaving the other three chatting with Chloe at the entrance, she walked him to the junk drawer and popped out a bottle opener. “Want to talk about it?”

“Huh?” He hadn’t been braced for that. The question appeared to be the first thing that had jarred him into paying attention. “Sorry, what?”

“I’m asking if you want to talk about whatever dark cloud is hanging over all your heads. ’Cause if so, do it now. I’m not interrupting a winning streak because you get a case of feelings.” A little harsher than she’d intended, Tori took a breath and dialed it back. “I mean, something is plainly up. You don’t want to talk about it, your call. Just making an offer to listen while we wait for Beverly.”

The slight pop behind her was all the warning Tori needed. Without turning, she held out a glass of poured wine slightly to her rear, where Ike accepted it as he walked around to Kyle’s side. “He’s miffed because we had an evaluation at the Alliance of Heroic Champions, and our team wasn’t able to overcome the challenge presented. Which is the polite way of saying we got our asses kicked.”

“Not... we didn’t do that badly. We just didn’t succeed at the task assigned, despite coming close a few times,” Kyle corrected.

“Coming close? I never even got a hand on that rock. Austin came nearest, and that was right before the time limit. We might have fought until the end, but we were far from success.”

The conversation only seemed to be riling Kyle up, which was admittedly better than the morose version. Tori thrust a glass of wine over. It wouldn't be able to affect someone with his metabolism, but the routine act of drinking sometimes helped to calm people down. "Were you up against some sort of monster, or giant murdering robot?"

"What?" Kyle asked, swinging his head around. "Of course not. Who would test their new members with that kind of opponent?"

Clearly someone had never been through villain training. Tori enjoyed a whole three seconds of feeling superior about the hurdles she'd cleared—right up until Kyle named their actual adversary.

"We had to test ourselves against Lodestar."

Setting the wine down, Tori went to the fridge and pulled out a bottle of beer. She'd never been much of a wine fan, and there was no reason to change that tonight. Popping the top, Tori clapped Kyle on the back lightly. "I'm pretty sure you don't have to feel bad about losing to the person famous for being unbeatable. She's the fucking Lodestar. What else did you expect? Who's going to come out on top against her?"

"Cyber Geek's team, for one." Ellie had wandered over, leaving Austin and Chloe still catching up by the door. The man was dedicated to his polite small talk, Tori had to give him that. Ellie drew more attention, though, as she poured herself a very full glass of wine. "We didn't have to fight her, per se. We had to take something she was guarding. And since she matched her power with whoever she was fighting, the stronger you are, the harder your challenge. So at least we can take comfort in how weak that squad must be."

Ellie lifted her glass, and Ike clinked. Only Kyle resisted the urge to join, showing unexpectedly good judgment, given his track record.

"Look, I'm sure there's all sorts of rivalries and pissing matches going on in the AHC, but let's lay one thing out right here and now: Cyber Geek is a friend of mine. We worked together, we fought together when our office was attacked, and he saved a whole nightclub full of people, me included, when Nexus let a monster loose on the dance floor. You've got beef, fine. Keep it between yourselves. But that's going to be the last time you shit-talk my friend in my presence. Anyone got an issue with that?"

Ellie looked stunned, and even Ike appeared momentarily taken aback. Kyle, however, recovered for his team, showing off that speedy thinking for a change. "Apologies, Tori. It was inappropriate. We shouldn't talk about a fellow superhero that way, and we certainly don't have room to belittle the strength of a team that did better than us. It won't happen again, though I do hope this policy flows both ways."

"I guess it would, but he's never really mentioned your team." Only after she said the words did Tori realize how they might be perceived. That was the cost of knowing tech better than people, stumbling into errors that a more socially adept person could avoid.

"Oh? Then what is it you do talk about?" For once, she was glad to have Ike around. His ridiculous innuendo was exactly the pivot she needed from that last statement.

"Spreadsheets, combat tactics, our eventual inevitable battle to the death. The usual former office drone stuff." Talking about it made Tori realize she actually hadn't had more than a phone call or a brief chat with Donald in some while. She should reach out, make sure he was holding up okay. If this was how the New Science Sentries were faring, it had to be a rough time as a recent rookie.

Heels clicking along wood signified Beverly's arrival, and Tori felt her head turn with everyone else's even though she knew who was coming. That was Beverly's knack; she could draw the attention of a room before even setting a foot inside. Once she actually arrived, Tori nearly coughed on a sip of beer. She was accustomed to Beverly, her roommate and friend, the one who always looked put together, but in a functional, office-appropriate manner. Tonight she hadn't changed much, yet the effect was potent. A touch more makeup here, a slightly different cut to her blouse there, and suddenly Tori realized why Beverly could survive by simply writing about fashion. The woman knew her stuff to a terrifying degree.

What was more interesting was the enhanced appearance itself. Obviously, she hadn't put in the effort for Tori or Chloe, which narrowed it down to the New Science Sentries. One glance at Austin's near slack-jawed face told her which of the group was having the strongest reaction, and to Tori's surprise, she caught Beverly clocking Austin's face, too. First mystery solved easily enough; the second was more troublesome, unfortunately. Was Beverly actually making an effort, or just screwing with Austin for fun? She'd never been the cruel sort—then again, Beverly didn't hate many people the way she hated Professor Quantum. It was hard to imagine her seriously flirting with his successor. Perhaps she was using her wiles to win him over, hoping to gain useful information about the AHC?

Tori shook off the curiosity, all too aware she lacked the skills to crack this puzzle. The easier method was just to get through the night, then ask Beverly later. That was the perk of being outside the courtship dance; she wasn't bound by any of the unspoken rules.

"My goodness, where did you get that top?" Ellie rushed over before Austin had recovered enough to speak. "I love it! I've been hunting all over Ridge City for wardrobe updates, mostly to no luck."

"You have to know the good spots, plus a little tailoring. Nothing comes perfect off the rack," Beverly explained. "Next time you have a day off, I can take you around to some favorites. Maybe with your help, I can drag these two along."

Finally ambling over from the door, Chloe piped up. "Hey, I went with you once. I just rarely get full days off. We don't all do freelance or get corporate hours."

"Yes, you at least have an excuse." Beverly narrowed her eyes at Tori, who met the glare with a casual shrug.

"My excuse is that I don't want to."

That deepened Beverly's stare, but had no effect on Ellie's enthusiasm. "That's all right. I'd be happy just for the guidance and company."

It was an interesting move. From what Tori could tell, Beverly had decided to embrace the friendship angle to a greater degree than herself. Then again, she'd asked Kyle what was wrong, so that was significant effort on her part. Maybe they were still playing the same strategy after all; she was just noticing the difference in how effective each were.

"I'll try to tag along if the timing works out. I've got some new looks in mind I want to get outfits for." Chloe was excited as well, and Tori wondered how many times she'd be walking in on gorgeous strangers as Chloe played with the newly discovered aspect of her powers.

While those three grouped up, Austin at last found his feet and wandered into the heart of the apartment. Taking a small glass and filling it with water, he paused next to Tori. "I thought you might like to know, your friend fought very well. His team not only passed the evaluation, they did so while putting on a fine show."

"Glad to hear it. So, you're not jealous?" Tori asked.

"Oh, I am incredibly envious," Austin corrected. "Also a bit resentful, if we're being honest. It's hard not to feel like this is all wrong. We're fighting the way we were trained by one of history's greatest superheroes and are being told we're wrong at nearly every turn. Meanwhile, the team closely associated with a traitor keeps finding success and acclaim. I understand they weren't part of Apollo's scheme, but I hope you can see why that would be frustrating for my people. They really are doing the best they can every time. That's why it hurts so much to keep feeling like failures."

Years ago, months ago, she'd have tossed those words aside, assuming them to be pure fiction. The trouble was, being around the capes this much had shown Tori a truth she couldn't fully ignore: some of them were sincere. Not all, probably not even most, but a few were doing the job because they truly wanted to make the world better, safer, for the normal people who lived in it. She'd seen an everyday programmer lay down his life for others multiple times, simply because he had enough strength to try. Hell, she'd looked into the eyes of Lodestar and seen only true concern behind them. Tori didn't know Austin or Agent Quantum well enough to have a clue if he was in that club or not, but she had a hunch. Enough to throw him a line. Whether he took it or not would determine how much of his demeanor was playing the part versus his true ambitions.

"I mean, there's a solution here, if you're serious. You really want to get better at this job, to see what the differences in your tactics are? Go ask Cyber Geek if you can tag along with his team for a few nights."

While the idea wasn't rejected immediately, Austin's face creased in visible concern. "There's merit to that idea, granted, but I'm afraid it might be too late. Our teams haven't gotten off to the greatest start; I fear such a request from me would seem like teasing, at best, or setting them up for some sort of trick, at worst."

Beverly and Chloe had gotten out the stack of board games and were beginning the discussion. Seeing several strategy options that would have them playing for half the night in the mix, Tori realized she needed to weigh in on this choice, and soon. Hitting the fridge for one more beer, she paused briefly by Austin's side.

"Convince Cyber Geek you're coming to him sincerely, and he'll agree to the pairing, bad blood or not. He cares more about the people you're protecting than the politics of the AHC. Make him believe you want to be better capes and he won't be able to turn you away."

Austin nodded. "Thank you. I'll think on that." From the way his eyes kept swinging back over to Beverly's side of the room, Tori doubted he'd get much critical contemplation accomplished that evening. She'd done her part, though, so with a clear conscience, she attacked the group choosing the night's diversion.

“Chloe, put that ten-hour strategy game down, and no one gets hurt!”

---

Chapter 52

---

Monday morning brought with it an unexpected message. It wasn't as though Tori hadn't kept in contact with Lance and Warren—Pest Control and Glyph, as they were known in the guild. They'd touched base during the guild's downtime, making sure all the rookies were laying low and staying safe. They'd both fallen silent in recent weeks; the new guild opening marked the chance to start working again, and no doubt the pair were busy with their own lives.

That's what made Lance's unexpected invitation to a meeting so out of the blue. The implication was clear, obviously. Some kind of guild business. Maybe Lance needed tech consulting, wanted air surveillance to monitor a location, or he was looking for backup on a job. The wide range of possibilities poked at Tori's curiosity. Besides, there was also the inevitable truth that she needed money, and if it was a job, guild work paid extremely well.

Designing and building a new product line was going to be expensive. She could foist the funding onto Indigo, except there was no way to do that without also cutting them in on a greater share of the profits. While Tori had made peace with the need for a corporate alliance, that didn't mean she wanted to hand over any more power or leverage than necessary. As much as possible, she would be the driving force of her creations. She wasn't quite sure that would be enough to motivate her to brave another museum heist, but it was worth taking the meeting. There was always the option to say no, if the offer didn't sound like her scene.

A crisp knock on her bedroom door came a few moments before Beverly's voice. "Saw some photographers creeping along the west side of the building, and Chloe is already getting ready for work. You might want to take the back door today."

It took all of Tori's control not to let out a groan that was audible from the street. Stupid photographers still hanging around. She wanted to be done with them, except the attention was still necessary for her long-term plans. Besides, it wasn't like she had a way to get rid of them. None that wouldn't involve guild tactics, anyway.

Beverly hit the door once again, softer this time. "You get a text from Lance?"

"Sure did. Meeting tonight?"

"That's the one," Beverly's voice confirmed. "Up for it?"

Tori's mind flashed to her Hephaestus suit, sitting down in the lab. She hadn't gotten to take it out for more than a few hours at the guild's relaunch, a pitiful amount of field-testing time. Even aside from that, part of her missed the feel of her tech encompassing her entirely. Tori enjoyed being Hephaestus, perhaps more than she let herself realize initially. If she wanted to suit up again, the guild was where she'd find her best opportunities.

Not to mention, she was sick of playing helpless. Between the car thrown at her head and the kidnapping, Tori had been affecting the role of mundane civilian too much for her liking. It was time to be powerful again. It was time to be Hephaestus.

"Why not? Could be fun."

It had been a hell of a weekend. Passing the evaluation was a high point, obviously, but the celebration with his team that followed had been a darn good time as well. Sans costumes, they'd gone out to a nice dinner in celebration, then followed things up with a downright horrific session of karaoke, in which they learned Irene was a shockingly talented soprano and Lucy could clear half a room with the first ten notes of a song. Ren always stuck to something country, low and simple. He'd gotten much better at speaking with his altered tongue since the change, but he still avoided anything that demanded rapid linguistic skills. As for Donald, he'd picked an old favorite that was more talk-singing than actual music, but it was on the list, so he'd considered it fair game.

One unexpected cherry had come Sunday night: a text from Tori about wanting to grab lunch and catch up soon. After weeks of working to be better at his job, and an objective evaluation that said his team was doing well, Donald found he could easily justify taking some time off to see her. Important as being a superhero was, it couldn't make up the entirety of his life. That wasn't healthy for any profession, not even capes.

The text was still on his mind as he walked down the AHC's halls Monday morning. With breakfast at his back, Donald planned to do some serious gaming today. The evaluation had reminded him of a tool Cyber Geek was going to eventually need: flight. Suit thrusters were fine for short distances, but sooner or later, they'd face an airborne opponent. When that day arrived, he was the only team member with the versatility to meet them in the sky. It was just a matter of seeing which flight systems translated well into the real world, and which left him spinning out.

He was so lost in thought about zipping through the sky that Donald almost didn't hear the voice calling for him until it was practically on his heels. In his defense, though, he only tended to think of himself as "Cyber Geek" while in costume.

Turning, he found Agent Quantum, sans the usual tagalongs, approaching. Not the best surprise possible, but at least Agent Quantum always conducted himself like a professional.

"Sorry, didn't mean to run you down," Agent Quantum said once he finally arrived. "But I saw you leaving the cafeteria and thought it might be serendipity. I wanted to speak with you, in private, when you have a moment."

Initially, Donald was torn. The New Science Sentries hadn't exactly gone out of their way to get on his team's good side. If anything, they'd been downright antagonistic. With a long day of work ahead, a very real part of Donald wanted to politely brush him off, sticking to the schedule that he'd planned. That inclination only lasted the micro-seconds necessary to remember where, precisely, he was standing.

They were in the hall of the Alliance of Heroic Champions, not some shitty office condo in downtown. This wasn't a corporate cog job where what they did had little to no effect on the world. Whatever else might be going on, they were both superheroes, and if Agent Quantum was willing to extend an olive branch, then Cyber Geek should at least hear him out.

“We’re not far from my room, if you want to follow me. I’ve got some free time until my next task.”

A tension that was extremely easy to miss left Agent Quantum’s shoulders as he nodded, a wary smile on his face. Together, they started down the hall once more, though this time walking together, rather than one trailing the other.

Ivan was waiting at his desk when Tori came in. He knew she’d be heading over, because he was the one who’d scheduled a meeting to start their week. As much as Ivan wanted to put the weekend out of his head, he couldn’t, and not just because the look on Rick’s face haunted him constantly. There were other implications to that discussion, ones that his former apprentice needed to know. The odds of the situation coming into play were minimal, but one didn’t work in a field of the miraculous without learning to plan for the impossible, to say nothing of the unlikely.

She was surprisingly prompt, arriving a full three minutes before they were due to start. As Tori walked in with a mug of coffee in hand, Ivan gave a short, pointed look at the door. Kicking it with her foot mid-stroll, Tori knocked it closed, after which Ivan hit unseen buttons hidden somewhere on the desk. One day, she’d really love to tear into these walls and see how much obfuscating tech Wade had woven through the building.

“What’s up? This about Lance’s text this morning?”

That was news to Ivan, so he shook his head. “Something more personal.” He waited while she got comfortable in her seat. No, that wasn’t quite right. Ivan wasn’t necessarily waiting so much as he was unsure of how to proceed. This was a big topic to bite off, especially given the potential ramifications. Ultimately, Ivan decided to push through bluntly. If nothing else, he and Tori both appreciated someone cutting to the heart of a matter.

“This weekend, Rick began to ask me questions about my past. He’s figured out that my old stories don’t line up, and as of now, knows that I am both a meta-human and a murderer, though my true identity has yet to be revealed.”

A parade of expressions ran across Tori’s face as she struggled to find fitting words to offer. In the end, she settled on glum. “That really blows.” Not especially eloquent, but sincere all the same.

“It very much does,” Ivan agreed. “However, that alone would be my burden to bear. The larger issue is that in Rick’s digging, he uncovered our purported genealogical connection. Given that it conflicted with the story he knew of my heritage, the detail stuck out to him. While I’ve tried hard to impart upon him that this is my secret, and stays between us, he is a sixteen-year-old, with all the rash decision-making that comes with the age. Worse, he’s got his mother’s smarts, meaning he might actually be effective at digging where he shouldn’t. There is a chance he’ll reach out to you, given what he’s grappling with and the connection he now knows we share.”

This time, Tori’s face was more guarded. She nodded along in understanding, giving away little more than that. “I get it. He found a rabbit hole, poked his head in, and is trying to figure out if he wants to see how far down it really goes. Since I’m the only person he knows who isn’t a parent that’s connected, there’s a chance he’ll try to approach me for more information.”

A pause as something familiar peered out from behind Tori’s guard. Fear. Of course fear. Always fear. In this case, Ivan certainly couldn’t hold it against her. This was fear he’d specifically imparted. He had no one to blame but himself.

“Given the protectiveness you feel toward your kids, I’m not looking to cross any lines here. If you want me to tell him to hit the bricks, I will. If you want me to try to soften the edges of what he’s going to learn, I’ll do my best, but let’s be honest, I might do more harm than good there. Point is, I’m following your lead.”

“I appreciate that.” Ivan looked down at his desk, where several pictures of his children through the years were featured. His eyes went to the youngest picture of Rick, still so small, riding on his father’s shoulders without a care in the world. For all the tremendous power Ivan could tap into, he’d have happily cast it aside to live in that day, that moment, once more. Sadly, not even Fornax could fight the forward march of time. Rick was no longer a little boy he could easily carry around. He was less than two years from the age Ivan had been when he became Fornax. In no time,

Rick would be his own man, and when that day came, he was better served by being as informed as possible.

Finally turning from his photos, Ivan met Tori's uncertain gaze. "Tell him anything he wants to know, assuming you're comfortable sharing. The only exceptions are the guild, and my true identity. The first for obvious reasons, the second because I feel I should be the one to handle that reveal. It will be... difficult."

"If he asks me if I've ever seen you kill?"

"You'd be perfectly in your rights to tell him that, yes, you have. Several people," Ivan said. "At this point, Rick doesn't trust much of what his mother or I say, and not without some reason. I'd rather him have an information source he believes than spare him truths he seems bound to eventually uncover. All of that is assuming he approaches you, which may very well not happen. I simply didn't want you to be caught unaware."

Tori took a long sip from her coffee mug, mulling the words over. "I appreciate the heads up, and I'll give some thought to how much I want to divulge if he does make a move."

"I think that's the best strategy, for the moment." Ivan was about to dismiss her, except a rogue glance to his calendar reminded him that there was one more matter of business to attend. "Before you go, remember that this week's Starscout meeting is bumped to tomorrow due to a district field trip. Kids should still be tuckered even when they get back, so we'll be putting the extra time to use. Got to prepare for the End of Summer Shindig next week, meaning there's always work to do."

"Almost forgot about those." To Ivan's surprise, Tori actually appeared happy about the change. "Sounds nice, a little normalcy after weeks of the insane. Plus, bonus, I actually got to meet Lodestar during the kidnapping. That should make a fun story for the kids, right?"

In his mind's eye, Ivan could already imagine the looks Helen would be shooting as Tori regaled the kids with tales of meeting their organization's founder. Annoying as they would be, he could just as easily imagine the wide-eyed joy of the children getting to hear that tale, Beth included. In the end, Starscouts was about the kids, and Tori was right. They would absolutely eat that story up.

"A fine idea. But word to the wise: bring throat lozenges. Giving a tale like that to children their age, you're going to find yourself with quite a few requests for encores."

---

Chapter 53

---

“You want to team up?” Donald had the screen on his TV glowing, and the special receiver booted up. It connected to the computer system wired into his body, loading a screen with dozens of games, all of which were constantly running in the background. Professor Quantum might not be as personable as Donald expected, but the tech he built absolutely lived up to the reputation. Comparing this to the wrist unit he’d been wielding initially was night and day.

“I wish I was asking for a team-up,” Agent Quantum replied. “That would be a much easier sell to my people. But there’s no sense in doing this unless we tackle it properly, which means accepting the truth. I don’t want to team up. I want you to let us shadow you for a few nights. It’s become increasingly clear that our training didn’t prepare us as well as we expected for this job. We’re doing the new drills, listening to the response tactics, it’s just not clicking. My hope is that watching another team up close will show us where it is we’re falling short. It’s the best way to improve.”

Making a snap decision, Donald chose a two-player game, grabbing a spare controller from the charging dock by the television. He tossed it into Agent Quantum’s hands, who stared at the device with a scrunched-up expression that looked quite out of place on his handsome face. “Might as well train while we talk. I’m leveling up a flight pack from Rocket Rangers. You’re the support ship, the blue cursor. Press the bottom button to shoot anything that isn’t me.”

The starting screen loaded, showing a nondescript avatar in leather clothing with a patchwork attempt at a jetpack strapped to their back.

Rocket Rangers wasn't the fastest way to gain access to flight, but since the system was built around buying new models and upgrades, it would theoretically allow for a large amount of customization. Any gear Cyber Geek couldn't properly control was too risky to bring into the field. Better to work toward a tool he could fine-tune than grab something easy and less reliable.

Agent Quantum fiddled with the controller for a few moments before gamely wiggling the joystick and opening fire on an empty field the player was flying over. The digital bullets rained down upon the meager stalks of wheat, ignored by the background art. He'd figured out the controls; that was a step in the right direction.

"Here's my concern." Donald waited until they were beginning to fire; having something else to occupy their attention made it less awkward to speak so frankly. "Our teams don't really get along. We can skate over the why, but it's true. I'm fully in support of you learning from someone more experienced and improving. I'm less sure that we're the right people to teach you. Aside from barely being past rookie level ourselves, why not pick someone your team doesn't have friction with?"

"Because they don't see those teams as their rivals." To Donald's surprise, Agent Quantum was unflustered by the point; he'd come in ready to address it. "You are right, our people have friction. What you might not realize is that part of why my team doesn't get along with yours is because of respect. You're succeeding at the job we can't seem to grasp correctly, you're beloved by people overall, and you consistently manage to power through every challenge presented. Whatever issues my team has, they're exceptional at threat evaluation. The New Science Sentries see your people as their main competition, which means they've acknowledged you to be capable. How many other teams at our level do you think they hold in such esteem?"

As he was talking, Agent Quantum's cursor grew faster, identifying the more dangerous targets and opening fire. It hadn't taken him long to grasp the game, despite his apparent lack of familiarity. Then again, it was a point-and-press-a-button situation. Donald hadn't exactly started him on Soul Grinder.

"Because they don't like us, they'll be willing to learn from us?" Donald really needed Ren as a consultant for this ego-based nonsense.

“Because they want to surpass you, they’ll pay attention to everything you say and do. Both to learn, and to search for weaknesses.” Agent Quantum managed to look sheepish at that, though just barely. “Not the greatest of motivations, but if they learn to be better superheroes in the process, I can’t be picky about what gets them to take the lessons.”

Toggling through the meager supply of weapons offered so early in the game, Donald rained three grenades down on the spot where the level boss would spawn. They landed just as the large man with a comically oversized gun loaded, blasting him past the first two combat phases and right into the finale, where he turned red and blinking. Donald could do this part essentially from memory—he’d long ago mastered the early level patterns. It was in the later stages, where randomization came into play, that progress would slow down.

“Although I’m still not sure it’s the best idea, I’ll run it by my team. If they say yes, we can try it for a night or two. If they say no, then it’s a no. Much as I’d like to help, I can’t have them feeling unsteady out in the field. We’re not as strong as you. We have to stay focused to be on top of our game, and the people out there calling for help deserve that from us.” Donald noted that Agent Quantum’s cursor was now darting around the screen, taking out the minions as they spawned, leaving Donald free to finish off the boss. “Should that happen, I’ll try to point you toward some other good candidates. Ren’s been here since the last confluence. He knows pretty much everyone on the new teams, and he’s sparred against most of them, too.”

“Entirely reasonable,” Agent Quantum said. “Given how things have gone between our people so far, I appreciate that you’re even willing to entertain the idea.”

With an on-screen explosion, the level boss died, spewing coins and parts that Donald would be using to start customizing the jetpack. He’d need to get some stabilizers and a few safety features before feeling confident enough to pull this thing into the real world. If it failed midair, Cyber Geek might be in for quite the tumble.

As the level transition screen appeared, Donald finally looked away from the TV. “I’m impressed you were able to come make the request. In your shoes, I doubt I’d have even thought to shadow another team, and I’m sure asking this couldn’t have been easy.”

“In the interest of directing credit where it’s due, the truth is I didn’t have the idea. Your friend Tori suggested it. She holds you in clear respect, and the more I see, the more I understand why.” Agent Quantum set the controller aside, rising to his feet. “Thank you for your time, Cyber Geek. I know you’ve got training, as do I, so I’ll leave you to think things over. If you have more questions or want to talk, I’ll be around.”

The two shook hands, and on impulse, one made a snap decision. “When we’re out of the masks, you can call me Donald. Wouldn’t hurt to be on more friendly terms.”

“In that case, please feel free to call me Austin.”

It was a nice moment, one that Donald dearly hoped he’d be able to communicate well when trying to sell this idea to his team. All things considered, it would probably be easier to take down another monster unleashed by Nexus than to sell them on this notion.

Then again, since when did he think being a superhero meant taking the easy path?

Lozora limped her way into the cave, annoyed for the first time by just how out of the way this lair was. It was necessary—one didn’t take on the Alliance of Heroic Champions in broad daylight until everything was good and ready—but running here after eating that cab driver was still quite a hike. Especially injured.

He came from the back, clad in a pure black suit. In the beginning, he’d had no name, nor any need for one. Recently, however, he’d begun to go by Wendel Worthington. Recruiting more broadly meant his business dealings had been forced into the mundane world, where huge stacks of money didn’t buy the same kind of “no questions asked” sales that their market offered. There was no way around it: they needed a figurehead, a name to give the pawns. Lozora’s was off the table; she couldn’t risk revealing herself and losing whatever nebulous protection Captain Bullshit had provided. Since her employer’s true moniker was a secret even from her, Wendel had been born. There was something else to it, too, a joke or barb she didn’t quite get but could still tell was there; however, on the hierarchy of mysteries about her boss, inside jokes were clearly at the bottom.

Given the polished appearance tonight, he was probably heading out for another meeting. Lozora had no idea what this part of the plan was, nor was she especially concerned. She'd signed on with a legend specifically because she didn't want to sweat all the details. After years of being cooped up, Lozora was ready for a little fun. Perhaps she'd start by picking easier targets for the next recruiting session.

"Issues?" He didn't sound worried, more like he was prepared to be angered by her disappointment. Those dark eyes scanned down to her leg, which was almost back to holding normal pressure, though not quite.

"Turns out Toon lives up to the reputation. He and Vaudeville were a no, but most of the others signed on. You provide the tech and the timeline when the capes will be busy, they'll pounce. We're getting up there in numbers. No major players, but plenty of small fish mad they missed the Ridge City Riots."

"Strap a bomb to a roach, it explodes just as well as a bomb strapped to a person. What matters most is the bomb, the equipment they're given. I can make them capable enough to be distractions. That's all they need to manage." The man going by Wendel Worthington absorbed Lozora's news slowly. "I presume from the injury that Vaudeville and Toon are both still alive."

Lozora turned as vicious a glare as she dared onto Wendel. "The pair famous for being impossible to hurt or kill, just like I warned you before the approach? Yeah, they're doing just fine. I didn't give any details, though, so even if they wanted to cause trouble, they wouldn't know where to start."

A loose end. One he might tie up, if time permitted. So many years of planning, finally given a chance to bear fruit—he couldn't risk the unseen variables causing complications. The world was filled with so-called "unkillable" beings, but in his experience, that really meant they just hadn't encountered someone truly dedicated to wiping them out. In a world like theirs, teeming with all manner of meta-elements, unknown magics, and fluid laws of science, nothing could be truly permanent or invulnerable. There was always a weakness, always a tactic—he believed that down to the darkest parts of his bones. It was just a matter of whether or not one had the will and the wiles to triumph.

As for Lozora, she was tense, waiting to see if failure meant he'd try to kill her. While he felt certain the task was achievable, it was also a poor use of resources. Lozora had far more connections to the villains of her generation than he could ever hope to achieve. Aside from which, she'd been powerful enough to warrant top-level security at Rookstone. A fight he could win, and a fight he could win without injury or loss, were two different matters. Especially in the heart of his lair, with so many inventions within easy smashing range.

"In the rear, you'll find a chair with a large metal circle around it, emitting a soft red light. Strap in. It can accelerate your healing."

"I heal fine on my own, thanks." Lozora appeared to relax without actually easing up, but the gesture itself was the point.

He didn't begrudge her resistance. This time, it really was a machine designed to heal; that didn't mean he hadn't also dummied up a few "medical" inventions that actually killed the user. It was a favorite trick of his—pretend to offer an olive branch and strike while their guard was down.

"Then take some time to rest. Recruitment is nearly done. I do need you to pick up an order in a few days, when it's ready. Something special, and specific. Will you be recovered in time?"

Lozora stared, and he stared back: she wondering what answer would trigger an attempt at murder, he pondering whether she could continue to be helpful. "I'll be fine by tomorrow. Just needed a good meal, which my driver was kind enough to provide." A long, purple tongue flicked out, giving a peek at the rows of sharp teeth normally hidden behind her lips. Intentional or not, it was a not-so-subtle reminder that he wasn't the only monster in the lair.

"Very well, then. I'll have the details ready when it's time for pickup. Until then, focus on recovery. I can have some food ordered."

"I prefer to hunt my own." There was a predatory gleam in her eye, one the masquerading Wendel paid no mind to. She could entertain whatever fantasies she liked about tearing into his flesh: one bite is all it would take for her to realize the mistake.

He hoped she held off until after the next job, at least. It would be very inconvenient to kill her with so much work still left to do.

---

Chapter 54

---

When Tori had first come to the new guild—what she'd begun to think of as Villain Island—the enterprise had seemed excessive. That sentiment had steadily faded the more she'd actually used the facilities, and as Tori headed down the hall to meet with Lance, she was thankful they were doing this far from Ridge City. There was something to be said for not being directly under an enemy's nose, even if doing things that way was more daring.

Everyone else was already waiting, as they'd likely come on their own schedules rather than catch a ride with Ivan, who was off at a clandestine gathering of his own. He played his mundane, normal role to a hilt, and that included driving almost aggressively within the law. They'd gotten more than a few honking horns and shaking fists; she'd have loved to see some of the fearsome drivers actually try to make good on the foul words they spat.

Hurrying in, Tori grabbed an open seat at the table. This meeting room was like most of the others scattered around the guild: built to hold up to eight human-sized bodies, or a small number of the more unwieldy members. There were larger options, but for a four-person group, there was no need to take up the more spacious resources, if Lance could even have booked them. After months of being shut down, and with a fancy new lair to play in, the guild was more alive than Tori had previously seen it, not that she'd had much of a sample size before the Ridge City Riots. Still, better make the most of the room while they had it.

"I know, I know, I'm late. Rode over with Pseudonym. You can catch me up on the highlights, and I'll get details from Beverly on what I missed. We don't have to restart."

“Not a problem. We’re mostly just going over the pitch as a whole right now.” Lance was as cheery as ever; his personable nature always seemed a strange fit for a man working in a guild of villainy.

Across the table, Warren boasted a less congenial expression, but Tori didn’t take it personally, especially when he offered a wave of greeting. She’d come to realize that was just Warren’s way, in the same sense that she and Ivan had their brusque moments. When shit hit the fan, he’d sided with their team and the guild over his own mentor; looking constantly grumpy didn’t matter worth a damn compared to his steadfast loyalty.

“Since the guild reopened, Warren and I have been picking up odd jobs here and there—mostly surveillance and support, given our powers,” Lance continued. That fit. With his swarms of insects to command and see through the eyes of, Lance would be one of the most capable non-technological surveillance options among the guild’s members. Most people in their field knew to sweep for devices called bugs; far fewer cared about the actual namesake. As for Warren, the ability to create magic in the form of drawn symbols meant he had a large amount of versatility. Plus, while he’d turned out to be a traitor, Balaam hadn’t done a poor job training his apprentice.

“It’s been a good way to get our feet back under us, plus pick up some spare cash. But recently, a job came around that we’re interested in working. The issue is the teams can’t be smaller than four people. I’ll tell you up front: it’s nothing too involved on our part. In theory, we could go the whole night without so much as a blip of action.”

“Or...” Beverly let the word hang, an implied question demanding to be spoken.

Lance didn’t shy away. “Or we might end up in a fight, though that’s not ideal. We don’t actually know much about what this job is, only that they need a fair amount of people running security. We’d be one of the outermost teams. Our primary job would be to keep passersby from going down the wrong street. If a cape shows up, we call in the alert so the real workers have time to finish or flee.”

Interesting. Minimal risk, presumably enough pay to warrant the effort, if Lance and Warren were roping them in, and technically, they didn’t even need to commit any crimes. When it came to tasks that had to be handled in costume, working as a lookout was about as legal an option as the guild presented.

“Why the four-person teams?” Tori asked. The more she understood, the better an idea she’d have of whether or not this was a good fit.

“Coverage.” Warren looked slightly more interested than he had at the start—quite a change, by his standards. “We need to be able to hold a sizable area. With Lance’s bugs and just me, it would be tight. Having you both along, plus potentially some tech to crack into security cameras, makes it a lot more manageable.”

“Possible, but I’d need the timeframe and general locale. Getting into a single closed system, like the museum, is one thing, but if we’re covering a big area, that would entail multiple buildings with their own securities.” A rogue idea struck her, even as she was listing the difficulties. “Although, if it’s anywhere residential, I could build something to hop on the wi-fi signals of all those home cameras that show the feed online. Those are much less protected.”

From her side, Beverly tapped her nails along the table. “I take it you want me to be eyes in the sky?”

To Tori’s surprise, Lance shook his head. “Nothing as overt as a dragon flying around. We’d be leaning on you if anything physical came up. I’ve picked up some new bugs, and Warren’s got his own tricks, but neither of us can fight like Bahamut. If we need to substantially dissuade someone from heading in a direction, you’re our strongest bet.”

It was almost comical to hear that, given Lance’s sizable muscles and Beverly’s comparatively slender form. But he was right. When she turned into that green dragon, Beverly became big, tough, and downright deadly. One good thing about being in a guild of villains: none of them held prideful delusions about their strength. Everyone in this room knew they weren’t the best, or the most powerful. It was an impossible fantasy, given the councilors who ruled this organization. Some were wounded by that fact, others grew from it. Judging by the team he was building, Lance appeared to be in the latter camp.

“Hate to be pushy, but the timeframe is a big one for me. I’ve got more than a few eyes in my direction, not to mention some Tori commitments that I can’t let Hephaestus overtake. It would be suspicious.” Also, Tori was fairly sure if she tried to double-book a Starscouts meeting, Ivan would have other ideas.

“I figured,” Lance replied. “That’s why I called the meeting today, as a matter of fact; an operational date was only determined last night. It’s supposed to go down this weekend, on Saturday evening. We'll be in a modest city named Ebnerville. The operation won't be near civilians, but since we're a far perimeter team, we might be—I'll look into that for you, Tori. Our job is to watch for intruders and capes, keeping them away at all costs."

What Tori found most fascinating about the situation were all the elements they weren't being given. Limited information, tightly controlled area, weight put largely on keeping anyone who wasn't supposed to be there away. There were probably a great many reasons the guild could have for setting up these sorts of situations, yet there was only one that Tori had already born witness to. A code enforcement—which was a nice way to say brutal execution—would demand that sort of security. Based on how the one she'd seen had gone, it would be over in no time, and they could be on their way. That had been Ivan, though. No telling who was running this one, or who they were up against. Definitely still some risk, even if it was risk that could be mitigated.

"Timing should be clear—easy enough to slip away on a Saturday. We haven't gotten to the real heart of the matter, however." Tori leaned in, making no efforts to conceal the greed in her eyes. Such pretense had no place in these halls. "How much does it pay?"

"Ten thousand per person, with an expectation of roughly four hours' work." He'd been ready for that, and appeared to take some joy in the momentary widening of Tori's eyes.

Sure, that was a lot less than they'd made on the museum heist, but they'd also been doing all the planning and had borne the entirety of the risk. To be paid that much for a simple lookout role... Tori felt her suspicions of the true job dial up, but ten grand was nothing to sneeze at. Especially if she could start picking up more of these gigs, the way Warren and Lance were. Beyond that, though, part of Tori simply wanted to grasp at the chance to wear her suit again. She'd put in so much work and had barely gotten to take it out from the garage. She liked being Hephaestus, and this was as fine an excuse as any.

"Count me in. Advertising revenue online isn't what it used to be," Beverly said.

"I'll need to double-check my schedule, but short of a conflict, you can expect me to show up." Even as she agreed, Tori thought about Ivan's meeting, the one he'd been in no hurry to get to. Given the job she'd just heard pitched, part of her wondered if Ivan was getting the other half of the operation explained to him at that very moment.

In truth, Ivan had gotten the details corresponding to Tori's task in the first five minutes of the meeting's start. It was more a footnote to him than a matter of primary concern. That might have changed, had he known his former apprentice intended to be part of the lookout team; however, the councilors had more vital matters to deal with.

All seven were gathered, staring at a hologram in the center of the table. The details were grainy, but one thing was clear. The objects depicted were vast, and numerous.

"I'll be the asshole," Morgana announced, seemingly apropos of nothing. "Wade, are you completely sure about this? It's hard to believe something so huge could be coming and we've yet to hear a blip from the AHC."

"A reasonable, if slightly wounding, concern." Wade was unbothered by the doubt. It was almost tradition for someone to ask such a question at this point in the situational breakdown, hence Morgana's vulgar declaration. "But yes, I am extremely certain. Many years back, after someone had an extraterrestrial encounter—" Wade paused to fire a pointed look in Ivan's direction "—I took the time to place surveillance stations and satellites in deep space. Professor Quantum never saw the same need that I did for such expansive early warning systems. That's also why the image is so bad; the tech is decades out of date. Regardless, yes, I am confident in this. My best guess is that, within a week, the AHC will know as well."

"That doesn't leave very long for the capes to prepare before they arrive." Stasis, for a change, was engaged in the discussion. Even to her, potential alien invaders held the spark of novelty. "Sneak attack?"

A loud clang echoed as Xelas dropped her arm to the table, looking up to the ceiling; perhaps lost in thought, perhaps scanning the skies. "It would have to be, after what the Grzzniltan ship saw. Except, that's what's bugging me. They got a good look at the AHC on full display. Outside of us, what whacko sees power like that and starts spoiling for a fight? Is it possible these beings are stronger?"

The universe was a vast place, and theirs was only a single planet among countless. It would be ridiculous to assume that the strongest of Earth was also the strongest across the entire galaxy.

Fortunately, they didn't have to rely on assumptions. With a neutral tone, Ivan rattled off the information. "To the best we've discerned, Earth is one of the more powerful planets among those with spacefaring intelligent life. Likely due to our tremendous concentration of meta-humans, as well as our own fundamental instincts toward combat. I once had occasion to compete in something of a gladiatorial event on an alien spacecraft, and they were not prepared to face Fornax's might."

"Space tournament? That sounds fun!" Xelas cried. "I can't believe you didn't invite us. So greedy. You'd probably still have won."

Ivan shook his head. "It was well before the guild, and I didn't win. Nobody did, technically. Things got... complicated."

Before they got too far down that tangent, Wade brought everyone's attention back to the front. "Our larger concern is the planet's future, not Ivan's past. As this is a threat that represents the potential to impact the guild, as well as our individual holdings and families, a response is necessary. We could theoretically kick this information over to the AHC, giving them extra time to prepare and buying some goodwill in the process."

It was Gork, who rarely spoke, who cut the idea off at the knees. "No. They came for us in our home. They dragged us into the streets. They wanted to do it alone. Let them."

There came a murmur of agreement from nearly every mouth, with two notable exceptions. Still, the consensus was clear, so Wade didn't waste the time calling for a vote. Better to keep the momentum going while they had it.

"Very well. That means we'll need to set to work on the other options: how are we going to protect what's ours? Because whoever sent an alien armada our way is playing a complicated game, and I'm certain we've yet to see all the pieces."

"I hate these sorts of overly complicated schemes. If that's how they want to do it, then let's go with my favorite counter." There was an unexpected darkness to Arcanicus as he rose from his chair. Time had stolen much of his aggression, yet under the surface, there still simmered enough rage to remind those watching of how he'd come to join the guild in the first place. An invasion of the planet was an invasion of the guild's territory, and that had managed to stir a touch of the older man's wrath.

“Let's incinerate the entire game board.”

---

Chapter 55

---

If there was one upside to confronting his father—and at this point, even that seemed like a stretch—it was that looking at pictures of the beach had stopped causing such pronounced reactions in Rick. He was no longer at odds with his own mind, groping for memories that weren't where they were supposed to be. Now that he understood, the fits of panic had faded. Unfortunately, what they'd left in their place was a constant boulder of dread in his stomach.

Clicking about, he opened yet another tab, evaluating a potential meta-human from history to see if his dad fit the bill. There was no reason for this. Ivan had been clear that when Rick was ready to ask, he would answer. But it was still insane to picture, his father butchering people. An army, at that. They must have been fairly weak for him to take out that many. If Ivan had ever been a major bad guy, then the AHC would have locked him up. Wouldn't they?

Fleeting, Rick's mind flashed to the guild of villains that had been revealed last year. He nearly skimmed right past the notion, as he had several times already. It was just a step too far. His dad hiding his past was one thing; an entire secret life felt like a flight of fancy.

Except... now that Rick was in the right headspace, he thought back to the metal-armored person who saved him and Beth when their school was attacked. That suit sure hadn't looked like it was designed by a cape, and Rick had yet to catch sight of it anywhere since, even online.

Was it possible their dad had sent a fellow villain out to protect his kids? That begged the question, though, why not come himself if he knew there was danger? Distance, most likely, although something about that still felt off. The kind of man who kills an army for threatening his family didn't mesh with someone who'd trust someone else to protect his kids during a riot. Rick was sure there was a reason, if his hunch was right, he just wasn't certain he'd want to know what it was.

That was the dilemma set before him. Learning that one little bit about Ivan had rocked Rick to his foundation, and all signs indicated there was a lot more to hear. His curiosity had been sated: he knew he wasn't crazy. If there was a point to walk away, this was it. This was the best opportunity he had to preserve his relationship with his father as it stood. One story had changed everything; there was truly no guessing how Rick would feel once he knew it all.

A knock on his door was followed by five seconds of courtesy waiting—he was a teenage boy with a computer—followed by Janet slowly easing the door open. “Came to see if you needed anything. You’ve been locked up for a while.”

Things had been strained since the revelation. Knowing what Ivan had done also entailed learning about his mother's complicity. Rick's initial impulse was to send her away, just like he'd been doing so far. Only this time, her timing was better. She'd caught him in a state of uncertainty, where getting guidance mattered more than holding his grudge.

“Are you a meta-human, too?” Rick looked to her, away from the screen—the first time he'd made such a concession in several days.

Quietly, Janet shut the door behind her, even though Juan was getting dinner and Beth was still on her field trip. “No. Never have been, and never especially felt the urge to change that. Powers make things more complicated.”

“So, our family smarts...”

“Just a lot of academics falling in love, along with growing up in an environment that emphasized learning,” Janet assured him.

Rick snorted at that, then looked embarrassed, before remembering he was supposed to be stern. “You sure broke that cycle with Dad.” Ivan was not an especially dumb man, but he'd never held the same passion for sciences and learning that captivated most of the family.

For a moment, Janet almost tried to deny the assessment, before merely sighing with a shake of her head. “I was at a rebellious point in my life, and I wanted to meet people other than lifelong devotees of education. Your father... well, he was unlike anyone I'd ever met before. Willful, unyielding, full of pride that had been hard earned."

"Not to mention, a killer."

The past faded from Janet's eyes as she snapped her head up. "A protector."

"He told me he slaughtered an army."

"Ivan would butcher an entire planet if they collectively threatened you or Beth. It's one of the traits I most respect in him." There was a hardness in his mother's face that Rick hadn't been prepared for. Deep down, he'd wondered how she could have gone along with this, speculating that perhaps she'd been kept partially in the dark. With that expression, all deniability was gone. She'd known exactly who he was.

"You don't... that's a bad thing, Mom. He shouldn't be that eager to kill."

This time, her face softened slightly. Her hand twitched, like she was tempted to reach out and offer comfort but feared it would be refused.

"Rick, your father took no joy in that day. Given the chance, I sincerely think he would live the rest of his life in peace. But when someone comes to do harm to your children, as a parent, you fight them with every ounce of strength in your body. Ivan's strength just happens to be higher than most fathers'."

That was a hard one to debate, and a point Rick's own mind had been raising. Awful as the image of his dad killing an army was, what was the better option? Letting them storm the shores, hurting innocent people in the process, permitting harm to come to his own family? Would Rick have respected those choices more? Even capes occasionally took lives in battle, albeit as a last resort.

Instead, Rick turned his attention to another matter. One that had haunted him in various forms for years now and had rediscovered a new form to take with Ivan's revelation. "Is this the reason you got divorced? I did the math. Less than a year after the incident happened, you filed for separation."

For the first time, Janet looked away. It took her a moment to compose herself, but when she turned back to Rick, she looked the same as ever—which might actually be more worrying in a way, had Rick been given time to properly consider it.

“No, seeing Ivan kill that army wasn’t what drove us apart. Your father didn’t lie to me. I knew who he was when we said our vows. He’s the same man, the same dad, he’s been all your life. Only now, you’re learning he’s also more.” Janet paused, deciding that this was as opportune a moment as she’d get. “Have you given any more thought to this weekend?”

“Still... deciding,” Rick admitted, not quite meeting her eye. This weekend was supposed to be spent at his dad’s house. The question was whether or not Rick actually wanted to go. Skips and trades happened; there were plenty of excuses he could use that Beth would buy. Ivan, on the other hand, would know.

Janet got up, smoothing over the section of bed where she’d perched. “Take your time. You know your room there is always open when you’re ready.” She retreated to the hallway quickly, content to take her victory of a short conversation before things turned south.

Because, while Rick didn’t know it, he’d been sniffing around a major sore spot, one that Janet wasn’t sure she could hold her composure through. Ivan killing the army hadn’t changed things between them; that much was true. She’d known her husband’s true power and identity, and certainly didn’t disagree with him killing to protect their family.

It was what had come next that had caused the problem. With an invading army reported and Fornax in combat, there was no surprise that she’d been called. In less than five minutes after the army was gone, Lodestar arrived, bursting onto the scene in a shower of sand and golden light. Such a simple moment, and yet, it had been the beginning of the end for their marriage.

That was the day Janet realized that no matter how devoted a husband he might be, Ivan would never truly love her. Not when his heart so clearly belonged to someone else.

“For the record, this is bullshit.”

“No, Presto. This is a favor that is being done for us, and if you can’t keep a civil tongue through it, then you can go back to the AHC for training.” Agent Quantum was sterner than usual. Generally, he tended to ignore Presto's running chatter on the channels. Everyone was a little tense tonight, given the situation.

Perched up on a rooftop, the New Science Sentries watched as Hat Trick threw a multicolored scarf from her sleeve onto a mugger's gun, wrapping up the entire thing. He fired, producing a muffled gunshot from within the cloth, followed by a brief yelp of pain. In the time he'd been distracted, Cyber Geek had dashed over, hitting him with a giant blue mallet that caused cartoon sound effects while also knocking the target unconscious.

"Handy trick. Not so easy to do when you're using real punches," Tachyonic muttered. He shut himself up after a quick nudge from Agent Quantum. This was a hard enough sell for the team; having the second-in-command question the move would only make things worse. "At least Medley is handling it our way."

That was true, in the sense that Medley was engaged in melee combat with two more muggers—one human, and one with long, whip-like appendages growing from his arms. Every time the whips landed, they eroded whatever they touched, from concrete to Medley's scales. He'd been dipping in and out of battle, holding both of his antagonists' attention. Just as the whip-man came in for an attack, Medley jumped to the side, revealing Cold Shoulder with a hefty blast of chill. The whips and the man wielding them were encased in instant ice, though the sections around the whip-appendages immediately started to liquefy.

The mugger made a dash, but Medley was already on him, and this time he wasn't playing the distraction. A quick blow to the leg took the man out, after which Medley patted him down for weapons, producing a well-used knife and a gun that appeared to have never been fired.

"I don't get it. They beat up a bunch of muggers. We've done that." Unlike the other two, Plasmodia sounded more confused than bothered by the scenario, though she'd slipped plenty of the latter feeling in there, too. "What are we supposed to be taking from this?"

"It's the first job, of the first night," Agent Quantum reminded her. "We're going to shadow them for a full week. Keep an open mind."

"Since our fearless leader says to be on board, I guess I'll point out one difference in their approach. Have you all noticed the injury count?" Presto pointed to the criminals who were being tied up. Cyber Geek had pulled out a gun that shot freezing energy and was keeping the whip-man iced until transportation could arrive. “The worst one of the lot is that guy who fired the gun, which was his own fault for shooting in that situation. Based on our stats, we’d have broken around three bones, and needed medical attention for at least one.”

Sometimes, it was dangerously easy to forget that, under all the bullshit, Ike had an incredibly capable mind. Plasmodia pivoted her head, eyes half-crossed as she did her own mental math. “Are you sure about that?”

“Absolutely. It’s in the nature of our tactics. Professor Quantum taught us to go for the takedown if the threat is real; the less the enemy rampages, the fewer civilians can be caught in the crossfire.”

That did make sense, from Agent Quantum’s point of view. Trouble was, the more they stuck to those methods, the more things went awry. If hitting softer was one of the differences between Cyber Geek’s team and the New Science Sentries, then Agent Quantum needed to understand how that factored in. That might not be the right tactic for his people, but he couldn’t make the call appropriately until he understood why it mattered.

Agent Quantum just hoped he could convince the team to keep going along with it. They still had quite a lot of week left to get through.

On another building, a different shape watched the same show. This was no great, major event, but every now and then, things took a wild turn. Nexus wasn’t expecting much. This was more him monitoring to track how things were shaping up. Seeing Cyber Geek helping the New Science Sentries filled him with great joy, simple a moment as it appeared. That didn’t always happen; in plenty of versions, pride proved too great a hurdle.

Nexus did love when they went this way, however. It opened up new potentials, ones that few worlds ever got to catch even the barest glimpses of. For the upcoming show, it had the potential to add several unexpected layers. He was so excited, he could hardly wait. But wait he would, as the event’s kickoff was still plodding along through space, dragging their unseen secret weapon with them.

He smiled as he looked down to the street, where all three criminals had been so expertly captured. While there might be some time left before the main event, he luckily had a few warm-up bouts to sustain him. One of which should be coming very soon, assuming this world paced with those similar. The potential for surprise was why Nexus kept coming back, even though he knew the beats by heart.

There was always a chance that this time could be different, a truth he found infinitely amusing.

---

Chapter 56

---

“Tori, grab the glitter before it falls off the table. Newton, watch out, you nearly hit Trudy’s glue. Ivan, any ETA on that next round of snacks?”

Helen stood in the middle of the storm, directing children and staff alike as they zipped around working on their banner for next week’s End of Summer Shindig. Soon, all of them would be gathered with the rest of the local clusters for several days of camping, activities, competition, and general fun. It was the year’s big kickoff, a way to ease the blow of summer’s end for the kids coping with a return to school. Preparations had been underway while Tori was busy being kidnapped, but it was clear her absence had caused little to no impact with Helen at the wheel. More impressive was that Helen was never harsh or demanding with the kids: only firm, supportive, and shockingly patient. Ivan had really lucked out when they paired him up.

Not that he was having trouble blending in. As Ivan made his way in from the kitchen, a bevy of toasted mini-sandwiches and homemade tiny pizzas stacked upon a tray in his hands, Tori could have easily pictured him wandering into one of her own childhood meetings. He would have fit in perfectly. Huge purple oven mitts that he didn’t even need, a borrowed apron, and a mildly uncertain expression, he looked like pretty much every dad she’d ever seen roped into pitching in—except, he was happy to be there. Well, he seemed happy if one knew how to read Ivan’s stalwart nature.

Across the table, Beth was hunched over, deep in concentration as she scrawled bubble lettering, attempting to capture the entire cluster’s roster in her fanciest handwriting. As one of the older kids present, it had fallen to her to handle such a delicate task. So far, there had been no flare-ups or issues with those silver blades, and if Tori didn't know better, she'd have had no idea Beth was a meta-human. Tori wondered, aware that she could probably never ask, how much of Beth's control was inherent, versus trained. Was it possible Ivan had been giving Beth side-instruction, or were the AHC's new programs for helping non-apes control their powers really that good? It was an issue to keep in mind—that pool could be used for recruitment with minimal effort. After all, who was going to say no if someone like Professor Quantum or Lodestar told a new meta they had the makings of a superhero?

Beth, hopefully—not that Tori imagined it would ever reach that point. Ivan would certainly step in long before his daughter went the path of the capes. Otherwise, the guild would end up having to add new rules to the code about keeping miles away from her any time she was in costume, lest they meet Fornax's wrath.

Tori forced her mind away from superheroes, centering on the night she was dealing with. It wasn't often she got to spend time on something entirely normal, and while the circumstances of getting here were undeniably meta-tinged, the nights themselves were completely mundane. She turned her attention to corralling the kids, aiming them as best she could back toward the various sections of the banner. There was an area near the top where Helen had the children with high energy shaking glitter cannisters all over the place—mercifully, she'd laid down plastic sheeting in advance. Sooner or later, even children could wear themselves out, and once they were tuckered Helen shifted them to a different activity.

Mallory was working on making lists of supplies they would need, taking it a step further to create customized checklists for each of her peers, complete with bright marker-colored boxes to cross off. When they could pry Loyce away from the snack trays, she was aiding Trudy with making the campground decorations. Considering that the materials for these were of the craft paper and popsicle stick variety, they were crafting some surprisingly substantial displays. Caden, meanwhile, was laying out the supplies for a paper mâché project, though Tori noticed him getting restless. With a quick check on Newton, who was losing steam on the glitter cannisters, and a look to Helen for confirmation, she decided it was time for a change-out.

When Tori brought Caden over, Helen was waiting, glitter can at the ready as she slapped it into Caden's hands. A child with a chance to make a mess needs little direction; without a word, Caden had joined the others, jumping and shaking the can of sparkles with all his tiny might. Helen took a few steps away, dodging Newton as he bolted across the room to take over on paper mâché; though, if she was hoping to spare her outfit from rogue shimmer, that battle was long since lost.

"Holding up okay? Need anything?" The words were carefully whispered, and never broke the happy grin on Helen's face that was turned toward the kids. It wasn't the first time she'd checked in on Tori that night, but she also hadn't been excessive about it.

"I'm fine, really. Although kidnappings are not my favorite activity, it's not like I haven't already been through some rough spots. Office attack, club attack, nearly getting crushed in the street—that's just life in Ridge City, you know?"

Helen nodded; however, there was an expression on her face that Tori couldn't quite place. Concern, probably, though if she hadn't known better, she'd have thought it was edging over into guilt. "You are unquestionably a tough, capable person, but even those types have to let it out sometimes. If you ever need help, please don't be afraid to ask."

Much as Tori would have liked to callously brush the whole thing aside and put the idea to bed, she couldn't exactly be rude to Ivan's friend, especially one who was helping out so much with the cluster. Past that, there was something sincere about Helen, in a way that itched Tori's brain yet she couldn't quite put a finger on. Whatever it was, it turned lines that should have sounded like hollow pleasantries into genuine care. Even for Tori, it was hard to be shitty when she believed someone was truly trying to make things better.

"Thanks. Not sure I'll take you up on that, but the sentiment is appreciated."

"All I can do is offer." Helen's face suddenly twisted in worry as she darted into the fray. "One sandwich at a time, Loyce! Just because they're small doesn't mean you can't choke on them."

Emory was dripping in sweat as the last of the machines slipped back into the wall. Overhead, the large clock had reached zero, meaning he was finally permitted a few moments to rest. Near collapsing, he grabbed a bottle of water from the small cubby built into the wall by the door. It was one of the only places in this chamber that wouldn't be in peril, mostly by virtue of sliding behind an armored wall when the clock started. Slamming the liquid as fast as he could, Emory tried to catch his breath at the same time. It seemed a fool's errand, but after over a week of this, he was nearly getting it down.

"Very nice." Xelas's voice echoed through the room, coming from unseen speakers woven through the design. "A few more like that, and we'll be ready to step you up a notch."

In the beginning, Emory had argued. He'd complained, asking why he needed to fight these mechanical opponents, overcome these painful, yet not lethal, traps. For a long time, Xelas had said nothing. It was only a few days prior that he'd finally been given an answer. The words rang in his head as he guzzled the water. They'd been haunting him ever since, seeping all the way down to his bones.

"Why the training?" It was the first time he'd seen her turn serious, a sharp indicator of what was to come. "Because your power isn't all that impressive, and I don't want you to die right out of the gate. I want you to be skilled enough to survive for a full year. But if you don't want that, we can call it anytime you like."

Emory yearned to reject that idea, yet he couldn't. The fate of his gang was proof that there were leagues far greater than the one he'd been playing in, and now, he was around meta-humans using an entirely different scale of power. If there was one lesson Emory had taken from his gang's slaughter, it was that death came swift and without warning. The only ones who'd walked away that night were the powerful ones, like Xelas.

If Emory wanted to live, to survive, perhaps one day even to thrive in their world, then he needed to be stronger. Meeting Xelas's standards was the first step, with untold more to come. Polishing off the rest of his water, Emory placed the bottle back into the cubby, then nodded up at the clock.

"Ready for another round."

Xelas was almost purring this time. "You know, I really didn't expect to enjoy having a pet this much, but that attitude does make it fun. Very well, my little apprentice. Ask, and you shall receive."

“Okay, you’ve been staring at your phone for a full five minutes now. Everyone okay, or did you find the mother of all entrancing gifs?”

The words yanked Beverly from her fugue. Chloe was right, she had indeed been lost in thought for some time. Together, they were sitting on the couch while an old episode of The Meta Bunch ran, Chloe researching some new coffee preparation technique they were trying in gastropubs while Beverly had intended to catch up on email. That plan had fallen apart when she hit the first one waiting for her, however. Tori would have been the preferable one to discuss the issue with, but it wasn’t as though this connected to anything directly villain-related.

“I got an email from my oldest brother,” Beverly explained. “He’s reaching out to see if I want to come by the house for a visit.”

Chloe perked up, showing new interest in her friend’s distraction. “I’ve been curious. You always talk about your family like you’re close, but I’ve never seen you visit or take a call from them.”

The truth was, Beverly considered herself very close with her family. They’d always been a unit, a team, and unfortunately, those instincts had been in full effect when she first became Bahamut. “We had something of a falling out, the night I got my powers. You have to understand, pretty much my entire family was in the service, mostly Marines. It’s a tradition that goes back generations. Before Lodestar changed the nature of war, they had plenty of chances to see traditional combat, to develop certain habits. So when a green monster suddenly burst into their home, roaring and destroying whatever it touched, they responded the way you’d expect from trained soldiers.”

“They attacked you.” Chloe could be more perceptive than her overall demeanor let on, and Beverly was glad for it. That saved her trouble of walking her all the way to the proper conclusion, even if there was still more story to tell.

“I get it, from their perspective. All they heard was my scream, a roar, and then some monster runs down the stairs. Easy to assume it’s a meta-intruder that just attacked Beverly. They opened fire on me, almost without hesitation. But I didn’t know I was bulletproof in green dragon form back then, so I was terrified. I tried to escape, except they were positioned in front of the exits in case of retreat, and I ended up slamming through several in my scramble to get away from the bullets—before I understood, or could control my strength, mind you. I think a few of them are still wearing casts. Thank goodness no one was permanently injured.”

No matter how tight-knit a family might be, attempted murder was a tough hurdle to get past. Beverly could still see her own kin turning their weapons on her, the killing intent clear in their eyes, just as she could still feel the crunch of their bones as she tried to sweep them aside. Time and distance had been the appropriate salve for the wound as Beverly gained control and her family healed. But she was long past accidental transformations, and it sounded as though there was only so much physical mending left to do on their end. If the wound between her and her family wasn’t patched soon, it threatened to become a scar, the sort that could never fully heal.

“Your brother wants to make amends. That’s something,” Chloe pointed out.

It was something, that was true. Beverly just wasn’t sure it was enough. If she went before everyone was ready, it could make things worse. Ambrose was the peacemaker of the group; as the oldest child, he often ended up as the default referee on disagreements. Him being ready to talk wasn’t the same as the whole family being in a good headspace.

She wouldn’t get anywhere by sitting around speculating, though. Beverly began to type, her mind now set. “I think I’ll meet with just Ambrose for now, get a feel in person for how the family is holding up.”

“If you need a public spot with some privacy, I can let you use one of the Ridge City Grinders rooms that people rent out for meetings. Haven’t exactly been slammed on that front since the riots, anyway.”

“Thanks. I might take you up on that.” Beverly’s hands continued to move, albeit with a slight touch of hesitation. She might have no problem diving headfirst into deadly battle, but dealing with family was a far more perilous undertaking.

---

Chapter 57

---

Saturday marked two major moments for Tori. The second would come much later, but the first happened quite early. Somewhere around four in the morning, Tori conducted her first fully successful test of the miniature aerosolized dispersion device. Getting the nozzle angles perfect proved to be a surprisingly tough part, as it demanded precise calculation to ensure the solution would spray only away from the user. The formula had also required a dash of fine-tuning. Its original incarnation could burn skin if the mix was even the slightest bit off. By altering a few ratios, Tori managed to produce something that was incredibly annoying, distracting, even painful, but that wouldn't cause any lasting damage. That she knew of, anyway. Probably have to run that part by Wade for testing.

It felt good to have the task cleared off her plate, but Tori didn't kick back with a cold one and relax at the accomplishment. Instead, she shifted gears to her other project of the week: fine-tuning the Hephaestus suit for the evening's activities. Tori's key goal was to recalibrate the mini-gravitational anomaly generators until the suit felt like moving in her own body. It was more efficient to shift the suit's movements than it was to relearn all of her tactics in a heavier form. The less difference there was, the more fluid she could be as Hephaestus.

That shouldn't matter, in theory, when Tori took the suit out later on. They were only working guard duty. She didn't even have any cameras to hack, as it turned out. All she needed to do was have her sensors engaged and keep scanning. Lance's bugs would be more than enough deterrent for any non-meta, plus Warren was setting up a few glyphs around the area in advance. Beverly was the muscle, leaving Tori to handle long-distance perimeter sweeps.

That was what she kept telling herself, even as she made sure the suit's weapons systems were all showing full functionality. Whether the night would actually prove to be peaceful or not, Tori had her doubts. Every time she put that suit on, she was stepping into another world, a world where things could go very sideways, very fast. The wrong meta in the wrong place, and who knew what might happen. That was why she had to be prepared for any outcome, no matter the mission. Even as a simple lookout, Hephaestus would be ready.

Until then, there was refining to do. The job wasn't until night, which offered a much-needed opportunity for some napping. She could also show Beverly the completed prototype, once her friend was up for the day. Tori had managed to cram her Saturday quite full of activity, a not-so-subtle tactic of staying busy to keep her mind off other concerns. The habit might not be all that healthy, but it did help make her exceptionally productive, so Tori could live with the tradeoff. As Hephaestus, with almost all of her abilities tied into the suit, being a perfectionist workaholic was more likely to increase her lifespan than lessen it.

It certainly wasn't as if having fully optimized beam weapons would make her a worse scout, after all. Just one with more options.

The sounds of the footsteps were heavy, despite the carpeting. Ivan listened as they came, hearing both the current sounds and the countless other versions echoing from throughout the years. He could remember those footsteps when they first began, so unsure and wobbling. Then came the faster, more dangerous footsteps, careening around as stability was learned. From there, they mostly just got bigger and louder, with a few particularly happy events bringing them back to that frantic, unsure pace. Today, they sounded especially firm, like a man marching down to face judgment.

Rick emerged from the stairwell of the townhome, walking into the kitchen where Ivan was already working on a skillet full of eggs. He'd been up prepping for an hour already; Tori wasn't the only one who liked to keep busy when she felt nervous.

Sliding up to the breakfast bar, Rick sat in one of stools, looking at his father with slightly bleary eyes. There hadn't been much chance to talk the night before. Since he and Beth were dropped off together, they couldn't very well dig into the issue of Ivan's past. Neither had said anything on the matter, in fact. For a time, Ivan almost convinced himself that Rick was content to let the issue momentarily rest. Now, seeing his teenage son up just before dawn, Ivan realized that this had been his plan from the start. Rise early—the time when Beth was sleeping and Ivan was making breakfast.

“Where did you learn to cook?” Rick's tongue was still slightly weighed down by sleep, but he was fast shaking it off with the energy that only youth, and a few meta-made compositions, could provide.

“Largely self-taught, with various books and videos to help along the way.” Ivan weighed how much honesty he should divulge. Technically, Rick hadn't asked specifically about the life he'd kept hidden. Then again, should he have to? So long as Ivan stayed away from the more troubling topics, there was no reason not to shoot straight wherever possible. “I didn't have a lot of pleasures growing up. Food was one of the few things to enjoy. Once I got older, it became an interest and a hobby, something I could do that was... creative.” Ivan had almost said “non-destructive,” which was also true, just not where he wanted to aim the conversation so soon.

Rick let out a soft groan and wiped his face, clearing some sleep from his eyes. “Well, you managed to make breakfast sound cryptic, so I guess we should just get right into this.” Before he could continue, Ivan set a glass of orange juice in front of him, then motioned for Rick to go on.

“I've had some time to think about what you told me. The army, the beach, you being a meta-human... and that part, I can make peace with. Mom had your back, you know. She told me that you only did all that because they threatened us. I still don't know if wholesale slaughter was the right course in that situation, but I also get it. You were protecting your family, and in the end, since you weren't even charged with a crime, it seems strange to hold that incident against you.”

It was good news, and had the delivery not come laced with several qualifiers, Ivan might have felt a rush of hope in his chest. Sadly, it was all too clear that Rick wasn't done yet, so Ivan merely continued to cook the eggs, giving his son room to find the words.

“What bothers me is this: I know that’s not everything. If you’re fish-army-killing strong, then there’s basically zero chance that you’re some no-name meta. You have a past, a history that goes well beyond that day on the beach, and I’m guessing most of it has less noble goals than protecting your family.”

“I made a promise.” The words leapt out of Ivan’s mouth from old, nearly forgotten habit. How many times had he spit out that phrase in the face of capes, criminals, and victims alike? How many deaths because of a single vow? “Yes, Rick, I did bad things. Killed, hurt—fill in the blanks. If you want to know why, it’s because I promised vengeance to someone who was truly owed it. Some of the deeds I did in service of that goal, others to survive or gain resources, but it always went back to that promise. I’ll give you the specifics, if you want them, just be warned that we’ll be diving into one of the darkest parts of my history.”

Shaking his head, Rick downed a quarter of the juice in a single gulp. Ivan slipped the first batch of eggs, scrambled just the way he liked, onto Rick’s plate while the drink was in motion: the seamless coordination of a dad who’d cooked untold meals, while also hiding a murderous secret.

“Let’s not go that deep to start. What I was going to say is that, while not all of it could have been about protecting us, I don’t think you’d hurt people without reason. For now, I’m okay with keeping some things a mystery. There’s just a few big-ticket concerns I wanted to get out of my head.”

Still dangerous territory, though Ivan much preferred general to specific, in regards to his past. Turning his attention to the pancake batter, Ivan hoped he wasn’t about to make a major mistake. “Ask away.”

“Have you ever hurt anyone who didn’t deserve it?”

“Unquestionably, yes,” Ivan replied, no hesitation whatsoever. This was a question he’d been expecting in some form or another and had already planned out a truthful response. “Even excluding the circumstances of my own brutal upbringing, metas often work in gangs or syndicates, the more powerful ones forcing their will upon the weaker members, turning them into pawns. Pawns tend to get cut down, and I can’t expect that all of them deserved it. But that’s also the nature of combat. Step onto a battlefield, and it’s no longer about who deserves what—only those who live, and those who don’t. Outside of that, I can only say that I’ve never struck without cause. How deserving they were from there is a case-by-case question.”

Rick's eyes were wide, yet he was managing to stay composed. He'd certainly come in better prepared for the conversation this time around. After a few seconds, the shock seeped away from his face. "I guess that's fair. Even in the beach example, you couldn't have known the morality of every member of that army. It's not like you killed a superhero."

Without warning, Ivan found himself at a precipice. Two paths lay before him, truth or falsehood. It would be very easy to lie right now, to put his son's mind to rest and let the matter end. The problem was, if Rick ever found out Ivan's identity, the lie would be obvious. Fornax killing a cape was what had finally caused his and Lodestar's last real fight, and his eventual incarceration. It was a well-known piece of trivia, one that Rick would be sure to pick up. Lying when they were young had been the right call—Ivan still had no doubt of that—but he'd told Rick that they were past that phase. Another fib, and whatever they built from here would always have the potential to be destroyed at the foundation.

"Superheroes go bad sometimes. Jokull, the Silent Server, Faithful, Candlebop—all former beloved capes who turned down a dark path. That's not even including the ones like Apollo, who abused their position to try manipulating the law. I've never struck without cause. Perhaps it's best if we leave that point there."

This time, the shock didn't fade so quickly. Rick chewed on a bite of eggs to the point where there had to be nothing but largely liquid left—either processing or plotting how to run for the door, Ivan wasn't fully sure which.

"Since you mentioned Apollo, there is the matter of that guild he exposed." Rick was going slow, visibly building up his courage. "I didn't think there was any chance you could have been part of that, even knowing about the beach. But the more you talk, the deeper I'm realizing this goes. Were you one of them, pouring out of that building, fighting in the streets?"

Though he couldn't have known it, Rick left quite a large loophole for his father to exploit in that question. Ivan was sorely tempted by it, even knowing how important the truth was at this juncture. It wouldn't be worth it in the long run; however, this did offer a bit of wiggle room in regards to how specific he had to get with the response.

Ivan spooned pancake batter into the sizzling pans, hisses and pops peppering the spaces between his words. "I was not in that crowd, but to answer your larger question: yes, I am affiliated with that guild. As much as it is a gathering of criminals, it's also a support group for those seeking to find a more mundane life... one that hasn't technically been charged with any crimes, I might add."

"Wow." Rick was past stunned, into near bewilderment. "That's... you're part of a guild of villains? What about the armored guy who saved me and Beth, you sent him?"

"No, I didn't," Ivan responded. "They learned about the danger to your school and came to help of their own accord. Because as much as it might seem like an assortment of monsters from the outside, there are people in that guild who I trust with my life. Friends who protected my family before I even knew they were in danger. So before you jump to conclusions about what that place is, keep in mind that when things went awry, my ally's first instinct was to save a school, not to run around pillaging."

With a clatter, Rick dropped his fork to the plate, eggs only half eaten. He stared down at them, trying to accept Ivan's words. "You trust a guild of villains... with your life. Do you get how insane that sounds from my side of the table? What about me and Beth, should we be making inroads with these people, too? Never know when we might need saving, and the Curdler is our only hope."

Sounds from overhead cut them both off. It seemed they'd gotten loud enough to raise Beth from her slumber. Once the smells hit, they wouldn't have much time left to talk openly. Ivan decided to finish things off with a quick piece of vital advice, one he'd be very grateful not to have to explain.

"You and Beth should be protected, but things do go wrong. If something ever happens to me, then don't bother with the guild. Get to the AHC or somewhere public—on TV, if you can manage it—and call for Lodestar."

"Because she'd just happen to be listening and choose to help us in that moment? She's not everywhere at once," Rick pointed out.

"Maybe not, but if I'm gone, then she's going to be looking for you both to make sure you're safe. I'm not only acquainted with villains, you know."

It was the first time all morning that Ivan had seen surprise that wasn't slightly terrified on Rick's face, and he did his best to memorize the expression. There probably wouldn't be many more like it to come if Rick kept asking questions. Eventually, they'd get to the truly horrifying stuff, and his son would never be able to look at him the same way again.

---

Chapter 58

---

The mood was tense as Morgana looked over the reports, her primary team gathered at her side. On her left stood Gork; to her right was Stasis, with the remainder of the room filled by the team leads who would be running their own units.

“Based on our intel, it looks like they haven’t moved much this week. If Endless Blitz knows we’re coming, he’s not tipping his hand.”

At Morgana’s words, a ripple went through the room. They’d hunted down most of the traitors to the guild—those who were not killed the day of the riots—but a few had managed to slip away. Endless Blitz, with his power of body duplication, had been a vital asset for Balaam’s attempted uprising. It was thanks to Endless Blitz that Balaam had appeared to have gathered so many forces early on, and that same power had made the man especially tough to capture. Thus far, they’d caught three duplicates posing as the real one. This time, they’d used new scanners and some fresh magical incantations to make as sure as possible that this was him. Vengeance was finally close at hand.

“One last review before we go,” Morgana announced. It would be overkill in most situations, but former guild members were special cases. “Remember, above all else, that this is not a normal code enforcement. Endless Blitz was one of us. That means, along with being strong enough to make the cut, he knows our tricks, our tactics. He doesn’t want to die any more than the rest of us do, so we can be certain he’s laid every defense possible to hold us off. We can hate him all day, but don’t belittle the danger he presents.”

Locking eyes with each of her subordinates, Morgana made sure the point found its mark. Ego could be a danger in the field, especially when emotions ran this high. “Whisperwind, you and the magic users are going in first. Mark the real Endless Blitz, then thin out the clones so they can’t confuse us. As soon as you act, Onslaught’s team rolls in to push over whatever goons he’s got surrounding him. Horrorsaurus, your team roams the exits, making sure nobody slips away and tracking them down if they do. Gork, Stasis, and I will come through once the initial strike is made to cleave what remains. Be ready to change and adapt as needed; we can’t take anything as certain when facing off with one of our own.”

“Any risk of capes?” Whisperwind was a slender woman with a soft demeanor, yet her voice carried well every time she chose to speak.

“With as many lookout teams as we’ve got stationed, there better not be,” Stasis said. “The fewer bodies to keep track of, the more likely we are to get him this time, so we’ve got three separate lines of security. Short of the major players, if one does wander by, we’ll at least have warning.”

Onslaught’s sizable form leaned down, a habit of trying to speak to others on roughly their same level. “At least it’s not a Ridge City base. Hiding all the way out in Ebnerville, he really didn’t want us to find him. Endless Blitz loved living in the big city.”

“The remote location and small amount of overall crime make it low priority for capes,” Morgana noted. “Which will aid our own efforts, as well. In a way, perhaps we should be thankful to Endless Blitz. It was so considerate of him to set the scene out where no one will hear his screams.”

The room nodded along with her, some even smiling at the sentiment. It was arguable how deep into true evil the various members of the guild fell, but there was certainly a moral gradient at play. On the subject of revenge, however, they were a far more unified group. This guild was more than just a loose association of crooks; it was a symbol of their collective power and pride—one that Endless Blitz had spit upon when he betrayed them, sealing his fate in the process. To wrong a villain was to court death.

To wrong a guild of them, well, that was essentially getting onto death’s lap and grinding hard. If Endless Blitz was so desperate to face his end, then as his former friends, they would oblige this final request.

Setting the controller down, Donald leaned back, the look of satisfaction on his face reflected back in the dark TV. The phantom Donald vanished as a fresh screen appeared, displaying the upgrade options he'd just unlocked. With planned ease, he checked off the selections, watching as the parts spun onto his digital jetpack, replacing the older versions to create a stable, quick flight system.

This was his secondary project of the week. The first, and far more taxing one, had been dealing with the New Science Sentries as his team's shadow. They were polite, thankfully, though he suspected that to be largely the product of Agent Quantum's influence. To their credit, the team did excellent work. There had been a few occasions where they'd needed the extra numbers to take a call, and things had gone smoothly overall. It had also been during those moments that Donald began to grow a hunch about the team's primary issue.

While he hadn't felt confident enough to voice the notion yet, there did seem to be a fundamental philosophical difference in the foundation of their training. Apollo, for all the bad he did, had taught new capes the AHC protocols, one of the most important of which was that the goal was saving civilians. Sometimes, that meant taking down the threat, but it could also mean getting people clear, or shielding them from fallout.

From what he'd seen of the New Science Sentries, their education appeared to focus on threat neutralization first and foremost. They came in swinging and didn't stop until everyone was down. It wasn't wrong, necessarily. Their team was still protecting people, helping to make the world better. Yet there was something about it that felt... wrong. Without being able to put a finger on why, Donald just knew that their apparent enthusiasm for combat left a bad taste in his mouth. He suspected that feeling to be a large part of why they weren't clicking in Ridge City. The people understood what standards capes were supposed to uphold and could tell when something was off. It wasn't so bad now that he'd talked with Agent Quantum and knew that they were trying to improve, but the rest of the world didn't have the benefit of that perspective.

They had been getting better: on Thursday's outing there'd only been one broken bone, and Agent Quantum had tried to take the mugger down less forcefully first. Still, Donald was glad they didn't have any actual patrols scheduled for that evening. He could use a break, and with his newest tool finally ready for testing, this was a perfect chance to go put it through its paces.

Scooping up his phone from the bed, Donald clicked on Ren's name, the number connecting quickly. "Hey. No, don't worry, no schedule change. We're still free today. That's why I was calling actually—you up for some fun tonight? I wanted to test out my jetpack. Oh hell no. Not in Ridge City; way too many tall buildings and other metas zipping around for a test flight. I was thinking somewhere more isolated, where I'd have room for mistakes."

Glancing down at the GPS on his phone, Donald scrolled over the map, hunting for a city big enough to explore, but without too many obstacles. "How about Ebnerville, up near the Canadian border? Pretty sure the AHC can jump us there, and I doubt there'll be much for me to hit, aside from trees. I'll double-check and let you know."

One press of the button, and the call was done. Donald zoomed in on the map, taking a closer look at his potential selection. While the notion had been spur of the moment, Ebnerville seemed as good an option as any. Testing the jetpack was what sincerely excited him. Making a mental note to go be sure they had viable transportation available, he turned his attention back to the screen and the newly completed item spinning around on the display.

Blue energy crackled along his fingertips as Donald reached for the code inside the computer resting in his skull. If he was taking it out for a test drive tonight, he'd best familiarize himself with the jetpack's controls.

With the hiss of a helmet locking into place, Tori vanished.

Hephaestus cycled through her various system startups, then took a tentative step forward. Not perfect—there was still a noticeable difference between moving like this versus on her own—but the gap was shrinking. A few more rounds of fine-tuning and she'd have it: fluid, seamless motion, like there was no extra weight on her at all. She could practically feel it. Those tuning rounds would have to wait for Tori, however, as Hephaestus had a full evening ahead.

Stepping out into the guild's hallway, she found Bahamut waiting; clad in her armored outfit and transformed to green dragon form. They fell into step alongside one another, heading toward the transportation chamber. While they could hop from the island to Ridge City using the installed gate, getting elsewhere still required special assistance. Whoever was putting this together had tapped the pair named Tunnel Vision to bring over all the teams. Theirs would be among the last to go out; the attacking units were already on the ground, getting prepared.

Arriving in the wide, open room with a vast, unmarked back wall, Hephaestus noted Pest Control in the corner, talking with Glyph. The former was clad in his almost beekeeper-like outfit, a costume with various metal rings adorning the exterior. As for Glyph, he'd made a few ensemble changes since they last saw him in costume. The cloak was traded for a stylized jacket, and his robe had been tailored up substantially to allow for easier movement. He still wielded the same wand, though Hephaestus couldn't fault him for that. Considering that the wand not only allowed him to draw his namesake symbols wherever they were needed but also stored a prepared glyph ready to be deployed, it was a crucial piece of his outfit. Even being a gift from Balaam, it was too useful a tool to discard, not something that could be easily cast aside out of mere dark sentiment.

At their arrival, Pest Control looked up, waving them over to join. "Good timing! Tunnel Vision finished the last team a few minutes ago, so we can go as soon as you're ready. Anyone have additional questions or issues to go over?" It had been a little odd, seeing Pest Control take the lead on this job, but he'd proven to be unexpectedly adept at it. Not the actual planning part so much—there had been a few key tweaks needed to his original layout—rather, Pest Control led well because he did a good job of taking input from others. When they brought up issues, they were dealt with, rather than brushed aside for not fitting Pest Control's vision. While Hephaestus was relatively new to all of this, Tori had witnessed far worse leadership styles than that.

"I feel solid." Hephaestus clanged her chest, producing a dense ring that briefly drifted through the air. The more she wore the suit, the more natural the movements felt. "Got my position and my job. Fly high, keep my profile low. Scan for any potential issues before they get close enough to surprise us."

“If they do get close and they’re human, leave them to me,” Pest Control reiterated. “Between my meta-insects and some entomological expeditions, I’ve got a bug for just about every problem. Every problem without special abilities, that is.”

The sound of scales scraping registered as Bahamut slammed a meaty fist into her open palm. Not even her size betrayed just how strong the dragon’s arms really were. Bahamut wasn’t nearly the mightiest of their guild, but her punches would hurt most opponents nevertheless. “Metas who get close, on the other hand, are for me and Glyph.”

“I do have a few new etchings I’m ready to try out.” Tapping his wand, a look dashed across Glyph’s face, one of sudden realization and swift embarrassment. “Almost forgot to tell you both. Just to be safe, I prepared an emergency escape spell as the symbol loaded in my wand. No way I want to get penned in like at the museum again. If anything gets too bad, group up around me when I give the signal.”

The sound of approach drew Hephaestus’s attention. She quickly realized the synchronized steps belonged to Tunnel Vision, a team of teleportation-empowered siblings. She was never quite sure which was which, or even if the names were meant to be separated. Since the two functioned in tandem, it was an academic concern. Nevertheless, her natural curiosity refused to let the point lay entirely.

In less than a minute, the pair had torn a hole through space itself, offering a portal that appeared to look out onto an old logging camp, one that had long ago been abandoned. Hephaestus knew the location already from Pest Control’s plan. This was their entry and exit point, a location far enough from the action to not be noticed, but close enough to run for if needed.

Together with her team, they stepped from the guild’s volcano lair into Ebnerville, site of what was supposed to be a few hours’ simple lookout work for a hefty payday. Hephaestus dialed up her scanners as they walked through, hunting for any single thing that would trip her suspicion. She might be a new villain, but had already seen enough to know few things ever went as easily as they were planned.

---

Chapter 59

---

Ebnerville was a city largely in a technical sense. There were adequate facilities and population to claim the title, but those from any actual metropolis would call the town a hamlet, at best. It favored sprawl more than height, meaning there weren't many tall buildings, and certainly no true skyscrapers for Cyber Geek to avoid as he banked hard to the left, gaining a feel for the turn radius he was working with. There would be ways to refine the jetpack further—he had plenty left before he fully completed Rocket Rangers—but this was essentially the model he'd be working with going forward. Getting used to it now would only make his usage smoother as the item improved.

Blasting along, Cyber Geek tried to keep parallel with a tree line near the edge of the city. Ebnerville quickly gave way to wilderness once one wandered away from the lights; in the distance, he could see the larger, looming forest massed up like an unmoving army, waiting for the signal to strike. It was a strange sight. Most of his work with the AHC had been in either Ridge City itself or other heavily developed areas, as those tended to have the highest levels of crime. Out here, it was almost serene, ignoring the dull roar of the jetpack. There was a reason he'd gotten the upgrades to quiet the noise; he'd be waking every house he flew past or going deaf from sound exposure otherwise —though Cyber Geek suspected he'd still be in for a headache when all was said and done.

“Looking good. Now bring it around.” Medley was seated on the rooftop of a five-story apartment complex, keeping watch from one of the higher points they could find. In the event someone else did fly through, or there was an obstacle Cyber Geek seemed on course to collide with, Medley would radio in. With senses as sharp as his, it would be tough for anything to take them by surprise.

Obedying the directions, Cyber Geek extended the turn, circling back so he was headed toward Medley once more. He was slowly starting to get comfortable in the air, though he did keep a constant watch on the jetpack's fuel gauge. After this many upgrades, it would take quite a while to run dry at these speeds, but that was not a limit Cyber Geek wanted to test. He'd fallen from a fourth-floor balcony in a set of item-armor and still bruised his entire back. From this height, the injury would be far more severe.

As he looked up to the night sky, admiring the better view of the stars provided to those who settled farther from civilization, a flash caught Cyber Geek's eye. He wasn't entirely sure what it was, but his training kicked in almost before he'd made a conscious decision. Something was off, and he was a superhero; that made it his job to ensure everyone was safe.

"I caught sight of something just now. Toward the western edge of town. Could have been a rogue firework, maybe. I only caught it for a flash."

On the roof, Medley rose, shaking a touch of evening moisture from his fur. "I'll come, anyway. Better than sitting, and you still need a spotter."

"Not going to argue that point after less than ten minutes of practice," Cyber Geek agreed. "Don't worry, I'm pretty sure I can slow down for you."

"Slow down? I was going to say this is finally your chance to be able to keep up." Without any additional warning, Medley took off for the edge of his building in a dash, leaping and easily clearing the divide. Claws sank into the next rooftop for purchase, then immediately released as he took off again, racing for the next roof.

Cyber Geek watched him for a moment, in awe of the strength and grace his friend was displaying. This was miles from the unsure, awkwardly moving version of him that they'd known after the initial change. The more accustomed to the body Medley became, the more dangerous he grew. That was an arrangement Cyber Geek would have been quite happy with, except for the fact it stuck his friend in the body of an animal hybrid. Had there been a cure, a chance for him to be fully Ren again, he wouldn't have blamed Medley for taking it. Until that option arrived, however, he was grateful to have him as a teammate, and a friend.

It also didn't hurt that Medley hadn't been kidding; he really was cutting a furious pace. Adjusting his angle to properly lead the way, Cyber Geek slightly increased the speed of his jetpack. Time to see what this thing could actually do.

“All quiet to the north.”

“Of course it's quiet to the north. There's nothing that way but wolves and trees.” Bahamut's annoyance was steadily rising as the night wore on, which was understandable given her situation. She was currently cramped into a doorframe down a dark alleyway, one of the few places that could effectively hide her sizable green form while still being in a central position. Getting her in had been an ordeal, and the tight quarters were fast eroding her spirits. If someone did wander through, they were going to get one wrathful dragon for their troubles.

“Still quiet,” Hephaestus reiterated, perhaps suppressing a snicker at her friend's momentary, but humorous, misfortune. For her part, she was on the roof of a cracker factory, one of the few high points Ebnerville really had to offer. Southwest of them, deeper into the industrial district, the plan was being carried out. Hephaestus still didn't know what it was, and the deeper in they got, the happier she was about that. The guild was treating this with gravity, and that made it way above anything she wanted to be involved in. Guard duty was more than enough.

A blip in her visor alerted her to the flare of energy just as it spiked into the night sky. The flash was brief. Whoever made it was either aware enough not to make a scene, or had been cut down before they properly could. “Anyone else catch that?”

“Catch what?” Glyph's answer was genuinely interested, a sharp contrast to Bahamut's reply:

“Nope, still just brick and alley—the only things I can see.”

Pest Control, thankfully, confirmed Hephaestus's sighting. “A few of my bugs saw that, too. It's blocked by a lot of the other buildings between. Anyone not elevated when it went off probably didn't notice.”

That should have been more reassuring, considering the layout of Ebnerville and the relatively low number of active metas. They barely had any street-level capes trying to make a name for themselves, let alone ones patrolling the skies. Nevertheless, the pessimist in Hephaestus refused to trust in those odds. She began scanning more actively, searching for any potential threats.

For roughly three minutes, she kept at it, her heightened concern slowly dissipating. Just when she was about to give the all-clear, another blip caught her attention. Heat signature, approaching from the east. Quickly spinning her head, she activated the lens's zoom, pinpointing the source of the heat. A jetpack. Of course, it was someone in a jetpack. As the image sharpened, Hephaestus felt a sudden weight slam into her stomach.

"Shit. We've got a cape approaching." A cape in a costume she recognized quite well. Hephaestus may be too new to have allies, but Tori had kept up with this friend's career. "Cyber Geek, zipping over using a new flying item."

The silence in her ear stretched on, finally broken by Pest Control. "We have to stop him. For his sake as much as the job. Whatever is going on, it's expected to be a bloodbath. We've got councilors fighting. A new cape wandering into that... even if our people try not to hurt him in the chaos, the other side won't have that concern."

They didn't have long to talk about it. Cyber Geek was cutting a solid pace. A leaping form caught Hephaestus's eye; Medley was along for the ride, because apparently, nothing was going to go right tonight. "Update: add Medley to that equation, too."

"Crap. If it was just one, he might be smart enough to steer clear. With backup, it gets riskier." Glyph paused, pondering a notion. "Pest Control and I have something of a working relationship with these two after the riots. If we go out there, they might be willing to listen."

"To what?" Bahamut asked. "That there's a crime going on nearby, but we'd really appreciate it if they hung back and didn't radio anything in? I don't see any cape going for that, working relationship or not."

That wasn't even touching on the fact that it depended on Cyber Geek and Medley being willing to listen, which was far from guaranteed out here in the field. They needed a plan that didn't require talking, a way to lead them away instantly, something they couldn't resist.

Unfortunately, Hephaestus knew exactly what would work. She'd wanted to get in some flying practice, anyway; this functioned as well as any other occasion. “Bahamut is right. We can’t count on diplomacy for this. We have to trust something more dependable: spite.”

“Don’t even think about it.” Bahamut was already ahead of her, probably trying to wriggle free from her alcove at that very moment.

“You really think it will work?” Pest Control asked, keeping his head on the mission as a whole.

Hephaestus’s mind flashed back to the sight of a smoldering Medley, to the look in his eyes as she was flown out of reach. “I lit the guy on fire and escaped from their clutches. Pretty sure they’ll chase me, given the opportunity. And if they don’t, I’ll just have to encourage them.”

Flight systems were operational; she’d kept them on standby while waiting, just in case. Lifting off her perch, Hephaestus rose through the air, gravity’s grip on her heft knocked back by the technology hidden amidst her suit’s dark depths. She momentarily disabled her sound-suppressing system and blazed into the air, engines roaring. For this to work, she needed to be both seen and heard. More than that, she needed to be recognized.

Staying low until she was away from the others, Hephaestus took a sharp turn skyward as she came closer to Cyber Geek. She rose steadily higher, the brilliant flames bursting out, propelling her forward as she seared the night. There would be no way for him to miss her, even with the suit’s stealth-friendly coloring.

In fact, it ended up being more effective than planned. Due to a bit of poor timing, Hephaestus’s trajectory was slightly off. That meant, instead of rising up before him like an ascending demon, she very nearly collided with the cape, both of them having to spin off in other directions to avoid a crash. She righted herself almost immediately, whereas Cyber Geek nearly went into a spiral, managing to gain control only seconds before Hephaestus might have felt the draw to help.

On a nearby roof, Medley was screaming, and while she didn’t care enough to isolate the sounds, she could more or less put the gist together. He definitely recognized her. The question was, would it be enough?

Hephaestus watched as Cyber Geek reoriented, letting out a small sigh of relief when he pointed himself in her direction, exactly opposite that of the site she was guarding. It worked. The capes were giving chase.

That thought was at least some comfort as Hephaestus blasted further up into the sky with no idea what to do with the capes now that she’d managed to attract them.

Agent Quantum carefully applied the handcuffs, taking pains not to break the suspect's wrists. It wasn't an issue that had come up before, but working with Cyber Geek's team had shed a lot of light on just how strong they were compared to a lot of the criminals they put away. If those slip-ups did happen, it reflected back on the AHC, and capes as a whole. That knowledge had added a layer of caution to every movement these last few days, and even with the week of shadowing over, he wanted to keep those lessons in practice. If they didn't improve, then what was the point of that effort in the first place?

Watching the police lead his latest efforts into a waiting car, Agent Quantum opened up his communication lines, checking in to the AHC's central hub. "Hey, team. New Science Sentries reporting assignment completion. What's the next thing we can help with?"

The voices always changed—running an operation of the AHC's size required a sizable staff—but their readiness was constant. He'd barely finished before a voice was providing answers. "We've got nothing but some minor security alarms reported near your current position—probably going to be due for another jump to get to the action. Hope you had fun in California."

It was a trite joke that got used every time capes were spirited off to a destination location, only to then spend their time working. Agent Quantum offered up a polite laugh; this too was part of the job, in its way.

"Let's see... if we're jumping you anyway, looks like Cyber Geek just called in something suspicious. Potential wanted criminal spotted out in Ebnerville. Not a high priority, but since you've been working together, I thought I'd offer."

The issue didn't sound especially pressing; then again, it also didn't seem like there were any major emergencies to tackle anywhere else at the moment. After letting them tag along for a week, the very least his team could do was make sure Cyber Geek didn't need any assistance. On the off chance he did, all the better. It would be a chance to show their thanks for the help he'd provided.

"Get me a jump to Cyber Geek's position as soon as someone is available. Looks like the New Science Sentries are visiting Ebnerville."

---

Chapter 60

---

The longer a chase went on, the worse it was for the one being pursued. A cape could call in more help, additional surveillance, whatever they needed to lock down their target. Generally speaking, Hephaestus's strategy would have been to speed up and start weaving through the trees, losing her pursuers in the confusion and then sneaking away. The trouble was that she had to stay visible for this to work. If escape was out, and continued pursuit put the odds against her, then that meant Hephaestus needed another idea. It took almost two minutes of racing through the skies, but eventually, she hit upon a solution.

She'd been approaching the issue as a criminal, when this was actually a villain's job.

Decreasing her speed, Hephaestus began the process of descent. The area she'd selected was well off from the battle site—also relatively deserted at this time of night. A strip mall, filled with discount shops and chain eateries, all darkened and empty. The closest thing to other human life was a large cutout of Flex Force showing off in a nutrient shop's window. No civilians to get involved if things took a turn for the messy.

Dropping low, she landed roughly, leaving a scorch mark on the cement. That part would take more practice; had this been grass, she might have accidentally started a fire. With a quick mental note to tweak the landing systems, she scanned the sky for her pursuers. Cyber Geek wasn't far behind, though Medley flagged slightly farther back as his rooftop options ran short.

The jetpack didn't leave any signs or scorches as Cyber Geek set down, attention already trained on Hephaestus. Show-off. Before he could speak, she yelled at him, the suit's voice modulator masking her true identity.

"What do you fucking want? I waved sorry about the near miss, yet you still felt the need to follow me? I've got video recording and 911 on speed dial, so take a few steps back. Getting some real creep vibes off of you."

It took Cyber Geek back for a moment. He'd been expecting her to take the role of the aggressor. "I... I know who you are."

"Really? You don't ring a bell for me. Sure it wasn't someone else with an experimental meta-suit?" Hephaestus saw the flicker of uncertainty in Cyber Geek's eyes. While the aesthetic was the same, this suit had undeniable differences since the reworking. Enough to cause doubt, and that was what she needed more than anything: make him unsure, keep them off-balance, and stall like hell until the coast was clear.

That was when Medley finally closed the gap. His tongue hung slightly off to the side as he ran, darting back inside his mouth just as it was time to speak. "Hephaestus! Surrender now, and we can do this peacefully."

"Who the hell is Hephaestus?" Hephaestus demanded. "I know there was a cape named Red Hephaestus a while back, but I think he's been dead for a long time."

Medley wasn't so easily knocked off-kilter. He continued to approach, clearly ready for battle. "What a lazy attempt at trickery. Do you really expect it to work?" Every muscle was taut. He shook out his limbs, readying them for rapid movement. She remembered how strong that body was; if Medley hit, it was going to hurt.

"Here's a better question: do you realize what you're about to do? Right now, I'm a civilian in a meta-suit. You have established no criminal identity, no active crime in progress, and no outstanding warrants. That flexing you're doing—that's not for a fight. It's for assault, and my video recording is going to show exactly that."

Hephaestus tapped her helmet, a keen reminder to everyone present that she was coated from head-to-toe in electronics. Medley's eager pace suddenly halted, the reality of her words sinking in. A criminal was bound by the system, while a villain knew how to turn that system right back against the capes who trusted it.

"On the chance this is a misunderstanding, you have our apologies. However, your suit bears striking similarities to the type used by a creator named Hephaestus, who is wanted for questioning in connection to a museum robbery.” Cyber Geek had recovered just as Medley lost his stride. The two made a good team. Under different circumstances, she’d have been glad to see them covering one another so well.

“Cool story. Got a warrant and some cops to go with it?” Hephaestus demanded. “Because last I checked, the Alliance of Heroic Champions aided law enforcement, without actually being such an entity itself. That clears you of a lot of liability, sure, but it also means that unless you have an actual warrant in hand or I’m presenting a provable, active danger, you can go get fucked. So, I ask again: got any paperwork and law enforcement shoved up that spandex ass? Remember, you’re being filmed.”

This was not the way Cyber Geek and Medley had expected the encounter to play out. They were accustomed to dealing with crooks who would scream and flee, or jump right into combat. She couldn’t imagine anyone they’d dealt with prior had attempted to use technicalities as their weapon of choice.

Finally, Cyber Geek found his answer. “No, I don’t have a warrant to arrest you. Instead, I’ll be happy to call the local PD and have them come take you into custody for questioning, while Medley and I wait here to keep you company.”

Though the clangs were loud as Hephaestus began to tick points off on her fingers, she kept up the theatrics all the same. The less concerned she appeared to be by these two, the more they’d worry she truly had nothing to fear. “Keep me here without my consent—that’s kidnapping. Follow me without cause, harassment. Try following me from a distance, without my knowledge, and I bet we can slip a few breach-of-privacy charges onto the harassment, maybe even a sex crime if I stop to piss and you both sneak a peek.”

Cyber Geek actually got a touch rosy in the cheeks at that one, though Medley was looking more and more furious by the second. He knew it was bullshit. They all knew it was bullshit. The question was how much could any person present prove it. Her suit had changed, enough to have reasonable doubt, and if flying homemade creations around were illegal, then a big chunk of the airborne capes would already be in jail. She’d stymied the pair without a single punch being thrown. There was a chance she owed Ivan an apology—all that harping on the code and learning the specifics had turned out more useful than she anticipated.

Most capes, she suspected, would have let it go at that. She'd made too much trouble, and presented a strong case. Trying to keep pushing just opened up more problems than it fixed, all for the cape who made the play. Trouble was, Cyber Geek could show an unexpectedly heroic spirit when put against a wall.

"I can live with that. If you're proven innocent and would like to press charges against me, then I'll give a full confession to every part of this interaction. Kidnapping seems like a reach, but I'm sure there will be consequences. Consequences I'd much rather live with than with the knowledge that I let a dangerous criminal escape justice." Cyber Geek started forward, and he didn't look like he'd be so easy to derail this time.

Time for a reassessment. Without knowing for sure what was happening at the battle, she couldn't risk turning these two loose. Going to jail, on the other hand, also wasn't on the table. Her only option left was to buy as much time as possible, and then run for it. She could always ditch the suit and make her escape as Tori, picking it up when the coast was clear. No matter how she sliced it, however, there were slim odds she'd be able to keep this delay rolling without things getting a bit messy.

"Seeing as you're attempting unlawful restraint, I hope you realize I'm in my rights to fight back, cape or not." Hephaestus made sure power was flowing into her blaster gauntlets, and that the setting was low. She didn't want to hurt them badly, but couldn't very well risk losing the fight either.

"Finally. I wondered when I'd get my rematch." Medley bounded forward, though Hephaestus noted his claws weren't extended yet. Despite the tough talk, he was playing it as a cape, coming in softly first, to be safe.

Hephaestus held no such compunctions, and had the benefit of knowing Medley to be incredibly resilient. As he leaped, arms wide for some sort of hug-clutch, she fired a beam directly into his knee, sending him spinning back through the air with a screaming yowl.

"What did you do?" That was the only line Cyber Geek got out before the cold metal of Hephaestus's elbow smashed into the bridge of his nose. He'd made the mistake of watching Medley's fall, rather than keeping an eye on the enemy, and was quickly taught the error of his ways. The nose broke instantly, sending tears to his eyes and blood pouring down the front of his face. It was fortunate he didn't wear a mask, or it would have been soaked in seconds.

“Fought back.” Hephaestus didn’t press the assault as she watched the blood drip. In truth, she’d expected Cyber Geek to dodge; it hadn’t exactly been the most efficient blow. The shock of seeing her friend in pain caused her to pause, a sudden flash of loyalty arriving at the most inconvenient of times. The cold, logical side of her mind swept into action, rationalizing at lightning speeds. It reminded her that a nose wasn’t so bad, more pain than anything, and the AHC had the resources to replace entire limbs. This wouldn’t be more than a blip in the long term, no matter how painful it felt for the moment. Whereas, if she was caught, the consequences would be far more long-lasting.

Scratching reached her ears as Medley drew himself back up, tenderly putting a reduced amount of weight on his still-smoking knee. At full force, that beam of energy could have carved through the bone. This was little more than a flesh wound in comparison. A flesh wound that still slowed Medley down—a benefit Hephaestus would gladly accept. After their last battle, when she’d been a slow-moving hunk and he’d easily overpowered her, it felt good to show she wasn’t a threat to be taken lightly.

“Think we’d have to land a hit for it to be fighting back.” Medley fell onto all fours, compensating for his injured limb. His tail rose high, ready to strike as he dashed along the ground. Hephaestus fired, only for him to swerve to the side, nimbly missing the shot. Hephaestus shot twice more, each time the blasts were avoided by Medley.

The fourth shot, he dodged as well. It was the fifth, fired right after the fourth, from Hephaestus’s other gauntlet, that finally found home. Unaware that she had multiple weapons, Medley wasn’t quite prepared to react post-dodge, earning a shot to the flank that burned away a section of his fur. He clutched his ribs as he rolled along the concrete.

Sparkling blue light drew Hephaestus back to Cyber Geek. He was reaching into the code for a weapon, something he should have done before getting into combat. Hopefully, he’d learn from this mistake; his next opponent probably wouldn’t be inclined to go easy. To that point, Hephaestus raised a blaster and fired a single shot into Cyber Geek’s left foot, again at the lowest setting. He still screeched, perhaps from surprise as much as pain. The blue light flared out as his concentration faltered, leaving him exposed while Hephaestus darted over.

She hadn’t actually expected the fight to go so well; having the advantage of surprise made a huge difference. They might have seen her there, but neither expected her to come out swinging for the fences. Such was the trouble with gradually sliding up the power scale to deal with new threats: those threats had no such obligation to play by the same rules.

“If you two are done, can I go back to flying around peacefully? Seems like you could probably use some more practice at all of this, anyway. I can even—”

An entirely new sensation came over Hephaestus, like someone was trying to tear her out from within her suit. Instantly, she fully shifted to fire form, yet the pull didn’t dissipate. It expanded out, yanking on Hephaestus as a whole, and for a moment, it felt like she might not fit into whatever cosmic hole was being formed. Then, like a champagne cork, she popped through space itself, her mind momentarily boggled at seeing existence from the inside out, only to appear again across the strip mall.

It wasn’t where she was that was relevant, so much as what—or rather, who—she was in front of. The punch from Agent Quantum lit up several alarms on her sensors, and the super-speed kick from Tachyonic less than a second later only compounded the problem. Had she been flesh, the rapid shift in momentum would have had the emergency vomit protocols fully activated. Instead, she just put everything she had into staying upright.

Set before her were the New Science Sentries, only, for the first time, she wasn’t seeing them as a civilian being rescued or a neighbor being pestered. As their adversary, she looked into the hard, battle-ready looks in their eyes, and suddenly found herself quite nostalgic for those bothersome neighbors. Because in the field, with combat upon them, the New Science Sentries looked downright terrifying.

And she was the focal point of all their attention.

---

Chapter 61

---

“Armor Boy there has got more heft than he lets on. Not an easy one to move, and he’s slippery inside.” Presto appeared safely out of harm’s reach, which explained how Hephaestus had been moved into such an inopportune position.

Although she hadn’t collapsed, her suit was blaring with alerts. In just two blows, the New Science Sentries had managed extensive damage to her shell. With attacks like that, it was only a matter of time before they broke something vital. This was not a fight she wanted, if it could be possibly helped.

“Oh good, more enforcers from the AHC here to help their friends with kidnapping. Guess after you so spectacularly failed to prevent one, aiding the kidnappers is the next logical step.”

It was, admittedly, a low blow, though if anyone had the right to throw that punch, it was the woman who’d endured the actual incident. Her hope was that it would rattle the New Science Sentries, giving them momentary pause to consider their role in the current situation. Instead, she received a brief proximity alert before Tachyonic slammed into her back, sending her spinning through the air with the force of his accelerated momentum.

She landed face up, starting to rise only to find Tachyonic crouched over her, his face inches from her helmet. “Don’t even fucking try it after that line. Agent Quantum, could you help me with restraint? Plasmodia, if you don’t mind, I think we need a can opener.”

From the left of Agent Quantum, Plasmodia stepped into view, her beauty turned terrifying in the flickering light of the energy spike extended from her right hand. Tough as Hephaestus's suit was, that thing would definitely carve through it; she'd seen the kind of power Plasmodia could conjure. On instinct, she started to move, only to find one of Tachyonic's hands suddenly resting on her shoulder.

"No matter what you do, it'll be too slow. Struggle all you like. We're taking you in."

A new noise came from behind Hephaestus: Cyber Geek's voice calling to the other capes. Thanks to using microphones rather than primitive eardrums, she was able to make out the words despite the distance.

"Watch out!"

Evidently, Agent Quantum had also been blessed with enhanced hearing, as he waved back to Cyber Geek. "Don't worry. We've got him. Might have a lot to learn in some respects, but fighting is one part of the job we can—"

His boast was cut off by several hundred pounds of green dragon flesh slamming into his back fist-first, adding the momentum of a skyward fall to the blow. Despite not seeing the approach, Hephaestus could put it together, especially given the patches of white scales still fading on Bahamut's form. She'd flown after Hephaestus, saw the trouble, and had dropped right in to help. It was an unexpected opportunity, one they had to use to the fullest.

For a brief, wonderful moment, the entire New Science Sentries team was stunned: Agent Quantum by the punch, everyone else from seeing their leader get knocked on his ass. While they were distracted, Hephaestus struck. A single punch wouldn't do much, especially given the rate at which super-speed aided healing. Taking Tachyonic out of the fight wasn't about injuring him; it was about making him ineffective.

To most people in her situation, the only recourse would be simple battle; however, Hephaestus was more than the might of her suit. She also had the brain of an inventor, one who took note of design details: a bracer getting touched frequently during combat, or the special containment material composing a costume. Tachyonic was hiding a secret—which was to say, a vulnerability.

Between the way she'd seen him occasionally tap that silver bracer on his right arm and the energy output signature her scanners were registering, Hephaestus had something of a hunch. Tachyonic might have super-speed on his own, but it certainly appeared as if he was augmenting that power out in the field. His suit was emitting trace amounts of setlium radiation, a telltale sign that he was dosing his cells in the meta-element. That level of tech was certainly in the realm of Professor Quantum to dream up; however, the implementation was a touch crude. After all, external controls presented a major vulnerability, especially against enemies who knew what to look for.

In the flash of distraction, Hephaestus struck, wrapping her right gauntlet around Tachyonic's bracer. Blasting would destroy it, along with Tachyonic's arm, which felt like a step too far, even in straights so dire. Instead, she funneled power into the mechanical muscles of the machine, squeezing for all she was worth. The bracer was well made. She was going to burn out half the motors in her hand, and would replace each with a smile on her face if it got her and Bahamut out of here.

"You brought frie—what the hell!" Tachyonic spun back around just as his bracer cracked, emitting a series of sparks and hisses. He tried to grab at the device, but bursts of electricity burned his hand at every attempt. "Come on... stabilize..."

The New Science Sentries were already recovering, Presto raising a hand to Bahamut as Plasmodia built power for a blast that would injure, if not cripple, even the green dragon. With no time to think, Hephaestus went on the attack. Rather than give Tachyonic time to stabilize, she cracked him in the nose with her elbow—the same offensive Cyber Geek had received to equally similar results. Either too unstable or too distracted to notice the incoming blow, Tachyonic took it full force, stumbling backward. In his case, something of a rueful expression peeked out through the mask, at least for the brief moment he had before Hephaestus shoved Tachyonic directly into Presto.

Both went down in a tangle, which should have given Hephaestus the chance to take out Plasmodia. Unfortunately, she'd made the mistake of forgetting what had brought her to this strip mall in the first place. Medley had finally recovered, and the sound of his panting approach gave her warning just before the slashing claws tried to part her armor. She slipped back, and he stayed close, not giving her any opportunity to switch back to ranged.

"Like I was saying—finally, a rematch." He smiled, she thought; it wasn't easy to tell given the animalistic structure of his face.

Glancing to the side, she saw Agent Quantum rising to his feet once more, with Plasmodia nearby to help. Farther back, she could make out the familiar blue flicker of Cyber Geek grabbing an item. Odds were steeply against them, and only getting worse.

If not for the buzzing of insect wings, Hephaestus might have lost hope. She could hear them, though, and that meant Pest Control wasn't far off. Whatever the plan might be—if there even was one—she had no clue. The best Hephaestus could manage was to stay free and uninjured while helping her friends do the same. Glyph had their emergency escape option, assuming they could reach him.

Medley came in swinging again, claws and tail flowing naturally. He'd been training, yet it was more than that. This was like he'd been learning to fight specifically using these weapons. Did the AHC offer some sort of inhuman martial arts program for people like Medley? Whatever the cause, Hephaestus was suitably impressed by his improvement, even as she deflected his attacks.

Capes weren't the only ones who got to grow after wins and losses, however. Compared to the last time they met, Hephaestus was markedly faster, stronger, and tougher, thanks to the various design upgrades. Her improved movement was showing the most benefits of all, as Hephaestus was able to somewhat keep pace with the furious flurry of attacks.

The ranged shot to her knee, unfortunately, slowed Hephaestus down. She could see Cyber Geek crouched at a distance, that comically huge video game gun propped up and taking aim once more. To her shock, Medley swung, and then leapt aside, giving Cyber Geek a perfect window. Hephaestus only just barely managed to dodge a second shot to the leg. This wasn't just some makeshift tactic on the fly; they'd trained this way, with Cyber Geek sniping as Medley wore the enemy down.

On the upside, he was still a cape, which meant the shot had been intended to wound rather than annihilate. Though Hephaestus wouldn't be completing any marathons until after the repairs, she could stay standing, for however much good that did. At that thought, another notion popped into mind. Why was she bothering with her legs at all? Landing had been essential to deal with Cyber Geek and Medley, but they were well past that point.

Using the momentary space Medley had so graciously provided, Hephaestus fired up her jets and shot into the sky, earning an angry yowl as he attempted an ineffectual pounce. From here, she could see the battlefield more effectively. Bahamut and Agent Quantum resembled prizefighters, exchanging punches like pleasantries at a church social. Plasmodia hung near the edge, ready to help; however, the tight confines of the fight limited her ability to shoot. Tachyonic and Presto were working on untangling themselves, hindered by Tachyonic suddenly speeding up and slowing down at inopportune moments. Medley was yowling, Cyber Geek was taking aim, and on top of the strip mall, Hephaestus could see what she'd been hoping for.

A mass of buzzing and wings swirled as Pest Control summoned more and more insects: some meta, some mundane, all of them annoying. Since Glyph was at his side, Hephaestus could take a general guess as to what the plan was. Get the bugs to critical mass, drop a bomb of confusion on the battlefield, and that was their window to escape. She and Bahamut would both have to make it onto the roof—not an easy task in their current situation.

The shot blazing past her visor reminded Hephaestus that Cyber Geek wasn't going to aim forever; eventually, he'd pull the trigger. She had to minimize their ranged options for the escape. Plasmodia's power was internal, whereas Cyber Geek's could be taken away.

That made the choice for her. Hephaestus dove, Medley already scrambling to meet her. It was his turn to be too slow, as she took a shot from Cyber Geek in the left shoulder just before landing. Alarms blared, and she was notified that functionality in the arm was reduced by roughly thirty percent. He was getting pretty good with that rifle, stupid size or not.

Since it was so conveniently propped up on the ground, Hephaestus dropped the entirety of her weight and landed directly on the huge barrel. No doubt the fictional gun was meant to withstand a huge amount of damage; however, hundreds of pounds of metal slamming into a section with no support underneath was simply too much physics to be ignored. It snapped clean down the middle, turning back into blue sparks as it dissolved.

"This didn't have to be a fight." Looking down at him, Hephaestus saw something she wasn't prepared for: fear. Cyber Geek was afraid of her, and why not? She'd just injured him, stood momentarily against the New Science Sentries, and had now easily broken his go-to weapon. More interesting than that was that despite the fear he so plainly wore, Cyber Geek's hands were still glowing as he went for more items. Fear be damned. He wasn't giving up.

“Maybe not,” Cyber Geek agreed. “But unless you’re willing to surrender, I don’t see it ending.”

Rather than respond, Hephaestus whirled around, firing a shot from her left gauntlet into Medley’s hip. Sneaking up on her in the middle of battle was one thing; she had no intention of letting him within swinging distance again. By the time she’d turned back, Cyber Geek had manifested a large green wrench with various runes on it.

“It’s called the Wrecking Wrench, from Clankbur’s Junkyard Journey. Nowhere near my best building tool, but it does triple damage to anything mechanical to help tear it apart.” Apparently, Medley wasn’t the only one sore over the last time—an item like that had obviously been planned for Hephaestus, or any other person wearing a meta-suit.

A huge explosion tore the night, stealing the attention of everyone in the strip mall parking lot. Further down the street, a car had detonated so aggressively that it flipped over and was now casting light from the roaring flames. Hephaestus might have been confused, save for the buzzing she’d paid such close attention to. It suddenly swelled in volume, her lone warning before the swarm fell upon them. Glyph must have snuck around to set something up, a starter pistol of sorts.

It was like a blanket of bugs covered the entire area. Cursing, swatting, even some yelps rang out as the clear night became hideously obscured. To Hephaestus, it was the sound of sweet escape, as she used the combo of distractions to leap back into the night. Briefly, she feared the bugs would clog her engine, but she quickly broke through them into the clear night air of the sky. Through the swirling insects, she could just make out Agent Quantum trying to chase Bahamut, even as her scales shifted from green to white.

Taking a cue out of Cyber Geek’s tactics, Hephaestus fired off a few blasts, one searing Agent Quantum’s shoulder. While it was nowhere near enough to stop him, the delay gave Bahamut room to escape, and once she’d flapped those white wings past the layer of bugs, Hephaestus set a course for the roof.

A few stray shots from Plasmodia rang out; however, she couldn’t risk shooting any real power blindly, and even the few she dared quickly faded as more shouts came from within the bugs. Hephaestus and Bahamut both slammed down into the roof in short succession, grouping in next to Glyph and a loudly panting Pest Control. Calling up that many bugs in that short of time must have taken it out of him. They owed him a drink when this was over.

“Please tell me we’re good to go.” In that moment, her greatest fear was a guild order to keep distracting the capes. They’d managed this far thanks largely to surprise, an element of battle that was quickly fading. Much longer, and the whole team was as good as captured.

“Officially cleared. Things are wrapping up, anyway,” Glyph reported, saving Pest Control the effort. “Everyone, get around me, now.”

They all complied, laying hands on Glyph, just to be safe, as he pointed the wand downward and released the stored spell. In flaring purple light, a complex circle formed around all four, composed of runes and symbols Hephaestus had no frame of reference for. Magic was its own thing, and she didn’t have to understand it to be thankful as the spell activated, tearing them all from the strip mall roof in Ebnerville.

Unlike with Presto’s power, this was more akin to the whole world flashing purple, then looking different as a new scene faded into view. They were near Ridge City—Hephaestus could recognize the lights from here—except, given the distance, they had to be at least half an hour’s drive from downtown, if not more.

“With this spell, you have to set the teleportation point in advance,” Glyph explained. He was stepping out of a matching circle to the one they’d left in, only this one was seared into the dirt. “It’s possible to follow if someone had jumped into the circle with us, so I set it out in the middle of nowhere, just to be safe.”

“Good call. Showing up with a cape at the guild would be bad for everyone—most of all the cape,” Hephaestus agreed. “Where to now?”

“Nearest highway is three miles from here. That’s where the guild car will meet us.” Finally somewhat recovered, Pest Control got the words out, albeit breathily.

“We could fly,” Bahamut suggested. She spread her large wings, illustrating the point.

“After tonight, I’m okay with keeping as low a profile as possible. At least until we’re back at the guild.” Hephaestus hitched an arm under Pest Control for support as they began walking down the dirt path.

A few seconds later, Bahamut took the other side with a freshly shifted green arm. In a way, it felt almost like their first training exercise, where Pest Control had crossed the finish line with a broken leg. If only that had been their night. Giant killer robots were a pain, but outside of surprise sentience, they didn't tend to hold grudges.

Capes, on the other hand, had far better memories, especially for the quarries who slipped away.

---

Chapter 62

---

Bloodbath didn't even begin to describe it. Chunks, viscera, tendons, perhaps a rogue finger here and there—those were the largest pieces the forensics team was finding as they combed through what could most accurately be called a cold flesh stew.

Standing above them, watching the proceedings with calculated indifference, Professor Quantum observed as the Ebnerville police worked, aided by several AHC resources. These were helpful for smaller towns not equipped to deal with such catastrophes and were able to respond faster than any government agency could hope to. Of course, since the resources belonged to the Alliance of Heroic Champions, any information uncovered in the aftermath would also flow directly to them. Whatever the cost of this nicety, it had paid for itself thousands of times over already in useful data.

Tonight, he feared, would be an exception to that rule. When he'd heard his team had faced combat, Professor Quantum knew he had to witness the scene. He'd been expecting another move from his unseen adversary, perhaps more merchandise from the past, but merely being a superhero came with its own conflicts. In this case, it hadn't been related to a lingering grudge, or not one aimed toward Professor Quantum, anyway. Worse, this was clearly guild work; the utter lack of evidence confirmed that the longer the scene was searched. Professor Quantum had already suspected as much, once he arrived on scene and got the full debrief.

The suit and dragon were newer recruits; he'd skimmed the files and therefore, his brain could easily recall such details. They'd been linked to the museum heist, which Apollo had conjectured to be a training mission for new villains. It seemed the training wheels were now off, if they'd been able to last against his team. Some of that might have been to blame on Lodestar and her soft methods. When he'd sent them from Vomisa, they were a fine-tuned battle engine, capable of handling threats even beyond their actual powers. The advocacy of softness had, quite expectedly, weakened them. A necessary sacrifice to keep the AHC at large appeased, but one that he would have to minimize the impact of.

Between the low-level lackeys playing lookout and the absolute decimation on the scene, there was little need to even call this speculation. Someone had wronged the guild, and they'd responded. Were Lodestar here, there would have been hand-wringing for the ones they couldn't save, whereas Professor Quantum didn't especially care. If any of these had the potential to be worthy test subjects, they'd have survived, so it was no great loss.

The larger issue was that the New Science Sentries had taken a defeat. By his standards, if not the AHC's. Such errors were unacceptable, especially considering they'd been facing off with a pair of villain rookies. Between their numbers and training, it should have been effortless. These were not the results he'd invested so much time into that team to reap. They were going to have to step up, and soon; otherwise, he'd be forced to move on to his contingency plans.

A team wasn't set in stone, after all, and there were plenty of other candidates back on Vomisa. If they couldn't pull together, then he'd simply tear the configuration apart and try again, as many times as it took, to create a proper team of successors. He would not allow the name of Science Sentries to be dragged down by their ineptitude. Not after all the work that had gone into establishing it.

Professor Quantum turned away from the scene, hand on his phone, the next task already on his mind.

With the program finally running, Tori fell back into a sitting position, sighing in relief. The walk back to the highway hadn't been a fun one, nor was waiting until the coast was clear to load everyone in to a guild SUV. After that, things got easier. It was just a drive to the country club and a hop through the portal to get back to the guild's volcano lair and, by extension, her spare room.

Pausing only long enough for a shower, Tori's first task was running diagnostics on the Hephaestus suit. It had taken some finagling to get the laptop cord connected—the port had been slightly warped during the battle—but with the diagnostics now flashing on-screen, Tori could check the damage her creation had sustained. All things considered, it had held up well. However, from what she was already seeing, there weren't a lot of hits left for it to take. Another good shot and something critical might have gone offline. With ease of movement becoming less of an issue, it was time to move on to defense.

While her current suit had been redesigned and tweaked, she'd been using the same base components as much as possible. It was her habit, as a thief and a scrounger, plus it helped to keep the costs in check. Looking over the claw marks Medley had managed to leave in a shoulder plate, it was evident that her armor was in need of an upgrade. Last time, she'd used metals that were high quality, but also mundane. To tangle with metas, the suit had to be able to withstand more damage. Energy shields ate power, most of which she was directing toward mobility and offense. Changing the base material would be the fix that required the least amount of work to keep up, but also the most effort up front. Tori would have to actually invent or steal a meta-alloy to make her suit out of one.

That was a long-term concern; the more immediate issue was getting her suit up and running again. She didn't have plans to take Hephaestus out again anytime soon, yet Tori didn't feel quite right with her armor temporarily out of commission. When it was down, she lacked the choice to be Hephaestus, and that rubbed against her brain wrong for reasons that Tori couldn't fully articulate.

Repairs would be extensive, and also would have to wait for another day. With diagnostics running, she couldn't do much, so Tori departed her room and headed down to the lounge on her floor. Doctor Mechanical hadn't changed much about the guild's overall layout style; everyone was largely able to navigate easily, even with the new locations that had been added. Part of that consistency included communal areas on every floor where residents could spend time together. Tori noted that once again, she and the other rookies were largely on their own, though that probably wouldn't last forever. She'd easily counted that there were far more rooms on this floor than were currently being used.

Upon entering, Tori's plans for a simple snack were dashed, as she came upon Warren, Lance, and Beverly, all sans costumes and identities, rooting through the shared fridge. "Whoever stocks this really goes all out. Beers, ciders, sodas—what'll it be?" Lance's meaty arm was shoved halfway into the chilly white box, like it was trying to swallow him whole, only to choke on his wide shoulders.

"I suppose tonight has earned an indulgence. I'll try one of those ciders, please." Warren accepted the can he was given, turning it over a few times in his hand.

Beverly reached in over Lance, grabbing a lager as well as a stout. "More of a wine person, but I've knocked back a few in my day. Tori, I got you." With casual ease, Beverly tossed the stout, which Tori caught easily. After the evening's events, everything felt heightened, right down to her reflexes, though eventually, they'd all crash hard. At least tomorrow was Sunday—no work and hopefully no neighbors.

At the thought of the New Science Sentries, Tori inwardly winced. They definitely hadn't been part of tonight's plan, and a piece of her felt awkward about the idea of seeing them again. That was silly, though, she reminded herself. The capes hadn't dealt with Tori or Beverly tonight. They'd only fought Hephaestus and Bahamut, beings entirely unrelated to the women they shared a building with.

Cracking open her beer, Tori swigged down a sip, saying a silent toast to Ivan and his insistence that she maintain a secret identity. This evening had made her grateful all over again for the distance between Hephaestus and Tori.

Shifting the ice pack elicited a fresh wave of pain, followed by merciful relief. The Alliance of Heroic Champions had many high-tech treatment options for capes who were injured in the field, from basic medical supplies all the way up to a few metas who could actually repair flesh within moments. As with most services, however, priority was determined by need. On a Saturday night, there were superheroes who required the advanced treatments for injuries far worse than a broken nose.

Donald made no complaints as he waited, sitting on a plastic-lined chair with a rag and an ice pack to handle his injury. Even being here felt ridiculous; except, waiting for the nose to heal naturally would leave a big bright target on his face for everyone they fought. Keeping the injury and being less effective was a folly of pride, something Donald couldn't allow to be more important than the job.

Given that this was the waiting area for low-priority treatments, Donald was more or less alone, with only the occasional attendant stepping in to check on him. When the door opened, that's who he assumed it was, until he caught sight of a familiar blue costume. Rather than go for a rag, Tachyonic had elected to stuff tissues into both his nostrils, a bit of red seeping into view on the white material.

The two met eyes in a shared moment of uncertainty. Despite spending a week together, they were on rough terms; no one outside of Cyber Geek and Agent Quantum had really connected on either team. Tachyonic ultimately made the move, as he was the one still walking. He strode confidently over and took a seat near Donald, without being directly next to him.

"So... that sucked." It was a surprise; those were not the words he'd expected to come out of Tachyonic's mouth, especially not accompanied by a touch of smirk. "You've fought those two before?"

"Sort of. I chased the dragon, Bahamut, while Medley squared off with Hephaestus. They got away that time, too."

"Don't sweat it too much. You're not the one who'll be blamed for this one." Tachyonic's left hand absentmindedly rubbed the empty right spot on his forearm, where a silver bracer would normally be attached. "Between losing the targets and getting exposed, I'm taking the heat for this, which I deserve."

Donald was unexpectedly torn. He wanted to ask what Tachyonic meant by "getting exposed," but wasn't quite sure it had been intended as a conversation option, or if he and Tachyonic were close enough to pose such a question. In the end, his eyes did the asking for him, as Tachyonic realized he was rubbing his arm and caught Donald's stare.

"I'm fast on my own. Could make a go at it as a cape and probably do okay. But to be on the New Science Sentries, okay isn't enough." Tachyonic tapped the empty space on his arm. “Setlium is stored in devices all along the suit, flooding my cells with extra energy. I’m able to absorb it, thus augmenting my speed. But the bracer is necessary for control, which Hephaestus figured out and broke, resulting in my suit and energy dispersal going haywire.”

“Hope you’ve got spares,” Donald replied. It was a tad flippant, but apparently struck the right cord as Tachyonic chuckled.

He nodded, though the look in his eyes didn’t seem so optimistic. “Professor Quantum builds for contingencies, so I’ve got plenty stowed in various places. The bigger issue is that my secret is exposed. A criminal just figured out my biggest weakness, which means, in no time, everyone will know. Won’t matter in every fight, but for the right enemy, that’s a big opportunity.”

Given the general malaise that had settled on Tachyonic after the brief chuckle, Donald decided it was time to steer the conversation elsewhere. “Sorry if this is rude, Tachyonic, just have to wonder, given our circumstances, is that why you’re here for treatment? I thought super-speed caused fast healing.”

“Fast, sure; good, no,” Tachyonic explained. “The bones already set wrong, so I need to go have it aligned properly. What really smarts is getting whacked there a week after Lodestar did it and told me to keep my guard up.”

“I get it. Kind of surprised Professor Quantum hasn’t made you some sort of shielding or healing devices, though.”

Tachyonic shook his head. “Are you kidding me? No way he’d do something like that.” Pulling himself up straight, Tachyonic affected an annoyed, weary expression paired with a stiff voice. “Pain is a teacher. Cut his lessons short at your own peril.”

It took a moment, but Donald realized he’d been doing a Professor Quantum impression, and not a bad one, at that. “I take it life’s not all that easy being on a legacy team.”

“Being Tachyonic is something I spent my whole life working toward, and there are still days I’ve nearly quit.” He paused, looking over the semi-costume he was still wearing, a more casual version that hung loose at the collar and sleeves. “Also, call me Kyle. We’re on the same side, and as of tonight, we’ve now fought together. Feels like we’re probably to the point of first names, don’t you think?”

“I appreciate that, Kyle. I’m Donald when out of costume, not that it’s a secret.”

“That seems like the life—not having to hide anything. We’re taking a run at the secret identities and barely getting by. Makes you wonder how so many of the crooks pull it off.”

Even if Kyle didn’t say it, Donald knew where both of their minds were turning. “Wondering who’s under that black armored helmet, huh?”

Tenderly, Kyle ran a finger along the bridge of his nose, wincing as he did. “Let’s just say that next time, I’ll be highly motivated to take Hephaestus down and rip off that mask.”

Raising a fist, Donald offered a bump, which Kyle accepted. “When that day comes, give me a call, and we’ll be there to help. My team is now down by two against that pair. I’d love a chance to even the score.”

“Sounds like Hephaestus better watch his ass,” Kyle said. “He’s got some serious superheroes hunting for him as of now.”

---

Chapter 63

---

“Absolutely inexcusable. Not only did you fail to arrive on the scene of a large-scale meta-battle, the very sort of incident where you could have turned your reputation around, you missed that opportunity because you were losing to a pair of villains. Rookie villains. That is despite having superior numbers and power, mind you. On top of all that, Tachyonic allowed his setlium dispersal control to be broken, compromising him both tonight and for the rest of his career. Do you have any sort of defense to offer up?”

Agent Quantum stood resolute as the tirade washed over him. There were objections he could offer, pointing out that at worst, the night had been a draw. He already knew the reply: if the crooks escaped, then it was a loss by Science Sentry standards. Had he drawn attention to the fact that his team was being careful with escalation, he’d only have to explain why they’d chosen such a tactic in the first place, and there were no happy endings to be found down that path. Instead, he waited until the silence finally loomed, then spoke with his head held low.

“I do not. We made tactical mistakes that led to the escape of our targets. Had we realized they were guild-affiliated in the moment, we’d have taken them more seriously, but we didn’t, and that was our error. My error, as team lead, and I’ll accept the consequences.”

The stare from Professor Quantum was harsh, but short. He didn’t have the energy to spare on lingering emotions. With Agent Quantum showing proper remorse and respect, the best option was to move forward.

“I’m glad to hear you at least understand your failings. After getting the full report, I’m starting to see where the team’s issues lie. Come Monday, Tachyonic will be sent back to Vomisa for additional training. Some of our backups have been progressing nicely. I’ll make a new selection that properly compliments the dynamic. Go inform Tachyonic to prepare his things.”

Professor Quantum took a seat at his desk, expecting Agent Quantum to simply leave the office now that the discussion was over. Instead, he looked up to find the team leader still standing there. Unlike before, there was something resolute in his eyes.

“I refuse.”

“Excuse me?”

The young man was nervous, yet did a respectable job of keeping it tamped down, just as he’d been taught. “Tachyonic is my closest friend. He shoulders a sizable amount of responsibility on the team. Removing him over one mistake would only leave us more vulnerable than we already are. It’s not a decision I can support.”

“Agent Quantum, perhaps you’ve become addled by the accolades, but you don’t actually control your team’s makeup. That is my prerogative, and I say Tachyonic is done.”

“Then you can send me back, too.” No give, not even a flicker. Had he come in prepared for this?

Rising slowly, Professor Quantum gave the boy a few iotas of actual attention. Unbending, loyal, determined, Agent Quantum had all the traits Professor Quantum had seen the crowds flock to over the years. Yet instead of loving him, they merely accepted him—and worse, those same qualities were now causing complications. Had this rebellion come a year prior, the entire team may have been tossed out, but things were different now. The team was public, working with Professor Quantum’s seal of approval. Taking one member out due to “injury” was manageable. Losing a team lead was another matter.

“Explain yourself.”

A quick nod, then Agent Quantum replied. “Figurehead or not behind the scenes, I’m the leader of this team in the field. I’m not going to cover for someone if they go on a killing spree; however, I won’t leave my people hung out to dry for doing their best. If Tachyonic’s failure represents anything, it’s a lack of planning and leadership. Whatever his penalty, I’ll pay it as well. I'm not going to live up to the Science Sentries' legend without my team's support, and they have to know I've got their backs, no matter what."

There had been stronger options for Agent Quantum. Not many, this one was well among the best; however, he wasn't the absolute most powerful in combat. Nor was he the most tactically sound. Some of the weaker candidates had developed mentally to compensate for their failings. It was that attitude that had won him the role, ultimately. Raising the name of the Science Sentries wasn't purely about being the most efficient superhero—hell, they'd actually had to stop Lodestar from doing that when humanity started to grow dependent. No, this was about PR as much as it was the actual saving, and on that front, Agent Quantum had something none of the other candidates could match.

Sincerity. Genuine concern for the people he was helping and love for the job, the sorts of things the public seemed to sniff out. Bad openings or not, with enough time in front of a camera, Agent Quantum was going to win hearts just by being himself. Tachyonic's presence wasn't likely to substantially impede the team, whereas losing Agent Quantum might leave the whole project dead in the water.

Perhaps Tachyonic would make a better collar than sacrifice.

"You want to take responsibility for him, that means whatever comes next is on you. Show me that the team does still work in its current composition. Win the people, stop the crimes, and do not permit another criminal to escape. I don't care if you want to play tiddlywinks with muggers and vandals: when you face real opponents, do what you were trained for. Take them down."

Not quite so sure this time, there was worry on his face, even as Agent Quantum agreed. "Yes, sir. We'll work hard to show you this wasn't a mistake."

"Let's hope so. Because I do not make the same error twice." Professor Quantum settled down to his desk once more. "You're dismissed, Version Nineteen. I don't care if you tell the others about this conversation or not, just make sure they understand you're out of slack. From this point on, failure will not be tolerated."

"Understood." Agent Quantum turned and left the room, shutting the door softly behind him. All that, and not even a slam. For as much distance as lay between Professor and Agent Quantum, they also had more similarities than the latter realized. That was for the best, though. Such notions only led to attachment, and this was not the right career for that kind of sentiment.

The graves for most of the original Science Sentries, and the multitude of capes who'd fallen since, were all the supporting evidence that hypothesis demanded.

Ivan lowered the phone from his ear, innocuous code phrase already fading. The words had been some fake solicitor offering him a hell of a bargain on used copy machines, whereas the message was quite concise: the traitor was dead. Endless Blitz, once a member of their guild, had been slain tonight.

It wasn't easy, hunting and killing their own, yet it was infinitely easier than managing the guild's defectors if they thought rebellion came without punishment. Another night, it might have been Pseudonym out there, carving carnage out of the betrayer's flesh. Having the kids this weekend had spared him from even the request, though in truth, Ivan would have preferred a hundred bloody battles to the thick tension choking the air in his townhome.

Ever since that morning with Rick, things had been awkward. Better, but still awkward. Whether this was a prelude of things to come or a bump in the road, Ivan had no idea. That would be Rick's call to make, in the end. The most Ivan could offer was the truth when asked, and reassurance that no amount of the past changed where things stood in the present.

He was tempted to touch base with Tori, but that could wait until Monday. Since he'd gotten updates about her team by request, he already knew they were back at the guild safely. That one required a lot less confirmation than making sure they'd killed the right Endless Blitz; the message of Tori's return had come quite a while ago. No need for her to know he was keeping tabs, even if she probably suspected it.

"Dad?" He turned to find Beth standing in the doorway of the stairs, looking confused. Ivan truly had been lost in thought to not even notice her footsteps, soft as they were. "Why are you still up?"

"It is Saturday, isn't it? This is when all the dads stay up for our secret meetings, planning outfits for the coming week to maximize embarrassment, swapping jokes, comparing notes... general dad stuff.”

Wiping the sleep from her eyes, Beth barely stifled a yawn as she went to the fridge, pulling out a bottle of water. Originally, she’d had cups by the bed, but once they realized what an active sleeper she was, Ivan and Janet had switched her to bottles. It minimized the amount of electrical shorts her alarm clocks would have to endure.

“Is it because you and Rick are fighting?” She walked up to him, smashing roughly against his legs with a hug in half-slumbering state. No fear, no hesitation, just embrace. Ivan savored it, more aware tonight than ever of just how limited these exchanges might be.

“We’re not fighting,” Ivan corrected. “Rick is just coming to terms with new things, sorting out how he feels about them.”

Guiding Beth with him, Ivan walked over to the couch, where she quickly snuggled up against his side, pausing only long enough to take a mighty sip from her water. “You’re up this late because you and Rick aren’t fighting?”

Overall, Ivan was deeply grateful that the children took more after Janet than him. That said, there were days when he could have done with them having a tad less of her intelligence and keen observation skills.

“Part of growing up is learning new information about things you thought you already understood,” Ivan explained. “It isn’t always pleasant, and I wish Rick wasn’t having to go through that right now.”

Absentmindedly, he stroked the top of Beth’s skull, just like when she was smaller. A few more years, and this too would be a memory. Time truly was a relentless bastard.

“He’ll be okay. Rick’s grumpy, but also smart and fearless.”

“Fearless?” Ivan loved his son dearly, but that was not the first word that jumped to mind when he thought of him.

Another yawn, this one stretching on for several seconds. “When the school came down, and that metal-person showed up, Rick tried to protect me, throwing books and stuff. He stood between us, even though I was covered in blades.”

It was strange to consider Hephaestus from an outsider’s perspective. While Ivan knew she’d been there to help, to strangers, it must have seemed like she was mounting an attack on the school. The dark armor, the burning jets, and yet Rick had still refused to yield his ground.

While he'd never admit it, for a moment, Ivan wondered if perhaps these fascinating children took more after him than he realized. The important part was that Beth was right. Rick was a good man. Whether that meant Ivan would be forgiven, or even have a relationship going forward with his son, he truly had no idea. But as a father, Ivan had helped to raise the kind of person who stood between someone they loved and a potential killer.

If they never spoke again, Ivan would continue being proud of who his son had become. He'd helped Rick grow into a good, dependable, loyal person. What father had the right to ask, or hope, for more than that?

Soft snores from Beth betrayed that she'd lost the inevitable battle. Gently, like he was holding the most precious gem in the world, Ivan lifted her from the couch, bottle still clutched tightly in her hand. Nearly a teenager, and still small for her age. It wouldn't be long before she was having the same revelations as Rick. How would it feel, to see that same fear reflected in his daughter's eyes?

Ivan put the thought from his head. No need to delve into theoretical tortures when he was already living through a real version. Depositing a brief kiss on her forehead, Ivan walked Beth back upstairs to tuck her into bed. Once she was down, he paused outside of Rick's room, pushing the door carefully open.

Asleep, as he well should be this late at night, Rick looked downright peaceful, an expression Ivan felt he hadn't seen on his son's face in years. Such was the curse of teenagers. In that serene face, Ivan could trace sixteen years' worth of experiences and memories. He could still remember when it was pinched and squealing, being handed off to him by a nervous Janet under the watchful eyes of the Rookstone guards.

That had been right before they went to face Orion, a special visit arranged by Lodestar. The cynic in him said it was because she'd wanted him motivated, fighting with everything on the line. That was why he and most of his ilk would have done it, though. To Lodestar, it was a chance to let him meet his son for the first and likely last time. A picture had gotten him to join. Holding Rick that day... Ivan had learned just what he was truly capable of.

Shutting the door softly, he slipped down the hall. Too many memories were stirred up, flashes of his childhood showing up as well. It was time to call it a night, now that he knew everyone was back safely. There would be fallout from this; the big scenes always drummed up concern, and he'd need to be on game for the week ahead.

Especially considering next weekend he'd be out in the woods, camping with Lodestar.

---

Chapter 64

---

“So, the purpose of the nozzle’s extension—”

“It doesn’t matter what the purpose is. I’m telling you, that thing is way too bulky to be any kind of compact mirror.” Beverly held the aerosolization prototype in her hands, gesturing wilding, making Tori wince slightly whenever it neared the edge of the table. She hadn’t exactly worked on durability just yet. “You either have to shrink it, or find a different product to serve as camouflage.”

A small shriek from the kitchen interrupted them as Chloe was splashed by grease from the pan. After the Saturday they’d been through, it had been nice to spend Sunday relaxing around the apartment. Between the sleeping in and the last few hours tooling around in her lab, Tori was feeling especially refreshed, though the current conversation was draining her fast. She’d been optimistic about integrating the unit into a compact, a notion Beverly seemed intent on disabusing her of.

“Not a hand-mirror then, okay. Wallet?”

“Wallet’s not bad, in theory,” Beverly agreed. “If you were getting mugged, they’d ask you to take it out anyway, so it’s easy to get your hands on. But this thing is a brick. I don’t see people lugging it around all the time the way you have to with a wallet.”

“Plus, it wouldn’t have helped much with your kidnapping.” Chloe slid a charred husk of a flauta from the pan into the trash, adding a fresh one to a now lower-temperature oil. She’d been experimenting with recipes online this morning. So far, this was shaping up about as disastrously as her prior efforts.

Beverly frowned, looking over the item again. “She’s right. That’s sort of the problem with all major self-defense items. You need to be able to get your hands on them in time, meaning you have to already be aware of danger in advance, or get an opportunity to rummage through your purse. Neither is consistently achievable.”

While Tori preferred the storage capacity of a backpack to a purse, she did own a few of the items for more formal occasions. She hadn’t had one on the day in question, so she’d never pictured digging through such an item, but as she replayed the battle in her mind, it was clear there had been no such opening to do so. Beverly was right. The way these devices were most useful was if it was in the victim’s hand already. And to Tori’s thinking, they’d just hit on a very simple way to achieve that.

“Then what if we built these into the purses themselves?” Tori mimed through the air with her hands, drawing the general shape of a handbag. “I can run the wiring up through the handles, create a pair of switches that have to be pressed in unison to prevent misfires, and have the aerosolized deterrent shoot out whichever side we designate for the front. Always in hand, easy to aim, completely non-suspicious—it would even minimize potential chemical blowback.”

Beverly turned the device around once more, no longer looking quite so skeptical. “That could work. Plenty of purses have more heft than this, and you’d be able to fit it into almost anything bigger than a clutch. We’d have to find a way to tell at a glance which way to aim it, ideally without giving away what you’re really holding.” Her gaze drifted off, lost in a flurry of new ideas. It was an expression Tori was intimately familiar with, though she rarely got to see it on others’ faces. “Yeah, I might be able to put something together. It’ll be rough if you want it fast, though.”

“That’s not exactly my most polished work, either.” Tori nodded to her device, proud as she was of it. “Right now, the goal is to show potential. Refinement comes after we prove it works.”

“I’m going to remind you of that when I bust out my first version and you start coming in with notes about thread, design, and—”

The sudden knock made both of them jump, and the flurry of fresh grease pops from the pan meant Chloe had knocked around her current attempt as well. All three looked at each other, the collective mind of the apartment trying to figure out if they had any plans for the day. When no one offered up an explanation, Tori rose from her chair.

“If it’s a salesman, I’m throwing that grease on him,” Tori muttered as she stalked across the room. Before opening the door, she checked to be certain Beverly had tucked the device out of view, then yanked it open.

For a moment, she almost flinched at the sight of Agent Quantum, memories from the prior night’s battle rearing up in her mind. Except it wasn’t Agent Quantum at the door, it was Austin. No costume adorned his body to mark that he was on the job. Even if it had been, he didn’t know he’d recently squared off with two-thirds of the apartment’s occupants.

That much was proven seconds later by his friendly greeting. “Evening, neighbors. How’s the weekend been treating you?”

“Drugs, sex, devil worship—you know. The usual. How’s cape-life?” Without knowing why he was here, all Tori could do was keep things light and hope he’d spill it soon. This was not a situation where she wanted to start guessing.

“Been better. We had a rough one last night—part of why I’m here, actually.” Austin pointed upward, either to Heaven or the roof, or theoretically both, depending on one’s particular love of rooftops. “It was such a shit night, we decided to blow off a little steam. We’re throwing a small party on top of the building tonight. Very small. More of a get-together, really, but there will be food, drinks, and music, so I’ve been assured it counts as a party.”

Tori looked back into the apartment, finding the response warm to neutral. Chloe was still more interested in her cooking practice, and Beverly gave a soft “Why not?” shrug. Having just come to blows with most of the team, Tori wasn’t especially feeling the desire to be social; however, that only made the paranoid part of her brain insist it was all the more necessary to do. Anything that might tip them off to the connection had to be avoided at all costs. Although, even she could admit that might be taking the fear a bit far.

“It sounds like a great time, but Sunday night is kind of a tough one, schedule wise.”

Austin nodded, yet looked undeterred. “I promise, we won’t keep you up too late. And I haven’t even told you the best part. Guess who the other guests are?”

“I mean, it has to be more capes, right? Those are kind of the only people you know in town.”

“Well, yes, though it’s the who in particular that’s notable.” Austin leaned in slightly, as if this was the part that had to be hidden from the walls’ prying ears. “Your friend Donald and his team are going to join us. A week together, and we were barely on speaking terms, but there’s nothing like shared combat to put differences in perspective. I do understand if you three can’t come, just wanted to extend the offer. We probably wouldn’t be on these better terms without your help.”

That complicated matters. Ducking the New Science Sentries was one thing. Avoiding a friend she hadn’t gotten to hang out with in a while was another, far more suspicious matter. There were ways out, excuses she could use to get free, but they would all leave a lingering patina of doubt in people’s minds or risk hurting a friend’s feelings.

“Long as you aren’t offended when I have to turn in for work in the morning, I bet we can swing by. What time does it start?”

“We told the others to be here in about an hour, although Ike and Kyle have already been hauling coolers and decorations up to the roof,” Austin informed her.

From deeper in the apartment, Beverly’s voice piped up. “Decorations? I thought it was just a get-together.”

A ripple of panic seemed to wash over Austin, brief but unmistakable. He recovered in moments, raising his own voice without treading near an actual yell. “It’s our first one in Ridge City. First one anywhere outside of home, actually. We wanted to have some fun with it.”

“Count me in. My curiosity is officially piqued,” Beverly called.

“Me too. I’ll need some dinner. Looks like this recipe is going to take more practice.” Chloe tossed the smoking remains of another flauta into the trash, tying off the bag to prevent the smell from escaping.

Austin’s enthusiasm ratcheted up by several degrees, and Tori didn’t think it had much to do with Chloe joining in. He offered up a big grin and two thumbs, both locked in the “up” position. “Phenomenal. I’ll let the others know, and we’ll see you three soon.”

Tori shut the door once he started walking away, mouthing the word “fuck” as loudly as she dared. After the fight, all she wanted was to spend some time being a normal person—well, normal secret-lab-having inventor, anyway. Now, she was going to spend the evening around the people she and Beverly had traded blows with less than twenty-four hours prior.

It was a good thing Austin had said there would be booze. Tori was definitely going to need a few drinks to make it through this one.

In the streets of Ottawa, children dove into the piles of candy like rich cartoon ducks swimming through a vault of gold. Laying broken in half were the two sides of the giant, tree-shaped piñata, split down the middle by a mighty blow from Rumblejack. The hometown hero was out with the masses, helping direct crowds and traffic amidst the sudden storm of candy coating the streets.

Standing atop a building, watching it all, was not a man with kaleidoscope eyes. This one had quite normal brown irises, though his ensemble was certainly more eclectic. Aviator hat and goggles, billowing purple scarf, a pirate-like ruffled shirt, and polka dot pants formed the foundation of his outfit, on top of which were piled a shifting array of accessories. On this occasion, he sported an earring with a three-foot-long peacock feather dangling from his left ear.

There was no warning before the landing; she came in fast. Her actual approach was slower, however, as she cut a casual pace to the edge where he was watching. Once she arrived, he gave a very small nod of greeting. “Lodestar.”

“Captain Bullshit,” she replied. Taking a long look over the edge, Lodestar surveyed the scene. “Still teaching people to expect the unexpected, I see.”

“It is the burden of many lifetimes. I simply do my part.” He never really turned to her, his attention locked on the exhibition he’d painstakingly created below.

“By blocking traffic for miles and causing general disarray.” Lodestar pointed to the long line of lights stretching out into the distance, all caused by the unexpected appearance of a skyscraper-sized pinata and its subsequent destruction.

Captain Bullshit adjusted his goggles slightly; otherwise, he seemed unaffected by the accusation. “It’s a break in the routine, a crack in the mundane, a chance for people’s lives to take unpredicted turns. Have you come to try and take me back for offering them this opportunity?”

“I obviously should. This is disturbing the peace at a very bare minimum. The problem is we both know that capturing you is almost impossible, and holding you against your will actually is impossible. Right now, the AHC is stretched thin. Trying to take down a reality-warper of your level would be dangerous, to both us and the surrounding area.”

“Shall I take it that you concede?” Captain Bullshit shifted slightly, only to find Lodestar directly next to him. He’d never heard a peep or felt so much as a whiff in the wind. Powerful though he was, she couldn’t be brushed aside.

She nodded down to the street, where the kids were still stuffing their faces with sweets. “Not in the slightest. This sort of stuff, I can live with. It’s far from ideal, but nobody got hurt. Nowhere near worth the death toll from trying to take you down. Don’t change that equation. Don’t become a danger I have to stop. You know where you overstepped last time. Count your years in Rookstone as time served and please don’t make the same mistakes again.”

At first, she thought he would ignore her, but eventually, Captain Bullshit bobbed his head ever so slightly. “Bound as I am by the direction of the art, I can acknowledge that hurting people in the displays lessens the audience who receives the message as a whole.”

While it wasn’t a firm commitment to not injure civilians, it was something. Given that Lodestar was dealing with someone whose power to manipulate reality functioned on a planet-wide scale, this was the best outcome she could hope for. Captain Bullshit wouldn’t be stopped easily; she’d only managed to get him into Rookstone through a tactic that wouldn’t work twice. Until they found a way to seal his abilities, it was better to have an occasional nuisance pester the world than have an entire nation be changed into a smoking crater, or worse.

“I appreciate it,” she said. Lodestar almost took back to the sky, but decided instead to knock out one last question, considering the opportunity. “Since we’re both here, I’ve been wondering about something. We aren’t finding any of the criminals who escaped from Rookstone. It’s like they vanished. No amount of tech or magic can get us a location. Would you happen to know anything about that?”

For the first time, Lodestar’s words produced a real reaction, a wide grin that brightened Captain Bullshit’s face considerably. “A gift, to them, and to the capes.”

“How is hiding them a gift for us?”

The smile only grew bigger. “What glory is there in scooping them up when they are freshly released and weakened? This gives them the chance to recover, grow stronger, offer up a proper challenge to the Alliance of Heroic Champions. You’d have been little more than animal control wrangling escaped beasts. Now, you’ll have the chance to show the world your art once more. I imagine we will be in for glorious displays, once they begin to act in earnest.”

That more or less confirmed her suspicions, as well as hinting that Captain Bullshit’s protection might fade once the escapees got active. Annoyed as she was by the whole ordeal, Lodestar still forced a polite tone into her voice as she said her farewell. “Really wish you wouldn’t have, but I appreciate the heads up. Remember what we talked about, for everyone’s sake. I much prefer these cordial visits.”

She flew off into the sky, her light slowly fading, leaving Captain Bullshit continuing to assess his handiwork. He watched her go, saddened by the spectacle. So much power, yet only the barest amount was ever allowed to shine through. One day, he would set a proper stage for her, give the art a genuine outlet. That would be an ambitious project for another time, however.

For now, he had years of ideas ready to be unleashed, most of which wouldn’t even violate Lodestar’s rule. As for the ones that did, he’d worry about those when he got to them. It wasn’t like he was in a hurry. Captain Bullshit was free, and the world was his canvas. After years in prison, he planned to savor the smaller projects before stirring up any real trouble.

He couldn’t risk being rusty once the true art began.

---

Chapter 65

---

Given the choice between navigating the social minefield of a party with two sets of capes she'd been fighting the night prior, or going through guild initiation training again, Tori easily would have suited up for another day of chasing robots with metal orbs inside. Sadly, no one was offering her such an option, which meant she had to step out onto the rooftop with Chloe and Beverly, officially joining the New Science Sentries' soiree.

The "decorations" that had been promised were sets of lights running between every remotely elevated point to and fro, creating a twinkling, overhead spiderweb. There were smaller touches, as well—a plant here, a tiki statue there—but it was still a level of decor meant to be broken down when the night was through. Featured prominently in the center was a large barbecue pit from which smoke was already rising, tinged with the mouthwatering scent of something roasting. Next to it were two coolers, one of which was open as the thick-fingered form of Ren pulled a pair of beers from the ice.

Like everyone else on the rooftop, he looked human, though in his case, Tori suspected trickery was afoot; she'd realized since their first meeting that he was really Medley. Tonight, his appearance was slightly more formal, with a collared shirt squeezing tightly around his robust form. Illusion, hologram, or full-on magic, all that bulk of Medley's still had to be accounted for.

While she'd never seen them out of mask, the duo talking to Donald and Austin had to be Hat Trick and Cold Shoulder, by process of elimination. Also, it wasn't especially hard to guess when seeing them alongside the rest of their team. Both were dressed slightly upscale, like they were going to a corporate cocktail hour. It made Tori glad she'd allowed Beverly to bully her into a blouse instead of an old t-shirt, along with a smattering of makeup. The goal was to minimize standing out, and fitting into the scene helped to make that easier.

"Pardon us, got some more supplies for the shindig." Kyle's voice caused Tori to jump aside, clearing the rooftop entrance for him, Ellie, and Ike, all arriving with armfuls of accoutrement. Chips, plates, cups, ice, all the party essentials outside of actual refreshments.

Beverly reached out to help, but her hand closed on empty air as Ike vanished, reappearing next to a table covered by a bright blue tablecloth. "Speak for yourself. Some of us just needed line of sight. So lazy, this one. No wonder we have to keep on him."

Ellie was already stalking toward him, the look on her face all the warning Ike needed to dart out of her path.

Muttering under his breath, Kyle blurred momentarily, depositing his burden onto the table and arranging it neatly before reappearing at Tori's side only a few seconds later. This wasn't nearly as fast as Tachyonic moved, however, a detail that Tori couldn't help but note. How much was the difference with and without the suit, she wondered. And did he have a backup bracer? For the first time, it occurred to Tori she might have taken him out of the field entirely until his tech was back up and running. Even more oddly, that didn't sit quite right in her stomach. There wasn't time to process the issue, as Kyle greeted her with the standard stiff half-hug of neither full friends nor casual acquaintances.

"Glad you three could make it. After last night, we all needed to blow off some steam. Wouldn't be the same without our neighbors."

"It's a nice gesture, especially for someone you're just assigned to bodyguard." Tori didn't really expect this to work, but it was important to at least try to keep some distance between her and the New Science Sentries.

To her surprise, Kyle managed an actual laugh. Had losing a fight made him less uptight? Now that was an unexpected side effect. "I guess you're not wrong, but honestly, at this point, you're also the only friends we've really made in this town. But hey, maybe things are turning around on that front." His attention was on Donald and the others, who were looking over as well thanks to the flurry of activity.

Finally noticing her arrival, Donald broke off from his conversation, walking over to embrace Tori warmly. She returned the gesture. It was nice to see him again outside of capes, masks, and kidnapping. When they broke apart, Tori thought she saw Kyle staring, though, when she looked closer, he appeared to be looking past them, at the barbecue.

“Well, well, well, the great superhero finally has time to see his friends from the cubicle days. Let me guess, you want to know if Barb is still pushing for Popcorn Fridays, or if Mustache Stan ever took the hint about microwaving fish.”

“All of it, all of it and more. Don’t you dare skip over the detailed minutes from the last monthly status meeting.”

Tori chuckled, even as the others stared in confusion. Running office jokes didn’t tend to actually be funny; they were more comforting, a constant one could depend upon. In that brief exchange, Tori saw a flash of the old Donald, before the weight of superpowers and the duty they entailed had been yoked around his shoulders. Pleasant though the glimpse was, Tori brought them back to the present. “You know, everyone is really proud of you. When your team does something big, it gets brought up in meetings; Barb even has a ‘Cyber Geek’s Greatest Hits’ wall where she posts news clippings.”

The words hit heavier than she’d expected. Donald almost seemed to have the breath drop out of him. “That’s... unexpected. Your uncle mentioned there was some support the last time we spoke. I never imagined it would be that much. When I was around after the change, most of them seemed so uncomfortable, not sure of how to act around me.”

“People don’t always respond to change well, or quickly,” Beverly interjected. “Obviously doesn’t hurt that now they’re seeing you out there all the time, helping innocents and saving the day.” She patted him once on the shoulder, then wandered over to the coolers with Chloe close behind.

Since Donald still seemed momentarily taken aback, Kyle jumped on the opportunity to join the conversation. “It sounds like you work with your uncle? That’s got to be an interesting experience.”

Every single warning light in Tori’s brain flashed like a nuclear launch had just been announced. Of all the fucking things to mention, Donald had to bring up Ivan. Worse, he mentioned their fake connection, meaning Tori was about to be intrinsically linked to him. Donald was one thing—he was fully tricked by Ivan’s mundane persona. If the New Science Sentries got too close, they might catch something, and that could lead to all manner of trouble.

Unfortunately, try as she might, her brain refused to offer up any solution for how to dodge the question while in Donald's presence. He minimized her ability to obfuscate or lie, so her only choice was to tell the truth, and really lean on how boring and unworthy of discussion her supposed uncle was.

"Oh yeah, it's the best. Total adherence to schedule, constantly double-checking my work, endless feedback, whether I want it or not. Ivan's a good uncle and a solid manager, but he's so uptight and by-the-book."

The small nods from Donald backed up her claim nicely. "While Mr. Gerhardt is one of the better bosses I've had, he does tend to be a bit stiff."

Tori spotted the approach as it was coming, the two forms she'd yet to meet out of costume wandering over, arriving behind Donald before he registered their presence. The shorter one tapped a finger on her team leader's arm, digging the nail in slightly to make sure he noticed.

"Going to introduce us?"

Donald didn't seem to mind the nail—that might just be her way, and he was accustomed to it. He greeted the arrival with the same timid smile as always, gesturing to both women as he faced Tori. "Of course. Perfect timing, too. Tori, this is Irene and Lucy. We work together, and you can probably guess how, but I'll keep the details light. Irene and Lucy, Tori is a friend of mine from my cubical days."

"Trust me, we know," Irene commented. She extended a hand to Tori, which Tori accepted. The woman didn't seem especially distant to her, in particular; rather, her persona read more as an overall antisocial aura, something Tori could not only respect, but understood and envied. Left to her own devices, she'd be affecting a similar vibe, or skipping the outing entirely.

Lucy didn't offer a hand. Instead, she gripped Tori in a tight hug the moment Irene let go and she turned to face the freckled woman. "It's wonderful to meet you! Donald has told us such nice things. I can't wait to get to know you better."

Was there such thing as social whiplash? If so, Lucy and Irene were the tag-team champs of it. Barely recovered, Tori did her best to return the dual greeting. "Good to meet you both, as well. What's say we all move away from the doorway and into the party proper? That cooler is calling my name.”

“A woman after my own heart.” Ike materialized at the edge of the group, sipping from his own open bottle. “If I had one, anyway. Donald, Ren sent me over. Ellie wanted to get some games going and your buddy said you were the man to see.”

Looking somehow sheepish, despite the innocuous request, Donald offered Tori an apologetic shrug. “The joys of being the item guy.”

“I had to chill all the drinks. We pitch in where we can.” Irene clapped him on the back. “Come on. We’ll force Ren to hurry up and choose so you can get back to the revelry.”

“Let’s talk more later,” Lucy called to Tori, before following them both over to Ren.

Ike vanished again, reappearing next to Ren and leaving Tori alone with Kyle, who didn’t linger before gesturing to the refreshment area. “I believe you mentioned needing a drink.”

“Excellent listening skills. Those will take you far.” They walked together over to the cooler, her taking a beer while Kyle pulled out a glass container with what appeared to water inside, marked by three X’s in a row, like an old-time moonshine jug.

“Damn it, Ike, that wasn’t what I meant when I said to label these.” Kyle yelled the words, but Ike’s attention was lost in the sparks of blue light as Donald produced various objects for the night’s activities. “I didn’t want anyone to drink this by mistake. Not healthy for those without super-speed metabolism.”

Cracking the lid, Kyle took a sip, his whole body tensing as the liquid passed his lips. “Oof. That is terrible every time. Cheers?” He held up his bottle, to which Tori clinked her own.

It was surreal to see the New Science Sentries like this, less than a day after fighting with them. In the field, they’d been terrifying. Fast, brutal, efficient—only quick thinking and a few surprises had kept her people out of jail. Yet tonight, they looked like little more than a few goofballs in their twenties. Then again, what did she look like to them? And what would their impression of Ivan be? The more Tori pondered it all, the more she wondered how many other people in her past had been living double lives. The deeper into all of this she got, the harder it was not to speculate about how much she’d missed before.

“Part of me has always been jealous of this.” With a sweeping gesture, Kyle motioned to the entire roof and all its merrymakers. “Live a normal life, make friends, have fun, be happy. Regular people don’t worry about whether or not they’ll be blown apart by some unknown meta, or fail to save someone in peril.”

“Actually, everyone worries about the first one—it’s just part of life these days,” Tori corrected. “I’ll give you the second point, though.” She examined Kyle’s face, not sure if even he knew how wistful it currently appeared. “You could have that, if you really wanted it. Nobody is forced to be a cape.”

“No, I couldn’t. Even if I had it in me to leave my friends behind, it’s only the parts like this that I envy. Tomorrow morning, all the people with normal jobs will wake up to go to work at things they probably don’t care about, simply powering through their days. I’m going to wake up and make the world better, might even get to save a few people. There’s no trading that life in, once it has its teeth in you. When all is said and done, this is the only job for me, so I have to be good at it.”

The kick Tori could still recall ringing her entire suit seemed to indicate that Kyle was well on his way to achieving that, but she couldn’t exactly say it. Instead, she went with something more suited to her perspective than Hephaestus’s. “I’m no expert on capes, but for what it’s worth, every time I’ve seen you fuck up, you own it. You take responsibility and try to fix it or improve, so there won’t be repeats. It hasn’t escaped my notice that no more saved civilians have ended up in Tachyonic’s arms on camera.”

“Maybe I just haven’t saved anyone else worthy of sweeping off their feet.”

Tori rolled her eyes at what she assumed to be a joke, then kept on going. “My point is, if your goal is to be a great superhero, learning from your mistakes seems like an excellent policy to have. Keep that up, and eventually, you’ll run out of new mistakes to make. Pretty sure that’s what they call being competent.”

From the other end of the roof, a cheer went up as tennis rackets were being passed out while Donald was summoning flashing orbs the size of softballs. Ike appeared directly in front of Tori and Kyle, holding a racket in each hand.

“The game has been chosen. It’s sort of like racquetball, only with magic balls that fly around. From some game called Electro-Sport Rodeo, which I might have to buy the next time we've got a day off. Take your weapons and come gather for the choosing of teams. If you're last, they'll stick you with me."

Lifting the racket he'd been handed, Kyle waved it slightly. "Guess that means it's game on?"

"Eh, why not? It'll help work up an appetite for dinner." More importantly, playing an active game made conversation harder, and they'd done plenty of talking for Tori's tastes.

Besides, some part of her couldn't resist the opportunity for a rematch, even if the game was different this time around.

---

Chapter 66

---

Taking a sip from her plastic cup of wine, Beverly surveyed the rooftop scene carefully. Unlike Tori, she hadn't spent the majority of her life eyeball deep in electronics, meaning she had a better grasp of social nuance. Not that the talent was especially called for—most people would have picked up on the dynamics at play, if not spotted them immediately.

Donald and Tori were sitting on chairs, plates loaded with barbecue, catching up on life. While they weren't technically alone—others were seated near them—by keeping the topic to their old lives, they'd effectively locked everyone else out of the conversation. For most of the other revelers, that was no matter at all, but two of the attendees seemed not-quite-comfortable with how familiar the former coworkers were.

One of them, Beverly had seen coming. It wasn't hard to note the way Kyle's fondness for Tori had grown through their interactions. Maybe it was her lack of giving a shit about superheroes, or her brusque nature, but something had been winning him over despite their initial impression. Not that Tori appeared to have registered even the slightest iota of it. It was hard to be too tough on her, given that Donald was getting the same looks thrown his way from Lucy. While there was a chance those glances were out of concern for a team member, it wouldn't be the bet Beverly tossed her money on.

Ike was still occasionally turning his head toward Ellie, who was mostly talking to Austin and Lucy, as Ren and Chloe were in a discussion about a surprise shared interest in some obscure winter sport they'd evidently both grown up watching. Between all the secret identities and hidden feelings, Beverly was starting to feel like she'd stepped into a meta-human version of high school. Not great, but then, she hadn't been able to turn into a dragon in real high school. That wasn't a terrible trade-off.

"Taking a breather?" Of all the capes on the roof, Irene was the easiest to lose track of. Short, intentionally bland wardrobe, largely quiet, she essentially vanished amidst the larger forms and personalities of the others.

"Enjoying the stars for a moment." Beverly had selected her seat partially for this excuse, as it was the point on the roof furthest from any light source. That also made it furthest from sound and activity and was an excellent spot for unwinding.

Irene also boasted a plastic cup, the fizz from within marked it as either a soda or a cocktail, rather than wine. She took a soft sip, then settled down onto one of the cheap lawn chairs dotting the roofscape. Once she was comfortable, she drank once more, then let out a grunt.

"Spot anything interesting?"

"Stars don't tend to change," Beverly replied.

"These days, you never know. I wasn't talking about the sky, though." Irene pointed over to the party, then to Beverly herself. "You're over here hugging the sidelines, trying to get a read on everyone."

Beverly wasn't entirely sure how to react, largely because she didn't know if the words were meant as a compliment or an insult. Rather than make a guess, she decided to play things neutral. "That's an interesting way to look at it. Here I thought I was just taking a breather."

"Maybe you were, and I got the wrong read. Doesn't happen often, mind you. When you're easy to ignore, people let down their guard; helps with catching details. I'm doing pretty well tonight, though, this snafu not counted. Clocked Donald's crush on Tori, and of course, there's Lucy's on Donald. Seems Ike has some unresolved feelings of his own, and then there's Austin."

Those looks, Beverly hadn't caught as many of. That was the nature of things, it was always easier to observe as an outsider. She'd seen snippets of enough to know that they were there. Short flashes, never overt, slightly too constant to be a coincidence. Austin was a knot of complications, none of which Beverly felt like diving into with someone she'd just met. "I work hard to look good. Doesn't bother me that he took notice."

"Except, he's not the only one who hasn't been as discreet as they think." Irene punctuated the statement with another sip from her cup, eyes darting between Beverly and Austin, just in case there was any confusion.

“This is a strange way to try to make new friends.” Beverly didn’t have a reasonable defense to offer: explaining that she’d been watching him in case he was watching her didn’t sound real in her head, let alone as actual words. Her only option was to redirect and hope they veered into a more manageable topic.

“Never been something I’m very good at,” Irene agreed. “A little too observant, and much too honest. Thought I might have spotted a kindred soul, but if that’s not the case, then sorry to have bothered you.”

The chair scraped along the rough surface as Irene pushed it back, rising to her feet. Beverly had a snap judgment to make. Before her current living situation, she would have let the cape walk away, happy for the interaction to be over. Time with Tori had given Beverly more insight to the less socially inclined, however. While it would have been easy to read the whole exchange as an uncomfortable moment, she could also recognize that it had been Irene attempting to reach out, in her own odd way.

“Stop,” Beverly commanded, her tone far more certain than it had been moments prior. “Sit and relax. You weren’t necessarily wrong, that doesn’t mean I want to talk about it.”

Pausing only to readjust the chair so it was angled to better face Beverly, Irene retook her seat. “I can understand that. How about something more standard to first meetings: what do you do?”

The smile on Beverly’s face threatened to push Irene back with how fast and strong it came on. Had she been praying for a topic she could speak on at length without going anywhere near romance or capes, Beverly might have thought someone up there was actually listening.

“What do I do? Settle in, because I’m about to explain the economics of running a fashion content website.”

For as good as Irene might have been at reading facial cues, she wasn’t especially adept at concealing her own horrified expression.

Turning the orb around in her long fingers, Lozora examined the handiwork. She’d never gotten to see any of Cobblord’s creations up close and personal before; in Rookstone, he’d been denied any materials for obvious reasons. On the inside, he'd been a quiet, bookish man who kept to himself. He'd have been eaten within the first week, if not for his usefulness. Cobblord's particular talent made him handy enough to earn protection from some of the more dangerous residents of Rookstone's lowest levels, a debt he'd apparently been paying off since he regained his freedom.

What she held now was a custom job, and not a cheap one, either. Much as she'd have liked to knock it on the side like she was checking a mango, the truth was, she had no idea what she was looking at. It could be a round rock with fancy designs for as much as she could tell. Rather than read the product, Lozora elected to keep her attention on Cobblord's bespectacled face.

"You're sure this will hold Fornax?"

"Certainly not." For as nervous as he always looked, the trepidation never touched his voice. "To my knowledge, that's impossible. It will contain Fornax, for a time, until he breaks free. How long that will take, I can't say. I added a lot of distance, so it would take time to travel, and some obstacles along the way, but there's really no stopping Fornax. Only slowing him down, which is what I was hired to do."

Cockier now that he had a bit of leverage, though Lozora couldn't fault him for drilling down on specifics. Working with these sorts of people meant that, when things went wrong, blame was quick to be spread, so Cobblord wanted to be explicit about what his product was supposed to do. It was a pointless worry. She wouldn't have the option to kill him until the second version was completed, and even then, it was an order she'd probably ignore. Her current employer was scary; that didn't mean he was the person that terrified Lozora the most.

"Fine, so this will slow Fornax down. We deploy it this weekend. I'll bring the results afterward. He'll expect a quick turnaround time on this one."

"They always do. Updates are easier than creation. I still have the model that one was cast from." Cobblord nodded to the orb, then spun in the leather chair, turning back to his workstation. "It was good to see you, Lozora. Now that I know you're my go-between, I'll have appropriate snacks for our next meeting. As I recall, you enjoyed the composition of weight lifters the most."

She stowed the orb, unexpected hospitality dispelling her more murderous thoughts. Perhaps there was a reason he'd survived on the inside beyond just his talent, or maybe he simply had good manners. Regardless, Lozora wasn't going to turn down food on a trip she'd have to make anyway. Especially considering the crap her current employer kept around.

"Keep up the good work, Cobblord. I'd like it if all my visits could go this pleasantly. Saves me from having to lap up the blood."

"Tori! Ren just had an awesome idea. Their team has next Saturday afternoon off—what do you say we all go mini-golfing?" Chloe's enthusiasm was exuberant, even as Ren's face made it clear this was more a casual suggestion than a vetted plan. Nice as the night had gone, Tori was glad she had an actual excuse for the outing, one that would cover her even if they tried to change around the times.

"No can do, I'm gone all next weekend, remember?" Only once those words were out of her mouth did Tori note the curious stares and realize exactly what that excuse was.

It was Ike who posed the question; the people she actually knew were polite enough to let it slide. "Weekend long trip? You didn't strike me as the music festival type, but as long I'm out of costume, sounds like a good time."

Embarrassing as the truth would be for a villain to admit, she took a small amount of pleasure in dashing whatever delusions Ike had spun for himself. At least only Beverly and Chloe would see the full humor in the situation, and they were already up to speed. "My uncle is a Starscout cluster leader, and I pitch in to help. The End of Summer Shindig is some big camping event, so I'll be in the woods battling bugs and filth."

"Add in some hallucinogens, and it's still pretty close to a music festival." Ike's reply was largely lost in the clamor of words amidst Tori's explanation. It wasn't the organization that stuck out to them, rather the one who'd founded it.

"You know, now that I think about it, it's kind of weird we don't do work with the Starscouts," Ellie said. "If Lodestar asked, there'd be no shortage of capes who'd volunteer."

Tori shook her head. “Separate entities, by Lodestar’s own design. She didn’t want the kids becoming targets used for drawing in capes, or the organization to be too connected to the AHC, in case someone got the idea to use it as a recruiting pool. Some capes do volunteer, but on their own, not under the AHC banner.” This much hadn’t been leftover memories from childhood, rather a bit of knowledge absorbed from Helen, who enjoyed sprinkling historical tidbits through the meetings. She evidently had a passion for history, at least where the Star Scouts were concerned.

“Guess that means we won’t be able to follow you up there and make wolf noises. Shame, I’ve got a decent howl.” Ike tilted his head back, as if to give a display, but thought better of it when he caught the death-glare in Ellie’s eyes.

Austin, on the other hand, appeared genuinely concerned. He rubbed his chin, his eyes never fully leaving Tori. “Are you sure that’s safe? Out in the woods, away from society? Seems like the kind of place well suited to another attempt on your life.”

Out in the woods, away from witnesses and police, Tori would be far more dangerous than she was masquerading through mundane life. Powers and tech could be used freely in that situation—none of which she could very well tell Austin. “Look, before you get the bright idea to send a tail along, this is a huge event. Clusters from all over the state meet up. I’m not saying we’re immune to meta-attacks, nowhere can boast that, but I’m pretty sure there’s a few security measures in place, given that there’s tons of kids hanging around up there.”

That was without even mentioning Ivan, who was more than enough on his own, and could be motivated to truly horrific levels if anything put Beth in danger.

“Attacking Lodestar’s charity organization seems like an especially dumb move,” Donald added. “There’s no way she doesn’t keep some tabs on it.”

A robust, far-from-demure laugh escaped from Ellie’s lips. “Sorry, I just imagined some idiots showing up, thinking all they had to deal with there were children, and finding Lodestar waiting for them instead.”

A ripple of chuckles and shudders rolled through the revelers as they all pictured the hypothetical scenario for the half-second necessary to see its inevitable conclusion. Even Austin looked more relaxed, perhaps realizing he'd been overly concerned. "That is a pretty amusing mental image. Doesn't even really matter who the challenger is."

"Well... except Fornax." Like a conversational sniper, Irene killed the light mood with a single phrase. She noticed the sudden deflation as the collective shoulders sagged, but showed no remorse. "What? He held his own with Lodestar back in the day, and now we know he was never really dead. Maybe you managed to avoid seeing any video from the Ridge City Riots, but I watched him smack around Apollo like a cat playing with a mouse. Even the Champions' Congress has enemies on their level."

"Been trying hard not to think about that," Ike admitted. "Though I do have to wonder, where do you hide Fornax for over a decade? Space, right? Had to be space. He'd have torn up any city they let him loose in."

Tori suddenly found herself extremely uncomfortable with the topic of conversation, and worse, she had absolutely no way to signal that without provoking suspicion. None she could think of, at any rate. She shot a brief glance to Beverly, who met the gaze yet said nothing. She'd help where she could, but neither of them was steering this ship.

"Maybe he went civilian," Chloe suggested. "Turned it all around and started living a normal life." For a brief moment, Tori thought she felt her heart actually stop, until she noticed the amused faces on almost all of the capes' faces.

"We would classify that as unlikely." Ren kept his tone as gentle as possible, but there was no getting around the disagreement. "Someone as destructive as Fornax keeping control on his own is probably impossible; if he could have fit in with society, he'd have done that from the start."

No, he wouldn't, because he never had the chance. He spent eighteen years being forced to kill the only people he knew, then was saddled with a destructive force from another plane before ever setting foot in "society." The man they thought of as some wild monster was in fact the most controlled person Tori had ever met. Not that she could tell them that, or any of the other insights into who that villain they knew only by name really was. It was strange; even though the assumptions were helping Tori and Ivan keep their secrets, it still pissed her off that they were being made. These people thought they knew their enemies, but they didn't have the first fucking idea what was really going on.

For a moment, she'd been able to forget what the actual dynamic of the evening was. It had been pleasant, pretending they were just a bunch of young people hanging out and having fun. But that was an illusion, one she couldn't afford to get lost in. This was eight capes hanging out with the two villains who'd slipped their clutches one night prior. If any of them knew who she really was, all their friendliness would evaporate instantly.

Tori had to remember those lines, keep them firmly in mind. One day, if her secret was ever exposed, these capes would probably become her fiercest enemies, feeling betrayed by her deception. She wouldn't even begrudge them that, the enmity would be well deserved. Still, Tori would be better off if she started distancing herself from them once the bodyguard work was over. In all honesty, she knew she should do the same with Donald, as well.

Alliances were one thing, but the longer she had to keep all these lies in place, the more Tori suspected that capes and villains simply couldn't be friends.

---

Chapter 67

---

“At 1:07 a.m., local time, the first alerts were triggered. After I arrived on the scene and began a preliminary investigation, it took less than ten minutes to confirm what we were looking at: extraterrestrials, moving en masse toward our planet. Given the size and number of ships, there can be no question that this is meant to be an invading force. I’ve asked Cresscriss to sit in and offer his expertise, where applicable.”

For once, Lodestar didn’t mind Professor Quantum’s brusque nature. Given what this Monday morning meeting was about, she was glad to quickly cut to the heart of the matter. They’d known more encounters were possible but hadn’t been expecting any after the Grzzniltan forces went fleeing to the stars.

On a large TV screen, several grainy images appeared, showcasing a vast army of ships with a strange, twisting design, like someone had tried to make a spaceship modeled after a particularly gnarly knot.

“Wrexwren,” Cresscriss muttered. Two of his six eyes closed for a long breath as his fingers pressed against the blue skin of his skulltip. “A species whose culture is based predominantly on war and conquest. Since they are part of a loose affiliation of spacefaring peoples, the Wrexwren direct those tendencies toward planets that have yet to reach the stars and attain such protections.”

“Perhaps the Grzzniltans passed them inaccurate information, painting us as an easy target? If they’ve got any enmity toward the Wrexwren, it would allow them to use us as a blunt instrument of vengeance,” Quorum suggested.

Cresscriss made a sound like a sparrow taking a shot of vodka.

“Unlikely. The Grzzniltans prize survival, and large as this force is, that in no way represents the entirety of the Wrexwren armada. Such a deception would bring intense repercussions, but I suppose it is possible if there’s an angle we’ve yet to discover.”

“I don’t care about their motivations. We’ve established them to be hostile. Let’s engage the planetary defense cannons and be done with it. I’ve made great strides in improving them through the years—if we strike before they’re prepared, there is minimal chance any will survive.” No one in the room doubted that if they gave the okay, Professor Quantum would fire on the fleet before the hour was over. That was part of why it took the entire Champions’ Congress to activate them; it had been her and Quorum’s condition on allowing the weapons to be built.

“Before we blow potentially thousands of living beings into dust, how about we entertain the possibility that they’re coming here peacefully? Being from a war-faring species doesn’t change the fact that a sentient creature makes its own choices. Some choose to rebel against the reality they’re presented. Maybe this is a band of Wrexwren outcasts seeking a planet to live in peace upon.”

It wasn’t especially loud, said mostly under his breath, but she noted Quorum’s whisper: “That’s a lot of outcasts.”

Thankfully, Cresscriss came to her aid, in spite of what she felt ninety percent sure was a skeptical expression on his face.

“There is another option to preemptive destruction. The Wrexwren are also a people who take great pride in their strength. I have heard tales that they will settle these matters with a contest of warriors—the greatest of the planet against the strongest of their own. Should they be defeated, the invasion would be called off out of respect for any planet that could birth such a combatant. However, I have never engaged with them directly, so I cannot attest to the viability of such a tactic.”

A click from the remote in Professor Quantum’s hand brought up a new image, this one harder to puzzle out. At first, it looked like another angle with fewer ships, until Lodestar noticed all the darkness. Something was there, blotting out the stars that should be visible, yet it registered as nothing more than a hole in the photo, like the object had been torn out.

“There is another concern. They are hauling something with them, an object my scanners and cameras have thus far been unable to detect. Unless that is standard procedure for the Wrexwren people, we should prepare to be surprised. I doubt they would make this approach without something that gave them the idea of victory.”

Mysterious alien force approaching from the sky? It felt like a fight. In her gut, Lodestar knew where this was heading. Blasting, punching, hurting—she could already feel the cold of space pulling at her skin. But sometimes, on a few wonderful and cursedly rare occasions, she was wrong. Every now and then, things weren’t what they appeared, and it didn’t have to end in combat. She had to fight for those possibilities, especially because so few of the other capes even believed in them.

“Hail the ships,” Lodestar said. “Ask them their intent, and if it’s invasion, see if they’re open to that one-on-one option Cresscriss mentioned.”

“They could lie,” Professor Quantum pointed out.

“Good thing they’ll be talking to the smartest superhero in history, whose brilliance can easily sniff out such deceptions.” Lodestar thought about the first screen again and the sheer number of ships that had been approaching. If things did get bad, that was too many to take out safely. For the Wrexwrens’ sake, she dearly hoped they turned out to be anomalies.

Cresscriss cleared a vocal sack, a noise akin to pudding falling on a tile floor. “I’m not saying attack need be the first recourse; however, you should know that right now is the optimum time to strike. The ships appear to be prioritizing speed, meaning that power to their shields will be minimal. Once they know you’re alerted to their presence, that energy distribution will change. A shot fired preemptively would have the greatest chance of success.”

The words hung heavy in the room, quickly dispelled by a nonchalant wave from Quorum. “Doesn’t matter. ‘Shoot first’ is not the way superheroes work. Besides, more shields or fewer, it changes nothing. If they’re peaceful, we greet them; if not, we send them away.”

“The Wrexwren are a powerful species. I would caution against underestimating them. You three would no doubt triumph against their soldiers; I’m not sure the rest of the AHC will fare as well.”

“Thank you, Cresscriss. Your information has been invaluable, and I’ll need your aid to be sure the Grzzniltan translators we constructed can work on Wrexwren language, as well. It seems we’ll be making contact soon.” Professor Quantum looked unhappy, but when wasn’t that the case? He was much too smart to have actually expected to shoot the lasers; Lodestar would bet he'd already started work on updating their translator. In spite of how much he could push the limits, Professor Quantum had been doing this job longer than anyone else, and had a keen grasp on the way things usually went.

"Since we know what we're going to do, that leaves us with only one major item to get figured out." Lodestar tapped a lightly glowing nail against the polished wood of the table. "First contact with an entire new section of the universe. What do we want to say?"

"Nice ass!"

Johnny Three Dicks smacked the oversized posterior of Thuggernaut as he arrived, earning an annoyed glare from much higher up. There was no remorse in his eyes as he dodged a half-hearted swipe for his skull. "What? I can't take note that my buddy got some new pants?"

"Not the way most people would acknowledge that." Stasis wandered into the room with a gigantic bag of chips in hand, pilfered from some unknown source. She paused, taking in Thuggernaut's non-costumed form, giving a small nod of approval. "Outfit looks nice. Got something fancy going on?"

"Opera tickets," Thuggernaut explained. "In a time zone where it's nearly evening, for a show that starts worryingly soon. Hopefully this doesn't take too long. I only popped by to see what the announcement was."

He, Johnny, and most of the other gathered villains had all gotten the same message, albeit through different methods of communication. Magic metas were more easily reached via sending spells, whereas the tech ones were never too far from an encrypted email. For the more mundane metas like Thuggernaut, a special Indigo Technologies phone with enhanced security was enough to deliver simple messages of when to arrive. The real information was always doled out in person.

Without warning, the television of their breakroom flickered on, just as they knew every other screen throughout the guild had. Broadcasting these sorts of messages was out of the question, but closed-circuit wiring on their island made the dissemination of information far more efficient than gathering everyone in a single space. Safer, too.

Doctor Mechaniacal's voice played as images flashed onto the screen: images of space, dotted by an abundance of twisted ships. "Recently, the guild has discovered an extraterrestrial force moving toward Earth. Based on information obtained from our own off-world sources, these are a people called the Wrexwren, a violent, warring culture who we should expect to arrive aggressively."

The room they'd ended up in wasn't especially full—perhaps five other villains milled about as the message played. Uniformly, they paid more attention to the screen with each passing word. Stasis, Johnny Three Dicks, and Thuggernaut were no exception. Idle curiosity warped into genuine interest; with that simple introduction, the guild was hanging on every one of Doctor Mechaniacal's words.

"It is our estimation that the AHC will attempt to conduct a duel to halt the advance. We also expect the Wrexwrens to lie, cheat, or otherwise work around whatever agreement is struck. There is a high possibility that they will mount some type of terrestrial offensive, attempting to split the AHC's focus between the sky and the ground."

In another place, Stasis imagined the words would find a very different reaction. Fear, most likely, as even the most faithful among the capes would feel a trickle of terror at the idea of aliens attacking the planet again. Earth had triumphed over every past invasion, but the wins hadn't all come easily. Anxiety could be reasonably expected, at the very least, worry over what would happen to one's family or property; even in victory, these battles had a cost.

None of that was reflected in her fellow guild members, however. Greed, excitement, even outright bloodlust, those were the reactions of villains to this news. Because they understood what Doctor Mechaniacal was really saying. An invading force wasn't just a threat to the planet, it was fair game to play with. For all the effort the capes put into keeping the world safe, they weren't going to complain if aliens trying to conquer it suddenly started dying in droves. There would be ships to loot, weapons to gather, and no shortage of targets for all manner of built-up anger and aggression.

This wasn't a warning. It was notice so they could be prepared to live that day to its fullest. Deep down, Stasis almost felt a flicker of sadness for these Wrexwren. The dumb fucks really had no idea what kind of planet they'd be stepping onto.

"All interested parties should contact their council representative for more information. We'll have various travel networks in place on the day of, depositing guild members onto scenes as they become active. Standard guild fees apply."

With that, the screen went black once more. Johnny's eyes were already gleaming; Stasis could all but hear the clatter of coins smacking into each other as he rubbed his hands together. "Aliens, capes, and combat—oh my. What entertaining bets I'm going to see on this one."

Thuggernaut's reaction was more subdued, and worrying. The big man closed his meaty fist a single time, squeezing it tightly. "It's been a while since I got a real match in. I wonder how strong they are."

That was something they'd definitely be finding out; Stasis had little doubt there. With Doc getting everyone prepped and the guild handling the transportation, the villains would be incredibly mobile by the time their visitors arrived. No matter where the aliens set down, they'd soon find themselves beset not just by the planet's defenders, but by its demons. After being dragged into the light and forced out of Ridge City, the entire guild was spoiling to throw a punch. There was no chance they'd be able to hold back once they finally had a viable target.

She tossed an elbow into Thuggernaut's side—the only way to get his attention given his overall bulk. "I'm sure the opera is great and all, but it can't compete with an alien invasion."

"Depends on the opera—and the aliens, I'd expect," Thuggernaut shot back. There was no mistaking the fire in his eyes, though. He was excited. "Perhaps I'll book some training sessions, just to make sure I'm not rusty. If they've crossed light years to see our planet, only seems polite to show them our very best efforts."

"Last time he talked like that, we had to haul people to the hospital in a garbage truck. Count me in." Johnny had a notebook he'd produced from a pocket in hand and was already scrawling rapidly into it. "We can have one of the homebodies run the betting board. I'm not missing my chance at some fun."

It was the same throughout the room, and likely the guild as a whole. The idea of bloodshed should have had them concerned, but that was why they were here in the first place. This was not an organization of petty criminals and simple ruffians. It was a home of villains, beings defined by their power and ambitions. They didn't see a threat; they saw a challenge, a chance to test themselves against invaders from another world.

When the Wrexwren arrived, they would find the guild ready, waiting, and above all else, burning for a fight.

---

Chapter 68

---

As the final Starscout meeting before the weekend's End of Summer Shindig, the evening served largely as one last preparation session for the children as well as their cluster leaders. The kids were finishing up banners, signs, and other craft projects that would hang alongside the other clusters' work, marking their respective areas. Ivan was manning the kitchen while simultaneously running through a checklist of items to make sure everyone packed and surreptitiously making notes on the ones he knew at least a few of the kids would forget. He'd already cooked enough treats and snacks to keep them fed on a weeklong march; Tori was almost certain there would be some sort of magic at work to fit it all in his car on the drive up.

Helen appeared to have settled on guiding the kids and messing with Ivan as her main trip-planning tactics. To her credit, she was excellent at both, helping the scouts stay on task while calling out that Ivan had skipped ridiculous items such as inflatable bounce houses and standing sleeping bags. If it annoyed him, he was hiding it from the room, though Tori was fairly sure he didn't mind. Ivan wasn't a terribly expressive person—perhaps that was why she and her mentor understood one another as well as they did. It almost seemed like he was enjoying Helen's teasing, which was possible. They were both single adults and perfectly entitled to flirt, though she'd be surprised to see Ivan on a date. One more person to keep secrets from didn't seem like it would be that appealing to him.

Tori herself was mostly filling in where needed: grabbing more supplies for the kids, cleaning up small messes before they became big ones, generally working support for the enterprise as a whole. She dropped a fresh bottle of glue next to Beth and Armand, who were teaming up on a particularly intricate glitter-star on the cluster's sign, noting that Ivan's daughter whispered, "Thanks," even in the midst of her work. The more Tori saw of Beth, the fonder she became. All of the kids were growing on her, though she was still quite happy when the meetings came to an end. Fondness or no, Tori only had so much energy to give.

"Hey, Tori, heads up! One for the trash." Helen called the warning before she tossed over an empty tube of paint, which Tori snatched from the air. "Nice! Someone's got the kvizblork tonight."

The tube of paint almost slipped from Tori's firm grasp in surprise. "Did you just quote The Sashay of Gelzork?" There was no way she'd heard that right; it was much too deep of a cut, even for someone else who liked foreign flicks. Tori's uncertainty lasted only until she finished tossing away the tube and caught the wide-eyed glee in Helen's reaction.

"You got that? Hot dog, nobody else I know digs into the Omdilbom section on Multerion." The excitement brimming from Helen was one Tori was almost embarrassingly familiar with; it was the energy of someone with a secret passion who'd finally found an outlet. "Did you watch any of the Kaldesian octology, or Finding the Tesseract?"

At Helen's feet, a curious face turned from the sheet of construction paper and up to the cluster leader. "What are you talking about?" Caden always looked a tad confused, but now, his forehead was positively scrunched.

"We're talking about movies," Helen explained. "Movies from other planets and cultures found across the broad array of alternate universes. Multerion is a service that collects and exports the greatest artistic achievements in film, ones that reoccurred over and over in various verses. Works of high art, meant to be shared with more than just the world that created them."

At Caden's side, Mallory leaned over, whispering with the trademark loudness of a child. "She means movies with subtitles."

"Oh." With that, the entirety of Caden's interest fled, his face turning back to the construction paper, utterly exiting the conversation.

"They don't all have subtitles." Helen seemed more to be grumbling to herself than the kids. "A lot of them are from worlds that look and sound like ours."

Loud noises from the kitchen signaled Ivan's emergence with a tray of steaming cookies. Most of these would be saved for the trip, though a few were fated to be consumed by the current swarm of children. Such was the tithe for baking around them. Noting the already hungry stares, Helen snapped into motion so the sweets would have time to cool.

"Okay, everyone, let's take a crafting break." Helen managed to pull both their attention and their silence with a calm voice, a talent that untold teachers would have killed to steal. "Find a good stopping point. It's time to stretch those legs for a bit. If you'll all follow me into the backyard, we can review our weekend events and make sure no one has questions, then play some practice rounds so everyone is comfortable. By the time we're done, I suspect Mr. Gerhardt's cookies will be ready. Tori, could you come with and give me a hand?"

Having seen where this was headed, Tori was already moving for Helen's side. Across the room, Ivan was scooping the cookies onto a wire cooling rack, cutting down on the amount of time they'd have to buy. He looked over to Helen, and it almost seemed as if a smile was trying to force its way onto his face. Instead, it warped into words as he called over to them. "Should I presume you'd like me to hold one back for you?"

"Utah, gimme two." Helen bumped Tori with her shoulder, the shine of expectation nearly glowing on her.

Might as well come clean, rather than drag this out and cause more disappointment. "Um, I haven't really gone through everything yet. Mostly just the sci-fi ones." Tori braced for Helen to be disappointed; instead, she was treated to a grown woman actually clapping her hands together in excitement.

"Hang on. You haven't even seen... wow. Wow. So many amazing things to show you." A rowdy swell of noise from the kids brought her back to the moment at hand. "Later. Things to show you later. For now, let's get out there and do our best. After this, the next time we get together is for the drive on Friday. Make sure you feel ready."

The scent of cookies still hung heavy as they herded the kids out into the night air, which was just cool enough that a bonfire would be perfect once the weekend rolled around. So far as Tori could tell, the kids seemed pretty prepared. No new cluster members meant they'd all been to at least one of these before, and Helen had been adamant about ensuring that every child knew what to expect. Maybe it was a safety issue, so that if anything did suddenly go off-kilter, the kids would be wise to it.

Such security was obviously unnecessary, not that Tori held it against Helen. The woman had no way of knowing that her supposed cookie-slinger was a nigh-unstoppable force of destruction, one that would do anything to keep his daughter safe. Sometimes, seeing him in that apron, Tori had to remind herself about who else Ivan was. That was what made his cover so perfect, and so powerful. Even the New Science Sentries, when trying to solve the mystery of Fornax, had tossed off any notion that he would live a simple, human life.

That party had been a clear reminder of the stakes at play where secret identities were concerned, reinforcing the importance of that separation. Tori's main goal for the End of Summer Shindig was for nothing out of the ordinary to occur. Barring that, her primary focus would be on keeping the kids safe and protecting Ivan's secret. Because if something did come to cause trouble, there was no way Ivan wouldn't stop it, very possibly exposing his secret in the process. Crazy as the worry was, Tori couldn't shake it—not when she knew the consequences. Fornax might not have warrants out anymore, but Ivan would never have his normal life back if the truth came out. No more regular job in middle management, no more blending in, and definitely no leading a Starscout cluster.

Although, part of Tori would have liked to see the look on Lodestar's face if she ever found out that Fornax, of all people, had worn the uniform of a cluster leader.

Beverly changed the pattern, watching as the computer loaded a new design onto the digital model, then frowned. Still too busy. She needed something that would tell the owner at a glance what was the front versus the back of the purse, yet wasn't so gaudy the buyers would be ashamed to carry them.

It was possible that Beverly was being more critical than she needed to be out of nerves, trying to keep her mind off the coming visitor. Though she hadn't taken Chloe up on the private room, she had elected to have the meeting at Ridge City Roasters. Despite the late hour, her corner of the room was oddly unoccupied, something she attributed to Chloe managing even from behind the counter.

The moment Ambrose walked in, she knew it. Not many fellows cast a shadow that tall and wide, or carried themselves with his level of confidence. Ambrose looked like what Beverly had thought of as a cape growing up: big, strong, and with a pronounced chin. It was hardly surprising she'd made that association, either. As her biggest brother, Ambrose had been her hero before she even knew what capes were.

He opened his arms to hug her, then suddenly lost a step. At sight, they'd been overtaken by familiarity, but now the awkwardness of their situation had returned full-force. Beverly ignored the hesitation, barreling in and hugging her brother tightly. Seconds later, he returned the gesture, until they finally parted and hunkered down at the table.

"You look well," Ambrose observed. "Managing to deal with roommates so far?"

"Compared to all the family coming and going at our house? I might as well be living at a spa, it's so peaceful."

The start of a frown tugged at his lips. "Not how I'd categorize having a roommate become national news." It seemed they weren't going to avoid the main topics up front; Ambrose was diving right in.

"Because that was obviously her fault." Even Beverly was surprised by the venom in her voice. She was sick of the bullshit Tori had been dealing with just from the sidelines.

Ambrose was momentarily taken aback, though he soon gathered himself. "Right, of course not. I just meant it could potentially be dangerous. No one's fault, only the situation as it stands."

Beverly leaned in, glad for an excuse to cut past the pretense. "Dangerous for who, exactly? Are you scared some kidnappers are going to come calling in the middle of the night? And then what? You know guns don't work, and I've learned more tricks since then."

"That is precisely what I was afraid of." Ambrose rubbed the back of his neck, where a small scar from rogue shrapnel still acted up when he got stressed. "You've been experimenting with it? I understand you had to get control, but pushing further is too risky. What if you get stuck that way, or start to lose your sense of self? That monster is scary as hell with you in the driver's seat. I don't want to imagine it running wild."

“Then your advice would be to ignore that I even have this power at all, keep it locked up for the rest of my life?” Beverly demanded.

“Only if getting rid of it entirely isn’t an option.” In contrast to the words, Ambrose’s tone was gentle. It was plain to see that this was all coming from concern for his sister, which at least made it more palatable. “You’re messing with magic you know nothing about, except that you found it in Gran’s collection of junk. If you want to be stronger, we can get you there. Without magic, without powers, without anything even remotely connected to those fucking capes.”

The last bit came out harsher, but Ambrose didn’t slow down. “That’s the biggest fear around the house, you know. That one day, we’ll turn on the screen and see you out there, wearing the outfit, serving that piece of shit and his organization.”

Beverly’s hand landed firmly on Ambrose’s, squeezing it tight. “Look: nobody, me included, knows where my life is heading right now. This was a curveball that I was in no way braced for, but I’m not going to pretend it didn’t happen. I have these powers. Maybe I’ll choose not to use them; maybe I’ll find a good outlet. Either way, I have to face what I am to get past this. That said, the one thing you will never have to worry about is me working for Professor Quantum. If I get within punching distance of that motherfucker, you better believe he’s going to be seeing green. Scaly green and fist-shaped, to be precise.”

“Not exactly what the family was hoping to hear, but it’s an excellent starting point.” Ambrose laid his other hand on top of hers, creating a hand sandwich, and pressed it between his. “I suppose the next step is for you to tell me about these ‘tricks’ you’ve been working on.”

“Aren’t you worried that asking me about it might come off as encouragement?”

This time, there was nothing muted about Ambrose’s expression; he broke into a smile that lit his whole face. “Speaking as a representative of the family, it’s a necessary risk for bonding. But speaking as your big brother, I might be coaxed to admit that dragon-shifting powers do seem pretty cool. Enough to warrant at least a few questions, and a bit of subtle encouragement.”

Ambrose winked, and Beverly closed her laptop. It was starting to look like she’d want to be here for a while.

---

Chapter 69

---

The hurdle shot up from the ground, moving so fast no normal person could have reacted in time. Kyle swung wide with ease, his enhanced sense of time rendering the surprise in slow motion. Touching a few sections of his new bracer, he altered the setlium output slightly, dropping his speed. Professor Quantum didn't permit the same failures twice. In his eyes, a piece of tech failing meant it needed to be refined, situation be damned. It was part of his philosophy as a whole: improve upon what worked, cast aside everything else.

In this case, the new bracer had an updated interface allowing for easier control, reinforced construction to make it harder to break, and it now sent an emergency signal to stabilize the output if it was damaged or disconnected. Next time a villain targeted the bracer, even if they succeeded in disabling it, Tachyonic wouldn't spin out of control. It would be nice to feel as sure about his own capabilities.

As he ducked under a spray of darts, Kyle felt the suit shift with him, flooding his body with high amounts of setlium radiation. He was supposedly lucky, according to Professor Quantum. Not many metas could handle a technique like this; their cells wouldn't drink it in the way his did. This level of augmentation was possible only thanks to that unique talent. Even Austin and Professor Quantum couldn't amplify themselves this way. Then again, they also didn't require the extra help. They were strong enough to hold their own without the need for supplemental tools.

It was an old sore spot in his ego, one that Kyle would consistently feel like he'd moved past, only to be knocked back into it sooner or later. He wasn't enough without the external help. All the others, even Ike, were on the team under their own power. Kyle alone needed the boost to stand alongside them. And this was a victory; there had been a time he didn't think he'd make the cut. That was why he had to be better—at the job, at supporting his team, all of it. Kyle had to prove he belonged there, that he wasn't just Austin's plus one, brought on out of friendship more than talent.

Zippering through an off-ramp, Kyle left the training track, blurring into the waiting room where Austin was doing push-ups. "Can you not let me catch up for a moment before you go off training on your own?"

"No can do. That Bahamut fight was tough as hell. I'm not sure I could have won if it had gone the distance. That means my only option is to get stronger for next time."

About what Kyle had expected. It had been some while since Austin lost to anyone outside an established cape. Going against a real opponent had gotten him stirred up. There was a renewed fire, spurred on by the reminder of how much room there still was to grow. Not beating Lodestar was one thing; having some random crook hold their own against him was a different matter entirely.

Flexing his right hand, Kyle checked the bracer functions while it cooled down, his suit no longer crackling with energy. As it changed, his senses slowed—never quite down to human levels, but nowhere near what he could do in peak Tachyonic form. "The new model is working fine. Going to take a while to get used to, so I'll log some extra training hours when I can."

With a look to the track, Kyle's mind flashed to their practice chambers on Vomisa. "Might swing by the island once I'm feeling more stable. The facilities here aren't quite as challenging as what I'm used to."

"There's nothing wrong with training that doesn't put you at risk of bodily harm." Austin finished his push-up set, rising to his feet. "You looked good out there, didn't seem to be missing a step. How do you feel?"

"Stupid, mostly," Kyle admitted. "I can't believe I got my bracer cracked by some asshole already."

The heavy hand patting Kyle on the back was familiar, annoying, and unprotested. "I think you're being hard on yourself. You say 'some asshole,' but those two were meta-humans with training and preparation, ones who've squared off with capes before. Donald's team suspects they're connected to that guild of villains. Not the sort of enemy easily brushed aside.”

All of which was true, but Austin was skipping over the fact that everyone else had at worst been handed a draw. There was no denying that Tachyonic had lost. He knew there had been fallout from Professor Quantum, and that Austin was probably shielding him from it, which only made the guilt he felt over failing all the worse.

That wasn’t something an apology was going to fix, however. The only course Kyle had was to improve. Get better, stronger, and hell yes, faster, so that when the next bout came, he’d be an asset rather than a fuckup Austin had to take heat for.

“Next time I see Hephaestus, he won’t get the chance to surprise me.” Heat rose in his cheeks, his mind flitting back to the after-incident report they’d been given. “I can’t believe there aren’t warrants for those bastards.”

Another few pats, though these were more subdued. “The law is the law, and ultimately, there was never any proof they were committing a crime. I wish we hadn’t ended up being their alibi, though.” Austin had been the first to learn about the slaughter in the same town where they’d been fighting, and he’d quickly passed it on to the others. Whatever happened in that blood-drenched place, Hephaestus and Bahamut couldn’t have been present. All meta-forensics indicated it was still going on when the New Science Sentries were on the scene.

“They’re smart.” Kyle tapped a few more buttons, finishing off the cool-down cycle on his suit. Donald and Ren had recounted the way Hephaestus used the law against them. Whoever that crook was, he came at unexpected angles. “We’ll have to be smarter.”

“For the moment, I’ll just be happy when you’re back at full power,” Austin said, steering them away from the topic of vengeance. “I never feel comfortable without you watching my back.”

One last shake of the arm to make sure everything was holding well, and Kyle fully powered off the bracer. This was the third test, and so far, there hadn’t been any glitches. The new unit was working just fine. Time to take it out of the lab and make sure it could handle the actual work.

“In that case, buzz the team and go grab a mask. I think it’s time to put this baby through its paces.”

“You’ll pay us to... cause trouble.” To look at Edna, one would form some fast opinions based on her appearance. Being a burly meta meant she had a tall, muscular frame. Unfortunately, some of the side effects of her condition included a receding hairline and unnaturally colored acne. By modern standards of beauty, she wouldn’t be winning any hearts. Not that it mattered; Edna wasn’t running things because of her looks, or even her strength. She had a keen eye for details and a gut that never steered her wrong—that was why the others trusted her.

At the moment, that gut was screaming that this guy was trouble, same as it had when Balaam came calling. The sorcerer had seen her people as nothing more than cannon fodder, and Edna knew what happened to fodder in a battle. This gentleman was making a more enticing pitch, yet she still kept her guard up.

“That is correct,” Wendel Worthington replied. He was stoic, only smiling thinly at any attempts toward levity or ice-breaking. There something about his eyes that set Edna’s nerves buzzing: twin voids lacking any sort of human connection. “Specifically, to cause trouble at a time and general geographic area of my choosing. Transportation can be arranged, or you may handle it with your own resources, if security is a concern.”

“My concern is not security.” Edna pointed a thick finger up to the restaurant’s tastefully painted ceiling. In this private room, it displayed a lovely design of interwoven circles. “My concern is the people who zip around through the sky, smacking the shit out of any crime they spot. We lay low, Mr. Worthington. Stay off the radar of the big fish. What you’re proposing sounds a lot like the riots that got so many people tossed in jail a few months ago.”

At that, Wendel bristled. “Certainly not. Balaam’s hubris allowed him to think he could actually win, which is preposterous. This is merely a strike during a window of opportunity. I happen to have it on good authority that there will soon come a day in which all of the major capes are occupied. When that time arrives, those with forewarning will be able to pounce, taking advantage of their distraction. However, there are always new members of the AHC joining, and I’d prefer to work uninterrupted. Your job would be to help cause enough mayhem that the remaining forces are scattered. Should a cape close in on your particular position, feel free to escape. Reach that point, or make it until the end; I’ll consider the job accomplished, regardless.”

The offer to run made it more enticing—Edna never went into any situation without an exit strategy. From the trolley of food sitting at the side of their table, she pulled off a rib and bit into it, bone and all. It was a trick she'd picked up initially for negotiation intimidation, but was also a handy way to get at the tasty marrow within. Seeing as Wendel was bothering to butter her up at a nice restaurant, she might as well enjoy it.

“How big of an area are we talking? A city, a block? How much room do I have to work in? Some of those capes can close in awfully fast.”

There it was, that thin smile, like he was afraid to stretch his mouth. “A fine question. You will be given an area of roughly ten square miles within a major metropolis. Ample space to select targets, as well as adequate cover should escape or concealment be necessary. Also large enough that, were you afraid I was laying some sort of trap, the area would be much too large for an ambush.”

“Depends on how many forces you brought.” Edna didn't really believe her own words; she knew her gang wasn't high enough on the food chain to warrant such effort. If they pissed off someone truly dangerous, they'd be butchered where they stood. Traps were laid for tougher prey. “But ten square miles of city isn't bad. That's about four football fields' worth of stuff, and in an urban environment, it'll be packed with options.” Since Wendel only wanted chaos, Edna wouldn't even have to mess with well-defended targets like banks or stores. She could focus her people's efforts on activities that were flashy, with minimal risk of capture. Hit hard, steal a little extra, then escape before things got too hot.

In front of Wendel sat only a single cup, filled with hot tea. He lifted the drink from the saucer and touched it briefly to his mouth. Edna wasn't completely sure she'd seen him imbibe or ingest a single bit of their meal together. Not the strangest thing, perhaps. Different cultures had different attitudes toward eating in public, and more than a few meta-humans were self-conscious about how they looked while dining. He could have just said that, though. It was the seeming pretense, the pretending to drink, that put her on edge. Between that, the smile, and those damned eyes, Edna felt very much like she was across from something playing at being human.

Issues aside, what he was pitching might indeed be lucrative. Based on the few details being doled out, Edna could guess he'd made a similar pitch to other outfits, with more to come. A game like this relied on numbers; Wendel wanted enough noise to drown out whatever he was planning. That meant there would be plenty of people causing trouble, and her team, ideally, would not stand out. So long as they came at it smart, picked the right targets to avoid pulling in any capes or cops, it should be possible to do the job, get the money, and avoid ending up in a cold cell. They were going to be ready to run, though; this was not a situation where Edna wanted to overextend.

“Assuming the details line up with what we can manage, I think this could be a working arrangement.” Edna was careful to leave herself an out, just in case. People like this didn’t react well to plans changing, but there was no way she was giving total commitment until everything was settled.

“I am glad to hear it, and I have faith we’ll be able to come to terms on the minor matters.” Wendel lifted his cup once more, only this time, there was no thin smile waiting. At last, those lips truly parted, revealing teeth that were artificially white, then kept on stretching, well past the point of good taste.

Now, Edna understood why Wendel kept his face so neutral. When it twisted in emotion, the wrongness of it all could be seen. Something off, inhuman, in the way that mouth kept growing, revealing more and more of those near glowing teeth. He lifted the cup higher, making a short cheers.

“To new business.” She watched as he tossed the tea down his throat, not even reacting to the steaming liquid splashing against tender mouth-flesh.

With great effort, Edna kept a tremor of fear from making it to her hands as she lifted her own glass of water. Under that watchful dark eye and hideous smile, she drank, already wondering if this was all a terrible mistake.

---

Chapter 70

---

It was a meeting that complicated things. Originally, the plan had been simple. Ivan would leave work a few hours early—with permission, of course—to go pick up Beth. He'd then circle back to scoop up Tori as her day was finishing, bringing both of them to the meeting point. There, they would join the rest of the cluster on a rented bus that would take them to the End of Summer Shindig. Slightly inefficient, but it minimized the amount of potential crossover between his lives.

Unfortunately, once Danny from marketing got on a roll, he could run for quite a while. That had turned what was supposed to be a simple spec meeting into a brainstorming session for new features and ideas, none of which would ultimately be implemented. Losing time was bad enough; losing it to pointless ego would have put Ivan in a foul mood under different circumstances. Faced with the prospect of a weekend spent bonding with his daughter, though, Ivan's temperament was softer than usual. It was hard to be mad when something so wonderful was on the horizon.

A positive outlook didn't solve the issue, however. That honor had fallen to Ivan's pragmatism, which quickly outlined the easiest solution to stay on schedule. He could either send Tori in one of the guild cars, or bring her along to pick up Beth. Except, Tori arriving separately would invite needless questions, since he and Beth had already gone over their existing travel plans. It would probably be a small matter to explain them away, but Ivan's recent experience with Rick was an excellent reminder that minor inconsistencies added up over time. The fewer questions asked, the fewer answers sought.

“You okay? If I didn’t know better, I’d say you were nervous.” Tori had largely been staring out the window as they made their way across Ridge City to Janet’s home. Something must have caught her attention, as she’d shifted her focus to Ivan. He didn’t feel as if he was showing the stress that badly, which meant he either wasn’t hiding it as well as he thought or Tori was getting better at reading him. Not a huge surprise—they were similar people who spent large amounts of time together—but also not a development Ivan was fully comfortable with.

The drive to Janet’s was rote after so many years; Ivan may as well have been one of Wade’s bots for all the mental effort it demanded to take the proper highway exit, plunging them into the outlands of suburbia. Ivan had been debating how much to tell Tori. He didn’t want to color her perceptions needlessly, but if she’d picked up on his energy, then forewarned was likely the best strategy. “There is a chance you’ll meet my ex-wife today. She’s working from home, so depending on whether or not she’s on a call when we arrive, Janet may come out to bid Beth farewell.”

He watched surprise morph to curiosity, then continue its evolution to speculation, all in a single brown-eyed blink from Tori. There was no guessing what sorts of images she’d conjured for the former Mrs. Fornax, save only that all of them were wrong. Nobody ever saw Janet coming—it was part of what made her all the more dangerous.

“Anything particular I should know going in?” A sudden sheen of fear washed over her face. “Oh shit, wait, what does she think our relationship is? Did she get the uncle story, or is it like with the kids, and I should stick to just being coworkers?”

A perfectly reasonable question, one that nevertheless pained Ivan to answer. He’d had to read Janet in on Tori at the start. She needed to know the cover story, and deserved forewarning about potential threats to the family, had Tori turned out to be that particular brand of evil. It still felt like a small betrayal to have given away part of Tori’s secret to someone else.

“She knows you’re part of the guild. I never went into specifics on powers or the like, but Janet is aware of our real connection.”

“Yeeesh. Couldn’t you just have said I was some prospect with a shitload of potential that the company would be eternally lesser without?”

Ivan cocked an eyebrow. “Eternally lesser?”

“I’ll have you know that I’m the one who reformatted the meeting request form. You think that bad boy shrank two pages on its own?” Tori rapped her knuckles against the dash, putting extra punctuation on her next words. “Eternally. Lesser.”

“Don’t get too carried away. If you remove all the bottlenecks and slow-downs, people will realize management doesn’t actually do anything.”

Affecting a solemn nod, Tori appeared to consider this revelation. “You’re right. I can’t go down that road. Getting rid of middle management is more a cape move than a villain one. I guess I should... add more hurdles?”

“That’s called working toward a promotion.” Ivan’s mood brightened as he turned down a familiar lane. Anxious as he was about the potential collision of worlds, the worry was having a hard time overtaking his excitement for the weekend ahead.

They pulled into the driveway and Ivan killed the engine, reaching for his seatbelt. By the time it was unclicked, he could see the figure walking out the front door. Part of him had hoped Beth would be waiting, so eager for the trip she’d come bursting from the house with bags in hand. Sadly, the figure was much too tall to be Beth, though it perhaps did offer some insight into the height she could one day inherit. Janet was dressed for work—matching jacket and skirt atop a pressed shirt, even though nobody was around to see it. That was just her, one of the eccentricities Ivan had acclimated to in their marriage. It wasn’t as if he’d had any room to throw stones.

Her finger rapped against the passenger window, startling Tori slightly. With one glance to Ivan for confirmation, which he gave, she rolled down the window, allowing Janet to speak.

“Beth couldn’t find her phone charger. She’s hunting around for it.” Now that the partition was no longer between them, Janet gave Tori a more thorough examination, adjusting her glasses midway through. “You must be Tori, the one who’s been helping out with the cluster. Pleasure to meet you.”

Through the open window, they shook hands, Janet continuing to stare. “You, as well. Ivan’s told me such nice things about you.”

“No, he hasn’t. He’s been respectful, but also made it clear I’m a pain in the ass.” Janet finished shaking Tori’s hand, releasing unceremoniously. “I have to live most of my life lying, thanks to Ivan’s past, so let’s dispense with it where unneeded.”

Brusque, though Tori was hard-pressed to say it was inaccurate. Hiding a major villain as a husband, ex or current, was bound to be a complicated matter. She was having enough trouble keeping her own identity secret, and that was without anywhere near the fame of Fornax.

“It keeps things simpler, anyway. Look at it this way: if I weren’t in the know, there’s really only one believable cover to use when a middle-aged man pulls up to his ex’s house with a younger woman.”

“Janet!” Ivan hissed, while Tori felt a small bit of blood rise to her face.

She paid little attention to either, most of her focus remaining on the door. “Relax. We already established I’m aware that’s not the case. The lie wouldn’t work, anyway. I know it’s not the younger ones who catch your fancy.”

This time, there was nothing subtle about the blush, as Tori realized she was getting back-scenes extras on this relationship that she very much did not want to know. Deciding that it was better to jump into the awkwardness than sit through whatever it was this was heading, Tori spat the first words that leapt to her mind.

“How did you two crazy kids meet in the first place? I’m guessing it wasn’t sharing a soda down at the malt shop.” This was something she’d been sincerely wondering for a while. The settling down part made sense because of Rick, but how did a super-villain and a normal person end up dating to start with?

The response wasn’t immediate. For an instant, Janet looked up to Ivan, and a flicker of the past flashed between them. “Stupidity, youth, and adrenaline. I was going through a rebellious phase, taking up at bars without the safest of reputations. One night, a gang decided they’d like to help themselves to the till, regardless of what the bar’s owners thought. Came in with guns drawn, screaming orders, even shoved a pistol into the face of a patron.” The wistfulness died as Janet shook her head. “When Ivan ripped the forearm from the elbow, gun still in hand, I wasn’t sure if the bar was screaming more in horror or surprise. But watching him savage those robbers... well, if I were making smart choices at the time, I wouldn’t have been there at all. There was something appealing about a man that capable.”

Having seen Ivan go into Fornax mode, Tori wasn’t sure “appealing” was the categorization she would use, but clearly she and Janet had different tastes. The story tracked—a situation like that was bound to stir someone up. The effects of adrenaline on libido were well documented. It didn’t fully explain Ivan’s side of things, but then again, Tori had never known Ivan in his Fornax days. Janet was a striking woman. If that version of Ivan was more open to socializing, she'd certainly have been able to turn his head.

"Mind you, decades later, my kids are going to be stuck at a new school while theirs is getting rebuilt, because one of Ivan's supposed allies blew it up. So take a lesson here, Tori. Don't hook up over bloodshed. It doesn't lead to the wisest of choices."

Not wanting to touch the vast majority of that topic, Tori steered into the one bit she could comment on. "It's a shame about the school. Looked like a pretty nice place."

"How do you know—?" The flash of understanding in her eyes came without warning. Immediately, Tori watched Janet's entire demeanor shift. She didn't lose the stiff spine or set chin, but the rest of her expression softened noticeably. "You're the one."

"I'm the one?" Tori was accustomed to hearing those words with a tone of accusation, not gratitude, momentarily blinding her to the obvious truth.

The hand was so unexpected, Tori almost jerked back before it landed lightly on her shoulder. Janet held her there, making uncomfortably direct eye contact. "Thank you, Tori, or whatever your name is while in that suit. Thank you for being the only person in that fucking guild who cared enough to go protect my children."

It wasn't fair; the others hadn't even realized Rick and Beth were being targeted. Tori had only gotten the information because she beat it out of Rust Tooth when he tried to kill her. Knowing all of that versus being able to communicate it at the time were different matters, and Janet didn't seem to be inclined toward listening where the guild was involved. Ivan could clear things up, if it mattered. Tori was just trying to get through this.

"Given the, uh, delicate situation, I, um, can neither confirm nor deny anything, ma'am." That earned her a laugh from Janet, a gentler sound than Tori would have predicted.

"I can see why Wade paired you two up. That's fine, Tori. You don't need to say a word. Just know I'm grateful. Whatever else is going on in your life, you put yourself in harm's way to protect my kids. That's not the sort of thing I'm going to forget." Janet released her grip, casting a glance back at the door. "Do your best to keep everyone out of trouble this weekend, if you can."

Tori nodded, grateful to be back on semi-normal conversational ground. "Nothing to worry about. Between all of Helen's planning and Ivan being Ivan, these kids are in excellent hands.”

Outside of people she knew quite well, Tori didn't have much talent for reading emotions, which spoke to just how naked the vitriol on Janet's face was at the mention of the name “Helen.” Had Tori not just been outed as the one who helped Beth and Rick, she had a hunch Janet would be letting loose some unfriendly sentiments. Instead, the expression was forced away slowly, moved by willpower rather than feeling more at ease.

“I'm sure they'll be well cared for. Just don't want anyone to get distracted.”

A bang from the front door pulled everyone's attention to Beth, who was zipping along with a white cord clutched in her hands. “Found it!”

Like a magic trick, stern Janet vanished into a haze of affection as she swept her daughter up. Gone were the harsh expressions and scrutinizing stares, replaced by a loving mother bidding her child farewell.

Perhaps it was from being rattled by the meeting, or the sight of a girl wearing a Starscout uniform being held by her mom, but Tori had to look away. It came a little too close to memories of her own, as well as the ones she'd been denied. Tori had never gotten to have a moment like this. Her parents were both dead long before she'd reached Beth's age.

When the farewell was finished, Ivan tossed Beth's bag into the trunk, loading the girl herself into the back seat of the car moments after. Janet lingered in the yard, waving goodbye until she was no longer visible in the rearview mirror. It had been an awkward start, but with that out of the way, Ivan and Tori were hoping for a fun, non-meta-human weekend.

That alone should have tipped them off to the chaos looming on the horizon.

---

Chapter 71

---

Huge fangs, dripping in what was probably acid or venom. A massive, scaly body covered in spines and sharp edges. Three tails slapping about wildly, making any approach from the back or side difficult, funneling enemies toward that big chomping maw with the dripping teeth. All packed into creatures each roughly the size of a city bus.

Honestly, not much of a challenge, at a cursory glance. It wasn't until Lodestar saw the flash of blue light hit and fizzle away that she understood why Wranglore, the spell-slinging cowboy, had called for backup.

Magic resistance, so these probably weren't mutations or science experiments run amok. Rather, they were some sort of mystical being. Summoned, created, or anything in between, when magic was on the table there were a lot more options. Looking at the silver lining, they were at least fully corporeal. For all her power, Lodestar didn't have very much non-physical versatility. She was largely pure force—anything that could phase enough to not be damaged by energy shots required help from the AHC's own magical resources. The semi-incorporeality was why she'd needed so much help to deal with Orion and was the reason magic users were such a pain for her to handle, in general.

Given that she only had five more minutes before she needed to be at the meeting point; there wasn't enough time to reroute the request for help. She'd just have to hope these beasts were as solid as they looked. From the sky, she dropped, increasing her speed as she went. This was no AHC evaluation; she didn't have to hold back on anything short of lethal force, and that was only until they knew if these creatures were inherently destructive or simply looking for food. Lodestar's speed cranked up until she could see the world in slow motion.

Wranglore had his hand cocked in a finger-gun, another spell formed at the tip of his index finger, sparking as it fired off. The nearest creature appeared to have noticed and was twisting toward him, mouth already parting. Lodestar saw a chance to test how immune these things really were, as well as help a fellow cape pitch in, so she took it. Grabbing the turning monster by the mouth, she jerked its head and pulled the jaws wider, ensuring that Wranglore's shot would go right down its throat.

That would take some time to connect, so she kept working. Zipping over to the one in front, Lodestar slowed herself down. She had to understand what she was dealing with. Scary on the outside didn't mean bad on the inside; that was a lesson she'd taken far too long to learn.

"Whoa there, big fella. Calm it down. How about you and me—" The words were cut off by a sudden lunge as those huge, dripping fangs came down on top of her. It would have been simple to dodge, yet she elected not to. Instead, she waited as the teeth shattered against her, hammers of clay smashing upon an iron anvil. Since conversation failed, this would tell her the rest of what she needed to know.

It took a moment for the monster to realize it had been defanged. A moan rose from deep in its gut, something hideous, and a spray of that dripping liquid gurgled up along with it. In the last second, Lodestar let out a burst of energy, vaporizing the liquid before it made contact. She wasn't worried about it hurting her, more concerned for how much extra work that would add to cleaning up once this was done. Today was on a particularly tight schedule.

With no teeth and its acid attack failed, Lodestar waited to see what would come next. She sighed as its jaws continued to gum against her and gurgling rose from the stomach, signaling a fresh batch of liquid attack brewing. Silly as it seemed, the action told her quite a bit. This creature was either made for killing or incredibly stubborn. Most animals would stop attacking something they had broken their teeth against, yet this one didn't even have that level of sense. Probably non-sentient, just conjurations made by some meta messing with forces they shouldn't have. Still, she'd play it safe until the experts could give their opinion. Wounds could be healed. There was no taking back death.

Turning the speed back on, Lodestar virtually disappeared from the maw, soaring back into the air. She wasn't there for long, finding the nearest target and dashing right into its mouth, this time breaking the teeth herself. She did a round on the feet, making sure there were no claws to worry about, then finished by tying the three tails tightly together. For some reason, that trick rarely worked on monsters made by science, but magic ones veered closer to cartoon rules. Nobody fully grasped why that distinction existed; it was just one of the many countless mysteries of living in a meta-world.

With a system established, Lodestar grew even faster. She was a flash of light, weaving through the pack, leaving a trail of beaten monsters in her wake. When she made it back around to Wranglore, Lodestar was momentarily confused by the stunned monster with smoke rising from its nose she found near him, before she remembered opening his target's mouth. Evidently, the magic resistance was literally skin-deep. Handy to know if these ever popped up again. Until they found the source, it couldn't be discounted as a possibility.

Wranglore's knockout was the final monster, so Lodestar brought herself back into normal time. Super-speed didn't really tax her to use, but staying in that state for too long eventually made her nauseous. It was a constant mental jarring, expecting things to move at one speed then readjusting on the fly over and over again. Some metas fell in love with the speed, tried to live there for as long as they could, but to her, it was just one more tool in the kit. A useful one, though.

“—that!”

Part of the problem of moving in and out of time perceptions was dropping into conversations already in progress. Given the look on his face, she assumed Wranglore was taunting his recently defeated foe. This also gave Lodestar a front-row seat to Wranglore's face as he took in the rest of the scene. He pushed back the rune-covered cowboy hat on his head, letting out a whistle like he was calling the herd.

“Holy... you tore right on through these things.” Wranglore threw a spurious look at his finger, still letting off a tendril of magical smoke. “I was feeling good about my one.”

“Luck of the draw,” Lodestar said. “They were resistant to magic, not fists. Another enemy, our roles easily could have been reversed.”

She gave the scene one last check, then covertly looked at the watch woven into the underside of her left bracer. “Do you mind holding down this area until cleanup arrives? I’ve got somewhere to be.”

“Seems the very least I can do, since this was my job to start.” Wranglore wiggled his hand, dispelling the last of the smoke. “Thanks for the... assist doesn’t seem like the right word here.”

“Well, it should, because that’s all I did. You uncovered the threat, located it, alerted us to the issue, and called in appropriate force before they could reach civilization. I threw a few punches. Being strong doesn’t mean diddly if I don’t know where to point that strength. You saved the day, Wranglore, and I was happy to pitch in where I could.”

Lodestar didn’t wait around after that; experience taught her it was best to depart on the uplifting statement. It helped leave things on a positive note, and delaying came with fewer graceful conversational off-ramps. That was especially important, because she was down to only two minutes left. Rising into the air, Lodestar flew faster up once more, this time cranking up to traveling speeds.

Technically speaking, the speed at which she was moving through the air should be causing friction and shockwaves, leaving untold destruction in her path. It was one of the more commonly observed curiosities since Professor Quantum broke the original laws of physics in the same legendary experiment that created meta-humans, and one that no one had a viable explanation for: the people with super-speed seemed to ignore all issues of friction. It was the same way that some metas could be so huge, and yet completely skip the square-cube law, or how super-strength translated into lifting cars rather than putting hands right through the metal. Their world was not as it had once been, and even after all these decades, they’d still only scratched the surface on understanding how the new systems worked.

For today, Lodestar was just thankful for whatever made them function as she raced across the ocean, heading back to North America. Getting in and out of the house would be easy thanks to her tunnels, but there wasn’t any need. Since returning to the AHC, she’d been picking up old habits, including one from her street-crime fighting days. Back then, she’d had nests hidden throughout Faucet Hills, places she could stop for supplies and rest. Rest wasn’t much of an issue these days, but a superhero worth her salt always had a few spare outfits around.

Zippering into an abandoned bell tower at a former East Coast college, Lodestar found the hidden silver box. Professor Quantum's creation, these were as secure an option as she had for leaving unattended equipment. Slowing down only long enough to punch in the code, Lodestar waited as the systems engaged, hissing slightly to reveal the box's hidden treasures. Inside were the same clothes Helen had been wearing before she got the call. A blur of light, and Lodestar switched her ensemble, adding the uniform to the contents of the box, next to a spare t-shirt and jeans. Her usual Lodestar garb was packed with the rest of her supplies for the End of Summer Shindig, which is why she'd had to snag the nest's spare on her way. She took one last item from the box—a set of spectacles, though these were held carefully rather than being donned. Pausing to check her makeup once—mercifully, sweat was very rarely an issue in this state—Lodestar took back to the sky.

She raced across the country, until Ridge City came into view. At the sight, she felt her heart lift. It was always good to be home, especially with such a fun weekend to look forward to. Hopefully, the AHC would be okay without Lodestar for a few days. Granted, she could come if she was called, but Lodestar had been burning the candle at both ends since her return. The other side of her deserved some time, too.

It was a matter of seconds before she was at the parking lot, but Lodestar didn't stop there. She kept going, flying a bit farther, then dropping down into one of the nearby alleyways. To be safe, she pulled out a phone-sized device and hit a small icon that flashed red, then green. Every camera in the area was either disabled or scrambled—one of Vernon's handiest inventions, and the reason she kept a Quantum Utility Tool on her. With the coast cleared, Lodestar pulled the power back into her at the same time she donned her spectacles.

Glasses in place, Helen jogged down the alley, weaving her way back to the parking lot. In the middle of the day, at those speeds, the odds that anyone had seen Lodestar arriving were infinitesimal, but it never hurt to be extra cautious. Even given the special identity protections Helen had, she still played it safe where she could. The life of a public cape was not one she wanted, for her or Penelope.

Helen arrived a full three minutes before the bus pulled in, which still beat the earliest time the Starscouts would start showing up by half an hour. After going over details with the driver, she did a quick tour of the vehicle, eyes peeled for any potential issues, of which she uncovered none. It was a little old and a bit run-down, but they hadn't exactly paid for top-of-the-line luxury. The bus was safe, which mattered most, and she could always stick Ivan in one of the broken seats that didn't recline. Relaxation and Ivan went together like mint and orange juice.

By the time her tour was done, a car was pulling into the lot. Too early for the kids, and besides, she recognized that nondescript sedan, just like she knew the intentionally bland man stepping out of it. He did seem more animated than usual, his resting-stern face replaced by interest in his conversation with Beth. The others in the AHC would probably never see this side of him, would never let themselves see it, even if they had a chance. It was so much easier when the capes were good and the villains were bad. Getting in too close, realizing how much more was at play, understanding that the people they fought were more than their crimes... it made things complicated. Not always bad, but never easy.

Tori was right behind Ivan and Beth, and she threw Helen a grin as they saw one another. Another villain she shouldn't be getting close with. The reports of Hephaestus's conflict with the New Science Sentries had already reached her, as did photographs of the scene that team didn't see. For her, it was obvious; Hephaestus had been on lookout duty, keeping the AHC members away from the real show. Horribly, a piece of her was even thankful for it. Helen wasn't sure any of them were experienced enough to handle that kind of scene. At least it had happened on a weekend when Ivan had his kids. It was a small mercy that she didn't have to add his potential presence into the whole confusing equation.

"Good afternoon!" Helen's voice was full of cheer and pep as she greeted her first Starscout of the day. "Is everyone packed and ready for an amazing weekend of fun, friends, and frivolity?"

"Yay!" Beth threw up her arms in celebration, and for a moment, even Ivan's steely demeanor was cracked by a smile.

"A little alliteration?" Tori chuckled at her own wordplay, unintentional though it was. "Yeah, I'd say we're pretty psyched."

Ivan didn't respond immediately; that was never his way. Only in battle was he quick and decisive. In his civilian identity, he favored being steady over being speedy. Better to grasp a situation well, and then act, than move in too rashly. It was one of the traits Helen admired in him; she tended to be prone to impulse in her own life. "Is there anything you need?"

“Sure, take this clipboard and help me greet our cluster as they roll in. We have to get an accurate head count before we can depart.” Helen thrust the hunk of wood into Ivan’s chest, and with it, she saw the nearly imperceptible signs of his nerves easing. What he’d really been asking was if there were threats to be aware of, and she’d just told him to keep his mind on the actual tasks of the job. Ivan did best when he had a role to play and a script to follow. Keeping him in cluster-leader mode would put his focus on actual issues, rather than potential ones.

For the first time since she’d been staring down at the stampeding hoard of monsters, Helen paused and took a breath. There was still a lot of weekend to go, and she hoped not to spend any more of it flying through the air while shining brightly.

“How was your Friday? Soak in the last bits of civilization while you still can?” Tori asked.

Helen half-shrugged, as if her activities were too boring to warrant a proper roll of the shoulders. “Same old, same old. Just another day at the office.”

---

Chapter 72

---

In the planning, preparation, and lead-up to this trip, Tori thought she'd gotten a good sense of what she was in for, having never gone to such an event in her own Starscout days. It took only until the bus pulled onto the campgrounds, joining dozens of others streaming onto the site, for Tori to realize just how off her expectations had been.

She'd pictured ten or so other clusters, all sharing a large chunk of forest with perhaps one central cabin in case of emergencies. Instead, Tori was forced to wonder if the entire state was all gathering for this single End of Summer Shindig; she stopped counting after the first fifty buses. Given that the attendance was so much higher than expected, she was somewhat less shocked as they began to weave their way through a huge swath of land. Dotted around it were various cabins and hookup points for RVs, all of which the huge convoy passed, heading into the deepest part of the forest.

It was there she finally saw the Starscout area—what almost looked like someone had built a full summer camp meant for hundreds of people out in the middle of nowhere. There were bunk cabins, a huge mess hall, various activity stands, a lake twinkling in the late-evening sun, and tons of space for setting up tents. Clearly multipurpose, yet she had to imagine this was the zenith of its usefulness, the main intent with which the space was built.

Since summer still held a slight upper hand in the changing of the seasons, it was warm enough to camp outside using tents. Some years, it had to be the bunk cabins for safety, and depending on how the winds blew, that might still end up being the case, but for the first evening, Tori found herself pitching in to help the scouts set up their camp. Or rather, she tried to do that, but instead discovered that the kids were overall better at it than she was. For them, this was old hat, whereas Tori had never been a fan of tents, even in her street days. Since she didn't worry about the cold, the loss of visibility wasn't worth the minor protection from the elements.

Only once every tent was sturdy and stable did Helen gather her charges. They'd ended up fairly in the middle of things, surrounded by other clusters, not far from the lake. It was a vantage point that showed her the multitude of others still handling their setup, giving Tori an unexpected pang of pride in the efficiency of her group. The sentiment was especially unwarranted given how little she'd helped, yet it was there, all the same. There were, thankfully, logistics to focus on instead.

"Great job setting up!" Helen declared, getting a rabble of cheers from the kids. She didn't let it grow past that, speaking while she had their attention captured. "Time to look ahead to the rest of our evening. We've got about an hour before the mess will start serving dinner, and the social starts right after, so anyone who wants to wash up should get jumping. We all know how fast the lines can grow around here."

The rest of the cluster nodded, so Tori did, as well. It wasn't hard to picture; this many people were going to cause traffic no matter what. She wondered if Ivan had brought along any sort of Wade-tech to mitigate that issue, at least where restrooms were concerned. Unlikely, but a woman could dream.

"Tomorrow, we start the Shindig Games bright and early, so try not to stay up too late catching up with your friends." There was something of a wink in her tone, the implied understanding of a rule that must exist, and yet everyone expects to be broken. "Tori and Mr. Gerhardt are our only newbies here. The rest of you know the area. Remember to stay within the camp at all times, unless you're in the company of a Starscout leader—we are still in the wilderness. If you need anything, I'll be here. Otherwise, come back by seven for dinner."

It was almost akin to being in a flophouse when someone screamed "Cape!" the way those children scattered. They fled in every direction, racing away from their area, streaming into other camps and calling out greetings. Coming here yearly, they'd obviously made friends among the other clusters, which was probably the point of getting them all together in the first place. Tori wondered if she'd been too young for these kinds of events, or if her parents had simply been too busy. It was tempting to put them on a pedestal, but keeping them human in her memories also helped make the pain manageable. They'd both been career-driven scientists; it wasn't inconceivable that this sort of thing was more than their schedules could, or would be allowed, to bear.

"Are we sure none of them used magic? That was a really quick departure," Tori noted.

"Our only known magic meta-human at this particular function is Lavinia, who you can thank for the utter lack of insects around us. She's got some handy repelling spells laid down." Helen scanned the campground once, like she was taking note of every activity and not just the actions of their kids. "Since we've got some time to work—Ivan, why don't you finish unloading the rest of our supplies? Get some exercise for a change, you desk-jockey. Tori, we can't have you out here without knowing how to ready a tent, so you're going to help me with mine."

With one hand, Tori waved to the rows of tents already sitting there. "Seems like that's already handled, doesn't it?"

"Until a strong wind knocks one over in the night and a scout needs help fixing it, potentially while terrified from being suddenly woken up. Or when breaking them down happens, and they need your help to not snap a delicate part of the frame. We're the adults here. The kids have to know we can handle any problem that arises. The buck stops with us, so we should be prepared."

On the surface, it might be difficult to see why Helen and Ivan got along so well, despite coming from visibly different worlds. But when one scratched the slightest bit deep, the biggest similarity leapt into view: responsibility. Helen and Ivan both cared a tremendous amount about the duty of their roles; each took their responsibilities arguably too seriously. Tori felt reasonably sure the world wouldn't end if she couldn't make a tent, yet from the way Helen spoke, it was like there were incredible stakes at play.

She followed Helen over, taking hold of a faded old green tent and helping to spread it out along the ground. In the corner of her eye, Tori could see Ivan unloading boxes of food from the bus—their contribution to the overall supplies. He almost reached for an entire stack of four, then thought better of it, shifting his grip up to two. Finally, and not without some visible annoyance, Ivan settled on a single box, hefting it onto his shoulder and starting the trek toward the mess hall. It had to be galling, knowing he could lift the whole bus, and having to do things the mundane way all the same.

A jolt brought Tori back to the moment. Helen had gently tapped the tip of her nose. It was more shocking than painful, jarring her suddenly. “We can help Ivan afterward if you’re worried about him, but there’s no point in doing this unless you’re paying attention.”

“Sorry,” Tori mumbled.

“It’s okay. I get it. New scene, lots to take in—this is an exciting place, and we’re going to have a lot of fun here.” Helen patted the green canvas firmly. “After our chores are done.”

Tori watched carefully as Helen stretched the fabric, pulling out the long tubes of plastic and slowly threading them through loops sewn into the tent. The procedure was smooth and effortless, equally so when Helen yanked them all right back out and set the tubes at Tori’s feet. “Your turn.”

“I just watched you do it.”

“Then it should be easy to replicate,” Helen countered. “And I’ll be here if you run into trouble.”

“For someone only a few years older than me, you sure do like to give orders.” Tori picked up the nearest tube and began attempting to mimic the feat she’d seen Helen so easily manage. It eventually did make it through the first loop, but it wasn’t nearly so smooth an operation.

Reaching over, Helen pinched a piece of fabric, breaking up a minor stoppage in the second loop so the tube could keep moving. “I look good for my age. Also, part of life as a single mom. You get used to acting as the final line of making sure everything gets done, because if you don’t, it won’t. Being in charge is a responsibility.”

“Where is your daughter this weekend, anyway? Could she not come along?” Tori finally finagled the first tube through its final loop and started work on the second. This time, she didn’t need Helen’s help with the pinch trick, utilizing it herself to roughly force the plastic along.

“Too young for this event, and not a Starscout yet. She may not go down that road at all. Penelope is her own creature; she never seems compelled to follow in my footsteps, thank goodness.” Helen looked a tad flustered at that last line, almost like it said more than she intended. “She’s staying with a friend of the family, alongside other kids her age. I daresay I'll come home to an excited ball of energy, or a completely wiped-out shell of a child."

On the final tube, Tori hit a significant snag, one that no amount of pinching seemed to clear. She started pushing harder, trying to force the plastic through the fabric, only to have Helen's hand fall lightly on her arm. "Stronger isn't always better. Sometimes, you're better off backing up, taking a breath, and trying again."

It was a good thing Ivan had taught Tori to not inadvertently let out heat, because she'd definitely have seared a few holes in the tent's thin material otherwise. Pausing for a few attempts at calming breaths, she wiggled the tube into the loop once more, and this time found it moved without issue. Whatever configuration of fibers had caused the blockage had moved on their own when she yanked out the tube.

"There we go. Very well done. Now, we get the stakes, and I show you how to keep this bad boy bolted to the ground." Helen hopped lightly to her feet; she was a surprisingly spry woman when she wanted to be. As Tori dug through a bag, she looked back to Ivan.

He was still going one box at a time, even as some of the other cluster leaders were hauling visibly heavier loads. But they were the strapping sort, the kind one expected to find unbothered by heft. Ivan was leaner—not that his body would have accurately portrayed his strength if he were three stories tall—and therefore had to pretend to be weaker. It was the commitment to the identity that she admired more than anything. No one would have blinked if Ivan opted to carry two boxes at a time instead of one, yet he refused to make even that small of a compromise. He lived his role unerringly, devoted to the deception. Tori wasn't sure she'd ever be that good, or had the desire to try. The easier path seemed to be avoiding people, especially capes, wherever possible.

"Gotcha!" Helen emerged from her bag with a handful of metal skewers, each tilted at a sharp angle on a single end. "Come grab an end. You can hold the tent in place while I hammer."

At least here, Tori didn't have to pretend. Fire powers and meta-suits didn't help one bit with getting a tent ready. Maybe that was why Ivan liked the office—it asked him to rise to challenges that Fornax never could. Come to think of it, that might be why she'd managed to find a bit of joy there as well. It wasn't the right environment for her long-term, but it had definitely taught Tori that there were ways to be fulfilled outside of science and stealing.

And at the end of today, she'd have learned an entirely new skill. She might not touch another tent ever again, or she could be hurled into some wasteland tomorrow. It never hurt to have a skill, by her reckoning, so Tori paid close attention as Helen lined up the first metal skewer.

"This is the best part, because unlike with the tubing, here hitting things hard does tend to fix all your problems." Helen smashed down on the skewer with the heel of her palm, driving it into the dirt.

"If only life could be so simple," Tori mused.

"I don't know, I think if you hit your problems often enough, you'll probably run out of them," Helen replied. "Either one would hit back harder than you could handle, or you'd drive off all the people and things that caused the problems to start with. Both pretty bad endings, if you ask me."

Tori shrugged. "It helps if you're a misanthrope."

"Funny, you sure do have a lot of people in your life for someone who just claimed to dislike them." Helen smiled, extending the next metal skewer. "Want to take a crack at the next one? Sounds like someone could do to show the ground what-for."

Weird choice of phrasing aside, Tori wasn't going to turn down the opportunity. If she had to learn this, she might as well learn it well. Plus, there was something to be said for the therapy of smacking inanimate objects.

---

Chapter 73

---

In his life, Ivan had been no stranger to unique experiences. From fake tournaments in space, to several mystical Christmas adventures, to traveling through a land made from mirrors and terror, to being summoned as a hero in a world of magic; yet he still counted this as one of the most surreal moments he'd ever experienced. Standing in the middle of a gigantic facility, surrounded by kids and other cluster leaders, amidst one of the biggest events of the Starscouts year. That he was here at all was bizarre, that Beth was along as well pushed it into the realm of unbelievable, and then, when one factored in Helen... were Ivan more confident about his prospects in whatever afterlife awaited, he might have thought himself unknowingly dead and ascended.

Of course, this was no heaven, which was why he had to snag the tumbling child who nearly came down headfirst on a punchbowl in their excitement for snacks. He was at this social on-the-clock, as an official of the organization, with a duty to uphold—though that duty was coming in fits and spurts, as the children were largely occupied.

All manner of food, drink, and snack had been brought in for the post-dinner social. The hall was largely segmented off into a more active section, versus one for restful engagement. There were games on both sides, things like cards and Velcro darts with minimal potential for causing damage. Some kids were playing, others chatting, and a brave few were already out on the dance floor, going to town. Beth was among a group of friends from prior years, catching up as they tossed bean bags at a slanted plank of wood, and he noticed Tori making rounds near one of the snack tables. She was grazing freely, but also helping out the kids who'd piled their plates too high, so she was at least earning her nibbles.

The whole ordeal was so peaceful and fun, it set his teeth on edge. Youth did not come with pleasant associations for Ivan. It was hard not to expect one of these children to wheel around and strike while another's guard was down. He envied this life of theirs, but couldn't be jealous. Ivan didn't even have the capacity to imagine experiencing a normal childhood—the scars of reality ran much too deep. It didn't matter, anyway. There was no changing the past. Watching his daughter smile and laugh without so much as a smidge of fear, Ivan told himself that was all the normal he needed.

"Hmmm, I'm a little worried about that dance floor. Should somebody get it started?"

In another life, Ivan would have grinned at the sound of Helen's voice arriving at his side. Instead, he merely nodded, letting perhaps a small spark of good humor into his eyes. "There are already kids dancing."

"Like six, and two of them are doing something interpretive. Sure seems like somebody should get it started." Helen bumped against Ivan's arm with her shoulder. "How's the trip treating you so far?"

"No issues to report."

The sigh that came from her lips was almost painfully familiar. "Not what I asked. I wanted to know how it's going. Are you enjoying yourself? Because it's okay if you are. You do get to be happy sometimes, Ivan."

It was the sort of thing only she could say with sincerity, the reason Helen was more dangerous than any other cape. She believed in people, to the core, and while that had made her job all the harder at times, it also meant she'd managed things like influencing Fornax, something that even Ivan would have considered impossible at the time.

"I am happy every day. I am grateful every day. I know where my path was supposed to lead, and each morning I rise fully aware that I'm living on bonus time."

"It isn't bonus time. It's your life." Helen paused as a trio of kids bolted past, eyes on the diminishing mound of homemade cookies, many of which bore Ivan's favored recipe. She touched Ivan's shoulder, drawing his attention over to Tori, who'd accepted a dart challenge from one of the scout teams and was proceeding to miss wildly. One even managed to land on a particularly fuzzy jacket of a nearby reveler, the Velcro hooking in on impact. “At least Tori’s taking to the vibe well.”

Looking at her, Ivan imagined the hard-faced young woman he’d first met in that cell. She never would have been able to blend in like this, her entire focus had been on the next move in front of her face. Now, she was not only thriving as a civilian, she was building up an entire new identity with history and contacts. One day, he truly hoped Tori would see a way out of this life for herself. Sadly, that was a journey she’d have to take on her own. Ivan couldn’t light a path he’d never traveled.

“She’s the adaptable sort. High intelligence doesn’t hurt, either.”

Another round of kids passing caused a pause, only this time, the conversation didn’t start right up again when they cleared. Instead, Helen lingered at his side. “You know, given the context of the situation, I’m sure no one would bat an eye at two cluster leaders hitting the dance floor together in a fun, friendly dance. How about like when you-know-who dealt with the... okay, I actually don’t remember the name of this one. Red thing, lots of ooze and tentacles, plus it ate small chunks of time?”

“KronDabbler,” Ivan supplied.

The triumphant slap on her knee was so loud it drew looks from some of the nearby scouts, forcing Helen to wave at them awkwardly.

“KronDabbler! Right. Like with KronDabbler—you go right, I go left, except, when we meet in the middle, we flip punches for box steps.”

“I know how to dance, enough to realize you might be a few decades out of sync with that box step idea.”

“Nah, everything is cyclical. It’s either back already, or we’ll get it there. Also, way to go blowing the whole ‘brooding silent guy’ thing by admitting you’ve danced. Keep the glower going. The rest of us are using your presence to lightly scare any of the rowdier kids.”

The truth was, Ivan had been to many bars and clubs in his villain days where idly moving in some semblance of time with the beat was enough to qualify as dancing, but it had been his wedding that had forced him to learn some actual steps. As small and simple as the ceremony was, they still went through the major hallmarks: first dance, bouquet, cake-cutting, all to fill the scrapbook with photographic evidence of normalcy. Yet for some reason... no... for a reason Ivan recognized instantly but chose not to acknowledge, he didn’t want to mention that fact to Helen.

“I can put on my annoyed face if anyone gets truly troublesome. Were I to go as far as vexed, I might end up giving them nightmares, however.”

To his surprise, that didn't garner any sort of laugh or chuckle. Looking down, he noticed Helen's gaze wasn't on the scene around them currently; it was aimed off somewhere in her brain that only she could see. He didn't have to wonder what was on her mind for long. Helen was never one to draw things out.

“Seeing all these kids... do you ever imagine what your life would have been like if you'd gotten a more normal childhood? What sort of person you'd have grown into with a different start?”

“No.” With almost anyone else, he'd have left it there. “I don't dream about the impossible. If I'd ended up somewhere else, then whoever came out of that wouldn't be me. He'd probably be better in a lot of ways, but even as a concept, that other me is so far removed from who I actually am that he's a stranger.”

“I wonder about that. I think some of this Ivan might be deeper rooted than you realize.”

Not wanting to let things settle there, Ivan turned the question around. “How about you?”

Helen shook her head. “We're in different boats. I made it to nineteen living normally. I had time to develop and engage with mundane life. Remove that one night where it all changed, and a whole lot about my life would be different, but I think I'd still be more or less the same person. Probably less confident.”

“Oh my, a Helen with more modesty? Perish the very concept.” In spite of the heady topic, Ivan laughed. Something about being around her just made it hard for his mood not to stay light. “Aside from the obvious two child-shaped reasons I would never change my past, you realize that version of Ivan wouldn't have met you, right?”

“Huh. You know, I genuinely hadn't considered it. You've been around so long, I guess I just automatically picture you in my life.”

The long stretch that went between them then had nothing to do with more kids, and far more to do with the unspoken line that Helen had just come dangerously close to slipping over. Both found something to occupy their attention elsewhere, avoiding eye contact.

When the song changed and two of the dancing kids exited the floor, Helen saw her opportunity for as graceful an exit as she could hope to manage. “Okay, now we’re down to four. It is definitely time someone got it started.”

Unsure whether to roll his eyes or smirk, Ivan did neither, opting instead to play along. “But where will we find a cluster leader with the self-confidence to—”

“Of course I will!” Helen charged onto the dance floor, clearly not having actually listened to Ivan’s reply, busting out such classics as the Lawnmower and Driving the Bus before the song’s first chorus had even been reached. It was a performance of pure cringe, made all the stranger for Ivan since he had firsthand knowledge that not only was Helen incredibly graceful, she’d taken multiple types of professional dance instruction. None of which could be seen in the display of her grabbing one knee and bouncing with it as she spun slowly around on one leg.

Across the room, interest turned to laughter, as one would expect in such an equation. Except afterwards, the process wasn’t over. By whatever strange alchemy of charisma Helen possessed, the amusement turned into fun. From the fringes, more kids wandered onto the dance floor, confident that nothing they did could possibly be as ridiculous as the moves Helen was busting out. She’d turned herself into the attention target, letting everyone else feel freer for the distraction. He even caught sight of Beth’s group migrating toward the music.

Tori wandered over, having soundly lost her game of darts, and examined Helen’s performance with an uncertain eye. “Well that’s... something. Don’t take this wrong, I like Helen, she’s nice and all, but the lady kind of does her own thing, doesn’t she?”

In a weekend filled with double-speak and subterfuge, it was a pleasant break to be able to answer with complete honesty. “Helen has the surety of someone who knows exactly who they are, and is comfortable with it. Obviously, she’s a total weirdo. That’s what happens when you lose all fear of what other people think.”

Taking one brief moment to stretch, Ivan started off toward the dance floor, resolved to hanging back at the edges. She was meant for the spotlight, he for the shadows; they both knew where they worked best.

“Um, what are you doing?” Tori asked, unable to believe what the context clues were suggesting.

Ivan didn’t stop, but he did turn back to answer, an equal mix of amusement and exasperation in his tone. “Probably a box step, sooner or later. She has a habit of getting her way.”

Lozora hadn't expected approaching the Starscout site to be easy—Lodestar would never let this many vulnerable kids be gathered in one place under her name without protections in place. It was that openness to being challenged that led her to accept her employer's tech. It galled her, needing something as external as his tools, but the call had proven to be prudent.

The external energy barrier would have sliced her clean in half without the disruptor blade, and the mechanical sentries she'd battled would have radioed in about an intruder if not for her signal jammer. Supposedly, even the dark material clinging roughly to her skin was helping, warping the view of any electronic surveillance device that happened to pick her up.

Her handiest tool was unquestionably the mapping device, however. What had started life as a simple Indigo Technologies tablet, the itPad as they were commonly known, had little save for the screen still in common with its original configuration. Lozora's employer had incorporated scanning utilities, along with some hacked satellite feeds, to build a mobile map-generation utility. Just by walking around, the area was revealing itself to her.

Tonight was all about reconnaissance. Targeting Fornax meant getting him nearly alone, down to just his cluster. They wanted pure data on how long he'd be held; the more unplanned factors introduced, the greater the chance they got faulty information. Tomorrow, when the games started, there would be chances. So long as Lozora knew the terrain, she had a fair shot at maneuvering around without being caught. Once the orb was thrown, that would steal everyone's attention while she holed up out of sight.

Stalking through the woods was hardly her idea of a fun weekend, but Lozora bore the task without complaint. Roughly a week to go until the real fun started, and all her work would pay off. One step at a time, though.

First, she had a legendary super-villain to piss off.

---

Chapter 74

---

The End of Summer Shindig schedule was clearly not here to fuck around. Before even sunrise, Tori was up with her cluster, dealing with poor sleep thanks to a combination of laying on the dirt and excessive sugar after all her snacking. There was no respite to be had upon waking, as it turned out children needed managing in the morning. Armand and Caden had to be shooed away from messing with their sleeping bags, both certain that two bags could be combined into an uber slumber cocoon, while Mallory sat to the side, explaining the flaws in their logic. For a moment, they thought Newton had vanished, but he turned out to merely be running around the campground, burning off some extra energy. Loyce and Trudy were trying to grill pine cones on the embers of a low fire, but at least they'd gotten ready first. Most of guiding the kids was on Helen and Ivan, who managed it well; however, with this many to track, they definitely needed the extra help.

Once the kids were on the right track, Tori managed to stumble through a shower at one of the facilities, getting in before the lines turned unmanageable, then forcing herself to throw down some food in the mess. On her own, she might have skipped the firm flapjacks and runny eggs, but this was not a day to be running on half a tank. By the time she'd finished slamming her breakfast, it was time to hustle to the lake for her cluster's first event.

Due to the number of scouts present, there was no way for the entire gathering to do the same activities concurrently. Instead, a rotating schedule had been established weeks prior, noting where each cluster would go through the day. They might tackle a task in the morning that others wouldn't face until that evening, yet by the end of the celebration, every group would have scores to be tallied. While not all of the events were competitive in nature, they were common enough that no one would forget they were playing for stakes. Mostly small trophies and bragging rights, but stakes all the same.

First Aid Relay was her cluster's starting activity, a test of their education in semi-realistic environments. Each cluster would see a "victim" fall over at the opposite end of the lake's beach. It would be on them to check the dummy's vitals, perform CPR, and find a way to move it safely back across the rough terrain of sand. A Starscout leader was on hand to make sure they handled every step properly, taking notes on the details that would ultimately become their score.

She watched at Ivan's side as the kids tore down the beach, kicking up plumes of sand that spun along on the wind, then drifted out over the water before finally settling back down. Newton got there first, with Beth close on his heels. To Tori's surprise, Ivan's daughter took the lead on checking vitals and executing CPR. Beth hadn't ever mentioned either subject, yet she looked like an aspiring EMT as she assessed the dummy's condition.

It was only afterward, when she had a moment to ask Ivan, that Tori got greater understanding. Part of Beth's ability-control training incorporated enhanced emergency education; the idea being that, if they knew what to do in an emergency, there would be less chance of panic and unintended flare-ups. In the moment, though, all Tori knew was that Beth had flown through the medical stuff, finishing just as Caden finally plodded his way up to join the rest of the cluster.

With Mallory calling out positions, the cluster dispersed the dummy's weight amongst themselves, while Armand and Trudy were dedicated to keeping the neck steady in case of injury during the fall. A touch excessive, given the short drop and soft landing material, but more concern typically fared better than less when it came to the practice of medicine. They kept a steady pace, moving with swiftness and surety, balancing the need for speed against the precarious balance of walking along sand. The fact that they stayed together so well spoke to excellent coordination and teamwork, far better than loads of adult teams Tori had seen throughout her life.

Of the three clusters, theirs was easily the first to return, stoking an unexpected spark of pride in Tori. That didn't necessarily mean they'd done the best—speed was only a single piece of the overall assessment—but it damn sure wouldn't hurt. Cheers and high-fives were passed around freely in celebration. Then, once the jubilation had faded, minds turned to the next task on their docket. The kids were old pros at this, changing from one challenge to the next without so much as a missed step. The exuberance and adaptability of youth were marvelous qualities; Tori wondered if any meta had found a way to bottle that. Then she realized the sorts of steps and ingredients that would probably go into such a concoction and figured if that meta had existed, the guild would have sent Kristoph calling almost immediately.

Being less flexible, Tori had to mentally shift gears as they wandered away from the lake, heading out to a wooded area. No more running on sand. Next up, they had to make and break down a campfire safely, a notion that still tickled Tori even days after learning about it. Then, there was the first crafting challenge, a relay race, and then finally, after the nature hike, they'd get to break for lunch.

Thinking about the long day ahead, Tori almost wished she'd forced down a few more of those stiff pancakes. Almost, but not quite.

“When you said you wanted to up your training after that last fight, I was on board. When you asked me to find a remote location with lots of high, sheer surfaces, I obliged. Even once you told us you'd be bringing along weights from the gym, we rolled with it. But at this point, I think we're going to need an explanation.”

Cyber Geek nodded to the pile of chains resting in the dirt next to the weights, all of it sitting in the shadow of the rocky outgrowth looming over them. Cold Shoulder seemed less concerned, whereas Hat Trick wore a comically puzzled face, a slight sliver of tongue poking out the side of her mouth, seemingly unnoticed.

“I've been doing a lot of weights and sparring, but Hephaestus didn't just get stronger since the last time—he got smoother. The guy was crazy light on his feet for how heavy that suit was. I thought long and hard about what exercise would help me the most.” As he spoke, Medley began to loop the first chain around his torso.

“The act of free-climbing will strengthen my hands and feet while I use my claws to dig into the rock. Hauling the extra weight makes it harder, meaning I’ll also get stronger. But I don’t just want to be heavy, I want to be unwieldy. Hence the chain.”

Medley picked up a weight and tied off a section of chain; however, it wasn’t bound close to his body. Instead, it landed several feet away. Given the slack, it would dangle from Medley once he started ascending, yanking him to and fro. “Different weights at different lengths is going to make it incredibly hard to move with any sense of fluidity. I’ve never really trained full-body dexterity before, but I figure pushing myself is a good place to start.”

“You’re sure this is safe, right?” Hat Trick asked.

“Definitely not. That’s why I asked you all to come along. Hardy as I am, that summit is a good ways up. Good to have friends around, just in case.”

“There are other ways to get stronger, you know.” Cyber Geek expected the words to fall on deaf ears, yet he had to speak them, all the same. They had decided to stick him in the leadership role, and saying what everyone already knew was part of the gig.

Medley kept on working with his chain, tying off the second weight. “Maybe for you. You’re still growing like you were at the start. Some of us are starting to plateau. We’re getting passed, by villains and fellow superheroes alike. If I want to keep up, it means taking things to the next level, so I hope you’ve got a healing item on hand.”

“Still no luck with consumables,” Cyber Geek reported. He’d tried summoning a variety of potions and power-ups, all of which came over fine, but turned back to sparks and numbers when he tried to ingest them. “The hunt continues, though I could summon a set of attack-ribbons that wind tight on impact to contain bleeding. Between that and your speed-healing, we should have time to get you help.”

“Let’s hope it doesn’t come to that.” Cold Shoulder was already beginning to form her ice-construct—a huge body that might be able to catch Medley, depending on where he hypothetically tumbled from.

Adding the last two weights, Medley moved across the ground, feeling them drag like the anchors they were. He ran his claws along the rough stone surface, locating purchase, and then hauled his body up from the dirt. That was the easy part; Medley could more than handle his own heft. When the first hundred-pound weight came off the ground, it was an inconvenience. By the fourth, Medley could feel the strain running along his arms and legs. It was a good pain, the ache of strength to come, the price of getting stronger.

Another handhold as the climb began in earnest. The weights clanked as Medley rose, his friends watching carefully from the ground below. So far to go, and he'd only just begun.

The relay race was, in theory, a simple event. Each scout would run their section of the track to a station, where a Starscout leader would be waiting to ask them a question pertaining to the history or systems of the organization as a whole. If they missed it, they'd be asked another, and so on until they got one right. After that, the baton changed hands and the race continued; a mix of mental and physical challenges rolled into one. What caused them a momentary delay was the fact that one of the cluster's leaders was also expected to participate, starting off for their teams to show the kids how it was done.

On the outside, it was a simple matter of determining who should take the role between Ivan and Helen. Spry as she was, there was no way Helen could hope to compete with Ivan's speed... if Ivan had been willing to show it off. Tori quickly realized the complication: Ivan couldn't tell them that he was stronger and faster than any human here could ever hope to match. Even without actively using his abilities, there was no getting around Ivan's overall power.

Helen, however, had thoughts of her own. "Come on. You're a quick study, but we both know I've got the better knowledge base here. Plus, I mean, you do work a desk job. Can't imagine there's that much opportunity for exercise."

"You'd be surprised by how fast I can learn when motivated, and it's not like this is my first year with the Starscouts. Beth has been a member for much of her life. I've paid attention to the various cardboard presentations throughout the years."

Tori trailed behind them as they led the cluster across the camp to the relay race site. None of the children were paying the adults much attention, far too enthralled in the joys of the day. Loyce had acquired a large bag of trail mix at some point; she and Caden seemed intent on polishing it off before the next event started. Newton was doing stretches while walking, visibly excited to put his athletic talents on display. Beth, Mallory, and Armand were deep in discussion about what the best order would be, going back and forth even as the final moments drew near.

As for Tori, she found the disagreement between cluster leaders interesting enough on its own, though the others couldn't appreciate the strangeness of what they were beholding. It wasn't seeing people playfully bicker that struck her as odd, it was the fact that Ivan was engaging in such a practice at all. Had she ever seen him argue in jest? Generally, Ivan was either giving or taking orders. There was nothing wrong with it, no reason why he couldn't, it's just that... something about this was odd. A curious itch in her brain she couldn't quite manage to scratch.

"Fine. We'll flip for it." Helen jammed a hand into her right front pocket, drawing the distinct jingle of change until she produced a shiny quarter. "Lucky for you, I've got a soft spot for vending machine snacks."

"Why don't we have Tori flip it, seeing as she's impartial?" Ivan suggested.

That earned them both a scrutinizing glance from Helen. "I'm not so sure about that."

"I am." Tori reached out and grabbed the coin. "I can say with absolute honesty that I don't care which of you does this part, so long as it's not me. Call it in air?"

"Yeah, yeah. I'll even play fair." Helen put a hand over her glasses and eyes, covering her face. "Go ahead."

One more eccentricity from a woman rapidly piling them up. Tori ignored it for now, losing any curiosity to that damned mental itch. She flipped the coin into the air, and at its zenith, Helen called out, eyes still covered. "Heads."

Tori snagged the coin, slapping it down onto the back of her left hand and covering it with her right. Despite the initial apathy, the kids had drawn closer, as well. With the entire cluster looking on, Tori moved her hand, revealing the shiny surface that lay beneath.

---

Chapter 75

---

Deep down, Ivan knew he should have let Helen make the run. She knew the organization's history better, and had more protection than he did in case of accidental power displays. That was without even factoring in the mockery that would come if words or photos of this incident ever got out. Had this event come some weeks prior, he'd never have even floated the possibility of being in the relay.

That was before things changed with Rick. Before Ivan had had to start asking himself how long he had with his children still seeing him as their father, instead of as a killer. Rick was already heading down that path; Ivan could only guess the number of years before Beth caught on as well. He wanted to build new memories while it was still an option, some pleasant recollections for them to hang on to once the hideous truth finally came to light. And, perhaps, these memories were for him, as well. Pieces of the life he knew could fall out from under his feet on any given step.

A sparse woods dotted the nearby landscape, leading to a sharp, rocky incline that turned into a lumpy hill. The stretch of track ran in a loop measuring roughly a mile, bordering up to the edge of the incline before circling back to the starting point where Ivan currently waited. With him were most of the cluster, along with Trey and Yuri, the leaders of the cluster they'd be racing against. Yuri would be his competition. While Trey looked like he could handle hauling firewood, she unquestionably was the faster mover. Her partner hung back with the scouts who wouldn't be participating.

At the other end of the track, Tori and Helen were positioned. Since the kids were spaced out along the route, they'd done the same with the adults, ensuring that if anything went wrong, the kids could be reached quickly. Five stations lined the equidistant points, all with a radio and a scout from each cluster waiting. That was where they'd be given their questions, though rather than have five staff members standing around, one referee could deliver all queries from a single device. That was also why a cluster leader was posted on the opposite side of the track—a little observation helped ensure that everyone played fair.

"Good luck!" Yuri called to Ivan from her starting position a few feet over, seemingly with genuine sincerity.

He put on his most pleasant face and waved. "To you, as well!" It didn't hurt to set good sportsmanship examples with the kids watching.

For the barest of moments, Ivan's past tried to break through, reminding him of the sorts of tasks he'd endured at that age. With absolute will, he denied it, sending the memory back into the pits from which it came. As Ivan, that part of him had to be sealed away, locked completely down. Those sorts of recollections served Fornax when the need arose; Ivan had no purpose for them. At most, they were reminders of what he was working so hard to ensure: that no child, especially not his, ever suffered through that again.

A crackle of static came over the walkie-talkie on Trey's belt. "We're ready to go with the questions when you are."

"Okay, folks, that means we're about ready to race." Trey's husky voice went well with his dense body, easily commanding the attention of the kids milling about. "Leaders, are you both ready?"

Ivan threw a thumbs-up, which Yuri mimicked moments later. Trey evidently caught the gestures, taking one last look over the track before he gave the order. "Perfect. Then take your positions, because the relay race begins in three... two... one... go!"

Obviously, Ivan wasn't running at full speed. Even without actively using the tremendous amount of power that coursed through him, or a hint of magic, at his baseline he was still well past human limitations. Unless Yuri was hiding super-speed, he'd win, and even that trick would only work until he equalized the temporal distortion. Fornax couldn't reach the tiers of true speed on his own, but he did have the ability to match an opponent, not that it was a skill he needed while plodding along a fifth of a mile. In the end, he more or less matched Yuri's pace. Sometimes he got a little ahead, sometimes a bit behind, until the last stretch, where he surged slightly ahead and stayed there. Fair play was all well and good, but he did like to win.

"Ivan Gerhardt of cluster number two-three-seven, checking in."

Although he tried to put a weary gasp in there midway through, it was clear to any observer that the effort hadn't significantly winded him.

The radio crackled as Caden and the other cluster's kids looked on, waiting for their moment to shine. After a half-second of static, the question arrived.

"What year was the first End of Summer Shindig held?"

In his mind, he could hear Helen's voice, rattling off Starscout history during their meetings. That one, he didn't need her help with, however. Despite the last memory's failure, a new one bubbled up. Lodestar's face, on the boxy old televisions inside the store display. Her smiling, cheery expression as she flew past a sun rising over an idyllic lake. Ivan could still picture it perfectly, still remember his absolute confoundment at the image. By then, she and Fornax had briefly traded blows, though he didn't yet have any idea what he was truly up against. At the time, he'd only been perplexed at the idea that someone strong enough to stand up to him would use their time on such stupid, pointless projects.

Funny, the way life loved to wrap around and remind Ivan of his own past idiocy. At least this time, it was useful for something. "The year was nineteen-ninety-three. Three years after the Starscouts were officially founded." One year after a young man dripping in blood crawled his way out of a hidden hellhole, blinded and terrified by his first time seeing the sun.

"Correct. You may hand off!"

Just as Caden had a firm grip on the baton, Yuri caught up. She wasn't far behind at all; Ivan had given his cluster a small advantage, not a guaranteed victory. Across the track, near Helen and Tori, he could see Beth waiting. She was the mid-runner, taking the third leg of the race. She put up a double thumbs-up, clearly celebrating their early success, before turning her eyes toward the approaching form of Caden.

By the time Ivan's attention was back around him once more, Yuri's question was done and her kid was off, slowly gaining on Caden's narrow lead. He was far from the most athletic member of the cluster, but they had some strong runners still left, with Newton acting as their anchor. Ivan moved back toward the other kids, cheering loudly as he did. It didn't really matter who won or lost; the experience was the important thing. But he could still root for victory, especially with his daughter among the competitors.

He was so lost in the moment, Ivan didn't even catch the minor spike of magical energy that came from the other side of the hill.

At the prick of her finger, the orb came alive. One drop of blood, not even human blood at that, was all it took to start the various mechanisms running. Initially, Lozora had considered waiting until the group was entirely on their own, hitting them on the nature hike. After a night hunkering low, Lozora had decided that expediency took priority. She rationalized it by thinking that the longer she stayed, the greater her chances of discovery. Besides, this would catch Fornax even more off guard. As for the extra civilians, they shouldn't impact the data. Ten kids or twenty, dead weight was dead weight. Fornax would have to deal with that either way.

Based on reputation, Lozora might have expected Fornax to simply wipe everyone else out on the off chance it would make escape easier on himself, but after seeing him run a fifth of a mile in a Starscout leader uniform, she was having her doubts. While Fornax might be physically down there, it appeared as if the legendary villain might well have already been dealt with. This hardly seemed like the kind of man who could disrupt her employer's plans. But that was why they tested: to be sure, rather than work off supposition alone.

Several clicks came from within the orb, and Lozora counted them. The timing was key. If she got it wrong, Lozora herself would wind up in the trap. It was a situation she'd eventually be able to escape from, but not without losing a significant amount of time. Anything strong enough to hold Fornax would be a murderous gauntlet for most meta-humans—even Lozora would have to work carefully to escape.

With a kerchunk, the first panel of the orb slid away, revealing a stretch of bright green beneath. It rattled, expanding in size, and Lozora reared back. Almost time now. She waited, tense, until a sharp hiss rose from the device. That was her final cue, and with precise aim, Lozora chunked the orb through the air, over the hill she was hiding behind, toward Fornax's position. The moment it left her hand, Lozora began to race in the opposite direction, all concern for stealth temporarily cast aside.

In order to make sure Fornax was caught, Cobblord had built a big range onto this trap. Brave as Lozora was in the face of danger, not even she wanted to be stuck inside the same cage where she'd just thrown Fornax. By the time she made it to a crop of trees to hang on to, the smaller rocks from the hill were already rising into the air.

For a moment, it was perfect. Beth won her part of the relay; Loyce lost them a few steps, but made up for it in trivia, getting Newton a clean handoff. He was trucking down the track, closing the small gap his opponent had built up. The others were nearly back—even Helen and Tori had started trekking over. It was a nice, normal, happy moment. Then Ivan felt the surge of energy. He might have stood out, craning his neck skyward, except that was about the time things started to fly.

Well, rise, really. Water bottles, kicked-off shoes, even hats clean off of scouts' heads. It all started to lift up, rising toward the rapidly expanding sphere overhead. The bigger it grew, the more details Ivan could make out. It was grassy inside, with long streaks of gray, like stone, and he was almost certain he caught movement in a few areas. Instantly, Ivan recognized the quality of the work. It was too specialized; only Cobblord could craft a custom portable world. Unfortunately, that also meant it wouldn't be easy to avoid without overtly using his powers. Cobblord's traps always sprang well.

A moment later, Ivan realized escape was never an option. The kids were rising too, a few fully leaving the ground. His eyes locked on Beth, who had been slowly jogging back to the group, and now upgraded to a full-on sprint. It probably would have been more effective had she not just been forced to race; Ivan could see her steps landing lighter as she drew steadily higher.

"What the hell is that thing?" Behind Ivan, Trey was panicking—a very reasonable reaction to the sight he was beholding. Any answer that could be offered would only raise more questions, so Ivan ignored it, focusing on controlling the situation while they still had a chance. With one look, it was clear he wouldn't be able to save all of the kids from going in—there just too many, and some of them were already halfway into the air. If keeping them out of it wasn't an option, then Ivan's only choice was to protect them on the inside.

"Keep the kids together," Ivan ordered, more force in his voice than he'd have used with the children. "Seems like we're going in no matter what. We can't risk them ending up alone."

The draw was starting to effect Ivan, as well. He weighed considerably more than the scouts yet could still feel the pull. Trey was already getting light on his feet, so Ivan made use of the movement he still had. Racing ahead with more speed than he'd been willing to show on the track, Ivan barreled across the field, to where the kids who'd been running were making their way back. He grabbed the ones he could reach, hurling them back in Trey's direction. They were still floating, but at least now, they'd hopefully come down with the others.

Beth didn't get tossed, however. By the time Ivan got there, she was too high, out of reach. With a single jump, he left the ground, sailing up through the air until he nearly collided into her. She grabbed on as soon as he came near, visibly scared, but still holding her composure.

"What is this thing?"

"A momentary obstacle," Ivan assured her. Looking up, he could see the structure in more detail now. There were stretches of forest, stone ruins, even cliffs and hillsides. Too big; this orb would be easy to lose people in. From his belt, Ivan grabbed a walkie-talkie, hoping that Trey still had his turned on.

"Listen to me, anyone being pulled in. We're going to rendezvous at the huge stone tower near the edge of that forest. Stay low, be quiet, and get there no matter what." From where the bulk of the kids appeared to be heading, that should be a straight shot for them to reach. He, Beth, and anyone else who'd been too far back would have a tougher trip, but they had the benefit of Ivan's willingness to crush any threat that might appear.

Having Beth secured, Ivan looked over to the section of the field he'd worried about the least, the area with Helen. She and Tori were both airborne, neither looking especially thrilled about it, though Helen's face spoke more to confliction than fear. If she transformed, it would be nothing to snatch the kids up out of the air. But in doing so, she'd also give away that Lodestar had been here, which meant the Starscouts would be potential targets anytime someone wanted to lure her out. Not to mention, if this was only the first step of some unknown plan, revealing their ace in the hole too early might leave them vulnerable down the line. Ivan did the only thing he could think of in the moment to help.

“I’ve got them!” Ivan yelled, hoping his words would reach across the long stretch of open air. “Just worry about keeping her safe.”

Both Tori and Helen nodded at that—a confusing reaction that Ivan didn’t have time to consider, because he was no longer floating. They had officially crossed the halfway point to the massive orb. Ivan could feel space rippling around them, packing the expanse of this microcosm into an sphere much too small to contain it. Passing that point meant they were now falling toward a new surface, rather than rising from the old one. As the ground drew near, Ivan pulled Beth in close, encasing her as best he could from all potential harm.

In the moment, Ivan’s entire focus was on getting her and the rest of the kids out of this safely. When that was done, when his anger could be allowed to stretch, Fornax would have a great deal to say to Cobblord and whoever hired him. That came later, though. For the moment, he had a portable labyrinth to deal with.

---

Chapter 76

---

In her youth, Helen would have already changed. Glasses cast aside, blazing through the air, she would have snatched every child out of the trap's pull and spirited them to presumed safety. Experience had taught her many things through the years, and one of them was the importance of patience. If someone had gone to all the trouble of securing a Cobblord creation, sneaking onto Starscout grounds, and deploying it, then she couldn't assume this to be the only trick in their bag. Until she knew what this was about, who she was against, and what powers were in play, it was preferable to save her big surprise. Rescue everyone now, and the perpetrators would clock Lodestar's presence, almost certainly triggering them to flee and try again later down the line. She might be able to catch them, but this was too much preparation to assume there wasn't some manner of escape plan.

All of which flashed through Helen's mind before she remembered that transforming could potentially out her secret to Tori, as well as to any of the kids or staff who happened to be looking over. That was a factor to be concerned with, but a secondary one. Protecting the kids came first.

Her eyes scanned the approaching orb, which appeared to be increasing in size as they drew closer. She spotted several moving creatures made entirely of stone, as well as some smaller ones that appeared to be constructed from grass and twigs. Cobblord was an efficient designer; he'd used the terrain of the labyrinth to stock it with pseudo-life. No need to feed them, and more could probably be formed if their numbers were cut down.

Certainly, they were dangers in other circumstances; however, for her or Ivan, there was nothing to present a significant challenge.

It was as she was visually combing their destination that she locked eyes with Ivan, who was already clutching Beth and pulling all the kids near him close. They'd be bunched up when they landed, and from the looks of things, not too far from the rest of the cluster. She and Tori, on the other hand, were drifting toward a canyon; based on their trajectory, Helen estimated they'd come down about a mile over from it. On her own, a minor matter to cross. With Tori in tow, it meant they had to either go around or fly, the latter of which came with a lot of required explanation.

"I've got them!" Ivan's voice would not be confined by such mortal hurdles as wind or distance. "Just worry about keeping her safe."

What a silly thing, the assurance she felt at those simple words. No one could "have them" in this sort of situation. It was dangerous, the kids were in peril, and they had essentially zero clue as to what they were up against. Yet all the same, Helen knew they'd be safe. Villain or civilian, when Ivan said he'd do something: he'd knock the gates of hell from their hinges to keep his word. With his daughter there, looking to him for protection, she truly couldn't imagine the threat that would successfully stop Ivan.

If he was taking over guarding their charges, then that meant it was on her to find the maze's center. Every Cobblord labyrinth could be safely destroyed and exited from their middles; he was as faithful to his theming as he was to his prices, both famously inflexible. Tearing it apart by hand was technically an option, but he tended to build in disastrous, often explosive, consequences for those who tried to cheat. On her own, she'd have blasted right through this sphere, and then wiped off all the sings. With a mass of Star Scouts in the mix, the safest option was to do this properly.

Their descent speed was increasing, and Helen noticed Tori bracing for impact. Poor thing was probably tearing herself up wondering whether or not to turn into fire upon landing, debating if broken limbs were worth a lost secret.

"Don't worry!" Helen said, raising her voice to be heard over the whistling of the air in their ears. "We slow down before landing."

The sharp, focused look Tori shot her was a curious reaction, but she did seem to be less immediately terrified. As for Helen, she spent the rest of their descent making as precise a mental map as possible. For most of the people being drawn in, this was all chaos, but she was used to looking at things from above. While the route she spotted was rough in patches, it definitely seemed to lead somewhere. That was as good a start as any.

Lifting her hands up like she was on a roller-coaster, Helen let out a sharp squeal of fun as the drop-speed grew, plummeting them toward the orb's ground. Ivan and the kids were out of sight—the warping space pushed them further away with every passing second. Since he had their walkie-talkie, Helen could only hope that Ivan would either be able to handle any danger, or be wise enough to yell for help. The faster she and Tori could end this, the less time those kids would be in even the slightest danger.

Behind her, the real world fell away as the artificial sky locked into place. They were officially contained in the trap. From this point on, the only way out was victory, or destroying the labyrinth entirely. The ground was rising up toward them at an incredible rate, and Helen permitted herself to savor the sensation of falling.

It was actually kind of fun, when one wasn't concerned about the landing.

Between the surprise, terror, and sudden rush of ground, Beth had apparently blacked out. She stirred slowly, feeling the strange grass against her skin. It was the right color, shape, even smell, yet something was inherently off. No one factor she could put her finger on, yet she instantly recognized the facsimile of foliage for what it was. Lifting her head, Beth spotted several other Starscouts, most of whom were either unconscious or barely starting to wake.

With a flash of terror, she realized her dad wasn't there. What happened? He'd been holding her as they fell, so he couldn't have landed elsewhere. Did that mean something had gotten to him? Beth knocked that idea aside; she knew the wilderness too well. No wild animal would go for one target in a sea of unconscious bodies.

Just as she was about to call out, movement from a nearby tree caught Beth's attention.

The leaves rustled as Ivan dropped down from among them, knocking some stray fake-twigs away from his khaki ensemble. At the sight of Beth awake, he hurried over, dropping down to a knee. “How are you feeling? Does anything hurt?”

She shook her head. Now that the pounding fear in her chest was fading, Beth realized she didn’t have so much as a bruise from the impact. Her meta-human ability had proven to make her slightly tougher, but considering that no one else was bleeding or howling in pain, she didn’t appear to be the only one. “I guess the ground is soft?”

“We slowed down just before we hit. The rapid momentum shift must have given you kids all a massive headrush.” Ivan pointed over to the tree he’d just come down from. “The good news is we’re close to most of the others. I spotted Trey, Yuri, and the rest of the scouts; they’re less than a mile from that stone tower. We’ve got a bit more of a trip, but the path isn’t especially difficult. Think of it like a nature hike in very unfamiliar terrain.”

“With alien animals,” Beth added. “I saw stuff moving down here when we were approaching.”

The fake grass squeaked slightly as Ivan slid onto his rear, sitting down next to his daughter. “Not alien. Custom made.” He motioned to the ground, trees, sky, all of it. “This is a trap made by a man called Cobblord. I saw one of those online mini docu-videos about him. Apparently, he specializes in custom creations, and these are his favorite. Used to be, you’d hear news about one appearing yearly. While well-engineered, Cobblord also has certain standards he upholds, one of which is that a labyrinth gets more dangerous the deeper in you go. Out here, in the starting areas, anything you see is likely more scared of you than you are of it.”

“Are you sure it’s safe?”

“Positive,” Ivan said, because he was. Beth didn’t know about his magic, and she certainly didn’t realize he had a low-capacity sleep spell. Even if she had, it was unlikely she’d have realized that two minutes and twenty pass the same while unconscious, especially with no electronics and an artificial sky. Most of all, she definitely wouldn’t have reason to guess that Ivan had spent that time racing around their entire area, destroying everything non-human that so much as twitched.

Not far from where they were, one could reach the lip of a large canyon. Were one to look into it, they might take note of the piled-up stone bodies, dozens of creatures smashed to oblivion and hurled roughly out of the way.

Ivan knew they would all be safe, because he'd ensured there was nothing around to attack. Eventually, the labyrinth would rebuild, but once they had the kids in one place, it would be much easier to protect them. Clearing everyone's path in secret was step one. Step two was rejoining the scout groups. Step three, find shelter—ideally food, if possible.

Step four was where things got complicated. Ivan could either stay with the kids, or try to hunt for the maze's center. It was tempting: wipe out every threat, then race to catch up with Helen and Tori. But if he were there, Ivan's mind would be back among the scouts, worrying for Beth. A compromised ally was often worse than an enemy—besides which, he'd told Helen he would keep them safe. That promise didn't end until the kids were off this orb and back onto... well, a different orb, when one got right down to it, but it was their orb.

Movement signaled that the others were shaking off their slumber. Beth had proven surprisingly resilient, waking several full minutes ahead of them. Ivan wasn't sure if that was due to her meta-abilities, potent willpower, or a developed tolerance. The reason he'd learned that spell in the first place was to help Beth rest when she was teething, so she'd gotten a fair few doses through the years. It was one more variable to account for in a situation already spiraling fast out of control. Hopefully, he wouldn't have to lean on any more magic. The ideal way this played out was that he found the other kids, they all hunkered down, and then Helen got them out. For her part, he had no concerns. Saving the day was what Helen did. Ivan just wished he felt quite so sure about his own tactics.

There was something else he hadn't told Beth, a part of the labyrinth that was not quite so comforting. While the starting area was the least dangerous, it steadily grew less so. Since the purpose of these places was to make the subject defeat the maze, staying in one spot was discouraged. The longer they stayed camped around here, the more numerous and powerful the creatures would become. By nightfall, the woods would be repopulated. Come morning, the threats would have grown in size and threat. If Ivan planned to let them survive that long, anyway. Once he got the kids with the other counselors, it would be easier to move freely. However long Helen needed, he would hold the line. Regardless of what he had to do or admit, he would not let harm come to these kids. Especially not with Beth sitting there, watching his every move.

Fornax was a villain, a killer, a monster, and so much worse. That had been the only life he ever knew, the only way of being. It wasn't until Wade that Ivan saw friendship in another person's eyes when they looked at him, something he hadn't experienced since the nameless companion Ivan had been tortured into killing. Then came Helen, someone who looked at him like he could be more than what he was.

But none of them came close to his children. For the very first time, Ivan had understood what it was to be a hero. When things went wrong, when they were afraid, when the world seemed darkest, they looked to him, because they knew he'd be there. That trust in him was among the most precious things Ivan had ever possessed. He already knew it was fading with Rick, and Beth probably wouldn't be far behind. Still, for right now, she was looking at him like he could make this okay, keep them safe. Save the day. There was almost nothing he wouldn't do to prove his daughter right.

"Everyone, please stay close as you wake up. The entrance was rough, but you'll be okay after a few minutes to shake it off. I know you're all scared and confused right now. That's not only okay, it's the expected reaction to something like this. However, we are not merely a gaggle of confused civilians. We are Starscouts, which means if anyone is prepared to get through this, it's all of you." Ivan looked to Beth, the only one fully awake so far. "For example, we need to head toward that stone tower. How do we navigate when we lose sight of it?"

From her pocket, Beth produced a compass, carefully noting the tip of the stone tower they could see poking up among the trees. "It's northwest of our current position. Assuming we always head in that general direction and keep checking in when possible, we should be able to find it without much issue."

Not exactly a tough dilemma, but the goal was to make them feel in control of the situation. Hopelessness and helplessness were wily enemies in situations like these. When people felt desperate, they started to make bad decisions. Keeping the kids calm was part of keeping them safe, a task that would only grow harder the longer this lasted.

"Starscouts, you heard Beth. Let's gather ourselves and start moving northwest. Stay close, and if you hear anything, let me know." Taking a defensive position at the front of the group, Ivan pulled away some almost-bushes and led the children toward what he dearly hoped would be safety.

Sparing a slender amount of his already scant mental energy, Ivan wondered how Tori was coping with all of this. Given that she didn't have children to watch or the responsibility to battle the maze, it was likely a much more relaxing endeavor than what he faced. With Helen there to keep her safe, the only real trouble she could get into would be self-inflicted.

---

Chapter 77

---

It was testament to how truly fucked up Tori's life had become that she quickly adjusted to the sudden shift in their situation: from a day out watching kids in harmless competitions to being scooped up by a giant floating sphere. Anyone who'd done deep research into meta-humans was at least passingly familiar with Cobblord's works—many of his creations had been huge public spectacles. Tori didn't have the slightest idea how the mazes functioned, unfortunately; only that they popped up, often swallowing bystanders, and vanished only after the capes ventured inside.

Standing on dirt that wasn't quite the right shade of red, Tori looked out over the vast canyon. Wide and deep, with sheer edges and no paths to be seen. Climbing down and then out wouldn't work, not without taking them days. Floating over in fire form was technically an option, if she was willing to reveal her secret and abandon Helen. That wouldn't have been a prudent move in the first place, and it certainly wasn't viable after Ivan's request.

"Just worry about keeping her safe." That was what he'd yelled across the aerial divide. Seeing as Tori was the one with abilities and guild training, it was obvious he wanted her to protect Helen. A much easier task than Ivan's guarding an entire herd of kids, but still not a simple job. Without using her abilities, Tori was going to be relying heavily on hand-to-hand, and some of the creatures she'd seen on their descent looked a might too large for that to mean success. She'd have to make judicious use of "tactical repositioning," the technical term for running like hell when outgunned.

Footsteps caused Tori to whip around and come face to face with Helen, who'd drifted slightly off near the end of the descent. No injuries that Tori could see. She didn't even look especially put out, face still beaming as Helen looked across the sizable divide. Her whistle started high, then dropped low, stretching for a borderline comical amount of time.

"Unless one or both of us is hiding the power of flight, I don't think we're making it across that." Helen seemed a touch more amused than that line really warranted, a detail Tori brushed directly over. "Not that it matters. Now that we're in, the only way out is through. Have to find the center and beat the final obstacle. That will safely release everyone trapped inside."

"Is there a non-safe release option?" Tori asked. She hadn't counted on the possibility of trapped exits, but there was no reason they couldn't be in use.

"Non-safe release is what happens when metas try to cheat. For example, nothing here would really pose much of a challenge to someone like Professor Quantum, but if he decided to blast right to the labyrinth's center, he would trip the failsafe measures, which everyone else inside would have to deal with. Carrot and stick. We either play the game as it's intended, with a chance at a happy outcome, or we cheat and live with the consequences. All of which is moot, in the first place. Obviously, we don't have the shortcut option."

Tori wasn't entirely sure about that. She could cause some potent destruction when needed, and a lot of the stuff here did look flammable. But Helen was right that they wouldn't be risking such tactics. Even without Ivan's fury if anything happened to Beth, Tori wasn't going to risk those kids. She was a criminal, not a piece of shit, and annoying as they could be, that cluster was still hers. Her fists tightened, anger threatening to rise. They were supposed to having a weekend camping trip, a nice, normal event. Some motherfucker had stolen that. From the kids, from Tori, from Ivan and Beth. Nobody hated getting robbed quite like a thief; Tori would have loved to show whoever did this just what a spectacular fuck up it was. Pity she doubted the chance would come. Ivan simply had more clout and connections. He'd get his vengeance first, and anyone who'd dined at his table knew that neither Ivan nor Fornax left any remains.

"What's the plan? Do we try to get a signal out to the capes?" Tori didn't love the feeling of those words on her tongue, but she couldn't very well suggest that they go attempt to conquer the labyrinth.

“That would take too long. Even if we could send a distress call, which is not an easy task, the way this place has warped space in on itself also means it packed in layers of time around us. Best guess, if we could get a message out right this moment, help might arrive within a week.” Helen slapped Tori lightly on the back, between the shoulder blades. “Good news. Looks like you and I are taking this bad boy on.”

It felt like her brain was stuttering. The ease and cheer on Helen’s face refused to fade, even while she proposed such an insane notion. Maybe Tori could have handled this alone, using her flames to hit and move, but with a human tagging along, their odds dropped substantially.

“I’m not sure we’re the best ones for the task.”

“Does it matter?” Helen managed to make what could have been a snippy retort sound utterly sincere. “We’re the ones here. The other adults can’t go maze-diving, since they have the kids to protect. Innocent people are in danger, and we have the power to help. What other choice is there?”

She wasn’t wrong about the situation. They were the only two who could move freely. Even if Ivan was capable of slipping over and joining them, he’d never leave Beth and the others helpless. Assuming that Helen had accurately estimated the warping of time around the labyrinth, external aid was unlikely to come anytime soon. Regardless of how she turned the situation around mentally, Tori couldn’t find another angle, not with such limited information to go on. There simply was no other way around it. Getting out meant going through.

“I guess there isn’t one,” Tori conceded. “Our only hope is to try. You seem to know these things pretty well—how do we find the center?”

“All roads lead there, eventually. It’s more a matter of how fast or easy a given path might be. I saw a route on our way in—looks troublesome, so that’s our best lead.”

The sudden break in logic almost made Tori miss a step. “Wouldn’t we avoid the troublesome parts?”

“Not if we care about time. The harder the path, the more direct it is to our goal.”

“Is that a rule of mazes?” Tori asked.

“That’s a rule of life. But yes, also applies to these labyrinths.” Helen looked up to the false sky, perhaps searching for an exit, or trying to create some sense of time. “We shouldn’t be reckless, but we also can’t afford to take too long.”

“Right. The longer everyone’s in here, the greater the chances one of the kids will get hurt.”

To Tori’s shock, Helen waved the notion off half-handedly, not even looking down. “I’m not worried about keeping them safe. Ivan’s there. My concern is that, depending on size, these devices can sometimes take days to properly complete, and we don’t have any food or water. Unless Cobblord happened to build those into this particular model, we’re on the clock with everyone’s own body. Without supplies, we can’t protect them from hunger.”

Casting her eyes around, Tori zeroed in on the foliage. Trees, grass, shrubs, some of it was bound to be edible. But food was secondary compared to water, and even as she scanned, Tori realized that just like the dirt, all of it looked slightly off. Just wrong enough that she wouldn’t feel confident trying to shovel it down, and certainly wouldn’t risk feeding it to one of the scouts. That hadn’t even occurred to her, yet Helen had clocked it as their primary obstacle.

The mental itch flared up once again, soothed by the thin rationalization that it must come from all her Starscout survival training.

“I knew I should have forced down more of those pancakes,” Tori mumbled.

“Ugh, yeah, the food here is dietarily compliant for pretty much anyone, but the flipside is that some of the stuff they took out is what makes it taste good. I made a breakfast muffin run.”

They’d started walking away from the canyon, ambling toward the forest and the route Helen had seen. Tori almost let the comment slip by unnoticed, before she remembered the prior day’s trek. “Wait, how did you make any kind of run? We’re miles from civilization and all came together on the same bus. You don’t have a car.”

Helen didn’t stop walking entirely, however, she did throw a curious glance over her shoulder, almost like she was reassessing Tori. “You’ve got a knack for critical thinking. Most people wouldn’t have noticed that. Anyway, I probably meant I made a breakfast muffin run before we came and packed a case in one of my bags.”

A rogue pang in Tori’s stomach signaled the first beginnings of hunger, an issue she’d have been far less concerned with one hour prior. “We should stop talking about food. I don't think it's leading anywhere productive."

Walking along the grass, it was easy to clock the shifts in terrain. After ten minutes, all signs of dirt were completely faded; it was as though they'd been dropped into a dense jungle. Even the air seemed warmer, soaking into Tori's unsweating skin. Heat was no issue, but if they encountered a more frigid environment, she might be in trouble.

One concern at a time. They followed the collection of breaks in the trees that constituted their route.

"Well, this is officially boring. Should we play a game? Penelope has made me a whiz at twenty questions, assuming all the answers you pick are famous cartoon characters."

How was she this calm? Helen was not only unconcerned with their situation, she was able to get bored? "Seems like we should probably pay attention."

"You can't stay tense the entire time, you'll burn yourself out before nightfall. I've got good ears. Let me handle the scouting. Until then, keeping mentally active will help us continue to stay alert."

Tori wasn't entirely sure how accurate that was; however, she'd begun to feel a headache forming in the base of her skull. The stress of waiting for something to pop out at any moment was wearing on her, and this could be their situation for days. Splitting guard duty made enough sense to justify letting herself have a momentary break. Assuming Helen proved to be as sharp a listener as she claimed, they could start trading off on the task.

"I don't know about twenty questions, but I can think of at least one. How do you know so much about these mazes?" Tori considered herself an adept researcher in the meta-human field, and not even she'd retained the myriad of details about Cobblord's various creations.

"Pretty simple: I used to be a reporter who covered the meta-human beat. Writing about new crimes requires putting them in context with what's come before, so a lot of the job was research based." Helen looked almost wistful, though given her age, the job couldn't have come more than a few years prior. "Nowadays, I'm mostly on the business side, running some self-owned stuff and staying afloat. I still like to keep up with meta-human events, though—can't quite kick the habit."

Although Tori didn't let her eyes go wide or loudly gulp, the sentiment still ran through her. A reporter who specialized in meta-humans, with a wide base of historical knowledge? Helen was essentially the worst person to be paired with while trying to secretly use abilities. Not to mention, her being a history buff meant she would absolutely know quite a bit about Fornax. If Tori fucked up truly spectacularly, it was possible for her to give away both their secrets. Better to steer the topic away from things like metas.

“Entrepreneur, huh? I’ve got ambitions in that direction, too.”

“Not happy at Vendallia?” Helen asked.

On reflex, Tori shrugged. “It’s fine for now, just not what I see for myself long-term. I like a little more excitement than Ivan.” It didn’t hurt to reemphasize his cover as a boring middle manager.

Helen’s laugh was different this time, lighter, almost familiar in an odd way. “You know, your uncle is more than his job. Ivan might surprise you.”

“I think I can safely say I am past the point of being surprised by anything about Ivan,” Tori told her.

A beat of silence passed before Helen’s reply; she’d tilted her head northward for a half-second. “Anything, huh? So you know that Ivan has a beautiful singing voice?”

Of all the insane things that had happened during their day thus far, that mental image almost caused Tori to trip over her own feet. Her brain had slapped Ivan’s face on one of the Multerion musicals—currently, she was picturing him belting out tunes as the titular character from Phantom of the Symphony. It was even more ridiculous than she would have guessed.

“I’m calling bullshit,” Tori declared.

“Call it all you want, but I’m right.” Helen didn’t slow down; however, she did shift their angle slightly, moving them to the right side of the path. “When Penelope was a baby, she was the fussiest sleeper you’ve ever met. I was on my own, a little out of my depth, and Ivan came by to help. Sometimes, he would sing her lullabies if she started to cry.”

The mental musical faded, replaced by the thought of Ivan leaning over a crib. Oddly, this image aligned far more naturally with her understanding of the man. When it came to his children, Ivan had no sense of embarrassment; their happiness and safety far outranked such selfish concepts. If singing made his kids happy, he’d have done it, just like he bumbled around the dance floor last night. Evidently, it was a skill he didn’t mind sharing with any infant in his care.

But pleasant an image as that was, it opened up an entirely new topic for discussion. “Wait, I thought you met Ivan when he helped out with Penelope's play. How did he sing to her as a baby?"

"That's a very good question, Tori. Unfortunately, I'm going to have to request we table it for now. Based on their movements, in less than a minute, we're going to have company." Helen halted their walk, pointing to a large section of trees that were just beginning to wobble.

"Brace yourself. We're about to see this labyrinth's claws."

---

Chapter 78

---

It only took a few hours to reach the stone tower where Trey, Yuri, and the rest of the kids were waiting. Had the cluster not been led by a man who'd secretly scouted the entire area and killed every hazard in their path, the simple trek would have taken triple that time, but none of the children suspected a thing as they ran to rejoin their friends. To them, it had simply seemed like the hike they'd already been prepared for, albeit in a scary situation.

"Oh my God, Yuri, they're okay!" Trey called from his position over to Yuri, who was in an identical spot on the other side of the tower. They'd posted lookouts, in case surprises came calling. Ivan wasn't sure if it was the program they headed or these two in particular, but he was glad to have competent help. Given the way this weekend was shaking out, that might well be the only lucky break he was going to get.

Unlike the others, Beth didn't run off to her friends, though she did wave to them. Her hand was gripping Ivan's, he could feel her elevated heart rate thudding away. Worse, he could sense her tension as Beth put all she had into focusing. This was scary, a sudden shift in the expected, and when Beth grew afraid, her blades tended to come out. Rather than worry the others, she was clinging to her father, trying with all her might to keep the silver weapons contained. Ivan's heart might have burst from pride, if it weren't already boiling in fury at whoever had dared to make his daughter so fearful.

"Look at that, we got here safely," Ivan told Beth. Still holding her hand, they headed toward Trey, who was walking in their direction. In unknown terrain, it was best to avoid loud noises like yelling whenever possible. “Is everyone accounted for?”

The relief on Trey’s face as he watched the children pour in spoiled the answer. “We’ll have to do a head count on your group, but I think we’ve got all the kids.” A shadow of fear suddenly crossed. “Wait, where’s the other cluster leader and her helper?”

“Across the track when we were getting lifted. Every inch of separation got magnified in the descent—you and I weren’t very far apart, and it still took hours to get here. Given their distance, it’s safe to say we probably won’t see them before this place shatters and sets us free.” Ivan noted the fear in Trey’s face; unfortunately, there wasn’t much mollification to be offered. Worrying about Helen was like fearing a dandelion: the circumstances where such sentiments were warranted virtually didn’t exist.

Several small forms, those from his cluster, were gathering up now that they recognized their leader. Loyce stuck her head up like a prairie dog, trying to see over the others. “Where’s Miss Helen?”

“She’s perfectly fine, off with Tori exploring this strange place.” Gently, Ivan sank down to a knee, eyeline with the kids. “I know everyone is scared right now, and understandably so. We’ve all been transported to a strange land. But keep things in perspective, too. Has anyone seen any sorts of animals or creatures?”

The shaking heads were as he’d expected, given his speedy slaughter, but it was also a way to make sure nothing had slipped his notice. Thankfully, it seemed he’d been thorough enough in the initial purge. Soon, there would be more. Ivan needed to get them all hunkered down safely before he went out again; each wave would be stronger than what came prior, meaning the fights would take longer.

“There you go, then. We’re in an odd location, but not necessarily a dangerous one. Helen and Tori will be fine. Soon, this place will run out of power and deposit us safely back on the ground. Until then, why don’t we take the opportunity to be proper Starscouts? Has anyone tried to identify the local flora, started sketching our surroundings, or begun work on shelter?”

Both the kids and Trey seemed surprised by the notion. They’d been so caught up in the shock of what happened, they’d yet to plan for survival. That needed to change immediately, both for actual logistics and to keep the kids from panicking. Having a task to focus on made situations like this more bearable; the other option was sitting around worrying all day.

“Let’s start breaking up based on the skills we feel best in, then your cluster leaders can find appropriate ways for everyone to help out. Take care not to overexert yourselves. I’m unsure how long it will be until we find snacks.” Ivan scanned the area once more, noting a bright orange spot amongst the emerald green of the grass. “I don’t suppose the water jug actually managed to keep its contents when crossing over?”

“Yuri was holding on to it, trying to weigh herself down, and inadvertently kept the top pinned,” Trey explained. “But we only brought enough to cool the kids down post-run. Even with rationing and the smaller bottles, people will get thirsty, fast.”

Another problem added to the list. At least for now, they had something to drink. Food was another matter. In theory, they would all be fine for days before the true negatives of starvation set in; however, that didn’t stop the pain and discomfort. Good kids or not, that was going to hinder them, to say nothing of morale. Nothing Ivan had killed looked especially edible, nor would he have trusted these materials, anyway.

In almost any other circumstances, Ivan would have slipped away into the forest, hunting down Tori and Helen to help them put an end to this. But between Beth and the rest of her cluster, he just couldn’t. They would be defenseless, and with no way of knowing how long Helen would take, he was equally ignorant on the number of threats that would come sniffing around this area. Try as he might to think of another way, Ivan’s only choice was to trust the others while he protected the kids.

“I don’t expect we’ll be here more than a day, at the most,” Ivan replied. “These tend to wind down long before then. Just to be safe, let’s plan for two days with the water rationing.” That would be stretching things thin as it was. If the others took any longer than that, he’d have to risk getting more directly involved. He’d never tried to teleport out from one of Cobblord’s creations. It very well might work, but it could also trigger some sort of volcanic meltdown. Far from a first resort, but if kids started getting dehydrated to the point of danger, risks might become necessary.

A squeeze on Ivan’s hand brought his focus back to Beth, who was chewing on her bottom lip, despite how her parents had tried to break that nervous habit. Eyes locked on the forest, she was steeling herself for something, gathering her nerve. At last, Beth turned her gaze to Ivan.

“I can... I’m going to cut some firewood. We don’t know what the night temperature will be, or if there are any animals out. A fire can be useful for warmth, protection, and cooking, if we find food.”

It was the first time Beth had even proposed the idea of using her powers outside of the courses she took for control. She didn’t even call upon her blades in private, let alone around other people, especially her friends. But she wanted to help, and saw something she could do that no one else could.

Few things terrified Ivan like his daughter’s kindness. He’d seen that same trait abused and twisted in others by no end of opportunistic shits. For a long time, he feared the tendency would lead to her becoming a victim. Then she grew older, began showing some of Janet’s wits, along with perhaps Ivan’s own stubbornness, which eased his concern slightly. But since the change, Ivan’s fear had only intensified. Kind, willful, smart, loyal, and with meta-human powers, Beth had all the makings of a future cape. He wasn’t sure what to do if that day came, how to react, what to say—any of it. What Ivan did know was that, in this moment, his daughter could turn something she was ashamed of into a way to help. She had a chance to be proud of her difference.

“Why don’t you wait a few moments? Then I can go over with you, help haul what you chop. Have to be careful around the woods until we know for sure there’s nothing out there.” He squeezed her hand, watching as fear and determination mixed to form an unexpected happiness on her face. The idea still worried her, but she’d made up her mind. No one knew better than her father how closed that meant the issue now was.

To his surprise, she pulled him closer, lowering her voice to a whisper. “Daddy, what happens if this doesn’t let us out in a day? I researched these labyrinths for a class project once. I don’t think they’re on a timer.”

As diplomatic a way as he could hope for a near-teen to call out his obvious lies. “I know, but they might as well be. The capes always handle these things in short order. Besides that, if things did get truly desperate, I still wouldn’t worry for a moment. You think someone can mess with this organization and not stir her up?”

He expected to have to sell the next line, yet it came out surprisingly natural. Or perhaps not so surprising, given the sentiment he was expressing. It was, after all, admiration for her strength; as the only one to defeat him, he had no choice but to acknowledge her power.

“Lodestar will save us, if it comes to that. In fact, I bet she’s already on the case.”

Sort of like if a bull and a mountain lion interbred, was Tori’s first thought. Gray, stone-like skin coated the lithe body as it strolled across the grass, with stretches of green foliage filling in the various joints. Each leg ended in a paw with claws the size of kitchen knives. The head included a snout with irregular, sharp teeth, and a pair of small horns better used for a quick slice than a full goring. Considering that even on all fours it nearly came up to her hip, this thing was hauling some heft around, too, no matter how graceful those steps appeared.

In a split second, Tori had to make the first of many choices. Assume it was aggressive and come out swinging, or wait to see if they roused this thing’s particular appetite. Were she in a real jungle, the latter option would have been more appealing—avoiding conflict wherever possible was generally a smart call. Except they weren’t in the actual world, with animals that moved as instinct and nature guided. They were in a giant crafted maze, filled with things solely here to kill them. One way or another, this creature would be Tori’s enemy. Waiting around for a fair fight was some stupid cape bullshit.

No sooner had it stepped fully out of the trees than Tori struck, darting in from the side and kicking it full force in what would be the ribs on a real animal. In mix of good and bad news, she visibly made an impact, eliciting a sharp yelp from her target. Unfortunately, the throbbing pain in her foot made it clear that damage hadn’t only flowed one way. Until she could shift her foot to fire form, Tori was looking at fractured, if not broken, toes.

That might have been worth the trade, had her target been suitably driven off. Instead, she appeared to have only provoked it; snout dipping low as it angled those horns toward her. Tori readied herself to dodge, hoping there would be a chance to strike in the counter. What she was utterly unprepared for was the axe kick Helen dropped onto the beast’s back. Unlike Tori’s attack, this drew far more than a yelp—stone shattered as it crumpled down slightly.

“Remember when I said we had to table your question? This is me untabling it.” Helen didn’t let up, scooping an arm under her opponent’s mid-section and flipping it onto its injured back, causing more damage in the process. “While I don’t really broadcast it, the truth is, I’m a meta-human. That’s how Ivan and I know each other.” She threw one elbow to the chest of her downed enemy, causing it to stop stirring. “Normal as I look, my body is physically fine-tuned to peak human condition. Meaning I can hit hard and well, when the need arises.”

Much as that opened up more questions than it answered, Tori did feel her hopes for survival increase substantially. If Helen had even some baseline physical abilities, it would make caring for her easier. That was the hope, at least, until the trees rustled and four more of the bullpanthers stepped into view.

Against this many, there was no time to think, especially as one charged right for Helen. Tori moved on pure instinct, fully giving herself over to the fight. As the bullpanther drew near, it opened its mouth, like it planned to chew off a piece of Helen. With only a passing thought of Deacon, Tori jammed her arm into its open mouth, fist already turning into fire. It was clear that getting out of this meant using all her tools, fire abilities included. Knowing that she was with a fellow meta-human, Tori barely even registered that she’d decided to let this secret out before she was blasting the monster full of flames.

The blaze did little to the stone, obviously. However, the foliage growing in the cracks and joints immediately caught fire. As it did, the bullpanther slowed, wobbling slightly, before starting to come apart. So the greenery was the glue keeping these things together. Tori set a grim smile to her face as she pulled her hand free, leaving the still-smoking husk behind.

“There’s a chance I might have a secret of my own.”

Helen was already shifting position, covering Tori’s other side. “Well then, what’s say we give these things a proper introduction to ourselves. I could use a good stretch.”

In spite of how mad the situation was, Tori barely suppressed a morose chuckle at the approaching creatures. It wasn’t often she had targets to truly let loose on. Perhaps she’d manage to have a little fun before this ordeal was over.

---

Chapter 79

---

Between Helen's fists and Tori's flames, the remaining three bullpanthers presented minimal challenge. Tori roasted the first, cooking off all the flora acting as its sinew, while Helen directed another's charge into a tree, its horn catching on the bark. She used the opening to kick its body mercilessly, until it crumpled down into a heap of rubble. The last one didn't attempt to flee—one more small reminder to Tori that they weren't dealing with sentient creatures, merely automated defenses.

Almost offhandedly, she torched it, wondering what tricks she'd use on the first enemy they encountered without such an obvious weakness. Assuming the challenges only got stronger, she'd probably have to deal with a few full-stone opponents, at the least. On the plus side, Tori was no longer on her own for combat.

Watching Helen move was a little disconcerting. Most meta-humans with physical augmentation leaned on that trait too hard, rather than training up their actual skills. They were easily marked by their simplistic styles and grandiose movements. Not Helen. She was quick, efficient, and brutal. There was no mistaking this for some newly turned meta who'd taken a few self-defense courses. Helen had experience. A lot of it, if Tori trusted her instincts—something she was hesitant on for the moment. Helen had slipped this secret past Tori without tripping so much as a single suspicion, after all.

With the last enemy downed, Helen wiped hair from her eyes, eventually giving up and digging around in her pockets for a band to hold it back. “Nice moves! I’d make a ‘hot stuff’ joke, but I doubt I can come up with anything you haven’t heard already. Still, pretty impressive fighting.”

“I was going to say the same to you.” Now that she’d stopped her assault, Helen looked perfectly mundane again. Tori could almost have deluded herself into thinking the whole thing imagined, if not for the rocky remains surrounding them. “You sure don’t move like a reporter or business owner.”

“Talking is fine, but we should move as we do it. Ticking clock of our supplies, plus the mazes get uppity if you stay in one place too long. A labyrinth is meant to be experienced. All the systems are designed to push people toward participating.”

No sooner had Tori learned this new fact than her mind leapt across the canyon to where Ivan and the kids would be hunkered down. It wasn’t the threats overtaking him that concerned her—no automated trap was strong enough to kill Fornax. What worried Tori was how efficiently Ivan could fight while hiding his secret. Between keeping Beth safe and getting to continue being Ivan, Tori knew without question which it was that he would pick, just like she knew losing that part of himself would hurt for the rest of his life.

More importantly, however, Tori caught on to something else. “Hang on. So the labyrinth pushes harder on people who try not to play along, which you already knew. And you’re still not worried in the slightest about those kids?”

This was as close as Tori dared to push, and even that was honestly overstepping. Her only saving detail was that she hadn’t actually said his name. She watched as Helen pondered the question, turning it around mentally, before finally allowing a gentle smile to land upon her face.

“Yes, Tori, it’s okay. I know who he is. I know what he can do. And I know he will use every ounce of that power to defend those children. Because a person is more than their reputation, more than their past, more than the facts others might think they know. But most of all, because Beth is there watching. He will never let himself fall short when his children’s eyes are upon him. With her present, I’m not sure he’d lose to anyone, even Lodestar.”

Relief cascaded through Tori as the weight of Ivan’s secret fell away. With as much as they had to deal with already, the simple act of being able to genuinely discuss the situation felt like a huge leap forward. Now that her powers were revealed and Ivan's identity acknowledged, Tori could finally put her energy fully into beating this labyrinth, rather than doing so with one hand and her fire abilities tied behind her back.

"That is great to hear, but word to the wise, I wouldn't drop the Lodestar line around Ivan. 'Nobody beats Lodestar' is practically his unofficial motto." Tori heard something like a snorted snicker slip out of Helen's mouth, but when she turned back, the bespectacled woman wore a totally neutral expression.

"You can't blame him too much for that. If you were the best at something for years and years, then met the only other person who could actually challenge you, even if they eventually won, it would be hard not to admit their talent. After all, to belittle that person's skill is to belittle everyone below them, as well." Helen held up a finger, and they came to a sudden halt. She stood like that for a moment, then nodded to the left, taking them along a slightly rougher path of the forest.

Shoving aside some thick branches, Helen held them in place long enough for Tori to slip through. "It's totally okay if you don't want to discuss it, but may I ask how you ended up with fire abilities? Some metas like the chance to open up, others not so much—completely your choice."

With a grunt, Tori roughly tore back a shrub trying to dig its thorns into her legs. Her injured foot was throbbing more and more over time; soon, she'd start limping noticeably. Using fire was one thing, letting on that she could turn into it another. Then again, Helen already knew Ivan's secret and the bulk of Tori's: what did one more aspect matter? Especially compared to slowing down their trip when they were already on a pretty serious clock.

"Lab accident," Tori replied, motioning for Helen to slow down. She pushed her way through the undergrowth until Tori could brace herself against a dense tree trunk. Lifting her right foot, she made a mental note of thanks to the guild for providing a phase-shifting-friendly version of this uniform. "Was messing with something a bit out of my league, things went awry, and when the dust settled, I could do this."

On cue, her entire lower leg shifted into living fire. As the nerve endings vanished, so did the ache, permitting Tori a long sigh of unexpected relief. That might have been hurting more than her brain wanted to admit. Only when the pain vanished could it be truly appreciated.

Helen was staring, fascinated by the transformation. "That's interesting. Historically, every stable elemental phase-shift like that has been done with some aspect of magic; never seen one from a purely scientific-based source. Orion was the closest, but he had a little bit of everything.” She made no move to draw closer or examine the phenomena, yet her gaze also didn’t leave the burning appendage.

“Guess you can consider me a... trailblazer.”

Helen laughed, probably more out of politeness than actual humor. “That joke almost makes me wonder if you and Ivan aren’t actually related after all.”

Not wanting to dive back into anything around that topic, Tori opted for a rapid conversational redirect. “What about you? How did you get... super-strength, it looked like?”

“More maxed out, than super,” Helen corrected. “The maximum potential my genes held. Think of humanity like cars being made on an assembly line. There’s a plan for each, but some get put together better than others—usually just by luck of the draw. My body is the equivalent of someone building a custom car. Every detail has been polished, every efficiency achieved. Blood pumps increased oxygen, muscles recover more quickly. I’m flexible, fast, and so on. Basically every advantage my body had the potential for has been realized, and every weakness eliminated.”

That was a fascinating power all right, if limited in scale. Human boundaries meant Helen could never tangle with the true powers of the world, but day to day, her ability probably came in a lot handier than controlling flames. There was, however, one discrepancy that Tori couldn’t help noting as she returned her foot to physical form.

“Perfectly built, huh?”

“Well, the aesthetics are open to opinion. I’m not saying it straightened the bump in my nose or gave my hair effortless volume,” Helen said. “More functionally perfect.”

“Weird then, that someone with all those advantages would have subpar eyesight.” Tori reached up, tapping the side of her face where glasses would have rested, were she wearing them.

To her surprise, the revelation was greeted by an increase in cheer from Helen, who jiggled her own spectacles in response. “Could be a fashion choice. Can’t a gal accessorize?”

“Could be,” Tori agreed. “I guess I should ask you same thing you asked me: want to talk about where your powers came from?”

“I very much do not.” Helen managed to keep all the pleasantness still in her voice, while also instantly shutting down that line of conversation. “The experience was far from a happy one, not the sort of thing to get bogged down in when our plates are already so full.”

That more or less killed the discussion for the next few minutes. Instead, they focused on making headway through the brush. Overhead, the artificial sky was shifting, its false sun beginning to move toward the horizon. Odds were good that this place had some sort of day and night cycle, which probably meant things would get more dangerous once the sun fell. Tori had nothing to base that assumption on, yet it felt immediately right, the way these sorts of things were meant to work. Perhaps she was simply learning to think like a villain.

After half an hour of silent trekking, they broke through a cluster of trees to find something new. More stones, though these weren’t moving—for the moment. Overgrown by what looked to be decades of grass and weeds stood a stone arch, leading into what would have been matching stone walls, if not for the broken sections causing sizable gaps. Further along, the breaks grew less frequent, as the structure appeared to lead to a large building made of the same material. While there was more forest along the edges, Tori felt confident that between them, they could cut a path around the side.

“Pretty sure we can skip this, if we work at it.”

“I’m almost certain you’re right, except we can’t.” Helen pointed to the huge obstacle, the place their route had obviously been leading toward.

“Remember, this is a game. Don’t play along, and things get more complicated. Angering the maze just risks making our own job harder, or causing surprises for Ivan and the others.”

The part of Tori that had always been drawn to discovery and invention, the piece of her that compelled the breaking down of various electronics to see how they worked, rebelled at such an idea. Her mind burned, seeing opportunities for efficiency and being denied them. Tori wanted to rip this place down to the screws until she understood the mechanics behind every blade of grass and puff of wind. Instead, she swallowed her annoyance and looked at the path laid out for her, the one she was trapped on.

“Any idea what will be inside?” If she couldn’t go at this her own way, Tori would have to settle for being as forewarned as possible.

“Could be a fight, a puzzle, a trap, a test, or an empty building just to mess with us. Probably not that last one—I don’t feel especially lucky today—but it shouldn’t be too bad. Escalating challenges and all that.”

Tori couldn’t believe her own feet as they walked through the stone arch, plodding down the path to an obvious trap. “Walking into a dangerous situation with no idea what we’re facing and with innocent people counting on our success. You know, this is probably the closest I’ll ever get to being a cape, thank goodness.”

“It does seem to be a calling that isn’t for everyone.” Helen paused, running a hand along the stone wall briefly, like she was checking for something. Whatever it was went unfound; she resumed their pilgrimage after a few moments. “Although, you might be more inclined to it than you realize. In my experience, there does tend to be a common trait that all capes share.”

“Corny taste in code names?”

Helen had to visibly bite back a chuckle at that. “Not quite. The inability to stand idly by. Capes are the sort of people who see an event they can’t stand happening and do something about it. Even if they might not be powerful enough, even if they don’t know the people involved. The ones who can act, and do—that’s the pool of people I’d look to for future superheroes. And you definitely don’t strike me as someone to linger on the sidelines when she’s compelled to action.”

“Maybe so, but there’s no way you’ll catch me in one of those ridiculous outfits.” As far as counters went, it wasn’t an especially strong one, mostly because Helen was right. The only thing she’d missed was that there was another avenue for those who wanted to shape the world into something better. Not all of those willing to act went to the side of the capes. The makings of a superhero and a villain were only a few details apart.

From the building, both women heard a loud noise rise up, like the sound of something very heavy thudding onto the ground. Exchanging a single look, they lowered their stances, hunkering down behind the walls for as much cover as they would allow. Now that they knew there was potential company, they silently made their way along the broken stone hallway, toward the unseen challenge awaiting them inside.

---

Chapter 80

---

Beth turned out to be a big help, as she was just about the only sharp element present in the camp, outside of a few rogue pocket knives. Her silver blades sliced effortlessly through the pseudo-trees, ringless interiors exposed as they cut cleanly in twain. For the larger denizens of the forest, Beth focused on shearing away branches, stretching her mercurial slithering weapons several feet up.

Despite Wade running analyses and the AHC teaching her control, there were still no clues about Beth's power. What it was, precisely, or where it had come from, no one had any notion. They weren't even sure what that silvery metal was composed of. So far, there had yet to be so much as a single fleck of residue to examine. The only way to test the blades would be in person, and Ivan hadn't yet figured out a way to slip a guild examination by Beth. Sweet and trusting though she was, every now and then, the girl had a habit of noticing more than one might expect.

By the time they headed back, Beth had honestly cut more wood than they'd possibly need for their planned stay. She'd found something of a rhythm by the end, so Ivan had just let her go. Having a task to focus on beat whatever awaited them when she was done: more sitting around. The boredom would be an insidious enemy the longer this dragged on. Without distraction, it was all the easier to dwell on fear and hunger.

Hauling the wood in his arms—more than he'd have normally risked carrying in less distracting circumstances—Ivan quickly took note of all the kids milling about. With a rough camp established, they were getting bored. The mental part of this would be harder than dealing with the automated monsters; he couldn't punch away a group of kids' growing unrest, even knowing it might eventually lead to panic.

They had to keep the scouts engaged and mentally active, doing more than thinking about their situation. Having them run around or burn energy was the easiest fix, but one they couldn't rely on with such limited supplies. Higher activity meant sweat, which would lead to emptying their pitiful water reserves all the faster, quickening everyone's panic. Ivan didn't have a solution, nor did one jump to mind immediately. This was far past his area of expertise, even as a parent. The best he could do was handle one issue at a time and hope Helen was moving fast.

Ivan was barely done setting down the wood when he spotted Yuri zipping over. She was walking briskly, without trying to appear in a hurry—performative for the scouts, obviously. Whatever the issue, it was only intended for adult ears.

"Why don't you go check on everyone?" Ivan proposed to Beth, clapping off the final splinters from his hands. "Mallory and Caden are both unsettled by surprises. We should make sure they're holding up all right."

She responded with a mock-salute, smile fixed in place, happy to help. "Can do!"

By the time Yuri reached Ivan, Beth was already halfway across the camp; her lack of care for optics meant that she could scramble along at great speeds. Rather than let Yuri broach her topic, Ivan motioned her to follow slightly, getting them to the edge of camp. Not terribly subtle, but he suspected that would be a growing theme as the ordeal wore on.

Eyes to the sky, Ivan tried to estimate how long they'd been inside the orb already. This place's night wasn't too far off, though how that corresponded to time in the real world would be total speculation. Anything that folded space this much usually messed with the chronoflow as well. No matter how he squinted, it had been more than a little while. Long enough that soon, he'd need to start worrying about monsters again.

"Hey, it was Ivan, right?"

"Correct, although I certainly wouldn't have held forgetting against you, considering the circumstances." He noted the awkward shift in her movement and the way her eventual stance favored the back foot. Not a topic she was looking forward to, then.

"Listen, I was talking with Trey, and it seems like maybe sitting around isn't the best idea. If there's nothing out there, we should be hunting for an exit.”

Having kids had taught Ivan a tremendous amount of lessons, one of the most salient of which was patience. Yuri wasn't stupid, merely afraid and inexperienced. She'd been hurled from her comfort zone, and didn't even have the luxury of panic with all the scouts looking to her for support. Chiding her would get them nowhere; however, Ivan also had to align her thinking. Resources were too thin for major mistakes.

“Much as it might feel that way, I promise you, we are following the correct strategy.”

More weight on the back foot, yet she didn't actually shift her position. “How can you be so sure about that? We've got no capes, no idea if anyone else even knows we're in trouble, and the only two people actually trying to get us out of here weren't exactly substantial looking. Someone like Trey would have better luck.”

“If Trey's strength is so vital, perhaps it's best used to protect the children.”

“From what?” Yuri demanded. “There's nothing here. We've scouted all around the tower, totally empty. We're wasting someone who could be helping to get us out.”

Given that Ivan had slaughtered the first wave of enemies, then refused to move on, whatever came next was guaranteed to be more troublesome. Not by Ivan's standards, but strong enough that Trey would be pulped the first time he met one of the incoming creatures. If he let the man leave, it was a death sentence. While that was a sacrifice Ivan would make if the situation demanded, they were quite a way from reaching that point yet. More people to watch the kids would make Ivan's work protecting them easier, and besides, he didn't dislike Yuri or Trey. Wanting to help wasn't bad, they just lacked understanding on how to best apply their strengths to the situation.

“Perhaps, or perhaps the monsters here only come out at night.” Ivan pointed up to the fake sky, where the not-sun was drifting toward the horizon. “Given that we're surrounded by a forest, nocturnal threats would make sense.”

“It's not a real forest,” Yuri pointed out. She pressed her hand against a nearby tree, eyes narrowing at the sensation. Off, somehow, in a way that couldn't quite be articulated any more than it could be denied.

Ivan nodded his agreement. “But it aims to be. It mimics one in appearance, so schedule makes just as much sense. My point is, before Trey goes off on his own, perhaps he should wait out one night with the group. Help soothe the kids, make sure we’re really as alone as we think.”

Her eyes followed his to the artificial sky, noting the way their version of a sun had shifted. Without looking, he could hear her stance change, her feet more solidly rooted.

“I guess it doesn’t make much sense to start out in unfamiliar terrain with night approaching. But if it passes without incident, he’s going to head out. We don’t need this many people to keep the kids corralled. Getting out of here needs to be the top priority.”

“Let’s worry about making it through the night first,” Ivan suggested. “To that effect, my daughter procured us quite a bit of firewood. Perhaps we should get the scouts to work building a proper pit. It shouldn’t strain them much, and will occupy their time.”

Yuri caught the idea quickly, already on board. “Fire also doesn’t hurt in case there are any animals out here, or we find a water source to purify.”

Her optimism felt misplaced, but then, Ivan had never been in this particular creation of Cobblord’s. It was always possible he’d built the model to be sustainable. If nothing else, Ivan wasn’t going to take away her hope. That was something vital they needed to cling to, especially as time here wore on.

While Yuri headed back to camp, Ivan turned his attention from the sky to the forest beyond. It wouldn’t be long now, and the next wave would come. His original plan had been to slip away in the hecticness, crush their assault before it ever drew close, and then return before being missed. Unfortunately, going that route had a strong chance of getting Trey killed. More than that, he’d already spotted a few scouts poking around the borders of the camp, exploring their boundaries the way children always did. Ivan couldn’t be sure he’d caught every trap and danger, so they needed to be kept out of the woods—a much harder task with nothing to be afraid of.

To keep this working, Ivan was going to have to let the scouts know that there was danger in these woods—all without letting them get hurt, and ideally while keeping his own identity hidden. This was why Ivan loathed situations in which he had to protect people; his skills were never suited for it. Everything about Ivan was built for destruction. At his peak, he could make natural disasters shit their pants. The most he could do now was make a plan, hope for the best, and trust in Helen.

Though he really hoped she wasn't taking her sweet time with ending this.

It was extremely tempting to use super-speed. Make an excuse, slip ahead of Tori, change, and blast through the rest of this labyrinth before they missed what counted as dinner at the End of Summer Shindig. Helen had two major hang-ups staying her speedy feet, however, the largest of which was not being sure of how the labyrinth would react. Zipping through the experience seemed like the sort of thing that would trip countermeasures; no big deal if they fell on her, very big deal if they impacted the kids. Even past the safety concerns, Helen might have still kept to this strategy, if not for the lack of clues.

Right now, she had zero. Well, that wasn't entirely true. Helen could rule out guild involvement, barring another coup attempt, which seemed early so soon after the last. The organization was much too smart to take this kind of swing, and against Ivan's own children... no, definitely not the guild. The AHC was out, as well. The only one who might do something like this was Vernon, and he'd never outsource that kind of work. His pride wouldn't bear it.

Taking those two off the board, Helen was working blind. She had no idea what this was about, the target, the goals, any of it. Until she understood what was happening, it would be difficult to prevent repeats from occurring. Knowing an enemy's plans made thwarting them vastly easier.

So Helen trod on next to Tori, never letting on just how powerful she could be if the need arose. Watching Ivan's apprentice had been fascinating. It was strange to see the places where his guidance had plainly left its mark. No wonder the two got along: they were emotionally closed off peas in their sardonic little pod. Yet Helen could also see Tori's differences: the way she examined every detail, the careful thought constantly at work behind those brown eyes. Ivan's guidance had always come from his gut; he trusted the impulses that had kept him alive above virtually any other source. It was what made Fornax so unpredictable, and so interesting.

Up the eroded steps inside the building—which was an interesting design choice in itself, considering this place wasn't actually ancient. Or was it? Helen didn't know if Cobblord made these to look distressed, or if he built them new and then found a way to age them. Either way, the effect was impressive—a few of the stones even gave way under Helen's feet near the end of the staircase.

At the top, there was only a single archway open. The rest had been blocked off by coincidentally fallen rubble, adding weight to the idea that the scene was designed like this. Expecting rocks to fall in a certain pattern was a stretch, even for a craftsman of Cobblord's caliber.

Outside the door, Tori hesitated, giving Helen a chance to put herself directly in front. Secrets were well and good when one could keep them, but she wasn't going to risk letting Tori be hurt. Hiding the fact that she was Lodestar wasn't allowed to grow more important than actually being Lodestar, a personal rule she'd settled on a long time ago.

Despite the shadowy appearance, there was no mildew or dankness as they entered the new hallway, just more stones as dry as those outside. Nicer on their noses, but not a great sign for this place having any drinkable water. If there were any, it probably would have been used for ambiance. As it was, the hall still cast a foreboding aura: long, looming, with sharp stones jutting out at odd angles. With every few steps, sconces near the ceiling burst into flame, lighting the way ahead.

Finally, they left the hallway as it opened into a vast chamber. At least fifty feet high, with odd breaks all along the walls, it appeared to be entirely empty, save only for a large metal pit directly in the center. As an old hand at these things, Helen wasn't surprised when a stone slab dropped into place behind them, blocking their exit. Nor was she ruffled when pitch-black flames suddenly burst forth from the room's pit. Not even the sudden voice that filled the room truly caught her off guard.

The words it spoke, on the other hand, shocked Helen so greatly she very nearly let out an un-Lodestar-like curse.

"Welcome to the first chamber of testing. It is a pleasure to see you've made it this far... Fornax."

---

Chapter 81

---

It felt like the stale air had been sucked from the room. Both women tensed, albeit for quite different reasons, as the booming voice continued to echo around them.

“Surprised? Did you think it was coincidence that you’d ended up here, or perhaps that we were after your little pet?”

Tori’s hands tried to ball up, but she denied them. Getting riled up on someone else’s terms didn’t suit her need for the moment. She had to be clear-headed until there was a chance to find this motherfucker, then the payback could start.

“No, Fornax, this was all for you. I’d have preferred peace—we never meant to steal your toy—but I know how your guild feels about grudges, to say nothing of your own reputation. My green little helper all but begged me not to mention that she was the one tasked with trapping you. Silly thing still believes you’ll be a threat afterward. Consider this a warning, a show of force, and a threat. Because we know about you. We know, for example, that right now, you’ve almost certainly been barreling through this maze, fearful of what will happen to those kids while you’re gone. To say nothing of your sweet Beth.”

“Oh shit.” Tori didn’t mean to speak; the words came out entirely on their own. Glancing over, she found a severe expression on Helen’s face.

While outwardly she had better control, Helen’s internal reaction was more or less on par with Tori’s. Ivan was generally dependable, predictable, a functioning member of society. Except when people went for his family. That was when Fornax showed he was capable of more than wanton slaughter; hunting people for vengeance had been that monster's entire purpose, the inferno of hate that fueled him. Attempting to provoke that side of Ivan, even as a bluff, was absolutely fucking insane. The trail of destruction he'd leave would be horrific, if she didn't stop him first.

"I'm sure by now you've discovered that any attempts at skipping sections, teleportation, and strong warping of the chronoflow will all trigger more of Cobblord's pets to appear. What you likely haven't learned is that in each occurrence, the same enemies spawn near the starting area, where you'll have had to leave those children undefended. We wanted to see what you could do when properly motivated; you understand. That's also why that entire area will get rapidly more dangerous as the hours pass. Perhaps you left your pet to buy them a little time, but she won't last long. You need to hurry, Fornax. Hurry if you want to save them. And remember that this was nothing more than a display. We know your name. We know your loved ones."

The flames roared suddenly, rising up from the pit as the voice reached a crescendo that bordered on a hiss. "Stay out of my way!"

With that, the fire vanished, though Tori noted there were still lit sconces showing them an empty room. More than just that, there was a creaking and rustling coming from all around them. Tori strained her eyes, trying to see into walls' dark voids where the light refused to reach. No luck, and while Tori did love both cursing and darkness, in this instance, she decided to flick on a light. Forming a fireball in her hand, Tori reared back and chunked it through the air, sending it blazing along to splash roughly against one of the opening's corners. From the brief flash, she could make out more rocks and a splash of green, which likely meant foliage. Those were secondary observations, however. The most important factor was apparent the moment her light had landed: movement. Something was moving in those walls.

"Stay calm." Helen's voice was steady, a sharp contrast to the shifting surroundings. "This is going to be a fight. We have to accept that and adapt." She wished she felt half as sure as she sounded. Someone was picking a fight with Fornax, and that was nuts, but the truly crazy part was that Helen still had no idea who it was. She had firsthand experience with every major threat to attack the world for the last few decades, the sorts of people who even could come at Fornax and the guild, none of whom fit the bill. Not like this, and not that voice.

Reorienting herself, Tori put her back to Helen, making sure they had eyes on all angles. “Any thoughts on what we’re facing?”

“Something manageable. Remember, Cobblord’s skills might be for sale, but he’s consistent with his art, and that means an escalating challenge.” The part Helen was leaving out was that this was a sliding scale built with Fornax in mind, but she’d deal with that once it mattered. “Based on the layout, I’d expect multiple attacks coming from different directions, probably triggered as soon as we head toward the pit to examine it for clues.”

That lined up with Tori’s observations, so it was as fine a working theory as any. “Gotcha. Okay, so what’s in our favor? That whole monologue was for...” Tori’s words faltered, as she suddenly realized just how vague they’d really been when discussing who Ivan was. From what Helen said, she might know it all, or only that he was a meta with a past. No one had actually said the name Fornax. A moment of thought made Tori realize the issue was beyond her control. The voice had called out Beth by name. There was no denying the connection.

“The monologue was for Ivan.” Tori couldn’t bring herself to use that name around someone else, even if the cat was freed from its bag. “So whoever made this can’t communicate directly. Hopefully, they can’t see anything either, or make adjustments on the fly. This whole thing was built with the expectation that only one person would be here.”

“Meaning that only one of us needs to go down to trip the attack,” Helen agreed. “Which will be me.”

“I’m not sure—”

Without hesitation, Helen cut her off, noting the way the sounds were getting louder. No matter the circumstances, the labyrinth got antsy when people stood still for too long. “Tori, you hit from a range. I punch and kick. Of the two of us, which can do a better job drawing attention, and which can do better sniping?”

Helen didn’t actually wait for an answer; the speech had gotten her a bit more stirred up than she wanted to let on. It wasn’t just coming after Ivan and Beth, although that did set off some very un-Lodestar-like feelings in her mind. This bastard had done it in the middle of a Starscout event, endangering unknown numbers of innocent children just to piss off and test Ivan. As a cape, it infuriated her, to see them needlessly put at risk. As the one who'd promised, by context, if not words, that those kids would be safe, Helen was veering dangerously close to getting truly pissed off.

When this was done, when the traps were gone and she could move freely, there would be severe repercussions. For the criminal's sake as much as her own fury, because locked away in an AHC jail cell was just about the only place he had an outside chance of surviving Ivan's vengeance.

Until then, she had work to do.

No sooner had her feet touched the center of the main floor than the walls virtually exploded. From within the holes they came, appendages like mossy snakes, as the overgrowth-covered stone struck. Some of the extremities had heavy, blunted ends, like a mace, while others were sporting a mishmash of blades poking out along every angle. Helen leapt out of the way of a mace-arm, watching as it smashed into the corner of some steps, leaving a huge crater in that section of staircase.

A blade-arm wasn't too far behind, and as Helen slid beneath, using her flexibility to pull off an Olympic-level limbo move, she noticed the flashes of red coming from the edge of the room. Tori was firing on the arms, burning off sections of foliage where she could, but it wasn't easy to hit moving targets from her position on the ground. The efforts didn't appear to be bothering the arms, as they continued to focus on Helen.

Dashing across the stone, she managed to zip past two more huge, smashing blows from the mace-arms. One of those, and Helen's secret was out. Her body would use as much power as needed to survive—very rarely a subtle display. Watching the angles of attack, she altered her planned path of movement slightly, a new idea jumping to mind. Glancing over to Tori, Helen noticed that her Starscout assistant was gone. That misconception only lasted until the blast of flame drew Helen's attention to the ceiling.

Since shooting from the ground did shit-all, Tori had elected to go skyward. Whatever hesitations she'd had about hiding her powers were long gone in the wake of that speech. This was no longer a curiosity, or a weird occurrence to puzzle out. Somebody was knowingly swinging against Fornax, against her teacher, against her guild. That changed the stakes, even without the personal aspect. The kidnapping was an accident—didn't make her less mad, but she got it. This was different. This was that bastard looking directly at the organization she was a part of and declaring he wasn't afraid. He was going to learn fear, for the short time he survived; until then, blowtorching his toys was the best outlet Tori could find.

She rained fire down on every slithering stone appendage she could see, targeting the bases where they connected to the wall. This had the benefit of avoiding Helen, who was sticking to the center of the room as she nimbly ducked and dove away from every blow, like a cartoon mouse slipping through her cat's fingers. At least, that was Tori's impression until the crunch.

One of the mace-arms had come down heavily, directly onto the midsection of a blade-arm. Somehow, amidst all the dashing about, Helen had managed to guide the appendages where she wanted them, causing the mechanism to attack itself. The half-shattered blade-arm weakly rose, shaking visibly, and Tori decided this was her chance.

Cutting off her flames, she dropped through the air, firing off an occasional blast for redirection. Just before the end, Tori shot flames from both hands and feet, killing her momentum as she landed on the crushed section of arm. Since there were no points for subtlety, Tori opted to take her speediest strategic option. Digging her arms into the stone and thick moss, she turned her whole body to flames, cascading out and in, catching aflame every piece of greenery she could find. The fire caught at once, racing through the interior of the arm, along with the outside. Tori barely had time to get back into the air before it was cracking, the front section breaking off entirely.

One down, seven to go, by Helen's count. Too many. She looked around the building once more, wracking her brain. No matter what the client wanted, Cobblord maintained his standards. A slug-fest for the first challenge didn't seem fitting, especially considering that this was supposed to be for Fornax. What would he have done, in this setting? Obliterate the arms, obviously. So what next?

Her eyes fell upon the forgotten firepit, and Helen felt it all click. Fornax would break the enemies, only to realize they were just a diversion. The real key would be somewhere he'd likely overlook, costing Fornax precious time and angering him further. It was an assumption that only worked if one knew Fornax by reputation as a mindless brute, rather than the kind of man Ivan really was. Trusting her instincts, Helen altered her planned trajectory.

With Tori overhead throwing flames, the arms were at least slowing down a bit as their greenery burned. Recalculating their speeds, Helen waited a hair longer to break left, sprinting in just near enough to a mace-arm that it would try to attack. She'd slowly been getting a sense of their range and what provoked a strike; given enough time, Helen could probably have broken most of the appendages with one another. This would be faster, if it panned out. If not, she'd just try something else. As an old friend had once told her: "The real secret to being a cape is just not giving up until you've found a way to win."

As she ran, Helen gauged the arms. The nearest one had blades, but it was currently on fire and would drop down a few feet short. Although a mace-arm was coming from the left, two blade-arms recovering from their last swings blocked a clean angle. Tori was working hard to cook the other blade-wielder, which left the last mace-arm for Helen, just like she wanted. It tracked her as she moved, clearing the blade-arm strike that was two feet short. Right when she slowed, the way a normal person might to take a corner or grab a breath, the arm struck. It slammed down with all of its considerable weight and power, utterly destroying the firepit that Helen had leapt out in front of.

Like a hose with a leak, they could hear the hiss, some unseen element escaping from within the ground where the pit had once stood. As it grew louder, the arms began to sink, the invisible force propelling them draining away. Holding her breath, more for fear of stink than poisoning, Helen walked casually back over the shattered remains of the firepit. Her hair was blown back by the invisible gas, but all the rattling of the rubble made it easy to spot what she was looking for, though she didn't know what it was.

The gem shined a pale red in the light of the flickering sconces, a perfect square, evidently with some sort of charge or magic. That assumption was based off the fact that as soon as Helen laid hands upon it, a door at the other end of the building began to loudly slide open. She watched as Tori came down, landing roughly near one of the now lifeless arms before walking over.

"Figure it out?"

"Yeah. The real target was the firepit all along. Classic double-up: you build something that seems like it's only there for theatricality or ambience, then hide the prize inside." Almost too classic, really. Helen hadn't seen this one used for a good while. "No surprise from someone that still monologues. I mean, they happen, but doing a whole production of one has been out of vogue for decades."

Together, they looked at the jewel, still sparkling slightly in the flickering light of the residual flames spreading across the downed arms. It was Tori who finally said the obvious, unable to see any way around it. "One gem probably means more, right? If it was a key, it might be one and done, but that feels like a component."

"That's my guess. And they'll only get harder from here." Helen tucked the jewel away carefully in her pocket. "But let's look on the bright side. Whoever built this expected Ivan to be on his own. They assumed he'd have to abandon the kids and crack through here at top speed. That means we should be able to finish before food or water become serious issues."

"Except that, while we do, more and more monsters are heading to the area where all the scouts are waiting."

There was something about Helen's smile that tickled Tori's brain. She'd seen one like it before, hadn't she? Kind and warm, but with a hidden laugh just out of sight, like its owner knew a joke nobody else did.

"Monsters that were made to deal with a group of scared children. Whatever threats have been marshalled, they won't even be close to scariest thing out there tonight." That smile brightened, and Tori wished she could just reach in her skull to scratch the gray matter directly.

"Those poor beasties are in no way prepared to face Ivan."

---

Chapter 82

---

The forest was moving. From this distance, that was how it looked: trees swaying in a wind that didn't exist. Thanks to the fading light of their artificial sun, none of the others had noticed yet; the herd was still a ways off.

Ivan stood at the edge of their makeshift campground, watching the waves of emerald as the forest betrayed its hidden forces. Most of the camp was gathered around the fire, trying to ignore the protests from their stomachs. There had been a few meager snacks collected, bags of peanuts and nutrition bars, that were being shared out among the kids as best they could. Little as it was, sometimes a single bite was enough to keep going. One step, one punch, it could all be the difference between death and survival.

Slipping away in that moment was possible. Legs like his covered ground at an incredible pace when pushed; getting there and back would be a minor matter. But the fight could take time, depending on how numerous and slippery the forces, long enough for him to be missed. That in itself wasn't so bad, but if anyone got the idea to mount an expedition, they'd be putting themselves and the children in serious peril.

Waiting was another option; it wouldn't be too long before the young ones got sleepy. Taking a guard shift, and then killing every threat in the area had been Ivan's original plan, and it was one that still had viability. Unfortunately, with no threats seen, Trey would go wandering off into the woods the next morning, dying almost as soon as he left the safety of their area.

Ivan had no particular care for the man, nor had he any distaste, but it didn't matter. They were at a Starscout function, Trey was one of them, and most of all, Ivan knew what Helen would say about the matter. He couldn't let the man die needlessly for no reason, but he also couldn't risk letting a horde of monsters near these children.

This was why villainy was so much easier than cape-work—fewer variables to consider. When all one had was a target, it simplified things greatly. Less to keep track of, such as fellow Starscout leaders. Ivan heard the crunch of dry grass before either of them spoke, already turning toward Trey and Yuri.

“While the kids are distracted, I thought we should have a little huddle,” Yuri suggested, tossing frequent looks over her shoulder to the circle of children. “Ivan, I raised your points to Trey, but we're both still in agreement. With no threats present, it makes more sense to send him on to help the others.”

“I understand there might be dangers further out there, I do.” Trey stepped forward, set on making this declaration himself. “But we can't do nothing while supplies run out. I have to go try.”

Perhaps it was the people that made villain-work easier, Ivan reconsidered. If these two had been a bit less responsible, they'd have happily sat around waiting for the problem to get solved. More cowardly, they wouldn't have had the guts to try to leave. Easily corruptible, and Ivan could have appealed to some lower urge for motivation. What the hell was he supposed to do with someone who was aware there was risk, but still determined to help?

With limited other options, Ivan decided it was time for some specific truth-telling. “We're past the point of ‘if’ there are dangers. Seeing as there's no wind, and I don't feel the ground shaking, there aren't many other explanations for that.” Pointing out toward the growing darkness, Ivan drew their attention to the waving trees.

“What? It's just forest.” Yuri had cupped her hands to her eyes, trying to block out as much light as possible from the fire.

“Give it time, let your eyes adjust.” While Ivan's gaze had needed no such shift, he felt reasonably sure a normal human could still catch enough details to notice the movement.

It was Trey who saw it first, the sharp intake of air almost slipping back out as an unintended hiss. “That can't be creatures.”

“Why not?” Ivan asked.

“Because if it is, then we’re all dead. That much force, shaking trees that big, it would roll over this area like a wave.” Trey’s eyes were haunted, and Ivan suddenly wondered if perhaps this wasn’t his first meta-adventure.

Here, Ivan found himself at a crossroads. He could, in theory, continue revealing small patches of truth. The easiest route would be to admit he was a meta-human without giving away any actual details. A small display of his warding power would likely convince the pair he was keeping all the threats at bay, and continuing to sneak away easily became sellable as him reinforcing the magic. Unfortunately, that still required admitting that he was more than human, and Ivan’s identity was heavily founded on being boring and unremarkable.

The other option was to explain as little as possible, keep them guessing, and hope Helen was making good time. Riskier in the long-term, but if Ivan could shuffle through this without an overt power display, the rest would fade away in their minds. Between the fear, stress, and adrenaline, no one would have solid recall of this, nor would they especially want it.

At least, that’s what Ivan was banking on.

“There is another possibility. When Beth and I were in the woods earlier, I caught sight of a strange stone carving a ways off. It may have been glowing, though at the time, I dismissed it as a trick of the light. It was too far to investigate in the moment, but now, I’m thinking it might be essential.”

“What does some rock matter in the face of that?” Trey asked, still gazing at the fidgeting forest.

“Maybe nothing, but we’re in a place with unnatural rules. I had the notion that perhaps the reason we’ve been safe here is that there’s something special about this spot. A barrier of some sort. It’s the only explanation I can think of for why there would enough monsters to do that, yet they still haven’t come for the camp.”

The gasp from Yuri confirmed she’d managed to spot the movement as well, bringing all three adults largely on board with the knowledge they were facing a threat. Lowering her hands, she took a long breath, gripping onto her own forearms. It was a trick Ivan knew well from his younger days, a way to keep one’s hands from visibly shaking. He was glad they were both smart enough to be scared—dealing with idiots would have made the task even harder.

“I’m going to go investigate that stone, see what the glow was, and if there are others. Hopefully, I’ll find some sort of clue, or at least confirm that my eyes weren’t playing tricks.”

“I’ll come, too,” Trey said, moving to Ivan’s side. He was halted, immediately, by a surprisingly strong hand on his chest.

Careful to make no expression, Ivan shook his head. “No. If I’m wrong, then I’m walking into danger. Better one dies, than two. The kids still need us.”

For a flicker of a moment, Trey faltered, the weight of the situation fully settling in. Then, he tried to step forward once more, despite Ivan’s hand. “Then I should be the one to go. Your daughter is right over there.”

“That would make sense, if you were the one who’d seen the stone’s location.” Or if any such rock existed in the first place. “Better I go swiftly than you bumble around in the dark. And while the sentiment is appreciated, Beth being here is why I’m the one who goes. I have more reason than anyone to fight my way back.”

He turned away, deciding it was better to simply leave and trust them not to follow at this point. That wave of movement was drawing steadily closer, and might take some time to get through. Ivan was ready to show these peons of the jungle what a true apex predator was.

The root snagged Tori’s foot, sending her sailing forward, face directly on a crash course with a nearby tree trunk. Hands snapped onto her shoulders, steadying her just before impact, as Helen gently helped her back to a standing position.

“That’s it, we’re stopping to rest.”

Even as she verbally protested, Tori’s body enthusiastically wanted to agree. Between the mediocre breakfast, abduction of the cluster, and heavy amount of activity, she was beginning to feel the drain. Hunger nagged at her belly, the first itch of true thirst was taking hold, and her muscles ached to take a rest. Most of her Hephaestus work happened in short spurts; it wasn’t often she needed to take a marathon approach.

“We don’t have time to stop. Everyone is counting on us.” At Tori’s words, Helen’s whole face twitched, though what that meant was entirely up to speculation.

There was a brief pause, then Helen found her voice once more. “Everyone is counting on us, which is why we have to stop. Blazing through recklessly could get us hurt, or worse, and if we fail, then what? Ivan has to actually leave the scouts, or drag them along through whatever dangers are still to come. It’s late, you’re tired, and even using your power to turn sticks into torches, it’s getting hard to see. Right now, you’re more burden than asset.”

The last bit especially stung, since Tori could hardly deny it. She was slowing them down; she was the one Helen had to catch. If they were in a fight, Tori could easily make some careless mistakes in a state like this. Yet every part of her screamed to keep going, keep working, stay ahead of everything.

In the end, Tori decided to split the difference. She needed to rest, but for how long was still open to discussion. A brief respite to recover, and they could get back at it. Nodding in agreement, Tori stepped out of Helen’s grip, motioning to an open section of woods not far away. “Want me to build us a fire?”

“We’ve got nothing to cook and no chill to ward off, but I do love the sound of a nice crackle, so I won’t fight you on it. Just sit tight while I grab the kindling.”

Moving slowly, eyes watching the ground for further obstacles, Tori wandered over to the minor clearing, which was more a break in the canopy than anything. Once settled, she extinguished what remained of her current torch, a random stick picked up when the last one burned down. Helen had no issues seeing in the dark, her excellent eyes further proving that the glasses were truly cosmetic.

Within a few minutes, Helen had returned, arms filled with various twigs and sticks. Dropping the whole load down in front of Tori, Helen wandered over to a tree and pressed her back against it, finding a semi-lean that in no way appeared comfortable.

One bit of focus, and the fire caught, rippling through the kindling in no time to create a bright, vibrant blaze. It was strangely comforting, even without actual purpose. The monsters wouldn’t care, and Helen was right about food and temperature. Still, looking into the flames relaxed Tori, earning a cry of joy from her back as tension slowly faded.

“Resting might not have been the worst idea.”

“With age comes wisdom, and that includes the importance of taking breaks.”

Tori looked the woman over for the umpteenth time that day, ever since her power had been revealed. “Seeing as you only look a few years older than me, I’m guessing part of that perfect-body package is slower aging?”

“That’s definitely one way to look at it,” Helen replied. “Without bogging down in details, let’s just say I wear my years exceptionally well.”

“You and Ivan both. I have to get me some of those anti-aging powers before it’s too late. Last thing I need is dementia or arthritis setting in.” Tori said it as a joke, yet as the words left her mouth, she wondered... was that on the table? She’d never dug into all the resources the guild offered, focusing on things directly related to her and her goals. Having more time to be young and full of energy sure wouldn’t hurt, though.

“They aren’t always as great as you might think, but it’s case by case.” Helen’s gaze drifted into the fire, her focus shifting for a brief, unmistakable moment. “Besides, as I see it, you’ve got quite a useful ability already. Form-phasing, heat control, long-range attacks, flight, and that’s just what you’ve shown so far. If I didn’t know better, I might think I was hanging out with a superhero.”

The strange notion tickled Tori to imagine, purely for its ridiculousness. “Yeah, that was obviously never on the table for me.”

Helen’s face grew unexpectedly serious. “With all due respect, that’s not true. Anyone can choose to protect the innocent, to fight for those who can’t fight for themselves. Not all on the same scale, and not all in the same way, but every sentient creature has the potential to help. To use whatever strengths they have and make the world better.”

A strange place for a conversational dig-in, though not entirely shocking. People had strong opinions on capes; often, they’d been saved by one. Even without that personal connection, every person alive had to live with the knowledge that the world only still existed because capes had successfully defended it multiple times. Granted, the threats were usually meta-human or created by said capes, so there was a chicken-and-the-egg question to be asked, but the fact remained that the Earth was still spinning.

“I guess I could have phrased that better. What I meant is that it was never really on the table because I don’t have that instinct. If I see things going sideways, my first thought is how to get out safely. After that, I think about how much of the shit I care about can come along, too.”

The fire crackled between them. Tori could feel Helen’s eyes on her, more focused than ever before. The attention was unexpectedly heavy, and oddly familiar in a way her brain just refused to place.

“Is that really how you see yourself, Tori? A selfish coward?”

“I’m a scientist first and foremost. We go by observable data. Historically speaking, that’s how I act, so it’s the conclusion I draw.”

“Sounds to me like you’ve got a lot of bias in your data collection,” Helen countered. “Because my observations have been quite different. I’ve seen a woman stick by a someone she thought would be nothing more than a burden to drag around. I’ve watched you show concern for people in danger over yourself, both in theory and in practice. Heck, let’s take it from you directly. When I said we should stop a few minutes ago, what did you come back with?”

Tori jumped back in her mind, trying to replay things. “I said there wasn’t enough time to stop.”

“Close. You said there wasn’t time, because everyone is counting on us.” This time, there was nothing subtle about the knowing grin on Helen’s face. “I’ve met and known a lot of capes through the years—more than I think you’d believe. ‘Everyone is counting on us.’ That sure sounds like something a superhero would say.”

---

Chapter 83

---

“Professor Quantum?”

The aide waved, trying to flag him down. Persistent fellow. Most gave up after being ignored the first several times. That meant the matter must be important, at least in the aide’s mind. Relenting his constant pace, Professor Quantum turned to the red-faced man waving a document.

“Yes?”

“Sorry to bother you, sir. We’ve been trying to reach out by phone, but there seems to be an issue.” The issue was that Professor Quantum had been ignoring the missives, a fact that both knew and neither would say. “Got a report that came in, flagged high priority. Some kind of orb thing appeared over a Starscout retreat and people are missing. Looks like a Cobblord piece.”

At the sound of an older enemy, Professor Quantum allowed his interest to raise its head. He snatched the document from the aide’s hand. “Seems as though there’s several layers of warped time folded around it, which means breaking through will be quite difficult—as well as unnecessary. We shouldn’t get involved.”

“Beg pardon?” The aide looked sure that they’d misheard.

Professor Quantum tossed the page back over, paying no attention to if it was caught. “Lodestar has expressed her desire for the Starscouts to be an entity separate from the AHC many times. Since she’s so set on that distinction, we wouldn’t want to step on toes and go rushing in. I saw that Quorum has already been dispatched, and we all know Lodestar keeps a special eye on that organization. I have no doubt the issue will be handily resolved.”

The aide hung in the hallway, staring with mouth agape. To him, it probably seemed as if Professor Quantum were being hard-hearted, but the truth was much simpler. As any enterprise, the Alliance of Heroic Champions had limited resources. There were only so many capes on duty or reachable at any given time, and from that pool, they had to be able to deal with any major threat to the world’s safety at often minimal notice.

Considering all that, Professor Quantum could think of few greater wastes of resources than sending reinforcements to Lodestar. Not that the aide had any way of knowing she was there, thanks to that ridiculous secret identity. Truly, the only thing Professor Quantum held in higher esteem than Lodestar’s power was Helen’s capacity to utterly waste it.

To tell the tale of Fornax was to sing a song of blood. Blood from Ivan, dripping off cuts in his knuckles, running down his chin, pooling in his ears. Blood from the others, felled one at a time by each other’s hands. Blood from his captors, taken in their moment of triumph. Blood from their allies, from every member of their cult, every soul connected to the horror of Fornax’s creation. So much blood there were days he’d wondered if his eyes had been stained, if he could ever see the world in terms other than flesh to be torn apart.

These creatures had no blood. Ivan drove a fist through the skull-shaped rock of a horned beast the size of a commuter bus, obliterating the head along with the entirety of its body, rocks spraying across the rest of the herd. No blood was a blessing. It made cleanup all the easier. More than that, though, it helped Ivan keep control. The darkness was always there, always pressing to be let out. Whispering that this is who he truly was, where he rightly belonged. Tempting him to go wilder, to enjoy himself. Reminding him of the only thing he’d ever felt made for.

Destruction.

If the trees were painted in viscera, it would have stirred those old memories harder, feeding his worst impulses. This was better, cleaner on multiple levels.

Ivan smashed through the other two giant horned beasts, then shoved past their rubble. He'd been picking off the advance troops as he approached, but staring down the slope he'd reached, Ivan realized that his trek was nearly done. What he was looking at had to be the main force, based on the way the entire forest rippled with their steps. A mishmash of shapes, some animalistic, some humanoid, some truly a design entirely unto themselves. The details didn't matter to Ivan. It was all the same. Rocks to be shattered, enemies to be broken.

This was nothing. Sliding down the dry grass, Ivan leapt into the air, coming down on the back of a horse-sized stone monster covered in spikes. It burst into pieces as his limbs made contact, a wave of power washing out from where Ivan hit the ground, cracking several nearby opponents. Ivan had never cared much for wielding widespread magic, even if his fighting was inherently suited to it. He preferred a one-on-one match, or at least to take down each enemy with his own fists. Tonight wasn't about his preferences, however. It was about keeping that camp protected.

Not even caring what his hand landed upon, Ivan grabbed the nearest stone limb and swung it around, turning the creature into a club he used to bludgeon the first movement that caught his eye. Down here, surrounded by chaos, Ivan's mind couldn't help flashing back to the pit.

Everything was a fight: food, water, a place to sleep. Their captors' favorite method had been to turn everyone loose in the pit, and then allow the winner first choice of their prize while the others were left with scraps. When Ivan showed a bit of talent early on, he inadvertently made himself a target. For years, they would come at him together, making him alone even in a place meant to drive all to isolation.

The limb crumbled in Ivan's tightened grip. He barely even registered the loss, dashing forward, deeper into the thick of combat. He grabbed a pair of gorilla-sized stone monsters by the heads, decapitating both. Multiple opponents meant nothing to him; that was the benefit of surviving all those group attacks. Without meaning to, the others had made him even stronger. By the time the numbers thinned, Ivan had already been winning fights against them collectively. One-on-one... well, there was a reason he was still alive, and they weren't.

Ivan came to a stop, realizing that, without noticing, he'd torn through a bunch of stone spheres held aloft by spider-like limbs. Whatever unexpected function they'd had was lost; their rubble revealed no secrets.

Pausing, Ivan forced himself to breathe, mentally getting out of the pit. It was dangerous to lose himself in the past, even for a moment. He couldn't give in, couldn't let that piece of him escape.

Something huge moved in Ivan's periphery. Not quite a stone dinosaur, but the sizes of these things were starting to get ridiculous. It had only been one day, why was the labyrinth pushing so hard on the second wave?

Hesitantly, Ivan felt more power flow into his fists. Releasing condensed waves of pure obliteration magic on every hit would cut down his time, but he loathed using the technique like this. The more destructive Ivan became, the deeper he verged into Fornax's territory. There was a reason that name had stuck, coined as it was for a black hole. In his early days, before he learned better control, Fornax truly was a walking disaster—collateral damage was almost a feature of his abilities. Ivan had already spent a lifetime fighting to win at all costs; paired with the sudden increase in raw strength, he'd barely been able to throw a jab without creating a corpse.

This power was meant to destroy. Always had been, since before it was Ivan's to wield. He'd met its source, overcome that endless appetite to unmake the world with his own will for survival. But putting his burden on a leash didn't change its nature. As Ivan stepped forward, moving toward his giant target, a stone quadruped with long, lashing limbs bounded toward him. A single blow not only shattered his opponent, it sent the shards flying like shrapnel, tearing chunks off the other nearby enemies. Ivan repeated the trick on the next one he could reach, then another, all while moving toward the big beast. It had been a while since he used this technique—a few calibration shots always helped.

The head of this enemy was massive—easily the size of the horned beasts he'd slain not too far back. As for the rest of it, Ivan could see a long stone neck leading to a body he imagined would be covered in thick armor, spines, maybe even some surprise defenses meant to shake off anyone who climbed on board. With his higher vantage point, Ivan opted not to mess with the head. Probably a fake target. The body would be where the real vulnerabilities lay. Cobblord was no rank amateur; he knew how to build a decent monster.

Decent by most people's standards, anyway. To Ivan, these were all the same. The same as those frail cultists whose bones were so easily torn out. The same as so many big-talking opponents who'd raised his hopes only to break after a single blow. The same as the countless challengers who paled in horror upon realizing the fight they'd picked. The same as every piece of fodder these unstoppable fists had effortlessly crushed... until the shining one who was different. Until the punch that was stopped, and everything else that unexpected moment had started.

"Cobblord, I don't know if you can hear me, or if you're monitoring any of this. But just in case, I wanted to pass along a message: you should have let them kill you." Ivan leapt over the head of the monster, toward the main body. All around it, he could see smaller stone forms, the army circling its strongest asset. How convenient of them all to group together for him.

Landing on its back, Ivan reared back, ready to throw a full-strength punch before thinking better of it. That might crack the entire mechanism of the orb, tripping Cobblord's fiercest defenses, if not a full collapse of their prison. Holding back, Ivan thrust his arm into the nearest patch of stone he saw. The initial hit left a crater, but it was the aftereffect that truly got the show started. Just like the earlier monsters, charged flecks of stone went flying off as shrapnel. Except, thanks to the opponent's greater size, these shards were fist-sized at their smallest, tearing through his massive enemy's inner workings as much as through the peons on the ground.

"Whoever it was, whatever threats they made to get you on board, you should have let them kill you. Because I don't give a shit how much you knew about their plans for this. I'm going to find you. And when I do, I'll show you the folly of your ways. You should have let them kill you, Cobblord. It would have been an easier death than the one I'll bring."

Ivan truly had no idea if Cobblord could watch the happenings of his creations, or if the threat had merely been for his unthinking audience. It was mostly habit, either way. Terrifying an opponent was often an easier way to win than bothering to make a fist. Besides, when it came to both Ivan and Fornax, the words were never really the message.

Explosions of energy tore through the giant monster as Ivan struck again, this time leaving his hand wedged inside. Rocks burst forth, shooting into the nearby hordes and blowing them into rubble. As he stood there atop his giant prey, watching the sea of enemies fall against his power, Ivan tried very, very hard to remember that this was purely a defensive necessity. Otherwise, an especially mad part of him would take too much joy in the spectacle.

Destruction spread like a spiderweb as Ivan rained down more blows, triggering blast after blast. A maelstrom of violence, a parade of obliteration. Like the black hole his other name was stolen from, Ivan wiped out his enemies, the forest, and everything in the surrounding areas. There was no distinction between them; they were all simply objects to be broken.

He wouldn't let one of these things slip past, couldn't risk the life of single scout. Ivan would never be like Lodestar—his powers didn't function the same way. If he had to fight with others around, it put them in danger. Acting before the threat arrived, preemptive annihilation, that was the only real tactic that worked for him. Ivan would be just as meticulous, thorough, and patient as he was at the office. One by one, until the last movement halted, he would crush this army.

So much of his life was about hiding who he was and what he could really do. For tonight, a brief and beautiful moment, Ivan felt united. His better self was determined to protect those kids, whereas his darker impulses were gleeful at the chance to rampage. Everything in him agreed that the only course of action was to wipe these bastards out.

Raising a fist overhead, Ivan felt a mad grin try to wiggle its way onto his face, an impulse he immediately squashed down. This was not Fornax running wild: this was Ivan Gerhardt sending a very clear, explosive message about what happened to anyone who threatened his family.

He hoped Cobblord was watching somewhere. Ivan wanted him afraid, wanted him cowering. The reputation of Fornax was one of the few things that kept his family safe. A little wanton decimation here and there was a nice way to remind people why they should be so afraid. Of course, in all likelihood, Cobblord probably wasn't watching. There was so much to keep track of, even if he had surveillance. That was fine, too, though.

When it was all over, Ivan would be sure to hunt him down and explain the error of his ways in person. For as long as Cobblord could endure.

---

Chapter 84

---

In spite of her steadily weakening state—a quite natural reaction to extended effort with no nourishment or water—Tori insisted they press on, taking rest only when she had to in the form of a few catnaps, grabbed under the starlight and Helen’s watchful eye. At least Tori was accustomed to keeping late hours; it meant they didn’t have to worry about drowsiness becoming a factor just yet.

Helen was taking no chances, though. Raising a child through toddlerhood had taught her the power of persistent gab, especially letting loose questions and refusing to be ignored. She wasn’t quite as bad as Penelope in her prime, but Helen could force a conversation to stay afloat when needed, especially if it meant keeping someone mentally active. Having Tori out this far into the labyrinth was dangerous enough. If she started making poor judgment calls, it could lead to injury or worse. That wasn’t going to happen. Helen would make sure it didn’t. This was simply the easiest method of doing so, for the time being.

“—and then he lets his friend go, watching him paddle off into the fifty-year storm, knowing he probably won’t come back. Throws his badge into the waves as he fades from sight. Seriously, you have to look this one up when we get out of here. True classic. It got me into surfing for a solid five-year stint.”

“I’ll add it to the list,” Tori replied, tone and words both a bit stiff. Helen had been going hard on Multerion movies for the last hour, veering between ones Tori knew about and far more varied fare. While the topic had started out promising, based on that reaction, it was probably time to switch things up. The chatter wasn't as effective unless it flowed in both directions.

Well... if she wanted to make sure Tori's brain was active and aware, there was a topic she could skirt around that was sure to raise the woman's hackles. It felt a tad like cheating, using her Lodestar knowledge as Helen, but with careful wording, she saw a way forward.

"Let me know how you like it. I've nagged my coworkers enough that I doubt they'll ever give it a real shot. Oh, hey, speaking of coworkers, did you happen to know a man named Donald Moss? The superhero called Cyber Geek?" Conversational subtlety was not a skill Helen particularly cared about utilizing, unless it was absolutely necessary. Sometimes boldness was more effective, anyway.

Like a jolt, Tori's entire body straightened. She really needed to work on that. Had Helen not already known the full story, it would have been a deeply suspicious reaction. Slowly, Tori turned, a forced calm on her face that probably would have been more convincing if she'd had a touch more energy to spare toward acting. "What brought that to mind?"

"Coworkers, sort of," Helen explained. "I know Ivan used to manage him, prior to the career change, so I thought you two might have been acquainted. Had to ask—I mean, how many people know an actual superhero?"

"At this point, I know too many." Tori seemed surprised by her own slip of the tongue, hastily recovering as best she could. "After my kidnapping, I got a protective detail put around me, met a few of the capes doing the work. But yeah, I know Donald, too. He was a friend before his change, and we tried to keep that alive afterward."

"Tried?" That was news to Helen, and Cyber Geek wasn't the stoic sort. If a friendship had broken, he'd likely have worn some visible reaction around the base.

Shoving her way through a dense patch of undergrowth, Tori spared a few moments to form a rough shrug. "Not like we had a big cursing fight and vowed to stop being buds... lately I've been realizing more and more that our lives are heading in different directions. Cyber Geek is going to be a big name one day, and I'll still cheer for him from the sidelines. Just not sure how much longer our worlds will overlap."

To Helen, the hardest feat in the universe was to see someone hurting, be able to help, and simply not. Fornax's life was built upon blood, but Lodestar's foundation was one of loss. Too many times, she'd been unable to help. Too many failures, funerals, tears, and screams. It was what made her the Lodestar she was, and even without her powers in play, that instinct didn't fade. She knew what Tori was saying, really saying. A villain and a superhero couldn't be friends. It was a ludicrous notion—to someone in Tori's position.

"If you'll forgive an intrusion from someone who doesn't know you all that well yet, don't be so quick to give up. Life takes strange turns for everyone, sometimes doubling back in directions you'd never imagine. Whether you have overlap or not is a passing occurrence. A good friend, one you trust, who trusts you, and who you want in your life? That's not something to throw away lightly. Even if the circumstances around you change, so long as you value one another, it is possible for a bond to endure."

"Okay, seriously, how old are you?" Tori suddenly demanded. "That sounded like someone with a lot more experience than your face shows, even considering the slow aging."

"Old enough to spot a change of topic when I see one." Helen ducked under a branch, not actually bothered by the question. Tori was more engaged than she'd been during the movie talk, which meant she was also more alert. That was the victory Helen had been after in the first place. "Sorry, I don't think I'm especially vain, but I'm still not giving out my age. A gal's allowed a few secrets."

Together, the pair broke through a tree line, only to spot a slight downward slope leading to more forest. There was a path they were following, choppy and thin as it could be at times. Where it was leading, and what would be waiting for them along the way, were mysteries yet to be discovered.

As artificial dawn rose overhead, light returned, making navigation easier, if not faster. Were Ivan running through this place, he'd have blown past them. Then again, he'd also have been forced to leave the kids. Slow, steady, and safe won the day for Helen over brash and reckless. She'd had too many chances to learn better.

"It's not like I want to kick friends out of my life. I've never... I haven't had the chance for many, the way my life has broken. Losing one, even by my own hand, sucks. But it's probably best, in the long run."

Safer, was what Tori really meant. Safer for Hephaestus, less chances to expose a secret. Safer for Cyber Geek, should her secret ever come out and their friendship turn into an anchor around his heels. Safer for Donald and Tori, because the stronger a friendship grew, the more it hurt when the long-buried truths finally came out.

Helen didn't just know this story, she was exhausted of it.

"Who you love, trust, and let into your life is ultimately something only you can decide. But if you reject anyone who might cause things to get complicated or gums up whatever future roadmap you had in mind, it's going to be a very lonely life to live. That's a steep slope, deciding things are broken before they even have a chance to be tested."

"It's better to leave yourself vulnerable?" Tori was starting to get worked up, which was good for her energy levels, though not so great for keeping her focused. "You might have meta-human aging, but you've got no idea the kind of shit I've seen. I spent years hunkered in holes and hiding in shadows. I've seen plenty of what happens to those so free with their trust. Usually, it ends with them bleeding and screaming, if they're lucky enough to still be alive."

Helen's heart broke as she looked at the fury and pain in Tori's eyes. Though the young villain could have no way of knowing it, Helen had indeed witnessed those sights. When she was new, not yet fully using her abilities, it had been more frequent, but even now, there were times she was too late. Lodestar, for all her power, was still a single person. Even at her fastest, she couldn't be everywhere. She couldn't stop every crime, save every innocent—no matter how much the failures weighed upon her.

"Being vulnerable isn't easy," Helen agreed. "It's why choosing who you trust is such a vital part of the process. But no matter how careful you are, mistakes will happen. Hurts, slights, maybe even betrayals. Nobody's perfect, as a person or a friend. Knowing when to forgive, and how, is a vital part of making those relationships work. Because people can surprise you in good ways, too. You never really know what someone is capable of, who they are, all the way through. People can amaze and astound when given the chance."

"I'm sure that's good advice in a general sense, but this is more complicated than hearing Ivan bust a tune. For my situation, this is what's best for all involved. I think it's the way it has to be."

Through no fault of Tori's, those final words made Helen's jaw clench. She'd heard that phrase many a time in the early days, before she got comfortable in her role as a leader. "I don't believe anything has to be a certain way. This is our world, built by the hands and desires of those who came before us. Now, it's our turn. Whatever you see out there that you don't like: change it. Who creates society if not the people in it? Who shapes this world if not its residents? This is your life, Tori. Your slice of existence. Who do you think has more control over it than you?"

"It's not like I—" Tori was cut off by the long stone spike that shot up from the ground, narrowly missing her left foot. It rose ten feet into the air before stopping completely, reorienting, and slicing down toward Tori yet again. She dodged easily. With so much time to prepare, it was an easy move to make. The stone carved through the dirt, vanishing into the ground. Where it had burrowed, only a small mound remained.

Together, the pair looked ahead at the long stretch of grass and the countless small dirt mounds they were only now paying attention to. If each one represented a similar trap, they might be able to walk through without stepping directly on one. However, Helen hadn't noticed a mound when Tori triggered the first. It was possible those merely represented entry points. The stone spikes were obviously able to navigate this place's underground.

Meaning that any step could trigger an attack.

Eyeing the tree branches, Helen flexed her fingers. It had been a while since she needed to go hopping around. She'd never even heard the term parkour back when Helen was leaping building gaps and free-climbing old brick exteriors. Luckily, being Lodestar meant never getting rusty. With a running start, Helen hopped up, kicking off the nearest trunk, grabbing onto a thick branch before pulling to a squat. She could already see her next two jumps. After that, things would have to get more fluid and improvisational.

"Tori, you okay to fly?"

"Little worn out, but I can manage." As proof, Tori was already halfway into fire form, having read the situation for herself. Helen couldn't help noticing that the change was taking longer this time. Exhaustion was on Tori's heels. Sooner or later, it would catch her.

But not yet. Tori's hands formed fists before vanishing into pure flames, her whole body blazing as she lifted into the sky, careful to go high enough to avoid the treetops. Slow and steady was the way to go. They'd get through this one hurdle at a time.

Unfortunately, just as Helen watched Tori crest over the trees, the blast came. It was pure wind, from the looks of things. That was a new attack, which meant they were probably near the site of the next trial. It had been waiting in the air, so this whole area was meant to be a trap, no matter the route they picked. Given how Ivan favored his leaping techniques, preparing for aerial entry was smart, but it also meant the force was strong enough to theoretically knock an airborne Fornax off-balance. Since Tori's mass was lightened for flight, and she hadn't been prepared to counterblast, the attack shot her forward, well past their current section of forest and toward unknown threats.

Plans of slow and safe movement fell away as Helen accepted what she'd just seen. While she knew Tori to be capable, the younger woman was also running on fumes in a trap made with Fornax in mind. Whatever plans this place had for her were about to be dashed, however. Even if Ivan hadn't asked Helen to watch over her, this wouldn't stand. Tori wasn't here as Hephaestus. She'd come as a normal civilian helping to plan a weekend. Even if that hadn't been enough, she was part of Helen's cluster, and Lodestar's organization.

An innocent civilian was in peril, and Helen was close enough to see it. There was only one way that scenario could end. This was how she chose to shape the world—into a place where every cry for help carried with it the genuine hope and knowledge that somewhere out there, at least one person cared. For now, she ran, dropping off her perch and dodging the spikes as they leapt from ground. Hopefully, Helen could make it in time.

But if she couldn't, then Lodestar would.

---

Chapter 85

---

It was some kind of vortex, near as Tori could figure. More than just wind, there were small objects being tossed about with her—small bladed ones, from the looks she could snag. Against a normal flying or jumping opponent caught in the wind, these would be a flurry of wounds slicing into one's skin, a constant, unstoppable assault from all angles. Pitted against an intangible target, they were a minor distraction to steal her attention and complicate the process of descent.

The blast had shot her across the forest, above some massive stone circle that seemed to be generating the wind and the blades. That didn't particularly explain how it was shooting wind toward itself. Her hunch was hidden remote stations that were used to create the effect—but being bounced around the sky made it tough to discern precise locations. She had to get low, there was no other choice, but she couldn't manage a clean shot out of the vortex. As carefully as possible, Tori began to solidify parts of herself in bursts, temporarily increasing her weight. The wind could blow all it wanted, gravity always pulled in one direction.

Unfortunately, turning solid even in pieces left her vulnerable. A rogue blade caught her on a solidified shin, while another tore a piece from her shoulder. Nevertheless, Tori was making progress, slowly falling out of the wind's grasp toward the waiting ground below. As she fell, she took a better look at the surroundings.

The forest ended a short way back, leaving only plains of fake grass leading up to the stone circle. Now that she was closer, Tori could see that it was actually several rings laid together, like someone had chopped a section out of a ridiculously oversized rock-redwood. The wind and blades seemed to be drifting up from the cracks between sections—hopefully, this whole thing was just one giant wind generator. Except this place was made with Fornax in mind, and while he did have the ability to fight and travel through the air, this sort of trap would be little more than an annoyance. Then again, wasn't that the point of this entire labyrinth? Even the voice they'd heard hadn't expected it to actually stop him—the whole thing was about sending a message.

Suddenly, the world turned more peaceful as Tori fell out of the wind's grasp. She was below the swirling mass of air, only a few feet from the ground, and the moment was almost serene. Had she been better rested and fed, Tori's sharp mind might have realized how precious such a place was and paused there momentarily before risking any additional movement. Sadly, the toll of her efforts was making itself known, and Tori dropped heavily to the ground, shifting back to human form as she took a dearly needed rest.

No sooner had her feet touched the ground than the noise started, of course. The grinding of stone was like a loud buzzer blaring at the sound of her mistake. In the air, she'd been caught up by happenstance. Landing had obviously tripped some sort of sensor, and having mass when she came down probably didn't help. Part of Tori was glad that Helen had been left further back, even as she wished there was someone else around the help. Limited as that powerset was in terms of scale, Helen had proven adept with it. Still, this would be easier without having to worry about a semi-normal person to keep track of.

That was Tori's thought until she saw the first huge stone leg rise from a rising section of the outermost ring. Ten feet long, with a square, unbalanced body following, along with four more multi-jointed legs. Worse, there wasn't a scrap of greenery she could see on it, meaning that there would be little to burn. Way worse were the dozen other legs she saw exiting from around the ring. The last test had been designed to pit Fornax against one massive opponent. This time, it seemed one had to survive being overrun by what would be small fries to someone on his scale. With her suit, Tori felt she could have made a serious go of surviving this. Given her current condition, even escape would take some lucky breaks.

Rustling from behind her had Tori whipping around, fireballs already formed in her hand; however, there was no stealth force approaching from the rear. Instead, she found the dashing form of Helen, who'd sprinted out from the tree line and was racing over. Tori's heart fell to her stomach. This was too dangerous for the kind-hearted cluster leader. Even if Ivan hadn't screamed his request across the sky, she liked Helen. Tori didn't want to see her hurt, or worse, which was looking increasingly likely as more and more crawling cubes came up out of the ground. And that was only the first ring—there were still eight more to go.

"What are you doing?" Tori demanded as soon as Helen made it into earshot range. "Get the fuck out of here! Can you not see those things pouring out?"

The words appeared to catch Helen momentarily off guard, after which she reacted quite oddly. A warm smile was not what one expected in this kind of situation. "Tori, are you trying to put yourself between me and the danger?"

"I'm trying to do what Ivan asked and keep you safe," Tori snapped, eyes darting over to the advancing stone troops. "Go around this area. I'll handle it, but I need time. While I deal with these punks, you sneak ahead and try to find whatever mechanism will end all this. I might not even have to scrap all of them."

It was bullshit, pure and simple. These things would overrun Tori in no time, and with the skies turned chaotic, she couldn't snipe from the air, whatever good that would have done. At best, her fire form would protect her from their attacks, and she could keep them distracted enough for Helen to get away. The woman was shockingly capable. Maybe she actually would activate the exit before Tori's stamina ran out. It was the best chance for everyone, including Ivan and Beth. Tori would figure out a way to survive somehow—it's what she did. That's what she told herself, anyway.

"You want to go charging into an army you've got no way to damage, just because of what Ivan said?" Helen was somehow unaffected by the advancing forces, the entirety of her focus still on Tori.

"Look, lady, this really isn't the time for a deep-dive into my shit. It's been a long, hard, dangerous life. Ivan is the first person in very long while to genuinely give a fuck about me. He's helped me in ways I don't know how to repay. I'm not letting his friend die while I've still got fight left in these bones." Summoning flames in each hand, Tori turned back to the cubes, drawing steadily closer. Not long left until they'd arrive. "So get out of here and let me get to work." It was an excellent performance, marred only by a minor wobble in her voice at the very end. Given what she was staring down, Tori felt it forgivable that a sliver of fear had made itself known.

“Tori... I’m sorry.” Helen stepped to her side, entirely ignoring the directive to run. Something had changed, though. The light joy was gone. In its place was not terror at the nearing onslaught, but rather remorse. “I was selfish. It’s been a long time since I could talk with someone like this, a person who knows our world but not my place in it. I never meant for you to feel this kind of fear.”

Based on the speed of the advancing cubes on legs, they had less than a minute left, and that was being generous. As if that weren’t enough, there were more legs rising from the second stone ring, these even larger than the first design. “Helen, I don’t know what the hell you’re talking about, but if you’ve got a plan, now would be a great time to let me in on it.”

“Same plan as always, I suppose. Save the day.” Facing away from Tori, Helen carefully took off her glasses, folding the legs over one another. A ripple ran across her whole body, like an illusion shifting, except the changes Tori could see were minor, some slight shifts in weight and hair, with perhaps a small alteration in height. Still looking away, Helen continued to speak. “Time for your Starscout trivia challenge, Tori. Where does Lodestar’s name come from?”

The whole moment was deeply surreal, to the point where Tori was starting to wonder if she’d succumbed to fatigue and passed out without noticing. Dream or reality, her best bet was to play along. Perhaps it would do something about that damned mental itch Helen provoked, the one that was only growing stronger by the second.

“Corvix had just defeated Professor Quantum on national television. A bunch of other capes tried to swarm him, and he started cutting a swath like they were regular humans. Then, in a flash, she was there, putting herself in the path of his blows. He hit her with everything he had and couldn’t make so much as a dent. Before she dropped him in a single punch, and Quorum delivered the surprise finish, he asked her how she could be so strong, and Lodestar responded: ‘The darker the night, the brighter the stars.’”

“That’s the one.” Helen looked back, and Tori suddenly realized the shift was more dramatic than she’d noted from the back—it seemed as if several years had dropped away. “Do me a favor, hold these.” She extended the glasses, wiggling them slightly, until Tori took them in her grasp. “I’ll let you in on two secrets, Tori. The first is that I kind of hated that saying for a long time. It was told to me a lot during a particularly dark time, and didn't quite deliver the hope it was meant to. All of which is to say that the line wasn't planned. It's just what popped out in the moment."

"In the moment?" Tori could almost see the line connecting these obvious, blazing dots, yet her brain refused to connect them, even when it felt like it was right there.

"That would be the other secret." Helen began to step forward, changing before Tori's eyes. "I hope you'll forgive minor theatrics. It's not often I get to do these reveals." Light poured out from Helen: blazing, brilliant, and instantly familiar. As her hair and eyes changed hue, Tori was truly struck by how little else shifted. Without the costume, the resemblance was even more uncanny. It was a strange combination of being thunderstruck with shock and also overwhelmed by a feeling she could only describe as "of course." It was like her brain breathed a sigh of relief at finally being able to see what, in hindsight, seemed crazy obvious from the start, followed shortly by the near mind-breaking implication of what this all meant.

Tori had just spent the better part of the day palling around with the strongest superhero on the fucking planet, and that was barely the tip of the iceberg. Thinking about the way Helen and Ivan were around each other, as compared to their other identities, indicated that their story went way deeper than she'd been led to believe. Her brain buzzed with fear about what secrets she might have accidentally let slip, but none could find solid purchase. Part of that was due to overall exhaustion, though it also helped to have far more immediate concerns to focus on. The first wave of cube enemies was drawing close.

Too bad for them, it wasn't Helen and Tori who were waiting to meet them. Instead, the first stone leg came down next to Lodestar, who remained unmoved as it settled down hard into the dirt. She stared the thing up and down, noting the others close on its heels.

"On the off chance there's any sentience in there, now would be the time to give up. All evidence points to you being automated, so if there's more, I'd really like to know before this gets rough."

In response, the cube whipped one of its legs around, slamming it down onto Lodestar's head. At the same time, several panels on its smooth surface opened up, various devices sliding out. What they were or did would remain unknown, however, as Lodestar returned the blow with one of her own. A single punch obliterated her opponent, sending chunks of it screaming into the air, up and through even the vortex of wind.

“Cobblord should be glad I’m the one here, instead of Fornax,” Lodestar noted. “He’d be insulted at the idea that these things are a challenge.”

“You’re not?” Tori asked, really unsure of where the hell else to go with conversation at this point.

“I’m a superhero, which means a whole lot more responsibility in the way I use my abilities.” With a motion of her hand, Lodestar formed and flung a ball of energy that detonated on impact, utterly decimating the nearest six cubes that were advancing from Tori’s direction. “For me, this is a chance to let loose with no fear about anyone getting hurt. No civilians nearby to protect, no need to worry about injuring my opponent. All I have to do is fight, and I tend to fare pretty darn well on that front.”

Truly, that might have been the greatest understatement Tori had ever heard. There wasn’t time to comment on it, as Lodestar was already moving forward, heading for the ring where multi-segmented stone lizard-like creatures were rising up. “Stay there and rest. I won’t let anything get close. After all, my dear friend Ivan asked me to keep you safe.”

Watching Lodestar race off toward the waves of enemies rising off the ground, turning into a shining missile of destruction, Tori finally hit her limit. She half-collapsed to the ground, letting her body rest as her mind went wild, reconciling this new information with everything she already knew. It was a noble effort, but one that quickly gave way to enjoying the spectacle of Lodestar annihilating the stone army.

Sometimes, it was nice to just sit back and watch the destruction unfold.

---

Chapter 86

---

It was early for visitors, which narrowed down the number of people potentially knocking on their door. Beverly was the only one up, with Tori at her scout thing and Chloe sleeping in. Everyone in her family tended to be early risers—whether it was genetic or ingrained barely mattered anymore. Whatever the cause, she beat the dawn on many a morning. Today’s sunrise had come and gone, at least, so odds were this wasn’t some bold robber about to make a hell of a bad choice.

Peering through the peephole—one could never be too careful—she was surprised to see Austin standing in the hallway. Given the early hour and his predilection for manners, she’d assumed if any of the New Science Sentries were going to pull such a move, it would be Ike. She opened the door quickly; Austin wouldn’t be here if he didn’t have good reason. Only after it was fully ajar did it occur to Beverly that perhaps she was the reason. If he’d learned Bahamut’s true identity, this could be the start of a very uncomfortable conversation.

Thankfully, Austin seemed his normal self, which was to say that he grew flustered at the appearance of Beverly. It was almost cute, how helpless he was at hiding even his most basic of feelings. At first, she’d taken the whole thing for an act, that he was putting on the “aw shucks” vibe to better sell his cape-image, especially considering whose name he was borrowing. Still, for all her hatred toward Professor Quantum, Beverly refused to be the same kind of bastard he was. She denied herself the easy out of judging someone for the circumstance of their birth rather than the quality of their character, and over time had realized that whatever else

Austin had going on, he wasn't putting on an act. Unfortunately, that left her with the obvious dilemma of his not-so-subtle crush. She'd thought getting to know one another would move him past it, or at least lower the awkwardness, but so far, he was proving oddly static in that regard.

After a few moments, Austin had regained his composure, or as much as he ever managed when talking directly to Beverly. "Good morning. Sorry for the early hour. I wasn't sure if calling or gently knocking would wake fewer people."

"A text would also have been fine." Her annoyance was fading to curiosity as Beverly studied Austin further. Shifting body language, eyes darting up and down the hall, there was definitely something off. He had a nervous energy different from the usual infatuation.

"Wish I could, but this was a little too important," Austin replied. "Please let Tori know her security is going to be reduced tonight. I just got a message. There's a big meeting at the AHC. Not sure what's going down, but they're calling in almost everyone. It won't just be us who are gone. There probably won't even be capes nearby if something happens. This is all private, of course. We're not advertising a few hours of weakened forces. Still, I didn't feel right leaving Tori unguarded without her knowing."

Two extremely different parts of Beverly lit up simultaneously. On one side, she was consumed by duty, flooded with worry of what might happen to her friend. However, there was more to Beverly than there had once been. Deep within her, the Bahamut piece of her mind couldn't help whispering that this was also opportunity. If she knew of a time when the capes would be compromised, it meant more dangerous guild jobs could be undertaken. Were Tori there at her side, the Bahamut voice might have been stronger, but concern for her friend ultimately triumphed over her budding villainy.

"Appreciate the heads up. I'll let her know as soon as she gets back from her Starscout thing."

"Any word on how that's going?" Austin was still checking the hallway. Whatever this meeting was about, it clearly had his nerves agitated.

"Didn't expect any. Cell reception outside of civilization isn't exactly renowned for reliability," Beverly explained. "Besides, I can wait until tonight to hear about the fun pinecones they spotted. Only so much interesting stuff can happen on a camping trip."

It was no surprise that Lodestar made short work of her opponents. That was, to Tori's estimation, the only part of this hour that wasn't some form of mind-liquefying shock. Helen was Lodestar. Helen, Ivan's good friend. Ivan, who was really Fornax, which Helen definitely knew. That whole concept was weird enough; when she factored in the times they seemed to be almost flirting... it was a lot.

Before she'd even realized it, the battle was done. Lodestar annihilated one final stone contraption—twenty feet tall with components of all the other types that had come from the rings—by dropping down from above and shattering it to rubble, before flying swiftly back toward Tori. Fast as she'd been, Lodestar never dipped into super-speed, even now avoiding tripping any of the labyrinth's safeguards.

Floating down to the grass, the glow didn't fade like Tori had expected. Lodestar wasn't hiding anymore. She was unashamedly herself. "From experience, I'm guessing that revelation knocked you somewhat sideways. Would you like to ask questions, or should I start by running down the greatest hits?"

While Tori certainly had questions to pose, she knew better than to pass up freely volunteered information. Asking on her own, she might inadvertently skip something vital. "How about you go first while I compose myself?"

"You mean think of follow-ups," Lodestar pointed out. "Told you, not my first time doing this. I don't mind, there's just no need to bother pretending."

To that, Tori merely nodded. She wasn't sure she trusted her own tongue at this particular moment.

Lodestar sat down, albeit in a peculiar way. She lifted each leg into the air, assuming a cross-legged position, before floating her whole body toward the ground. "The big one to get out of the way is no, you're not stupid, crazy, or wildly imperceptive. Now that you know the secret, it probably seems obvious in hindsight. I've never been great at hiding my identity. I try, but tend to slip up on details. To put it simply: you couldn't see the truth because I hadn't revealed it to you yet."

Now that she'd settled, Lodestar reclined, laying her back against empty air like she was resting in a lounge. "Took a long time to figure that out, but time has proved it true. Something about my power protects my secret. With a few very powerful exceptions, it's impossible to put the pieces together unless I do it for you. Brains refuse to form the connection. Even if someone had been watching us remotely just now, it wouldn't work. They have to be physically present when I knowingly reveal myself, hence why I avoid public transformations. And before you waste a question, no, I don't have any idea how that works. Some of my abilities are harder to understand than others, and I'm still not sure I've found them all."

To Lodestar's credit, her selection of what to address first had been a fine one. Knowing the reason why her brain had been so ceaselessly bothered by Helen put a great deal of things into perspective, and also freed Tori from questioning her own deductive skills. "What's the next big question you normally knock out?"

"Actually, that one we kind of covered," Lodestar said. "The next question is usually if I'm the real Lodestar, the original, and if so, how do I look so young, but you already know that part. All that stuff I told you about my body was true, by the way. I just didn't mention what else I could do."

Behind them, shattered stone minions crumpled further, chunks of rock falling to join their brethren sprayed across the battlefield. An entire army, reduced to garbage in mere minutes. Lodestar paid it no mind, gently tapping the underside of her chin. "After that, things tend to splinter off. Different people have different concerns and reactions. Although, in these sorts of situations, they will eventually get around to asking one more identical question: why me? Why were they chosen to carry this secret?"

"You can skip that. I know a circumstantial emergency when I see one."

"Is that what you think? Tori, I had the entire run over here to change if I wanted to. Even after arriving, I could have slipped behind a tree, or waited until your back was turned. I made a choice to tell you, the same way I have with everyone I choose to share this secret with."

She wasn't entirely sure how to respond to that. Dealing with someone who wielded honesty and forthrightness so expertly compromised many of her usual social tactics. There was nothing to pry at, no secrets or shadows to take conversational refuge in. With few other options, she decided the time for being passive had drawn to a close. If Lodestar was offering answers, then Tori would take them.

"Okay, I'll bite. Why tell me?"

“Because you were afraid, even though I knew you had no reason to be. Because I’m a good judge of character, and have had plenty of time to get to know yours. Because Ivan trusts you, and that puts you in very exclusive company. There aren’t many of us.” Lodestar paused, visibly taking her time to think. “And because I wanted to. I like you, and I don’t enjoy hiding things from people I like. I wouldn’t recommend sharing it around, though.”

“Obviously. No one will even believe me if you’re not the one to show them, right?”

Lodestar seemed momentarily taken aback, though she recovered quickly. “Well, yes, that too. But mostly because of Ivan. Even despite of my power’s protections, he can be a bit overly concerned. There was a near miss some years back—story for another day—however, when the dust settled, he made it a point to crush anyone trying to uncover Lodestar’s identity.”

The story brought Tori up short, reminding her of the most insane aspect to all of this. Somehow, she had a feeling this particular tidbit wouldn’t be covered going through Lodestar’s frequently asked questions. “Yeah, on that subject, about Ivan. I mean... what the fuck?”

“Can you be a little more specific?”

“I honestly feel like ‘what the fuck’ summed things up pretty well.” Tori took only a moment to consider her phrasing; at this point, interest and curiosity were fast pushing diplomacy to the side. “You’re Lodestar. He is... was Fornax. The respect, I get. You were the biggest dogs on the block for a long time, the only ones who could really fight one another. But this is... it’s not just some person you used to trade blows with. You two are friends. There’s history and banter—hell, he even sang to your kid.”

A new thought entered Tori’s head, and as it did, her eyes felt like they might break their very sockets with the speed in which they expanded. “Wait a minute... your kid...”

“Let me go ahead and pause this train before it leaves the station. Ivan and I have never even come close to... you know... and therefore certainly couldn’t have offspring. Her father died before she was born, and if it’s okay, I’d like to leave it there. That’s more of a Helen question, and not an easy subject.”

It was odd, seeing sadness on the face of Lodestar, even for only a moment. “Sorry, didn’t mean to step on old wounds. Just seemed to make the most sense when I put it all together. The idea of Lodestar letting Fornax babysit is still a bit wonky.”

“As it should be,” Lodestar said. “Because that would never happen. Helen leaning on Ivan, however, happens probably more frequently than it should. In the sense of over-imposing, I mean.” Her gaze turned softer, perhaps nearly embarrassed. “As for your ‘what the eff’ question, I guess I would describe things with Ivan as breaking a candy bar in half to pretend it has fewer calories. Perhaps not always the healthiest choice, though it does make life sweeter. I don’t have a lot of constants in this world. Ivan is a rare exception, though sometimes I worry I overburden him too much when things get choppy.”

Tori couldn’t argue much there. Ivan was nothing if not steady and reliable. Pseudonym and Fornax might be different stories, but the middle manager named Ivan Gerhardt was solid and sturdy enough to build bridges off of. “Why does he do all this...” Tori realized she knew the answer, even as she was forming the question. “Because he feels like he owes you.”

Another short flash of surprise from Lodestar, though this was less marked than before. “That’s a quick mind you’ve got there. Ivan credits me with his freedom more than he should, and given what’s associated with that freedom, he values it beyond measure. But it would be disingenuous to say that’s the root of it all. Truth be told, we even got along well in his Fornax days, when circumstance allowed for civil conversation.”

“What possible circumstances could allow for that?” Tori demanded.

“The first time was when we were chosen to represent Earth in a galactic tournament to stop it from being attacked.” Given the blasé response, Lodestar had definitely seen some form of this question coming.

Tori folded her arms. “You’re fucking with me.”

“What a thing to say. Lodestar doesn’t really lie, and she certainly doesn’t curse. Ask Ivan about it sometime. The whole thing ended up being an evil scheme we had to deal with, but there was a solid bit where Lodestar and Fornax were on the same team.” Rising from the grass, which she’d never really even touched, Lodestar stretched out her legs. “That said, since it seems like we’ve moved past the mental-panic phase of the reveal, how about we fly and talk? Since we didn’t get another monologue here and I found another gem when smashing the final boss, it seems this place has given up most of the clues it’s going to. Let’s wrap this up and get everyone home safely.”

Lodestar extended her hand, which Tori grasped. It was unnerving, the ease with which Lodestar lifted Tori up from the dirt. It was as if she had no more substance than a politician's morals; with a single motion, this slender woman could crush Tori to goop. Instead, Lodestar used that strength to pull her close and cradle her gently, taking care to ensure she would be safe as they rose higher into the air. Tori could see more of the fake world stretching out below them, and just before the wind began to howl in her ears, she made out a few half-whispered words from Lodestar.

“Much as I’m a proponent of walking softly, I think the time has come for the big stick.”

---

Chapter 87

---

With dawn had come the inevitable truth that they were out of food. The last of the scrounged-up rations were doled out among the kids, water making the rounds as well. To their credit, the scouts were holding together well, but hunger was already beginning to put some on edge. Given that they were children who'd been spirited away and were slowly being starved, the fact that they'd stayed this composed was outright miraculous. Ivan couldn't expect it to hold forever.

The lie about being inside a boundary would only work until desperation defeated sense. Pressed into a survival corner, thoughts of monsters would fly out the window, a potential quick death not so bad compared to a slow, certain one. They'd go hunting for food and water, even though neither were here.

It was hard, sitting around, doing nothing, knowing the other two were out there fighting to free them. His hands ached to be fists, furious and powerful. The sidelines were never his place in battle. He belonged in the thick of things, the center of chaos and often, the cause.

Breaking off from the group she'd been talking with, Beth wandered over toward the log where Ivan was resting. Watching her approach, he realized something that should have been obvious.

That brutal position in the middle of a fray was Fornax's place. Ivan didn't belong on a battlefield. Ivan had no place slaying monsters. Given the choice in that moment, he knew he wouldn't have traded places with Helen or Tori without dire cause. Because this was where he should be: watching over his daughter, along with the other charges. Were he out there, his mind and heart would be here, constantly distracted by fear for her safety. Better to be focused on the task at hand than let himself be split.

“Some of the kids are starting to get really scared.” She sat down next to him, keeping her voice to polite, if not covert, levels. “I keep telling them we’ll be saved, but between the noises and the darkness, last night was hard. Being hungry isn’t helping. I hope they’ll be okay until it’s over.”

Even in a situation like this one, Beth was more concerned for everyone else. Ivan patted her head, wondering for the umpteenth time how he and Janet had managed to produce these wonderful children. “I suppose that means you’re not scared at all.”

“A little,” Beth admitted. “But that seems selfish. I’ve got my power and my dad here. Nobody else has either. If I can’t be brave, it’ll only make the others more scared.”

The hug was unexpected, as the best ones often are. Beth’s tiny arms encircled his ribs, clutching him tightly, expressing all the fear she was hiding from the others in one single, powerful embrace. “And I know we’ll be okay. Even if Lodestar doesn’t find a way to save us, my daddy always comes through.”

Sitting on that log, Ivan hugged his daughter back, thankful that no one who actually knew him was around to see the swirl of emotions storm across his face. One way or another, they were getting out of this trap. Helen would find a way eventually, but if time ran short, then Ivan would think of something. Destruction was his talent, his burden, his medium. There had to be something he could break to get them out.

Until then, he comforted his daughter, and reminded himself that he wasn’t sitting on his ass doing nothing. Ivan was waiting for the inevitable. Lodestar would defeat this place, just like she’d defeated every meta Ivan had ever seen take a swing. It’s what she did, and frustrating as that was when set against her, the notion offered a great deal of comfort as one under her care.

It was only a matter of waiting until this labyrinth broke open and Fornax was set free to hunt down the perpetrators. For now, he simply threw all of himself into being Ivan. Each version had a time and a place. Fornax’s would come—probably much too soon for perpetrators. Ivan only hoped he’d have enough self-control to take his time. They’d made his daughter afraid. That earned them the slowest death he could provide.

Something was wrong.

Lozora hung near the edge of the campgrounds, away from the prying eyes of police and capes, just near enough to keep an eye on the floating orb suspended above the track. The sun had fallen and returned, yet still no one had come out. By the estimations they'd been working from, the trap was expected to hold a fully motivated Fornax for only a few hours, ideally. Finding out exactly how long it would take was the whole point of the test; however, this was well outside the bounds of expectation.

With his kid at risk, Fornax would have had to move at top speeds, even if he trusted his apprentice to watch over her. The whole thing should have been done before midnight on the first day, based on what they'd been able to find on Fornax's estimated speed. A few hours here or there was variance, but they were coming up on a full day since the trap had sprung. If Fornax had left the kids alone for that long, odds were at least a few had already been lost, possibly the apprentice, too. What really sent shivers down the cartilage system that functioned as Lozora's spine was the possibility that his daughter was among that kill count.

Crossing Fornax had been a calculated risk, one Lozora didn't take lightly. It was why she'd been careful not to be seen or implicated in any way, and had advocated for a plan that put the kid in as minimal danger as possible. Because the underworld still whispered about the remains of those who crossed Fornax; even now, the Order of the Final Dawn's massacre was told like a bogeyman's tale. Though it wasn't known what they'd done to cross Fornax, he had wiped them from the face of the Earth: every last member, killed and butchered past even the most potent forms of meta-restoration.

Lozora was growing torn with every hour that ticked by. The more she lingered, the greater her chances of discovery, linking her to this crime. But if she fled before seeing the experiment's conclusion, her employer would be aggressively displeased. Despite his attitude already wearing thin on her nerves, Lozora had put in too much to walk away from the endeavor now. Besides, she wanted to see how one of the old legends worked—the ones who never bent a knee to those damned capes.

In the end, it was a matter of weighing risks. While Fornax might be coming out furious, so long as Lozora remained unseen, he'd never know she had a hand in it. Whereas her employer was expecting results and a report, which made him the more pressing danger. Still, it was hard not to wonder just what the hell was going on inside that orb.

“Subtle, it isn’t.” The massive crater in the ground looked like a sunken amphitheater, with four grooves chopping it into equal quarters. All of it was made of stone, with visible sections that would probably flip over, revealing the inevitable minions within. It was smaller than the series of rings, which Tori found curious until she remembered how weak those had been compared to the first challenge. So far, the labyrinth had tested its prisoners against a single potent threat and many smaller ones. Logically, the next step would be multiple strong enemies.

“If I didn’t know better, I’d think it was a trap within a trap. Ivan steps in, puts the gems on those raised chunks in the center, the whole thing locks down after he’s worn out from the earlier fights.” Lodestar hovered in the air, Tori still clutched carefully, surveying the land—though for what, Tori could only guess. They hadn’t seen much in the flight over. All roads seemed to lead here; one more sign that they were on the right trail.

“I guess he would have been taking this faster, with no rests in between,” Tori agreed.

Slowly, they began to lower, still a ways off from the giant stone pit. “That wouldn’t matter, not against enemies like this. Even if the challenge were great enough that it did briefly work, all it would do is make him mad. No prison can withstand him for long.”

“Except Rookstone, obviously.” Tori waited, expecting to hear quick confirmation. Instead, she got a very precisely phrased statement.

“In a sense, yes. Ivan never escaped from Rookstone.”

With the ground rushing up, it would have been easy to miss the careful parsing of words, but Tori was feeling reenergized and alert after the shocking revelation, along with some time to rest. “That’s not the same thing as him being unable to, is it?”

There was scarcely even a jostle as Lodestar landed, lowering Tori onto her own two feet. “No, it’s not. I hope you’ll understand why we don’t broadcast that, though. If people knew there was a meta that jail couldn’t technically hold, they'd push for more permanent solutions to be used, and trying that with Fornax, among others, would largely end in bloodshed."

"Trust me, I want the public getting execution-happy with villains even less than you do. Does make me wonder: if Rookstone didn't keep Ivan held, then why did he stay? Fornax broke into and out of government installations before."

"The answer is simple, and exceedingly complicated, depending on how deep one digs. You'll have to do with the succinct version, since we're in a hurry: Ivan stayed because I beat him. Defeated him, I should say. We threw down for real. I proved to be better, and that was my prize. Even as Fornax, he always had his pride. That was why he agreed to the terms, and honored them upon losing. Pride was the only cage I ever found that worked on Fornax, and not even that weakness exists anymore."

"You think Ivan doesn't have pride?" Had those words come from anyone else, Tori might have flushed with anger, but Lodestar knew her teacher better than Tori could even begin to guess. There had to be some meaning to her words outside the obvious read of it as an insult.

"Heavens no, I'm not blind," she corrected. "The weakness of it no longer exists. Ivan will cast his pride, his dignity, even his life aside without a second thought when the need is real. If he were suddenly thrown back into Rookstone under similar circumstances, it would only last until the first time Rick or Beth needed help. Pride like that means nothing compared to guarding the ones we love."

Lodestar reached out, taking Tori's hands carefully, giving them a squeeze. "I know, at the outset, this world can be confusing. The labels and legends all seem like they mean so much, the distinctions between cape and villain appear as chasms between us. But here's the truth as I've best discovered: when things get serious, you'll know who your friends are."

"Ah, so we're circling back to Cyber Geek and the New Science Sentries." Tori didn't pull her hands away just yet, even if she was slightly tempted.

"We're circling back to the young woman who told me she didn't think she could keep being friends with people because of circumstance. If that's your choice, then so be it. I just want to make sure you know the decision you're making. The longer you live like this, the less the labels matter. You realize that jerks will chase the glory of being a superhero and good people can end up on the path of villainy. At the end of the day, you'll know who your friends are, because when things inevitably get bad, they'll be the ones you want to protect. The people who, when you see them in danger, a deep, primal part of you simply says No. The world can't have them, can't take them. Not while you're there to intervene. You can choose to ignore it, if you like, but you'll never be free of wondering what might have been, had you been a little more honest with yourself and fought when the chance was present."

She released her gentle grip on Tori's hands, looking away quickly, albeit not quite quick enough. "Those the words of experience?" Tori asked.

"Too much experience, honestly. There are days I see why most Lodestars don't last as long as I have." Quickly changing the subject, Lodestar turned back toward the stone circle, gaze turning determined. "So what do you say we put a wrap on this thing? It's either the last trial, or meant to look like it, which means there will probably be some sort of surprise trick. Any thoughts?"

"It's made with Fornax in mind, so my main guess would be violent as hell."

Lodestar licked her finger, shot up into the air a few feet, then dropped back down. "No artificial wind this time. You feeling up to being my eyes in the sky?"

"Hell yes. Here I was thinking I'd have to sit on the sidelines." There was a part of Tori that wondered how essential she could truly be, given who she'd be watching over, but she swiftly dispelled that doubt. This was, after all, a matter of not just getting things done, but getting them done quickly. If her efforts saved even a few minutes for Lodestar, it meant they'd be getting the kids out of danger that much faster.

That was, obviously, the reason Tori was excited as she shifted to fire form and took to the air. As a proper villain, it certainly wouldn't have been anything as silly as the chance to fight alongside a living legend. Well... perhaps Ivan might get some insight into her actual motivations, once the dust had settled.

If anyone could understand, she had a pretty good hunch it would be him.

---

Chapter 88

---

Overhead, the scene looked the same as it had floating with Lodestar, only a bit less stable. Tori's tactic of flight didn't allow for the same precision when hovering—not that it mattered much, as she was currently flying rings around the area as Lodestar made her approach toward the pit. The legendary superhero was taking the ground route this time, just like Ivan probably would have. No shifts as Lodestar approached, even when she drew within touching distance of the caveless stalagmite in the stone crater's center.

Pausing to give Tori a brief look, Lodestar placed both gems into grooves on the ground's upward protrusion, each clicking instantly into place.

For as well as she was rolling with the shock, Tori still hadn't fully adjusted to the Helen-Lodestar connection. Even as Tori watched her step into the pit, it was hard to fathom that this was really the same person. The woman who'd hit the dance floor like a tornado of elbows, coordinated constant craft projects, and spent half the night talking about old movies was the most powerful superhero known to Earth. All that saved her from wasting time denying the obvious was knowing that Fornax turned out to be a dependable middle manager, a devoted dad, and a surprisingly skilled cook. Tori was in deep enough now to know that the mask and who was under it didn't always match up, though this still felt like a bit much.

Her interest in speculation fell away as movement came from the stone surface. Shifting rocks fired out of the ground, encircling Lodestar, then briefly blocking her from view as they locked together. In the center of each quadrant, a tower appeared, stretching roughly ten feet into the air. One by one, as they completed, small metal objects appeared from hidden compartments in the very top. The whole process took less than ten seconds, and when it was done, Tori was shocked to hear the mysterious voice echo up from below.

“Well done, Fornax. I’m sure you’ve had a great deal of fun smashing through what must seem like rudimentary obstacles. To escape, however, I’m afraid you’ll need something not normally associated with your skill set: delicacy. Around you, I’m sure you’ve noticed the four pillars that have risen. Atop each is a small puzzle, a minor mental challenge at best, yet you’ll need every bit of focus to see the task through. You see, if any of those pillars are destroyed, the labyrinth will self-destruct. Such an explosion wouldn’t be enough to kill you, obviously. Anyone else trapped inside likely won’t be so lucky.”

As the voice was talking, Tori realized the stones on the ground hadn’t stopped moving. They were still shifting, and from within the dark spaces, she saw flashes of movement. She started to call out a warning, but unfortunately, her words were drowned out by the loud voice resuming.

“You also won’t be the only one in there. We’ve got plenty more minions for you to play with—though, if you’re too occupied, they’ll happily attack the towers instead.” The first of the new enemies emerged, and for a moment, Tori almost mistook it for a living being; the lizard-like body paired with stretches of moss along the joints created a believable image, at least until it opened its mouth, revealing rows of sharp, gray stone fangs.

“To ensure you continue working with the expediency we’ve come to expect, let’s properly motivate you not to dilly-dally. I think one minute per tower is fair. In fact, we’ll round up to an even five.”

The center of the pit at last opened up, revealing a modestly sized hourglass. No sooner had it touched the artificial sunlight than the sands began to fall. “Five minutes until everything is annihilated, unless a tower is destroyed or forbidden power used, in which case, it happens immediately. Let us see how the great legend fairs with a task beyond pure destruction.”

By the time Tori looked back from the hourglass, there was already a spray of stone appendages next to Lodestar, where the first rock-lizard had popped up. More were crawling out across the pit, spacing themselves in what sure seemed to be purposeful inconvenience. Had Ivan been alone, the task would have been trying for him. Kill enough to get breathing room, work on a puzzle, rinse, repeat. Without being called, Tori was already dropping back down. Strong as Lodestar was, she was still a single cape, and with super-speed off the table, they had to pick where best to use her.

“You go low. I’ll go high!” Tori all but fell onto the first tower, halting her descent with a powerful blast at the very end. She dared not shift more than her hands to flesh—every pound added increased the work needed to stay airborne, not to mention presented a target for any ambitious enemies. Behind her were the sounds of sneakers skidding, the shatter of rock, but her eyes stayed focused on the puzzle at hand.

It wasn’t an especially complex task. With only her first few glances, Tori could see the solution. The test was one of precision more than mental acuity: everything had to be lined up near-perfect to untwist the central cylinder. First try, no luck. Second try, another failure. A spray of shards clipped through the flames of her back, and Tori worked to put the rest of the world out of her mind. This wasn’t taking on a meta out of her league or demanding a power she lacked; Tori could do this. It was a test of her ability to concentrate, to think under pressure. That task was within her reach. Failing because she lacked power was one thing. Failing because she couldn’t do the damn job—now that was another matter entirely. She mentally pulled back, letting herself take a fresh run at the attempt, just like she had a snagged pole during tent setup.

On her third try, the cylinder twisted, and as it did, the entire puzzle began to dissolve. They didn’t get much more “done” than that, so Tori tore back into the air, eyes already hunting for the next tower. Looking around, she was dumbstruck by the number of broken bodies surrounding her position. Evidently, the goons came out in mass when a puzzle was being solved. What would Ivan have done, if he’d really been here all alone? Yank up the whole floor and kill the whole army at once? The notion seemed ludicrous, yet also worryingly plausible.

Hovering near the second tower, Tori noticed that the next puzzle was different from the first. Not unexpected, though part of her had hoped they’d all be the same, since the real test was in the execution. No such luck, so she began to twist the various symbols on the cube, deciphering the pattern as she went. Again, the solution was relatively easy to see, harder to reach. Every movement created countermovements that had to be accounted for. This one, she actually had an easier time with than the first; after all the half-rigged inventions she'd had to keep functioning, working with the overall project vision in mind and thinking several steps ahead were skills she'd polished to a shine.

Flashes of light in her periphery meant that Lodestar was busting out blasts of energy. Tori wrapped up the second puzzle just in time to see flecks of debris hit the ground where presumably a squadron of enemies had stood previously. This time, there were also still a few rock-lizards prowling around, though none near her tower. Lodestar wouldn't have any reason to be slowing down, so the rate they were appearing had to be increasing. Without using her super-speed, there was a limit to how quickly she'd be able to fell them. No wonder she'd switched over to wider-reaching attacks.

As Tori zipped over to the next tower, her vision wandered across the hourglass, which was shedding sand at a worrying rate. Had it really been nearly half the time already, or was it picking up as she cleared each challenge? She had a feeling the voice would pull that stuff, but Helen had been adamant about Cobblord's standards as a creator. Hopefully, accurate timers were part of that.

This time, she found herself staring at a spiked ball where each spike could be twisted anywhere between 180 – 360 degrees. After turning the first few, she was able to pick up on the different sounds each made upon hitting its latches. From there, it was a simple matter of finding the universal noise and dialing all of the spikes to it. Simple, but tedious, and with lots of room for reckless error. In a way, she had to hand it to the designer; given the time and distractions, Ivan really would have had trouble with this, even as detail-oriented as he was. Then again, if he failed, the creator would have a vengeful Fornax with a daughter to avenge, so maybe this wasn't such a great plan after all.

That assumed the threat was genuine, and since they clearly couldn't risk dismissing such a possibility, she had to proceed as though it wasn't a bluff. Whether it truly was or not, she hoped to never find out, dropping the third puzzle as soon as it began to dissolve. Firing away, she scanned the battlefield as she crossed to her final destination.

Save only for the patches where more minions were emerging, Tori could no longer see the ground. It was completely covered by the broken bodies of those that had come before. Like someone had driven a semi through a hall of statues, untold rock limbs lay shattered in piles, surrounding a Lodestar who continued to glow, untouched and unmarred by the relentless assault. Sadly, the hourglass wasn't so unaffected. Her time was definitely running short.

Coming down hard, Tori accidentally put a flaming leg into the tower, causing a dark stain along the stone. She pulled back quickly, all attention on the final puzzle: a series of thin rings, brittle enough they'd easily snap, interwoven with strategic gaps in each one. Lining them up required getting the angles precise, and then carefully controlling the force used to pull them apart. There was nothing that said breaking it was against the rules, but given the circumstances, some limitations could be inferred. For as quickly as Tori found the solution, she also realized there was an issue. Hovering roughly had been fine for the first three; however, this task demanded a perfectly steady hand. She couldn't do it while bobbing in the air.

"Going full human. Please keep those things at bay." It was scary, shifting back fully to her human self, grabbing onto one of the many decorative spires along the tower's top, putting her safety entirely in the hands of a cape. Although, if she was trusting herself to any superhero, it would have been hard to pick a better candidate.

Wrapping her legs around the tower's center for stability, Tori didn't bother looking over to the hourglass. At this point, she had the time she had; knowing wouldn't change anything. Working as fast as she dared, one by one Tori pulled the rings apart. A rock whizzed by near her head as she separated the next-to-last pieces, strings of curses filling her mind, then dying on the tongue. Even moving her jaw was unnecessary, and right now, stability mattered more than anything else.

The final two rings had the thinnest of openings, because of course this shit couldn't be easy. Tori shut out the sounds of battle, the protests of pain from her already worn legs, the absolute insanity of her situation overall. She did what she'd always been able to do: close off the world, narrow it to the project before her. Everything else was ancillary. All that mattered was what existed in her hands. With more dexterity than she'd have believed her fingers capable of, the final rings pulled softly apart, neither breaking from the force.

Seconds later, they began to dissolve, though this time, the puzzle wasn't alone. The tower was doing the same thing, as were the bodies Lodestar had beaten. And the active minions, now that Tori was looking around, along with the stone pit and the ground surrounding them. The whole landscape was rippling, like it had been painted on a waterbed that had just been jumped upon.

Before she could shift back, Tori found herself suddenly weightless as Lodestar flew them both up into the air. “Pretty sure it will float us back down, but better safe than sorry. If we start descending normally, I’ll let you enjoy the ride.”

“What if we all come out of here dropping?”

“Then Lodestar will miraculously swoop in to catch everyone. No more labyrinth rules means I don’t have to hold back anymore, and I’m pretty quick when I need to be. Don’t worry, I’ll set you down as well. There’s no need to show anyone your powers unless you choose to.”

The words were comforting, despite watching the ground crack and shake below them. Relief was flooding Tori’s system; this ordeal truly did seem to be over. Unfortunately, Tori wasn’t so short-sighted that she couldn’t see there was more on the horizon. Being let in on Lodestar’s secret wasn’t a minor thing, no matter how the cape herself had tried to downplay it. There was also the fact that the weekend’s events constituted a direct, knowing attack on guild leadership. People were going to pay for this, and to her surprise, Tori realized she wanted to be in the thick of it.

That was as far as her thought process went before the world around them suddenly sucked briefly inward, and then exploded.

---

Chapter 89

---

One moment, they were gathered in the forest, and then suddenly the ground was shaking. There was barely any time to react before the whole world they were standing on shattered, sending them all flying into what seemed like the sky. The false veneer quickly gave way, opening up to reveal the genuine outdoors. Loud booms were echoing across the campgrounds as the walls of condensed space collapsed, sending out minor shockwaves.

Mercifully, the same effect that had been used during their capture was still functioning, floating them down slowly. Ivan scanned for Beth and found her nearby, holding the hands of several other campers. He readied himself to teleport if gravity suddenly kicked into gear before noticing a familiar light streaking through the sky.

“Oh my god, it’s her.”

“Look! It’s Lodestar!”

“Lodestar saved us!”

The kids were yelling now, moving toward cheering, and it wasn’t as if they were wrong. Whether as herself or as Helen, Lodestar had indeed saved the day. Ivan had a great deal of questions for her on how, but resolved himself to waiting. Up here, he could already see the small crowd watching their descent. Her first job would be to update the AHC—official information channels took priority over secret friendships, especially considering she wouldn’t want Ivan to get ahead of her on this one. Both had reason to want the perpetrators, but each would have very different plans for what to do with them.

Catching Beth's attention, Ivan gestured to the streaking light, to which he received a few quickly mouthed words: "You were right."

Ivan tried his very best to etch that memory into his brain. If Rick's teen years were any indication, he wouldn't be hearing those words again anytime soon.

As the ground drew nearer, Ivan assessed the crowd, searching for the other missing Starscout personnel. It wasn't hard, as Tori turned out to be less than thirty feet away as they were landing. There was no way she'd been that close when the orb split; although, in all that streaking about, no one would have noticed if Lodestar moved one body to a different position in the sky.

While Lodestar continued to circle the kids as they descended, ensuring that each one landed safely, Tori darted over, grabbing Ivan.

"Glad to see you're okay," he greeted her. "Everything go smoothly?"

"Oh boy, just so much to unpack and tell you about. But first things first, there's some stuff you need to know about what just happened."

With a quick glance, Ivan confirmed there was no one directly near them; however, in the chaos, that could change at any moment. "Perhaps this could wait until we have a more private location?"

"Ivan... you were the target. The old you. Whoever did this knows who you really are, and they also know about Beth."

A different Ivan, one not somewhat tired from a day-long ordeal, not facing down the very apprentice he'd worked so hard to educate on the importance of control, would have potentially ruined an entire swatch of forest with the surge of violent power that rose up inside him. But this was an Ivan who knew the value of control, and of pointing one's vengeance in the proper direction. None of these people deserved to bear his wrath. That would be reserved for the ones who'd incurred it. He could scarcely wait.

"Tell me what I need to know."

By early Sunday evening, the news was pouring from all major outlets: someone had attempted to attack a Starscout event. It had, of course, ended in failure. Details on how they'd been saved were light, but with Lodestar herself appearing on the scene right as the orb shattered and gently dropped its prisoners back to the ground, some assumptions were obvious. Images of slightly dirty children flickered across multiple screens, along with the stern face of Lodestar.

“While we don’t have any perpetrators in custody yet, let me assure you, this is a crime the Alliance of Heroic Champions, and I, personally, take quite seriously.” Those damned eyes looked right down the camera, like she could see the man going by Wendel Worthington watching in his lair. “I would advise the perpetrators to turn themselves in. Barring that, my recommendation would be to enjoy what freedom you have left. Very soon, you’ll be in court—”

He muted the audio feed; threats held no interest for him. His only concern had been the results of the experiment, and whether or not Lozora had been apprehended. Evidently not. If they had a lead to parade in front of the camera, the AHC absolutely would. That was one silver lining; he didn’t need to replace his pawn so close to the real game. Unfortunately, the experiment itself had been a massive failure. With Lodestar in the mix, there was no telling if Ivan had even finished the labyrinth himself, or what his speed would be.

Resting on his desk sat a large hunk of rare metal similar in hue to the orb Lozora had been given, yet not quite the same. This was to be material for Cobblord’s second draft, a refined version. They could still make it—catching another kid to put in there as the limiter wouldn’t be too hard. Hell, it probably didn’t even have to be Ivan’s own child. The so-called legend had never possessed the ruthlessness to ascend beyond his limitations. But without knowing for certain if it could hold Fornax long enough, the whole effort was useless.

In his youth, this man would have pressed on with the compromised effort. He would have looked at the resources spent, the time and money used to procure these items, and decided it would be folly not to use them. Life and experience had taught him much, including the concept of a sunk-cost fallacy. What mattered wasn’t the work put in, but the results obtained. Fornax had to be occupied; otherwise, the whole plan could come apart.

Working the shadows, scheming in secret, it all only held together for so long. Too many villains tried to make this phase last forever rather than accepting what it was: a chance to prepare. Sooner or later, the truth always spilled out, and once it did, there would be a reckoning. Using this time to get ready, to smooth out the path toward his objectives as much as possible, meant that when things did change, he'd still have the upper hand.

If the labyrinth couldn't be counted on, then his best bet was to roll Fornax into the same distraction planned for the AHC. It would shift the timetables, perhaps significantly, but so long as he was efficient, the rest of the plan was still viable. He only needed enough time to do the job and slip away. The real challenge would be forcing himself not to savor the act he'd spent so much work laying a foundation for. Although, this was more about the message than the killing itself, an inherited grudge the owner had no idea had been hung over their head.

Lifting a phone, those thin fingers stalked along the buttons, the anti-tracking equipment wired in making the process slightly cumbersome. It was time to make sure the Guild of Villainous Reformation knew exactly what it was they'd no doubt been tracking for some time now, along with what was hidden from their sensors. Once the guild knew what was coming, they'd have to take steps to interfere, most likely leading with the tip of their spear: Fornax.

After all, this was their world, too. It wasn't as if they could afford to shrug off an impending invasion.

Beth was asleep before she even made it to her room, nodding off on the couch while Ivan brought Janet up to speed. Rick and Juan were out fetching dinner when they arrived, offering Beth a quiet place to rest—probably not a coincidence. Given the look on his ex-wife's face, Ivan imagined this wasn't a conversation she wanted lots of people to be around for. He'd expected to have to wait until Beth wore down; however, a weekend of stress and poor sleep made itself known the instant she felt at home, sending her soaring into slumber.

Nearby, in the kitchen, Janet kept her voice low and controlled, a well-honed skill from their married days, when these discussions were far more frequent. "What the hell happened out there?"

"It's like the news says. Someone tossed a maze, and it snagged all of us. I made sure the kids were safe, while the others worked to get us out."

“Uh huh. ‘Someone’ threw a maze. Weird, how they’d use a device worth millions to the right buyer on a Starscout cluster, run by a middle manager and a whatever-she-pretends-to-be. Just admit it, they were picking a fight with her, and our daughter got caught in the middle, like I always warned you she would.” Janet glanced into the living room, making sure the kid in question was still resting. “Well this is the last straw. Tomorrow, we are going to explain to Beth—”

“It was me,” Ivan interrupted. He didn’t want to agitate her by being rude, but Janet could also be hard to derail once she had momentum going. Better to get the truth out while it was still capable of being considered. “We don’t know much yet, but I was able to exchange a few words with Tori after the release. Enough to be aware that I was the target, and Beth being in there wasn’t a coincidence.”

Her head of steam died slowly as Ivan’s words sank in. What took its place was far worse, in Ivan’s esteem. Janet was past angry, the heat of rage giving way to the pure, unrelenting cold of true fury. When she spoke again, it was with the sort of unnerving calm that had always intrigued Ivan. The facet was, in honesty, part of what had formed their initial attraction.

“You promised me this wouldn’t happen. You looked me in the eyes, and you told me they’d stay away. That your identity was secret enough, and even the few who did find out would keep clear. Because no one would dare mess with Fornax, or the ones he loves.”

The words were all but a slap, and Ivan glanced over himself to be sure that Beth was still conked out. Using that name in her home was not something Janet did lightly.

“Don’t think for a moment that I wanted—”

“Our baby just got dragged into an orb in the goddamn sky, I don’t give a fuck what you want.” It was Janet’s turn to interrupt, and she hissed the words—likely the only way she could resist from screaming them. “You know I want? I want to spend tonight with my husband and kids, having a nice dinner, not calling a child psychologist who specializes in meta-related trauma. I want to not see that suspicious glint in Rick’s eyes every time he looks at either of us these days. I want to stop lying awake every single night wondering when it will all come crashing down, when your secret gets out and their lives become insane—assuming they’re lucky enough to make it through. I want our children to be safe, Ivan.”

She finally paused, taking a moment to compose herself. Only once Ivan was sure she'd said her piece did he speak once more. "As do I. More than anything in the world. There is nothing I won't do to protect those two."

"Except, apparently, your current plan isn't working. This is the second time in a calendar year our kids have been targeted because of you." Janet was looking more centered now, the initial shock of the revelation giving way to her relentless thought. She seemed to take him in as he stood there, looking over every detail of the aggressively mundane appearance. Her tone softened considerably. "Ivan, no one, not even her, knows better than I do how hard you worked to leave Fornax behind when Rick arrived. Whatever issues we might have, you have always been an amazing father to those kids, and I am wowed by the transformation you made. But maybe... maybe right now, they don't need their father as much as they need the demon he used to be."

The words came out heavy, as such a sentiment should be. She never looked away, however. Janet knew what she was saying, asking, in a way that very few could. "People aren't afraid the way they once were. Achievements have turned into history, stories into myths. You did such a good job living in the shadows that Fornax's legend faded."

"Your solution is that I take revenge for this incident, I assume?" Ivan wasn't entirely sure how he felt about the idea she was floating; instead, he focused on making it through the conversation. It had been a very long weekend. He dearly needed some time to decompress.

"Revenge? The kind where your people show up and the perpetrators are never heard from again? No, Ivan. This demands more than death from the shadows. This needs to be a spectacle." Ivan felt a slight chill at Janet's steady, unwavering gaze. "Crack their bones, sear their skin, drop their severed heads onto the tables of their closest allies. Break these pieces of shit, the way only the great destroyer can, and make sure the world sees. Show them what happens to anyone who goes against Fornax."

Between the two of them, Ivan was undeniably the greater danger. Even without his meta-human abilities, he had a lifetime of combat training and the willingness to do harm in ways most people could never obtain. However, that didn't mean Janet was some shrinking violet, content to live in willful ignorance. Protecting her children always came first. She knew full well what she was asking, and there wasn't so much as a flicker of doubt.

"If I do something like that, the AHC is going to turn the heat way up. There might be unexpected consequences."

"Glad you mentioned them, actually," Janet replied. "Reminds me—pass a message along to her: I want to have a word."

That was a bad idea. A terrible idea, for an abundance of reasons, none of which Ivan could find a tactful way to bring up. Ultimately, he decided to stall for time until he could think of something. "I'll let her know, but she's often busy. Might be a while before she responds."

"Tell her to use that damn super-speed. The way she should have inside that stupid maze, so a bunch of kids wouldn't have spent a weekend being kidnapped."

Though Ivan had gotten a rough outline of the labyrinth's setup and limitations during his brief talk with Tori, he declined to bring any of it up. For the moment, Janet was angry and scared; the facts weren't going to matter. Ivan understood that all too well, because he was feeling exactly the same thing. The fact that Beth had been included on purpose terrified him down to his very core. Life was so fleeting, so easily snatched away, and he couldn't bear the thought of anything happening to either of his kids.

Which was why the anger inside was taking significant effort to hold back. Janet was freer with her emotions, because she could afford to be. Harsh words weren't the same as what slipped loose when Ivan's control wavered. Worse, part of him was already wondering if Janet was right. Was his best move to dole out this punishment publicly? The Apollo fight was a slipup; he hadn't willingly acted as Fornax in years. Perhaps that was part of the reason these new threats felt so emboldened.

Janet had raised some valid points, yet Ivan still remained hesitant. Not because he didn't relish the idea of setting a violent, bloody example of what happened to those who crossed his family—in fact, it was an image he was actively working to keep out of his head. Being Fornax again would be easy, which was why Ivan still felt the need to resist.

Once Fornax was intentionally let out, there might be no putting him back.

---

Chapter 90

---

Tori was surprised to see an empty street corner as the car dropped her off. She'd been expecting some of the New Science Sentries to be there, so over-concerned that they insisted on walking her the few feet from sidewalk to front door. Hauling herself out of the car, she looked her brick domicile up and down, appreciating the familiarity. It had taken a while, but arriving here was starting to feel like coming home. Especially knowing that she had friends up there waiting for her.

It was probably a good thing none of the capes were around. Tori still wasn't sure how she felt about learning Lodestar's secret, or the implications it had regarding Ivan, and some time to think through that would be nice. Besides, she needed to reconsider her stance on fraternizing with capes as a whole. The friendships that had seemed so impossible on Friday weren't nearly as remarkable by comparison now, which made them feel far more manageable.

Stepping into the foyer, Tori caught movement from the mail alcove. It wasn't especially subtle, as the figure moved toward her as soon as she appeared. For an instant, her heart leapt at the sight of those kaleidoscope eyes, but the same bit could only be genuinely scary so many times.

"Nexus, you are one creepy bastard, you know that?"

"If only," he replied, sounding oddly... wistful? "How was your weekend?"

"What, weren't you posted up on a tree somewhere, watching the whole thing?"

Nexus shook his head hard, causing his long trench coat to shake slightly, sending off small plumes of red dirt. “Others to watch, and Lodestar fights are boring unless they’re big. Like... well, odds are you’ll see soon enough.”

“Great, I’ll set my DVR. Anything else, or is this just your creepy hangout for the night?” She should be more scared—Tori knew that rationally. Mad as he seemed, Nexus had endured the full efforts of the guild and the AHC to stamp him out. He was capable of wide-scale destruction like she could only imagine, based on the few displays he’d given.

“One thing, if you’re interested.” Nexus was smiling in a way that only the truly gleeful and insane could manage: with absolute abandon. “A junction is looming, a point where things tend to go in one of two directions. In one version, several fascinating stories are cut short. In another, they persist, providing more entertainment. The difference in the two is often you.”

The unnerving thing about Nexus was that he was mad, not crazy. There was logic in those shattered eyes, a process of thought and reason that guided his actions. After a few meetings, she’d gotten enough clues to realize that, at least for now, he was largely acting as a voyeur. Their world was amusing to him, so he watched it for entertainment. Tracking that, when he said stories were cut short... he was probably talking about the people living those tales.

“Who gets hurt?”

“Can’t say. Not always the same, you know. But they won’t be strangers to you, that much is certain.”

It was never that easy. Just enough information to make you do what they wanted: that was how manipulators loved to work. She was very tempted to flip him the bird and walk away, except that afterward, every time she looked at Beverly or Chloe, Tori would wonder if something bad was coming for them, and whether she could have stopped it.

“You can’t tell me who is involved, or what will happen, I’m guessing. But somehow, I affect the outcome?”

“A superhero defends what is just; a villain defends what is theirs. Remember who you truly are, and the rest shall flow as it does. I have my preferences, but the show marches on regardless.” He twirled once, his massive coat flaring out behind. “Do try to keep it amusing.”

Without warning, he was simply gone. Never with flash or spectacle, Nexus moved through space with the same level of grandiose display as when Tori took a step forward. It was mundane to him, as was likely all of this. Who knew how much those fractured eyes had witnessed, and over a span of how long? Yet something impending was fascinating enough to warrant a special trip to Tori. These did happen—she'd been warned as much since he crashed a guild meeting.

Tori's plans for an evening of rest suddenly evaporated as she found a fresh wind. Dinner with her friends, certainly, but after that, it was down to the lab. The Hephaestus suit needed repairing, and she no longer felt safe with it compromised. Something told her she was going to be wearing it again sooner than later.

Curiously, Tori realized this notion had put a thin smile on the edges of her lips. Perhaps Nexus wasn't the only one capable of acclimating to the insanity of this lifestyle.

“Any idea what this is about?” Donald followed Ren through the crowd, his friend's bulk helping clear a path through the array of costumed forms. He couldn't recall ever seeing so many of the AHC's capes in one place. Usually, they were separated by schedules and distance; with a whole world to keep running and only so many capes to lean on, they weren't exactly all walking the same patrol beat. Most of the others seemed excited, though a few appeared nervous.

“I got the same text as you. Major meeting—everyone not on active assignments who can get here needs to report.” Ren halted his forward march, having reached the end of space in the crowd. Moving more would demand shoving bodies aside; hardly a polite option, especially around coworkers. This room was enormous, as was the screen dominating an entire wall. Still, even with all the space, they were getting packed in. The AHC had evidently grown since the room was last needed for this purpose.

Scanning the room, Donald noted Irene and Lucy coming in from their individual training sessions. Both were still clad in sweats rather than costumes, Lucy waving as soon as they made eye contact. The two began wading through the sea of bodies, though how long it would take to reach their position was anyone's guess.

Turning his attention toward the front, where the screen was located, he picked out the familiar hue of the New Science Sentries' costumes, all four of them in prime positions. They must have either gotten here in advance or used Presto's teleportation trickery—probably the former. Austin didn't seem the sort to let his people cut ahead. There were other familiar outfits near the front, as well: Dapper Doll, the Ineffable, Glass Cannon, and the unfortunately named Mister Fister, a brawling cape who must be working very hard to ignore the innuendo of his moniker.

At the next figure, Donald almost let out a yelp of shock. Sure enough, that was Lady Shade standing there. She'd been missing since the rebellion. He'd assumed she was booted along with the other traitors. Maybe telling the truth at the end had bought her some leniency? That was more comforting than his other hunch: that they were up against something so dangerous, it demanded all hands on deck. Even the untrusted ones.

Suddenly, the lights flickered, blinking three times. Instantly, the crowd grew silent as every eye turned toward the giant screen. After the third bout of darkness, the lights remained off. What illuminated the room now was a bright, blank screen. Seconds later, Professor Quantum stepped onto the stage, followed by Quorum. Lodestar arrived a few steps behind, her tardiness probably the result of still having to deal with the fallout from the Starscout attack. Donald had sent Tori a text—the most he could do with this meeting filling up his evening. Besides, knowing her, she probably wanted to be alone and relax. Tori would reach out when she was ready; he just hoped his schedule would open up when the moment came.

"Superheroes of the Alliance of Heroic Champions," Professor Quantum began, "today I stand before you with grave news. The purpose for which this organization was founded, to defend the world against threats great and small, shall be put to its fullest test once again. While much of what I'm about to say will eventually leak to the public, it is vital this remain confidential for as long as possible. Failure to control information could lead to mass panic and civilian casualties."

The light, interested vibe of the room shifted quickly. Professor Quantum was never what one would call carefree, but the gravity of these words was undeniable. He was serious, as was their situation. "We have been tracking a migration of ships moving on a course for Earth. These are not Grzzniltan, though we suspect they had some hand in this. Based on information provided by our extraterrestrial sources, we believe these to be the Wrexwren, a species specialized in conquering and combat. Considering their attempt at a stealthy approach and the number of ships present, this is almost certainly an invading force.”

Someone in the room obviously had the ability to steal the bottom out from people’s stomachs: that was the only explanation Donald could think of for why his gut suddenly dropped to the heels of his shoes. An invasion? An actual attempt to take over their planet? That was crazy. It had been forever since the last time anyone tried that, and the AHC had sent them packing. Which was exactly what Professor Quantum wanted to have happen again, from the sound of things.

“Before anyone gets too nervous, we do have a plan that we hope will keep things contained,” Lodestar announced. “The Wrexwren, like many warring cultures, pride themselves on their strength. Historically, they’ll allow a planet’s champion to battle their own to earn its salvation. We plan to invoke that, hopefully keeping the fighting entirely contained off-planet.”

“However, there is no guarantee this particular force will honor that tradition, or do so fairly,” Professor Quantum said, retaking control of his stage. “We must be prepared for the absolute worst we can imagine. Someone is coming to take this planet. From us, from you, from everyone you love. Many things are different across the stars, but conquest is constant. If we aren’t prepared, it will be brutal and bloody before you’ve even got your masks on.”

To Donald’s surprise, Lodestar actually nodded in agreement this time. “Hope for the best, brace for the worst. There’s no such thing as being too prepared. For our newer members, keep in mind that we won’t intentionally put you against something you can’t handle, but an invasion is a hectic time. We know little about the Wrexwren, their motives, or their potential allies. Trust your instincts. If something feels way out of your league, your first priority is communicating that back to base, not engagement. Information is going to be the name of the game.”

“Perhaps we should start at the beginning: expected arrival date.” Quorum had to be wearing a mic; there was no way that soft tone traveled so well on projection alone.

His words recentered Lodestar and Professor Quantum, perhaps one of the most essential tasks in all of the AHC. Professor Quantum nodded, then made a motion. The screen behind him suddenly went black, or that was how it initially appeared. After a moment for his eyes to adjust, Donald realized he was looking at an image of stars. A flicker as the image changed, and now he could make out a small patch of Saturn's rings in the photo. Something else, too. A large ship that blended well with the blackness of space, unnatural in design. Too many angles and loops, it had design functions he couldn't even begin to guess at, for a biology he knew nothing about.

The third slide pulled a gasp from Donald, along with several others nearby. Now, they could see more ships, dozens in this one frame alone, with untold more outside the shot. Hearing the word "invasion" was one thing; seeing it stretched out through the vast void of space was an entirely different matter.

"Based on their speed, it is our estimation that the forces will arrive in less than a week's time. While we will of course monitor in case of acceleration, current predications have them entering within range of Earth on Saturday. I hope you all can appreciate the implications." Whether it was needed or not, Professor Quantum opted to go ahead and state the obvious, ensuring that everyone fully grasped the stakes of their situation.

"It means that if we do nothing, this will be humanity's last week in control of its own planet."

All the data was backing it up, ridiculous as the tip had been.

Wade was never one to turn down a solution, so long as he understood all the implications of using it. A random call to a guild-monitored line, leaving explicit information about the invading forces, was all but the literal definition of "suspicious." The thing was, that didn't make the tip incorrect.

People often thought of misinformation as untruths, and while there was certainly a fair bit of that in the mix, there was also more to it than that. On occasion, the right tactic involved giving out real information, but controlling who got it, and when. Move the pieces into position, predict their movements, and plot how to use them to the scheme's advantage.

Based on the message he'd gotten, the Wrexwren weren't coming to Earth with no idea of what they were stepping into. They knew the humans had intel, and were planning to challenge them to a duel. They also knew the Earth had an undefeated defender, and they were still coming, which meant they had to think they possessed an effective counter. That part, Wade had been the most curious about, and as test after test returned the predicted results, it seemed he finally had an answer.

“The universe is a scary place, if things like that are just out there wandering around.” He looked over the digital image, constructed out of places the transmission vanished, like throwing paint around a hole to get a shape of the void. Without the message’s precise frequency to scan, it might have taken him weeks more to manage even this much. Seeing the picture on-screen, Wade felt a rare sense of foreboding.

This was no half-assed effort. Whoever was pulling the strings had accounted for nearly everything, even managing to stymie the guild’s power here and there. As much as Wade wanted to wait out the AHC, force them to return on bended knee, begging for even the slightest bit of aid, survival took precedence over grudges. The Wrexwren were coming hard, and so far seemed to be better prepared and informed than the humans they were up against.

The guild would need to be ready to do more than just scavenge and strike. Should the world truly be in peril, it wasn’t just the champions with a stake in its defending. His people would be ready, too, prepared to send a message to every alien, cape, and civilian that saw their handiwork.

Even monsters had the right to protect their home.

---

Chapter 91

---

The flash in the sky was all she needed. Juan was asleep on the couch with Beth, and Rick had already locked himself in his room for the evening. Still, Janet paused by the door to scoop up the kitchen trash—less an excuse, more being productive with her time. Stepping out into the night, she shivered slightly. Fall was setting in more firmly; the night winds carried a crisp chill. Part of her wondered if she should have grabbed a jacket, though that might have looked odd to simply take out the trash.

Walking around to the side of her house, Janet popped open the large trash can and tossed her bag inside. Out of the corner of her eye, she caught movement coming from the driveway, a figure stepping into the floodlight's range, lighting up a whole section of yard. She'd have been so easy to overlook, had Janet not known the truth.

Adjusting her glasses slightly, the woman waited until the light flickered off, plunging them into darkness once more.

"I heard you wanted to talk."

"Talk?" Janet shoved the trash down harder, resisting the urge to punch and potentially break the bag. With her luck, she'd hit a wine bottle and fracture a knuckle—one more reminder of how human she was. "No, what I want is to be standing over the twisted remains of the people who did this, or living in a world where it never happened in the first place. What I'll settle for is getting some goddamn answers. You were in there the entire time: how dare you sit on your hands for a full day and make those children suffer."

Helen didn't rise to the anger. She simply nodded. "I know this is hard to believe, but being careful and going slow was my way of keeping them safe. The labyrinth had failsafes in case certain abilities were used, ones designed to target the kids. Until I knew what they were, I couldn't take the risk of accidentally causing the whole thing to explode."

"How convenient, that it just so happened so that one of the few times Lodestar can't use her speed is one where you're sealed inside a getaway with..." Janet forced herself to take a breath. Going off topic wouldn't help any of this. "Fine. I can accept that in your situation, with Ivan protecting the kids, caution would be the smarter move. My real question is what you intend to do about this moving forward."

"That's a perfectly fair concern," Helen replied. "To answer your question, I've only just started the ball rolling, so there aren't many details yet, but I'm putting together a new division of the Starscouts. Security-based, to ensure that nothing like that happens at one of our events ever again, or barring that, we have people to respond if it does."

Slamming the large trash can lid down, Janet wrinkled her nose at the last whiff of stink. "What a surprise, you went running to your followers. And now that the AHC has its hooks in, it's only a matter of time before they turn it into a recruiting pool."

"Happy to disappoint. This new division still isn't AHC-related." Helen was unfailingly calm, even cheery, despite the implied accusation Janet had just thrown. "Since the Starscouts are an organization open to humans and metas, we have quite a few of the latter who have graduated. I've been reaching out to old members, asking about their time and availability. There's lots of interest so far, but it's much too early to have many specifics in place. Just know that I take what happened this weekend seriously."

Janet wasn't sure why she'd expected anything different. Of course Helen already had a plan and an answer ready to go; not to mention found a way to get the personnel she needed without tapping the AHC. Given the role Helen filled in protecting the world, her efficiency and preparedness were technically positive traits, even if Janet did find them annoying.

"A good start for the Starscouts, but what about my kids?" Janet stepped away from the trash, onto the driveway, inadvertently setting off the floodlight once more. "I know who the target was, and why they chose that event to attack. There's no secret magic protecting their father's identity from getting out, or them from the fallout. If it's already started leaking, then this was only the start of what's to come. Tell me you have a plan to keep them safe."

For a moment, Helen started forward, arms extending like she was reaching out to comfort Janet. That motion lasted for only a brief instant before she halted, just as the floodlight died once more. "I'm sorry, Janet. I know what you want to hear. You want to know your child will be safe, protected, and watched over no matter what. You want to be able to keep the worst of the world away, to drive it off, spare them so many horrible truths. That's why I'm sorry, because I can't give you that. Not even I can be everywhere at once."

Before Janet could begin her tirade, from which there would have been little reprieve, Helen continued, hurrying slightly. "What I can do is start by enrolling them in various AHC monitoring services, if you're comfortable with that. We'd set them up with some light surveillance and trackers, along with emergency response beacons they could push to alert us they are in imminent danger. Obviously, these would all be located here; your ex-husband's property is his own business."

"That's it? Your idea is to bug them?"

"I said it was the start," Helen corrected. "I'm happy to work with you to come up with more solutions."

To her credit, she did still have a polite smile fixed in place, but Janet doubted just how "happy" she'd really be if that offer was accepted. Not that it mattered. Hearing her proposal had only set Janet's determination all the more. "Pass."

"On which part?"

"All of it." Janet mimed forming the air into a ball, then tossed it over her shoulder into the closed trash can. "You think I'm giving the AHC even one door into their lives? It's just a matter of time until some cape with an old grudge or burning ambition decides to see how a legend's offspring hold up. Or hell, one might pull an Apollo and outright use them for hostages. My kids will have protection, but not from you."

Realization hit instantly. Young as she might look, Helen was concealing a wealth of experience. "As much as I get it—and I do—you understand what you'll be choosing, right? Ivan is not the norm in that organization. He's the leash they're all kept on. I understand the mistrust in the AHC, truly, and if you'd prefer, I can pick the capes assigned to them personally."

“Do... do you honestly think I’d trust you?” Janet was sincerely a bit shocked. She and Helen were on far from friendly, or even cordial, terms.

At long last, the veneer slipped, and Helen’s forehead pinched in frustration, causing her to run a thumb along the wrinkles that Janet knew would never set. “Outside of your—let me remind you—unfounded suspicions, yes, I would really like to think that if nothing else, you’d believe me when I say I’m trying to protect innocent children. I’ve got the track record to prove it.”

Forcing herself to stay in control, Janet took a few moments to breathe. She couldn’t afford to get overly heated. Much as she loathed it, there might very well come a day when Lodestar was the only cape in her kids’ corners. Janet knew she should play with at least a minimal amount of diplomacy until then.

“All right, perhaps that was a bit far. I’m standing by my decision, however. No AHC involvement. Maybe the guild won’t be as polished or as practiced in their protections, but they’ll know the stakes. They’ll understand just who they’re failing if anything happens to their charges. Besides, sooner or later, those two are going to learn the truth. Better they make some inroads with their eventual allies.”

Surprisingly, Helen gave another nod rather than keep debating. “Very well, then. It’s not the choice I’d have made, but you’re their mom. I won’t try to tell you what’s best for your family. All I can say is that if you ever do decide that we might be able to help, the door will be open so long as I’m there to hold it.”

The sentiment was a nice one, and probably the best place to end the conversation. Janet hadn’t gotten as much reassurance as she might have liked, but after a point, they would just be empty words. There was, however, one detail of the discussion that she refused to let lie. “I appreciate that, and I appreciate the help you’ve shown them so far. That said, let’s be clear: my suspicions were not unfounded.”

A loud, weary groan of a sigh escaped from Helen’s lungs. “I am several decades too old to stand in a driveway and fight about a boy. I’m sorry you think something went on between us, even though it didn’t. No secret affair, no tawdry messages. Ivan and I barely even talked when you two were married. He’d never have done that, and neither would I.”

“I know.” Janet was surprised to hear the words come from her own mouth. She’d realized all of that long ago, though giving the sentiment words was another step entirely. “I know Ivan would never cheat, because I understand why he was here in the first place. It wasn’t an affair I suspected. It was the truth.”

“Janet, it’s been a long weekend, and I’ve still got a lot more work before the night is over. Can you maybe skip over being cryptic and just tell me what it is you think happened so I can set the record straight?”

“If that’s what you want,” Janet agreed. “I ‘think’ my ex-husband married me because I’d given birth to his son, which is admittedly the same reason I married him. He was a good husband—surprising, given his past—but Ivan is adept at throwing himself fully into things. So he became Ivan the father, Ivan the civilian, Ivan the manager. We had another child, built a life together, and over time, I thought we’d fallen in love. Then that day at the beach came. Horrific as it was, the image I can never seem to forget is what came after, when Lodestar arrived.”

There was genuine confusion on Helen’s face now, an expression Janet might have relished in other circumstances. As it was, her focus remained on getting to say her piece. “I know how Ivan looks at someone he loves. There’s a vulnerability that exists only in those instants. I caught it when he looked at our kids, or as a faraway glint on the rare occasions he’d open up about those he lost in the past. For a long time, I thought he just had a different look for me—one of affection and care, yet still not quite the same. And I was okay with that. You don’t wed someone with his baggage without expecting a few oddities. Until that day. Until you landed, racing over to comfort the man who’d just slaughtered an army. Until I saw the way he looked at you.”

“I cannot emphasize enough, nothing was going—”

“Do you think that makes it better for me?” Janet barely resisted the urge to yell, her hands forming into balls. “I get it. You did nothing wrong, as always. You were perfect, and moral, and continued to live at a standard no one else can touch, and I’m just the horrid monster of an ex who dared to want more than a hollow marriage. But he loved you. Loves you still. Don’t look me in the eye and pretend you don’t realize that.”

Some distance off, the sounds of a car’s brakes filled the silence of the night air. “Yes, Janet. I know how Ivan feels about me. That’s why we barely talked when you were together. Both of us understood the danger and avoided it. Because whatever passing affections he might have in my direction, this family is the most important thing in the world to him, as it should be. And I promise you, Ivan never strayed, never even looked off the path. This emotion that you're angry about, I understand, but I'm not sure what more either of us could have done."

"While we're several years and a new, happy marriage past that point, some more honesty might have been helpful. I don't think Ivan is ever going to work past what he feels for you. However, if he'd been open about it, we could have at least tried." A brisk wind caught Janet, causing another shiver. Helen remained unbothered, of course. She lived in the same world as Ivan, filled with beings of incomprehensible power, a realm that mortals could only catch glimpses of.

"On that front, I truly don't know what to say. Getting Ivan to open up is beyond even the greatest of capes. Only he decides when to be vulnerable." Helen took a slight step back, turning on the floodlight once more. Head lifted, she was scanning the skies, preparing to leave.

Tempting as it was to let her go, Janet did have one last bit of curiosity to scratch, especially since answers were flowing. "You know, in all this time, I've only ever gotten to witness Ivan's side of things. That intentional avoiding of each other, was that purely for his sake?"

"Have a good night, Janet. I'll catch you around."

A few hops back out into the darkness, then suddenly, there was a flash of light and an empty driveway.

Janet headed back into the house; question more thoroughly answered than Helen might have intended. Nothing quite said inadvertent guilt like hightailing it out of a conversation at top speed.

---

Chapter 92

---

Halfway through her Monday morning wake-up routine, Tori paused to wonder if she even actually had to go in to the office. So far, they'd generally given her a few days off after each life-shaking traumatic event, but a corporation's goodwill could only stretch so far. Then again, she did know the boss, and the guy who owned the whole damn shebang, so perhaps she was receiving more generous time to recover than most. Toothbrush still hanging from her mouth, Tori popped open her phone, a text from Ivan already waiting.

"No office today, but there's still work to do. Meet me outside your building at our usual start time."

Interesting. Tori tossed the phone down and slowly resumed her brushing. No telling for sure what today's activities would entail, though she could make a few general guesses on the subject matter. After a night of sleep and a few thousand actual calories, she was feeling far less wiped, but the new secret she'd uncovered still lay heavy on her mind. Tori was extremely thankful Helen had explained that it was impossible for her to slip up; at least she didn't have to worry about some wrong word or turn of phrase giving away what she knew.

A few solid raps on her door were all the warning she got before Beverly shoved it open. "Hey, you almost ready in here? Chloe got up early to cook you a 'welcome home' breakfast, and I am not facing that alone."

"That was sure... kind of her." Tori had never quite gotten her flames hot enough to manage turning something solid into total ash, which would have made disposal of the goods far easier. Perhaps an invention to consider, once her suit was fully repaired.

“At least you can stall until it’s time for your office job,” Beverly said, marking one of the few times she’d expressed jealousy for Tori’s corporate-cog status. “Speaking of, since my more distracting roommate was gone all weekend, I made a lot of headway on our project. Couldn’t sleep after you got home and hit the lab, so I stayed up and got pretty close to being done. By tonight, I should have my part ready for the prototype.”

“So soon?” Tori would have expected turnaround like that from herself, which was to say a person with a poor work-life balance and tendency to hurl herself into projects. Beverly was far more reasonable in her passions. Even if she was incredibly skilled, she still must have put in a lot of time to already be near finished.

Beverly affected her best haughty expression, one that actually sat quite well on her finely sculpted face. “You’re not the only one capable of knuckling down when the occasion demands.” Her face softened, a sliver of weariness cracking through. “Plus, there’s been all the stuff with my family reaching out—having something to work on made for a great distraction. After this, I might build us a new dining room table.”

“Don’t go overcommitting too fast. If the prototype goes well, we’re definitely going to need more.” Tori stepped into her bathroom, partially to do one last appearance check, and also to buy more time until she had to head into the kitchen. The woman staring back at Tori was one she’d never have imagined possible. Brown suit, long skirt, hair back, stud earrings, and sensible shoes. She was so... boring, and Tori felt a strange swell of pride in her heart at that notion. This was a woman who lived a normal life, worked a boring job, and had the dullest of secrets. Building this image had taken time and effort, not to mention quite a bit of guidance from Ivan.

If everything went well, Tori wouldn’t be able to keep playing this angle for much longer. She wouldn’t be revealing any heavy truths to the world, but the new role required different features to succeed. That was getting ahead of herself, though. They still had to finish the prototype, impress Wade, and start the ball rolling on production. Nevertheless, Tori took her time examining that reflection, more than just to delay eating Chloe’s food.

At the rate her life had been changing, by this time next year, she might have three heads and a tail. Best to appreciate the moment while she was still in it. If Tori had taken no other lesson in her life, she knew that nothing —no time, no phase, no joy—lasted forever. Sooner or later, everything came to end.

Without warning, Chloe's raised voice rang out from the kitchen. "Hey you two, does anyone have an allergy to pimento cheese? I found a waffle recipe online that suggested using it in the batter and thought that sounded fun."

Tori stepped out of her bathroom, locking terrified eyes with Beverly, who reflected her expression nearly as well as the actual mirror had. Hiding was no longer viable; they had to get proactive.

Wordlessly, Tori put up her fist, and Beverly did the same. They each shook the closed hand three times, then reformed it into the finger-symbol of paper, scissors, or rock. Tori won the first match with a last-second scissors, but Beverly took the second thanks a well-timed rock. The final bout was neck-and-neck, yet Tori's own rock ultimately claimed victory.

"You know what? I think I am allergic to that," Beverly called, pausing only to shoot Tori a dirty look. Tori accepted the gaze, along her prize of not having to remember a new fake allergy.

Such were the spoils of victory.

"Excuse me, sir, can I help you?"

Ivan looked up from his phone to see the two figures he'd already clocked approaching standing nearby. The blond was big—not just raw muscle, either. He moved like someone who actually used his body rather than only building it. Next to him was a shorter fellow with brown hair and a lean frame. Given what he knew about Tori's living situation, Ivan had a hunch on who these might be. Still, muscles did not a meta make. It was possible they were normal ruffians planning a robbery. Although, early in the morning, with their arms full of groceries, would certainly be a departure from the mugging norms.

"Appreciate it, but I'm just waiting for someone." Instantly, both men's faces tightened. They were either on guard patrol or were up to shady activities of their own. Clearly, this wasn't a good answer. Deciding to part with slightly more information, Ivan added, "My niece lives here."

The shorter one—Tachyonic, if Ivan was getting this right—stepped forward. “Sorry to say this, but we’ve had a few incidents surrounding some residents as of late. Perhaps there’s somewhere more comfortable you can wait.”

“My answer is a polite, firm no.” Ivan looked back down at his phone, effectively dismissing them both. “I’m standing on a public sidewalk, not inside the building where you may or may not reside. Since I don’t see any badges on display, this doesn’t seem to be a discussion of loitering coming from an officer of the law. Unless you two are both secretly superheroes, we’re all civilians, and I’ve got no reason to move.”

It was a tad mean, coming so close to calling them out, but they needed to learn to split their identities better. These sorts of discussions had to happen when they were in costume. Without that authority, they just seemed like interlopers bothering strangers, at best.

To their credit, both were flustered, but neither one lost themselves entirely. Instead, the one who had to be Agent Quantum gave a knowing grin, then walked over to the building’s brick exterior and placed his back against it. “He’s right. We’ve got no authority to make this gentleman move. But we do have just as much right to stand out here as him, making use of the public sidewalk.”

Smarter than the physique indicated, not that Ivan was too surprised. Professor Quantum’s attachment to his legacy was legendary among capes and villains alike; the man protected his brand better than an entire PR firm could manage. For him to pass on the mantle, even if only part of his name, was a tremendous vote of confidence in the one who’d be carrying it. Agent Quantum wouldn’t have the title if he were merely some hulking bruiser. To earn that, there was no telling what sorts of tests he’d had to endure, let alone pass. Ivan had a hunch that once this kid started showing what he could really do, they’d be in for quite the show. Possibly even a real challenge.

Tachyonic moved slowly—a detail that very nearly caused Ivan to chuckle—stepping over to his friend’s side, his eyes never leaving Ivan. He paid them no mind, putting the final touches on his email before hitting send. With that, his schedule had been effectively cleared for the week. Waking up to find he’d been temporarily reassigned, by the head office no doubt, to a special research project had been momentarily confusing, until he noticed the message from Wade. It was vague, as all monitorable guild correspondence tended to be, but the gist came through. Something was up, and while he'd get the details later that day, all indications seemed that it was serious. Wade didn't go around butting into Ivan's schedule willy-nilly; he knew that sort of invasion was only acceptable under extremely necessary conditions.

With work done, Ivan glanced down, noting that the shopping bags were largely filled with various coffees and caffeinated beverages, along with a few sandwich-shaped bundles letting out wisps of steam. Whether it was boredom or simply his office small talk kicking into gear, Ivan found the words leaving his mouth before he'd thought to give them leave.

"Late night?"

That earned a scowl from Tachyonic, yet Agent Quantum nodded without hesitation. "Never a dull moment in Ridge City."

Ivan made a noise in his throat that could have been agreement, or simple acknowledgment that the words had been properly heard. It was one of his favorite tools for weathering office meetings, allowing him to handle most questions tossed in his direction without getting bogged down in needless details.

"What about you, mister? Out burning the midnight oil?"

"No, I had a very long, trying weekend. A night of heavy sleep was well-earned." Ivan felt that was true, even though he hadn't gotten one; instead, he'd wasted most of the night digging for any leads on their mystery trapper, only to come up empty. Whoever had thrown that orb was hiding themselves well. Same for Cobblord—no luck, not that Ivan really expected to succeed. He'd never had much talent for locating people. Ivan's skills kicked in once he had a target.

"Sorry to hear that. Hopefully the week ahead will treat you better." Agent Quantum's face twitched, only for a moment, yet in it, Ivan saw his realization. This would not be a normal week—based on Wade's estimates, at least. Seemed like the capes might have finally started letting their people know what was coming.

Ivan gave a shallow nod. "It will certainly be an interesting one."

The slam of a nearby door lifted all their eyes to the same location, which was how they all ended up staring at Tori as she strolled into the afternoon light. He could hear the capes tensing, practically feel it at this proximity. If they thought he was here to do harm, then she would be the chief target for such aggressions. They were waiting to see if he would make a move.

Neither, however, was fully braced for Tori.

“Ivan? What the hell? I thought you meant we’d meet at the office.”

“We’re heading somewhere else, so this was faster. Special company research project. We’ve been moved over to it all week.”

“As long as it’s not more quarterly reviews, I can manage.” Seeming to notice the capes for the first time, Tori’s eyebrows scrunched together.

“Kyle, Austin, why are you guys standing on the sidewalk?”

The flabbergasted look on both Austin and Kyle’s faces was such a spectacle, Ivan wished he had a way to snap covert photos. Their gaze went from him to Tori, then back again, as they began to process the implied connection.

“Wait, is this guy your uncle?” Kyle asked, putting a fine point on the issue.

“There’s some cousins and marriages in the equation, but yeah, he’s pretty much been Uncle Ivan since we met.” The proud gleam in Tori’s eye made it impossible to miss how well she’d threaded the needle of truth with her carefully chosen words.

After a few more head-turns—too many; he was giving into his speed—Kyle fully faced Ivan. “Sorry for bothering you. We had to be sure you weren’t a danger.”

With great effort, Tori almost managed to change the harsh bark of laughter that tore from her into a coughing fit, albeit not very convincingly. “You guys were sweating my uncle? What did you think Ivan was going to do, build an organizational spreadsheet of doom?”

Not a bad recovery, at least. Better they think the joke was how comically non-dangerous he was than sniff out anything near the truth.

Austin took a more diplomatic approach, offering Ivan a hand to shake. “I apologize for the inconvenience, if we caused any.”

“Not for the act itself?” Ivan accepted the hand, even as he posed the question.

“No, sir. One of our residents has been targeted or endangered multiple times in short succession. I’m glad you were telling the truth; however, you easily might not have been. I’m not sorry for trying to protect this place or the people in it, and I won’t do you the disservice of lying about it.”

It didn't happen often. In fact, Ivan would say for a long time that it had happened never. On rare occasions, however, he'd get a feeling. Part hunch, part experience, potentially part cosmic connection to the greater forces of the universe. Gripping Austin's hand, looking into the young man's clear eyes, Ivan could sense the barest bit of that old feeling rising from within. A sensation like he was touching his opposite, coupled with recognition of the spirit brimming out from those eyes.

This kid was dangerous. Not in the ways so many of the others feared—raw strength that could be turned against them in force. No, what he had was more insidious, and ineffable. It radiated off of him, that genuine, earnest attitude that made people want to trust. Want to believe. A cape who could lift a mountain was an easy force to predict and contain; one who could inspire others to heroism had a far further reaching impact.

The world before and after Lodestar's arrival was proof enough of that.

Thankfully, Austin was young, and Ivan felt himself questioning the assessment almost as soon as the handshake ended. He had potential, the raw makings were there, but there was still a lot of growing to do before Agent Quantum became a major threat. Ivan would have to keep an eye on him, though. Today's rookies were tomorrow's veterans; the guild would be ready for conflict long before Agent Quantum was.

"I suppose there are worse neighbors than ones who keep an eye on suspicious characters," Ivan conceded.

"Tori's not just our neighbor, she's our friend," Austin corrected. "We'll do our best not to let anything happen to her."

It was a very nice sentiment, largely undercut by their inability to stop any of the attacks she'd suffered so far, not that Ivan could really blame them for those. Someone had been outmaneuvering both the guild and the AHC—expecting four rookies to outperform that went past ridiculous into outright silliness.

Tori made her way over, giving quick high-fives and farewells to Austin and Kyle, then followed Ivan as he led her to the car. Behind them, the heroic duo scooped up their groceries, finally heading indoors after their unexpected delay. Once Tori and Ivan were in the car, they remained silent, waiting until the capes were inside and fully out of view.

"What's up? Is this another day off thanks to the weekend's craziness? 'Cause if so, I think I'd like to head to my lab."

“Not this time. Something is happening, big enough that there’s no communications about it going out. We need to head to the guild and see what’s going on,” Ivan explained.

“Damn, now you’ve got me all curious.” Tori buckled her safety belt and adjusted the car’s air vent, lowering the output by half. “Also, I could have used a guild car. I know the weekend was nuts, but you didn’t have to drive all the way out here.”

Putting the vehicle in gear, Ivan pointed it toward the highway and steeled his courage. There was still a chance to back out, knowledge which forced his tongue to move, lest fear leave it locked in silence. “I picked you up because I thought you might have questions about... well, I’ll let you tell me. Given who one of those topics might be about, we can’t have the talk on guild property, and not many civilian locations are secure enough to discuss something so sensitive.”

Tightening his wheel-grip slightly, Ivan set his will and finished the statement. “This drive is in case you wanted to ask me about Lodestar.”

---

Chapter 93

---

It was so shocking, Ren had to blink and rub his eyes, despite their above-human vision. Sure enough, this was neither a hallucination nor imagined, which meant the next most likely explanations were a meta with body-possession, copying, or illusion-based abilities. Long shots, sure, but the other choice was to believe what he was seeing.

Donald Moss had beaten him to the gym.

Given the looks of things, not by a tremendous amount; the freckled, pale face of his friend was red, but not yet slick with sweat as he pushed on the weight machine working his chest. For a moment, Ren lingered at the edge of the room, still barely filled on a Monday morning, searching his mind. Had Donald ever even come here on his own before, let alone been first? Not that Ren could recall; it certainly would have stuck out in his memory.

Walking with more grace and precision than he could have dreamed of after his initial shift, Ren approached from the side, waiting until Donald let the bars fall slack and leaned against the seat, panting from effort. How hard had he been going already?

“Vanity, or ambition?”

“Huh?” Donald’s face roughly matched the words: bleary-eyed from the combination of a late night and an early morning, along with the surprise arrival of his friend. Ren hadn’t slept great either, not after what they’d learned, but he’d plainly done better between the two of them.

“That’s not a maintenance workout, and it’s not you going through the motions to appease me. This is the first time I’ve seen you in here with actual drive. Usually, that means someone either decided to sculpt their body, aka vanity, or they found a goal to work for, which I simplified to ambition.”

A moment passed before Donald managed to sort the words and put together a proper response. “Fear, I guess.” He tried to shove the machine’s bars forward, struggling in vain; he’d gone too hard already, and now the current weight was beyond him. “Or maybe frustration? Every time I feel like we’re making headway in this job, something reminds me how weak I am. Not being able to help Tori, not being able to stop Hephaestus, and then last night’s announcement... there’s an invasion coming. People are going to be looking to me to do something about it, trusting me to keep them safe. This isn’t busting muggers or doing patrols, Ren. This is war from the stars, and I’m a guy who turns video game items temporarily real. I couldn’t sleep, and doing nothing was worse, so I came here.”

Sometimes, there were perks to an empty gym, such as unexpected honesty. Given how Donald had opened up, Ren could offer nothing less than his own truth. “I get it. It’s really terrifying, when you realize we’re part of the line that has to hold. I’m not sure it scares me in the same way, but I do get the drive that kicks in when you feel yourself up against a wall and want to be better.”

“Maybe once I get half as strong as you, the fear will ease up a bit,” Donald joked.

“You think I’m not as afraid because I’m tougher?” Ren looked around, taking note of the few other bodies present and their current distance. He was pretty sure none of them had meta-hearing, but sometimes, it had to be risked. “Donald, I’m less scared because this job... this is all I have. My life, my dreams, even my body got taken away when that meta-storm struck. One day, you might take those talents and do something else, find another way to help, move on to a new phase of life. This, right here, is the best it gets for something like me: still able to help, to make a difference, to matter. There’s no leaving that behind. I’ll be in this work until the day I fail. It’s easier not to be afraid when I already know this job will kill me. It’s just a question of how much good I can do before it does.”

Donald reached out and grabbed the machine’s bars once more, though rather than trying to push, he used his already weary arms to pull himself up, out of the seat. Fully standing, he turned to face his friend in the eye. “Dude, that is messed up.”

“Pardon?” Ren’s inhuman face twisted around, making his version of surprise.

“This is all you have? All you’re good for? To hell with that. What we do here matters a lot, but you’re not some battery to be used up and cast aside for it. I am sorry, man. I didn’t realize how hard things still were for you. Been too caught up in my own dumb shit to notice. But the AHC can’t be your whole life, and I’m going to help you be okay with that, whatever route it takes. We can even start hunting for a way to reverse the changes. Just because the AHC lacks one doesn’t make it impossible.”

A night of sleepless anxiety, unknown time sweating at the gym, and Donald’s mental state hadn’t improved one bit. Less than a minute of having a friend’s problem to focus on, and suddenly he was newly alert and engaged. It was strange. Cyber Geek clearly felt unsure in a position of leadership, likely because he didn’t have the same talent for combat that some on the team did. Yet in terms of valuing his people, listening to them and considering how they felt, Donald was head and shoulders above countless coaches Ren had suffered through. The guy was like a brace on the other side of a wall: easy to miss, but the support made everything he touched sturdier.

“Thanks. Maybe I need to hear that sometimes. That said, we should table that idea until after the attempted invasion. This seems like a good week to stay focused on the job.”

While Donald’s face didn’t look thrilled, he nodded all the same. “Can’t argue well against that. Guess it’s time to climb back into this contraption.”

Ren snagged his arm, hooking a clawed thumb over to the free weight. “Forget it. Now that you’ve got a spotter, we’re doing the bench. If you’re really here to work, I’ll show you how to safely get stronger.”

With an exaggerated bow, Donald moved from the machine. “Part of me already knows I’ll regret this, but lead the way.”

“For the most part, I think I’ve got the basics figured out. She’s the Starscout contact you kept mentioning, so after that night with Haywood, you went to see Helen, who pitched leading the cluster as penance. Ostensibly, Lodestar is also there because putting Fornax in charge of impressionable youths would rub people who don't know you the wrong way. The rest sort of falls into place from there, but one thing I haven't figured out yet is why I'm in this, too."

Ivan had remained silent as Tori considered the opportunity and put together a response, only speaking once the pause in Tori's words stretched long enough to be sure it implied a question. "That was Helen's idea. She knew you were at Haywood's office somehow—the AHC has their tricks, as well—and wanted you to get the same lesson: actions have consequences."

Had Ivan dropped that bomb before the first Starscout meeting, Tori might have had a hard time wrapping her head around that as motivation. Even now, her first instinct was to assume it was a trick, part of a larger plan to learn more about her abilities and whether or not she was a threat. But after the weekend she'd spent at Helen's side, Tori understood. Lodestar wanted her to see that there were consequences because she was still hoping to turn Tori away from the path she was on. That thought raised a sudden memory, which created quite the new question.

"Did you know she pitched the idea of me switching over to the capes?"

"Not specifically, but I'm also unsurprised, if that's what you're wondering. Teams change. While usually more tend to flow in our direction than the other, there is precedence. We'd have a few securities put in place, some mental blocks to keep you from accidentally letting anything slip; otherwise, it's a fairly simple process for where you are. Someone like Johnny or Pod Person might have more trouble, but you're only just starting out. Not even an official criminal record yet."

Considering that, Tori could see how it would be viable, yet for all the work joining the guild had taken, could leaving really be that easy? "Guess I'm just surprised you don't put up more of a fight."

Staring in the rearview for several moments, Ivan suddenly changed lanes, then returned to normal speed. "Given your passion for technology, I'm sure you've heard of Tyranny, the inventor who rules over her own country of Indroga."

"Sure. Possibly the greatest meta mind out there, only no one can be sure because Indroga has a massively strict immigration and visitation policy, so we've never gotten a good look at her full potential. She doesn't even allow capes to set foot on Indroga soil."

“Almost,” Ivan corrected. “She has one exception: only Lodestar is allowed on Indroga. I had occasion to ask her why that was, once. Her answer is very fitting for this current, and quite a few subsequent, questions. Best as I recall, she said, ‘A ruler must have absolute power over their domain. All that occurs within it occurs with their permission. I cannot stop Lodestar from coming, nor do I think any bureaucracy would halt her if she knew there were people in need. Therefore, since she may arrive regardless, and I am Indroga’s ruler, she must be arriving with my permission.’”

Not a hard story to see the parallels in, especially given her question. When one was facing an overwhelming force, it was often a matter of choosing battles. Yes, the guild could dig in and be shitty if one of their own opted to start doing good, but what would that gain them? Ire from the capes, and a member ripe for turning to treachery. And since it wouldn’t look very good to have the AHC dictating terms, deciding it was a mutual policy allowed the guild to save internal face.

“At some point, I definitely want to circle back and hear more about you actually talking to Tyranny.”

“I’ll save you the time: she was cordial enough, but our conversation centered largely on dealing with capes, many of whom aren’t even around anymore. She and Wade had a far more productive discussion that day, if you can ever get him to part with specifics.” Another change of lanes, this time paired with acceleration.

Weird driving and inventor tangents aside, Tori tried to focus in on anything she wondered specifically regarding Helen’s secret. Other conversations could continue; this one had a shelf-life. Since Ivan had been so forthcoming, and Tori wasn’t one to beat around a bush, she decided to just go all in on the obvious.

“Do you love Lodestar?”

“Whether they know it or not, everyone loves Lodestar, in the same way every blade of grass loves the sun. She has single-handedly saved the entire world several times, including all life on it. It’s coded into all nature to seek and love the things that keep you alive.”

“I’ve never seen a blade of grass and the sun spend ten minutes making flirty small talk over a bin full of paper mâché,” Tori countered. “You’re going to tell me there’s nothing there?”

“Not nothing, no.” Ivan was checking his mirrors more frequently, and Tori was starting to do the same. Something was off, even if he didn’t want to address it openly. “Respect, friendship, even trust. There’s a tremendous amount of history between Helen and me. Some things are bound to be built atop such a rich foundation.”

It was a nice spiel, the kind that almost made one overlook the fact that Ivan had never actually come out and denied Tori’s accusation. She decided to let it go for now. The point wasn’t to make Ivan sweat with a discussion about feelings, it was to answer her questions and get a clear head.

“She already knew who I was, so I guess nothing has changed in that department. You two have your own thing. Pretty sure I don’t want to dig much deeper into that can of worms. I guess my main question left would be... is she for real? The concern, the caring, the way she sees things: I have a hard time believing it’s not at least partially an act, but I never saw anything other than sincerity from her. Now that I know her power conceals her identity, I wanted to know if there was a chance that was fake, too.”

“Hmm.” Ivan’s hands drummed the wheel, stopping only once to suddenly jerk the car around a slowed van in front of them rather than reduce speed. “Technically, it is possible that this is one more aspect of the abilities, though it’s highly unlikely. I believe I’ve mentioned that Lodestars are consistent across all the universes we’ve scanned, and part of it is that they’re always trying to do good. Not always Helen’s exact brand, that shifts with who holds the power, but they are, at minimum, attempting to work on the side of right. For them all to be fake, the power would have to have no failings in any world we’ve checked, and then you’d have to ask yourself why? What’s the point of pretending to be good if you spend your life saving the world anyway, and at that point, is it even still pretending?”

“I get it, I get it. Morality is hard to gauge in any real sense, but so far as we know, her actions consistently match her attitude.” Tori rubbed her left temple, aware the day would end in a headache, yet fighting it off for as long as she could. “Guess this is why we stick to smashing skulls instead of saving worlds.”

The exit came fast, but Ivan was ready, jerking the car off the highway, on track to the country club they’d be teleporting out of. “Actually, I did save a world once. Sort of. Not this one... got summoned by mistake, but the experience was more fulfilling than one might expect.”

“Wait, what? Forget Lodestar—the hell happened there?”

“Story for another time, I’m afraid. We’re being followed, and I wasn’t able to shake them.”

For an instant, Tori's skin went cold. More attacks, more chaos, more madness, and she'd barely had time to even partially recover from the last. Then, slowly, warmth returned as she remembered that this was no scouting trip stocked with innocent children. To her knowledge, there was only one other meta who could be a real threat to the villain seated next to her, and Lodestar wouldn't need a crappy sedan to follow them in. This was a pothole in their road, not a gaping chasm to leap.

"Should we floor it?"

"Scraping them from our heels was ideal, but the time for that has passed." Ivan's face darkened, and Tori quickly remembered that he'd also had a very shitty weekend, and that currently, they had no clue which of them was the target being tailed.

"Running is for prey. Our kind lay ambushes."

---

Chapter 94

---

Their tantrum reached a fever pitch as the camera equipment was torn open, electronic guts dropped roughly onto the gravel. On the television screen, Tori watched as the country club security roughly grabbed one of the photographers that had been on their tail as he lunged for the camera, slamming him to the ground and beginning to administer zip ties.

“This is really legal?” It wasn’t that she didn’t enjoy watching a pair of parasites being pulled from their car and having their belongings carelessly searched, but it did seem the sort of thing that might come with consequences.

“They drove past multiple signs informing them they were entering private property, with no trespassing permitted and all vehicles subject to search. Given that they were tailing you, a person who has endured multiple attacks in a very short time, it’s natural we assume them to be criminals as well and thoroughly check their belongings for hidden weapons or explosives. Resisting the process can only lead to them being detained until the police can arrive to scoop up this refuse.” Ivan managed a straightforward tone, despite the not-so-subtle smirk inching along his face.

“I’m just sorry you’re still having to deal with this. I’d hoped the fervor would fade quickly. Seems they’re either doggedly determined or news you were at the Starscout incident has started to leak.” Though they’d done their best to hide the names of those involved, when the bulk of the witnesses were young children, some were going to make slips when asked the right question.

The second paparazzi attempted to make a run, bolting to where one of the guards was yanking out what looked to be an extremely expensive video camera. He grabbed for the equipment, managing to actually pull it away, thanks to the element of surprise. It fared far worse seconds later, as it went flying from his arms, shattering while its owner fell to the ground shuddering, body filled with electrical current. Only once the guard he'd robbed stopped holding down the trigger on his tazer did the twitching at last relent.

"Believe it or not, this kind of works for me. I've got some big plans coming up, and still being part of the public consciousness is in my favor for them. Speaking of, I need to talk with Wade soon. Think he'll be around base today?" With the show winding down, Tori turned from the monitors to the rest of the security room.

It wasn't the actual security wing of this building, rather the mundane one that had existed in its original incarnation. Closed-camera TVs lining the walls, stacks of electronics poorly organized and maintained, even a guard with drooping eyes leaning back in his chair, keeping a sleepy watch on everything happening. Seeing as this employee, like the vast majority of others, was secretly robotic, how open his eyes were didn't actually impact his capacity to do the job. It was simply a small touch of detail. That level of care into every project was part of why Tori admired Doctor Mechaniacal's skills in the first place.

"Wade will definitely be here, though you might have trouble catching him free." Ivan glanced down at his watch, noting that they'd spent a tad longer than they should have enjoying the show. "I've got a meeting with him and the other councilors momentarily, after which, I'll bring you up to speed. While I'm there, I'll see about your meeting... just don't expect anything today."

"Perfect for me. Only looking to get something on the books again. I'm not quite ready either." Tori's mind jumped back to her prototype, now nearly complete. Much as she wanted her suit repaired, she'd also have to make time to properly polish that up. One generally didn't get multiple pitches to multi-billion-dollar corporations, not even with secret villain connections.

Together, they walked through the resort, into the secured teleportation chamber, and crossed untold miles in a single flash. Once at the guild, Tori opted to go grab a breakfast she wouldn't have to pretend to eat while covertly tossing out the window, while Ivan headed up to his meeting—past the residences, the utility rooms, the lounges, all the way to the new Councilors’ Chambers.

He was, in a rare anomaly, the last to arrive. Morgana looked tanner since they’d last seen one another—evidently, she was spending a lot of time at the new guild with its ample sunshine. Gork and Xelas were seated next to one another, the latter swiping a hand through the air as she browsed unseen screens. Arcanicus was holding what Ivan deemed to easily be the largest mug of coffee he’d ever seen, his bleary eyes betraying why. Stasis was clad in a surfing outfit, her post-meeting plans very apparent, whereas Wade himself looked as if he was going into the Indigo Technologies offices, clad in tan slacks and a crisp shirt.

It was rare to see Wade like that while in these halls. Knowing him, it meant he’d gotten some new piece of information in his civilian outfit and had been too excited to even consider changing, or probably showering. Although it was a habit that could make Wade hard to room with, it also meant he was good at finding answers, devoting himself entirely to whatever question was currently occupying his brain.

The outfit was one tip-off, the look in his eyes another. It wasn’t often that Ivan saw that expression, but when he did, it meant things were about to get extremely complicated, and equally as dangerous.

“Good, we can finally start,” Wade said. “Ivan, please shut the door. There’s a lot we need to talk about.”

Zerle Salvryn’s subganwum sacks swelled with pleasure as the orb filled his screen. Blue and green, quite picturesque—if one went in for that sort of thing. He held no particular passion for the aesthetics. What tickled his yerkle were the readings they’d taken from that captured Grzzniltan ship. One of his clawed fingers ran along a panel of dark metal, turning the screen from a picture to a display of that lovely, lucrative data.

Oceans of water, huge tracks of land, an ore-rich core, and billions of lesser lifeforms to serve or feed upon as their talents dictated. A civilization nearing the verge of galactic travel, ripe for the plucking. The Grzzniltans were turned away by a few mere guardians, cowards that they were. Earth would not be so fortunate when it faced the Wrexwren fleet moving toward them.

Two of Zerle Salvrin's eyes kept watch on the communications channel, always waiting for a fresh transmission. Their mysterious Earth informant wasn't the most constant information source, yet what they'd provided thus far had proved valuable. Without the initial broadcast, Zerle Salvrin might never have sent a crew to intercept that Grzzniltan vessel in the first place, leaving this gorgeous celestial pulvin completely unflugged. It was also thanks to their informant that the Wrexwren knew Earth had a special defense, a seemingly unbeatable force.

Changing the screen once more, Zerle Salvrin checked the dispersal of plasma his ships were carefully leaking. One couldn't tame, control, or even direct creatures like that which was following in their wake. All they knew was hunger: perfect machines of function, to Zerle Salvrin's reasoning. The only way to use one was to lead it to the planned destination and turn it into someone else's problem. Whatever supposedly unstoppable defenses the planet had, this would neutralize them nicely.

In a way, Zerle Salvrin was glad this planet had some capacity to put up a fight. His crew had faced far too little adversity in recent conquests, enemies falling like the shards of eslewright that rained down on the Wrexwren's desolate homeworld. Lack of challenge would make them soft. He hoped the Earth would manage to put up enough resistance to demand some effort, though in truth, he expected little. A planet so coddled and cared for would cause most of its inhabitants to lose their edge. Once their champions were broken, the world was essentially done.

Not long to wait, now. They were on course to reach Earth at the appointed moment. They could have arrived weeks early, but the messages were quite specific about the timing, claiming that there was preparation to do. Zerle Salvrin didn't entirely trust this source; however, he also didn't want to alert it to that fact by ignoring the agreed upon plans. They would play along while the source proved to be useful. Once that function lessened, circumstances could be reevaluated. After all, it wasn't as if Zerle Salvrin had told their contact the actual number of Wrexwren ships in the approaching fleet.

By the time Earth realized it was in danger, the conquest would already be done.

In his life, Ivan had seen a great many things. He'd gone briefly to the stars, wandered other worlds, and walked many realms hidden within their own plane. Yet even with his wealth of experience, the sight on-screen caused his heart to hammer. This wasn't just big, wasn't just bad; it was raw, absolute destruction.

Ivan could recognize his metaphorical kin when he saw them. An invasion was one thing—it had certain goals and plans, most of which centered on keeping the planet intact overall as it was being overtaken. This was different. These aliens weren't planning to leave more than a used-up husk behind. They didn't care about losing resources in the name of efficiency. The Wrexwren weren't coming to take over Earth, they wanted to strip it down to the studs.

"Given the new situation, it's safe to say the AHC are not prepared for what they'll actually be facing." Wade was still somehow calm, despite the rundown he'd just delivered on the threats currently en route to Earth.

"Most of our people are already planning to be on the ground in the event Wrexwren troops start landing—nothing changes much on that front. The bigger question is what we do about this new intel. While I recognize that we and the AHC are not on our best terms, protecting the planet we live on generally supersedes such momentary grudges."

"You want to tip them off?" Morgana proposed.

"Fuck that. After what Apollo pulled? It'd be good for the AHC to get publicly pantsed again." Xelas, despite her harsh words, didn't sound particularly passionate in her pettiness. "I'm on board with helping keep Earth safe, but we're not their spies or messengers. Let's not start acting like it."

Wade changed the screen, revealing a series of images showing various terrains with specific sections marked. "I'm with Xelas on that front. If they want our help, then they'll at least have to acknowledge it happened. Currently, we have several space-capable weapons locked on the approaching fleet. Attacking preemptively is still an option—break their formation and make them panic. But it risks them turning tail, only to come back better prepared, and again, the AHC can spin things as they see fit. Alternatively, we could sit on our weapons until the ships arrive, then add our firepower to the fray. We won't have the advantage of surprise, however, so active defenses will cut down on how well the attacks work."

It was forming, no matter how Ivan wished it wouldn't: the path to victory, the way ahead, that determination to come out on top that had helped him survive his eighteen straight years of hell. There was a plan coming together, spurred on in no small part by Janet's words still ringing through his mind. "The surprise is obviously for Lodestar. They're hoping to take away Earth's superhero before any sort of duel could officially start. Professor Quantum would never put himself in a position that vulnerable, so he won't step up. Quorum might, but he's also the weakest of the three in combat. They'll either send in someone tough enough to buy time, or give up on the duel entirely, focusing on the armies themselves."

"Tracks with their historical tactics." Gork nodded her large gray head solemnly as she agreed. Her people lived far, far below the planet's surface, meaning that this invasion wouldn't impact them for quite some time. But in a planetary-wide looting, sooner or later, every stone got turned over.

"Seems Ivan and I had a similar train of thought," Wade added. Another slide clicked over, this one showing tech-specs that went sailing right over Ivan's head, but that garnered a whistle from Xelas. "I've reached out to every extraterrestrial contact we have and begun work on a welcome gift for our visitors. Assuming it's completed in time, I would still need proximity to use it. If we were to send our own envoy, along with a champion, it would be a perfect distraction while I put our new tool to work."

Loud slurping from Arcanicus and his oversized mug momentarily broke the tension. He glared right back at several of the looks he received. "What? Does anyone actually think I'm the one getting tapped for this? It's obviously a task for Xelas or Gork—possibly Morgana, if these things have blood."

"I'd prefer to have Xelas with me—should cut down on how long we need." Wade pointedly didn't look at Ivan as he continued. "Whoever we take should be able to withstand some damage. We don't have a firm idea of how strong the Wrexwren are, but it's safe to assume we'll get one of their best, considering the stakes."

When Ivan stood, the room went silent. Now Wade was looking in his direction, old friends staring at one another, trying to figure out what the other was thinking. "There's only one choice. We need someone who can endure, can hurt, can survive against nearly any odds. Remember, technically, we're still betting the planet on this fight. Makes sense to try and win."

"Are you sure about this?" Wade asked. "Working as Pseudonym in the shadows is one thing—everyone in the world will be watching when the invasion comes. The AHC will absolutely have some sort of video gear with them; they'd never let PR like this pass undocumented. Depending on what happens and how much is caught, this is a fight where the identity could be easily compromised."

"Then it's a good thing I wasn't proposing Pseudonym take them on." Ivan shut his eyes, not trusting them to remain human in that moment. What Janet had said was true. People weren't scared of him anymore, not of some dusty old monster from the past. They were getting bold enough to come for him, and his children. White-hot rage spiked in Ivan, and he didn't cool it down so much as set it to the side. Fury had ample uses in the right moments, and it seemed he'd be getting such a chance very soon. Because if the world thought they didn't need to be afraid, then he'd just have to remind them why that terror had existed in the first place.

"If they decide to try to step around Lodestar, then the bastards can face Fornax instead."

---

Chapter 95

---

Tori found the guild in a lively state upon her arrival. Since the move, she'd been seeing her fellow villains sporadically; it wasn't quite the default clubhouse the old location had been. Yet today, as she helped herself to a breakfast burrito, it was impossible not to notice all the faces, both new and familiar, dotting the halls. Heading to grab some coffee, she found herself in line behind a pair she knew quite well.

"France? You really want to wait in France? Just because they always go for the Eiffel Tower at some point in the movies doesn't mean the real ones bother with landmarks." Johnny Three Dicks rapped a knuckle against Thuggernaut's sizable shoulder, the closest Johnny could get to reaching his head. "You want the biggest population centers you can find. Absolutely going to be a target, and if you don't find any cool alien stuff, there's always looting the normal stores in the chaos."

"You use whatever tactics suit your needs best," Thuggernaut replied. "I've been wanting to visit a good open-air market for weeks. This is a chance to go early and knock out two errands in one trip."

Johnny grumbled, but Tori would bet that when the dust settled, they'd both end up in France. For as much as Johnny talked, he was smart enough to stay near his much larger, more intimidating friend.

Since she saw an opening in the conversation, Tori coughed loudly before asking, "Did someone say aliens? Are the Grzzniltans coming back?"

Thuggernaut and Johnny both turned, expressions softening when they recognized who was speaking. Johnny's sour mood quickly shifted into a mischievous grin. “Well, well, if it isn’t Pseudonym’s old apprentice. Decided to take a break from being the damsel du jour?”

“I really fucking hope so.” Tori’s response came out a bit more honest than she intended, so she hurried onward. “Next thing I invent might be a giant firebomb I keep with me at all times. Be a fun surprise for the dumbfucks that try to grab me next.” Actually, that wasn’t a half-bad idea—she made a mental note to see how viable it was. “Anyway, what was that about aliens?”

While Johnny feigned a confused look, Thuggernaut merely nodded. “Given the potential danger of the outing, only the more experienced members were initially brought up to speed, but I expect that to change soon. The guild has been tracking several alien ships heading toward Earth. We suspect there’s an invasion afoot.”

The shock on Tori’s face was both evident, and completely ignored by Johnny as he took the chance to reinvigorate their prior debate. “That’s right, a whole swarm of new marks bringing their favorite goodies for us to snatch. Which is why we should go bigger. No telling how long before they wise up and flee. Have to grab as much as we can while it’s here.”

“Hang on... are you guys kidding?” Much as Tori wanted to hope for that outcome, both seemed serious, or as serious as a man named Johnny Three Dicks could manage.

“Not in the slightest.” Finally, Johnny seemed to register the uncertain fear in Tori’s face, his own smile growing wider in response. “Oh my, are you worried? How fun! It’s been so long, I’ve kind of forgotten how that feels. Pulse racing? Starting to get the sweats?”

“Enough.” Thuggernaut’s voice was calm, but brooked no objections as he silenced his friend. “Sorry. Sometimes, after you’ve been in this world for so long, you forget what it’s like to be new. Johnny is right in one regard, though, you really don’t need to worry. Ever since we first learned aliens existed, both the AHC and the guild have prepared for these possibilities. It’s not even Earth’s first attempted takeover.”

He was right. Tori had read up on the prior attempts for herself here and there. Forcibly, she took control of the terror that had reared its head, shoving it aside until she could think more clearly. Her view had been that of a civilian, if not an outright human, fearful of this newly discovered threat. She’d reacted like prey rather than recognizing what else the aliens represented: opportunity. As a predator, what she could see was something slithering in, unprepared for the native beasts already lying in wait.

“Is there a betting pool for how long before they go screaming off into the night?” Tori asked.

“Oooh, look at our optimist here.” Johnny stepped forward, the coffee machine finally opening up as he jammed his mug underneath. “The Wrexwren making a successful escape is currently one of the long shot bets, so if you’d like to toss some money on it, I can give you decent odds.”

Tempting, though it was always better to have things spelled out to the letter with Johnny. “What defines a successful escape?”

“Retreat with greater than fifty percent of the original forces.” Thuggernaut didn’t even have to mentally dig around—he had that tidbit ready to go, a subtle tip-off that perhaps Johnny had been trying to coax others toward this wager, as well. “In this case, we’ll be counting whatever they land with.”

“There’s also decent money to be made in the twenty-five to fifty percent range,” Johnny added. He moved over to the sugar station, grabbing a handful of various artificial sweetener packets seemingly at random. “Once you get lower than that, we leave the long shot area, and you’ll see a steep drop in payout.”

While Thuggernaut took his turn at the coffee machine, Tori flipped the situation around in her head. At the end of the day, it was a question of who she thought was stronger: the Earth and its metas, or this extraterrestrial force coming toward them. It was always possible they were outgunned, but if that truly were the case, if these things could overtake people like Lodestar and Fornax, then there was no fight to be had. Earth would be wiped out, likely in a day, and no amount of Tori’s fretting would change that. Power at those levels was beyond her ability to deal with, currently.

“Any advice for someone who’s apparently about to go through her first invasion?” It seemed prudent to get some guidance from those who’d been there before, and her selection in that range was deeply limited.

Surprisingly, Johnny’s expression shifted, turning almost serious. “Be on your guard, and with people you trust. Us being collectively stronger doesn’t mean each of us can defeat each of them. Use every advantage, and take nothing for granted. Don’t ruin the fun by making us have a funeral after.”

His gravity was jarring, enough to remind Tori that these stakes were still life and death. Having powers and the guild didn't change that; they just gave her a better chance to survive. "I'll talk to Glyph, Pest Control, and Bahamut. Guessing they'll be in the same boat, and we can watch out for one another."

"A fine idea," Johnny agreed, instantly softening back to his usual countenance. "The next step would be to determine where you want to wait out the invasion. Somewhere cool and hip—say, the middle of downtown New York—or out in a big, open area with a giant metal art display."

"Your lack of appreciation for art doesn't remove its inherent value." Thuggernaut and Johnny were back in their fight, absentmindedly wandering away from the machine as Tori filled her mug.

As if her week hadn't already been slammed enough, now she had a potential alien invasion to worry about. Part of her wondered why Ivan hadn't told her yet, before realizing that she'd probably stumbled on the very reason they were here today. At least if Wade didn't have time to meet, she would definitely know not to take it personally.

Even for a genius like Doctor Mechaniacal, countering an invasion was one hell of a side project.

Ridge City Grinders was slammed. Chloe had no idea if it was the new Electric Conga Cappuccino they were shilling that month or just an especially caffeine-demanding Monday, but her morning had rapidly turned into a blur of grinding, pouring, and handling customers. Most were coping all right with the excessive line, others less so.

"Still waiting on that large latte." The watch he was tapping against the counter cost easily more than any car Chloe had owned, and he definitely knew its value. From suit to shoes, the whole outfit was meant to convey wealth and authority, personality traits that had evidently drifted into his capacity for polite waiting, as well.

Glorious as it would have been to work some small errors into the order, that would only delay things further; he was absolutely the type to kick up a fuss. Putting the final touches on the foam, Chloe set the drink down directly in front of him, motioning to the accessories as she did. “Thank you for your patience, sir. Sugar is on the table, as are lids and straws.”

“Lids,” he scoffed, grabbing the drink roughly. “I’m not a child or an imbecile. I think I can handle—”

It was truly perfect. Mid-sentence, the cup seemed to suddenly slip in his hand, tipping over toward him. All down the silk shirt and tailored suit the near-boiling coffee ran, drawing screams of both pain and horror from him as he suddenly leapt back. The coffee cup, now all but empty, clattered to the ground in front of him, one final nail in the coffin of his humiliation.

Despite knowing better, Chloe couldn’t resist. “There are also napkins, in case you have a spill.”

The laughter was quick and contagious, rippling outward like a mocking stone dropped in a lake. There was barely enough time to see the rage and shame in his eyes before he bolted from the shop.

“That guy is definitely going to beat an intern before lunch is over.”

That voice was familiar, though unexpected here. Chloe glanced up and realized that Ike and Ellie were in line, the former still chuckling to himself.

“He seems like at least the type to call a manager. If he complains, let us know. We can attest that you were nothing but professional,” Ellie added.

“Thanks, but there’s cameras all over since the Ridge City Riots. I’m sure we’ve got footage that shows him spilling on himself.” Even as the words left Chloe’s mouth, she found herself doubting them. The way he’d lost control of his cup was very strange, almost like someone had moved it while in his grip, causing the container to go tumbling over. “That is what they’ll see, right?”

Ike met her gaze without hesitation, offering little more than a shrug. “Sure what it looked like to me. Certainly what the dude deserved, right?”

At his side, Ellie leaned slightly over Ike, turning suspicious. “I suppose, in that case, we could call it karma. Karma that in no way should be emboldened by this and start doing it frequently.”

“I doubt it will be an issue. Seems to only happen when people are dicks to someone I like.”

“You don’t like anyone,” Ellie pointed out.

“I like Chloe. She shoots straight and doesn’t take bullshit. More people had that attitude, I might not be such a misanthrope.” Ike punctuated the statement with a wink, a gesture that Chloe might have found less endearing several minutes prior.

“Says a man who refuses to just admit what he really feels,” Chloe replied.

That earned an actual laugh from Ike, along with a snap of the fingers. “See what I mean? Even after that, she refuses to let me skate. Great stuff.”

“Sorry about... all of this.” Ellie looked back to the sizable line still stretching out behind them, and the other baristas working hard to clear it. “We should probably order and get out of your hair.”

“Hope you’ve still got some warm fuzzies in our direction, because this order is massive.” To his credit, Ike wasn’t overselling the list he pulled from his pocket; it filled up the front and back of a large sheet of paper.

Looking it over, Chloe noted that since the drinks were built over function rather than form, she could make the bulk of it in batches. There were a lot of high-potency drinks on the list, though, stuff generally only ordered by the true addicts, like Tori.

“I can put this together, just going to take a minute. You must be bracing for one hell of an all-nighter.”

There was unquestionably a look exchanged between Ellie and Ike, one that Chloe pointedly chose not to follow up on. Whatever secrets they had were probably AHC-related, and Chloe was more than happy being on the outside of that loop. The more she saw of both sides of the cape-villain coin, the more joy she found in her normal life and job. Ultimately, it was Ellie who spoke, likely not trusting Ike to avoid dropping some manner of hint.

“It’s safe to say that a lot of people won’t be getting much sleep this week.”

By the time Ivan found her, Tori had finished breakfast, done quite a bit of chatting with other guild members, and generally gotten a good grasp of what was heading their direction. An invasion was coming, enough that the guild was expecting troops to land and planning to lie in wait for them. Nobody seemed especially scared about Earth actually losing, which aligned well with Tori’s own deductions. Either their champions could handle it, or the planet would be crushed. At those higher tiers of power, there was no middle ground.

“Done?” Ivan asked. He didn’t sit at the small table where she was clacking away on a tablet, an indication that this would be a walk-and-talk conversation.

“Depends. Do you mean with eating, or with finding out about the invasion you didn’t bother bringing me in on?”

“Both, but mostly the latter. I assumed this would be faster than me explaining, and then you digging around behind my back anyway.” Evidently, Ivan took her response to be confirmation, as his brisk pace resumed.

Tori briefly scrambled, throwing the tablet under her arm as she hopped off the stool and gave chase, catching up to him shortly. “You still could have gotten me up to speed before now. Seems like the whole guild except me had the heads up.”

“All newer members of the guild were left out of that loop. None of you have faced a substantial enough threat to have an accurate combat rating, and we don’t have time to get you trained up before this invasion arrives.” Ivan’s words hesitated, even as his feet continued without pause. “Perhaps some part of me also imagined that keeping you in the dark would hold you apart from the danger such an invasion represents.”

“Gave up on that idea?” Tori found the notion hard to imagine. Ivan sure didn’t seem like he’d gotten less protective after the weekend’s incident.

“In a way. I’ve realized that my power alone is not enough to protect the people I care for. Had help not been with us for the Starscout incident, the outcome could have been very different. You, alone, might have been killed by those traps and challenges, or we may have lost some of the children in our care. All of which represents a failing on my part.”

They came to a stop in front of an elevator. Ivan led her inside. Once there, he tapped a sequence into the buttons, sending the mechanism diagonally, rather than up and down. “I haven’t been nurturing your talents the way a mentor should. I taught you the code and survival first, and that was right, but since then, I was content to let you slowly find your own path. My hope was that you would reject this life, find a way back to normalcy. This weekend showed me the folly of that mindset. Unless you are powerful enough to survive our world, you’ll never have a chance to leave it behind.”

“Hang on, there. I don’t necessarily want to go whole hog into the guild,” Tori protested. “I like finding my own path. It’s the happiest I’ve been in a long time.”

“A journey you are welcome to continue. My concern is not the search for what to do with your life, but rather making sure you live long enough to complete it.” The elevator came to a stop, and Ivan punched in another set of numbers. This time, rather than moving, the doors opened to reveal a new room.

Tori’s breath caught in her throat at the sight of it. Gleaming metal, flashing screens, a wall stuffed with one strangely shaped tool after another. Tentatively, she stepped out, surveying her surroundings. “Ivan, this is a lab. Not a basement lair, not a retrofitted garage, a laboratory.” Her voice was caught somewhere between confusion and longing, not daring to approach even the edges of hope.

“Correction: it is your laboratory, rented for the next month, though the coming week is the most vital part of that. I expect to see Hephaestus’s armor back in working condition at least a day before the first wave of invasion is predicted to arrive.”

Given the equipment present, that would be a relatively simple task. So much of the tedium from her work could be automated or simplified with all of this at her fingertips. There might even be time for an upgrade or two, though she was hesitant to put in something untested before a potential fight. Still, the situation nagged at Tori; she didn’t trust when anything came too easily.

“Not that I don’t appreciate you getting me some nice digs, but mind if I ask why? Do you really expect me to get in danger during the invasion?”

“I do not,” Ivan told her. “Nor did I expect you to be taken from the street, or my daughter to end up stuck in a labyrinth. The time for being taken by surprise is at an end. From now on, we are the ones who deliver the shock. Next time something happens, we’ll be prepared. You’ll have your suit, and I’ll be ready to do what’s necessary.”

Tori could still remember how it felt being in there, watching Lodestar work, realizing how outclassed she was. If she’d had her suit, things would have been different. Tori would have had more options, could have contributed to the fight and gotten them home faster. Much scarier, however, was wondering how it would have gone if Helen hadn’t been around. Tori didn’t want to need the capes. She had to be capable of handling this insane life on her own. Although, a little help at the start was something she could make peace with.

“Got it. Work starts as soon as I haul over my gear. After the month, do I need to make arrangements with Doctor Mechanical to keep paying?”

Ivan merely shrugged. “You’ll have to ask him. He seemed to think you might wish for different facilities after that, depending on how your enterprise goes. Your meeting with Wade is set for Wednesday afternoon, by the way.”

That tracked. If they were starting something new together, then she might want a more public facility. A concern for later down the line; right now, Tori was staring down a pair of very imposing deadlines. She had a few days to get the prototype finished, and a couple more after that to ensure her meta-suit was in tip-top running condition.

With a gleeful crack of her knuckles, Tori set off to explore her new lab. It was time to get to work.

---

Chapter 96

---

He could still hear panting from that inhuman mouth, no matter how hard he ran. It was supposed to be a simple stickup—that couple had the look of a pair with more money than caution. But no sooner had the knife come into view than the creature dropped down from above. Had it been hiding on the rooftops, waiting for a juicy victim? There was no telling. New meta-animals popped up same as humans, each with their own powers and dangers.

All he'd known was that, when it roared, his legs moved. Bolting him from the scene so fast he'd dropped his weapon, racing with all he had, and making what felt like zero progress. Every turn, every street, it was on him. He dared not slow down enough to turn and look, but there were times he could swear there was hot breath splashing across the back of his neck. There was no thought, only running.

Until he hit the wall. In his defense, it was an unexpected obstacle, as this alley was supposed to open up into a wide street. Instead, a frozen blockade smashed against his body, sending him sprawling. There were walls of the same material on either side; only the way he'd come was still open. Spinning around, the would-be mugger prepared to keep running, just to be reminded of why he was fleeing in the first place.

Standing there, backlit by the streetlights, he could finally get a good view of his pursuer. Thick muscles, scales, even a tail: this was no single meta-animal, more like what a mad scientist would create with only a zoo for parts. That didn't make it any less terrifying as it stepped forward, low rumbling growl rising from deep within.

“I give up! I surrender! Somebody—capes, cops, help! He’s going to eat me!”

A slight wince in the approaching monster, before that growl turned into a rough, annoyed voice. “You’re in luck, buddy. I’m a superhero with the AHC, so you know what that means.”

A big, broad smile revealed a mouth stuffed full of fangs, each somehow larger and sharper than the one before. “It means they only let me eat the ones who don’t play nice.”

As Medley wrapped up their latest catch with help from Cold Shoulder, Cyber Geek and Hat Trick were seated on a bench, scrolling their AHC-issued phones, checking for any assignment updates. Direct communication was useful in battle, but for assignment coordination, it was hard to beat the convenience of screens and GPS.

“Sounds good. Yeah, we’ll be back at the incident point. Meet us when extraction has this one removed.” Cyber Geek finished his remote chat with Cold Shoulder, who was keeping an eye on things as Medley’s backup. Splitting the team was essential when it came to drawing out these sorts of criminals—few things were lured without bait—but he still disliked how it left them vulnerable. Not even Medley was allowed to run off on his own. Muggers could just as easily have meta abilities, too.

“What’s the plan now?” Hat Trick asked. She was, for the most part, unrecognizable as her superhero self, clad in a bright dress too summery for the cooling weather, along with a large designer coat. Hidden within its depths were her hat, wand, and a few other trinkets in case things took a turn for the dire, but on the outside, she looked to be nothing more than a normal woman on a nighttime stroll.

In a rare display of fashion, Cyber Geek matched her well, clad in slacks and a button-down more reminiscent of his cubicle days than his current position. He’d been dressed in a few high-end accessories as well, or at least excellent reproductions, since the AHC didn’t seem especially concerned about loaning them out. Together, the duo were playing the part of a couple lost in their affection for one another, blind enough to the world that they’d wandered into a place where dangerous people liked to hunt.

“Probably time to pack in for this operation. Getting so late we won’t be believable soon. Besides, I’ve seen you hurting in those heels, and I’m ready to get in my real uniform, too.”

“For the record, it’s not the heels,” Hat Trick said. “I can walk in heels when I have to, even if they aren’t my favorite. It’s these designer ones. I don’t think they were built for women with all their toes, or even a centimeter of extra ankle.”

She leaned against Cyber Geek’s shoulder as her hands worked to loosen the tight shoe-straps visibly digging into her flesh. When one latch finally gave, the whole thing seemed to pop, falling away in a series of snaps and straps he could never have hoped to reconstruct.

“Ohhhhhh, there it is. That’s the good stuff. Don’t suppose you’ve got any shoe-based items I could use?”

“Wish my power worked that way.” It would have been incredible, to outfit his team with an endless array of weapons and armor from across the world of gaming. Unfortunately, the items were only real for him. Losing contact with an item was no issue, yet when he tried to give one away, it quickly dissolved back into numbers and sparks. That was something they’d learned in the earliest of experiments, and while it was fun to dream of his power evolving that way over time, so far, there were no indications his ability had any potential to grow in that direction.

Shifting position, yet somehow still with her shoulder against him, Hat Trick released the second shoe with far less effort, scooping it up into her lap before digging around in her pocket. From the coat’s depths, she produced her wand, a single black rod with crisp white tips on either end: a magician’s wand, to go with the kit she’d purchased that had imbued her abilities. It was strange to imagine gaining powers that way, especially given that Cyber Geek had been nearly deep-fried when obtaining his. The sources of meta-abilities were nearly as varied as the powers themselves—one more reason to always be prepared for the unexpected.

“Not to worry. I’ve been working on something. Zesto-Chango-Outfit-Rearrangeo!” Hat Trick waved the wand as she spoke, ending with a flourish that tapped the tip of it against her left shoe’s heel. A burst of smoke exploded from the footwear, causing both undercover capes to cough and wave their hands.

Once the cloud cleared, Cyber Geek spotted a new pair of shoes waiting where the heels had been. Black, shiny, and made for the stage, Hat Trick had managed to change her designer footwear into the standard shoe of a tuxedo-clad magician.

“Drat. Been working on getting them cuter, but everything comes out like I’m about to step on a stage.” Hooking one of the shoes, Hat Trick slipped it easily onto her foot. “They do fit perfectly, though, and are surprisingly comfortable. I’d make you some, if they didn’t all come out in my size.”

“That’s still amazing.” Cyber Geek shook his head, part of him wanting to look around for where the original shoes had been hidden. Magic was fascinating. It played by its own rules even among the metas who wielded it. Evidently, that also made it harder to control than some other abilities, though Hat Trick had been making incredible strides. “I remember when you first started and didn’t even use the wand.”

“Well, I wouldn’t rely on it in a life-or-death situation, but it has proven to be a handy little tool,” Hat Trick admitted.

Watching her put on the second shiny shoe, a new thought occurred to Cyber Geek. “Wait, don’t you have to turn those back in? I signed out all of my fancy clothes and was warned to bring them back.”

“I’m sure Faldica will be mad at me, but maybe if the AHC would start keeping a wider array of sizes on hand for this, I wouldn’t have to transform them midway through the night.”

Cyber Geek wasn’t entirely sure what an appropriate reaction to that would be. While it was true that Hat Trick didn’t necessarily have the same frame many female superheroes aspired to, she never seemed bothered by the difference. Since the complaint didn’t seem to be coming from a place of insecurity, rather one of annoyance, she probably wasn’t looking for reassurance about her appearance, even if he had trusted himself to express such a sentiment without bumbling things into awkwardness, which he did not.

“I’ll see what I can file about equipment issues. Having the right gear for us to do the job is part of the AHC’s responsibility. If they can make outfits and tech for all the different types of metas we work with, it’s not unreasonable to expect them to have shoes that fit.”

Hat Trick flushed slightly, easy to spot on the pale skin between her freckles. “You don’t have to kick up a fuss on my account.”

“Someone on my team isn’t getting what they need to do their job safely. If that’s not worth kicking up a fuss over, what is?”

Her smile was swift and sudden, shining under the streetlight without warning, so earnest that Cyber Geek found himself looking away after only a few moments. “I suppose I can’t argue with our leader on that front. Maybe wait until next week, though. Given what’s coming, I think the AHC has bigger issues to focus on at the moment.”

It was a thought he’d been trying, and failing, to avoid since the announcement. Only a few days left, and the world would potentially be at war with outside invaders. They knew the fight was coming and were prepared, yet still Cyber Geek’s guts twisted when he dwelled on the nearing conflict. With people like Lodestar and Professor Quantum on their side, he had a feeling the Earth would come out victorious overall. But wars didn’t just impact the people at the top of the spectrum. There were billions of innocent people who could be swept up in the battle just as easily.

In essence, Cyber Geek wasn’t afraid of losing, so much as he was afraid of how much would be lost. That was why his downtime had been largely spent training with Medley. The big capes would take care of the major threats, but it would be on them to keep things safe on the streets. He wanted to be ready this time, or at least as ready as he could be.

“You make a fair point. We can take care of the complaint next week. Until then, we’ll stick to costumed patrols.”

“Uh huh. Just don’t go getting any ideas about signing us up for one tomorrow. Some of us need that occasional bit of downtime.” Hat Trick paused, looking around the empty night. “Speaking of, do you have any plans for your day off? I know Wednesdays aren’t exactly hopping, but it feels like we should all make good use of it. You know... just in case.”

Just in case they lost. Just in case the aliens were stronger than expected. It was a lot scarier, being on this side of the curtain, realizing how many threats he’d been able to live ignorant of by being a civilian. For all the stress it caused, Cyber Geek was pretty sure he preferred it this way. The Ridge City Riots had come out of nowhere, taking him entirely by surprise. A little warning wasn’t so bad, in comparison. Especially if it gave him the chance to tackle things he’d been putting off.

“Another excellent point,” Cyber Geek agreed. He was scanning the area, so he missed Hat Trick’s face lighting up, along with the slight opening of her mouth, as if to speak, before his own response continued. “In fact, there’s an appointment for coffee I’m well overdue for. Seems like a good reason to finally make that happen.”

He turned back to find Hat Trick wearing a soft grin, with the barest hint of lip caught by one of her upper teeth. “Sounds like a nice idea. I think I’ll make the trip to see some family during the day, probably spend that night hanging with the team.”

“I bet they’ll be overjoyed to—” Cyber Geek trailed off as his phone began to flash, signaling a new alert. “Crap, looks like we’ve got some sort of meta-bear sighted, and it’s near... okay, that has to be a joke.”

Checking her own phone, Hat Trick barely suppressed a giggle. “Nope, I’m seeing the same report. Ten feet tall, looks like a bear that’s been rolled in spines, and currently attacking a production center for the BingleBuzzle Honey Corporation out in Brigsby, Utah. Be honest, if we get there, what do you think the odds are it will be wearing a bright red shirt?”

“The real question is if it will only be wearing the red shirt,” Cyber Geek added. “This one will make Medley happy, if nothing else. He’s been complaining that he never gets a real workout in the field lately.”

“You think a mere ten feet of bear can challenge our boy?”

“No idea, but I’m willing to sit on the sidelines and cheer as we find out.” Cyber Geek tapped the alert on his phone, instantly connecting his earpiece with the appropriate AHC communications facilitator.

“Confirming, this is Cyber Geek. We’re already in Utah on patrols and can take the bear, just need rapid transport for my team.”

Heavy footsteps from nearby signaled to both of them that they weren’t alone any longer. Thanks to Medley’s sizable shadow, the mystery of who was nearing was quickly solved, as he and Cold Shoulder soon stepped into easy view. “Tell me we’ve got something interesting this time. I’m tired of slow-chasing these robbers into the iceboxes.”

“It does get tedious,” Cold Shoulder agreed.

“How about a giant meta-bear attacking a honey factory—that grab you as tedious?” Hat Trick countered.

“Grabs me as you having a laugh.” After a moment of looking at Hat Trick’s expression, Cold Shoulder lifted an eyebrow. “You’re serious?”

“The report is serious. We’ll see for ourselves soon enough if the situation is.” Cyber Geek had barely finished the words when there was a flash of light nearby.

Standing silently was a man clad in a simple, white cotton outfit. Catching a ride with an AHC asset was rarely the same experience twice—they had too many movement-metas aiding a huge staff in itself, so the odds of getting the same transportations frequently were slim. Upon arrival, this fellow motioned to the area around him, wordlessly indicating that proximity was required.

They headed toward him, Cyber Geek angling himself to arrive next to Medley. “How you holding up? Need a rest or anything?”

“After that chase? I don’t even consider myself warmed up, let alone gassed.” Medley’s claws flexed as he spoke, and his tail gave itself a good long stretch before settling back into position.

“Looks like someone is excited for a good brawl.”

“Are you kidding? A fight that might be an actual challenge, and not against another human or sentient creature I’ve got to hold back against? I’m not just excited, I can bear-ly contain myself.”

There was just enough time for Cyber Geek to give his friend a dirty look before the light flashed once more, leaving nothing more than an empty street and a single silver buckle that had broken off a designer shoe.

---

Chapter 97

---

“I don’t give a shit what Gram-Gram says, you need to trust me.” Beverly had spent a great deal of effort post-confluence gaining control of her new transforming powers. That was why she was able to still be in human form, not even dragon enough to accidentally shatter the phone in her hand, as the argument dragged on.

“Cancel the damn trip. This isn’t the weekend for apple-picking. Be near the house, and have weapons at the ready.” She paused, listening to the same reply she’d been getting for nearly an hour. “Because you’ll be glad you did! Goddamn it, Ambrose, just keep the fucking family home this weekend. Please.”

A crisp knock on the front door pulled Beverly from her pacing, giving her a welcome exit to this frustrating exchange. “I’ve got someone at the door. We can talk later, but I expect you to get the ball rolling on this. I’m not playing around.”

With that, she ended the call, walking over to open the door and reveal Kyle, along with Ellie. Both looked weary, though knowing what was secretly on the horizon for their weekend, Beverly hardly found that surprising. The AHC was likely running itself ragged in preparation for the looming threat.

Since she was supposed to know none of that, having only been brought into the loop by Tori on Monday, Beverly stuck with a simple, noncommittal greeting. “Hey you two, what’s shaking?”

“We were hoping to speak with Tori, if she’s around,” Ellie opened. “There’s some... scheduling issues with this coming weekend. Might be hard to properly guard her, so we wanted to, if she was okay with it, maybe get a little heads up on where she was planning to be.”

Given that they’d be handling an invasion, it was actually nice to see that the AHC still took the time to properly cover the people they were actively guarding. There was no chance in hell Tori would go for it, but whatever tactics she used to keep this team at arm’s length were hers alone to figure out.

“You’d have to ask Tori herself on that one, and she’s not currently around.” Beverly checked the clock on the wall, realizing she’d gotten so lost in arguing that she hadn’t even noticed the hour change. “It’s Wednesday, so she’s got a meeting, and I think she mentioned something about grabbing coffee after. That means she’ll either be back here or pestering Chloe at Ridge City Grinders. If that doesn’t pan out, you could always just use the phone.”

Kyle shook his head. “This seems more like a face-to-face conversation. Tori hasn’t exactly been shy about liking her privacy, and I don’t want to seem like we’re prying. We’ve still got some of the week left, but if I’m near the coffee place, I’ll pop in.”

He started to turn away, but Ellie remained, staring at Beverly closely. “Actually... you don’t have any big plans this weekend, right?”

The conflict was obvious, looking at it, knowing all that Beverly did. Ellie wanted to warn her friend about the upcoming invasion, to make sure Beverly was safe. Except word wasn’t supposed to leak out—the AHC would absolutely want to control that narrative, even if only to minimize panic. So now, Ellie was suddenly stuck, the desire to protect weighed against her trust in the AHC that silence was right for now. Perhaps another villain would have taken some pleasure in seeing a cape discomfited, even momentarily, but Beverly felt the pain far too keenly. In a way, it was exactly what she’d just been dealing with regarding her own family.

“Who, me? I have a glorious weekend planned out. Laying around, streaming movies, catching up on work, ordering far too decadent of food—really just two days of indulgence. Sort of a mini-vacation to recharge the batteries. I’ll be shocked if I leave this apartment, though you’re welcome to come join if work is slow. Kyle, that extends to you too, and the other boys, but I warn you now that I will not tolerate any insubordination on film selection. The rom-coms are happening.”

Relief flooded Ellie's face—they really had to get better about hiding stuff—as she nodded enthusiastically. “That sounds amazing. I may just take you up on that after... after my work is done.” It was a near miss, but Ellie recovered in time, albeit not quite quickly enough to save Kyle from wearing a very nervous expression.

He managed to give a polite wave as they departed. “Have a good day. And please let Tori know we stopped by, in case we don't spot her at the coffee shop.”

“Take your time heading over,” Beverly advised. “She's probably still got a fair bit of meeting left to go.”

Wade examined the item from all angles, running his fingers along the seams, getting close to the pattern, even sniffing one particular section of faux-leather. This went on for ten full minutes as Tori sat, patiently waiting. Having a master of the craft evaluate her work would have been worth it alone, but this was the chance for so much more. If they'd done well enough, this could be the start of something brand new, a place outside of villainy where she could succeed.

“Okay, walk me through it.” That was all the guidance Wade gave as he set the prototype back down on the table.

Rising from her chair, Tori approached and scooped up the device, hanging it carefully from her arm. Nearby was a small area with several cardboard dummies. Each had been made up with a classic ruffian face, drawn scruff and painted-on scars unique enough to make Tori wonder if she'd found Wade's secret hobby. Their purpose for today was to serve as stand-ins for real crooks, though Tori wouldn't necessarily have objected to warm bodies for such a test. There was time enough for that after more R&D, she supposed.

“As you can see, from the exterior, this appears to be nothing more than a tasteful purse, and does indeed function as one. For the majority of its owner's life, it could do that job without ever being anything more. But let's say one night I can't catch a car and wind up walking through a particularly dangerous area. Suddenly, I am accosted on all sides by would-be thieves. What's a damsel to do?”

Tori strode over to the cardboard cutouts, mentally replacing them with her actual kidnappers. This device wasn't just marketing bullshit. It mattered to her. Feeling helpless, trapped, unable to fight back—Tori wanted to kick those fears in the fucking teeth. Not just for her, either. For anyone who picked up one of these purses. As an inventor, this was her pride and passion, a chance to actually do something the world couldn't ignore. So it had to work, and not just against cardboard. Tori had to feel safe even when mentally facing down a crew of kidnapping metas, because that might very well be what one of these devices went up against.

"The answer is simple. You run your finger along the silver section woven into the handle. There's a specific path to make sure it isn't triggered by accident, but if you're trying, it's easy to do. After that..." Rather than explain, Tori simply activated the trigger. A small piece on the purse's front parted, revealing a spray nozzle that doused the cutouts in green mist. The cardboard was, unsurprisingly, not effected by the spray; however, Wade picked up his phone and began to peruse some sort of display.

"Fascinating. This liquid is unstable, but the effects are quite potent. How many shots per cartridge?"

Waiting until the nozzle was fully spent and the front section had resealed, Tori moved the purse back to her side, tapping the base. "Three per purse, to start. Beverly is working on moving toward a more modular design, something where we could swap out the exteriors and cartridges easily. If it works, you can technically just sell the one purse, and then have separate skins to change out, like phone cases."

They waited a bit longer, until Wade's phone chirped a loud beep at him. "It seems the effects of the spray have now ended. Are there any secondary effects or other features you wish to show?"

Up until that moment, Tori had been feeling pretty good about their work; however, she'd also been hoping for a tad more enthusiasm. Trying to stay optimistic, she shook her head. "That's the basics for now. It's easier to build from here after getting your input than to press forward and have to go back for redesigns."

"A wise choice, as there is still much work to be done," Wade agreed. Not the most encouraging, but if they were continuing work, then it meant the project would still be alive. "Tori, what you have created is quite useful, will certainly have a market, and would never reach shelves in its current incarnation. The design itself is quite nice. What it fails to account for is the potential ramifications.”

Wade motioned to the purse, still hanging from Tori’s arm. “That weapon is capable of temporarily neutralizing metas with actual power, which makes it useful and dangerous. No sooner would it hit store shelves than we’d see them wielded for robberies, slowing or weakening capes, and all manner of general disarray.”

“So... it’s a no?”

“Certainly not. There’s profit to be made here,” Wade corrected. “This, Tori, is where your business education begins. You already know how to build powerful weapons and tools. What you haven’t yet experienced is bringing a new product to market without tipping the scales of power or stepping on the wrong toes. This is what you came to me for.”

He extended a hand, reaching for the purse. “May I?”

Tori handed it over, watching as Wade’s pale hands turned the prototype around several more times. “If I were the creator of such a tool, my first step would be identifying what pieces of the technology were unique, as those are the ones to protect more stringently. Here, everything you’ve used is fairly straightforward, with the exception of that liquid. Therefore, our main concern is keeping it proprietary, stopping these delivery mechanisms from being used illegally, and ensuring that the cartridges can’t be utilized by another device.”

“The cartridges are already built to be tamperproof. I’m sure together, we can get them secure. I really don’t think anyone can synthesize this liquid; it’s spliced-together insanity, and does not play well with other chemicals or equipment. They’d melt a lab and give their eyes a chemical burn before making much progress.”

“You’ll forgive me if I take a few attempts myself, just to be sure.” Wade shifted the weaponized accessory in his hand, moving so that the handle was visible. “For limiting how the purses are used, I recommend adding a fingerprint authentication feature that is set up upon purchase. It will create a record of which purse belongs to which person, so identifying the ones wielded illegally will be a snap for law enforcement, and ensures a stolen purse can’t be used. Maybe toss in a GPS as well, along with a beacon that notifies local emergency services that help is needed whenever a spray is activated. We’ll also need some wireless charging capabilities to power the new additions. Now you’ve got a self-defense device that is a pain in the ass to use illegally, but offers even more features to the people who are actually in trouble.”

“Sounds expensive,” Tori noted.

“It will be, but mass production, along with a few tricks I’ve picked up, should help reduce costs. Besides, you designed an item often classified as a luxury. With stylish enough designs and the features we’re adding, the price tag will justify itself.”

He wasn’t necessarily wrong, but it still nagged at Tori’s conscience. “Let’s keep at least a few of the models priced as low as they can go. This isn’t about only protecting rich people. No offense.”

To her surprise, Tori found Wade was no longer examining the purse, and had instead pointed that scrutinizing stare in her direction. “The desire to create change, to invent something which leaves a lasting mark upon the world... there is nothing wrong with that ambition. In fact, I daresay it’s the part of you I find most interesting. But ambition alone does not build an empire. You’ll have to make hard choices, and look to the bottom line more than you’ll want to. This concession is a small one, and I can easily make it. Understand that in the future, such may well not be the case.”

“Got it. If I want my stuff to be universally available, I have to build with that in mind.”

“Along with hoping the projects don’t change form in development, but that’s more of a long-term concern.” Gently, Wade handed the purse back over to Tori. “For today, I think it’s safe to say we’re on an excellent track. If you’d be open to it, I can take a crack at adding the additional features, since I’ve got more experience building computer components for mass production. However, if you’d prefer to do it all by hand, I understand, and we can schedule another progress meeting down the line.”

It was no accident that he’d given the purse back before asking; they both knew Tori’s general capacity for trust, especially where her work was concerned. Taking it and adding the suggestions would be doable, but slower than anything Wade could manage, especially with her suit repairs still ongoing. Beyond that, for this partnership to work, at a certain point, Tori would have to let it out of her hands. Since she wasn’t planning to make each of these things personally, loosening her grip was simply unavoidable. Better for Wade to show his true colors now, early on, if there was going to be a betrayal. Tori couldn’t control that part, though. All she could do was present him with an opportunity.

“I say give it a shot.” Tori dropped the purse back on the table, where it had started. “I’ll obviously want to look things over, but you can get us a build closer to the mass-market version anyway, so it makes more sense to start from there.”

“Your trust is noted, and appreciated,” Wade informed her. “I should be able to have something ready by next week. It would be sooner, if not for the upcoming hecticness.”

That was certainly one way to categorize a planned alien invasion. Tori might have to steal that the next time she was alluding to an upcoming villain event—at the rate things had been going, the damn things were sure frequent enough.

“Until then, I suggest you focus on personal preparations, especially where self-defense is involved.”

“You don’t have to tell me twice,” Tori concurred. “After one stop at Ridge City Grinders, I’m heading back to the base to keep working.”

She pointedly didn’t mention why she was stopping for coffee, not that anyone she knew in the guild would require such an explanation. For Tori, it was a perfectly natural detour—would have been stranger if she skipped her favorite java spot. It was much easier to let that assumption slide than to explain she was grabbing a drink with her friend who was also one of the AHC’s rising stars. It wasn’t a secret, per se, just something she chose not to talk about.

After what she’d learned about Ivan and Helen, Tori was starting to suspect there were a great many things so hidden by the guild members. It was only fair she rack up a few of her own.

---

Chapter 98

---

“Mommy? Are you okay?”

With a start, Helen jerked upward, feigning wakefulness as best she could. The effort was severely compromised by the document stuck to her face, pasted there by ill-timed slumbering drool during the unexpected nap. Thankful there were no photographers around to capture this candid moment, Helen yanked the page off, setting it back onto her kitchen table with the others, right where it had been before the boredom and sleepiness overtook her.

“Mommy is doing fine, just taking a short rest when she can. How about you? How’s packing coming along?”

Penelope’s eyes turned downward, a sure sign that no productive report was impending. “I packed three shirts, twelve socks, and my comfy snow pants.”

Sighing, Helen reached down and scooped up her daughter. At six, she was no longer the tiny bundle that could easily fit in a single grip, yet there was no twinge from her back or cry from her arms as she lifted the small human with a squeal of delight. For all that her power had taken through the years, there were other gifts it left behind. Never truly losing the ability to sweep up those she loved in her grasp was one that Helen treasured.

“I know you don’t want to go with Miss Theresa this weekend, but she’s going to take you somewhere secure. An emergency bunker, with lots of supplies, where you’ll be safe no matter what happens.”

The small head dug into her collarbone, pressing hard. “But you won’t be there.”

“No, honey. Mommy can’t be down there. Mommy has to do her part to keep everyone safe.” She kissed the top of Penelope’s head, all too aware that there was no happy end to the conversation in sight. Her daughter was afraid. She knew something bad was coming. For all that Helen wanted to be there with her, telling her that it would be okay, she had to be Lodestar, ensuring that such an outcome was actually possible.

“Can Uncle Ivan come?”

Ridiculous as the notion of Ivan Gerhardt walking into an AHC-owned bunker was, for a moment, Helen found the image deeply comforting. Truth be told, if there had to be one person that wasn’t Lodestar watching over Penelope, Ivan would be at the top of the list. Hopefully, he’d be spending the invasion protecting Rick and Beth. This problem was squarely within the AHC’s jurisdiction, so she didn’t expect much guild activity. Or rather, she hoped there wouldn’t be much—because if the guild had a chance to play, it meant that things would have gotten very messy indeed.

“No, honey, Uncle Ivan has another safe place to be. But there will be other kids to play with, new people to meet, and the whole thing shouldn’t take more than a day or two. Can you be my brave girl for that long?”

Uncertain squirming made for a potent tell, yet Penelope still screwed her face up into a curiously familiar expression. “I can do it. You go save the world.”

In her decades as a superhero, even before fully coming into her powers, there were only a handful of blows that hit as hard as that look. Helen knew that expression, because she’d seen it on her own face so many times throughout the years. It was the face of someone hiding their own pain to put on a brave front for the sake of those watching. Thanks to her job, Helen had worn that mask untold times, but she’d never hated it so fundamentally until she saw her daughter do the same.

“How about I help you pack? We’ll pick out some fun outfits you can show everyone, and think of lots of games for you to play with the other kids.” It wouldn’t make up for being gone when her daughter was scared, but it was something. Helen would deal with the paperwork later; super-speed made for sloppier work, however she didn’t especially care. With only a few days left until the world was at risk, Helen was going to spend the time she had where it mattered most.

That was one lesson life refused to stop teaching her.

Almost time.

The man pressed his thin fingers together, hoping the latest round of coverage could contain his excitement until the moment was at hand. The materials for coating himself enough to maintain an appearance of humanity weren't exactly easy to come by, even if he did make the vast majority of them himself. There were still components to consider, some getting rarer by the year. Over time, he'd attempted to adjust the formula, substituting in newer materials for those falling out of availability. Each such experiment ended in disaster. Were he capable of death, several would have likely ended him entirely.

"We just... wait?" Lozora hung in the corner of the room, an attack dog no longer sure of her usefulness. She was wise to be uncertain; her presence was tolerable only so long as it served a purpose. Fortune remained on her side for the moment, as there were still tasks for which she was suitable.

"We are not waiting. We are preparing for the perfect moment to strike," he clarified. "Once the attack begins, some of the assets I've reached out to under my cover identity will move into position, drawing our targets to the appropriate location. Our aim is set, the hammer cocked. It is merely a matter of letting everything properly align to take it all in a single shot."

Her next words were mumbled, perhaps not truly meant for him to hear. "Seems like there are easier ways to kill some capes."

"Countless simpler methods," he agreed instantly. "Yet this is not a job built toward efficiency. It is about the spectacle, the show, and the aftermath of what remains. If simply 'killing capes' were all I had in mind, this would have been finished on the first day. I seek something far more delicious, and difficult."

His thin hands stretched out before him, the pale skin clinging to the finger bones like cheap shrink-wrap. "What I want is to take decades of pain, a lifetime of suffering, an endless torment with no escape, and gift even a small portion of it to someone else. Killing the capes will be the finale, a grand flourish to drive things home. All the hell I put them through before that is the purpose. I want them to know, even briefly, the cost of their power. Only when they understand the truth will death be allowed."

Lozora said nothing to that. She'd been especially quiet since the Starscout incident. She didn't matter, anyway. Her role could be easily filled by multiple lesser minions at this point. The plan was what counted. He'd worked so hard to move everything into position, just to create a perfect opening.

With only a few days left until the fun started, he could scarcely contain himself, as the slow leak of dark smoke rising from his left pinky attested. There was probably enough material left to last for another coating before the invasion, but after that, he'd be running low.

Then again, after the invasion, he might enjoy a little time living in his own visage. After so long spent unseen and unknown, it was well past time he showed the capes what they were really up against.

It took Tori a moment to spot Donald amidst the bustle of Ridge City Grinders. Only the good fortune of Chloe being on shift made things easier, as her roommate gave a pointed nod to a table in the corner, where some douchebag was wearing a hat and sunglasses indoors. On her second look, Tori realized the douchebag in question was Donald, which was all the prompting she needed to kick off the conversation.

"You going to a brightly lit baseball game in the next ten minutes, or just auditioning for 'World's Most Obvious Narc'?" Tori smiled down at him, softening the blow slightly.

"Oh, hey!" Donald leapt up, stowing his phone at the apparent realization of her arrival. Working with the AHC was already a busy gig; she had to imagine. With what the weekend was bringing, that was even more the case. It made the fact that he'd coordinated with her schedule for coffee catch-up session to happen all the more impressive, and worrying.

Tori still wasn't sure where she'd landed on the idea of capes and villains being friends. Helen and Ivan were proof that it could work, yet she was smart enough not to base too much of her life around Lodestar and Fornax. Those two tended to be exceptions a lot of the time; it was best to not take them as the standard. Nevertheless, they proved it was possible, for those who put in the work.

As their hug broke apart, she caught the sheepish look on Donald's face. "I... um... I've had to start keeping a lower profile in public lately. Cyber Geek is getting more popular."

“Isn’t that a good thing?” She clapped him on the back once, though he didn’t seem especially enthusiastic.

“It’s not a bad one, but it takes some getting used to. For today, I wanted to be incognito.”

“Then I’m glad I caught you before any browser windows were open. Hang on, let me go grab a drink.” As Tori turned, she found herself looking at the approaching form of Chloe, who set a large cup on the table in front of her.

She only paused long enough to add a napkin to the top of the cup. “I made you the afternoon usual, plus a little extra. Tell me how the meeting went later tonight.” Then Chloe was gone, back into the fray of cranky caffeine consumers.

With no more need for detours, Tori took her seat, sipping the coffee, unsurprised to find it scorching hot. Chloe had probably made the thing, and then tossed it in an oven to stay warm—not like she had to worry about burning Tori’s tongue.

“Big day with the Vendallia higher-ups?”

It took Tori a moment to figure out what he meant. She was currently so mentally checked out of her day job that the words almost seemed nonsensical. After a stuttering start, her brain finally kicked into gear, putting together his meaning. Luckily, large sips of coffee were excellent for hiding mental recalibration.

“In a way, sort of, though only in the most technical sense.” Tori hesitated. This wasn’t a development she was ready to share with the world yet, not even amongst friends. “I’m working on something new, but I don’t really want to talk about it until I see if it’s going somewhere.”

“I’ve seen the quality of work you can do at a job you tolerate. If it’s something you actually care about, I’m sure you’ll knock it out of the park.” Donald was squirming now, and Tori realized his own drink, an iced coffee turned light from all the added cream, had barely been drunk a quarter of the way, despite his head start. He was... nervous.

Instantly, the scene changed for Tori. Every single body in the building was a potential cape in disguise. Did Chloe know? No, she’d have found to way to slip in some sort of message, or used one of her idioms to escape. What was the plan? Ambush her while the suit wasn’t around, subdue her if she was lucky, then drag her to court for... for what, exactly?

Forcing a few deep breaths down under the guise of a very long swig, Tori took control of herself. Awareness and fear were useful tools; giving over to full-blown paranoia was another matter entirely. Nerves didn't mean Donald was about to turn on her. He had plenty going on this week to be worried about. And even if she was busted, the only crime Hephaestus was wanted for was a connection to a museum heist, something that the guild lawyers could hopefully handle. More than anything, though, if the AHC wanted to haul her in, Lodestar could have done it whenever she chose.

"Here's hoping you're right." Tori gave a mock toast, which Donald mirrored, albeit on a delay. "Anyway, what wins me time with one of Ridge City's rising capes? Don't get me wrong, it's nice to catch up, but you seemed pretty set on making something happen this week when we were texting."

Of course, Tori knew the reason: Donald was facing down an invasion and was afraid. He was doing what people facing real battle often saw as the best use of their time: spending it with friends and family. Even if she had to feign ignorance, Tori was touched as she realized how important that made their friendship to him—a kind feeling that was followed swiftly by remembering how easily she'd thought him willing to betray her moments ago.

"There's... I've got a mission coming up," Donald said, quite nearly slipping up right out of the gate. "You probably don't need to worry or anything. No one expects me to be in particular danger."

"But life doesn't come with guarantees, especially for capes." That was a truth Tori had understood long before guilds and abilities. She was a smart cookie. Life only had to savagely rip away everyone she loved once for the message to sink in.

He nodded, though he didn't seem much more at ease, despite her jumping them to the punch. "That's definitely a big part of it. I've started to really understand how powerful some metas out there are, and how wildly out of my depth I could be with even just one wrong move. I don't want to make the mistake of assuming things will go well, and then end up being wrong."

Softly, Tori reached over and patted him on the forearm. "Dude, you're allowed to be scared. These powers aren't a change you asked for. They just happened. The fact that you chose to do something constructive with them at all is amazing. Most people would have kept it to themselves or used it for personal gain. Expecting yourself to take on criminals and monsters without ever being afraid, well, that's just dumb."

"It isn't that kind of fear. I mean, yes, I might get hurt, but that's true any time I go out on patrol. I've had to make peace with that for a while now. My bigger concern is leaving things unsaid."

Without warning, Donald's free hand came down lightly on top of the one Tori had been using to pat his forearm. He looked at her, eyes not quite fully shielded by the reflective glasses, thanks to the angle of the lighting. That was why she could see bits of the terror, and sincerity, in his gaze. Too late, those clues finally gave her an inkling of what this meeting was really about.

"Tori, I asked you here because the truth is... I have feelings for you."

---

Chapter 99

---

The first five passes came up empty. Luckily, no one appeared to notice the streak that blasted by Ridge City Grinders multiple times. On try number six, Kyle arrived outside the window just in time to see Tori laying her hand on Donald's arm. His pulse spiked, in a way that had nothing to do with the speeds he was operating at. Unlike many of his peers, Kyle was somewhat in touch with his own feelings, meaning he understood quite well what was happening.

At some point, he'd become taken with Tori. It wasn't all that shocking—his past romantic affections had often landed on headstrong women with forceful personalities. Mix in that she was one of the few people outside of the island who'd treated them all like their positions didn't matter, making her the only outsider he'd ever been able to open up to, and it was practically inevitable.

Recognizing that those feelings existed wasn't the same as giving into them, however. They were in Ridge City to continue a legacy, while building something new of their own. One day, maybe, he could free up enough of himself to put into a relationship, but for now, Kyle knew he would always pick the job and team first, which wasn't fair to any prospective partner. Especially one who clearly had other prospects. So while he did feel his pulse rise, it wasn't accompanied by any sort of impulse to dash over and interrupt.

While a piece of Kyle was tempted to slip inside and listen in, he'd already made enough mistakes where Tori was concerned, and for this one, he wouldn't even have the power of self-delusion. Catching a moment in happenstance was one thing; if she caught him purposefully snooping, there rightfully might be no forgiveness.

With one last look through the window, Kyle disappeared in a sudden blur.

Finding the right response was no easy feat. For a dangerous heartbeat, she almost tried to laugh it off, but the look on Donald's face was much too vulnerable. Her next impulse, a new standard in terrible, was to blurt out that she was really Hephaestus. Both were resisted as Tori opted—rather than blow up the conversation and attached friendship—to try to muddle her way through. Not being sure about her future friendship with Donald didn't mean she wanted to hurt him, regardless of how things went.

"Look... I'm about to say something, and it's going to sound like a line, so you have to hear me all the way out, okay?"

"Of course," Donald replied.

Tori took a sip of her coffee to steel her nerves. "You're a great guy, but —"

The groan that slipped out of Donald was plainly unintentional, as his eyes went wide in embarrassed surprise moments later. "Sorry, sorry, just wasn't expecting an actual verbatim dumping line."

"Warned you." Tori tossed a small smile on, lightening the mood as much as she dared, given the subject matter. "And like I was saying, you are a great guy. The issue is me. I'm... there are a lot of parts of my life that you don't know about. Really, truly messed-up parts."

"I get that things were rough for a long time. Losing your parents, the addiction—I can't imagine what you went through. That said, none of it would change who you are today."

"You're wrong. It's done nothing but shape who I am today." Tori felt the rage in her gut rising without provocation, just because she'd dared look into her own history. It was always there, in the spot where happy memories of her family and childhood were supposed to live. The endless blaze of fury over a life stolen from her, not even by something as ineffable as fate, but by simple greed and apathy. One more broken piece in the pile that was Tori Rivas.

“I have a lot of trust issues. I mean, a shitload. Right now, the only way I can seem to make genuine friends is to share some sort of near-traumatic battle with them, which isn’t really a healthy or sustainable tactic. As for romantic relationships, they aren’t even on my radar. I don’t know what sort of emotional bandwidth you need to open up like that, but I don’t have it. Not now. Maybe not ever.”

It was Donald’s turn to use his beverage as a way to buy time, an extra-long slurp punctuating the pause after Tori’s words. At last, he lowered it, reply finally formed. “That might be the first time someone has used ‘it’s not you, it’s me’ and been entirely sincere.”

“Molds were made to be broken.”

His gaze softened, despite the bad news. “Clearly.” After a moment, he composed himself, looking a tad bashful at the earnest admiration. “If that’s how you really feel, then I can respect it. While it’s not the answer I wanted, I didn’t honestly expect you to feel the same way. I’m sure I’ve got a type out there, it’s just very specific.” Donald leaned back slightly, eyes moving toward the shop at large, as if scanning for an exit from this now embarrassing situation.

To no one’s shock more than her own, Tori’s hand shot out, grabbing him by the wrist. “Hey. Stop. I meant what I said. You are a solid guy, Donald. Kind, honest, and loyal to a fault. Even brave, nowadays. You’re a damn cape, for god’s sake. There is no shortage of women out there who would love to be on Cyber Geek’s arm. Just because I’m not one of them doesn’t mean I’ll let you shit-talk my friend.”

“It wasn’t much of a shit-talking,” Donald protested.

“Sentiment more than words; I can still read between the lines. The point is, you are my friend.” Tori realized the words were true only as they were tumbling unbidden from her mouth. “Assuming you’re okay with that, after my answer.”

The response wasn’t instantaneous. As Tori pulled her hand back, Donald appeared to give the matter a few seconds of serious thought before finally nodding his head. “I’d love to still be friends. But, fair warning, I also don’t think I can turn off my feelings just like that. I won’t bring it up again and will try my best not to let anything show; it just might take time. I don’t want you to think I’m hanging around in the wings, using our friendship as a way to wait and see if you change your mind.”

“If I’d had a few more friends like you throughout my life, I might not be such a fucked-up mess.” Tori relaxed a little, now that the conversation was on a more predictable track. “It’s okay for you to feel however you want, so long as you respect my own thoughts on the subject.”

Despite the positive swing, Donald’s face creased, the first time in the whole talk he’d looked genuinely bothered. “Good. Then as your friend, I don’t like when you do that.”

“Do what?”

“Do what? The exact thing you just got on me about: shit-talking my friend. You’re not a ‘fucked-up mess,’ Tori. You’re holding down a job, a social life, an apartment of your own. I know people who haven’t been through a tenth of what you have, and they still can’t get it together enough to do their own laundry. Give yourself an ounce of credit from time to time.”

Her impulse was to deny and defer, pretend all of that was mere happenstance. And to an extent, it was, in the sense that only chance had gotten her on the guild’s radar, leading to her apprenticeship with Ivan. Yet that was merely the opportunity; everything from there on had been done by Tori’s own hand. She’d endured the guild’s trials, she’d survived the Ridge City Riots, she’d built the identity of Hephaestus. Maybe he was right. Perhaps she was a little too hard on herself.

“Well then, how about we both promise to be better about going easy on ourselves, and hold one another accountable to it?” Tori lifted her coffee once more, noting that Donald did the same without even looking. “To friends?”

His reply was as instant as it was earnest. “I’ll always drink to that.”

“And what makes this place so safe, exactly?” Janet was rubbing the spot above her nose between her eyes, giving Ivan deep flashbacks to the later years of their marriage. That gesture had been in frequent use as the arguments grew more constant. He briefly wondered if she used it around anyone else—it would seem not, if today was any indication. Juan was at work and the kids were in school; this was a meeting solely for those in the know about the greater events of their world. Specifically, the weekend's coming danger.

"Guild owned, heavily reinforced, and with an emergency escape option in the event things go catastrophically wrong." It was all the more galling that they had to hash this out when he knew she was going to go along with it in the end. The other options were to take their chances out in the open, or turn to the AHC for help. Intelligence and pride cut off both those paths for Janet.

"Yes, but what good will that do if Earth loses?" Janet persisted. "Death by starvation as we remained trapped in your hidey hole isn't much better than getting wiped out in the initial shot."

It was hard to argue that she wasn't presenting a relevant concern, albeit one Ivan had trouble imagining. Thankfully, the possibility was one he'd also taken into account. "If Earth's defenses fall, then you'll use the escape option. We have a versal-displacement engine to punch a hole between this part of the multiverse and somewhere safe."

Janet's concern was momentarily tempered by her curiosity—the same trait that had gotten them mixed up together in the first place. "I thought it was near impossible to break through the multiverse barriers anymore."

"Then you also know Wade considers the words 'near impossible' to be the start of a challenge," Ivan explained. "It takes a tremendous amount of power, and the portals only last for a short while, so it's still a huge ordeal. But the technology functions well enough that we built an emergency escape system and established an outpost where we can flee to."

He didn't add that this system wasn't designed with aliens in mind. For all they knew, the Wrexwren were just as far ahead on that front as humanity. No, this safety mechanism was built with a single force in consideration. For all the power Lodestar had, she was completely unable to leave her native universe. All the nooks, subspaces, dimensions, and planes of their own world were fair game, but no Lodestar they'd heard of had ever been able to step beyond the initial universe they inhabited. Which made fleeing to another part of the multiverse the only true way to slip from that powerful, glowing grasp.

"Meaning if things go badly, our best option is to leave the entire world behind?" The words could have sounded patronizing or sarcastic; instead, there was a cold calculation to them. She grasped the stakes at play, and that failure from Earth's defenders meant the entire world they knew could come tumbling down. Janet wanted to be sure she understood the consequences to every action as she made them. It was an attitude Ivan had worked hard to learn from during their time together.

“Yes. If I fall, it means these creatures are incredibly dangerous, and the world is in for a harsh battle. Should Lodestar fall... just get out. If they hold power greater than hers, this planet cannot stand against it.”

Janet rolled her eyes with outstanding form; however, not even she bothered to argue on this point. “I do feel better knowing there’s a contingency, although it would have been nice to look over the other world’s facilities in advance. Our best option is not to need it, to stay put in our own universe. Tell me you’re going to win this, Ivan.”

“My part is relatively simple. The harder tasks fall upon Wade, Xelas, and Lodestar.”

“That’s not what I said.” Janet rose from her kitchen table, striding over to the corner of the room and plucking up a set of framed photos. She walked back, thumb resting on the image in the rightmost corner. “Do you remember that day?”

He took the photos from her hands. Janet appeared to be standing on a dusty road, in front of a natural rock formation, posing with the infant version of Rick. All of that was true and accurate; what was unseen, just outside of frame, were the front gates of Rookstone, where Ivan had been imprisoned at the time. The picture was from the day he’d first met his son, taken less than an hour prior to the event.

“I could never forget.” He remembered every piece of it. The uncertainty in Janet’s eyes, the sharp sting of the cleaning spray lingering in the prison air, the tiny fingers that grabbed at his hands before balling up into a fist, clenching on the orange fabric of Ivan’s uniform until Rick was taken away. Even then, the small hand hung on, tugging the collar in a way that had never truly gone from Ivan’s mind.

“Do you remember what you told me before I left?”

“I won’t let anything happen to him.”

The sharp “tsk” hissed out of Janet’s closed teeth instantly. “Those weren’t your words.”

Ivan’s eyes traveled from the starting photo to the rest of the frame. He was missing in most of these, but there was no shortage of pictures documenting his children’s lives. Babies, to toddlers, now one nearing her teens and the other verging toward adulthood.

“I will kill every meta, every monster, every world, if it means keeping our child, our children, safe. No price is too high, no blood is too sacred. I will protect them.”

“That’s what I wanted to hear.” Janet gently plucked the photograph from his hands, looking up at him with a small touch of her former admiration. “Now, you’re ready to fight.”

---

Chapter 100

---

Contact came on Friday. Specifically, Friday morning, just between when Professor Quantum wrapped his current project of upgrading his flight belt and when he returned to the lab with an ultra-energy bar. He'd already half unwrapped the glowing treat when he stepped into his facilities to find every piece of communications equipment lighting up. Those tricky little invaders were trying to send it worldwide, stirring up panic among the masses before they'd even set a single ship in Earth's space.

Such a mass broadcast was impossible without tripping the AHC's blocking equipment, and while there were, admittedly, a few other metas capable of bypassing the media defense, the days of screens suddenly filling with criminals were largely long-past. There were obvious exceptions, like that traitor Apollo teaching Balaam the ways around it for their little rebellion, but those were insider tricks. An alien force wouldn't have knowledge of such tactics, so for the moment, this message was only for the AHC, and anyone else who'd rigged up a functioning interstellar communications array.

Looking over the content of the message as his automated translator was spitting it out, there was nothing surprising thus far. This was a twenty-four hour notice: the battle would begin in a day's time. Earth was allowed to send up a champion if they so chose, losing would forfeit their planet to be plundered—all the standard bits they were already expecting. The only real unknown to be revealed was the timetable. A single day, enough to technically give the planet a chance to ready their defenses, yet still with most of the benefits of a surprise attack.

There was sharp crack and a minor flash of light as Professor Quantum took a large bite from his bar, the crumbs dissolving as soon as they hit the ground. Now that they knew the invasion was planning to move soon—within a day, if they were telling the truth—it was time to bring the public in on what was happening. In the old days, they'd have just let the sky fill up with aliens and tell people to have faith. Now, everyone expected these sorts of things to be added right to their calendar. Lodestar coddled this world too much. Professor Quantum was of the mindset that tribulation built character. Not a fight worth having on this front, though, especially not when the issue would have the public on her side.

Instead, he activated the preprogrammed sequence, sending out the recorded video across the world, the computer redubbing over their voices in various languages to ensure it was understood by all who saw. While he might not have loved the necessity of communication, Professor Quantum would never permit his work to fall below acceptable quality.

On his screen, and across millions stretching out through every corner of the globe, a new image suddenly appeared. On it was himself, Quorum, and at the front, speaking, was Lodestar. Time to bring the world up to speed on what the weekend held in store.

Across the world, people drew near to their screens and speakers, all too aware of what an announcement like this foretold. Families huddled closer, souls were searched, and each person faced the momentary possibility that everything they'd ever known or loved could be destroyed in a single day's time. Then, for the most part, they continued on with their respective days. An invasion on the horizon was all well and good, but it didn't change the work ahead of them, and once the AHC kicked the attackers back to the far reaches of space, things would be back to normal by Monday.

Some took the news more seriously than others. In one particularly well-armed Ridge City household, for example, the entire family was engaged in cleaning and checking their entire stock of weapons. Ambrose watched the screen as he reassembled a rifle, not needing his eyes for a task so well burned into his muscles. Beverly had called it, and days before the AHC. Something big was coming all right, and she'd wanted to make sure her family was ready for it. Part of him wondered if he should be probing deeper into how exactly she'd had access to that sort of information, but they were already in the process of getting reestablished after the transformation incident. Better to let her reveal the truth in time. For now, he had plenty to keep busy with.

Beth and Rick saw the announcement on their phones, inside a car already headed out of town. Beth was mostly interested and excited, while Rick couldn't help thinking about this trip they'd mysteriously decided to take beforehand. It all tied back to his dad's secret somehow, though for the moment, he was content to let that sleeping dog lie. Learning just a taste of the truth had terrified him to the core of his soul. Right now, he was happy to have Ivan just be his dad. Yet even as he held that thought, Rick's eyes wandered out the window to the blue sky overhead. When the dust settled, did he really expect a man who'd killed—or rather, slaughtered an entire army, to just sit back and watch?

Sitting at his stool, surrounded by terrified locals, Grantham watched the old tube set flickering as it blasted out the message in a language he'd only picked up the basics of. He'd been around long enough to get the essentials: there was a fight coming, and the AHC was trying to keep it off-world. Keeping his beer soundly on the table, Grantham flexed his left hand into a fist. Veins bulged an icy blue hue, a shade that spread across the arm, swelling it with muscle at even the merest thought of combat. Smiling, he used his right hand to take a sip of beer, not even caring that it had dropped by several degrees. He wasn't ready to take on the AHC yet, but Jokull might have fun tearing through some easier targets.

Chloe watched the announcement along with everyone else at Ridge City Grinders. It was strange, seeing this message while practically sitting in the AHC's shadow. People were obviously scared, yet not sure how afraid they should really be. Daunting as the concept was, it was hardly the first time Earth had been attacked at large, and so far, the capes had succeeded in repelling back every major threat. Then again, they only had to lose once for the planet to be wiped out, a fact that everyone was trying hard not to think about. Her customers absorbed the message like a small blow, then each began the process of walking it off. The rest of the world would deal in its own way; this was just part of what it took to build a life in Ridge City.

Sitting atop the Statue of Lizardy, which rested directly across from the Statue of Liberty, Captain Bullshit's hand stayed, despite being moments away from summoning the sarsaparilla storm clouds. The clunky old mobile television was easily four times bigger than a modern phone, and with far worse picture, but it still held a signal well enough to get the message. While he was disappointed to scrap the performance, such a display was no longer needed today. The world had already been reminded to expect the unexpected; to strike again at their cocoons of repetition would be mental assault, rather than the art of cerebral elevation. This could wait for another day, when the masses' minds were properly aligned for radical shocks.

On an island nation off the coast of Australia's Shattered Shores, the message was blazing on a huge screen, higher in definition than most people even realized was possible. The figure seated upon a mechanical throne took in every detail, face inscrutable through her meta-suit's seamless helmet. It flowed into the rest of the armor, which coated every inch of the wearer's body. Her fingers tapped heavily against the armrest, calculating the odds of AHC failure. Chances were strong they would repel the threat, though whether or not they would succeed without the Earth taking damage was more in question. Whatever the outcome, Tyranny was confident in her nation's defenses. Her land would either endure, or tear off the enemy's flesh on their way out. Leaning over, she whispered to a figure at her side, the only person in the chamber with her. Confident or not, there were preparations to be made.

Nexus had no grand view to watch from for this part. He was only around happenstantially, in case this was one of the versions where Captain Bullshit went ahead with the storm. Standing on the street, he could see the image playing on several screens in various stores and windows, none of which he paid attention to. The message wasn't inherently fascinating, especially after hearing countless prior versions of it. What came next, now that he would have several good seats for. This was little more than the curtain call. With no sarsaparilla storm on the horizon, Nexus soon vanished, popping out of the world like he'd been digitally removed. Only for a bit, though.

Come tomorrow, this would be an event he dared not miss.

Tori and Ivan didn't see the announcement. They weren't intentionally avoiding it; however, there were no television screens in the testing chamber, and neither had elected to bring a phone along with them for this.

Zippering through the air, Tori adjusted her flight path, nimbly getting around one of the cardboard protrusions popping down from the ceiling. As she did, a fresh target popped into view, earning a short blast from the gauntlet on her left arm.

In all but title and a few small suit pieces, she was once more Hephaestus—or at least, she would be once this test was complete. It wasn't really for Ivan; he'd simply wanted to see where she was at. The real assessor was Tori herself, keenly observing every detail of her suit's performance post-repair. So far, it was holding up splendidly, the few limitations she hit being ones of design and fatigue. No amount of repairing would change the fact that she'd put the armor through more than its initial materials were meant to endure. Between learning in the field and access to superior components, Tori was slowly coming around to the fact that soon, she'd need to build an entirely new meta-suit. Projects like this were never done. Each design reached the full extent of its potential, and from that knowledge, a next step forward could be taken.

Reorienting with a quick spin, Tori fired at two more targets with the left gauntlet. Her right was cycling into its large beam weapon. For all the work she'd done on efficiency, there was still a sizable charging time before her big shots could be used. Not ideal in the field, so she needed to make a habit of keeping one blast ready to go whenever possible. The rapid turns earned her groans from the suit's dark metal. Between fighting with metas and the strain of flying at high speeds, she was going to have to go far more durable for the next incarnation, assuming she could find something both strong and light enough—there was no way she was parting with flight.

Settling into a rough hover, Tori scanned around, isolating two more targets as they flopped out into view. A pair of shots, and both were smoldering pieces of cardboard seconds later. Carefully, keeping a close eye on her stabilizers, Tori brought her suit back down to the ground, coming to a halt roughly ten feet from Ivan. She disengaged the helmet's latches, popping it off as her body reformed to flesh and bone. "Now that's a way to start a morning! What did you think?"

"Very impressive." Ivan didn't actually sound terribly impressed, though Tori knew that if she was waiting for that to happen, her next invention had better be the world's comfiest chair. "Your mobility is constantly increasing as you improve the flight systems, and the gravitational distorters have even made you light on your feet. Aim seems accurate, force is adequate, though I notice you didn't test the major weapons."

Even without her helmet showing the indicator, Tori could tell her gauntlet was still charged; there was a crackling, static-like energy running along the length of her arm. Crap, that meant she needed to reinforce the shielding before there was a major rupture. That issue would have shown in the charging, though, so it was probably still safe-ish to use. "Wasn't quite sure what these walls were rated for. Figured Wade had enough on his plate without me cutting a hole in the base."

"A bit overconfident, though you do make a good point." Ivan took several steps back, then raised his hands out in front, like he was pushing an invisible wall. "Whenever you're ready."

"For mime-work? Hate to be the bearer of bad news, but you're going to be holding that position for a hell of a long time."

Ivan sighed with the exhausted resolve that only a parent raising a teen was capable of. "For the fully charged beam. We're testing all of your suit. That certainly includes your ace in the hole. The walls' durability can be called into question. Mine is a known quantity, especially when braced. So, as I said, whenever you're ready."

There was no reason why Tori's arm hesitated before shifting into position. Ivan was, so far as she knew, borderline indestructible. Her absolute best efforts might be able to put a scratch or a burn on him, but causing actual damage was currently a pipe dream. All the same, it was momentarily difficult to point her greatest weapon at the man who'd fast become one of the few positive constants in her life, even knowing how silly her fear was.

In that moment, just before she fired, Tori finally understood how Ivan could feel protective over Lodestar, despite how fantastically nonsensical and pointless it was. Whatever the rational brain might know, it didn't quiet the fearful voice that lived much deeper down, the whispering tone terrified to lose someone its owner cared about.

The beam of energy scorched the air, blazing through the short distance between them in a flash. That was the furthest it went, however. Ivan's hands, still stretched before him, didn't just stop the beam, they contained it. It was like he'd hefted some invisible shield, which wasn't the worst way to describe magical wards, soaking up all the power she'd sent hurtling in his direction.

Finally, when the beam cut out, Ivan waited a few seconds, then lowered his arms. His hands were rubbed against one another, then shaken out, like they'd been slept on and had to be roused from numbness. "I could feel that."

"What does that mean?" Her gauntlet was smoking—she definitely needed to tweak the shielding before the invasion kicked off. Still, Tori felt the first whispers of pride rising in her chest, wondering if she'd managed something especially impressive.

"Many things. That you've increased the power from the last time I took one of these shots by quite a bit. That you'll be capable of damaging all but the most durable of metas." A hand landed on the armor of her shoulder, patting her twice. "And it certainly means that, should you choose to enter the fray tomorrow, I won't have to worry about Hephaestus making it through safely. That villain will have more than enough power to survive."

Good as the praise made Tori feel, she wasn't quite sure that survival would be her only goal once the invasion started. The majority of her life had been focused on having no attachments, caring for nothing, so that she couldn't be hurt by losing it again. For better or worse, the last year had chipped away at that tactic, one friendship at a time. Helen was right. She could keep pretending to not give a shit, but that wouldn't actually lessen the pain she'd feel to have someone taken away. If she wanted to protect the people she cared for, it was time to have a hard, honest reflection about who those folks really were.

Once she knew, Hephaestus could decide in the moment how to react to whatever the invaders threw at them. Tori might not have much insight into their game plan, but she had a pretty good idea of her own: defend what was hers, and show any dumb sonsabitches who tested Hephaestus why it was never a good idea to try to steal from a villain.

---

Chapter 101

---

“Those of you assembled before me, your primary task in the coming event is to maintain peace and stability among Earth’s citizens. When something like this occurs, there will always be those who assume the Alliance of Heroic Champions is too busy to deal with lower-tier crimes. On top of that, some people may give in to genuine panic, taking actions that endanger themselves and those around them. You are going to be out there, en masse, making sure there’s help for anyone who needs it.”

Lodestar floated before the massive assembly, more capes than Cyber Geek had even realized were working at their level. Then again, with the rotating shifts and ways they were spread out, there were plenty of other members he passed like a ship in the night. Plus, the AHC was always adding new members, albeit not in the same flood that had been around when Donald first joined. To his left was Medley, on his right were Hat Trick and Cold Shoulder. They’d arrived that evening as a unit, ready to receive orders for the coming madness.

“In the event that our visitors decide to take the fight to Earth, your focus should be on guiding and protecting civilians. We have more experienced superheroes standing by to deal with an actual invasion force—that’s not where you’ll do the most good. Those of you who’ve gone through evaluation and done well may be tasked with slightly more difficult jobs as needs demand; however, it is highly unlikely we will ask you to get into the fray.”

Her form rotated through the air, working to make eye contact, however fleeting, with each person in the crowd. Neither Professor Quantum nor Quorum were present, not that Cyber Geek had expected them to be around. Given what the planet was facing, it already felt like a waste to have Lodestar here breaking things down. But then, the real trouble was still a sunrise away.

“Should they invade, for most of you, this will be your first experience in anything similar to true war. In the heat of combat, pitted against an enemy with ruthless intentions, you may be forced to make difficult ethical decisions. I can’t tell you how much force is the right amount, or if the final line has to be crossed. The circumstances you’ll be facing will have to inform that decision. Just remember that there are no undo’s in this world. A life that’s taken can never be reclaimed.”

It was a notion that had been sitting heavy in Cyber Geek’s gut ever since he learned about the planet’s current threat. He’d had no issue blasting through a monster that Nexus conjured from another world, but since then, he’d been largely dealing with humans who required a far more gentle touch. Killing an alien was a notion that left him feeling uncomfortable, yet was still something he could imagine. Were it a human, Cyber Geek was fairly sure he wouldn’t be able to go through with it. He really hoped he wouldn’t have to find out if it was in him to kill a sentient being.

“We’re going to be working in rotations, since the chaos this causes will reach well outside the timetable we were given. First teams go out tonight, then back before dawn for some rest and recovery while the secondary teams work. It’ll go like that until we’re in the clear. I can’t promise we won’t hit an all-hands-on-deck situation at some point, so make sure to use your downtime well. There might only be so much of it.”

“First teams! Find a coordinator and get your starting position assignments. Second teams, hit the beds. You’re up in just a few hours.” This announcement came from one of the many people wearing polos bearing the AHC logo. Support staff were essential to keeping this place running, especially since so many other capes lacked Cyber Geek’s experience with office drudgery, along with his honed planning skills.

The crowd broke into movement instantly; they’d all had enough training to understand that speed was a factor in dangerous situations. By the time he looked back up to the ceiling, Lodestar was gone, zipped off to another of what had to be countless pre-invasion tasks. The polo-wearing staff were moving fast, too, dispatching teams and individuals to patrol areas with blazing efficiency. When his team's turn came, there wasn't even a chance to speak.

"Ah, Cyber Geek's quartet—just one moment, please." The bespectacled man was slender and meek in a way that reminded Cyber Geek of himself less than a year prior. "Looks like you're on the home team. You'll be running patrols in Ridge City. No teleport needed. We'll route you as the night goes on. For starting off, let's have you begin near Ridge City Savings and Loan, swing wide around the Alfred Settler Memorial Plaza, then head up to Denny's Diamond Depot on fourth. By then, you'll have new directions waiting."

With their orders received, the team headed toward the main exit, a different direction than the vast majority of their peers, who were all being relocated to various locations. To his surprise, Cyber Geek noticed another group of four heading in the same direction. Waving, he caught the attention of Agent Quantum, who was walking with his own team. The big man returned the gesture, though there was still a bit too much crowd between them for anything verbal.

"At least we've got some heavy hitters hanging around," Medley noted. It was, by Cyber Geek's estimation, the first real compliment he'd ever paid the New Science Sentries.

"Let's just hope we don't need them," Hat Trick added.

"Because the threats are so weak, or we're so strong?" Cold Shoulder held up a bicep, perhaps intentionally showing off the results of her own training. Medley and Cyber Geek weren't the only ones hitting the gym lately.

"Ideally, because no one is in danger at all. I guess I'd settle for them being weak, though, since that would be easier for the average person to deal with." It was more or less the answer he'd expected from Hat Trick, though that didn't make her point any less salient.

It wasn't so long ago he'd been one of the normal humans, and he could still remember how terrifying it was in moments like these, when forces so far beyond anything he could fathom were gathered to determine his—along with the rest of the world's—fate. Hat Trick was spot on: the best outcome was one where nobody was in danger. Barring that, the next best thing was to make sure that if someone was in trouble, then there would be a superhero nearby to save the day.

“Everyone, grab a snack or some caffeine if you need it. We’ve got a lot of work to do.”

“Mobile, or fortified?” It was a strange question for Beverly to ask at a kitchen table next to bowls of Chloe’s half-burned spaghetti, even with the few empty beers scattered around. Laying in front of Beverly was a rough sketch of the neighborhood, with their building at the center. Based on the assessment they’d done over dinner, it was clear that holding this place during an invasion would be tricky. Like most apartment buildings, it wasn’t designed to resist real assault, only to keep unwanted trespassers out.

“With my hop-skip-and-jump phrase, we could change entire countries as needed. Even if the aliens come, there’s no way they can be everywhere,” Chloe pointed out. “Still a lot of planet to cover.”

Curious as she was about alien tech, Tori had been through one too many close calls lately to find any appeal in flying around, trying to hunt down invaders. Truth be told, in other circumstances she’d likely have holed up in the guild and let the whole ordeal pass, except they couldn’t very well bring Chloe along. She and Beverly had made sure to keep their friend off of both guild and AHC radar, since Chloe wanted to keep her normal life, extremely potent ability and all.

Considering the nature of the threat, mobile was absolutely the safer move. They could pop into some towns in the middle of a flyover state, the sort of place low on any invasion’s target list. Even if they picked wrong, Chloe could give them another shot within seconds. Mobile made them both efficient and safe.

And yet, Tori still felt a hitch in her stomach at the idea of fleeing. Ivan’s house had felt like her first home in a long while, and it had been destroyed—technically by her—during the last of these major catastrophes. This apartment, for all its faults, was hers. She’d chosen it with her friends, declared it to be her home, and even found herself missing it when she was away. Nexus had said it himself: a villain defends what was theirs. What was the point of having power if she was going to let some interstellar assholes push her around and wreck her home?

“I can’t speak for you two, but I don’t like the idea of running off and leaving this place for scavengers or aliens. If we try to stay here, we don’t lose our teleportation option. I propose we start by hunkering down, and then, if it becomes clear there’s no holding the line here, we bail out.”

“Running’s never really been my style, either,” Beverly agreed. Both eyes turned to Chloe, who was the heavier voice to weigh in on this discussion. She had no meta-suit, nor dragon-shifting. Her ability was strong, but strange, and certainly not the kind that could be counted on to keep her safe.

Scooping up two of the spaghetti bowls, Chloe brought them into the kitchen and dropped them on the counter, before returning, albeit not empty-handed. She’d grabbed the pink and black umbrella that always managed to somehow be in the same room or area as Chloe, despite none of them ever seeing it move, or even disappear. Sitting back down, she laid the umbrella down on the table.

“Last time I got involved in meta-human stuff, I accidentally exploded the top half of someone and ended up haunted by their indestructible umbrella. I definitely don’t want to do any fighting again, especially with outcomes like that, but I do have a little protection. I’ll stay with you two until it’s time to leave, and then we get clear. Fair?”

“Can’t reasonably ask for more than that,” Beverly agreed. “I think it’s a good plan. While we’re bracing for a fight, our exit strategy is impeccable. At the worst, we can strike hard, and then retreat.”

“Which brings us to our next question. We’ve got a single night to work with: what sort of defenses can we get in place before then?” Tori paused, looking over the rough diagram once more. “Ideally ones that don’t kill our neighbors or tip off the capes that there’s some sort of diabolical genius sharing the building with them.”

That earned her a raised eyebrow from Beverly. “Isn’t it a bit egotistical to call yourself a diabolical genius?”

“Humility is a virtue, so that shit is for the capes.”

“Touché.” A flash of thought darted through Beverly’s eyes. “Speaking of, should we expect any interference from them? Given that the New Science Sentries are on protective detail around you, they might be sticking close during an invasion.”

Crap. In all the madness of approaching aliens, Tori had forgotten their duty to her. Then again, if aliens ended up attacking the world, there was little chance the New Science Sentries wouldn't get called to pitch in. No way they'd let a team like that ride the pine guarding one woman and her apartment. It was a thought that felt true, yet didn't quite reassure her fully.

"Nothing to be done. We have no idea where the AHC will put them, or even if aliens will show up at all, let alone come here specifically. But I think a good rule should be that we stay civilian until the first contact is reported, just in case they check in. An invasion would mean shit hitting the fan, so they'll have way more on their plate to deal with than me."

"There's always—" Chloe was cut off by a burst of sudden, fast knocking on the door, like someone was trying to pound out a rhythm.

Tori rose, putting the pieces together in short order. That sound was really just someone knocking normally, only sped up significantly. Unless the legendary Ricky Rocket had suddenly run back into reality, she had a pretty good hunch who this would be.

Sure enough, the door opened to reveal Tachyonic, looking almost jittery with the way he was fidgeting. Someone must have their speed cranked up substantially. The energy didn't extend merely to his body, even Tachyonic's voice came out at an accelerated pace.

"Hey Tori sorry to bother you in a bit of a hurry we're technically on patrol but I zipped over to let you know the AHC has us patrolling the city so please keep your head down and stay safe since we won't be next door plus I also snagged an emergency response clicker in case anything happens just hold the button down for five seconds and we'll get an alert okay gotta get back on patrol bye."

The words were a flurry, ending in a burst of wind as Tachyonic dashed back out to wherever it was he was actually supposed to be. Resting in Tori's hand was a small electronic button, like a stylized garage door opener: silver and with a large AHC logo emblazoned across the top. For a moment, she felt dirty, holding a thing like that, but the notion was quickly followed by intrigue. This was something that tapped into the AHC's communications network. If Professor Quantum had designed it, there would no doubt be safeguards on top of safeguards, but logically, he couldn't make every single piece of tech the AHC used. Some had to be crafted by other, lesser minds that weren't so skilled at protecting their creations.

Shutting the door, Tori turned back to her friends, who were watching with curious expressions. "Good news: I don't think we'll have to worry about any capes. Now, if we can just convince the aliens to stay away, we might finally manage to have ourselves a goddamn peaceful weekend.”

Her friends laughed, and Tori chuckled as well, though there wasn't really much mirth in her at the moment. Tomorrow brought an element of unpredictable chaos, and there was no guarantee that when the dust settled, things wouldn't have changed. As someone who finally liked where her life was at, the idea scared Tori, the same fear that had helped act as a drive during her suit repairs.

When Tori felt afraid, her instinct was not to curl up and hide. Whatever was out there and coming to fuck with her, or the few people she cared about, would find a mad-eyed woman willing to fight tooth and nail to protect what was hers. Well, she'd certainly be willing to break somebody's teeth and nails, at any rate.

Whatever the Wrexwren were planning, Tori sure hoped they knew the fight they were in for. Otherwise, the savagery they were facing almost wouldn't feel fair.

---

Chapter 102

---

When the Wrexwren ships first entered Earth's space, it was a very different event than the Grzzniltan visitation. Since the last extra-worldly visitors hadn't been bringing a fleet, there had been substantially less concern. This time, it seemed all but a given that there was a fight looming, and the citizens of Earth had endured too many such frays to be caught unaware. Families sheltered in place where possible, or banded together in large community centers. Weapons were passed out, and those with meta-human abilities were assigned roles best fitting to their talents. The world at large prepared to weather a storm from the far reaches of outer space.

Quorum and Professor Quantum were in the same room as Lodestar, where they'd been waiting and talking for the past hour, until this moment arrived. Another message lit up the equipment, a new transmission from the Wrexwren. On the large screen, dozens of imposing ships filled the sky: strange and alien, yet with the familiar hallmarks of machines made for war. Weapons, shielding, maneuverability—the exact shape might change, but the generalities remained the same. In the center was a larger vessel, almost like four balls of metal yarn: one at the center and three linked with tubing that seemed much too thin to exist outside the weightlessness of space.

“Signal source confirms, that's our mothership.” Professor Quantum ran a finger along the readout, checking carefully. “Whatever big object they're dragging, it's still managing to stay hidden from our censors. We can at least tell it is significantly behind them, though.”

“Which may or may not matter, depending what it is and how fast it can move,” Quorum added. “All we can safely presume is that it will not be something that turns the tide in our favor.”

“Doesn’t really change anything, does it? I go handle the fight, you two take care of anything they try to pull while I’m gone. Any surprises, we roll with.” Lodestar couldn’t help staring at that void in their readings, even as she dismissed it. All of this felt too well-organized. For off-world invaders, everything seemed to be running smoothly. They had a plan, and while she didn’t know it yet, Lodestar also wasn’t convinced that things would go as easily as they hoped. Although, that could have easily just been the inner voice of experience.

Standing nearby, Professor Quantum finished reading over the communication. “Seems they’re ready to host guests. We’ve got thirty minutes to present a champion and claim the right to duel; otherwise, the invasion begins.”

“You’re getting ever faster at translations,” Quorum complimented.

“Yes, but also, they sent it in multiple Earth languages.” Professor Quantum seemed unbothered by the news—they’d already suspected the Wrexwren to have advanced information. This merely confirmed it.

“Half an hour isn’t a lot of time.” It wasn’t a concern, but Lodestar wanted to make sure she understood as much as possible. Once these things got going, there usually wasn’t a chance for reflection.

Professor Quantum tilted his head in agreement. “My best guess would be it’s a remnant of their culture too sacred to disregard, while also deeply inconvenient to the act of world-conquering, so they honor it in a cursory fashion. Whatever the case, no one sets a time limit that short and plans a grace period.”

No point in wasting her window, then. Lodestar did one last equipment test, checking her communicator, Professor Quantum’s newest galactic translator, the long-range scanning goggles, and other tidbits that helped make her job easier. Everything came back singing, as she’d expected. Professor Quantum had a lot of traits that caused friction between the two of them; his dedication to the work was never among them.

“This is Lodestar. Preparing to initiate contact.”

“Lodestar, we’re reading you loud and clear. Good luck, and godspeed.”

The voice on the other end represented one of the countless support staff who would be monitoring her feed, along with that of all the other active superheroes, as they tried to keep this situation contained. With a clock ticking down and all her prep work out of the way, there was only one thing left to do.

Lodestar leapt into the air, defying gravity like she took pleasure in it, which was accurate. In the ceiling, she slipped through one of the hatches designed for expressly this purpose. When the world needed Lodestar, it was often time sensitive, so after the tenth roof she'd burst through, the new design rule was to leave her some escape options.

Once clear of the AHC's base, she rose up, higher into the sky. Ridge City spread out below, a beautiful tapestry of roads, homes, businesses, communities—a society of people going about their lives. As she rose, Lodestar could pick out familiar landmarks: her own home, currently empty as Penelope waited elsewhere, watching the television to see her mommy fly. Without meaning to, her eyes swept further out, to the under-construction lot that was Ivan's house. More locales filled her vision: Penelope's favorite yogurt shop, Mr. Bando's karaoke bar, and a small patch of seemingly inconsequential street not far from downtown where a significant punch was once thrown.

Rising higher, more of the world came into view. Human eyes could never have taken it all in, but Lodestar was decades past being human. She could see most of her home nation, from the quiet hamlet of Canple, where her first life had started and ended, to the bustling metropolis of Faucet Hills, where she learned to be a cape. So many places, where she'd fought so many dangers. Higher and higher, until she was past the atmosphere, out into the true vacuum of space.

She loved this spot. In the early Lodestar days, before she learned to completely control her abilities, it was her quiet place. Up here, with the right angle, it was like she could literally hold the entire world in her palm. It would be so much easier to protect that way. Sometimes, she liked to imagine a version where things were that simple. Today wasn't about peace, however. Someone had gone and parked a fleet of warships much too close to her relaxing place for Lodestar's tastes.

Time to give them a proper Earth greeting.

Just as she turned, Lodestar caught a flash from below—that would have to be trusted to the other superheroes. She had a deadline to beat. Flying over to the mothership, Lodestar scanned for anything that seemed like it might be a docking port. While she could survive the crushing void of space without issue, not every species fared so well, and ripping a hole in their ship was a bit extreme before the fight had officially started.

Near what she thought of as the top of the pseudo-yarn ball, Lodestar spotted what appeared to be a large opening with some sort of energy barrier in front. Trusting that to be for keeping space out rather than ships or visitors, she set course and soared through, causing a commotion of surprised noises from the various Wrexwren gathered in what looked like their version of a hangar.

It was her first time seeing a Wrexwren, and they were certainly a sight to behold. Much like their ship, there was no real front or back: four huge arms, four squat legs, a thick torso, and heads without any visible features, all completely covered in what appeared to some sort of natural armor. It was sort of akin to stone, except far shinier. They began to speak to each other hurriedly, platelets in the armor of their face opening and closing quickly to create shrill tones that her translator picked up perfectly. They were surprised, but not flabbergasted.

“Somebody called for a champion from Earth. I’m here to take up the fight.”

More tones, though with less panicked energy. After a few moments, a new Wrexwren stepped out from an archway. This one was larger than the others, his armor a dark hue with spiked sections poking out. Perhaps it had to do with their roles in the society, or maybe genetics was as fickle a mistress on other worlds as it was on Earth.

“You are the Lodestar.” The voice didn’t come out of the face, which made the same tones as the others. It had a small blue device ringed around its neck, and that was where the words originated from.

“Guess my reputation precedes me,” she replied. “May I ask your name?”

This time, there was a delay between the whistles and the translator, as if it were processing. “My true name is unpronounceable in your tongue. The closest translation would be Salvryn, and I am the Zerle of this vessel.”

“Got it. Nice to meet you, Salvryn.”

Two of the arms sort of... shimmied, in a way Lodestar had no idea how to interpret. “A name is a thing given to all. I hold no pride in it. Zerle is a title of great honor. I will not be addressed without it.”

“My apologies, Zerle Salvryn. Your culture is a new one to me. I meant no offense.” Evidently, shaking arms indicated annoyance; that was probably a good note to file away. For now, she had to play nice. No matter how obvious their intentions were, she wouldn't give them an excuse to start anything.

"Of little matter. You will follow. Time runs short." Zerle Salvrin motioned for Lodestar to come with him, moving with surprising grace for those stubby legs. She also noted that his fingers had claws, a distinction from the other Wrexwren visible; one more feature to mark him as dangerous.

Walking through the ship was bizarre, even by Lodestar's extraterrestrial-vehicle standards. Riddled with loops and repeated sections, it was akin to a maze of mirrors, only without actually needing any mirrors to function. When Zerle Salvrin finally came to a halt, however, it was not in some reinforced room, as Lodestar was expecting. Instead, they appeared to be at a communications station, based on the number of screens and flickering holograms.

At her arrival, nearly every other Wrexwren filed out, until it was only her, Zerle Salvrin, and a few other Wrexwren that also had spikes on their armor. His clawed hands began to tap at the screen.

"Before you formally accept this challenge, you should know that leaving once it begins is akin to a forfeit. Should you flee, for any reason, the victory goes to the Wrexwren."

Without warning, the other Wrexwren let out a high-pitched tone. There was no translation in her ear for that one, which meant it was probably just the sound of them cheering.

Something was off, that was obvious by now. The hidden package they were towing, the specific condition, all of it was part of a plan. Unfortunately, she didn't see any way around it. Her only option was to be strong and fast enough to neutralize their scheming.

Zerle Salvrin kept right on clicking as he talked, laying out the question like a hunter setting down steel jaws. "Knowing that, do you, Lodestar, accept the role as Earth's defender?"

"Objection!" This was not a Wrexwren voice, or Lodestar's, but it was one she knew quite well. Half-surprised, and then surprised at the fact that she was surprised, Lodestar turned to see the unmistakable form of Doctor Mechanial in full meta-suit strolling up casually, with Xelas on his heels. Thinking back to that flash from below, she realized they must have been flying a ship that launched only a few minutes behind her. "That message you sent out made the invitation to any of Earth's citizens. Who says Lodestar gets to take the job just because she was here first? It's our home, too, you know. We do have a stake in this."

Several of the other Wrexwren moved position slightly, the most active one suddenly finding a seared patch of flesh roasting on his arm. Across the communications station, Xelas wiggled a still glowing finger. "Ah-ah-ah. We came here nice and chummy, playing by your rules. I'd be very certain of myself before deciding you want to play by ours."

Zerle Salvrin held up one of his four fists, and the other Wrexwren relaxed. "Very well. Do you wish to challenge her for the right? If it is not settled by the time limit, then Earth will have no defender."

"Me?" Doctor Mechaniacal put a hand on his metal chest, causing a clang. "Oh no. I'm not much of a fighter, especially not compared to these two. But I like a good fight, you see. One with real stakes and effort. Having you spring this on Lodestar and send her flying off would have killed all the fun." With one motion, Doctor Mechaniacal hit a button on his suit. A holographic image suddenly bloomed from a light in his hand.

The creature was massive and hideous, like a giant mouth hooked to a long body with various limbs stretching out, none quite like the others. "No idea what this thing is called, but I've been able to figure out quite a bit of other information. It appears to survive on plasma, and based on the energy readings of what they've been using to lure it along, my guess is it's the sort one finds in stars. Seems to eat every signal and light we shine on it—that's why it stayed hidden, like a living black hole."

Doctor Mechaniacal's words felt like tumblers clicking into place. A threat she couldn't ignore, even with the stakes established, one so powerful that Lodestar was the only person who might be able to stop it. But bringing in something to eat their sun? That was beyond invasion. They were willing to leave this world as nothing more than a cold husk.

"Is it who I think?" Lodestar didn't look at Doctor Mechaniacal. Her eyes were still on the monster, one that was flying not nearly far enough behind this very ship, heading toward the Earth's sun.

"Indeed, and he will be along shortly. We had him make sure the hangar was closed to any other potential interruptions."

"You have ruined our surprise, but it matters not," Zerle Salvrin declared. "Earth's hero must still choose. Defend your world from us, or from the Scralthor. Time runs short."

It was hopeless. She knew that already. The die was cast, and there would be no going back, but she still had to try. Lodestar saved people. It was who she was. “Listen to me, Zerle Salvryn. Whatever you think you’re doing, you’re wrong. I know how this sounds, and it must seem like prey in a trap begging for its life. But you are the one with the jaws closing in. While there’s still time, send that creature away. Sit down and talk with us as visitors, not invaders. Please, you have no idea what you’re getting your people into.”

This time, the pitches oscillated, high and low, long and short. Without fully understanding how she knew, Lodestar was certain she was hearing the Wrexwren version of laughter. “Pathetic. We’d been warned to no end of how dangerous Earth’s great champion is, yet she merely begs.”

Being a superhero was as much about accepting limits as challenging them. Lodestar couldn’t be everywhere, couldn’t do everything. Sometimes, she had to make the hard choices, and this was no exception. Shaking her head, she turned from Zerle Salvryn. “Remember, this was the path you wanted.”

The footsteps came from the same hall as Doctor Mechanic and Xelas had. This entity had no desire to sneak, however. He came strolling in, knocking a few globs of green-blue blood from his hands. It had been a long time since Lodestar saw the full outfit—as much as one could call it that. There had never been much of a formal costume: dark clothes, sometimes a leather jacket tossed on, an ensemble built for function over fashion. There was no need to glitz up the outfit when the mask already stood out so well. Blood red—because in the beginning, it had been actual blood; even his disguise referenced the sort of mess his fights had left behind. The eyes were still normal, but she’d seen the trick enough to know that they could change at a moment’s notice.

Her breath caught in her throat. When Lodestar asked if it was who she expected, she’d meant Pseudonym. This was so, so much worse. What happened with Apollo was one thing, losing control in a fit of rage over his children.

If Ivan had donned that mask in advance, it was a declaration of intent. Walking past, too aware of the clocks on them both, Lodestar whispered as lightly as she dared. “If there’s any mercy to be shown, try to find it.”

“They had their chance for mercy. Now, they get me.”

Roughly the answer she'd expected. Which meant her only option was to go deal with the Scralthor fast enough to still make a difference here. Not an easy task by any means, but being the strongest superhero meant Lodestar got the hardest jobs. As she flew away, back through the ship and out of the now wrecked hangar, Lodestar wasn't quite quick enough to miss Doctor Mechaniacal's words.

"My dear extraterrestrials, and the countless millions watching this stream at home, allow me to present Earth's defender for this duel: Fornax."

---

Chapter 103

---

“There’s something up.” Beverly couldn’t say exactly why the sensation was there. It was no singular element, no suspicious figure walking past the same alley three times, nor covert whispers being traded by unsavory characters. She couldn’t put her finger on it, but it felt like there was too much foot traffic around them, given what was happening. And she was pretty sure some of the faces had repeated. Then, there were the oddities, like a man in a full suit trying to hide what looked like neck tattoos, and the businesswoman whose dress showed the telltale outline of a knife. Part of her brain whispered for her to ignore the hunch, but her family had long ago taught her that intuition was often your gut being smarter than your head. Always worth at least a listen.

“You think?” Tori said, eyes wide as she sat next to Chloe on the couch. “Not only is Doctor Mechaniacal streaming a live feed of their assault on the Wrexwren, motherfucking Fornax just walked on-screen. What the living shit are they up to?”

Beverly kept her eyes on the street, watching the way the people flowed. Less than half an hour prior, a new link had appeared all over the internet, popping up on major sites as well as social media. The stream kicked on with a spaceship like four tied-together balls showing up on screen, and from there, the viewership had only begun to soar. Enough that it was strange so many people apparently had business around their building when there was a live invasion-attempt to watch.

“Show of force. When the AHC came for us, we lost some cred. Being hauled out into the street like that, losing our anonymity—it made us seem weak. I'd guess that's why the rules are getting pushed more. The Council wants to turn that trend around." Beverly craned her head, still focused on the street as she spoke.

"Got it." A dark joy spread across Tori's face. "We're going to remind them that the secrecy and systems were never the reason they should be afraid of us. Can't imagine a better messenger for that job."

There was a loud crunching sound as Chloe helped herself to a handful of popcorn. "At this point, anyone fighting for the same planet where I live is good with me. Go Team Earth!"

No question about it: Beverly was seeing more groups massed up as they walked by. Whatever was going on, it was escalating. Technically, there were several other buildings, other apartments, that this trouble could be addressed toward. If only that damned intuition would let her believe it.

"Tori, I know what we said about waiting until the aliens moved, but you might want to at least get in costume, if not your full suit."

To her credit, Tori's response held no hesitation. "On it. What's up?" She was already moving toward her room, where both outfits were waiting.

Beverly moved the curtains slightly aside, noting the way a select few of the walking masses reacted. Some of them had noticed, which meant they were watching her right back. "Not sure yet, just looks like trouble."

"Here I thought we rookies were going to miss out on all the fun." Tori slammed the door behind her, hurrying to change.

Lozora was learning it was hard to control a collection of individuals; they were far less cohesive than an actual group. Unfortunately, when one was hiring freelance violence, package deals were harder to come by. That was why her employer had procured a great deal of individual talent—more than really felt necessary to scare a few metas. Most of them were competent, mercifully, even if it had required hours of dressing to make them passable for normal civilians.

It was important to get the timing right. They had to strike during the initial wave, when chaos would be the highest. Even their long-laid preparations—the blocking technology in place, the teams ready to cause distractions elsewhere—would only work during the right window of opportunity. Move too soon, and too many capes could be brought in for assistance. They needed to wait until resources were at their limit before the trap would be ready. All of the work that had been done—drawing in the aliens, testing the equipment, even tipping off the guild to move Fornax off of Earth—everything was in service to this singular goal. Lozora didn't care about the outcome in a personal sense. This was her employer's grudge entirely; her motivation was largely monetary.

Although, it would be a lie to say she was in it for the cash alone. After seeing what her fellow villains had begun, their sad little clubhouse with its long list of rules, the idea of setting a counter-example appealed to her greatly. This was a chance to remind the world what true villains looked like.

Killing several capes would be the perfect way to drive such a message home.

More high-pitched notes, laughter, coming from the Wrexwren. Zerle Salvrin made one motion, and the noise came to an instant halt. He was a commander in total control of his ship; there was no question about that.

“This is your choice? Be certain. Once he dies, your only hope is lost. Pick someone strong, and do not mistake the crew you have encountered as a sample of what you are to face.” Zerle Salvrin drew himself up to full height, which was quite impressive, and stretched those spiked limbs out. “I have endured many battles, forged my strength in the deadly terrains of untold planets. You do not fathom the danger I represent.”

Another round of laughter—only this time, it wasn't the Wrexwren. Xelas, showing the reason Doctor Mechanial had likely brought her along, was leaning on a wall, letting out peals of howling laughter. “Oh my god, you have to stop. I'm going to pee, and I don't even do that.”

Doctor Mechanial kept to the more professional approach. Reading a species without faces wasn't easy, but the way some arms crossed and bodies shifted, they didn't seem to be fans of mockery when it was turned around. “Our selection is adequately strong.”

“Very well then, we formally accept your challenge.” Zerle Salvrin tapped one button on a nearby console, and suddenly, the ship rumbled slightly. “Should you defeat me, the invasion will be halted.”

A long pause filled the silence of the ship, until Doctor Mechanial finally piped up. “Are you waiting for us to cry out in surprise? Something like, ‘Oh no, they’re going to attack until you win, splitting your focus during the bout,’ or other tripe? Happy to disappoint, but we counted on that from the start. Before Lodestar stopped us, humanity had a real passion for making war. The ships are impressive and the discipline is respected, but you’re nowhere near humans when it comes to the mindset of combat.”

That earned some low pitches from the assembled Wrexwren, but Zerle Salvrin sounded unmoved. “All you have shown me so far is your talent for empty boasting. Come, Fornax. Let us see what the defender of Earth is capable of delivering. Your attendants may wait here, out of the way.”

“One moment.” Doctor Mechanial reached into a suit compartment and produced three small orbs. Each one glowed and quickly flitted out of his hand, hovering in the air, taking up a gentle orbit around Fornax. “I presume there are no objections to broadcasting the bout? Since you expect to win, it will be an excellent way to break the spirits of those watching below.”

“Or be a source of inspiration if I fall. A transparent effort, but I will win, so it matters not.”

It was a very good thing no one could see Wade’s actual smile. It would have given away the game right then and there. “Your grace is greatly appreciated.”

That earned him a short, shrill tone with no translation, probably akin to a grunt. Zerle Salvrin left the room with Fornax in tow, walking him along a stretch of various paths and routes, all of which were recorded and mapped by Doctor Mechanial as the cameras followed. It required fiddling with lots of settings and unseen screens, so to an outsider, he might have appeared to be pawing at empty air. Even if it left him looking silly at times, Doctor Mechanial still preferred this to display screens others could see, largely for situations precisely like this one.

While Fornax was being led away, he made a few motions not related to any camera work. No, these had more to do with the ship’s systems as a whole, and the remote access module Xelas had planted on their way in. It had taken a lot of work and every ounce of extraterrestrial tech information they could get a hold of, but as the connection established, Doctor Mechaniacal felt a deep satisfaction ripple through his bones. There was truly nothing like the feel of a plan coming together.

Access was only the first step, however. There was still quite a bit of work to do before the real scheme could kick in. Until then, Fornax, and Earth as a whole, were just going to have to endure.

Against the dark backdrop of space, it was easy to spot the hundreds of smaller ships alighting out of the fleet, their first wave of attack heading for the surface. Lodestar wanted to turn back, to knock them all from the sky before they could ever touch down, but she had much bigger concerns. The Scralthor, as Zerle Salvryn had called it, still looked mostly like a dark patch of space to Lodestar, but with every passing moment, she was catching more and more details.

Huge was an understatement. This thing could have easily tossed a comet without thinking twice. Its motions were like living ink on a map of the stars—it was more emptiness than being. Leading it by some distance, she spotted a pair of Wrexwren ships, spitting out small sprays of what appeared to be glowing liquid. Bait, meant to lure it closer to its targets. This close, there couldn't be much more guidance needed. Not for a creature that had evolved to eat stars. Most predators had means of finding their prey.

In earlier days, Lodestar would have been awash in self-doubt, wondering if she had the necessary power to defeat this threat. Having enough strength was no longer a fear she held, but wielding that power appropriately was another matter. For all she knew, this was a sentient, thinking creature that had merely been led to destruction by the Wrexwren. Just because something looked scary didn't make it evil. Using the kind of power it would take to stop the Scralthor came with risks; she'd much rather convince it to change course.

Should that fail, then force would be resorted to—hopefully just enough to scare it away before she had to get serious. So many steps to get through, and all while the Earth was fighting off an invasion. At least they weren't unprepared for it. If the Wrexwren thought her planet had put all of its eggs into the dueling basket, they were in for a sun-eating-sized shock of their own.

Across the world, skies burned with the glow of alien ships breaking through the atmosphere. For some, they came out of clouds, ruining a blue-sky day. Others saw their strange curves descending under moonlight. Citizens of all walks of life, in nearly every country, felt the tight clamp of fear bind their chests as the invaders landed around the globe. That terror drove some inward, deeper into their safehouses and bunkers to ride out the storm. For a different sort, rage was hot on fear's tracks, a fury borne from the fact that some interloping bastards would come try take this planet.

Wrexwren ships began to touch down; the first reports were already hitting the internet. The crews emerged clad in a foam-like exterior that was evidently their spacesuit, swinging strangely shaped objects that soon proved to be dangerous weapons. For a terrible moment, it felt like a true invasion, as though the aliens might get a foothold it would be impossible to drive them out of.

Lozora cared for none of that. Her orders were simple on this front. Now that the Wrexwren were beginning to move, the AHC was reacting. The digital feed scanner showed her capes suddenly popping up in all corners of the Earth. The Wrexwren invasion had officially, finally, kicked off. With their giant smokescreen in place, it was time to get to work on their actual objective.

"Listen up, everyone. I want to be crystal clear on this: the goal is to make them afraid. Corpses do not help us. Unconscious bodies, do not help us. Mutilated leftovers... well, that one is probably circumstantial, but we are not going to risk it." Lozora looked at her crew, the hodgepodge of miscreants her employer had managed to recruit. She'd have liked some heavy hitters, even one other Rookstone escapee, more for their experience than power. Half of this lot looked like they'd start slicing and never look back once they had a target.

"To put as fine a point on this as I can, anyone who breaks that rule can expect to have a long session with me, and Mr. Worthington, when this is over."

Even the hardest of faces blanched at that. There was an aura to the man, a coldness that went deeper than any she'd seen before. It wasn't that he was strong—that was common enough in the meta-human world. It was that he had an unmistakable mix of ruthlessness and competence. Encountering someone who claimed they would do anything to see their goals met wasn't a total rarity, but meeting someone who actually seemed capable of following through on such schemes was another matter. Her employer was such a man, and she was quite curious to see how one of his plans looked when it came to fruition.

After months of work and laying low, she was starting to feel like a proper criminal again. An excellent sign, since the day was only just getting started. Lozora gave one last look at the building, then back to her stitched-together crew.

“Remember: above all, we want them scared. Afraid for their very lives. So terrified, in fact, that they're even willing to call the capes for help.” Once the real targets showed up, that was when things would get interesting.

With a nod, Lozora dismissed her crew, and they moved toward the building as one. No more need for skulking about, hiding, or subtlety. At long last, it was time for a fight.

---

Chapter 104

---

“They’re coming.” This time, it was Tori who gave the report, though only barely. Between the full mask and costume, along with nearly every piece of her meta-suit, she was as close to being Hephaestus as possible without fully making the switch. Sitting at her side rested her helmet, waiting for the moment when it was donned.

On her laptop, she could see the crowd moving through the remote camera feeds they’d set up. With limited time to work in, most of their preparations had been focused on expanding their information-gathering capabilities. A few traps were waiting as well, but they’d all been built with the intention of halting robbers, or perhaps a few rogue aliens. As things stood, they were facing dozens of enemies, and with their civilian disguises falling away, it looked like at least some had experience with violence.

“Best guess on what they want?” Beverly had also changed, her usual flair for fashion replaced by the thick armor that would shift with Bahamut’s various dragon forms.

“This feels like the kind of force you’d see for guild business, except I can’t think of anyone we’ve pissed off enough to warrant the effort.” Tori paused, thinking things over. “Well, no one still around, or who has these kinds of resources.”

Clad in combat boots, thick pants, a flak jacket that Beverly had produced without explanation, and of course, holding her pink and black umbrella, Chloe was pacing around in the back, thinking hard. Her face was mostly covered by a wool balaclava, with a set of Tori’s telescope-goggles added to obscure her eyes, yet one could still make out the worried lines of her forehead if they searched carefully. “Maybe they’re friends of that gang who kidnapped you and got slaughtered?”

“Publicly, that was on Nexus. Privately, on the guild. Either way, I’d be a weird retribution target. Not impossible, though.” Something snagged in Tori’s brain, a memory from that dark time when she’d been taken against her will. “But that gang never wanted me in the first place. I was just bait, put in a trap to lure the New Science Sentries out, because they thought Tachyonic and I were an item.”

“Which many people online still do,” Beverly pointed out.

Finally, they’d hit an angle that had even the smallest bit of legs. Tori watched as strangers moved toward the building steadily, methodically, ensuring every exit was covered. The crowd didn’t even care how visible they now were. Definitely not the actions of people who were walking in expecting a fight. If she was right, that definitely meant they were here for Tori, not Hephaestus. What they would find, now that was a matter still to be decided.

Tapping carefully at a key with her gauntlet-covered hand, Tori cycled through the camera angles once more, getting a full sweep of the area. “Whether or not this is about the New Science Sentries, I don’t think they know who they’re coming for. Maybe they want to make enough commotion that Agent Quantum and the others show up; maybe they’re here to kill the whole building. The question is, what are we going to do? If there’s running to be done, this is our prime chance. They can show up to find an empty apartment.”

There was a look on Beverly’s face that Tori was starting to learn. It happened when they hit a point where her life and her nature were forced to be at odds with one another. The truth of the matter was, Beverly didn’t have the right disposition for villainy. She was too nice, too responsible—only her absolute hatred of the AHC had kept her from viewing the other side as an option. As a result, Beverly was caught in a difficult situation: trying to live as a villain while still being true to the decent person she was.

“We aren’t the only ones who live here.” It was Chloe who put voice to the issue, briefly changing Beverly’s expression to one of relief. “What if they find us gone and burn the whole place down, or we’re not even the targets?”

“Besides, you really want those pieces of shit touching all your stuff?” Beverly added.

The smart move, the survivor's move, was to leave now. Use Chloe's power, get out of Ridge City, spend the invasion holed up in some backwater bar, watching it all play out on television. The villain's move, on the other hand, would be to obliterate her would-be attackers, sending a message to all who tried next. Prey, or predator. Tori had fought like hell to claim the title of villain. It was time to start defining what that truly meant for her.

"We're going to use Chloe's power," she announced. The faces of both her colleagues were momentarily disappointed, though the expression changed as soon as she wrapped one armored hand around her helmet. "We're just going to use it a little differently than originally planned."

As the Wrexwren landed, out came the orders: different parts of the city, suddenly flaring up with various issues. The more experienced superheroes were sent to handle the actual landing sites, while Cyber Geek and his team ran to clear rubble from the road. A nearby building had been clipped by a landing ship, causing a massive obstruction in the roadway.

Medley and Cold Shoulder teamed up to haul the debris, the latter in her giant ice-armor to make lifting easier. Hat Trick was directing traffic around them, and as for Cyber Geek himself, he was making use of Autom's Eye from the latest Sneak Soldiers Semi-Solid game. In a franchise built around stealthing into various places and bases, there was no shortage of useful goodies to play around with, and this one was a real doozy, capable of floating through the air, scanning within set parameters, even feeding the images back into his eyeball display. Thanks to Autom's Eye, he was able to note that there were no Wrexwren approaching their position, though the humans nearby were getting antsy.

"Cyber Geek, what's your status?" The voice came over his communicator, one of the support staff that was too numerous to learn purely by voice.

"Cleanup is nearly complete, at least for the big chunks. Team is ready for our next assignment."

"We've got reports of an unusually large crowd massing up in a residential block to your east. Could be people collectively banding together in case they're attacked, but the old lady who called it in sounded spooked. Better make sure we don't have early rioters striking in the chaos. Sending location."

On his camera feed, Cyber Geek saw a Wrexwren wander into frame, directly to their northwest. His whole body went cold, the understanding that the battle was near landing on him in a way that seemed perhaps too familiar, given how long he'd been at this. It was a small mercy that the Wrexwren arriving were nowhere as intimidating as Zerle Salvryn, the leader whose face and name were all over the internet thanks to that livestream. Why in the hell the villains were up there, let alone squaring off with the Wrexwren, he hadn't the faintest idea. There was no time to sit and watch the unfoldings, so all of his intel was coming from what could be gleaned from short snippets of information.

Quick as the threat had arrived, it vanished, punched out of frame by someone wearing a brilliant emerald cape. With a small breath of relief, Cyber Geek activated the team channel on his communicator. "Be aware, there's some extra threats to the north. Exilor has got it handled from what I can see, but still, stay careful. There could be more around. Our orders are to head east—we've got a crowd that apparently needs controlling. We're not sure if they've just scared or up to no good, so diplomacy first until we know for sure. There's plenty of people afraid right now, the last thing we need is a misunderstanding."

Medley dropped a sizable hunk of bricks onto the sidewalk, out of the roadway, before spinning a few times to get his bearings. "You said east of where we are now?"

"Yeah, why?"

The buzz on Cyber Geek's phone proved to answer the question at the same time as Medley did, even though his teammate couldn't see the mini-map that had just appeared, showing their next destination.

"I'm pretty sure that's where we went to your friend's pool party."

Whether it was his animal abilities or merely a good sense of direction, Medley was spot on. While the map only gave a general zone based on the report received, it couldn't be a coincidence that Tori's building was smack dab in the middle of the estimated area.

"Everyone, move out. We've got civilians in potential danger." Despite keeping his words calm and professional, it took everything Cyber Geek had not to put on his jetpack at that very moment. Getting there ahead of his team would only make things harder, however, and rationally, he knew that. Nevertheless, after failing to be there for Tori twice already, Cyber Geek refused to go for three.

This time, he was going to save his friend.

“Get me every space-faring meta we have up there, knock those ships down before they ever break the atmosphere. Defense team, why are our beam-cannons missing so many of these vessels? How is our ground response going?”

From the sea of nameless workers, a voice rose up. “We’re working on counters for some of shielding and blocking tech they’ve employed, sir, but it’s... well, it’s like they know exactly what to defend against.”

Professor Quantum stood in the center of the chaos, watching every monitor, hearing every tidbit screamed or spoken his way, constantly calculating. In terms of raw power, he was now on the higher side of the scale, although he’d started much closer to Agent Quantum before decades of self-betterment. Even after all of that, his physical capabilities could never hold a candle to the talents of his mind. The world was filled with metas of all shapes and manners, but only he, only Professor Quantum, had gotten there on his own. He’d broken the world, yes, and by doing so introduced the meta-elements and shifted physics that made such impossibilities real, but he’d had to do it before those things existed. His power had come through old-fashioned hard work and genius, traits that were only amplified after the change.

Today, he was acting as the nerve-center of the response, issuing orders and tactics, conducting the entire fray like a lab-coat wearing maestro. Out there, he was one more set of highly capable fists. In here, he was an electric charge to the system, speeding everything up and handling issues as they arose. No one had objected to him taking on the role; in fact, most were delighted by it. Even Lodestar agreed it was the right call, and they were so often at philosophical odds that alone counted as a small miracle.

Yet it was not entirely for the greater good of the AHC that Professor Quantum had taken his place in the communications hub on this occasion. Somewhere, in the deepest recesses of his brain, a small voice whispered that he should see as much as he could. This tiny, oft-ignored voice represented what remained of Professor Quantum's self-doubt—a voice that whispered there was one enemy out there who could have been at work behind the scenes. Thought to be dead, but then, wouldn't be the first time, would it? With his massive intellect absorbing every detail from the multitude of informational streams, this ensured that if any clues did pop up, Professor Quantum would be the one to catch them first.

How he would deal with such an issue if it arose remained to be seen. There would be situational details to consider, but Professor Quantum would want to have a hand in the response regardless. If that annoying little voice did prove to be right, it only be proper that he deal with it.

This was no mere common criminal capitalizing on an opportunity. This was a chance to deal with an old friend.

For good.

At long last.

It was hard to tell if he was being led purposefully on a long route, or the winding nature of the ship simply made it seem that way. Around Ivan the orbs swirled, sending video of him and Zerle Salvrin, still leading the way, back home to Earth. The broadcast idea had been a hard sell, but Wade won out in the end. As he pointed out, the purpose of this was visibility, reminding everyone why the guild was nothing to trifle with. If they allowed the AHC to control the narrative, then any achievements the guild earned would either be minimized, ignored, or outright robbed of their due credit, depending on what suited the organization best. This way, there was no chance for them to spin. It gave the guild control of their own message, but also demanded Ivan rise to the challenge of live theatre. Fornax's performance would be key to making this worth the effort.

Zerle Salvrin made no attempts at chitchat or conversation. If Ivan was reading his general energy right, the Wrexwren leader seemed more put out than anything. Likely, he'd expected to join the invasion fun once Lodestar was off handling the giant space-monster. One of great many disappointments Ivan planned to deliver before the day was over.

At last, they reached a pair of large doors covered in various markings. Zerle Salvrin tapped a clawed finger on the entrance, producing an unexpectedly harmonious ping. “Perzolic ore. Very rare. Source unknown, chunks have been found spread across the galaxy. Once forged, indestructible. Every master-warship must include such a chamber. The only way to have a proper battle while traveling.”

The message was clear: no need to hold back. This cell could handle whatever they dished out—in theory, anyway. Zerle Salvrin stepped back as the doors parted and revealed an entire room made of the same gleaming metal. Given the rarity Salvrin described, Ivan could only speculate how many worlds worth of conquering this represented. Maybe there were a few shards of Perzolic ore buried on his planet as well, scraps the Wrexwren were eager to get their claws on.

He stepped inside, followed by Zerle Salvrin. Once they were through, the doors shut loudly and melodically in one sweeping clang. Scanning around, Ivan noted that there were no screens or windows—hardly surprising given the room’s purpose, but inconvenient for the plan he had in mind.

“Perhaps you technologically sophisticated pillagers have some sort of way to watch the outside world. Lodestar versus a monster that eats suns, I have to see that one play out.” The grin he gave was not for Zerle Salvrin; very little of any of this was. All of the pageantry was for the masses watching at home, ones who’d know quite well about Fornax’s history battling Lodestar.

“You wish to see your champion devoured before being broken yourself. What a strange challenger they have sent me this time.”

On the ceiling above them, an image suddenly snapped into focus. Darkness, the void of space stretching on endlessly... until the flash of light. Lodestar, blazing through the sky, on a crash course with an alien creature of untold size and power. Didn’t even seem fair, really.

“Do you have more requests, or are you prepared to begin?” Zerle Salvrin did little to hide his lack of patience, so perhaps the walk to get here really was just that long after all.

“I was prepared upon arrival, there—”

The movement was instantaneous, so much faster than the unwieldy size betrayed. Zerle Salvrin struck as soon as Ivan confirmed he was ready, mix of limbs twisting into a strange pretzel of crooks and angles. There was only a second to realize that this must be a kind of Wrexwren martial art before the first blow caught Ivan in the face, blasting him across the room where he banged off the far wall, leaving not so much as a scratch in the surface. He did note that the ringing sounds were far less enjoyable when conjuring them with one's own skull.

"Pathetic." Zerle Salvryn was standing a bit back, still twisted up, waiting to see what his opponent would do. After all that boasting, Ivan was really hoping for a paper tiger; unfortunately, Zerle Salvryn lived up to his own hype. That punch had packed a wallop.

Rising to his feet, Ivan brushed off his shirt and ran a hand along Fornax's mask, as if checking the placement—not that it had any potential to move with all the latches and charms keeping it in place. "Not bad, for a sucker punch. You might make this fun yet."

Again, no hesitation as Zerle Salvryn charged, although he did let out one quick response before unleashing a flurry of blows. "Pity, I do not hold the same expectations for you."

---

Chapter 105

---

For a bunch of randoms, Lozora's motley collection of crooks was sticking to the plan surprisingly well. They'd all remembered their approaches and areas to guard, ensuring there was no chance of escape. After that, it was a matter of turning up the pressure until the women caved and called for help.

"Boss, we got an issue. The team that was supposed to be ahead of us isn't here." The communicators, like all the tech these minions were using, were hand-made by her employer. A little shoddy on appearance, yet they carried a clear signal from within the building to Lozora's position down the street, where she was keeping watch.

The message came from one of the front-teams, second only to the actual first wave. "Are there any clues?"

"We thought we heard a scream and something heavy falling, but that's it. No signs of a struggle. They're just gone."

Teleportation? Or perhaps just a hidden pit or latch that covered up the captured contents. Either way, what the hell? Who had put traps inside an apartment building? After a moment's consideration, Lozora reasoned that there must have been defensive measures put in when the New Science Sentries took up residency.

"Careful, the AHC might have added a few tricks around there. Can't be too dangerous, though, not in a public residence. Watch where you're going, and I'm sure you'll be fine."

"Sure" was something of an overstatement, and for a moment, Lozora felt the uncomfortable sensation of guilt slither through her. It wasn't based on morality in particular—these assets were expendable, that was the reason they were here, and she didn't tend to hold mammalian life in high regard to start. Yet she did dislike finding herself doing to others what she herself especially loathed. Keeping a team in the dark made her feel a bit too much like her employer. The man barely gave her any information to go off of, keeping nearly all the tidbits that might make her job that much easier to himself. At least they knew who the bait was versus the real target... probably.

This time, she caught part of a boom on her communicator, in the split second before it cut out. After waiting a few moments, she tapped the broadcaster to send out a wide message. "Everyone, be advised: it seems there are some traps in place. Two of our advance teams are down already."

She imagined that riled them slightly. Most had been equipped with some level of offensive equipment, although those were for when the capes arrived, making these lower-powered goons feel like real threats for a change. Only now they would start realizing that a shiny new toy wasn't enough to change the odds entirely, not in a world like theirs. There might be threats they never even saw coming, to say nothing of having time to pull a trigger.

Because of her vantage point away from the building, only Lozora saw the approach. A figure in black metal descended from the sky, coming down with unexpected grace on the sidewalk outside. For a moment, she dared hope the job might be done, only to quickly realize this wasn't the cape they were fishing for. Didn't look like any cape she knew, in fact. She might have seen a suit like that one in the Ridge City Riots footage, but who could keep track of every metal-based costume?

Regardless, this wasn't their target: only an interloper and potential cause of trouble. Luckily, that was why the pawns had been equipped. This should be a threat they could handle, with the aid of technology.

"Perimeter Team Two, there's a meta-suit that just landed near your exit. Send a few with firepower to deal with it."

Almost instantly, they came from the nearest doorway's shadows. Three of her people, all packing some manner of ranged weapon. The one at the vanguard had a red serpent tattooed along the length of his body, poking out of the neck and ending on his skull. She'd seem him bring that tattoo to life when another member of the crew spoke with disrespect; it manifested as nine feet long and incredibly venomous. And that was nothing compared to what the mini-molecule detonator he was aiming would do to all but the hardest of flesh. Behind him were a pair of tough metas with fun guns of their own. She practically felt bad for the poor idiot who'd chosen the wrong landing point.

Running up on their quarry, they didn't bother with such pleasantries as a warning. Red Snake raised his gun, getting a line on the target, ready to shoot. Lozora was so focused on watching her people, she didn't catch the source of the beam. All she saw was the flash of light as a searing energy burst forth, sweeping along to make sure it hit all three of the approaching forms. In seconds, it was over, and what remained of Lozora's attackers was writhing on the ground.

No warning. Not even a word said. They saw a weapon aimed and responded with zero hesitation, employing what was inarguably far too much force. That was definitely not a cape—even the worst of them couldn't get away with that kind of response. Yet the power of the weaponry employed spoke to a professional, someone a cut above from the general rabble of ne'er-do-wells.

The only minor mercy was that, by luck or intent, the beam had been fired at a low angle, targeting the bottom halves of the would-be attackers and ensuring only some melted street in collateral damage. Lozora also noticed a lack of blood, and quickly realized that the wounds were cauterized as they formed. The end result was that all three were technically alive, for the moment, though none were as whole as they'd been moments prior.

"What the living fu—" Lozora didn't hear the rest of the message. It was cut off, though she was fairly certain her excellent ears detected something like a roar coming from within the building. More than just one, they were coming in succession. Screams, as well.

After a moment, she got a more coherent message. "Boss, something is in here! It's green, and huge, and it's breaking people in half. We can't even get a clean shot."

"Then take a dirty one," Lozora snapped. Months of work, planning, scheming, and all of it was getting immediately fucked up by some unknowns crashing the party. She didn't really care about success or failure on a personal level, but her employer would be sure to blame her for any issues, and this project represented too much work to miss out on her payday.

Like most of the crew, this member proved to be more adept than expected at following orders. Less than five seconds later, part of the building's third floor exterior wall exploded outward, sending brick and debris spraying into the empty street. The newly formed window showed Lozora a peek at what was going on, and it was not a pleasant sight. What few of her people she could even still see were either leaning on a wall or one another, clearly nursing injuries. One of them lifted a staff overhead, preparing an attack, only to go sailing back from an unseen blow. The strike carried him off his feet, and would have slammed him into a wall, if only the wall was still there.

Instead, he went sailing out the new third-story expedient exit, crashing with a wet thud on the sidewalk below. Lozora was fairly certain he'd been an extra tough meta, so there was a chance he might walk it off. The same couldn't be said for what remained of the advance teams, who'd been cut through at a rapid rate.

While Lozora was distracted, the black meta-suit had advanced, making it all the way to the front entrance. She didn't see the charge, but evidently, one of her people tried to hold the perimeter. The suit threw a punch, grabbed an arm and twisted its hips, hurling the adversary into plain view as they were tossed over the suit's shoulder, into the street. Blood ran down the goon's mouth, indicating where that first punch had landed. Walking back over, the suit leaned down, and then stomped on both of the man's elbows. Between the impact and the audible crunch, it was clear he wouldn't be getting back into the fray.

Much as she respected the efficient brutality, they were clipping through her pawns at a rapid rate, and the real party hadn't even kicked off yet. She was going to have to slow this down, which meant getting her own hands dirty. It would make things tougher later on, but this had to last until the cavalry was called for.

"Hephaestus!" The voice rang out from the sky, the descending form of Cyber Geek soaring into view, jet plumes firing off a pack strapped to his back. He bore down on the suit almost like he planned to crash, before pulling up short just in time, coming to a sharp halt. "What have you done?"

"Self-defense." Hephaestus, the suit's evident name, tilted their helmet down to the man still writhing in pain. "Maybe slightly aggressive self-defense."

“You call this slightly?” He motioned to the downed man, even as more were appearing from within the building, taking note of the injured among their peers.

“Look buddy, if someone points a gun at me, I’m not taking the gun. I’m taking the whole fucking arm.”

Nearly on cue, one of the rabble from the building raised an impact isolater, firing at where Hephaestus and Cyber Geek were standing. The explosion of force sent Cyber Geek flying backward, causing a flicker of blue light where he landed, while Hephaestus was merely knocked back a few paces, the differences in their mass causing variant reactions.

Two more goons had their weapons at the ready, and Lozora felt a sense of relief as things got back on track. The giant wall of ice that suddenly formed, blocking line of sight between her crew and their targets, stole the relief away just as quickly. Multicolored scarves shot out from a nearby alley, ensnaring and plucking the weapons from the attackers’ hands. A hulking beast of a creature ran over, scooping Cyber Geek up and putting him back on his feet.

“What’s going on?” Now that she could see him better, Lozora recognized Medley, along with Hat Trick and Cold Shoulder. They’d managed to summon a team of capes, as intended, just not the right ones.

“No idea. Some kind of attack, and it doesn’t seem like aliens,” Cyber Geek relayed.

Scanning the field, Medley caught sight of Hephaestus and let out a growl, stepping forward before Cyber Geek’s hand snagged his furry shoulder. “Hang on. He’s not with them. They shot at both of us.”

“Of course I’m not with them. These bastards came at me. I’m just showing them the folly of their ways.” Without warning, Hephaestus fired another beam, this one directly into the ice wall. It exploded the entire structure, turning the shards of frozen water into shrapnel flying directly at the formerly gun-toting trio. This time, there was quite a lot of blood, as jagged hunks of ice didn’t seal their wounds the way an energy beam did.

“Stop that!” Cyber Geek yelled, growing visibly distressed. “You’re going to kill someone.”

“Do you think those guns fired beams of candy canes and rainbows? Wake up, dipshit. Those people were aiming for our heads. They are not here to play the game of capes and villains. They came with a purpose and will happily leave you cold on the street if you get in their way.”

So, this suit was a man named Hephaestus, and he was observant, as well as able to comprehend the true stakes on the table. A complication, no doubt about that, yet in the end, things had still worked out well enough. The targeted woman calling for help would have been ideal, as it was the least complicated version of the plan. However, there was no reason it couldn't be multiple factors that drew the New Science Sentries over: fellow capes asking for backup would be an excellent motivator.

Double-checking her laptop feed, Lozora confirmed that the AHC's resources were largely deployed. The goal was to limit how many options could even come to help; otherwise, they might end up with more unwanted additions. Based on what their systems were able to gather, the capes appeared to be stretched damn thin. For every three Wrexwren landing sites, there would be only one unit to respond. The aliens could certainly take direction well—they were overwhelming the exceptional skills of any individual cape purely by being too numerous to be effectively dealt with.

With so much to handle, the only teams likely to respond would be other capes stationed in Ridge City. Between the location and the team needing assistance, she couldn't see any possible way to stack the deck harder for getting the New Science Sentries. Since there were no more variables to tweak, that meant it was time to advance.

“Secondary team, now.”

Had they possessed a capable teleporter, her first choice would have been to drop the additional troops in suddenly, with no warning. Since that was not a skill her employer possessed, however, they'd gone with another, more classic method. All around the street, car doors began to open and bodies poured out. Using the same cloaking tech they'd tested with the kidnappers, every vehicle had been fitted to hide any life signs from even the most potent of scans. In a night of pre-invasion revelry around town, it had been a simple matter to have them parked and waiting.

Just like that, the capes and Hephaestus found themselves surrounded on all sides. These were more formidable opponents, the ones considered to be not quite so easily replaced, and as such, her employer had gifted them with higher-valued equipment. If these annoyances thought all the fights would be so easy as the first wave, they would be in for quite the surprise.

“Come on, already,” she muttered, idly checking the streets and sky for movement. The sooner they arrived, the sooner the real work could start. One way or another, they were going to pull the New Science Sentries here.

It was just a matter of finding the screams that would bring them running.

---

Chapter 106

---

Ducking beneath the cracked remains of a lamppost, Jean huddled in the shadows, hoping that the unnatural forms wandering nearby wouldn't notice. They'd already landed their ship in the middle of his block, opening fire on the nearby citizens with their strange, sizzling weapons. Jean was trying to slip out. He was the only one of his family here; he just had to move to the big city for University. Already, his mind was on the village kilometers away, hoping it was as peaceful and idyllic as his heavily panicked memory was recalling. He had to get there, had to make it away from the landing site. The Wrexwren couldn't be everywhere. It was just a matter of staying unseen.

The pair nearby were pawing at the front of a jewelry store window that had been smashed open in the chaos. One with armor in a light green hue plucked a sapphire earring from the display. It made high-pitched whistles to its magenta counterpart, who echoed similar sounds right back. Green took the gem in its eight-digit hand, then slammed the butt of its weapon down onto it, causing a spark. Lifting its arm high, Green dropped the chunks of sapphire down into its face, all the various holes opening wide to accept the offering.

Silence, then loud, sharp whistles as the green Wrexwren shook its head violently, clearly unhappy with the choice of snack. While they were distracted, Jean started to creep back, slowly and steadily shifting his feet one after another. Not too fast, focus on being silent. Every step had to be sure... which made the sudden arrival of the curb behind him so unfortunate.

Although he momentarily lost his footing, Jean managed to avoid taking a tumble. He didn't even whirl his arms or nearly keel over. What he did, however, was produce a loud yelp in the brief instant where he felt the ground slip out from under him. The moment his foot was stable, he looked back at the Wrexwren, whose heads were suddenly stiff and alert.

All efforts at planning flew away in an instant. Jean simply turned and ran for everything he was worth. Stubby legs slamming onto cobblestones marked the pace of his pursuers, and it was horrifyingly swift. They were catching up already as he took the first corner, using his knowledge of the area to aim for narrow, twisting alleys. If he could lose them on the angles and find a nook to hide inside, he might see that farm again one day after all.

Part of him wanted to look upward, to search the skies, wondering where the hell all the capes were at. What was the point of the AHC having a branch here if Sir Vitesse couldn't even marshal the superheroes into helping out? Jean already knew the answer, though. They were out there dealing with the hundreds of other ships that had come crashing to Earth. He'd just been unlucky enough to be one of the people left on their own.

Ducking along a narrow stone wall, Jean hunkered down, listening to the sounds of heavy steps now no longer dashing. Had he managed to lose them?

That delusion lasted only until the first nearby wall exploded in a shower of mortar and rubble. Ten feet over, and Jean would have been caught in the detonation. Through the gap, he could just make out the form of the Wrexwren. Magenta had a weapon still pointed at the wall, whereas Green was selecting a target. A sharp whistle and shifting head confirmed that the window had worked both ways; they'd seen Jean at the same time he spotted them. Not that it would have mattered, since they were obviously happy to destroy the whole neighborhood for the fun of running down their quarry.

Nowhere else to run, and little hope of superheroes happening by to offer salvation. This was it, then. To his surprise, Jean felt calmer than he would have expected; once the future became certain, fear was something of a useless concept. He started to lift his arms into fists, thin as they were, before thinking better of it. From the rubble, Jean lifted a hefty chunk of stone. It felt almost fitting, to fight with a rock, humanity's very first evolutionary tool pitted against these better-equipped sci-fi conquerors.

Magenta raised its weapon once more, making sure Jean knew he would have limited time to use that rock. Then, without any warning, the Wrexwren was gone. In its place was an exploded pile of viscera and organs, none of which appeared even vaguely human. Green was still there, swiveling its head around quickly. It very nearly got a guard up in time before the hulking man stepped out of the alley's shadows. The Wrexwren struggled as those meaty hands broke apart its attempts to block, this giant man gripping the whistling head like he was palming a basketball. A grunt of effort slipped out as he turned the arm—and the Wrexwren's head—steadily counter-clockwise. Several crunches and pops made it seem as if the job was done, but when he yanked at the end and took the head off entirely, there could be no doubt that the fight was definitely won.

"Anything fun?" The voice didn't come from the giant. It was further up the alley, and had spoken in English. Jean knew quite a bit from his studies, so he listened closely, unsure of whether this was truly better than what he'd been facing or not. Mindless murdering monsters were horrifying in their own right, but there were some truly scary humans out there, as well.

"More exploders, from the looks of things." The huge man hunkered down and lifted up the light green Wrexwren remains, gently plucking the weapon hanging from its claws.

"I'm not mad at that. These are pretty fun. Can definitely find some buyers once the dust has settled. I do hope we find something a little more special, though. One of these has to be their version of a higher rank with fancier gear." The second speaker having now stepped fully into view, Jean realized he was human—in appearance, if nothing else. Slim, cheerful, clad in a pinstripe suit, a Wrexwren weapon slung over his shoulder. That explained what happened to Magenta, at any rate.

The larger man let out a low harrumph. "I still wish they hadn't destroyed the outdoor market on entry. Such a waste."

"Tell you what, after we fence all this tech, let's pick up a case of truffles and snails or whatever," his friend replied.

Moving as slowly as he could manage, Jean backed away, toward a gap in the debris where he could squeeze past. Tempting as it was to run to these two for help, capes didn't rip the heads off opponents' bodies and then loot the corpses. Whoever this duo was, they represented a different meta-human element, one that Jean had no desire to learn more about.

Just as he was about to slip through the break, Jean looked up to see that the small man was standing over the puddle that had once been a magenta Wrexwren, watching him move. For a second, they held eye contact before Jean bolted, scurrying through a break in the debris and sprinting the moment he was on the other side.

It wouldn't be until a several hundred meters later that he would finally slow down, and only then realize that perhaps the run might have been easier if he hadn't held on to the huge rock.

Seeing the crowd rise from the cars, Hephaestus dearly wished they hadn't left Chloe, who was going by Cliché in her makeshift costume, up on the roof. The plan made sense, in theory. Since the people attacking thought their targets were trapped in the apartment, all attention was focused on keeping them inside. By repositioning themselves to the rear and staying hidden in the halls, they were able to strike from the angles no one was expecting. Unfortunately, as the second wave reminded her, they weren't the only ones allowed to get clever. She did have to wonder, who the hell was committing this much force to what sure felt like fishing for small fries?

Weapons were being pulled, and she could see several metas drawing on their abilities, including one who appeared to be absolutely sizzling with energy. Before the battle could start in earnest, Hephaestus fired off a quick shot, right into the glowing one's torso. Anyone showing off that much would be more trouble than it was worth.

While certainly not planned, the shot did turn out to be helpful. All that crackling energy exploded out from the now dead meta, striking at the others nearby and causing momentary confusion. It was an unexpected window of opportunity; the question was what Hephaestus should do with it. If she zipped up to the roof and grabbed Cliché, they could pick through the interior stragglers, scoop up Bahamut, and get clear. Of course, that would mean leaving their home, along with Cyber Geek and his team, totally undefended.

Running was always an option—she wasn't ready to give up on fighting just yet, especially not when things were getting interesting. They did need to regroup, however.

Racing over, Hephaestus clapped Cyber Geek on the arm.

“Come on. We have to go inside. We’ll be overwhelmed out here.”

“What?” Cyber Geek had produced a large shield in a shower of sparks and numbers. He was trying to get between the crooks and the others before they recovered. “Why would you help us, and why would I trust you?”

“How about because neither of us has ever tried to kill the other, which I can’t say about any of those assholes.” Hephaestus cocked a thumb at the already recovering crowd, driving home the point. “Do you really want one more enemy in this situation when you could have an ally?”

Shots came from the goons—some bullets, some blasts of strange color, all crashing into the surroundings with various destructive effects. Cyber Geek took one right on the shield, drawing a loud beep and sparks, even as the protection held together. “I suppose that old ‘enemy of my enemy’ bit doesn’t endure for no reason. Fine, we’ll go inside with you, but if you try anything—”

“You’ll scold me and call the coppers?” Hephaestus interrupted. “Save the empty threats for someone who doesn’t know how capes work. Now, let’s get in the damn building already.”

Together, the five avoided most of the shots as they scrambled for the entrance. Too many of the shots, in fact—only Medley took a few bullets, and those didn’t even break his scales. Hephaestus had a hunch they were shooting to wound, at most. If they were still holding back even after she’d wantonly been breaking their troops, then they didn’t have whatever it was they wanted yet. More and more, the evidence was pointing toward this being about someone else, and it was hard to imagine who it could be other than the New Science Sentries.

Huddling in the mail room, Hephaestus clicked off her helmet’s outward speaker and activated it’s communicator. The device was connected to a similar model expertly woven into Bahamut’s mask. Since Cliché wasn’t a guild villain, however, she had no such equipment on hand. They’d had to improvise a little to keep her in the loop.

“Bahamut, what’s your situation? We’ve got reinforcements surrounding the building, and these look more competent than the last wave. Cliché, everything okay up there?” With the helmet speaker disabled, Hephaestus was effectively able to have a private conversation, despite all the capes in proximity.

“I’m okay, but there’s a lot of people around us.” Patching a toy walkie-talkie into their communication system hadn’t been easy, but it was also a trick Tori had lots of experience with. When it came to listening in undetected, there were few things as convenient to crack as a radio signal. Guild lines were too encoded for a direct tap, but patching a signal through her helmet and relaying it to Bahamut made the whole system more or less function, at least well enough for what they needed in the moment.

After a few seconds, the deep hush of Bahamut’s voice joined in. “Pretty sure I’ve cleaned out most of the first wave, but there’s bound to be a few stragglers holed up. Have to be careful moving around inside from here on. Where do you want to regroup?”

That was an excellent question. Their own place was out, for obvious reasons. Roof would provide easy exits in a pinch, but also opened them up to fire from a distance. Given that Cliché could get them out easily enough, there was no reason to risk that yet. Ducking into a random apartment would be the easiest move, except she didn’t know which ones would be occupied, and adding civilians to the mix was only going to make things messier. They needed somewhere safe, ideally secure, and not currently occupied.

Instantly, Hephaestus knew where they were heading. “Group up at the New Science Sentries’ apartment. If anywhere in here has extra protections, that’ll be the place, and most importantly we know it’s not currently in use. Bahamut, open the door and rough up the scene so it looks like an empty place you stumbled upon mid-battle. Can’t risk letting on that we know who actually lives there. Cliché, if you want to keep an eye on things up top, it’s fine, but get out of there if there’s even a whiff of danger.”

“So far, no one seems to have noticed me,” Cliché replied. “I don’t mind keeping guard. It’s better than watching that video stream.”

“Why, what’s going on with the video?” Had Ivan already lost control and gone on a rampage? That would be a surprise, but if he was wearing that mask again, then there was no telling what was on the table. Hephaestus was prepared for anything.

“It’s Fornax. He’s... he’s losing. And it looks like it’s starting to hurt.”

Halted dead in her tracks by the cold chill of shock, Hephaestus realized she wasn’t as “prepared for anything” as she’d thought.

---

Chapter 107

---

Zerle Salvrin delivered a blow to Ivan's stomach, slipping through his guard with those twisting movements and hurling him back against the far wall. Most metals would have dented, or at least shown a scratch after so much damage, yet their chamber remained intact no matter how many times Ivan was roughly slammed into the material.

Thus far in the fight, Ivan had learned quite a bit about Zerle Salvrin's combat abilities. The alien had prodigious strength, exceptional reflexes, an outstanding capacity to read an opponent, and one could only presume durability on par with the rest of his abilities. The reason Ivan had to make guesses on the hardness of his opponent was that he'd yet to land a substantial blow.

Punch after punch, he would try to dodge, block, or otherwise counter, only to be slammed from some unexpected angle, clobbered across the room until he scrambled up and the whole dance began once more. There were times Zerle Salvrin could have pushed the attack but chose not to. Perhaps he was being cautious, making sure that Ivan didn't have some hidden tricks up his sleeve. Or, as one who'd clearly reached a level of strength which surpassed that of his peers, maybe Zerle Salvrin was merely savoring the chance to let loose against a sturdy opponent. It was a sentiment Ivan understood perfectly.

"What a disappointment." Zerle Salvrin's words were still coming out translated—whether for Ivan or the audience watching at home was anyone's guess. "The rumors of Earth's strength had me intrigued. There are whispers about this section of the galaxy, tales of exploratory forces that vanished entirely. Yet when we arrive, what do we find? An overconfident champion and a pitiful substitute.”

The laugh that rose from his throat was not Ivan’s. It was too expressive, too mad, and much too joyous. A small drop of blood slipped from the corner of his mouth, one of the small wounds this battle had already imparted. Ivan caught it with his tongue, running the red along the stretch of his teeth. It was a very familiar flavor, one that called up parts of him he’d spent decades trying to bury. He held it back, not denying what welled up within, merely halting it for the moment. This wasn’t yet the time.

“You laugh?” Zerle Salvrin was confused, though it was unclear if he was wondering why Ivan was laughing, or if he was checking to see that that’s what the sound was.

“I do. I laugh at you, Zerle Salvrin. I laugh at your idiocy, your ignorance, and your pride. I laugh because you still have no idea where this is going. And I laugh at your pitiful idea of strength. You cannot fathom the power we’ve all been struggling against, nor how we’ve grown as a result.”

No more talking: the banter earned Ivan a fresh round of punches, this time catching him directly in the ear. He spun across the room, slapping the wall once more and sliding down. Laying there, he took a brief moment to catch his breath, eyes scanning the ceiling screen to check on Lodestar’s progress. She was getting close, tearing through space at speeds no rocket could hope to match. Still going to be a while, knowing her. Even against something like that, Lodestar would try to talk. To reason. To find a way forward that didn’t require violence. It was a habit that was easy to dismiss or mock, and there had been no shortage of capes or villains who’d done both through the years.

But silly an idea as it seemed, Ivan could never say that it was pointless. Because every now and then, she was right. There was a solution other than punching, a compromise to find where everyone could be satisfied. A spark of goodness in a criminal the world was willing to write off. She had her way, and Ivan could endure until the time was right.

For the show they had planned, they required a perfectly set stage. Until then, Ivan would have to deal with the beating and wait for his cue.

The alert in Tachyonic's ear came just as he finished yanking the weapons from a pair of Wrexwren clutches. Powerful as their tech was, once it was stripped away, they were only marginally stronger than regular humans, which was nowhere near powerful enough to hang with the New Science Sentries.

Agent Quantum brought down the first Wrexwren with a pair of punches, while the other tried to flee. A searing beam of energy caused the alien to skid to a halt, moments before Agent Quantum appeared overhead, dropping heavily down and subduing his second target.

Presto popped into view nearby; now that the threats were handled, he didn't have to manipulate from behind the scenes. "Okay, I tried again and felt like I was going to burst a blood vessel. These things are either way denser than they look or have some natural resistance to teleportation. I'd wipe myself out just shifting one, forget about popping them around."

Half-ignoring Presto, Tachyonic listened carefully to the message relay. It wasn't an official dispatch, technically speaking. But he'd put in a request to be notified if there was significant activity in a certain area of Ridge City. Based on the timestamp at the end, sending it over hadn't been high priority.

"Sentries, it sounds like something might be going down back at our off-site base. There was a report of a large crowd gathering, and a team was sent out to check on it. Nothing reported back yet."

"Which could mean they're busy dealing with the threat," Plasmodia suggested.

"Or that they were wiped out in an instant," Presto countered.

Agent Quantum looked over his team, first at the pair debating, then at Tachyonic himself. His gaze lingered there, briefly, before giving his oldest friend a knowing nod. "Regardless, we have a responsibility in that building, civilians we gave our word to protect. Our track record on that front has been frankly terrible. Seems like we've finally got a chance to do this right, so let's make sure we use it well."

"I'll scout. You relay our position shift and catch up." Tachyonic was gone so fast he imagined himself getting ahead of his own words, though that was impossible at his system's current settings. Nevertheless, he blasted through the increasingly familiar streets of Ridge City, along the nearly vacant highway, past the buildings of people hunkered down, until he neared the downtown section stuffed with residences, including one old apartment building that now hosted a giant hole in the third floor.

Skidding to a halt, Tachyonic resisted the urge to go in swinging, especially once he caught sight of the crowd that awaited. Dozens of people, none of whom looked friendly, wielding the same cobbled-together tech they'd been picking off the street for weeks. Except, this was no selection of minor wares; every person out there was geared up with at least one device. Some had multiple. That was without counting the ones showing clear meta-powers, like the woman hovering, or the guy talking to four frogs the size of hubcaps.

"Team, we've got more than just a group out here. Looks like someone assembled and outfitted a small army—none of them alien, at least visually." Tachyonic's speedy brain zipped through the possibilities. This organized and malicious group made it seem like something that villain's guild would be a good fit for, except he didn't recognize any of the milling faces. Based on the Ridge City Riots footage, most of the guild members had existing famous careers or were fairly distinctive, none of which applied to this rabble. It could be a meta-gang out to grab territory in the chaos, but this was a strange place to try to claim, especially considering the AHC headquarters wasn't too far off. It didn't track. There was nothing about this place valuable enough to warrant such force, which meant it was more likely about one of the building's tenants.

The most probable explanation was that they were here for the New Science Sentries. If their identities had leaked and someone figured out their address, that might explain the attack force. Only... much as Tachyonic hated to admit it, they hadn't really done anything to warrant this yet. Since arriving, the vast bulk of their time had been spent dealing with low-tier muggers and goons, not the kind of people who could access armies for vengeance. There was also the chance the crowd was here for Tori, if they were connected to the other gang and had decided to hold her responsible for the slaughter, since Nexus was well out of reach.

Over the communicators, he heard an unexpected, familiar voice pipe up. "Tachyonic, did you come into range?"

AHC communicators functioned on multiple levels, and while dedicated channels to the home base and one's team were always useful, there was also value in a simple proximity system, making sure they knew when they had allies in the area.

“Cyber Geek, is that you? What’s your location?”

“Currently inside, hunkered down and figuring out what to do next. They’ve been like this for the last few minutes, penning us in but not advancing.”

Tachyonic peeked around a corner, able to carefully scan the surroundings in a fraction of the time most would need. “It’s weird. They’re all staying ready to react, but there’s no movement toward the front. Any idea who these jerks are? My best guesses were a gang out for revenge or part of that villain guild.”

“The first is possible. The second one is probably out, though,” Cyber Geek replied.

“What makes you so sure?”

“Because we’ve got two of that guild’s members here with us, and they’re both pissed about the situation.”

That lined up with what little they knew about the guild—one feature of which was that very lack of information. If the guild did deal with internal issues, they certainly weren’t public about it; this was exactly the kind of situation that drew AHC’s attention. The fact that Cyber Geek was stuck with a pair of villains didn’t sit well with Tachyonic, however. It was possible they were there as moles, or even the ones who’d put all of this together in the first place. He’d have liked to simply trust Cyber Geek’s judgment, but with civilians in the building too, it was best to avoid chances as much as possible.

“Which two members do you have, exactly? Knowing what they can do gives us more options. I can do some quick research while the others are on their way.”

“I don’t imagine that will be necessary. Your team is already familiar with the skills of Hephaestus and Bahamut.”

Of course—of fucking course—it would be them. Taking a moment to steady himself, Tachyonic reasoned that there were two versions of this scenario: either the villains were truly with them, or part of the attack. While the latter would be highly problematic, the flipside was that he knew those two were capable: smart, tough, and motivated to survive. If the pair really were with them for this fight, it added more to their desperately mismatched team sizes. Ten versus a small army wasn’t a lot better than eight, but it was an improvement.

“Any sign of our mutual friends?”

“There’s some sort of blockade between us and their room, with a few people already skewered on it. We assumed you’d put some defenses in. I’ve texted her a few times since we arrived. Seems like she and the others are sheltering in place. I warned her to keep everyone indoors and away from the windows until we give the all-clear.”

A text wasn’t as good as eyes-on, but in the current situation, it still took a huge burden from Tachyon’s mind. His charge was out of harm’s way, which meant they’d be able to take a more offensive approach to handling the issue. Once his team arrived, they could figure out a plan of attack. Because, with so many civilians in the area, evacuation was out. Even if they could get to just Tori and her friends, there were too many others to reach. Protecting this area meant driving out the threat, and based on how armed they were, he had a hunch this crowd wouldn’t respond to politely spoken requests.

“Good thinking, Cyber Geek. Let’s keep them out of this as much as possible. Now, we’ve got about five minutes before the rest of my team will be able to catch up. That’s how long we have to come up with what to do next.”

It was strange, watching what looked like a parade-viewing crowd gather up on the streets below, all with their attention on her building. Cliché peered carefully over the sides of the roof in short stints, making sure not to draw their attention. Her umbrella was clutched carefully in her left hand, ready to defend if the moment demanded. The right hand, she’d left unencumbered, which was why the sudden appearance of a revolver in her fingers was such a surprise.

Spinning around, she trained the weapon on her target, only for the barrel to start immediately shaking. What the hell good was a gun supposed to do against him?

The kaleidoscope eyes of Nexus stared back at her as he cocked his head in an almost curious manner. After a moment, he snapped his fingers.

“Forewarned is forearmed. When a potential threat approached, you got a weapon. Very clever, haven’t seen one of you use that in ages.” He paid her and the weapon no mind, waltzing to the rooftop’s edge, peering over with none of the same caution Cliché had been employing. “Shoot if you like, but I’m not here for you. You’re almost never worth it.”

The whiplash of going from shocked to terrified, relieved to slightly offended, had Cliché’s head swimming. Lowering her gun, she dropped it to the rooftop, where it soon vanished. The umbrella, conversely, she gripped tightly, ready to swing at a moment’s notice. It would likely fare as well as the gun, but it at least had a chance of working.

“What do you mean, I’m not worth it?”

He waved a hand in her general direction, eyes still on the crowd below. “What’s the point in a power you go out of your way not to master? Where’s the thrill in seeing someone give half their effort? Entertaining as you could potentially be, I’ve seen that possibility squandered untold times, because you fear what you might become.”

Stepping slightly forward, Cliché tried to angle herself so she could keep a lookout over the roof’s edge, too; if she wasn’t keeping watch, there was no point to even staying up here. “Let me guess, this is where you tell me all my fears are ridiculous and ungrounded?”

“Certainly not. You are perceptive, with yourself, as well as others, and the potential you see is far from imagined. There are worlds where you embrace your power, plumb its fullest depths, and truly master the gifts you have been given. In some of those iterations you even manage to retain what you think of as your current sense of self. But the best of the lot, the ones I consider personal favorites, are exactly what you fear: beings cut off from the laws of reality, unbound by the same limits as the rest of the world. Sometimes, Cliché, you become an even greater monster than you can imagine, and she is glorious. You may be of little interest, but Edict is always worth watching.”

---

Chapter 108

---

At long last, she was near enough to see, and Lodestar's stomach twisted at what awaited her. Up close—or at least as close as she could get without losing sight of the massive creature—the Scralthor was a mind-twisting array of features. The dark exterior captured and reflected the void of space, masking it near perfectly, even from the AHC's advanced instruments. Long limbs, like a mix of a spider's leg, an octopus tentacle, and a sucker mouth, stretched off the vast main body. No eyes that she could see, though it did have various plates with a slightly different reflective sheen.

The most distinguishing, disgusting feature was easily its true mouth, not the sucker-like endings on its limbs. It was easy to miss on the approach, a void within a void, the place where the Scralthor stopped reflecting space and instead embodied it. Cavernous, surrounded by endless rows of grasping teeth, seemingly with no end, that was the maw Lodestar would expect from a creature that lived by surviving off of suns. Hanging there, staring at what was closer to a celestial body than a creature in terms of mass, Lodestar was momentarily struck by the sheer impossibility of her task.

It was ludicrous—to even compare their differences as an ant versus a human drastically undersold the gap in scale. Ant versus blue whale wouldn't have even properly captured it. This was no person, or meta, or even something as grand as a natural disaster. She was gazing upon a fundamental force of the galaxy, something powerful and ancient, well beyond the constraints of what a single planet could contain.

Cupping her hands to her mouth, Lodestar let out a loud yell. She was perfectly aware that sound didn't travel through the vacuum of space under normal circumstances, but this was one more area where the limits of reality had become iffy after Professor Quantum's famous experiment. Besides, the idea of standing in this creature's path was absolute lunacy to begin with. Attempting to start a conversation wasn't really all that much more ridiculous, comparatively.

"Hey there!" Decades of this, and she never felt like she'd gotten the hang of starting the awkward pre-fight discussions. It was hard to find a cordial greeting for a being one was likely about to exchange blows with, yet she still persisted, because sometimes, those greetings were enough to keep the punches from being needed. "I don't suppose you're a talker?"

No reaction, which was more or less what Lodestar had expected. Even the ones who did eventually listen needed their attention grabbed first, and there was really only one universal method to that end. Keeping the power low, just enough to be felt, Lodestar fired off three shots at one of the limbs, which was wiggling through the sky in a very gut-churning fashion. Her shots hit their mark, but produced no reaction that she could see. Even the limb itself was unmarked. The blasts may as well have been more awkward small talk.

About what she'd anticipated; anything that was eating suns wouldn't be that vulnerable to simple energy blasts. Part of her hoped that would have been enough to garner a kernel of attention, though, and in a way, she was right. Red beams caught her directly in the torso while her attention remained on the Scralthor, pushing her back a full inch in surprise. Glancing up, she noticed the Wrexwren ships that had been leading the cosmic monstrosity were now pointing in her direction, one charging to follow the first's shot.

Moving faster than either ship could dream of tracking, she raced right past, twisting around behind the pair and letting off a shot of her own from each hand. Unlike the Scralthor, these alien crafts were not made of some nigh indestructible natural armor, a truth that was proven nicely as Lodestar sliced up their engines, leaving them both adrift until the main forces could send someone to scoop them up.

That done, she turned back to the Scralthor, which was quite easy to do, because this close, it occupied more of the space around her than less. "Just you and me now, big guy. Please give me some kind of sign that there's sentence in there.” Her right hand was already formed into a fist, too aware of the inevitable outcome she was staring down. Still, she had to try. With power like hers, it was so easy to turn force into the default solution. Only by attempting to make peace could she truly be free to fight, certain that there was no other way available in the moment.

No response as the creature continued to swim through nothingness, path unchanged even as its guides fell by the wayside. So be it, then. Time to see how the Scralthor held up against direct strikes.

Of all the suit capabilities Hephaestus hadn't expected to need today, texting was proving to be the underdog MVP. Responding to Cyber Geek's—and soon Tachyonic's—rapid requests for assurance that she was okay was all that kept them from charging down the hall to confirm Tori's safety in person, which was a very good thing for Hephaestus and Bahamut. She added a line about spotty service to both of them, hoping that would buy some breathing room if they tried to chat mid-fight. Covertly responding inside her suit wouldn't be quite so easy while also battling for survival.

“At least we're in an older building, from when they made them to last rather than break safely.” Cold Shoulder was running her hands along the exposed brick wall, getting as close as she dared to the window and scoping out a view. She nearly knocked over one of several empty ice cream containers poking out of a trash can, a caloric giveaway that someone with super-speed lived here. “Want me to ice-wall over that and limit our exposure?”

“Not yet. If anyone spots it from outside, we've basically given away our position, and right now, we need the advantage of surprise.” Cyber Geek was cycling back and forth, coordinating with Tachyonic as they waited for the rest of the New Science Sentries to arrive. He'd ended up in something of a pacing circle around Austin's go-to chair, like he was trying to conjure help here faster with a slapdash summoning circle.

It was more or less the outcome they'd specifically been trying to avoid—this outdoor assemblage of assholes had managed to bait the real targets nearly into the open. Once the New Science Sentries were known to be on the scene, Hephaestus had a hunch that the rules of the game were going to change. Everything so far had been about drawing them in. Once it was time to spring the trap, there was no more need for niceties.

As Hephaestus saw it, every plan they formed would come from one of three foundations: send away the New Science Sentries and let the siege continue, use them as mobile bait to draw away the attackers, or let them join the fight. The second option was easily her favorite, and the one she knew would be all but impossible to talk anyone into. Even if they trusted her while under this helmet, there was no way the New Science Sentries would run off and leave another team of capes surrounded by criminals, in a room with a pair of villains, along with the civilians they were supposed to be protecting. Maybe, if they knew the whole situation, it would be viable, but this was one cost of living a double life: she couldn't tell people everything she knew, even when it would be extremely helpful information for them to have.

Finishing a sweep of the perimeter, Bahamut circled back around, sidling up next to Hephaestus under a giant light-up beer display that they both instinctively knew was Ike's. Medley had been watching them both without pause, barely even blinking, and they had no lack of understanding as to why: he expected them to turn traitor at any moment. In truth, Hephaestus couldn't even say it was a farfetched concept. Her goal was to get everyone she liked through this day alive; whether or not they were fond of the meta-suit-wearing villain in the end wasn't a central part of that equation. It did mean they had to choose every word carefully, though, since these were going to be very public conversations.

"How's the fight going?" Bahamut asked.

The short answer was "bad." A small section of the helmet's inner screen was showing a muted version of the fight stream, and when Hephaestus could bring herself to look, what she saw was her mentor getting smacked around, thrown into walls, even dripping blood. Part of her kept insisting that this had to be a trick, part of some grand villain scheme, but the bright streaks of red made that idea harder to cling to. The mere fact that the Wrexwren leader could even make Fornax bleed spoke to the power in those alien blows.

"The same," Hephaestus replied finally. "I'm sure he's got a plan."

That garnered a snort from Medley. "If that's the real Fornax, then I doubt it. His whole deal was being a walking disaster. He isn't one to plan, and sure not the sort to get his ass kicked by a lone alien. That's either a fake, or he's gone soft."

"You have—and I cannot stress this enough—absolutely no fucking idea what you're talking about." She was coming back at him too hard, could even feel herself doing it, yet the rage couldn't be stopped. It wasn't even anger, really, just fear. The oldest fear she had, the one she thought would never apply to someone like Ivan: she was afraid to lose a person she cared about, and the semi-parental shape of their relationship only made the ache hit all the deeper. "That's the real Fornax, and he's going to win. It's what he does. There's only one exception to that rule, and it sure as shit isn't that Wrexwren bastard."

"I'm sure he'll be fine." Hat Trick wandered over, laying a careful hand on Hephaestus's arm. The rest kept their distance from Hephaestus and Bahamut, but she seemed entirely unconcerned by their villain status. "Lodestar wouldn't have left it in his hands otherwise."

Still positioned semi-near the window, Cold Shoulder shook her head. "Didn't seem like she had much of a choice in the matter."

"When you're as powerful as they are, you always have choices," Bahamut said. "For right now, let's trust that the ones more experienced than us are making smart calls, even if we can't grasp their significance yet. Our bigger concern is the mini-army outside. With Agent Quantum, myself, and Medley on the scene, we have a good amount of heavy hitters, plus Cold Shoulder if she makes that big ice body. Plasmodia and Hephaestus can snipe for us, putting Presto, Tachyonic, and Hat Trick in flex positions. Cyber Geek, given your array of tools, I'd assume you can fill any of those roles as needed, so let's decide where we're weakest and shore things up."

Nearby, Cyber Geek blinked in visible surprise. "That's surprisingly close to what Tachyonic and I have come up with."

"I know." Bahamut tapped the side of her head, where ears would be. She seemed to realize the absence at the same time as everyone else. "Er, you get what I mean. Good hearing, even for hushed phone conversations, and it's not a hard composition to sort out."

"The bigger question is what do we do with those teams?" Medley interjected. "How do we drive off this mob while not plunging everyone on this block into a meta-brawl?"

That was an exceptional point, but thankfully, one Hephaestus already saw the fix for. "While we don't know for sure what or who they want, it's clearly all focused on this building. If the New Science Sentries join us, it ensures that the focus stays trained here. At that point, it becomes a game of funneling them where we can and picking through. Snipers on the roofline to keep them from swarming, heavies in the halls to block their progress, and so on.”

“Too risky,” Cyber Geek replied. “Holing up while under fire is one thing, but we can’t bring a brawl inside knowing there are also civilians sheltering here, too.”

Between seeing her mentor getting beaten and feeling trapped in her own home, Hephaestus was not in a patient enough mood to deal with moral objections. This was a survival situation. “Then you get out there and scare them off, superhero. You go show us whatever power you have that’s going to send them screaming into the night. Because as far as I can tell, they’re here to do some damage, and aren’t inclined to leave. This fight is happening, Cyber Geek. The question is if it’s on our terms, or theirs.”

“That said, we do have another asset in the building, unofficially. A friend who is pitching in, and could theoretically guide the survivors somewhere safe,” Bahamut offered. “I believe a lot of the underground parking spots here are concrete-enclosed cubes, the perfect spot for hiding out from a riotous mob.”

Cyber Geek and his team looked at one another, the unspoken question so obvious they may as well have just used words. Trusting the villains was one thing; trusting the villains to handle evacuation, and with an asset they’d never even met—that was asking a lot. Especially considering that the capes believed they had friends hiding out in another room, as well.

“When the Ridge City Riots happened, we ended up having to work with a different pair of villains, Glyph and Pest Control,” Medley stated. “I didn’t like it at the time. Still don’t fully, to be frank, but I can’t say they didn’t hold up their end of the bargain. If you can be like them, then we can walk away from all of this on the same terms. But if you betray us—”

“You’ll carry a grudge that will shine through all eternity and will harass us at every turn until one or both parties are dead. Yeah, man, I’m in a guild of villains. How do you think the people I’m around respond to being betrayed? Our friend will get people somewhere safe; they’ve got ways of moving around and staying unseen. Will that put you at ease enough to accept the inevitable?”

Surprisingly, Cyber Geek nodded to the affirmative. “According to Tachyonic, the rest of the New Science Sentries just arrived, and the outer crowd is getting restless, starting to look at nearby buildings. We have to get their attention and keep it. Everyone ready?”

He looked around, first to his team, then to the pair of villains sharing the room with them. No one objected. They understood where this was heading and were ready to stop cowering.

“Let’s go over starting positions, then get into them as fast as we can. The New Science Sentries are going to arrive with a splash. While we wait, let’s put that free-roaming asset of yours to work. There’s an apartment near here you’ll need to start with.”

“Should be no problem,” Hephaestus confirmed. She said a silent prayer of thanks to Bahamut, who’d just made their lives much, much easier. Not only would “moving” Tori out of supposed proximity lower her chances of being caught, it came with a perfect excuse to let the texting drop. Once her other identity was expected to be surrounded by concrete, even the best phone would have trouble keeping a signal. This was a chance to put Tori out of the way and let Hephaestus have full rein.

She only hoped their efforts fared better than Fornax’s had so far.

---

Chapter 109

---

The sound of Wrexwren mirth was grating on Doctor Mechaniacal's nerves, aided in no small part by watching his oldest friend get beat to hell. The experience couldn't be pleasant for anyone who cared about Ivan, yet Doctor Mechaniacal felt it all the more keenly, because it was his fault. While the plan had placed huge burdens on others, like Ivan, it was Doctor Mechaniacal and Xelas who were handling the most important piece. Without them, this invasion would simply end, and that would be that. The prime opportunity they'd been handed would slip away, and in a few months, they'd be dancing the same jig with a new set of challengers.

That was why he made no objection or sounds of his own as the Wrexwren let out their whistling titters at Fornax's beating. There was better use for such mental energy. Because while it appeared that he and Xelas were standing there like good little escorts, watching what looked to be an inevitable defeat, in truth, they were both hard at work. Getting access to the systems had only been the first step. From there, it was a matter of finding what they needed, running digital tests until they found the right settings, and then making sure the implementation was flawless. Given that they were working with alien technology, it was an insane idea, even for meta-genius intellect like his own.

Now, two meta-genius intellects, with years of experience and trust deepening their connection, working in perfect tandem—that was another story. For as rambunctious as she could be, Xelas also possessed one of the most sophisticated digital minds in existence, thanks largely to years of self-directed upgrades and improvements. With her considerable processing power added in, the task went from “utterly impossible” to just “mostly impossible,” and those were odds Doctor Mechanical felt quite at home with. Especially considering the progress they were making.

A little bit more. Ivan just had to hang in there for a touch longer, and things would change. He hoped the rest of the guild was out there working hard in this window, because once their plan sprang, the Wrexwren would start behaving very differently. Better to grab all they could before the aliens realized the situation they were really in. At least he didn’t have to worry about most of them getting caught up in the streaming show; they knew Fornax well enough not to expect he’d really go down like this. But based on the numbers ticking by on his helmet screen, quite a few people were tuning in.

That was just as expected, and planned. Seeing Fornax lose would certainly be curious and novel enough to draw more viewers, expanding the size of their audience. They needed to set the stage well and get as many live eyes as possible on the broadcast—the AHC would definitely attempt to purge this footage once the day was done.

And really, given how horrific it would be, Doctor Mechanical wasn’t even sure he blamed them.

The small town of Kerber was nestled perfectly between two highways, so as to be convenient for neither. Once it had held a key farm road running through it, but when the new interstate came, the travel business in the town dried up. It managed to hang on thanks to stubborn citizens and enough agriculture to get by, but it would never be a major metropolis. They had no Alliance of Heroic Champions outpost, no superheroes nearby, not even a meta-human among the population. Their law enforcement consisted of a small Sheriff’s outpost, most of which was already burning.

With no real defenses, the town of Kerber had been completely unprepared when a Wrexwren ship crashed into Old Man Gaffleston’s cornfield. Four had emerged, wielding unnatural weapons and whistling in those horrific high-pitched tones. They swept like fire, destroying all they came across as the citizens fled, most holing up in the church near the edge of town.

One member of the city did not go to the church, however. Mrs. Croskey cursed her age as the uphill walk sapped her legs' strength. She pushed herself onward, ignoring the sounds of buildings collapsing and the Wrexwren whistles, even as it seemed like they were getting closer. Roots tore at her feet, nearly tripping her twice as she pressed farther into the small grove. The third time, she fully tilted over, catching herself on a nearby tree trunk, scraping her hand badly in the process.

The pain didn't matter, nor did the ache in her lungs. She had to keep going. This was the town's only hope. None of the others knew such a chance existed; they believed their only meta-residents in history had left, never to return. Only Mrs. Croskey had gotten the visit years later, along with the gift. She'd buried it away, thinking such things best left forgotten. It was an act she regretted all the more with every step.

At last, Mrs. Croskey arrived. Her thin, wrinkled hands plunged into the dirt beneath the gnarled old tree, winding into a small gap of two intertwined roots. The Wrexwren noises were drawing near. If they found her, then they found her. What mattered was the task at hand. Arms already shaking from the overall effort, Mrs. Croskey kept digging, kept hoping, until she felt the cold metal of the box she was searching for.

With the last of her strength, she yanked it out, turning the combination tumblers to their proper position, all while hearing the aliens approach. It took more struggling than she wanted, but finally, the box opened, revealing a small silver device with a single button. On it was a stylized droplet of blood, which was soon covered by the smear of the genuine article Mrs. Croskey's scraped hand left as she smashed the button down, drawing a brief light under the symbol.

It was done. She collapsed back against a nearby tree, panting so heavily it felt like she might never catch her breath. That was possible. Her body had given too much in the run; perhaps the cost would overwhelm her. It was far from ideal, yet also a chance Mrs. Croskey knew she'd been taking. Her only wish was that she knew everyone would be safe. Devices and promises were one thing, but could she really expect that after so long

---

"I'm going to need some field healing. No, a civilian. That's fine. I'll go out of pocket. This one is under my protection."

It was impossible. She'd hit the button less than a minute ago—surely this was a delusion. Yet it seemed quite real as the shadow leaned over, then crouched to look Mrs. Croskey right in the eye. In the years since she'd last seen that gaze, much had changed, but not the determination looking back at her.

"How did you get here... so fast?" The pause for breath mid-question only drove home how depleted Mrs. Croskey was.

"I've got friends who are handy at transportation, and I promised that if you needed me, I'd be here."

"The town... needs you."

That earned Mrs. Croskey a frown, along with a resigned sigh. "Fine. But keep my name out of it, if you can. I don't want them thinking it's some bit of hometown pride. Personally, they could raze this place and I wouldn't bat an eye." She leaned in, lightly kissing the older woman on the forehead. "Except I know how much it would hurt you."

She stood back to her full height, then lifted a finger. From the wound on Mrs. Croskey's hand came a small tendril of blood, which wound its way around Morgana Le Faye's finger, before shaping itself into a dagger. The Blood Witch of the villains' guild clutched her weapon tightly, then turned back to the forest.

"Now then, let's deal with the dead pieces of shit who dared to wound my favorite teacher."

Agent Quantum looked up at the roof again and frowned. "You sure you can get an angle on that? Seems like the closest point we can see would have you both dropping a good distance to the ground below, not to mention drawing attention."

"Have a little faith. This is my one trick, and I'm pretty damn good at it," Presto replied. "I'll squeak us over the edge of the roof so we don't have far to go. There's no way around the visibility part, though. If I can see it, then I can teleport there, but I do have to see it. Which means when we pop out, we'll be in plain view before the fall starts."

"Which is exactly why, when they do that, you and I are charging in the front door." Tachyonic was fiddling with his bracer, getting the output settings just right. Once this battle started, there wouldn't be many chances for casual recalibration, so it was important he start off properly. "I'll run defense, you go right for the entrance. Once we're in, the roof team starts laying down cover, breaking up the crowds that charge after us. Plasmodia, you still okay getting teamed with a villain?"

She hesitated for only a small moment before giving a blonde-hair-bouncing nod. "Not ideal, but what about this is? So long as he keeps shooting at the people attacking, we'll be good. If he tries anything, I'll pop that can open and see how tough our villain is then."

The four superheroes exchanged glances once more, before looking out to the small army blocking them from their goal. It was not the first time they'd faced such a situation, if one counted training. Professor Quantum had been relentless in preparing them for what he considered to be the most vital part of superhero work: efficiently neutralizing threats. After weeks in the real world, they'd begun to understand all the gaps such training had left in their knowledge, gaps that had caused the sorts of mistakes that had put them on the wrong foot with this town. But for all their failings, the New Science Sentries still knew how to fight. Today, it looked as though they might finally have a chance to work in their element.

Slowly, one by one, the eyes all turned to Agent Quantum, their unquestioned leader. Not because he was the most dangerous, which went to Plasmodia, or the fastest, obviously Tachyonic, or even the most perceptive, a title all would begrudgingly give to Presto. Not even because he was the one chosen by Professor Quantum to head the team.

Agent Quantum was their leader because, above all else, he had their trust. They believed in him, in the way he saw the world, in the team he wanted to lead. He might not always lead them to safety—that was the price of being a superhero—but each knew he would give every drop of blood in his veins to bring them back alive, and the feeling was reciprocated.

"The time is here. New Science Sentries: attack."

In terms of rallying cries, there was room for improvement, but the results could hardly be questioned. Agent Quantum and Tachyonic burst from their hiding place, loudly drawing attention in a way no real attackers would. The plan worked flawlessly, as suddenly, dozens of heads swiveled in their direction. Worse, they didn't just turn, the faces reacted. Lit up, in fact, at the sight of what should have been a sign that the party was over. Instead, they all looked like someone was rolling in with a truck of fresh food and drink, a few actually rubbing their palms together like greedy cartoon characters.

Nearby, Agent Quantum caught sight of several raising their unusual weapons—these resembled junkyard scraps welded into roughly gun-like shapes, similar to what they'd seen on the streets lately. None of them got raised higher than mid-waist before the blur zipping through the crowd struck. Sometimes it knocked the guns away; others received swift kicks to the back of their knees to send them sprawling; and a few just got flat-out coldcocked into unconsciousness. Agent Quantum had no idea how Tachyonic was picking which target to give which strategy; perhaps he was trying all three on each person and seeing what worked. It had to be taxing. Even with his speed, there were so many opponents to keep track of.

Agent Quantum made the job as easy on his teammate as he could, weaving wide to avoid fights and focus on speed. Some confrontations were unavoidable, however, as a one-eyed man with horns along his skull tried to halt Agent Quantum's charge. Tough as he looked, a single blow to the ribs was enough to send him hurling back, and Agent Quantum realized he'd forgotten to factor his current momentum into the punch. It was stronger than needed, but had the side effect of scaring a few nearby threats, so Agent Quantum seized the opportunity and bolted ahead.

He glanced up to the roofline just in time to catch Plasmodia's legs going over the side, out of view. That meant the sniper team was now in position, and no one appeared to be reacting to the roof, so hopefully, they'd slipped by unseen. With the distraction done, his only task remaining was to make it through the front door.

Pumping his legs, Agent Quantum didn't bother hitting the next person who jumped in his way, mostly because he'd plowed over them before there was even a chance to react. Something stung his back, fluorescent yellow strings that seemed to sear wherever they touched extending from a nearby crook's arm. It was tempting to deal with, but the lone glance back showed Agent Quantum how many of the momentarily stunned enemies were recovering both their wits and their weapons, all with their attention on him.

With the top speed he could muster, Agent Quantum barreled ahead, lowering his shoulder and knocking aside a few hefty gentlemen that tried to block him with mere mass. The effect was similar to a bowling ball cleaving through pins, sending them scattering and opening up a clear path inside. Agent Quantum took it, continuing to bolt forward until he turned a corner and nearly collided with a scaly green wall.

Except, it wasn't actually a wall. It was Bahamut, the dragon who'd managed to fight him to a stalemate only a few weeks earlier. Normally, Agent Quantum wouldn't have been so happy to see someone so dangerous, but if they were going to team with villains, better they at least pull their own weight.

"Agent Quantum," the dragon greeted. "You should follow me. There's quite a few people on your heels, and this isn't the place to deal with them."

Lozora didn't especially care about how they'd done it. All that mattered was that the New Science Sentries had gotten inside. Really, she'd done everything but leave a neon sign and a key in the lock, but they'd managed it eventually. With them in position, the preamble could finally come to an end. It was time to get down to business.

On her phone, she sent a single message: "The piñata is stuffed." With that, her employer was officially notified. Nearby, blocking devices keyed to specific signals engaged, triggered by her message. In other parts of the city, different teams were turned loose, creating a buffer of crime in case any passing patrol might head their way. The capes wouldn't be able to call for any more backup. From this point on, they were stuck with what they had until the man who'd put it all together arrived. She still wasn't sure how he would make the approach—perhaps by air, or maybe burrowing up from under the street. It wouldn't really even shock her if he simply walked out of a coffee shop and strolled up to the front door. The man loved to keep secrets, even from those in his employ, and that included his own entry methods. It didn't especially matter; Lozora had kept her end of the bargain and brought the target into the trap. If her employer failed from this point on, there was no one to blame but himself.

Nevertheless, she still rose and prepared to take a more active role if needed. Whether the blame would be deserved or not, she'd dealt with enough despots to know they rarely saw fault within themselves. Making sure this stayed on the rails was how she ensured there were no snafus in her payday.

Besides, after working so hard to put this piece on the board, there was no way Lozora was going to miss the actual game.

---

Chapter 110

---

It was kind of like watching the inception of a parade. As Agent Quantum ran, the rest of the crowd came alive, realizing something of note was happening. If there'd been any doubt in Hephaestus's mind who they were here for, it vanished at the obvious reactions from the hodgepodge army. This was their target all right, and they pursued him with the gusto one would expect after so much milling around. Together, they surged forward on his heels, slowed by their own numbers but giving chase nonetheless, forming a river of bodies in Agent Quantum's wake.

The gauntlets were primed and ready, and from the glow rippling off Plasmodia, she was in a similar state. Cyber Geek sat posted up on the actual edge of the roof, hidden by a cloak he'd pulled out as he kept an eye on the goings on through the scope on his huge Blaster Brahs gun. Only Presto didn't look ready to fire, since he had an entirely different job to do.

"Once Agent Quantum and Tachyonic are clear, aim for the middle of the crowd. Let's break them up and limit how many get inside." Cyber Geek gave the orders, since obviously the villains weren't being trusted to that extent, though Hephaestus had no objection to the situation. Between the two of them, Cyber Geek had logged far more hours in actual combat with just this last year, to say nothing of Donald's love for games that required tactics and strategy. And it meant she was free to break off if need be without leaving them in the lurch. "Remember, stunning shots only."

That last bit was obviously directed at Hephaestus, who rolled her eyes even though no one else could see through the helmet. "I bet that's what all their weapons are set at, too."

“Doesn’t matter,” Cyber Geek rebutted. “We aren’t them. We’re superheroes. No more bloodshed than is absolutely necessary.”

There was the end of their discussion, as Agent Quantum finally made it through the front door, a blur on his heels less than a second later. No one needed the cue—they’d all just gotten it—and almost in unison, the shots burst forth.

Hephaestus’s gauntlet beams didn’t really have a “stun” setting, so instead, she fired a few feet in front of the crowd, creating visible damage in the concrete and pulling most of them up short. Some kept right on going, only to be smacked aside by bright bolts blasting out of Plasmodia’s hands. Based on how hard they were being sent flying from those shots, Hephaestus had a hunch they were only just barely on the non-lethal side, perhaps the weakest Plasmodia could manage.

For the bulk of the group that stopped at the sight of Hephaestus’s beams, Cyber Geek had something special. He fired directly into the center of them, releasing an explosion of crackling blue light that sent nearly every crook hit down to the ground, twitching. They couldn’t have asked for a better opening shot, which was a good thing, because with eyes twisting upward, their advantage of surprise was officially spent.

No more freebies. Now, they were getting fired back on. Chunks of brick exploded into the air as they all ducked down, save for the lone member who hadn’t fired a single shot yet. Smacking his hands on his costume’s pants, Presto tilted his head up to the sky. “Looks like that’s my cue.”

He vanished, reappearing some distance off, much higher up. That position lasted only a moment before he was gone again. Hephaestus carefully approached the roof’s edge as the shots tapered off, poking her helmet up while making sure to stay in flame form inside, just to be safe. What greeted her was a scene of masterful chaos.

Presto was there, popping around, moving the crooks along with him. Whenever he saw one taking aim to shoot, they’d suddenly find themselves reoriented, firing into a fellow criminal. Not only were they taking one another out, but the ersatz betrayals were causing fights among their ranks. He darted around like that for nearly a full minute before vanishing, only to reappear overhead, then pop directly to their sides once more.

“That should give you all a little breathing room. We can do this trick maybe twice more before they wise up and really focus fire on the roof.

Also, heads up to the indoor team, I saw a few slipping in the front during the confusion.” While he kept the panting out of his voice, Presto’s chest was rising and falling quickly—using so much power had left him winded.

“Good. It means we’re doing our job right,” Plasmodia said. “Break them up into manageable chunks for the rest to handle.”

Hephaestus tilted a head to the well-manicured hands that were rippling with energy. “I think you could break them into literal chunks. Those sure seem easier to handle.”

“I told you, we’re not doing that,” Cyber Geek snapped.

“You say that now, while things are going well. What if the tide starts to turn? What are you willing to do when your team’s lives are at risk?”

She’d expected another canned reply, but that was her own failing. This was not just a generic cape, no matter how often he could fall into the habits of one. Donald Moss was a man who loved superheroes, yes, but who also thought deeply about the things he did. “I know that sometimes, there is no getting around a lethal shot in this job. I had to kill an interdimensional monster on my first time out, but that same situation could have easily happened with a meta-human. Even Lodestar has had to throw that final punch a few times. Whether or not it’s in me to kill another person, I don’t think I’ll know until the moment comes, but I refuse to take that step a single moment before it becomes absolutely necessary.”

“Agent Quantum would make the same call.” It was perhaps the first time Hephaestus had noticed Plasmodia really look at Cyber Geek since arriving on the roof.

Even Presto seemed a tad impressed, if one paid more attention to his tone than his words. “Yeesh, now we’ve got another of them to compensate for.”

There was clearly no winning this battle, so Hephaestus opted to let it go, though she couldn’t resist one final bit of parting wisdom. “I admire your resolution and dedication to your ideals. Just remember, there’s a cost to taking the high road.”

Cyber Geek’s eyebrows pinched as he pointedly looked up and down the armored suit. “As opposed to your way?”

“Oh no, my road has its own costs, too. I imagine they all do.”

Hephaestus returned to the roofline, gauntlets charged to fire once more. “But I live my life prepared to pay them. Be sure you’re ready to do the same.”

This was, in Medley's estimation, total bullshit. Being behind Agent Quantum's combat skills had been one thing. He was the inheritor of a legacy team, and had clearly been provided with ample training as part of that. The fact that Medley could fight on nearly the same level was almost a point of pride, even if Agent Quantum was clearly ahead. But now, before his eyes, Medley was realizing that he wasn't the second strongest member of this motley combat team: he was third.

As it turned out, Bahamut was quite a great deal more adept at brawling than Hephaestus. While the former used his suit's bulk and weapons to make up for gaps in skill, Bahamut had no such failings to cover. Despite the size, he was quick and sure, cracking the man emitting smoke from his ears hard in the ribs, sending him tumbling to the ground. A huge fellow with some kind of cobbled-together electro-axe swung for Bahamut's flank while he should have been distracted, except the green dragon ducked under the blow, striking back with a kick to the knees that earned a horrific yowl from the axe-wielder as he crumpled to the ground.

It was to Medley's disadvantage that he was on the side of the capes in this contest. Unlike Bahamut, he and Agent Quantum were putting their targets down with as little damage as they could manage, while the dragon seemed to be paying a passing effort at most to not being lethal. Near Agent Quantum, a goon produced dripping purple blades from his arms, angling them directly for the cape. He never even came close, as Bahamut grabbed him from behind, spun the man's arms, and sank both blades into the limbs of two other crooks, both of whom dropped to the ground immediately.

"Oh, that stuff is dangerous," Bahamut noted. He twisted the arms inward, the captive struggling vainly against the dragon's superior might, until the blades were plunged into the wielder's own legs. While it did appear to hurt, he didn't have the same reaction as the first pair.

"Stupid fucking lizard, of course I'm immune to my own poison."

"Guess that does make sense." The crack turned Medley's stomach, even before he looked to confirm. Sure enough, Bahamut had snapped poison-blade's arms at the elbow; both were hanging limply at his sides.

"Looks like you're not immune to broken bones, though. Or concussions."

That was the only warning before Bahamut's fist smashed into his face, sending the broken man flying back into a wall, where he wouldn't be able to sneak up on them with those potent blades. Agent Quantum looked aghast, but in the midst of a fray, he didn't exactly have the spare time to object.

As for Medley, he deflected a pair of bone-daggers hurled by one of his nearest opponents, then noticed they were still airborne, floating around to his rear. Somebody was pairing with a telekinetic; a smart combination, but less useful once noticed. Medley dropped to a crouch, his body's natural pouncing position, then leapt, jumping over the bone thrower to an inconspicuous invader who'd been hanging to the sides. A surprised face, one swift punch, and just like that, the daggers clattered down once more. The physical threats were straightforward to deal with; they had to handle anyone who could throw curves as soon as possible.

So far, things had been going well. In fact, they'd gone so well that Medley didn't trust it. In the months since he'd been changed and joined the Alliance of Heroic Champions, there had been a great many lessons to learn; one of the earliest was that battles never went to plan. Out in the field, things were chaotic, messy, unpredictable. Plans were meant to be shapes of things, general guides to trust and use as a compass. Details always shifted on the fly. Yet somehow, while totally surrounded and trapped, it was all working flawlessly. The outer team was slowing the slew of entrants enough to where just three of their fighters could handle it, and apparently, none of the crooks considered the idea of taking another route inside.

No, something was definitely off. The only way things went this well if it was a piece of both parties' plans. Except, Medley couldn't see what gain there was to this setup. How did letting them whittle away at the troops help whoever had put this all together? Were the bodies booby-trapped, or rigged to suddenly regain consciousness and heal? They smelled normal enough, so far as he could tell, but with metas, there was never truly a way to be sure.

Unfortunately, Medley's only current available tactic was the "wait and see" move. Once he knew what the point of all this was, he could start working more directly against whoever was pulling the strings. Until then, he had to play the game long enough to reach the end, which meant keeping up with Agent Quantum and Bahamut as they took down new threats.

Tachyonic appeared in the room, zipping in from another hallway. "You've got a team on the way. I took out two of them, but three more are still coming. A new group just entered—I'll lead them around a bit until you're clear." As quickly as he'd arrived, the speedster was gone, back to running in-building interference.

That, like everything else, was working well. Medley had a hunch that things would continue to keep going their way, until the trend very abruptly stopped. Sooner or later, the synchronized plans would diverge, and these criminals' real goal would come into focus. When that moment arrived was when the deadliest part of the fight began.

The Wrexwren ship was flying over a long stretch of ocean, searching for a viable landing target, when a message hit their comms system. It was from another Wrexwren vessel, reporting that they'd discovered an excellent find not far away. Little defense, ample resources, even natural features that would make a sustained occupation more viable; they were calling for reinforcements to help raid and hold their discovery. Redirecting course, the pilot angled for the other ship's beacon, homing in and locking the location.

In a matter of minutes, they'd shot across the sky, arriving at what appeared to be a huge chunk of land surrounded by ocean—an island, as the humans called them. This island had a great many human-built structures, the most striking of which was a massive castle that gleamed wherever light struck, metal coating most, if not all, of its surface. The Wrexwren pilot looked to the rest of his crew; this was certainly not what the transmission had promised. Something was amiss, and with no backup anywhere nearby, the prudent call was to evacuate.

As he tried to steer them away from the island, however, it became clear that the ship was no longer in control of its own movements. Below, they could see energy lashes dig into the sides of their vessel, pulling it roughly down from the sky, onto a metal pad waiting below. They prepared themselves for combat, readying weapons to make a final stand and show these humans the might of the Wrexwren fighting spirit.

Sadly, such a fight was never to occur. When the ship got with fifteen feet of the circle below, a pulse shot up, delivering a tremendous dose of electrical current to everything inside it. Some of the Wrexwren initially survived, but they had no time to recover before the ship was pulled all the way down and the roof roughly opened. Mechanical limbs reached in, yanking out the pilot's crew as he struggled vainly to reach for them, arms barely even capable of a twitch.

"Looks like we've got one that can still move. Put him in the observation tank. The rest are dead or dying—get them directly to our dissection room. Our leader wants these as fresh as possible."

Above the Wrexwren, a human face appeared, looking at him with none of the typical sentiment they'd been told to expect from this species. The human examined him once, then moved its skull in a side-to-side motion. "Really, if you're falling for tricks this simple, someone really must have fed you a lot of misinformation about Earth. Did they paint us a simple rubes in the backwater of the galaxy, huddling together out of fear of the unknown? Our planet is much like this place, the island built by Tyranny. Lovely to gaze at, yet so much more deadly than appearances would ever let on."

The human made a noise, a light series of expulsions from its mouth—perhaps this was their version of laughter. "I'm sure that sounds ridiculous to a mighty invader like yourself, but in time, I think you'll understand. You see, the ones currently being dragged away were fortunate. For them, this nightmare is already done. Fate was not nearly so kind to you." He leaned back, motioning to someone unseen. "All right, get him moving. We need to reset the trap for the next batch."

Metal reached into the cab, tearing the Wrexwren pilot out of his seat, dragging him into the damp Earth air as his screeching whistles echoed through the night.

---

Chapter 111

---

Where in the hell was he? All this work, weeks of scheming, planning, luring in an entire alien invasion to serve as a distraction, and now, when the goal was at hand, her employer was late? That didn't track. No way would he miss this. Catching the New Science Sentries had been all he focused on, the lone goal driving every action. Something was up, and Lozora didn't like it, especially when she'd yet to be paid.

Finishing her coffee, she dropped a few bills on the table and rose, striding out to the street all other civilians were steering clear of. Shots rained down from the apartment building's rooftop, receiving return fire that tore at the brick exterior of the building. Real guns would have little to no impact, which was why her crew was outfitted with more effective options. Given enough time, they could clear out the whole wall running along the roofline. Hence why the capes shooting back were being certain not to give the gang that kind of opportunity.

Lozora moved easily through the road, steering clear of the brawl like any normal person would. She slipped up a few streets, circling around and coming at the building from the other side. A few others could be spotted using the same tactic, though for the most part, everyone was sticking at the front. Well, they hadn't been hired for their on-the-job thinking skills. Mostly, they were just intended to be fodder, though for what purpose still remained a mystery to her. Unlike the others, she went unnoticed until reaching the building itself. Using her strength, it was a small matter to scurry up the exterior to a second-story window, then smash her way inside.

She'd chosen a dark apartment, and it appeared to be currently unoccupied, which was perfect. Lozora wasn't necessarily going to join the battle—that wasn't what she'd been contracted for—but she had no intention of letting her employer get everything he wanted and then skip out on the bill. For as little as she knew about his plans as a whole, one way or another, it would end with the New Science Sentries. So long as she stayed near them, her employer would turn up.

Until then, it was a matter of laying low. When he inevitably arrived, there was truly no telling what might happen, save only that the New Science Sentries were unlikely to survive it.

Finally.

Doctor Mechanical reran the simulation again and again, testing external variables for differing results, yet none of it seemed to matter. So long as the meltdown process was started properly, minor details like position and active velocity had no impact whatsoever. They'd found their move, but there were still a few more details to handle. It wouldn't do to give away the turn too early.

The first preparation step was to take control of the ship's communications. Blocking the signals from Earth had been a minor chore to set up before they left; this was quite a bit more comprehensive. From the Wrexwren version of cameras currently trained on Lodestar, to the actual signals being relayed between ships, Doctor Mechanical took control of every last scrap. As of this moment, the Wrexwren on the main vessel would see and hear only what he permitted.

With that done, he scanned the general chatter as Xelas dummied up a few programs to simulate the same amount of mid-battle noise. It wouldn't fool anyone truly perceptive, and even the slower ones would catch on eventually, but it wasn't as if this charade needed to stand the test of time. It didn't particularly matter if they saw through it, really; the damage would be done, except this would give Fornax a more powerful tool to use when the time was right.

Control established, preparations in place, and the right sequence discovered. There was no need for he or Xelas to move their physical heads, not when they were already working together so closely in digital space. They did pause for a moment to confer, making completely sure that both were ready to proceed. Once they made the call, there was no turning back on multiple fronts.

Together, unseen by any of the Wrexwren who were still laughing as they watched Zerle Salvrin smack around Fornax, Doctor Mechanial and Xelas activated their creation.

It was, at its heart, only a signal. A signal carrying specific programming, one designed to bypass the Wrexwren security completely and cause a series of sequential activations within the engines. Just a signal, yet with it, the Wrexwren invasion functionally came to an end, even if it would take the aliens some time to fully understand the loss they'd incurred. Most would die with no idea of what had even happened—a small blessing that proved Doctor Mechanial wasn't entirely heartless.

Since there was no more need to play nice, he and Xelas both raised their weapons, unnoticed by the Wrexwren who'd written them both off entirely. A few bright flashes and some whistle-screams, then they were alone, that annoying rabble of laughter muted at long last. It felt good, but not nearly so fine as the sensation of broadcasting a message to his friend's ears, letting him know the first part of the fight was over. No more sandbagging.

"Fornax, this is Doctor Mechanial. Injury has been accomplished. You are free to proceed with adding Insult."

Despite the distance, she saw them go. Lodestar was burning bright with power, operating at what most of the world thought to be her maximum. They were close on that front, as this was what she considered to be her terrestrial maximum—things got dangerous if she swung much more power than this around while planet-side. But the truth was, so far as she knew, a Lodestar had no true limit. There was always more power to be drawn. The only question was how much of the person would remain afterward.

Using her power was like stealing some primal force of the universe to make herself bigger, in a metaphysical sense rather than a literal one. The more she drew, the greater her capabilities, but the less of her there was in comparison. As the power flowed in, it became harder and harder to stay Helen. That was how Lodestars changed, based on the multiverse research they'd managed. One drew in more than they could find their way back from.

There was a time even brushing against her current level might have caused some concern, but that was very long ago indeed. She was, to her knowledge, one of the longer-lived incarnations of Lodestar, and had a very strong hunch as to why. Most Lodestars were cut off, their tremendous power and responsibility making it near impossible for them to feel truly connected with anyone else. Who could possibly relate to that kind of burden? But she was different. Friends, family, the simple thought of her daughter, all of it bonded her to that world, to the life she lived outside this costume.

She was Helen, who served as the Lodestar, while knowing exactly who she was. And right at that moment, she was furious. With Ivan and the guild, for what they'd just done. With the Wrexwren, for putting them in that position to begin with. With herself, more than anything. Maybe there was a way it didn't have to be like this. A world where, if she'd been stronger, faster, or smarter, there would be less bloodshed. It was a very familiar anger, one that had burned in her since the first day she woke with these powers, and without her parents or brother.

Earth-maximum was clearly not going to cut it. Still, she had to press on incrementally. Trying to kill this creature outright because of her own fury would make her just as bad as the guild. But those increments were about to start increasing sharply, by necessity if not intent.

Truth be told, when she started using this kind of power, not even Lodestar could completely control it. For the Scralthor's sake, she really hoped it was smart enough to run while it still had a chance.

Doctor Mechaniacal's voice in his ear was both welcome and terrifying. Welcome, because even Ivan was starting to get weary of taking blow after blow constantly. Terrifying, because compared to what came next, that was the equivalent of sitting on a park bench on a sunny afternoon. He was going to have to do something genuinely horrifying, and there was simply no way around it.

With so many meta-humans and people watching at home, no subterfuge would go undiscovered, no trickery could slip the collective consciousness. The plan called for Fornax, which was why he'd donned the mask and name once more. Except, the reputation wasn't enough. For this to work, for the message to get through, he couldn't be Ivan playing pretend. Everything had to be real, so there were no loose threads to unravel.

Pretending wasn't enough. Today, he had to be Fornax once more. And that was what made Ivan so scared, as the darkness filled his eyes and runes appeared in their place: how incredibly easy it was for that first mad giggle to come bounding past his lips, like it had been waiting just below the surface for a chance to rise.

It was a strange time to laugh, given that he was currently leaning against the wall, having been sent there by Zerle Salvrin's mighty fists. The Wrexwren was struck by the sound, turning its head in some manner—though without eyes, it was hard to view any section as the “front” with certainty.

“Zerle Salvrin, I came here expecting to be disappointed, but you... you are worthy.” Fornax rose, not bothered by the blood dripping from parts of his face. That was what the mask was for, and anyway, it wasn't as if he hadn't fought through far worse pain than this.

“I need be worthy to kill one so pitiful as you?” He seemed insulted by the idea, charging right up with a fresh attack. Only, this one didn't land like all the others. Despite the twisting madness of his movement, Zerle Salvrin found one arm caught by Fornax, while the red-masked man dodged the other strikes. There was brief moment as they looked upon one another, before Fornax's fist sent Zerle Salvrin flying back to the other side of the chamber.

“You are worthy of being broken.” Fornax was smiling now, genuine glee as he took in the rasped, unsteady nature of the Wrexwren's whistles. He might have hit whatever their version of lungs was. “Only the strong can truly be destroyed, you see. The weak have too much bend. They lack suitable pride to be humbled, confidence to shatter. Even the things they love, they understand might be stolen away by fate or another. Not like the strong, who believe we can push against the very will of the universe when what's ours is threatened."

Zerle Salvrin didn't simply lay on the ground and suffer abuse. He was up in short order, but approached with far greater caution this time. The movements were closer to his initial attacks, before he'd felt certain in his victory: guarded, probing, a much more defensive tactic now that he knew his opponent was capable of hitting back. Fornax allowed three blows to land on various points of his body, and in return, he slammed a fist into the same spot he'd hit the first time, sending Zerle Salvrin flying again with a fresh round of rasping.

"You think you can kill me that easily?" Zerle Salvrin was already rising again. It looked as if he could take as hard as he gave—no wonder this being had attained such a high position among his species.

"Kill you? My good Zerle, you truly have zero grasp on what is happening. If someone wanted you killed, there is no shortage of options available to us. We could have obliterated you from the ground weeks ago. You are not so fortunate as to get an executioner. I am Fornax, and my one true gift is destruction. Death is easy. Instead, I am going to break every piece of who you are. Then, if you ask very nicely, I may just grant you an ending."

The whistle had a very snarl-like quality as it rang out, which matched the aggressive posture Zerle Salvrin was adopting, visibly prepared for another bout. "Empty threats. Even if you are stronger than I, my people have well prepared me for torture. I've endured it on missions more than once. There is no breaking of Zerle Salvrin."

Fornax's smile grew substantially wider. "Excellent. That's right, tell me how pointless it is. Tell me how you will absolutely, unquestionably triumph. Show me your strength, Zerle Salvrin. Show my world your power, so that your shattering will be all the greater."

This time, Fornax didn't counter the attacks. He merely dodged them, stepping nimbly out of the way so the myriad of Wrexwren limbs struck only air. "But you know, I really can't stand fighting in all this silence. Down on Earth, things are messy and chaotic. By now, we'd have people screaming and yelling, possibly even a few interlopers to deal with. Doctor Mechaniacal, would you be so kind as to give us a soundtrack?"

This time, the voice didn't reply over the communicator. Doctor Mechaniacal's reply echoed through the entire chamber, broadcast along whatever system was still showing Lodestar squaring off with the Scralthor overhead. “My pleasure, Fornax. In fact, I have just the thing.”

The closest sound Fornax could compare to what came next was a truckload of whistles crashing in a hurricane, which then blew through each one. A cacophony of crunching, crashing, shrill noises, most of which were all nonsense. Only a few soundbites were clear enough for his translator to make them out.

“They’re everywhere. We can’t get out!”

“—large teeth and glowing red eyes, killed—”

“—entire crew eviscerated—”

“—a trap!”

“Seems like this was planned—”

“Zerle, this is a world woven of death.”

That last one was rather poetic, assuming it was the Wrexwren’s actual words and not the translator’s approximation. Zerle Salvrin, however, was not reacting nearly so well to these new sounds. Given that he understood all of them, it was probably quite the bloody accounting of how their invasion was going so far. Selectively blocking the signals had been vital, both to keep the Wrexwren cocky and to ensure Zerle Salvrin was properly caught off guard. Now, he was learning the truth of how his people were faring, or at least, the relative few that might still be alive.

“If you want to break someone at their core, you must first understand what makes up their foundation. From where do they draw their strength. As you informed Lodestar, you are a Zerle, an earned rank, no doubt connected to your position on this ship. I do wonder, how many are required under your command to be a Zerle? Is there a specific number needed? How about you count the ones we hear actually die, and you tell me when I need to start addressing you by another title.”

This noise was nearly a train whistle, a furious burst from Zerle Salvrin which served as the only warning before he sprang, a wild mass of limbs moving faster than any blow thrown before. As planned, he was now fighting for real. No more putting on a show or taking his time; Zerle Salvrin was swinging for the kill. That too was an important part of the process: he had to bring his very best to the fight.

Because that would make Fornax crushing him all the more painful.

---

Chapter 112

---

Between the trickle of goons making it through only to be smacked down, the shots on the roof doing some damage on their own, and the few smart enough to leave after they noticed that dozens had gone into the building without anyone reemerging, they were making a surprisingly good pace through the siege's attackers. A worryingly good pace, if Tachyonic was being honest. For as relatively new to the field as he was, it wasn't as if Vomisa were without any dangers of its own. Tachyonic had been in enough tight spots to trust his instincts, all of which were screaming that something was off. Whoever had thrown this together put in a lot of effort. There was virtually no chance it would be settled so easily.

That's why Tachyonic was doing a thorough sweep while he had the opportunity, making sure that none of the crooks were secretly planting explosives or setting up meta-tech devices while everyone else was distracted. Thus far, he'd come up entirely empty. The only things he was passing as he ran were the toppled bodies of criminals that had already been taken out. They were scattered through the halls, most in various states of unconsciousness, with a few showing more substantial injuries—largely the ones who'd been unlucky enough to fight Bahamut.

He paused near an electrical panel that was slightly askew, stepping over three knocked-out minions to get at it. Maybe they'd been doing something when they were interrupted, and the others hadn't noticed? Yanking open the door, he scanned over the interior, finding nothing amiss. While he wouldn't have been capable of puzzling out the workings of some complex device, he trusted himself to at least tell if the wires had been yanked out and messed with.

Unfortunately, all that focus on the panel took away from other potential threats, though it wasn't as if he'd have paid much attention to a defeated foe in the first place. That's what made it such a perfect hiding space.

The pain was instant, swift, and terrifying: a burning spike driven directly through his left ankle, forcing Tachyonic to lean against the wall as his leg suddenly refused to bear weight. Spinning around, he saw one of the bodies calmly rising to its feet. It appeared to be a largely unremarkable man—plain clothes and simple looks, not even any meta-tech on hand. On the subject on hands, Tachyonic noticed that this fellow did have one very distinguishing feature: his left hand was gaunt, almost skeletal, with dark wisps of smoke rising off it. The smoke was quite similar to a small tendril drifting out of Tachyonic's new ankle-hole, making the puzzle of what had happened a simple solve.

Struggling, Tachyonic tried to move, hopping slightly away. To his shock, the man made no immediate lunge, but rather followed slowly, as if he had no reason in the world to hurry. Did he not realize that with enough time, Tachyonic could call for backup?

No. He wanted the call for backup to go out. Suddenly, it all made much more sense. Whoever this was had been lying in wait, next to a trap that would draw in any superhero doing a perimeter sweep. He'd hobbled their fastest member in a single blow—that was not a coincidence. Having the power to do such a thing meant nothing if one couldn't create opportunity. This was someone with a plan, and there was little hope that playing into it worked out well for the New Science Sentries.

The trouble was, if he radioed and warned everyone, there was a strong possibility they might come anyway. Were he to know a friend was in danger, Agent Quantum wouldn't turn back, and the others would be hot on his heels. Their best shot was if Tachyonic could escape and warn them in person. It might still come down to a fight; the goal was just not to have it on this mystery attacker's terms.

Running on an ankle with a hole in the middle would be painful as hell, but the real problem was how much it would slow him down. Still, he'd be limping at super-speeds, so hopefully that beat out the ambusher's running pace. Tilting forward, Tachyonic took off, bolting himself forward. Except something was wrong, more than just his foot. His speed was diluted, weakened, even with the bracer confirming that he was indeed getting a constant setlium output.

He'd barely gotten ten steps down the hall when a strong hand fell upon his shoulder, jerking him back effortlessly. Tachyonic flew into drywall as he was tossed, leaving a sizable dent and receiving a good rattle to the skull. By the time he looked up, the attacker was standing above him once more, staring down with a smile that didn't fit the skin of his face.

"One of life's cruel humors; I am the opposing element to your power source. That potent setlium crackling in your cells is suddenly not working so well now that my energy is in the mix, corrupting the bonds that fuel your abilities. The good news is that the effects will fade, eventually. Assuming you survive."

It was not his smoking left hand, but his still human-looking right that reached forward. Although Tachyonic tried to struggle from the ground, it was useless. This man wasn't just strong in the sense of Agent Quantum: he was on a whole other level, closer to Professor Quantum. Nothing Tachyonic did, from pulling at his arms to a full-force punch in the face, made any impact. The superhero might as well have been a stiff breeze. The attacks were short-lived, as he soon found his head pressed against the wall as the stranger waved a device next to his ear. When his attacker spoke again, Tachyonic realized with horror that he didn't just hear it nearby, it was coming through the communicators, as well.

"Good morning, New Science Sentries. I'm pleased at how well you've done with the warm-up exercises, but the time has come to take things to the next level. We now know you to be capable of the basics for superhero work. Let us next test your bravery. I have taken Tachyonic, and he won't be escaping without help. Playing with him will likely keep me occupied for some while, long enough that the rest of you might get away. Time for your first choice, New Science Sentries. Come save your friend, or live to fight another day. You have five minutes to find us. After that, I'll put a new hole in him for every minute the entire team isn't present. Oh, and as you can tell, I'm tapped into your lines. If anyone decides to try to reach the AHC, I'll leave Tachyonic's body in the lobby. His head... now that you'll have to search for."

Fighting through the pain, Tachyonic stared into those cold, distant eyes. "Why are you doing this? We don't know you. There's no grudge here."

“Poor little pawn. He’s so cruel as to send you out into the world with no idea what you’ll truly be facing, yet somehow, I’m the monster?” While the words might have crafted a veneer of sympathy, there was no touch of humanity in those words. “Take heart, because this isn’t really about you. It never could have been—not if you’d spent decades building to the New Science Sentries’ legacy. He would have never let it be that way. You were always destined to die a footnote, just one more person for Professor Quantum to step over in his quest for greatness.”

It might not be the nicest sentiment, but at least it made sense. The New Science Sentries hadn’t gotten into nearly enough trouble to have grudges like this held against them. The Science Sentries in their original incarnation, especially with Professor Quantum in the lead, would be a very different story. And as someone who’d grown up around Professor Quantum, Tachyonic had no trouble believing someone could hate the man that much. In other circumstances, it might even have been a point of bonding.

“Look, I’m sorry if Professor Quantum screwed you over in some way. That’s just who he is. You’re one of countless. But it has nothing to do with us.”

“So very wrong, on multiple levels,” the attacker countered. “You became part of it when he gave you that name, when he decided to add to his legacy using you four as tools. You are connected to his accomplishments—which is to say, his ego—and nothing hurts him more than being attacked there. Besides which, I am not ‘one of countless’ as you implied. I am, without question, the first one destroyed by Professor Quantum’s ambition.”

“What makes you so sure of that?” Tachyonic spat, half hoping to keep him distracted, half trying to keep his mind off the pain in his ankle.

There was a placidness to the man as he spread his arms, one hand normal, the other letting off plumes of dark smoke. “Because on the day he betrayed me, his name was still Vernon.”

Sunshine covered the green landscape, where verdant trees and lush grass grew in every direction. As the Wrexwren moved, it noted the structure up ahead: simple, yet large and well-maintained. This was a lived-in area, which made it more dangerous. The rest of the team would be circling, ensuring they took the occupants by surprise.

In front of the structure, many tiny humans were running about, wasting their already short lives on frivolity. Such energy would be better used in industries across the galaxy, once the Wrexwren understood how much labor a human body could endure at various levels of growth. There would be trial and error, but there was no shortage of subjects to learn from.

Stepping out of the woods, the Wrexwren leader began to raise his weapon, only to have his view cut off. The rest of his team was around him—only, chunks of their bodies had been torn out. Worse, there were more appearing: the Stropolof warriors they'd mowed through, the devoted innocents who'd been wiped out by his fire on Tregle-9. More and more, the past appeared, all of it looking right at him, deadly hatred in their eyes.

Together, the mass of unseen horrors descended upon the Wrexwren leader, viciously tearing him apart as they had the rest of his crew. None of the playing children witnessed any of this, however. They were busy making a fort with their current caretaker, a grown man with dirty-blond hair. He alone looked to the dying Wrexwren, no pity whatsoever present on that serene face. For a moment, in the pain of death, the alien believed he saw something else, like a pair of metal wings extending behind the peaceful man.

Kristoph handed out fresh crayons to a child drawing the landscape, not a single Wrexwren or ship to be seen in the artwork. Taking a role of protection had made the most sense for him on this chaotic day. While the Wrexwren invasion would no doubt have casualties among every age group, there was little purpose to hunting them down.

The guild was already making sure that when the day was done, the Wrexwren would thoroughly answer for their crimes.

“Holy shit.” Presto stopped cold, and Plasmodia looked as though she might be ill. The smaller cape’s face was hidden by his mask, yet the anger made it into his words without any obstruction whatsoever. “Oh, this guy is so dead.”

“He could be bluffing.” Plasmodia’s rebuttal was weak—she didn’t believe it. This was a moment’s respite in brief denial.

“Not on our communication channel, he isn’t.” Presto started for the roofline, only to be snared by Cyber Geek.

Hephaestus, for her part, was mostly trying to keep the blasts raining down, though the available targets were getting thin. After a prolonged period of firing and letting them past in batches, most were either inside, injured, or had decided this was not worth the effort and bailed. “Anyone want to loop me in on what’s going on? Temporary allies and all?”

She was unprepared for the furious dervish who suddenly appeared next to her, Presto grabbing her helmet and trying to force it into his eye-line. “You! If you had anything to do with—”

Hephaestus jerked her helmet forward. She nearly smashed Presto in the nose until he leapt away at the last moment, though she did succeed in her attempt at breaking his grip. “I have about had it with the goddamn threats. In case you didn’t notice, I am not a fucking cape, and I do not have to be here putting up with your shit. Flying out has been an option from the start. Now, will you cut the posturing and tell me if there’s anything new I need to know about?”

“Someone captured Tachyonic and sent a message over the nearby AHC communicators.” The response came not from Presto, who was still fuming, but rather from Cyber Geek. “They’re going to torture him until the New Science Sentries come help. And apparently kill him if we attempt to call in any backup.”

Suddenly, Presto’s rage made a great deal more sense. What she comprehended less, however, was the unforeseen surge of anger that suddenly tore up from Tori’s gut. There was a time when she wouldn’t have understood what it meant, but Lodestar’s words still hung heavy on her mind. She could put up all the walls, pretend that there weren’t bonds, and go through her entire life acting as if she had no human connections. Lying to herself was the only area where it was doomed to fail. Because deep down, she knew when she felt that instinctive reaction, that every part of her was saying No. Tachyonic... Kyle... was intrusive, often said the wrong thing, and had generally made her life more complicated since he’d arrived in it.

But he was her friend. She could accept that now, while there was still time to act, or later, when nothing she did would matter.

Just like that, the world made sense again. It didn't matter if he was a cape, or a villain, a meta-human, an alien, a god, or a demon. She wanted him around, alive, and that made him hers, in a sense. If there was one thing that defined Tori Rivas, one truth carved into her soul as she endured the beeping hell of watching her parents slowly fade away, it was this:

No one stole from her. No one took what was hers, be it items, ideas, or people she cared for. Whoever this person was, they had made a huge mistake. It wasn't merely the capes they'd pissed off with that move, they'd caught the attention of a dangerous villain, as well.

"Then why the hell are you all still standing here? Shouldn't we be sweeping for him?"

The three capes looked at her, visible worry in their eyes. Hephaestus been an ally so far, but also an adversary in the past. With the stakes suddenly dire, their tenuous trust was stretched thin, torn between the need for more bodies in the fight versus pairing with people they actually trusted.

"I feel like one of you is about to threaten me yet again, which is not only unneeded, at this point, it's actively rude. You don't like me, fine. Don't trust me, that's fair too. But you're all smart enough to understand that I'm a guild member, meaning that there are rules I play by. Torturing and killing capes is not a part of that. Whoever this person is, they're disrespecting my organization, as well. Now, that's not the same as 'kidnapped friend' for motivation, sure, but it's more than enough reason to plant my beam in the base of their skull."

"Let Hephaestus come. What matters most is getting Tachyonic back. Anything else, we can deal with after." Presto headed toward the rooftop doorway, his only way into the building since they lacked a clear line of sight. "But we stay together as we move. Anyone capable of taking down Tachyonic is not to be underestimated."

The mere fact that Presto, of all people, was being so serious drove the gravity of the situation home. Hephaestus followed the capes from the roof, leaving the few straggling goons waiting for shots that would never come. They had a new threat to deal with, and this one was not nearly so easily countered.

---

Chapter 113

---

“The new guy is kind of intense.” Pest Control directed his swarm of meta-hornets into the Wrexwren cockpit, drawing more whistle-screams from within. Whatever physical characteristics the aliens had, immunity to insects that had been mutated by a chemical spill was not among them. Since adding these specimens to his arsenal, the villain’s deadliness had gone up considerably, though this was his first chance to really cut loose with them.

Nearby, Glyph snapped in triumph as a different Wrexwren soldier stepped into one of the hidden magical runes placed along the ground. Without warning, he turned on his comrade, firing onto the other Wrexwren who’d trusted their leader with their lives, killing several before they managed to shoot back and bring it all to an end. “Yeah, he’s really racking up the bodies.”

From the trees, the humanoid form dropped, sinking claws into a Wrexwren’s neck before savagely digging further, sending sprays of alien liquid all along the lush grass. He leapt off the still-standing corpse, laying his fangs into another Wrexwren while pointing its own weapon toward more invaders. As pain took over, the alien tensed, sending errant shots sizzling through the air.

“Emory hasn’t had much chance to test himself in the field yet—he’s got to rebuild his sense of power and self, especially after the training he went through.” Arcanicus reinforced the magical shield around them, a form of power which the Wrexwren were showing no capacity for whatsoever. If they hadn't even been prepared for mystical forces, they were woefully unready to try to take on Earth.

"We all had training," Pest Control pointed out.

"You had a group experience. Emory has been entirely in the hands of his mentor to mold." Arcanicus had to look momentarily away as their newest guild apprentice ripped the scaly exterior from a Wrexwren's body, drawing horrific noises in the process. He usually didn't mind watching over the newer members—they weren't ambitious or competent enough to cause much trouble yet—but this bout was making him wish he'd prepared a stomach-soothing potion.

Glyph appeared to have a similar reaction, shaking his head at the carnage on display. "Who exactly was his mentor, anyway? A walking flesh-blender?"

"Close guess, actually. He learned from Xelas." Arcanicus wasn't sure how he felt about the immediate understanding that settled into both rookies' faces at that revelation. He was of the opinion that perhaps the guild didn't need to be bone-chillingly scary to function effectively, but that put him in the minority of their leadership. The guild's current plan was built out of reestablishing precisely that horrific reputation, so Xelas and her methods were clearly a good fit for the organization.

As a spray of alien viscera landed on his shoes, Arcanicus muttered darkly under his breath. Carnage was one thing; they needed to teach him how to aim the consequences better. If the guild was going to be home to the world's greatest horrors, then Arcanicus could ensure they were well-trained unnatural disasters, if nothing else.

Moving the apartment building's residents around was surprisingly easy. One of the benefits to living in Ridge City: everyone was accustomed to meta-fights and evacuations. With minimal prompting, they were willing to accept the aid of a woman in what could be generously described as a makeshift costume. By opting to be "Better lucky than good," Cliché managed to avoid almost every threat as they walked down into the garage, depositing her neighbors into their respective concrete cubes or whatever ones were unoccupied. On the few occasions where someone did spot them, her umbrella easily deflected any ranged attacks they sent, and soon, the attackers had one of the capes to worry about.

She tried hard to put Nexus and his cryptic warning out of her mind as she worked. There had been no sign of him since leaving the roof, but that offered little comfort when it came to a man who could appear from nowhere. Scary as Nexus was, he didn't appear to be taking an active role today, which made him more annoyance than threat. When everyone else was coming to kill, creepy predictions didn't carry quite the same oomph.

The scream caught her off guard. Having already checked all of the rooms down this hall, Cliché was heading back toward the roof to report a successful evacuation. It didn't sound like a mid-fight scream, especially considering she'd glimpsed Bahamut and Agent Quantum a floor above minutes prior. Maybe she'd missed someone, and they'd gotten caught? Except, something about that voice was almost... familiar. Umbrella at the ready, Cliché crept forward, taking each step with care until she came around a corner and nearly gasped in shock.

Tachyonic was down. Not just down, trying to crawl on his back, eyes tilted upward at the twisted face of the man staring down at him. Smoke drifted from the man's left arm, dark and gaunt all the way to the elbow. By the way Tachyonic was dragging his leg, this didn't seem like any sort of ploy; he'd been seriously injured. For someone with his skillset, Tachyonic was functionally out of the fight, a huge blow to the New Science Sentries' collective strength.

"It's such a pretty narrative. One man's genius breaks the very foundations of reality, ushering in a new age of limitless potential. The laws of physics and the universe are altered, allowing what was once impossible to become commonplace. Except it all ignores the simple truth that some things are supposed to be impossible. What was unleashed has far more capacity to corrupt, destroy, and ruin rather than elevate. How many monsters have risen out of our world, chasing or fueled by the power he unleashed?"

"So you're the good one? Going to tell me how, somehow, all of this is because you were really in the right? Look, you'll never have to sell me on Professor Quantum being a callous, cold, calculating asshole. But he still turns his power toward the greater good, so why don't you spare me the moralizing. I know who the superhero is between the two of you."

The man advanced, stomping down a foot next to Tachyonic's shin that shattered the wood beneath. Oh crap; he was strong on top of whatever was going on with his hand. Cliché leaned slightly forward, shifting her footing in case she needed to help. Thus far, the umbrella had been able to take everything thrown at it. Hopefully, this was not the day she discovered its limits.

"You're so young, barely more than a child. It's no wonder you still believe in such ridiculous concepts. There are no heroes in this world, super or otherwise. Only powerful people playing games to amuse themselves, the mundane serving as little more than pieces and prizes. The entire premise is a fabrication, a trick that lets them rule while upholding the illusion of service. The only difference between your people and the guild is that yours were more effective in seizing power."

Cliché said a small prayer of thanks in her heart to whoever the god of monologuing was, for they'd been blessed with a talker. That was time not spent maiming or killing; Tachyonic just needed to play into the rant and keep him going until help could arrive. Help other than her—someone with real power to swing around.

"I might be young, but you are categorically wrong." Tachyonic somehow managed to find a defiant expression, despite his prone, vulnerable position. "Are a lot of capes like that? Hell yes. Most of us are in this career for the wrong reasons, from pure ambition to having no normal job options. But there are some who live up to the word superhero, whose hearts are in exactly the right place, who take up this fight because they can't imagine standing by when they have the power to help. I know it with absolute certainty; it has been my privilege to work under just such a person."

A sharp hiss and crackle drew Cliché's attention to the looming man's left arm, which was sending up even more smoke. Strangely, the skin along his arm turned crisp, then flaked away, unlike any transformation she'd seen before. It was more like he was burning off an outer shell of flesh.

Leaning down, his right hand flew out, snaring Tachyonic by the skull, holding his head locked in place. "Do you still think he's going to save you? That there's any hope you will all make it out of this?"

"The entire point of being a superhero is giving people hope even in the most dire of lost situations," Tachyonic replied. "Maybe he won't make it in time to save me, but he's absolutely going to stop you."

They stayed like that for a long moment, until the grip on Tachyonic's skull was suddenly released. "Very brave, little pawn. Trying to goad me into killing you in the hopes of taking away my hostage. Your friends still would have died, but I will admit, it might have been harder to draw them all in. Now, I shall teach you the cost of bravery. Everything below your right knee seems an adequate price."

He lifted his smoking left arm, and Cliché realized her bystander time was officially over. Either she let this happen or stood up: both options represented a choice. Praying dearly that the mask and goggle combo adequately hid her face, Cliché dove out from her hiding spot, racing forward with umbrella at the ready.

Whether it was uncertainty as to who she was or merely confusion at the motley ensemble running in his direction, the man actually did pause to see what the hell was happening. It was enough of a gap for Cliché to leap between him and Tachyonic, popping her umbrella out to full extension, barely fitting inside the narrow confines of the hallway.

"Get out of here! He's too strong." Tachyonic tried to send her away; however, the effort was significantly compromised by his inability to stand or walk.

"I think that's in our favor. The worse I am in comparison, the luckier I should be." Cliché wasn't entirely sure if that was how her current saying actually worked, but it felt like it could be true as an interpretation. If the power really was shaped by her perceptions of it, then that was how she chose for the phrase to interact with the world.

Then again, if she was wrong, it probably wouldn't take too long to figure out.

The man examined Cliché once with detached interest before coldly remarking, "You are not a New Science Sentry. There is no purpose in killing you slowly." His left hand slashed down, intercepted by the umbrella as the bone-like digits raked off what should have been nothing more than dark fabric. Mercifully, the makeshift shield held, though the reaction that came next was completely unexpected.

"What?!?" The man bellowed, his voice ringing off the walls around them, all composure suddenly gone. He struck again, that smoking hand scratching at the handheld barrier between them, only to slide harmlessly off. "This can't be. No mere object can withstand my corrosion. Even the skin I wear is temporary. You... dare to challenge me?"

The next blow that came was not a scratch; instead, it was like a sledgehammer. Having raised up his arms, the man struck with tremendous force, driving Cliché and her legs deep into the wooden floor. Snapping sounds were her only warning before suddenly, there was no ground beneath her feet. The stomp he'd delivered earlier had substantially weakened the structure; this second blow was more than the old building could bear.

Through the air she and Tachyonic tumbled, down onto the unexpectedly soft landing pile of blankets and pillows. They'd ended up in a bedroom a floor below, the lush mattress easily breaking both of their falls. Up above, she could still see the man, staring down through the hole he'd just accidentally made, twisted in rage and glaring down at both of them. Well, she was certainly on his radar now.

"The hell just happened?" Tachyonic fought his way out from under a pile of pillows, rising back to a seated position just before they heard the gentle thud of another body hitting the ground, their attacker landing only feet away.

"You managed to buy yourself another few minutes." Everything from his left shoulder down was smoking now, as were small sections of his face where the peeling process had begun. "That's all your vain struggling managed to accomplish."

This time, there was nothing gentle about the noise that rang out from the floor upon landing. Given the new form's size and muscles, it was no surprise the wood struggled to uphold what crashed down heavily upon it, and if rage had any mass, then Agent Quantum would have caused the floorboards to buckle right then and there.

"They also made enough noise to be easily found." Agent Quantum looked across the room to Tachyonic's injured form. The anger hardened as his gaze turned to the smoking-armed attacker. Cliché had never seen an expression like that on his face, in or out of costume. It was, curiously, the first time she'd even noticed any resemblance at all between Agent and Professor Quantum.

Despite the evident fury, he still didn't come out of the gate swinging. "You get one chance: surrender, and come in quietly. Don't try to fight me right now. I'm not at all confident I can hold back."

"He's our weakness!" Tachyonic hurriedly yelled from the bed. "Don't let him touch you—it messes with our abilities. Just get the others clear. He won't stop until he has us all."

"Well, yes and no," the man corrected, his calm voice and face once more fixed in place. Whatever dark impulses Cliché had stirred up, Agent Quantum was clearly of higher priority. "The weakness part is true, and I fully intend to do some killing, but only you are truly essential, Agent Quantum. Only you carry his blood."

Up above, Cliché could make out the forms of Medley and Bahamut. They must have heard the noise, as well. Perhaps they were waiting for the right moment to strike, which she hoped would arrive soon. Tempting as it was to teleport out, she wasn't going anywhere until at least her roommates were present. Besides, at least here, she could influence things slightly. She just hoped it would be for the better.

"That mean you'll let the others go?" Agent Quantum asked.

"Obviously not. My point is just that I don't especially care about them, so it's possible they could escape. Flee and cower—that will shame the Science Sentries brand nearly as well as their deaths. That means the longer you 'distract' me, the better their chances of escape."

Lifting his arms, Agent Quantum took a position that clearly indicated a fight was about to begin. "Seems we both believe ourselves to be the stronger in this fight. How 'bout we skip the bluster and find out who's right?"

"You lack his prudence and intelligence, yet you managed to retain the arrogance. I shall take great pleasure in this."

Agent Quantum charged, and the battle was on.

---

Chapter 114

---

The noise was fading, not that it mattered. Zerle Salvrin remained enraged, swinging like he intended to knock Fornax's skull from his shoulders. The cries for help from his people, all beyond his reach, had done their job and rattled his certainty. Had Ivan been the one running this show, he would have ended things soon after. To his thinking, it was enough. Sadly, for Zerle Salvrin, this was a Fornax mission, and he was only just beginning to have fun. Besides, this show wasn't really for Zerle Salvrin, and Fornax couldn't start the conclusion until the star performance had occurred.

A dull ringing echoed through the room as Zerle Salvrin's fists collided with the wall, failing yet again to land a blow on Fornax. The Wrexwren anatomy and martial art was certainly unique, involving tactics that had demanded time to fully grasp, but Fornax had been born in battle. His entire life until the change was nothing but fighting: constantly, endlessly, without even the hope of it ceasing. Adapting to new forms of attack was one of the reasons Ivan had been the lone survivor, and some habits were far too ingrained to be weathered away by a few mere years of peace.

"While my world chips away at your title, I can move on to breaking the next of your foundations: that strength in which you place so much value. Tell me, Zerle Salvrin, were you the strongest of your people?"

Zerle Salvrin was in no mood for chitchat. He kept pressing the attack, limbs swirling in all manner of directions, like an inescapable cloud. Fornax struck directly through the attempt, knocking two arms aside as he sent the Wrexwren hurtling back hard into the wall. "I asked you a question. Don't get boring on me, or I'll have to find other ways to entertain myself."

Whether it was the actual threat, or just the desire for a few seconds of rest, Zerle Salvryn eventually replied as he slowly pulled himself back to standing. “I am among the elite, yet there are greater threats still among my people. Do not think this will save your planet. Even if our forces are driven back, the Wrexwren will never stop.”

“Oh?” Fornax didn’t sound as if he was afraid of the prospect. In fact, he was bordering on excitement. “How I wish you were right about that. What I wouldn’t give for an endless stream of your people coming to Earth, providing me with new fun. Because I am not the strongest of my people.”

He pointed overhead, to where the screen showed Lodestar glowing brighter than before, still attempting to fight back the cosmic horror on a crash course for the Earth’s sun. “Our planet is like a pressure cooker, and that is the lid. We host a constant building of power and force that should spill forth into the greater universe, except for the insurmountable barrier that holds us all back. It spurs us on to greater heights, building more pressure as we try and fail to overtake her. As iron sharpens iron, meta sharpens meta, all so we can break our blades on that incomprehensible wall named Lodestar.”

“You believe weakness is a thing to boast of?” Zerle Salvryn came in for another round, but this time, Fornax didn’t wait for the attack. He dashed forward, hitting his opponent in the torso yet again. He didn’t permit the alien to fly back, however. Instead, he took hold of one of the four arms, pulling it taut until it nearly separated from the body.

“I don’t think you get the point. My species hasn’t been dominating the galaxy for untold years, attacking less-advanced cultures and calling that superiority strength. We are a combative, violent race that struggles endlessly to be mightier. In just fighting with each other and trying to reach that impossible standard set by our champion, we have already grown well past the point where the Wrexwren could ever have been a real threat.”

Kicks came from the multiple legs, but Fornax didn’t bother trying to dodge. He let the blows rain down, wards blocking most of the damage, yet not all. It was a gamble, allowing some injury now in the hopes it would strip away Zerle Salvryn’s will to fight. After telling him he was weak, refusing to show any reaction to the alien’s blows only drove the point further home.

“If we are no threat, then why did your greatest defender come to meet us?” Zerle Salvryn demanded. It might have been a real question, or a ploy to take whatever the Wrexwren version of a breather was. Either way, that was a good enough opening to Fornax.

“She is the world’s true superhero, and will defend it from any threat, big or small. It’s why the people of that planet can live such peaceful lives despite the chaos and madness of their reality: deep down, they all know that they have Lodestar’s protection. Which is the same reason why I’m up here today. Because you... don’t.”

The sound was wetter than he’d expected, given all the rough armor on the exterior, but it turned out the Wrexwren had a goopier inside than anticipated, at least around their limbs. Whatever noises Zerle Salvrin was making, there was no direct translation available, and perhaps that was a small mercy.

Not letting go of his prize, Fornax slapped Zerle Salvrin across the head with the newly detached arm, still flinging green goop all over the place. “You don’t have her protection, mighty Zerle. Since you came declaring war, none of your people do. What you considered an invasion, we think of as a pleasant diversion. You’ve given the Earth’s metas some new amusement, toys we can break to our heart’s content without fear of the blinding light interrupting the fun.”

Throwing his head back, Fornax let out a good old-fashioned villainous cackle. It came naturally, as did every part of this. That was the problem, being Fornax was too easy. There was no helping it for now, though. Making this work meant selling the part, so he allowed the dark impulses to wash over him. “You thought she was protecting us from the greater galaxy, didn’t you? Never once did it occur to you that perhaps Earth is home to innumerable monsters that would chew through what the rest of the cosmos considers to be threats. She’s not protecting us from the greater universe. She’s protecting the rest of you from things like me. That cute little ploy with your giant monster, what you likely thought to be a stroke of genius, was really just you sending away the only being who could have saved your people from this outcome.”

Another smack with the arm, more to horrify than to hurt. The job wasn’t yet done, and wouldn’t be until Lodestar completed her task. Fornax could break many things—he truly was an artist of the medium—but destroying hope was another matter. For that, he needed the power of a Lodestar. Until then, Fornax would simply have to amuse himself further.

“You lie... this is a trick...” Zerle Salvryn didn’t have quite the same confidence he had earlier in the fight—even his anger was being drowned out by uncertainty. They’d have to rekindle that flame soon, though not quite yet. Fornax preferred to hit him with the heaviest blows in rapid succession.

“Lying is for people too weak to own their truths. I am Fornax, one of the planet’s strongest combatants, renowned killer, and infamous villain. No tricks, no deceit. I’m just better. The only reason you aren’t dead yet is that I haven’t finished destroying you. Well, that...”

The blow was sudden and savage, a direct kick to the Wrexwren’s leg that completely shattered the lower half of the limb. Zerle Salvryn went sprawling, down to three functional appendages on both the upper and lower halves of his body. More harsh whistle-screams rang out as Fornax walked around him slowly, savoring each screech.

“That,” Fornax continued, “and I like the funny noises you make. Let’s see just how entertaining a Zerle can really be.”

“This might be getting a little violent.” Juan reached for the remote, intending to click away from the stream on the television. The hideout Ivan had sent Janet and the others to resembled a simple hotel on the fringes of a farming museum—not that there were any tours going on, given the day’s events. Everyone was huddled inside, though no Wrexwren ships had been seen anywhere near their vicinity. Or if they were, the security forces were handling it.

Janet’s hand moved before she’d thought it all through, snatching the remote away first. “You’re right. This is probably a bit much for Beth. Why don’t you two go to the lobby and get us some lunch?” She couldn’t turn away. Part of this was on her—she’d told Ivan the world needed to fear Fornax again. If anyone owed him a duty as witness, it was Janet. Besides, for all that had passed between them, some shard of her would always love Ivan, even if it was only the pieces of him she saw reflected in their children. He was fighting for the fate of the world and his family—at the very least, she could watch him do it.

“What about me?” Rick asked.

A month ago, it would have been such a simple question. Make him leave, keep him in the dark, as far from the truth as humanly possible. Now, he'd begun to unravel the shawl draped over their past. Sooner or later, there was a very real chance Rick was going to discover who his father was. He was going to hear horrible things about the man he called "Dad"—and worse, most of them would be true. Today would do little to alter that perception; watching Fornax torture a living creature, invader or not, would leave a sour taste in many people's mouths. Then again, there would also only be so many times he might get to see his father helping to save the world, and whether people liked the methods or not, Fornax was pitching in. Based on the horrific stream of cries from the Wrexwren in that broadcast, it seemed as if the entire guild was.

"It's up to you," Janet decided and declared in the same breath. "Violent as it is, I can't say this isn't a historic moment for our planet. There is some value in watching it unfold." Rick's journey of discovery had thus far been largely self-directed, so Janet decided to let that trend continue.

"I'll stay and watch. Finding out Fornax was alive was crazy enough. I never thought I'd get to see him cutting loose. Where the hell has he been all these years?" The flicker was brief, dispelled instantly by a brain not willing to contemplate such truths, yet Janet saw it all the same. A moment of concern, terror, on Rick's face as he'd briefly entertained what no doubt seemed like a ridiculous possibility. Pity for him; the longer he mulled it over, the less implausible it would sound.

As Juan and Beth headed out, Janet changed her position. Moving from the chair, she sat down on one of the bed's edges, next to Rick. If asked, she'd have said it was to get a better view—except Rick didn't ask. Probably because he'd reached that conclusion already, or the fight on-screen was simply too engrossing.

Or, deep down, Rick knew why she'd moved into easy hugging range and didn't yet want to face it. Janet, for her part, said nothing more. She didn't trust herself not to give everything away, even with how close Rick was to the truth. All she could do was be there for her son no matter if he chose discovery or ignorance, and try to mend what remained if his entire world fell down around him.

Lozora slipped along, moving toward the sound of the fracas. Her employer should be where the action was by this point. The few advances she'd gotten were fine, but the bulk of her pay still hung in the balance, so he'd better have managed to make it on time. At least she didn't have to worry about him losing upon arrival. There were capes who could potentially deal with him as a threat—temporarily, if nothing else—but they were all handling the much larger issue of an alien invasion. It was the most ludicrous, over-the-top distraction she'd ever even heard of, and it had been a large chunk of what convinced her to take the job. Anyone with that kind of ambition would be fun to watch whether they succeeded or flamed out spectacularly.

Her slender limbs made little sound as she crept, peering around a corner to spot Medley and some humanoid-dragon meta both looking through a hole in the floor. Dollars to cents, that would be where she found her target. How to approach was more complicated. Medley was no pushover, and the dragon certainly possessed the build of a bruiser. As a physical-based meta herself, two-on-one would put her at a disadvantage, even if they were individually weaker than she. Part of surviving meant avoiding needless risks, so Lozora eased back out of their sight.

The retreat lasted until she felt cold metal press into her back, and saw flashing lights in the corner of her eye.

“Tell us who the fuck you are right now, or I remodel your torso with an outside view. Whatever is left, Plasmodia can dice into pieces.”

“Hephaestus, that isn't how superheroes work.” Cyber Geek stepped into view, some device that looked like a lantern with earmuffs fading back to sparks. That explained how they'd snuck up on her, though it didn't really help the current predicament.

“Someone just captured a New Science Sentry and threatened to cut off his head. You'd better harden up fast, Cyber Geek. These people are not playing around.” The voice from behind, Hephaestus, was spot on, not that Lozora could tell any of them that.

Raising her hands slowly, Lozora made her posture as nonthreatening as possible. “I'm sorry! I'm sorry. I didn't mean to trespass, but there were aliens and a bunch of people with weird weapons, so I was trying to find somewhere to hide. Please, I can leave. I don't want any trouble.”

“Horseshit. You, a clear meta-human, broke into a building surrounded by a violent battle in an attempt to escape danger? Tell me neither of you capas are buying this.”

Plasmodia stepped forward, the sharp light emitting from her hand forcing Lozora to blink and look away. “Honestly, no. I don’t believe it either.” The light suddenly dimmed, and Plasmodia shifted her hand away. “But being a superhero isn’t just about protecting honest people. She doesn’t have a weapon and didn’t try to attack either of our allies. At worst, I think we have a robber with bad taste. At best, a civilian with terrible luck.”

“Either way, you’re staying with us,” Cyber Geek declared. “It’s too dangerous to let you wander off if you really are a civilian, and too risky for us if you’re not. Stay close, out of the fight, and when this is all over we’ll see you to safety.”

Almost incapable of believing her luck, Lozora waited for the coldness on her back to move. It finally did, though not before the helmet came within touching distance, brushing against the side of her head. “Give me a reason. I dare you.”

The voice didn’t try to whisper, which made the need for proximity curious, but when the threat was delivered, Lozora found herself not being poked by the weapon, which she considered excellent progress. Not only did it sound like she’d found her employer, Lozora had also procured a front-row seat. If things went south, she might even be willing to jump in and help the plans stay running smoothly.

For an additional fee, of course.

---

Chapter 115

---

Agent Quantum's swing went wide, sailing over the strange man's head as he easily side-stepped the attempted blow. Crawling, Tachyonic tried to make it to the edge of the bed, unsure of what he'd even do once he was off it, but certain that he had to try something. He'd already known their enemy was powerful. Now, they were learning things was even worse: this bizarre man also had training.

Thus far, he hadn't even delivered a single blow to Agent Quantum. There had been no need, when he could dodge every attack. It wasn't that he was just fast, however. For all the capabilities taken from Tachyonic by being hobbled, he could still perceive things at near super-speed. Watching the fight in slow motion, it was easier to notice the small details, like how this man wasn't actually quicker than Agent Quantum. He started reacting to the attack before it actually arrived, which could mean prophetic abilities, making them all the more screwed. Except sometimes, he had to tweak his dodges on the fly, meaning he didn't know exactly what was coming, only the general shape. Strangely, the attacks that came closest were when Agent Quantum got sloppy and broke his form.

Taking it all in and processing through a sped-up brain, Tachyonic quickly reached the most viable explanation he could find. "Agent Quantum! This guy knows our playbook. That's how he's reading your moves."

"Your playbook?" A hideous glare twisted around to Tachyonic, hatred flowing like the smoke drifting from cracks in his face. "These tactics are no more yours than the team name or costumes. I have fought the real Science Sentries, tracked their every development through the decades. If the true creators of your techniques were unable to defeat me with them, the sickly imitations will fare no better.”

The speech bought Agent Quantum a few moments to breathe, which he wisely utilized. Sounds came from overhead, and Tachyonic caught blurs of movement from Bahamut and Medley, along with what appeared to be more goons. Right, there were still a few stragglers around. Those two were probably holding the perimeter. He looked away just as a flash tugged at the corner of his eyes, but the smoking-armed man was much too dangerous to leave unwatched.

When Agent Quantum came again, he was moving differently. Not nearly as smooth or polished, he’d broken out of his usual form and was shifting more to a brawling style. Unrefined, true, but also less predictable. The first punch still missed, but the second managed to land. A solid uppercut that caught their enemy on the chin, resulting in a snap that brought warmth to Tachyonic’s heart... until he saw Agent Quantum grip his own fist in pain.

Before Agent Quantum could retreat, his opponent’s right hand snapped out, grabbing him by the shoulder and squeezing so hard it drove the big cape to his knees. “I’m afraid hitting me is only the first hurdle. You’d also have to be strong enough to inflict damage. Seems we’ve reached your limits already. How disappointing, and after your dear friend gave such an impassioned speech about how you’d stop me for certain.”

Agent Quantum tried to struggle, but it was no use. He was simply far weaker than his enemy. This was the difference in strength that existed in the meta-world.

Tachyonic pulled toward the end of the bed where that umbrella woman was huddled up, her odd yet effective shield fully extended, just in case. Nearly to the edge, Tachyonic had to jerk his head back as a fully masked face appeared in front of him.

Hunkering low, his small stature at last a boon, Presto put a finger to where his lips would be, pointing up through the hole as he slipped an arm around both of them. Tachyonic began to object, until Presto quickly whispered, “We have to get you both out so there’s room to fight. Why do you think the other heavies are waiting?”

Knowing it was the right tactic, Tachyonic bit his tongue. They weren’t running. They were getting out of the way... no matter how much it felt like abandoning a friend.

“Look, Agent Quantum. Your friends are so quick to leave you, perhaps there’s more in common with you and the original than I suspected.”

It was a good thing Presto looked up out of the hole and teleported at that moment, as Tachyonic might have tried to claw his way over. They popped out barely past the perimeter of the hole; at the angles Presto was working with, this was the best line-of-sight he could manage. All three collapsed in a heap, but Tachyonic was on his back, scoping things out before the others.

Throughout the hall there were a few newly downed crooks, as well as the entirety of their AHC forces, minus Agent Quantum below. Medley was already halfway through the hole, Bahamut right behind. Flanking either side of the floor’s entrance were Hephaestus and Plasmodia, both with arms up and energy at the ready. Further down one hallway, Tachyonic spotted Cold Shoulder forming an ice wall, cutting off potential avenues of attack, just like she’d done when they were controlling the flow of crooks getting in. Above him, Hat Trick and Cyber Geek were both looking down, the former wearing her concern plain on every part of her face not covered by a mask.

“Can you do anything?” She wasn’t talking to him, instead to Cyber Geek, who was making motions in the air like there was something only he could see.

“Got an idea, just haven’t had much chance to test it.” Cyber Geek produced a sci-fi-looking implement in a shower of blue sparks and numbers. “No outright healing items I’ve tried have worked on anyone because they were consumables, but status effects are another matter, like with my freeze ray. This is the Rally Rod from Galactic Conquest 9, an item that temporarily numbs pain and boosts the energy of every troop you use it on. It won’t fully heal you, but it might get you back in the fight for a little while.”

“Do it.” Tachyonic had to force himself to slow down enough to make the words comprehensible to these two.

A flicker of hesitation from Cyber Geek. “Thing is, I haven’t tried it yet, and in-game, it’s not described a pleasant experience—”

“My best friend is down there getting stomped because I got my stupid ass captured. Use the goddamn staff, now!” Medley and Bahamut were already through, yet Tachyonic knew it wouldn’t be enough. That guy was just too strong. Even getting momentarily healed, he had no idea what difference his speed could even make in the fight.

None of which mattered. There was no way in hell he was letting Austin face a match like that without his backup. He held on to that thought as Cyber Geek's staff made contact and the incredible waves of pain began to flow from his ankle. It was all that kept him from passing out immediately.

Medley was only a few steps in front of Bahamut, yet he sprang with such ferocity upon landing that he reached the target substantially ahead of her. The strange man was unbothered by their appearance—given the wide smile on his smoking face, he might have even been happy to see them. Medley's first round of blows were taken without flinching, before his opponent delivered a single backhand that sent the sizable cape sailing into, and through, one of the apartment walls. He crashed in the kitchen, creating a cacophony of pots and pans.

Slowing her own charge, Bahamut reconsidered the plan. That kind of strength was no joke, especially considering Medley's general heft. Between that trick and the fact that their target was still holding Agent Quantum prone, it was evident they'd yet to push this stranger anywhere close to his limits. That didn't mean all was lost; they did have a rudimentary plan in place, but brute force wouldn't be enough.

"The guild's new dragon is here, too, I see. You may want to scamper home, little lizard. I'm no more afraid of your organization than I am of theirs. Riding the reputations of your betters will do you no good in the real world."

It was an obvious attempt to get under her skin, but it presumed she'd put far more sense of self into her villainy and strength than Beverly had even approached. That those were the targets he went for first was informative, however. People often attacked what they considered to be their own weak spots on others, because that was what they thought of as being most vulnerable.

"You've got some nerve to talk about riding reputations. How many pawns did you need just to make it this far and get Agent Quantum in your clutches? All that effort to take on what you call a sickly imitation of the real team. Guess that makes you an imitation of the original Science Sentries' actual villains. No wonder you had to settle for going after the kiddie version when you couldn't cut it against the real deal."

Facially, there was little change. Dermatologically, it was a terrifying show as the skin along his neck and face rapidly eroded, revealing gaunt, dark features. The more of him that was exposed, the surer Bahamut became that there was nothing other than bones waiting to greet them. It made the smile even more horrifying as a corner of the mouth fell away completely.

To her surprise, his next move was not to bolt over to her. Instead, he released Agent Quantum, who darted away and back to his feet in seconds. "How silly of me. I was caught up in the action, eyes on my prize, and nearly forgot to relish the experience. In front of a guild representative, no less. You're quite right. This demands far more cruelty and torment. I shall play with you all for a bit longer, with one caveat. Agent Quantum, if you run, I'm going to kill everyone here, then start lopping off the heads of civilians, one per hour, until we finish this."

Whoever this guy was, nothing gave the impression he was bluffing. Bahamut's eyes flickered to Agent Quantum, noting the way his arm wasn't hanging quite right. The grip on his shoulder had left damage, and that wasn't even with the smoking arm. A single blow from this guy could take them out of the fight, or cave their very skulls in, depending on how much he put into it. They were outside their league right now, and all of them could feel it. But life wasn't merely an equation with numbers plugged in. There was strategy and tactics to consider. Plus, they had the advantage of greater forces, and that opened up more options than working alone.

Rustling from the other room was all the warning they got before Medley came bursting out of the kitchen rubble, bounding on all fours as he came at the enemy. Bahamut charged, too, ready this time to make it a multi-pronged assault. Since she and Medley had no experience working together or fighting alongside one another, they'd elected for a simple division of combat labor.

As Medley went low, aiming for the legs, Bahamut went high, sending precise blows toward the torso. There was an uncomfortable crumpling as Medley hit the legs, his body collapsing in on itself from the resistance. Still, with claws dug in for grip, he managed to force the back of their enemy's knee slightly forward, shifting his center of balance. Seeing the opening, Bahamut let loose a real punch, not holding back one bit. If she blasted the walls with his brains, then that was a good turn so far as she was concerned. Not one worth worrying about, however, as the strike sent pain tearing through her arm. It was like she'd hit a steel beam, except she suspected that would have hurt less.

For as strong as he was, the enemy did still use two legs to stand on. That meant shifting his balance in one direction while pushing hard in another was enough to leave him unsteady. On their own, that probably would have been the limit of their offensive, but there was still one more ally to account for. Agent Quantum came barreling in, showing no fear despite his recent failings, following up Bahamut's blow with one of his own.

The trio of attacks was enough to do what on their own none could have managed: they knocked the stranger onto his back. Unfortunately, the plan had to adapt. Originally, this was when they would have helped Agent Quantum escape, getting everyone out and to safety. After that ultimatum, she had a hunch he wouldn't go that easily. There was one idea from the old plan that could be repurposed, however: the way they'd planned to hold this guy off if he tried to follow.

Reaching down, Bahamut grabbed the man by his ankles, planning to easily chunk him through the air. Instead, she felt as if she were lifting a boulder. He was dense in a way that wasn't quite weight, yet still made him hard to move. Putting everything she could manage into it, Bahamut used her whole body to force the throw, weakly slamming him into the wall at the far end of the room.

Upon landing, he rose to his feet, brushing some of the dust from what remained of his shirt. The left section had largely burned away, revealing that the smoking bits of flesh were now well past the left shoulder and into the torso. "If you're about done, I think I've given you ample chance for your turn at offense."

"That's wasn't my offense," Bahamut corrected. "That was just optimal repositioning."

He had almost enough time to realize the throw had placed him almost directly under the hole in the ceiling. Had he made it in time, that revelation might not have mattered much, given that the toughest fighters from every team were already down with him. But he didn't share in Bahamut's knowledge, namely that they had a pair of long-range damage dealers who were positioned right overhead, ready to fire if their opponent had tried to pursue.

She didn't even have to call out the order. Both of the women watching had pieced it together; they'd heard the same threat to Agent Quantum as Bahamut. From above, multiple streams of concentrated energy rained down. Hephaestus's beams were familiar by this point, and also visibly outclassed by the ridiculous torrent of energy flowing from Plasmodia. Clearly, she didn't appreciate her team leader being threatened.

The combined assault was too much for Bahamut to look at; the guy's body was essentially glowing. At last, the lights faded, and Bahamut was able to blink her way back to vision. In a way, she wished she hadn't, because the first thing she saw was that their opponent was still standing. Only, he didn't look much like the one they'd started the battle with.

Almost all the skin was gone, save for a few patches here and there, one hanging on just above his right eye, if it could be called that. An inky, dark orb easily mistaken for a void filled the socket, resting in a face with no nose, ears, or other decoration. Only a dark sinew ran between the black limbs, not like any form of muscle Bahamut had encountered before. Smoke rose from his entire body now, and she noticed the ground where he stood was warping and cracking.

There was no more smile—Bahamut realized there had never been one to start. Only a skull's haunting, unmoving grin with a thin veneer of false flesh stretched atop. She really hoped the craftier members of their groups had something in mind. Her well of ideas ran dry just as he took a step forward.

“As I was saying, I think you've had a fair shot at offense, and should now realize just how impossible the fight is. However, I'm not done playing yet, so let's make this a bit more fun. Something classic seems in order. Should you manage to guess my name, I'll grant your wish and let everyone go. Even Agent Quantum.”

The words might have been heartening, if not for the malicious glee absolutely dripping from each word. No one was even surprised when he continued. “Just be warned, I take a toll of flesh for every attempt. Try as many times as you like, for as long as you can bear it.”

---

Chapter 116

---

Nothing. Not a scratch, not a dent, not a crack. Even Ivan had shown a small mark on his hand, and that was from a much earlier model of this blaster. Granted, he wasn't exactly in full combat mode at the time, but this guy hadn't employed any tricks that Hephaestus could discern either. It sure seemed like he'd just taken the entire blast of energy, near point-blank, without flinching. Given the intensity in her attack and the shock on her face, Hephaestus had a hunch Plasmodia was experiencing similar feelings.

Noises came from down the hall, where Cyber Geek and Cold Shoulder were taking care of another batch of straggling enemies. Hat Trick and Presto were still nearby; their powers tended to be more situational, so they'd been stuck guarding the unexpected trespasser. While it was impossible to read Presto's face through the mask, Hat Trick's expression made it clear she felt as flummoxed as they did. Not far away, Cliché was on her phone, scrolling like the wind, though what she was looking at, Hephaestus had no clue. By virtue of distraction, Cliché was one of two who missed the terrifying display of durability. The other was Tachyonic, who was slowly coming around, but was still visibly out of it from Cyber Geek's staff.

"We didn't even annoy him. He's ignoring us." Plasmodia looked down at her hands, still glowing with what should be deadly power.

It was an experience Hephaestus had known was coming, yet the arrival was no more pleasant to endure: she was against someone above her abilities. Dealing with people like Ivan and the council, it was impossible to delude herself into believing her current meta-suit and some fire powers would be enough to overcome every challenge. Some metas existed on an entirely different scale than she did, for now. The man below was obviously one such example.

As panic swept through the others, she forced herself to stay calm. Terrifying as the moment was, all was not yet lost. Because the truth was, her original gift wasn't beam-shooting gauntlets, or a homemade combat suit, or fire powers, or even meta-genius. From the very beginning, her one true talent was the capacity to look at a situation and keep thinking until she found a way through: intelligence born of willfully stubborn determination. This smoking bone-man had bested the suit. That wasn't the same as beating her.

What did she have to work with? One cape with the powers of a stage magician, one with line-of-sight teleportation, a living plasma battery, topped off by commanders of ice and video games, respectively. She also had Cliché, who might be handy if they could hit upon the right saying. For most of those present, Hephaestus knew too little about their abilities and training to make proper use of them, but as she looked from her own hands to Plasmodia, an idea took shape. The same idea, in a way, only reformed and hopefully improved.

Below them, Bahamut tried to knock the legs out from under the enemy with a sweep, only to have her own leg kicked back so hard there was no question the bone would be fractured. Fast as she healed in that form, it would still hurt like hell. And that was nothing compared to what might happen if this guy really let loose. He was toying with them, openly so, and once the fun dried up, what came next wouldn't be pretty. Agent Quantum and Medley ran in to help, but Hephaestus already knew how it would end. They were fighting a losing battle, unless she could change the equation.

"Anyone have guesses on the name?" Hat Trick asked. "I don't think he'd really let us go, but it might give them some space, or create an opportunity."

"No, which is troubling." Presto sounded unlike himself. This might have been the first time Hephaestus heard him take a fight seriously. "I've studied the Science Sentries more than anyone but the most devoted superhero expert, and this guy is ringing zero bells. Even though he acts like he's been around forever."

While this wasn't the time to say it, Hephaestus was having similar thoughts. Someone with this much power should have left an impression throughout history; the fact that he was such an unknown meant that either he'd been working in secret all this time, or another power had wiped out any traces of him. Neither boded well for what they were facing.

"Doesn't matter. When we guess it, he'll just find another excuse. Nobody having this much fun is just going to let the game end, especially after a plan this complicated to get here. If we want this asshole gone, the only way is to drive him out." Hephaestus pointed to Plasmodia, who was slowly coming back to herself. "I need your help."

"For what? Soldering? I just hit him with the strongest blast I've got. I could go bigger, but if that intensity didn't work, then... there's nothing I can do." Plasmodia was also hitting the wall of her own limitations, and wasn't nearly as prepared for it as Hephaestus had been.

Ordinarily, she'd have let the cape get over it in her own time, except Hephaestus needed Plasmodia if her idea had even a chance of working. "Why? Because your power doesn't work? You fucking capes. It's always about the abilities. Who gives a shit if he's got us beat on that angle? We've got limbs, lungs, and most of all, brains. He's stronger than us, fine. Let's make ourselves stronger than him. Meta or not, we're all humans at our base level, and there is nothing more human than using tools and wit to overcome a challenge outside our own abilities."

She noticed Presto start to do a mock-clap, then halt himself. Perhaps because he agreed with the sentiment or just appreciated the impact it was having. Plasmodia no longer looked so unsure; instead, her face was creasing in anger. It might have been more ideal if that rage was pointed down into the hole, but Hephaestus would take the progress she could get.

"How the hell are we supposed to do that? I watched your attack do just as much nothing as mine, so it's not like you've got an ace up your sleeve."

"Funny you should mention sleeves." Hoping this wouldn't be a time when she looked back with deep regret, Hephaestus released the interlocking systems on her left gauntlet, reaching over to pull it free from the suit with her right. The removal of a suit piece revealed her hand and forearm, covered entirely by the costume she'd donned before her suit. Staying concealed was still ideal, as it would keep anyone from realizing Hephaestus was a woman, which made keeping her identity secret so much easier.

Lifting up the device, Hephaestus nodded to it. "If I work fast, I can retool my own blaster. Get rid of everything except for the amplification systems, put all of it into making the strongest shot possible. The more powerful a beam we start with, the greater the final output.”

“Who knows if that will even work? Or how long it will take?”

Plasmodia couldn't keep her eyes out of the hole, where they could see Agent Quantum take a particularly bad blow that sent him spinning. “If I went down there now, I couldn't do anything, could I? I'd just be another target.”

“Let him take a crack at it,” Presto said. “Not like he's trying to mess with any of our gear, and as you said, at this point, what do we risk? Even reaching out to try to teleport that guy felt like lifting a mountain. I'd probably explode my heart getting him across the street. It's all I can do to minimize damage.”

Paying closer attention, Hephaestus realized that Presto was indeed doing more than throwing cursory looks at the trespasser in their care. When one of the downstairs combatants got knocked toward anything too dangerous or sharp, he would shift them over slightly, conserving energy while keeping the wounds they took as limited as he could.

“Anything.” This voice didn't come from any that had been speaking. It belonged to Tachyonic, who had finally managed to bring himself back to consciousness. “Try anything. Doesn't have to be a good plan. Doesn't have to be a smart one. If it might work, that's enough.” Sweating from the effort of sudden injury and temporary recovery, Tachyonic struggled to his feet, using the wall to lean on and discovering his ankle would tolerate the weight of a leg once more, albeit barely.

“I am not letting that bastard win. We save our friends, which means stopping this threat. Find a way, if you can. It's the most any of us can do.” With barely a glance down to aim for the bed, Tachyonic leapt through the hole in the ground, reentering the fray as soon as he was able. There were bursts of speed as he scrambled off the bed, but he was definitely not back to full strength.

Shuffling through her sleeves and vest, Hat Trick sorted an array of magical items, plainly searching for anything that might be of aid. Her hands fell upon the wand, terror flickering in her gaze. “I've never used actual attack magic before. It would be a risk, but he might be vulnerable.”

“Knowing the way your new tricks tend to go before you master them, that might not be the best use of us,” Presto suggested. “I know how you're feeling. Getting stuck on the sidelines is the worst. Welcome to being a support member: you have to watch the people you care about take the risks you aren't able to."

Those words, more than anything else, seemed to convince Plasmodia as she listened to them talk. "Hell with it. Sure, let's try your plan. If it fails, we're in exactly the same situation as right now. Just hurry. I think our enemy is getting bored."

"I'll work fast, but it's still going to take a minute." More than a minute, really. While she'd loaded up the suit with tools for repair and modifications in the field, these were still less ideal conditions than a lab. Add in that she'd essentially be working one-handed, with her other in the gauntlet, and things would be even slower. That was what she expected, anyway.

The second set of hands were familiar, largely because Tori recognized the high-end leather gloves around them. After all, she'd been there when Beverly loaned Chloe the accessories to complete her ensemble. Cliché was smiling nervously at Hephaestus, phone finally put away. "Don't worry. I think I found a way to help." Looking down again, she blinked, then pulled off the device hiding her eyes, setting them to the side. "Probably easier without the ultra-telescope goggles, though."

"Much as I appreciate the sentiment, this is specialized equipment that demands expertise-level knowledge and skill to work with." It was as close as she could get in a public setting to calling out Cliché's total lack of understanding when it came to meta-suits.

Lowering her voice, Cliché leaned in, speaking directly to Hephaestus. "Look, my friends are down there, giving everything they can to keep us safe. It's time for me to stop being so afraid of my power and see if it can do something of value, like helping stop that jerk. From behind the scenes, though, ideally."

"Lovely as the sentiment is, that doesn't change the fact that you have no idea how to work on this equipment." Hephaestus was half-scared, half-curious on where this was leading. Knowing the ability Cliché possessed, it could truly be anything.

"Not at the moment, sure, but you're forgetting one important fact: Anything you can do, I can do better."

It was the first time Hephaestus had seen an immediate physical shift accompany Cliché's empowered words—even the aesthetic change had been slightly delayed. This time, it was a bizarre experience as Hephaestus watched a familiar pair of eyes suddenly look back at her from Chloe's sockets. She knew them in an instant, and had there not been a helmet between them, the same eyes would have been staring right back at Chloe. They were, after all, the eyes of Tori Rivas.

For a moment, the stolen irises stared back, until they began to dissolve like shimmering flames, drawing into Cliché's pupil, revealing her own eyes once more. Suddenly, she grabbed the sides of her head, wincing in visible pain as her whole body began to shake.

"Gaaaah, okay, okay, I think I'm—crrraaaaap." She swayed, and for a moment, Hephaestus feared her friend would collapse entirely. "Hang on. Little longer. I think... nearly there." At last, her eyes opened, tears streaming down her face. "Wow. That was like an ice-cream headache multiplied by a root canal. So much getting crammed in at once. I think this one might be tougher depending on how much power I'm copying." Shaking off the last of her brain pain, Cliché's gaze fell upon the removed gauntlet. "Oh, hey, looks like you misaligned one of the connectors. That's going to make this feel sluggish when you need full dexterity."

It took a tremendous amount of self-control not to bristle at that, remembering that her saying had purposefully called out being better than the subject from whom the talents were taken. Part of her wondered how that would have worked if she'd targeted the smoking bone-man instead. Given the painful reaction for just Hephaestus, it was probably best she hadn't tested the power on someone that powerful. Even if it worked, publicly using such an ability would mean Cliché would definitely no longer be under anyone's radar—not if she had a power that allowed her suddenly jump entire leagues in terms of danger.

"Glad to know, but let's focus on getting this thing capable of handling Plasmodia's output. Efficiency is more of a refining concern than an immediate worry."

From below, there tore a scream. This wasn't like the muffled thuds of bodies and blows being thrown. Someone had just been hurt, and based on the voice, that person was Agent Quantum. Presto, Hat Trick, and even their pseudo-prisoner were all staring with rapt attention through the hole. Plasmodia, however, was striding over to join them.

"What happened?" Cliché asked.

"He forced them to make a guess, and it went poorly." Plasmodia sat down, crossing her legs like she was settling in for a session of yoga. "You two keep working. I'm going to work on building up my energy. If we're betting it all on one shot, then I'm going to put every last bit of intensity I have into the attack." The crackling glow of power radiated up from her hands, stretching across her entire body inch by inch.

The message was clear: if they wanted to save everyone, time was running out. Once the smoking stranger was no longer amused by playing with his toys, he'd begin breaking them. On a small, muted video still playing in a corner of her helmet screen, Fornax was giving a live demonstration of exactly what happened when a real monster grew bored. Unless they wanted one of their own to end up like Zerle Salvryn, they had to change the situation.

Activating the soldering torch in the finger of her right gauntlet, Hephaestus cracked into her creation and got to work.

---

Chapter 117

---

The scream had belonged to Agent Quantum. As he went in next to Medley, the two of them attempting to knock their enemy off-balance, the opponent suddenly shifted in ferocity. One hand shot out, slamming into Medley's torso and sending him through a wall, shattering a bathtub. Agent Quantum wasn't so lucky as he found his own blow caught, the arm being squeezed so hard it drove him to his knees in moments.

"That's enough pondering. Time for you to make a guess. Any takers, or should I move right on to the penalty for failure?" As their opponent raised his smoking, gaunt hand, no one knew exactly what the punishment would be, but they could all make educated guesses that it would hurt.

Agent Quantum twisted his head, meeting what technically qualified as the man's eyes. "How about Mr. Bones?" Although the name was patently ridiculous, Agent Quantum had heard stranger. Besides, he didn't expect to be right. If the name were really guessable, the offer never would have been put forth.

"Thematic, yet incorrect." The man's eyes darted over to where Bahamut was slowly shaking off the last round of attacks, and to the shifting debris of a bathroom covering Medley. "Now we move on to the fun part of the game. Tell me, Agent Quantum, who shall be punished for this failure? It can be you, another cape, or even one of these villains you've formed a shaky alliance with."

"Your problem is with me. Leave them out of it."

Not quite a laugh, not quite a cackle, the hideous amusement that brimmed from that lipless mouth was almost as terrifying as the threats.

“Exactly the answer I would expect from a superhero of your caliber. But the first one is easy. Let’s see how noble you remain after understanding what you’re in for.”

His movement was sudden, smoking right hand extended so the bony fingertips were pointed forward, then thrust into the meat of Agent Quantum’s left shoulder. The scream was immediate, like it had been pushed out by force of the blow. It wasn’t merely pain, though; everyone in the room had taken enough injuries to understand what that looked like. Agent Quantum was leaned over, barely hanging on as his whole body twitched and seized. Finally, the man yanked his hand free, leaving Agent Quantum collapsed on the ground. He didn’t stay there long, stirring soon, but the point was made.

“As your friend warned you, I am your weakness. That doesn’t just mean my ability lessens yours, ironically enough, but also that it hurts tremendously in the process. Now then, once you’re able to speak, let’s hear your next guess. I hope it’s better—”

The speech trailed off as the form of Tachyonic suddenly dove through the hole in the ceiling, landing roughly on the bed then scrambling off of it. Standing at a visible lean, there was no pretending he was able to fight at full strength, but he was standing. Given the state of his leg minutes before, that in itself was impressive enough.

“Perfect. It’s so much more enjoyable when someone personally invested has to watch. A coworker and a temporary ally aren’t the same as being taken apart in front of someone who believes in you.” The man’s eyes lingered on Agent Quantum, despite him making no forward movements. Now that the game was in full swing, he was enjoying himself far too much to rush it. The Wrexwren weren’t even dealt with yet, and once they were, the chaos would last for hours. Plenty of time to savor his triumph.

At last, Bahamut was back up, visibly groggy yet upright nonetheless. From the bathroom, Medley’s tail broke through, sweeping off shards of porcelain as he rose. Agent Quantum had made it to a turned-over chair and was using that to haul himself up. Just like when Tachyonic has been stabbed by those digits, Agent Quantum was visibly weakened, more than what just pain could manage.

Wobbling forward, not fully trusting his own leg yet, Tachyonic held up his hands and made a “come get some” motion. “Hey asshole, how about Round Two? Only this time, no sucker punch.”

“Do you know why it is prudent to take out the team’s speeder first? It isn’t because they’re dangerous—few ever manage to do significant damage against real threats. Your kind are simply annoying, dashing about in the middle of a fight. And you especially have a talent for failure. Being my hostage was perhaps the closest you’ve come to doing something right.”

The man turned away, facing Agent Quantum once more. “You are beneath me, Tachyonic, as are the rest of this silly ensemble. But you aren’t even entertaining enough to break. Stay patient. You’ll die when I get around to it.”

The wet smack was not the blow the smoking man, or anyone else, was expecting. Tachyonic became a momentary blur as he ran to the kitchen’s garbage can, yanked out a semi-full bag, and slapped it over his opponent’s head. No one was entirely sure what the owner of this kitchen had made the night prior, only that it was very sauce-heavy. Unidentifiable green and red liquids dripped down the lengths of the near-skeleton, whose smoke suddenly increased in amount and darkness.

“You dare—”

“You’re goddamn right I dare!” Tachyonic was right there, in his face, so aggressive it seemed to knock their opponent momentarily off-balance. “Where do you get off, strutting around like the big shit in town? Do you know why your little game works? Because none of us know who the fuck you are! All these big claims about fighting the original Science Sentries—except we’ve gone through all of their old cases and fights as part of our training. If you really were around, then you left so little impression it didn’t even warrant mentioning.”

In a flash of movement, Tachyonic dashed back several feet, wincing at the end as his leg nearly gave out. Ignoring the pain, he repeated his previous hand-motion, once more inviting their opponent to trade blows. “You’re a nobody. Nothing but forgotten trash. You don’t deserve to face Agent Quantum yet. Team leaders are reserved for actual threats, the kinds with real reputations, not sad fantasies they’ve concocted.”

In terms of subtlety, there was a lot of room for improvement. Tachyonic might as well have been waving a red flag and wearing a matador’s outfit. That was the upside to blunt attacks, though: they didn’t have to be refined to be effective.

Plumes of dark smoke rose from the man, searing off all the garbage on his person into a sizzling residue that clung to the floor where it landed. He stared at Tachyonic, all others momentarily forgotten.

“Such a dear, devoted friend you are, taking my wrath all for yourself. Very well, Tachyonic, I’ll grant your wish. My statement holds true: you aren’t worth the entertainment. Yet I think it will be rather enjoyable to watch Agent Quantum’s face as I tear his most devoted supporter limb from limb.”

In spite of being less an arm and down a leg, Zerle Salvrin refused to buckle. His assaults continued, their techniques changing on the fly. The Zerle even scored a few hits with unexpected movements, making use of the now missing appendage’s space. Fornax let him come, parrying here, knocking back there, but otherwise keeping him at bay and suffering. There was a next step to this process; however, it couldn’t be initiated by Fornax. Moving forward had to begin with Lodestar or Zerle Salvrin himself.

As it turned out, the latter arrived first. After taking a rough punch to where his hips would be on a human, the Wrexwren leader did not immediately attempt to spring back up. Instead, he sat, leaning his head and back against the cool metal of the chamber’s walls.

“My pride as a fighter can deny it no longer. You are indeed stronger than I, Fornax.” Zerle Salvrin made a motion with his hand, though what it was or what it meant, Fornax could only speculate. Perhaps a gesture of respect?

“Is this your way of calling it quits? I must say, I didn’t see that coming from you.” He paused, rune-filled eyes sweeping across the alien enemy. “Still don’t, actually.”

“Nor should you. I will never admit defeat, nor permit you to take victory.” Zerle Salvrin made the noise Fornax felt reasonably sure was laughter, albeit low and subdued. “My people saw the command given. As we speak, they are already training their weapons on this ship. We will be annihilated together, along with the entirety of the crew, but you will not triumph today.” Having taken a breather, the Wrexwren got up, keeping weight off his broken leg. “I hope now you understand the Wrexwren people’s commitment to victory. Not even our own leaders are of greater importance.”

The whistle was sharp and high, nearly a Wrexwren voice, except it came from Fornax's puckered lips. "Hell of a move. Rather die than lose. Believe it or not, I get that. Even respect it, in the right circumstances. Of course, I could always kill you before the attack hits."

"Which is why I took my time explaining. It's already too late. The blast will arrive at any moment." Zerle Salvrin raised his remaining arms, determined to hold out until mutual destruction took them both.

Fornax made no move to follow up on his threat, turning his attention to the floating cameras instead.

"Well then, it seems our only recourse is to patiently wait for the end to come. In these, my final moments of life, I would like to leave all of you viewers with a simple bit of advice: never start a war with the most dangerous species in the galaxy."

With that, Fornax turned, facing Zerle Salvrin as they waited for the ship to explode. After ten seconds, Zerle Salvrin began to get worried. After a full minute, true terror set in. Finally, he broke, the question bursting forth as he watched the absolute lack of concern remain in Fornax's grin. "What have you done?"

"Me? I've been in here with you, having a grand old time. But I'm not the only villain out there with stress to relieve. In fact, while we were playing around, my old friend Doctor Mechaniacal was working on his own project. Doc, you want to take it away?"

From all around them, broadcast over the Wrexwren's own communications system, the answer came. "Gladly. After some basic analysis, I discovered quite a number of weaknesses in the design and programming used in your ships. Redundancy is all well and good; however, the trouble with using identical components over and over is that they all have the same vulnerabilities. For example, did you know it was possible to create an overload sequence in the engines, leading to catastrophic detonation? Ten seconds, and any Wrexwren ship is nothing more than debris in the void."

"An entire ship... you wouldn't. There is no honor in such a tactic."

Fornax laughed at that, loud and cruel. "You don't get to say shit about honor. Tricking Earth's champion, launching the invasion before our duel, even trying to cheat at the last minute when losing became inevitable. You have held to whatever code the Wrexwren have in only the most technical sense. I will say this much, though: you're right. We wouldn't do that."

The smile widened as new images flashed into existence all around; Doctor Mechaniacal was really getting the hang of the Wrexwren systems. The entire invasion fleet still in space, from the largest warship to the tiniest landing vessel, were being detonated before Zerle Salvrin's eyes, the scenes played over and over on a constant, repeating loop.

"We wouldn't, because we already did." Fornax spread his arms, gesturing to the cornucopia of destruction surrounding them. "What sort of creature would do a thing like that? Kill an entire army when peace is still on the table? What sort of species would even conceive of such a notion, wiping out their enemy without prudence or partiality? It's the same one that fell upon your people the moment they landed. A species born in war and conflict, with millennia to hone both their skill and the darkest parts of their souls. You would shrivel in disgust to know what we have done to each other, for crimes no greater than a hue of skin or a place of birth. What did you think would be waiting for monstrous invaders such as yourselves?"

He faced the floating cameras once more, and for the first time, Zerle Salvrin began to understand that this wasn't really about him at all. Whoever was on the other side of those orbs, that was the target Fornax was trying to reach. Ordinarily, he'd have considered that useful information for controlling the tide of the fight. As it was, Zerle Salvrin was momentarily lost in the horror of seeing his entire force purged so completely. Much as he wanted to think it all a trick, the fact that they were still here meant the other ships had failed to fire. Zerle Salvrin's life was proof of his people's death.

"My advice earlier was genuine," Fornax continued, speaking directly into the cameras. "It is indeed prudent not to start a war with the galaxy's most dangerous species. Only, the Wrexwren are not the holders of that title. They are a simple, brute force: effective at their own tasks, yet inherently limited by their own rules. No, the true danger would be creatures capable of planning, deception, and untold death, all without a moment's pause. An imagination that can conceive of terrible ideas, the sort no decent species would ever consider, let alone put into use. Beings who can justify any atrocity, so long as they come out on top."

Pointing back over his shoulder, Fornax drew attention to the array of exploding images all around him and Zerle Salvrin. "Meet humanity: the most twisted, murderous, foul species in the entire cosmos. We are the ones you should have avoided conflict with. Now, you get to be a warning for the rest of the galaxy, a tale to tell over whatever the alien versions of campfires are. The once mighty Wrexwren, destroyed by one simple, poor decision: they decided to fuck with Earth.”

Finally managing to gather some of his thoughts, Zerle Salvryn glared back defiantly. “Do not think one kolitre is the entirety of the Wrexwren force. There will be more to follow, to avenge our failing.”

“My dear Zerle, don’t be so impatient. We’ll get to that, when the time is right. A being like you, possessing such willpower and strength, must be broken properly.” Fornax started forward, a fresh look of excitement in his rune-filled eyes. “Have no fear, you are in the hands of a professional. I will make sure to see the job done right.”

---

Chapter 118

---

This world was a hellscape. Humans were not the docile, simple creatures that had been painted for the Wrexwren forces. They fought like prexles, a notoriously ferocious pest on the Wrexwren home world, famous for its willingness to lash out when dying rather than flee. Prexles would prefer to wound their enemy in death than to survive, and somehow, it felt like humanity had stolen that philosophy from across the stars.

Even the ones that lacked abilities were armed, opening fire on the trio of Wrexwren as they ran through the streets, fleeing their pursuers. The ship was lost, blown up minutes after landing. The team's only hope was to find somewhere to hunker down and call for rescue. Not that they felt great about the odds, given how many similar cries for help were pinging their own systems. With every passing step, the effort of running became more and more futile.

Just when a few of the Wrexwren were pondering the prexle route themselves, something strange happened. The team was advancing on a dilapidated old building with dozens of vehicles in front of it, and as they drew closer, their pursuers started to fall away. Together, the aliens ran faster, and saw the trend continued. No explanation to be had; perhaps this ground was somehow cursed or sacred to the native species. After a day full of the worst sorts of surprises, none of the three was willing to argue with a turn of good fortune. Together, they raced up to the front and burst through the door.

For a moment, the first Wrexwren thought it was some sort of human design choice. Red splashes all over the floors and walls, bits and chunks spread around to create a messy ambience. It was a forgivable initial mistake; they were hardly familiar with much human anatomy. Upon spotting an arm, however, the Wrexwren reassessed the situation, along with estimating roughly how many humans would be required to create this much debris.

“What happened?” The whisper came from one of the others, communicated in the softest of their whistles as possible.

“Somebody didn’t live up to the hype.” This response came from deeper in the building, and while they had translation software equipped, it was unneeded. Whoever the mysterious being was, they’d replied in the native Wrexwren tongue. Footsteps rang out from further in the building, unseen in the thin strips of light streaming through from outer streetlamps. Darkness was in swing on this section of the planet, though all of the aliens suddenly wished they had a bit of sunshine on their side.

Raising their weapons, too aware that this might be a chance where they only got a single shot, the Wrexwren at the front called out. “Who goes there?”

“This was a meta-mercenary base. True war might be banned, but countries still have conflict, and this team was often hired to fill a given side’s ranks. They were quite renowned, especially their leader: a man wielding a magical sword, said to be one of the most skilled fighters on the planet.”

From the shadows an object came, tossed much too short to come within striking distance of the team, yet they all tensed just the same. It landed with a clatter—or rather, they landed. It turned out to be two objects which had once been whole. A golden sword, sparks of fading power crackling along the edges, sliced cleanly in two.

“I waited so patiently for a chance to strike in secret, a time when the blame could be put elsewhere, like an invading force. Such pains making sure not to lose Captain Bullshit’s veil, only for this absolute disappointment to be my reward. Not a good day. Not a good day at all.”

A spray of sparks came from the darkness, metal being run along concrete. For the first time, the aliens saw who they’d been speaking with. He appeared human, save for the twisted expression on his face. Mundane clothes, no visible armor, equipped with a single weapon: another sword, this one with a slight curve to the blade. The Wrexwren weren’t especially familiar with the names of Earth's out-of-date weaponry, but there was enough context to expect it would be dangerous.

"I know you won't be any better. I do. But after waiting this long for such a worthless taste, I can't be satisfied with just this." The sparks ended, and suddenly, the man was in front of the first Wrexwren. His blade moved a single time, and the would-be invader felt his upper body sliding, leaving the lower portion behind. There was just enough mental function to hear his next words in the alien's final moments.

"After so long trapped in its sheath, my sword thirsts."

Grantham was mildly surprised by the small army waiting outside the bar. They were not made of Wrexwren—in fact, everyone present was either human or meta. Sipping his beer, he bristled at the chill hitting his lips. Damnit, he'd held the glass for too long.

"Diego, what's the deal with the battalion?"

His bartender, a svelte man with dangerous tattoos running up and down both arms, jumped slightly at being directly addressed. Thus far, he'd been one of the only people Grantham had bothered to learn the name of and occasionally talk to, largely because Diego also spoke English. Neither Diego nor the others were sure if that made him safer, or more in peril. All they knew for certain was that this was not a child to cross.

"They are from a neighboring compound and seek to lay claim on our holdings, attacking during the confusion. Word has probably spread about the prior owners being slaughtered."

"Yet nobody thinks to wonder if the thing that did the slaughtering is still around." Spinning on his stool, for a brief moment, it was possible to forget the absolute power this kid had used to rule them with since arriving; he looked like any other normal child. The effect ended as soon as he stopped, and Diego could see the icy-blue shining in his eyes. "What the hell—I could use a workout, and I doubt this will count as making a scene."

As his feet touched the ground, his skin changed, turning the blue of one lost and frozen in the deepest tundra. Muscle bulged in his limbs as his height shot up, reaching and passing that of an adult's stature in no time. A bushy beard of frost sprouted on his no longer childish face. He was out of the bar before fully transforming, largely because the door couldn't accommodate his modified bulk.

From outside, the deeper, older voice thundered. "Look at this pathetic lot! Such a pitiful offering. Your bodies will serve as warning to those who come next. Only the strong can face Jokull!"

Groggily, the lone surviving Wrexwren struggled back to consciousness. He'd been with a team of four. One had been killed on landing, forcing them to flee. The forest had seemed like a good place for cover, until they reached a patch where the ground gave way. Between the fall and the blunted stone triangles at the bottom, the others died on impact. Only a bit of fortune had influenced the survivor's fall, shattering a pair of legs and one arm rather than his head. It was a curious choice for a trap—sharp objects at the bottom would have a much higher lethal success rate.

Overhead, something new came into view. It appeared to be one of Earth's native species, called a bear, except the alien felt almost positive bears didn't have horns, or opposable thumbs on a huge, hairy hand. Most of the creature was off in some way, yet it moved with certainty as it grabbed the living Wrexwren and began to drag the captive along.

For a while, the ground was dirt, then slowly stones started showing up. Tighter and tighter they grew, until it was as if they were on some stone-cobbled path. Strange as that was, it had nothing on the door they reached: huge, dense, and a striking shade of white that stood out amidst the darkness of the subterranean lair. The bear-like creature knocked once, and instantly, the door gave way.

Inside was a room lit by electric lanterns. White shelves lined the walls, decorated with various knickknacks and pops of color. Chairs in the same white hue were lined up next to a matching table, not far from an actual bed. To the sides of the room, tunnels were visible, some smaller than what a human could fit through, others too large even for bear-sized creatures. Seated on a pillow in the center, preparing herself a cup of liquid from some sort of white cup-and-jug set, was what appeared to be a human woman.

She wore a lavender dress, barely fitting over her visibly emaciated frame. Frail, thin, he could see her bones moving through the skin as she reached for her cup and took a tentative sip, letting out a sharp squeak.

“It’s hot,” she said by way of explanation, the Wrexwren’s translator conveying the general meeting. “I suppose we should start with an apology. I’m afraid you’re going to find me a terrible host today.”

Bad as this was, perhaps all hadn’t yet been lost. If she was the meta controlling this beast, then killing her could set it free. That would put him alone with a wild animal, but that was still a better fight than having it puppeteered by someone with intelligence.

“I wish I could offer you some wonderful options to replace what you’ve broken. Unfortunately, laying low means I haven’t been able to collect any human or meta parts. All my lovie’s have come from the nearby forest.”

At her words, new sounds came from within the tunnels. Few approached the flickering light of the electric lanterns; however, there were enough misshapen shadows to know that none of these creatures were currently in the same configuration as they’d been born.

“Even that might not be so bad, except Sissy doesn’t like to help me build anymore. I can’t do nearly as clean of work without her. Modern medicine helps bridge the gap, but her ability made things so much more stable. And far less messy.”

Deciding that this was his only shot, the Wrexwren slammed his remaining three arms into the ground, shooting up and kicking off with his pair of working legs. The effort was successful, in that he managed to get clear of the bear-monster’s reach. That was the end of the positive outcome, and the Wrexwren’s advancement, however.

From the table and each chair came a spear, molding from their very material, firing out and piercing directly into the Wrexwren’s flesh. Four lances where the dining area had been, skewering him in place, lifting up slightly so he was unable to even use the ground for traction.

“While I did say I was going to be a terrible host, I can’t believe I forget to introduce myself. My friends call me Cathy, but I guess you’d probably be more interested in my professional title. Before I got locked away and had my old lovie’s taken, people used to call me the Bone Mage.”

The shadows were slinking out from the tunnel, a menagerie of warped creations, each spliced together in a hideous hodgepodge. From her pillow, Cathy rose as well, stepping lightly over to take a closer look at her newly captured specimen. When she reached out, the Wrexwren tried to jerk its head back. That earned him a gentle smile, as well as a hand delicately running along his torso.

“There’s no need to fear. I’m going to take good care of you, or as much of you as I can. Alien physiology is tricky. Luckily, I’ve got the rest of your friends to experiment on first. Don’t worry. I’ll get all the mistakes out before it’s your turn. We’ll make you stronger than you ever were before. Relax, be at peace, and look forward to what the future holds.”

That gentle smile sharpened, and her wide eyes shined down like mad moons, like they couldn’t wait to unveil the horrors laying in store. “I just know you’re going to enjoy being one of my lovies.”

Clad in a scat-brown suit and bowler hat, no one would mistake this man as an icon of fashion... not that the gentleman clad in such an ensemble gave even the smallest of notions to the opinions of the masses on any topic, including clothes. Compliance with the herd was a practice for the weak. Those with power lived in whatever way suited them best. This was simply one more way he marked himself as above them. Although, not quite so far above them as the woman currently on screen.

Unlike the rest of the world, he had no interest in watching Fornax piss about—the man had been insufferable enough when they shared a prison together. Trying to view Lodestar with magic was a fool’s errand, so they’d simply found the Wrexwren broadcast and tuned in to that with the help of a peon. Other metas often looked down on those with powers focused more toward utility than combat, while those of wisdom knew it was always handy to keep such talents around.

“Worried she might not win?” This man wore simple garments with a high collar—almost a priest’s outfit, yet not quite.

“For a meta who uses the name ‘Faithful,’ you certainly express a great deal of doubt.” In truth, he knew why Faithful wore such a moniker, and the history that made it such a hideous joke. One did not align with Faithful unless there was good reason, and it was never wise to fully trust him. Yet Faithful’s power was so great, sometimes the risk was worth it to gain access to his abilities.

With a completely sincere expression, Faithful lowered his head in apology. “Consider me chastised. Against such a tremendous threat, I thought perhaps even the Lodestar might have some trouble.”

“A Lodestar, certainly, but not that Lodestar. She’s already ascended to greater heights than this. If she were dispatched by such a base, rudimentary threat, she wouldn’t be the prize worth pursuing.”

The bowler hat tipped back, revealing a face worn by the years, unlike Faithful, who remained young and spry no matter how much time piled up on top of him. “My mistake the first time was moving too fast. This is no ordinary cape to bring low; it was folly to think of her that way. One does not snare an apex predator the same way they catch meager prey. This will be a long hunt. Keep that in mind if you get any urges to make a spectacle and lose yourself Captain Bullshit’s veil.”

“My urges are entirely in check, until they aren’t,” Faithful replied, as if that settled the matter. “I’m more curious on how, precisely, you expect to snare her. Not even my ability was able to overcome that cape, and I was among the most offensively powerful in Rookstone.”

The bowler hat dipped down as its owner nodded in agreement. “The trouble was that you came at her head-on, as did I, as did almost everyone else. We all forgot a truth as simple as a nursery lullaby.” He hummed a few bars to himself, watching as Lodestar grew brighter, hitting her opponent over and over to no effect.

“If you seek to catch a star, first you have to make it fall.”

---

Chapter 119

---

This enemy should be beyond her. Lodestar understood that, as another attempt to even dissuade it from the current course failed to draw so much as a reaction. It existed on a scale beyond what humans were designed to fathom, let alone challenge. To stand against the Scralthor was like seeking to halt a sun's meltdown mid-nova. These were not forces they were meant to have control over. And yet, for better or worse, she was permitted to break that limit. Human-shaped wasn't the same as human.

For even another Lodestar, this creature likely represented a final task. Tapping that deeply into the power would be enough to wipe out any trace of the person wielding it, all but guaranteeing that someone else would be burdened with the mantle. Under normal circumstances, this would be her last bout: going out in a final blaze of glory to keep her planet safe.

Except that Helen had a secret that not even most of the other capes knew. Over a decade before, she'd floated in the depths of space, squaring off against another seemingly unbeatable opponent: Orion. With his speed, power, and semi-intangible nature, even her abilities hadn't been enough to fully stop the former scientist bent on destroying the world. At least, not at first. Not until the fight neared its climax, and she finally understood her place in the cosmos.

Not until she broke the rules.

"You're just hungry." She said it to no one but the vast monster. Even the Wrexwren ships that had been leading the Scralthor were gone now, blown up with all the others—no doubt the guild was somehow responsible. "This isn't your fault, and I get that. Someone is using you. This was never a fight you wanted any part of. As much as I can, I'll try to hold back. With what I'm about to do, there are no promises."

She blasted off, soaring into space, tightening her focus as she moved. It was easier to access while active, gave her somewhere to channel the excess energy as it was building. Distance traveled didn't matter. By the time she was ready, it would largely be a question of how fast she chose to move. Still, she had to be focused. This was only her second occasion going past the current limit.

Last time, there had only been the absolute injustice of the situation to focus on, and her own unwillingness to bend to it. That was the night she learned that roles were just words, and that even a Lodestar could be greedy. Today was different. She could already feel that as the heightened levels of power flowed into her, trying to drown out the woman at their center.

Between the daughter, friends, and history on that planet, there was no chance she was letting the Scralthor plunge it into darkness. Scorching through the void, Lodestar wasn't just glowing anymore. She'd begun to shine.

Cyber Geek and Cold Shoulder arrived back at the hole just in time to catch the end of their mystery attacker's threat toward Tachyonic. He wasn't making empty overtures, either—those bony hands came grabbing for Tachyonic immediately. Luckily, he was still mobile enough to dodge, albeit poorly. He wasn't as sluggish, though whether that was from the staff or the fact that the power-weakening attack had begun to fade was up in the air.

"What's going on?" Cyber Geek asked as Tachyonic scrambled away from the claw-like hands.

"Mystery asshole says he's going to kill everyone unless we guess his name, then probably kill everyone anyway." Hephaestus didn't look up from the glove she and Cliché were hunched over, the pair working in near perfect tandem. "Unless you have something more powerful than me and Plasmodia blasting at once, save the ammo. Delay and holding tactics would be greatly appreciated."

To their surprise, it was Cold Shoulder who perked up. “Looks like that’s me.” She started for the hole, but Presto suddenly appeared in front of her.

“Shoot from up here. He’s strong enough that he can kill any of us with one hit. Ice-armor isn’t likely to change that, and I don’t think he’s going to react well if you actually do hinder him.”

Cold Shoulder hesitated, until Plasmodia jumped in, still seated and building her charge. “Presto doesn’t joke around when we’re losing, and he’s actually got a good head on his shoulders. That guy is toying with them. Let’s not give him any more targets, especially less durable ones.”

That evidently convinced her, as she perched at the edge and watched the battle unfold, swirls of frost dancing in her hands as she waited for the opportunity to strike. Plasmodia and Presto were by her side, neither of them paying proper attention to the green trespasser in their care, who was mostly poking her head over to watch the same show play out.

Meanwhile, Cyber Geek was hung up on the rest of the conundrum, trying to guess the attacker’s name. There were so many games where avatar names popped up automatically, and he knew that some interface components came over when he used head-covering items from specific games. Unfortunately, so far, none had name-revealing properties; otherwise, he’d have known who was really under Hephaestus’s mask. This was where he needed more item variety, the kinds of situations where his power could truly excel, if only he knew the right option to use.

“Do we have any clues on mystery man?” Cyber Geek wasn’t expecting much, but knowing he was too weak to fight directly and apparently not powerful enough to fire an effective shot, this was all he could think of to do.

“Well, he looks like that, so there’s a starting point,” Presto noted. “Says he fought the original Science Sentries, seems to really hate Professor Quantum, basically untouchable in terms of strength, and his power directly weakens those with abilities derived from setlium exposure. That’s all we know.”

Plasmodia’s head popped up as something occurred to her. “And it’s ironic that he has that effect on setlium—at least to him. I’m ninety percent sure he said that.”

Tachyonic’s voice came over the communicators, a sharp reminder they were still broadcasting locally, words spit fast between pants for air. “He also claimed to know Professor Quantum before the change. Said he was the first destroyed by the professor's ambition."

Who could have lived that long and still remained unknown? For that matter, why would it be anything other than pure convenience to have an ability that neutralized not only one of the most legendary capes in existence, but also hindered everyone sharing the same source of powers? A sudden notion scratched at Cyber Geek's mind, intuition cobbling together the pieces he was too frantic to see. There was one thread of an idea firm enough to pull on, so that's what he did, yanking out his AHC phone and opening up a quick tab for research. It certainly didn't feel heroic, skimming the internet as his friends were fighting for their lives, but Cyber Geek was fast learning not to give a shit about what did and didn't feel like cape-work.

If it had even a chance of keeping someone alive, then it was time well spent. Besides, this didn't have the feeling of a wild goose chase. Cyber Geek was on to something. The question was if he'd figure it out in time to matter.

The dodges were working, at a cost. Between the injured ankle and the residual effects of being weakened, it was taking everything Tachyonic had to avoid the clawed blows. From behind, Medley ran up on their attacker, throwing the entirety of his bulk into one of the bony man's joints. It was truly the only technique he'd managed with any effectiveness, knocking his opponent briefly off-balance before a smoking leg kicked Medley across the room and into a wall.

If not for incredible endurance and rapid healing, Medley and Bahamut would both be out of the fight already, likely in shape similar to Agent Quantum. Tachyonic felt pangs of guilt as he backpedaled, equally aware of what these distractions were costing them, and how badly they were needed. Without those two drawing occasional focus so he could rest, the dance would already be over.

Sadly, there weren't many steps left to it either way. Tachyonic zipped around, grabbing a meat tenderizer from the kitchen. He tried to break it over the man's skull, hoping to annoy more than hurt at this point, keeping focus away from Agent Quantum. As he made the approach, Tachyonic's ankle hit a poor position and suddenly buckled. Not enough to send him sprawling, though that was largely because of the strong, gaunt, smoking hands that grabbed onto Tachyonic before he could land.

"At last, my little fly, you've wandered too close. Let's see what we can do about pulling off those wings."

"Rob Bob." The name was nonsense to Tachyonic, as well as everyone else in the room based on their expressions, yet Agent Quantum didn't pause before throwing out another. "Todd Williams. William Todds. Jack Crack. Is that enough guesses for a penalty yet?"

Injured or not, Agent Quantum was on his feet, dragging himself to a standing position thanks to the wall. "That's the game, right? Guess and take the penalties. Well I just earned myself four, and they're all coming to me. Unless you'd rather play with Tachyonic than finish trying to break me."

For a face lacking flesh, the stranger did an excellent job of showing his momentary indecision. "You are already beaten."

"If this was about crushing me, you could have done that on a street corner in the middle of the night. Whatever you're after, I don't think it's just proving you can take us in a fight, and I'm positive it has nothing to do with my friend. You want to hurt Professor Quantum, right? I'm the one walking around wearing part of his name and using some of his DNA. I'm the one you want to hurt."

Medley and Bahamut, both slowly having shaken off their last blows, were nearby, watching the act play out silently, unwilling to move and risk tipping whatever gambit was in play. If either was surprised by the revelation of Agent Quantum's origins, they had more important matters at the forefront of their minds.

"Yes, you are," the man agreed. "But unlike Professor Quantum, it seems you truly care for your team. And there are many ways to hurt someone."

"Maybe so, but you challenged me to take the pain until I caved and gave it to someone else. Maim Tachyonic, and it's the same as admitting you couldn't defeat me. Not the way you wanted to."

For a delicate moment, no one moved, all of them too aware that this man could squash Tachyonic's head in a single motion if he so chose. Finally, the dark skull turned back to its captive. "I suppose it would be disappointing, to come all this way and not see you ultimately turn on those who trust you. Though I've had enough of this pest flitting around."

The sharp tips of his left hand broke the skin on Tachyonic's arm, and he stabbed his right fingers into the thigh on the cape's non-injured leg—a short combo that drew a brief yelp of pain before Tachyonic collapsed. Between the new injuries and the power-weakening effects, he'd done his last running of the battle. Their enemy stepped over Tachyonic's writhing form, shifting toward Agent Quantum.

"Now then, about those penalties."

Before the man was fully turned, Medley sprang, launching at their enemy's head. Between the fur, bulk, and general confusion, he was able to hang on long enough to hammer home a few blows before getting roughly hurled through a wooden beam. Loud creaks came from overhead, as Medley dimly realized how many of the support structures on this floor had been already taken out.

Futile as the attack seemed, it gave Bahamut enough time to run in and drag Tachyonic away. She even managed to return as Medley was getting thrown, grabbing a chunk of broken granite from what had once been a kitchen counter and smashing it against the bone man's back. He spun around, surprisingly quick when he wanted to be, and snared one of her arms. That was all it took, so great was the strength difference between them. For the first time since she'd been transformed into a dragon against her will, Bahamut was truly feeling the limits of her power, and it was not an experience she had any interest in repeating.

Dragging her along, the man looked back to Agent Quantum. "What about this one? Are you also willing to suffer in place of a villain? Who knows the number of innocents these claws and teeth have drawn blood from, how many injustices they've perpetrated. You're a superhero; surely it serves the greater good for me to hobble criminals and leave you at full strength."

"There's nothing good about passing my problems on to someone else, greater or otherwise. Maybe he deserves what you'd give, but if I bought into that philosophy, I'd never have become a superhero in the first place. We're not here to punish. We're here to protect. Now, are you done wasting time with these distractions? I'm half-recovered from that last attack; you'd better get moving if you want to stand a chance."

A plainly empty bluff, yet Bahamut was still released from the iron grip, all interest from her captor instantly lost. “You put on a better show than he did, I’ll give you that. Which will make it all the more enjoyable as I rip that façade of nobility away and show them all who you truly are.”

In an unexpected bound, the man crossed the gap between him and Agent Quantum, easily snaring the weakened cape by the back of his neck and holding him roughly in place. “Which brings us to your punishments. Can’t take your tongue yet—I’ll need to hear you talk so you can cave—and most of the senses will be vital in watching your own body torn apart. A limb might be a good start, though I do worry you may bleed out too soon.”

The sharp fingers traced along Agent Quantum’s face, leaving a red abrasion wherever they ran, until stopping on the bridge of his nose. “Then again, I suppose you could still see your team butchered with only one eye. The real question is, which one to take? I have just the solution, one that Professor Quantum would find great appreciation in.” His finger began to tap under each eye in succession as he spoke. “Eenie... meenie... miney...”
“Alfred!”

What should have been a random name being shouted in desperation instead had a very curious effect. Their attacker halted, finger still halfway between eyes for the next tap, all attention shifting to the hole above, where Cyber Geek’s head was poking through.

“That’s who you are. Alfred Settler, the member of Professor Quantum’s team supposedly killed in the experiment that created meta-humans. You’re the man setlium was named after.”

---

Chapter 120

---

Laughter. That was the bone man—or rather, Alfred’s—response. Tittering chuckles that oozed from his mouth as he looked from Agent Quantum, still held tightly in his grip, to the virtually unknown cape that had awkwardly blundered into such a revelation. Unfortunately, this was not the kind of mirth that signaled a positive shift in mood. If anything, he appeared even more dangerous.

“Alfred Settler is supposed to be dead,” Agent Quantum said from his prone position, searching his captor’s fleshless face as though there were clues to be found. “When Professor Quantum’s experiment changed the world, most of the team with him became the first meta-humans. Alfred was killed, and Professor Quantum named what he saw as his greatest discovery in honor of their fallen team member.”

“Yes, that is the story.” Without warning, Alfred hurled Agent Quantum through yet another chunk of wall, drawing groans from bits of ceiling overhead. While the cape struggled to his feet, blood dripped from fresh wounds; in his weakened state, even the lesser attacks were causing damage. “Because the truth casts such a hideous light on the great, beloved Professor Quantum. I wasn’t just some assistant caught in the blast. Nearly half the work on that experiment was mine! I was the one who saw the greater potential, who warned your supposed hero that there were dangers he wasn’t considering. I was the lone voice of caution who stood against the experiment, and this is how fate repaid me.”

He gestured to himself, to the smoking skeleton with the barest bits of muscle tissue keeping it held together. “I’m sure they thought me dead. My body had become corrosive to everything, in varying degrees, and looked like this. By the time I woke up, I was entombed in a metal box and buried under literal tons of rock, the same way we treated nuclear materials at the time. But that's the upside to being corrosion incarnate: nothing can hold you forever."

Having a receptive audience, Alfred had fallen into one of the oldest villain habits in the book: monologuing. No one dared to interrupt. This was a chance for them to catch their breath and think a few steps ahead. Had Alfred gone through guild training, he'd have been warned on the dangers of such an indulgence, especially when the fight was not yet won.

Lifting a thin hand, he pointed directly to Agent Quantum. "Yet what should await me when I emerged? A world enamored with the same selfish, irresponsible, arrogant bastard who made me this way!" The wood under his feet turned dark and cracked at the sudden flash of anger, forcing Alfred to move closer to Agent Quantum. "Whereas I am nothing more than a footnote. Even my name he warped and corrupted to serve his own goals. What a great man, to honor the colleague he killed and erased from history by naming something I never wanted to exist after me. Of course, by the time I reemerged and the humor in that became evident, it was too late for a renaming."

Another step closer, causing everyone watching to tense up. The truth was, if he made a run for Agent Quantum, they couldn't stop him. Slow him down, maybe, but there were no delusions left to dispel; everyone present knew he'd simply been taking his time and having fun. Unless they came up with something soon, the moment he got serious, they would have to face the hard choice: flee, or die fighting.

"We were across from each other, in almost exact opposite points of the room. I wonder sometimes if that's why it worked out this way. Perhaps we inadvertently freed the entire spectrum of meta-elements in that one moment and have slowly been discovering what was in Pandora's Box. He got setlium, whereas I got the opposite. This horrible, eroding energy that kills everything except the man who would welcome it. The exact opposite of what infuses your cells with their ability. I call it: vernium. What do you think?"

Agent Quantum went momentarily stiff, drawing another round of terrible chuckles from Alfred. "That was just in case any of you thought I was spinning a yarn. I am glad to be able to tell you all this, before your end. It's been so long since I shared that story, and I think it will add to the experience of watching your friends die. If nothing else, you'll understand why I'm going to leave them as nothing more than skeletons. A message to the man I'm playing with."

"You think he'll see this as a game?" Medley demanded. It might have been telling that the one who doubted such a sentiment was a cape who'd never worked with Professor Quantum before.

"The game is what he and I have been playing for decades. This is only a single move—though an excellent one, if I do say so myself." To their surprise, Alfred started walking again, but not toward Agent Quantum. He was heading away from everyone, toward one of the holes into the hallway punched by flinging bodies. "As for games, I suppose there is a prize that is owed. Cyber Geek, you and your team are permitted to escape, assuming you are able. Because now that my secret is out, I find it's nearly time to draw things to a close."

He didn't step through the hole, as a few might have been expecting or hoping he would. Rather, he grabbed a support beam on either side, two of the few in the area left standing, holding up everything currently over their head, including the rest of the capes and villains. "Everyone in the pool. It's time to sink or swim."

A pulse of dark energy washed over the beams—the first time they'd seen him intentionally use the corrosive power. In less than a second, the thick wooden supports were nothing more than black ash. Overhead, a loud snap could be heard, followed by a series of groans and crackling, before a huge chunk of the ceiling—and everyone who'd been sitting on it—came crashing down.

Bloopston was pinned down. Separated from Big Swing by the sudden Wrexwren ship that had slammed down to Earth, weakened by having to run through a burning hallway, and now with four aliens drawing close to his position. The call for help had gone out minutes prior, but hope was restrained. There was so much going on right now, and a limited amount of backup to spread around.

Just as the first Wrexwren rounded the corner, face aimed right at Bloopston, something fell from the top of the building, landing directly in front of the creature. On first glance, it appeared to be a normal person. No costume, no mask, nothing to mark this man as exceptional, not until he threw a single glance backward, permitting Bloopston to get a look at his face.

No wonder there wasn't a costume: Quorum didn't wear one. His identity, much as one could call it that, was on public display. Despite the tense situation, he still sounded calm, as another Wrexwren joined the first, sounds of the other two drawing near.

"I know you have translators. This is your only chance. Surrender now, and we can attempt to protect you. The invasion has failed, your people are beaten, but as individuals there might be a path of peace for you moving forward."

In response, the first Wrexwren took a swing at Quorum, who deftly leaned out of the way before returning a blow to a spot on the left side of its chest. As the alien choked, two more hits came, striking a specific point in the torso, and one just above where two of the legs joined. Three quick strikes, and his opponent was lying on the ground, making a sound Bloopston felt reasonably sure was gasping.

Seeing its ally injured, the second alien began to raise a weapon. The attempt was leagues too slow, as Quorum had the speed and perception of over a thousand people piled into the single space his body occupied. Twisting the weapon out of the Wrexwren's claws, Quorum used it as a blunt instrument, delivering one sharp blow to the head and sending his opponent down in a heap.

"Go." Quorum had turned to Bloopston, still unfazed. "Along that alley, turn left by the fountain, keeping heading north until you see the other AHC members. We're consolidating our forces to root out the nearby remaining invaders. I'll be there shortly."

He was gone, around the corner, off to meet more Wrexwren head-on before they arrived. Bloopston, still shaken, did as he'd been instructed, forcing his webbed feet to move along the paved stone streets. As much as Lodestar and Professor Quantum tended to be the larger profiles at the AHC, this particular cape felt a great deal of gratitude to the less-assuming member of the Champions' Congress, who was out here getting his hands dirty. Granted, Lodestar's fight was obviously essential as well, but

Professor Quantum could have made a real difference out in the field. Who knew how many capes wouldn't be coming home tonight because their calls for backup had gone unanswered?

If the big capes were busy, then that just meant the rest of them had to pick up the slack. Bloopston poured more effort into his legs, eager to find the others. Assuming they had some healing power on hand, he could recover and get back out into the field. Being trapped and helpless, only to have salvation arrive unexpectedly, was an excellent reminder of what it meant to be a superhero.

Time to pay it back. There were others out there who needed help, and next time, Bloopston would be the one running in to save the day.

Hovering in the air, Cliché held in one arm, the in-progress gauntlet in the other, Hephaestus couldn't believe there was a time she hadn't considered flight an essential suit function. She blasted back, toward a hopefully stable section of the remaining floor, and set both down. "You okay?"

"Not especially. That guy sounds serious about killing us all, and I'm not sure this is going to work," Cliché admitted. "Oh, you meant physically. Little bruised on the ribs from your grip, but doing much better than I would be if I'd taken the tumble." Tenderly poking herself in the side, Cliché appeared momentarily confused. "Actually, wait—maybe not a full bruise?"

"If you copied my powers along with my brains, then your body is tougher than normal right now, and will heal quickly. Really wish we had more time to play with the fire-based stuff, but eyes on the prize. As of now, I think this bad boy is our last shot."

Reaching over, Cliché put a hand on the cold metal of Hephaestus's shoulder. "What if it fails?"

It was something she'd been trying not to think about. Calling the guild was out, since most of them were dealing with the invaders, just like the major capes, so they couldn't count on backup. If this didn't work, she was officially out of ideas. Sure, with enough time and tech, there might be a solution; however, with what they had on hand, it simply might be impossible to beat the enemy who'd clawed his way out of the past. Should that be the case, it was important to remember that they weren't the capes here.

"Teleport out as many of them as will go. Bahamut and I should be able to escape on our own. I don't think Alfred really gives a damn either way, since we aren't with the AHC. Regardless, the guy lacks wings. Take anyone who's willing to teleport somewhere far—another country if you can manage it. Aim for big cities. The kinds of places where capes will have to be present, dealing with invaders. Then get away from the superheroes fast, because we don't want any part of this grudge spilling onto us."

The sudden groan of floorboards had both of them expecting another collapse, until they glanced behind and saw the familiar pattern of kaleidoscope eyes peering past them, into the rubble below, where bodies were already beginning to stir.

"Not a good time for cryptic bullshit, Nexus," Hephaestus spat, focus swiftly returning to the gauntlet-in-progress.

"Then I am pleased to say that I have none to offer. This is merely the point where things grow most interesting, so I've come to see your version."

"Still a little cryptic," Cliché pointed out, though her tone was gentler than Hephaestus's. "I'm surprised you're here, though. With Lodestar fighting a big monster and Fornax dueling an alien champion, aren't there more interesting things to watch?"

Nexus gave a small nod, never looking away from the shifting debris where Medley's tail had just emerged. "Both are worthy of witnessing, which is why I am doing just that. There are a great many tales being told in this chaotic backdrop, and I am carefully observing all of the most entertaining ones."

Very nearly, Cliché almost asked how—except she sensed that that would start a journey down a rabbit hole they very much did not have time for. Instead, she helped Hephaestus with the gauntlet, rewiring at incredible speed, despite her previous lack of familiarity with the task. This was quite a potent saying to keep on hand, assuming the next attempt didn't split her head open like she felt the last one still might.

A voice rang out from below, filled with confidence, perhaps even a dash of joy. Unfortunately, that voice belonged to Alfred, and only made their situation worse. "Lozora, is that you? Here I assumed you'd have scampered off into a hole once the work began. Turns out, you managed to sneak in. A dedicated helper to the end.”

Hephaestus knew that voice. It was one she’d clung closely to, making sure not to forget a single syllable, and as she listened to Alfred speak, his tone finally landed in her memories. It hadn’t sounded quite the same through the magical fire and distortion of the room, but there was no mistaking that air of shitty smugness. This was the voice they’d heard in the labyrinth, meaning that she’d finally found the one responsible for attacking the Starscouts.

That might be useful in the long term for getting him on Lodestar’s radar, but in the moment, it meant their “trespasser” was exactly what Hephaestus had feared: an enemy in disguise. In fact, her skin’s inhuman hue triggered another bit of memory from the flaming pit’s speech—this Lozora woman was likely the “green little helper” he’d mentioned. Worse, based on everything she’d managed so far, Lozora might also be competent, as well. They were already on the ropes; one more enemy who knew what they were doing could very well put the nail in this coffin.

“So considerate of you. Saves me the trouble of hunting you down later.” After Alfred’s words came a sharp screech, and Hephaestus felt a tad less worried. This was why villains used the guild, for protections against exactly this type of betrayal.

It wouldn’t take him long to finish with his former ally—or anyone else, for that matter. Hephaestus scanned the gauntlet again, searching for any potential way to increase the output. There was no chance the weapon would survive; they’d get a single shot out of this, at most. It had to be cranked to the absolute maximum.

Because if this didn’t work, the only choice they had left was to run, and Hephaestus knew deep down that not all of them would get away. Alfred’s bony hands wouldn’t let them escape.

---

Chapter 121

---

From the wounded body of Zerle Salvrin came a series of higher-toned whistles, what Fornax had begun to suspect indicated the presence of mirth. Moments later, the translator kicked in as words sprang forth. “Behold, your mighty champion. She has realized the fight is hopeless, and is fleeing for her life.”

The mistake was understandable. Zerle Salvrin had no context for what he was seeing, no history to pull from. To Fornax, this sight also represented the nearing of the end, though not in the same way his opponent anticipated.

As he was looking up at the ceiling’s screen, Zerle Salvrin launched an attempted surprise attack. To his credit, several blows managed to land before Fornax hit back, once, stunning the Wrexwren momentarily.

By the time Zerle Salvrin recovered, he was being held, head pointed upward, directly facing the screen.

“Fun as playing with you is, this is the sort of thing one rarely gets to witness,” Fornax said. “It’s about time you understood just what your species is truly up against.”

Together, they stood, watching the light burn brighter as it rose through the sky, waiting to see what came next.

The rubble should have been nothing, not to him. From the early days, he'd been strong. Before he learned, trained, grew, and evolved into the man who could lead the New Science Sentries, he'd been born strong. Pressing his hands against the floor, the weight bore down on top of him, trying to hold him back. Out there, he could discern muffled voices, followed by a scream. It could be one of his team, or the other superheroes, even one of the villains giving aid. There was no way to tell through all the debris blocking his ears.

A small voice inside whispered that perhaps it was better this way. Covered as he was, the situation was actually a momentary respite from the beating he'd been taking. The voice lit something in his belly, a self-directed fury at even being capable of such a notion. Pushing harder, arms straining, he forced his muscles to work, despite being weakened by Alfred's energy. Staying put, laying low, none of those were acceptable options for a superhero.

His head swam from the effort, threatening to pass out entirely, and he refused it. Through the blurry vision and near unconsciousness, he could still see the faces of his team... his friends. Ike, so jaded and broken when he'd first arrived, now fighting to protect others. Ellie, starting so nervous and quiet, they initially thought she had stealth powers; it had taken years for her shell to crack and the powerful superhero to emerge. Kyle, who'd been with him from the very beginning, a pair of kids shooting for the impossible goal of carrying on a legacy.

Just when it felt like his arms would fail, one last face swam into view, followed by her gentle voice. "I don't like the idea of you following his footsteps, especially knowing how dangerous it can be. That said, I trust you, and I know this is where your heart is set. So just promise me one thing. Don't be like him, a figurehead playing a role. Be true to who you really are: my superhero."

Something in his back tore, a pain that barely registered amidst the accumulation of wounds piled atop him, as Agent Quantum managed shove aside a massive hunk of unseen material pinning him. He burst forward, getting most of his torso out into the open air. What greeted him was an array of groans and slow movement as a few of the others pulled themselves free. It seemed Agent Quantum had been under one of the densest sections, though there were some still hidden beneath the debris.

Nearby, Alfred was holding some tall woman with skin the color of an old lime underneath. Her face was twisted in pain—no surprise given the way one of her legs was dangling, refusing to bear any weight. Neither paid the newly emerged cape much attention; they were busy dealing with one another.

“You traitorous shit. Why?”

“Same old Lozora, needing explanations instead of just accepting the commands. Because you annoyed me, I wanted to kill you, and now that the job is done, there’s no reason not to. As a bonus, it saves me some pest nipping at my heels, demanding payment that was never going to come.”

As they were fighting, a sudden creak next to Agent Quantum tipped him off to Presto’s arrival before the other man spoke—though not by much. “Things are looking rough. We’ve got one real card left to maybe play. After that, our only option is to hope we can escape.”

Spinning around, he noticed Presto was lightly coated by dust, having taken at least part of the tumble with everyone else. There was also a curious set of goggles wrapped around his left wrist, much too cobbled-together for the New Science Sentries aesthetic. “You heard him—if we run, he’ll kill random civilians until I show up.”

“I’m not so sure about that. Look at when he took his shot: mid-invasion, when all the bigger capes are busy. I don’t think he can afford to draw that much attention to himself. Because next time we show up, it’ll be with the full Champions’ Congress at our backs. That’s the whole point of being in an alliance.”

It was a good point; with backup, this fight could go very differently. And in truth, Agent Quantum didn’t really expect Alfred to manage a nonstop murder rampage if they got out. But people would die for it, he had no doubt there. This was an enemy who delighted in hurting them. He’d never miss such an opportunity to twist the knife.

“Thank you, Presto. I know what you’re trying to do, and I appreciate it. Get everyone else out safely. That’s an order.” Turning from his ally, Agent Quantum shoved his legs through the rubble, yanking himself fully free as he faced their attacker once more. “Hey, Alfred! I thought we were mid-game. Get bored of me already?”

At the sound of Agent Quantum’s voice, Alfred hurled Lozora over his shoulder without the slightest care; she hit a wall and slid softly down.

“Never, my boy. I will never tire of tormenting anyone who wears even a piece of that name.”

Moving with intent, Agent Quantum stepped away from the site of the collapse. The others were managing, but they needed time. If he could keep Alfred’s interest, it would give them a chance to recover, and hopefully escape. “It doesn’t have to be like this. What happened to you is clearly a tragedy, but the AHC has resources. They might be able to find a cure.”

“A cure? A cure?” Another section of floor darkened moments before Alfred shot forward, backhanding Agent Quantum so hard the cape stumbled back several feet. “What possible need do I have for a cure? Shall I go return to my family, all of whom are long dead? Perhaps I can visit the graves of my friends, marvel at the results of my stolen legacy, or mourn for what might have been. A cure—what a childish notion. The only things in this world that are still mine are this power, and that mid-city patch of ugly concrete they slapped my name upon.”

“This is better?” Agent Quantum wiped the blood from his mouth, or as much as would come away, as he struggled to regain his balance. “Hurting people you don’t even know, hoping the pain carries over to Professor Quantum. Which is pointless. Whatever you do to me, we both know he won’t really care.”

For a very strange moment, something passed between them. On as many aspects as these men were polar opposites, there was a shared understanding common to both. They knew the man behind the legend, understood what it was to live in the shadow of the great Professor Quantum. In their own way, both had been scarred by the experience—only one of them wore that pain on the outside.

“I do know.” There was almost a tenderness to Alfred’s tone, which did not match the punch he delivered to Agent Quantum’s ribs, shattering several. “But having his precious legacy ripped violently apart so soon after their debut will hurt the Science Sentries’ reputation. Let the years pile on as they may: pride has always been Professor Quantum’s one true weakness, the place where he can suffer.”

Morose though the moment was, Agent Quantum’s heart suddenly fluttered as he caught sight of a dark armor floating down from the ceiling. Alfred glanced back once, allowing Agent Quantum a chance to strike, which he didn’t take. Knowing the effect such a blow would have, it wasn’t worth the injury to his hands. Right now, he needed to stay whole for as long as possible—taking the beating was the only way he could hold Alfred's interest.

"Oh, are the others planning something? How cute. Perhaps you're buying them enough time to attempt an escape, now that you've all finally grasped how hopeless things will be? Guess that means you'll have to keep me busy, then." Another punch, this time to the left shoulder, breaking it and sending Agent Quantum reeling.

Even through the pain, however, he kept watching the others. Hephaestus had brought down some woman with a ski-mask and an umbrella just after Alfred turned away, and together, they were rooting through the rubble, searching for someone. Agent Quantum tried to raise both fists, but the shattered shoulder refused to work properly, so he settled for getting the right hand up.

"That's right, I will. Keep it coming. Almost got your timing down."

A bony palm to the sternum cracked it on impact, as well as sending Agent Quantum stumbling back. He was saved from the floor only by virtue of crashing into some of the few remaining kitchen cabinets. Breath was suddenly tight in his lungs—the air had been knocked out of him, adding rasping to injury.

Behind Alfred, light burst forth from the debris. They'd uncovered Plasmodia, who was seated like she'd been meditating, energy crackling along her entire body. Agent Quantum wasn't even sure she'd realized the floor collapsed. Plasmodia was building a charge, focused enough to manage through the chaos. Hephaestus and the strange woman hurriedly grabbed her attention.

"Bastard though he is, at least Professor Quantum is capable of adapting to a challenge. Look at you, the situation so clearly hopeless, yet you persist on playing hero. Do you really intend to take this all the way to the end?"

"Absolutely." Sweat and blood were dripping into Agent Quantum's right eye; he must have cut his head on impact. It didn't even matter. Seeing the punches coming wasn't helpful in this fight. Half-vision was plenty. "I know what happens when you start choosing yourself over everyone else. I've seen what lays at the end of that road. If my choices are to be a real superhero for this one moment or spend decades as a fraud... well, I think I've already made my decision on that front clear."

Ignoring the pain screaming across his body, Agent Quantum lifted his working arm into a fist once more. The others were to his right, in the blurred-out section of his vision, so he had no clue where they were in whatever scheme they had planned. All he could do was keep standing, and have faith in his team.

Alfred, on the other hand, was in clear view as he lifted a hand, fingers fully extended. That was the form he used for stabbing blows, and gauging by the angle, Agent Quantum had a gut feeling he'd be feeling this one in the gut. "Such a noble sentiment, yet in the end, what did all your suffering accomplish?"

"Well, he bought us enough time to beat you, so that's something." Hephaestus's voice rang loudly through the room, clearly meant to be heard. At the sound, Alfred twisted back toward it, and Agent Quantum was able to adjust his gaze. Now he could make out Hephaestus and the woman wearing the ski-mask, both directly behind Plasmodia, who'd donned one of Hephaestus's metal gloves. Both she and the device were glowing like a sword pulled from the hearth, his fellow New Science Sentry staring pure death at their attacker.

Interestingly, it was the ski-mask stranger that seemed to rile Alfred the most, pointing directly at her. "You! The gall to be in my presence again, and with that vile item in hand no less." To Agent Quantum's shock, Alfred began to stalk across the room, interest momentarily shifted.

While this did move him closer to the others, it also put distance between him and Agent Quantum, meaning Plasmodia had an easier shot. From the whine of the metal glove, it sounded as if she'd hit the same conclusion.

"Really? More of this pointless pageantry. Very well. These are your final moments. Waste them as you see fit." Alfred kept right on walking, and given how unassailable he'd been through the whole fight, it was hard to blame him. Odds were, this would be just like all the other attacks: entirely pointless.

Hephaestus grabbed Cliché as the threat drew near, no longer shouting, the voice still easily carried through the small space. "Weapon is out of our hands now. Can you think of anything to give it some extra juice?"

There was something familiar about the twinkle of her eyes as the ski-mask woman stared down the approaching skeleton, but Agent Quantum was in no headspace to place it, even with the aid of her voice.

"In times like these, only one pops to mind, and I can't think of anything more fitting. The darker the night, the brighter the stars." No sooner had the words left her mouth than the woman tipped over as she passed completely out, saved from hitting the ground only by Hephaestus's quick reaction time.

Amidst the madness, Plasmodia paid neither of them any mind. Every ounce of her focus was on the still-advancing form of Alfred. She was letting him draw close, making sure there was no chance the shot could miss, even if it meant she'd be in danger afterward.

"On behalf of the New Science Sentries, the original Science Sentries, the Alliance of Heroic Champions, and everyone else you've hurt with your horrible scheme, consider this a message from the bottom of our hearts: Fuck you back to the grave."

Plasmodia fired, and the entire world exploded in light.

---

Chapter 122

---

It had never been like this before. Not anything close. Usually, Chloe felt the power shift around a touch with each new saying, like a mild change in the breeze. Even the ones that impacted her physically, she registered differently than the power itself. This was no breeze, however. It was a tornado, yanking her out of metaphorical Kansas and whipping Chloe through what felt like a dozen different spaces all packed into one.

When she finally stopped, there were no sights to behold. Everything was sensation; she was well past the boundaries of the physical world. There was a shape to this place, a form, even shifting as it was. Mentally groping around, Chloe felt a small divot, a break in what should be. At her touch, words drifted into mind—her own words, in fact, spoken to Hephaestus back in that hallway, when they needed to work on the gauntlet.

This was a mark left from using her power. Wherever she was, it was connected to that ability. As she pondered what it could mean, Chloe also realized something else: the break was shrinking. Self-repairing, soon it would be no more than a memory. Continuing on, Chloe tried to get her bearings, to create a sense of this place. There was no time here, making it impossible to say how long she wandered. She only knew that something was leading her forward. It was a peaceful, nearly serene trip... until she reached the edge.

No mere divot this time. Instead, she was at the lip of a crater. Standing there, she could feel her own power flowing into the fracture of reality, reinforcing something much larger and bigger than she was capable of generating on her own. Slowly, Chloe put the puzzle of her situation together. Before, she'd been the one creating the breaks, her own pockets of the world where things functioned differently. This time, she'd stumbled onto someone else's efforts, and that made for a very different experience.

Today was turning out to be quite the learning opportunity. Not only had she discovered a new use for her abilities, Chloe also learned she wasn't the only one out there who could create these sorts of effects. Except, whoever had made this one was worlds stronger than her—though, with Nexus's warning fresh on her mind, it was hard not to wonder if that gap could be closed. Especially considering the other truth she was realizing.

Based on how much was flowing from her into the crater, Chloe had a lot more power than she'd been using, far more than had been leaking out of her last effort. She could feel the connection, and had an intuition that it could be severed when she desired, but Chloe made no attempts to halt the power. Might as well see how much she really had to throw around.

Besides, if this was working as she imagined, then there was no phrase to use where her efforts would bear better fruit. She wouldn't change the tide of the invasion—that had already been sewn up—but there were still untold smaller fights going on across the planet, countless forces facing dangerous odds, seemingly unbeatable forces. This crater was already a thumb on the cosmic scale. Chloe was just turning that thumb into something a little heftier.

Now it was just a matter of seeing how heavy she could go.

Two-on-one were bad odds, even without an injured leg, something that Dapper Doll tried not to dwell on as she leapt to the side, narrowly avoiding fire from their blasters. She had the advantage in physical power, but the ranged weapons kept forcing her back, scoring minor damage from shrapnel when she wasn't quick enough. With buildings to her rear, however, room to maneuver was running out.

There was one shot she could think of: do the unexpected, sprint toward them and try to dodge the incoming fire. Absolute lunacy, there was no way she had the dexterity or reflexes to pull off something like that. And yet, in that moment, something in her stirred. A newfound... confidence wasn't the right word. Certainty. This was the only path forward. She simply had to find a way to make it work.

Hearing the footsteps draw near, Dapper Doll sprang, her feet unexpectedly swift. Whether it was terror or adrenaline, she was faster than she'd ever been before, clocking the movements of her opponents as they aimed their weapons. At the last second, she dropped into a slide, narrowly avoiding the pair of shots that went clear overhead. That got her within swinging distance of the first Wrexwren, just the proximity she was aiming for. A pair of punches sent it reeling; funny, the last one she fought had been a bit tougher, but an upper hand was an upper hand.

One kick to the head put it down to the ground hard, revealing that the other Wrexwren had been drawing a bead on Dapper Doll. That should have been it, end of the line, a shot point-blank into her torso. Except that her instincts had a mind of their own. Rather than duck down like she had before, Dapper Doll used her enhanced strength to push off the ground, leaping into a standing somersault. The Wrexwren shot had been angled low, expecting her to dodge downward, which meant it missed her entirely.

Her move, on the other hand, landed Dapper Doll only steps from the enemy, steps she took quickly, sending the alien down with a few well-placed blows. Scanning the area for more threats, she saw nothing. "Everyone, come on out. Let's keep moving to the evacuation point."

Out of nooks and crannies all along the street, civilians appeared, the ones she'd been leading to safety when the pair attacked.

Now that the fight was done, her hands were starting to tingle, the post-battle drain setting in. Moments later came the pain in her leg, the injury exacerbated by all the acrobatics. Dapper Doll was glad for it, though, because moments prior, she hadn't been expecting to make it through the night. It seemed someone out there was keeping watch over the capes today.

Lodestar was nearing the edge of safe terrain, the limits of what she could wield without substantial risk. With power like this, it was very possible to lose herself, even rooted as she was. Feeling the flood of new energy wash over her, filling her relatively miniscule form with the fundamental forces of the universe, she mentally turned away from the Scralthor and all the fighting.

To hold on in moments like this, the key lay in remembering who Helen truly was. The first faces pained her heart: Mom, Dad, and David. Why did her mind always go to that night, that hill, where they were waiting for her with the telescope? Next came a vision of Mackenzie, trying to hide her tear-stained eyes as Helen awoke in the hospital.

Lodestar began to fly once more, no longer away from the Scralthor, now on a direct course. Helen's mind flashed ahead, to Faucet Hills on that fateful day she'd been forced to accept and wield the same power that had killed her family. Because the other option had been to standby helpless as Corvix butchered her friends. That was the moment she swore to never be helpless again.

Her shine, already blazing so brightly, only intensified as the memories flew by. After Corvix came Quorum, the loss and gain he simultaneously represented. Faces flitted by faster, friends and people she'd saved, anchors that helped her stay grounded as the world grew enamored with Lodestar. Battles, challenges, enemies, adversaries, one after another they fell, until Fornax.

Ivan's face swam before her, coated in a red mask, staring in absolute shock that his blow hadn't sent her spinning back through the air. In fairness, her face had also been a mask of confusion; it had been so long since anyone threw a punch she really felt. From there, it was a chaotic swirl of Fornax and Ivan, sometimes an enemy, sometimes an ally, yet somehow almost always a friend.

New pain filled her as she remembered the way he'd stared up during their final bout, eyes filled with the apology he didn't know how to voice, fully aware of how much it wounded her to bring their dance to an end. To leave her alone on the top of the mountain once more. It was short-lived, soon replaced by the image of Ivan hanging in the void of space, wielding more power than she'd even known he possessed, holding Orion locked in position. The moment he'd helped her see who it truly was that set their roles in this life. For a fleeting moment, she could hear his voice, reaching through the chasms of time.

Even the Lodestar is allowed to be greedy.

Things grew brighter from there, as did the soaring Lodestar, now on a crash course with the Scralthor and only picking up more speed. At last, she'd reached the foundation of her world, the cornerstone that would not give: images of Penelope's newly born, scrunched-up, crying face filled Helen's mind. Fast on its heels were countless memories of holding, teaching, playing, dancing, all with the daughter that was never supposed to be.

The same daughter who was probably watching right now, along with the rest of the world, worrying about what would happen if Lodestar failed. She was counting on the world's greatest hero, yes, but also on her mother. Without a sun, their world would wither and die, and at the even idea of Penelope suffering, Lodestar drowned all the forces of the universe vying to overwhelm her. This thing, this being—whatever it was—would not yield until it was fed, or beaten.

That fear in Penelope's heart wasn't hers alone. It stretched across the entire planet, her planet. It had lingered over all of them for long enough. Lodestar locked her fist in position as she increased her speed, charging toward the otherworldly abomination.

Seemed she needed to remind everyone, cape or villain, alien or human, cosmic beast or god or anybody else that wanted to step up, just who this planet was protected by.

Across the world, countless small fights suddenly turned, the forces seeking to protect gaining ground on those who were after conquest. It wasn't always enough to shift the tides, but for a great many, that extra bit of speed or oomph in a punch was enough to snatch victory.

In the room with Chloe's unconscious body, a much more direct contest was occurring. Plasmodia's beam wasn't simply hitting Alfred with no effect, like last time. No, this was leagues more powerful, physically driving the near skeleton back, forcing him to raise his hands in defense. A scent of burning bone drifted up from the air, and something gave way, flying off from Alfred. Whatever snapped, he'd had enough, diving out of the shot, which instantly carved through the back wall, opening them up to a view of the outdoors. Plasmodia angled the beam upward as it died out, making sure not to hit anyone below.

The gauntlet fell off her arm in pieces, the entire contraption burned away from the beam's intensity. That had been everything they had, and then some, but it wasn't enough. Alfred was still there, rising slowly to his feet. No one moved, because what move was there left to make? That was their final gambit, and it failed.

"You..." He wasn't beaten, but he also wasn't the same, twisting toward Plasmodia like a serpent rearing to bite. "This cannot be. I have stood against the Science Sentries countless times, wiped out capes and villains alike, even survived an encounter with Fornax. After all of that, I refuse to believe the first true injury dealt to me came from one of Quantum's whelps."

As he spoke, the keen-eyed in the room realized something had changed. On his left hand, the ring finger was now missing. Plasmodia's beam hadn't been enough to kill him outright, but she had managed to cause a wound. To his ego more than his body, unfortunately. There was no revelry or humor as he began to stalk directly toward her, hands already extended.

"There's only one solution. I'll just have to kill you all and rewrite history. Starting with the one who caused this unacceptable embarrassment." Suddenly, he wasn't walking anymore, but rather bolting forward on a direct course with Plasmodia.

It was too fast for almost anyone to act. Even if he'd been at full strength, Agent Quantum couldn't have caught up in time. Most of the team was still crawling their way out of the debris, and while Hephaestus was at Plasmodia's side, what kind of aid could be offered? Those bony hands would likely tear through metal just as easily as everything else. There wasn't even room to dodge as Alfred barreled down on her. Plasmodia merely faced the threat head-on, watching as his arm reared back and struck.

Before it could hit, the arm was slowed by a sudden new obstacle in its way. Presto stood there, strange goggles over his eyes and blood dripping from his stomach where the arm went cleanly through, Alfred's hand poking out the other side. Shocked, the room was silent, meaning they heard the slight sizzle as Presto leaned forward, grabbing on to Alfred's forearm, his own flesh burning on contact.

"There's a funny thing about having a power that can kill you if pushed too hard: that issue only matters when there's not something you'd die to protect. For as much of a limit as it's been, the upswing is I've got one hell of a single-use trick, and you're along for the ride, asshole." Presto sucked in a deep breath, then jerked his head upward, staring past Alfred, into and past the sky, the stolen goggles peering at the dark depths of space.

"One last time, for the people in the cheap seats... Big Finish!"

This was unlike any other time Presto teleported. Normally, he simply vanished, and that was that. On this occasion, be it due to effort, mass being pulled, or overall effect, there was a snap of a moment where the spaces connected. Cold burst forth as air flowed in, a fraction of a nano-second enough to feel the wave of emptiness ripple out from their destination.

The silence that followed felt false. It couldn't be over, not just like that. But it was.

Plasmodia's hand was reaching out, grasping at the point where her teammate had been moments prior. "Presto... why...?"

"Not to be indelicate, but the why is pretty obvious. He knew what we all knew: there was no winning this fight." Hephaestus looked at the still-smoldering hole in the building. While her current system couldn't see much, the goggles he'd grabbed were capable of far more impressive views, daylight be damned. If Presto had really used enough power to die, then there was no telling how far into the cosmos Alfred had been flung. What was more impressive was that he'd had the presence of mind to grab and test new equipment, then formulate a last-ditch plan, all in the midst of Alfred's chaos. He'd had a brain with lots of potential, all of which was now lost.

"No." The voice was near a whimper, and it didn't come from Plasmodia. Agent Quantum was leaned against a set of wrecked cabinets, tears running down his face as he pressed his working arm's fist to his forehead. "Damn it, Ike. Damn it." He swallowed, trying to find some level of composure. "I'm sorry. I should have been better. I should have found a way."

Emotional a scene as it was, Hephaestus's perspective afforded her a good view of the sky, which had suddenly grown much brighter. Weirdly, the sun appeared to have shifted position as well, moving at an alarming rate. Except, when Hephaestus checked again—nope, the sun was still in its expected position. Too preoccupied to noticed how Fornax was holding his captive on the livestream, she turned to the others. "Not to undercut the moment, but should we be worried about that?"

Following her pointing finger, Plasmodia looked up as well, damp eyes going suddenly wide in shock. “Oh my god. It’s just like the Day of Two Stars.”

That name was familiar, something Tori had uncovered in her initial research of Fornax; after all, it was all but impossible to learn about her mentor without also reading the history on his greatest rival. As she recalled, the Day of Two Stars was what some people called the fight with Orion, alleging that Lodestar had blazed so bright, the planet’s two light sources became indistinguishable.

Seeing it for herself, Hephaestus could certainly understand how the nickname had formed. There was something horrifying and humbling to see so much power being wielded that it was literally visible from space. Yet even that paled in comparison to what came seconds later.

With most of the Earth still watching, the sky suddenly shattered.

---

Chapter 123

---

The term “Scralthor” was a Wrexwren word without direct translation. To the creature itself, such a combination of noises would have had no meaning. The sharp shrills of smaller beings weren’t even loud enough to be an annoyance. Merely background, like the songs of the stars and the hideous buzz lurking within black holes. It had no concern or thought for them as it swam, gobbling up small morsels on its way to a larger meal. Flashes of light and minor impacts had caught what passed for its eye, but they were no more than minor meteor strikes, impossible to break through its tremendous hide.

As it swam, however, the creature noticed a new sound. Rich, deep, melodic, and loud. Increasing in volume, at that. Shifting its attention, the creature could not believe what its senses were saying. Since being spawned in the flickers of a dying nebula, the being had swum and devoured, devoured and swum. Others of its kind were challengers, an occasional threat, but space was large enough for all to swim.

This was not a challenger. This was not of its kind, nor was it fully of the tiny ones. The song thundered all around, inescapable and undeniable. Power, a power that was far older than the creature or any of its kin, rippling forth like the fabric of the universe could scarcely contain it. While the creature had been alive for time untold, it was still growing, still learning.

In that moment, seeing a force so much greater than itself, the creature had just enough time to experience genuine terror. Seconds later, a blow that seemed to fracture reality itself rang out, the shred of light stretching through the darkness of space. It made no sense, that a being so small could wield such power, but the pain radiating forth would tolerate no second-guesses.

For the first time in its existence, the endlessly devouring creature born from the void of space was being genuinely challenged.

“That’s...”

The first translated whistle reached Fornax’s ears moments after Lodestar’s initial blow. Before their eyes, a tremendous burst of energy tore forth from the point of impact, like a crack made of light splintering across the windshield of the universe. That was merely the spectacle, however. What was visible when the light cleared was the real show.

“That’s...”

Against all known reason and sense, the Scralthor had been sent reeling back, blasted away from its shining snack by one true blow from Lodestar. It opened its mouth, letting out some unseen howl lost in the distance of the void. The creature turned to face this blazing threat, taking it seriously at last, far too late. Another blow sent it hurtling further away, Lodestar proving she had plenty more punches to throw, if needed.

“That’s...”

In truth, Fornax didn’t even need the translator for these words. He’d heard them spoken over and over again through the decades. Sometimes, the language changed, or the voice, or even the form of speech, yet the feeling was always the same. It was the sound of understanding setting in, the audible crunch as delusions of grandeur were smashed apart. Scheming scientists, aspiring gods, invading monsters, horrific villains: they all sounded alike when the reality of what they were facing finally landed.

“That’s impossible!” Finally, Zerle Salvryn got the words out, joining a rich Earth tradition he had no idea he was even part of. The words Fornax had been waiting for, the signal that his work could at last draw to a conclusion.

“Yes, it is, not that she gives a damn. This is what it means to stand against the Lodestar,” Ivan explained. “That is the lid on the pressure cooker of our planet, the limit we cannot rise above, the force that rises to meet every challenge. Barrage of giant robots, summoned army of demoids, or even asteroid-sized monsters from space. It doesn't matter. It never matters. All hope of victory has been stolen. No amount of training, or planning, or effort will ever be enough, regardless of how hard any of us try. Do you understand now, Zerle Salvvin, why the day was lost before it began? Even if there are any Wrexwren left out there, they'll never be a threat to Earth. Getting past her only means dealing with all the hungry beasts of the planet that eagerly await fresh targets."

Fornax couldn't destroy hope, but Lodestar did it by her nature. While inspiring those she protected was all well and good, being on the other end of that equation wasn't nearly so nice. It forced one into the simple realization that some walls could never be climbed, certain challenges left forever unmet. Watching her beat a natural force of the cosmos away like nothing more than a shoplifter's hand reaching for a candy bar, Fornax himself felt the same wave of despair as Zerle Salvvin and anyone else who dreamed of being the strongest. Once they knew how high that bar really was, the impossibility of the task became unshakable.

"There will be more Wrexwren." Zerle Salvvin was whistling sharply now, trying to twist his head away from the screen; however, Fornax kept it held firmly in place. "They will find a way to deal with your planet's defender, and you will suffer for this day."

Taking a moment to be sure there were no sudden surprises in store with the Lodestar fight, Fornax moved slowly around, putting his head in Zerle Salvvin's line of sight. By no coincidence, this also gave the floating cameras a good view of both Fornax and Zerle Salvvin's faces as they looked into one another.

"In truth, they wouldn't," Fornax corrected. "Whatever tricks they'd have brought would be irrelevant. Trust me, if anyone, on this subject: Lodestar rises to the challenge. Not that it matters, anyway. Because no more Wrexwren are coming, Zerle Salvvin. You see, we didn't tell you everything about that destructive wave from earlier, did we, Doc?"

The voice came immediately, finally tipping off some of the viewers at home to just how planned all of this had been. Fornax was never in danger; they were toying with the alien who'd challenged Earth, drawing the fight out to make him suffer.

"As a matter of fact, there was one tidbit we omitted. What we used wasn't merely some sort of short-range attack; it was coded into a signal.

And my, you Wrexwren have just as robust an interstellar communications array on your warships as I was hoping for. Capable of reaching across innumerable light years in a matter of moments. I've been watching their systems detonate one after another, never even aware they were under attack. I'll scroll some of their identification codes on the screen, just in case you need proof."

Twisting against Fornax's grip, Zerle Salvrin tried to look away, not that there were any good alternatives to the horror in his gaze. Above, he saw Lodestar smacking down what was meant to be his ace in the hole, now with alien symbols flashing on the side of the image, the names of more downed ships across the stars. Next to him was the twisted joy in Fornax's face, eager to dole out more suffering. Even looking to nothing held no escape, as his mind filled with images of all his kin dying in space without warning.

"You would not do such a thing. To destroy our ships, murdering untold soldiers far from conflict... that is beyond the scope of war."

"Beyond the scope of your war, maybe. Humans are a truly unforgivable species. Then again, you came here to invade, to wipe us out. Did you expect to have fewer stakes in the fight? Think we'd be content with merely driving you off? Ridiculous dreams. Ours is not such a benevolent way of thinking. Our kind would sooner rip the moon in half than let a chance for vengeance go unfulfilled. Come for this planet, and know you do so with the life of everyone you care for riding along. Consider the preemptive genocide of the Wrexwren army our version of a warning shot to the galaxy at large."

Finally, Fornax shifted his gaze away from Zerle Salvrin, turning to the cameras. "Because this isn't only being broadcast to the citizens of Earth. Doctor Mechaniacal is using your ship to send this video out to every receiving system out there. A galactic hello, from the hellpit of Earth, in case any other eager aliens have thoughts about sending more invaders." His eyes shifted back, down to the rattled form of Zerle Salvrin. "We'll get to them. First, I believe you and I have some unfinished business."

The truth was settling in. Their previous demonstration proved that not only could they remotely blow up ships, but they absolutely had zero compunctions in doing so. Zerle Salvrin raised an arm, half-forming a claw to strike with, only for the appendage to drop heavily. Nearly there. Just a bit more to finish out the job.

“Zerle Salvrin, I present you with a rare opportunity. Based on the state of your ships and the conditions waiting for your invaders, even the few who survive our signal won’t be able to withstand the wrath of all those other planets you attacked. There is a real chance you may end up being the last of the Wrexwren army. Yet all hope is not lost. Doctor Mechaniacal can still halt the signal before every ship is reached. I’m willing to offer a way out, and make no mistake, this is your only chance to save countless Wrexwren soldiers. Let us see if you are a leader who can also be humbled. Accept that your people are helpless, that you live or die only by our pleasure, that your strength is nothing. I will permit you to beg for your life.”

Releasing the grip on Zerle Salvrin’s head, Fornax slowly took a few steps back, visibly unworried about potential attacks. First, he’d broken Zerle Salvrin’s faith in his physical strength, showing that Fornax was unquestionably the more powerful of the two. Then, he’d broken Zerle Salvrin’s sense of strength in numbers, decimating the forces that had earned him his title. Next, Lodestar destroyed any hope he had that the Wrexwren people would ever be able to overcome this obstacle, making sure he would die for nothing, not even a potential new invasion target. Now, they’d come to the hardest part for beings like Zerle Salvrin, the reason Fornax had needed to knock away every other support before arriving to this point: it was time to break his pride.

A being like Zerle Salvrin would never beg for himself. That was a truth Fornax understood to his bones. Yet the experience of Ivan also gave insight, because even the staunchest of warriors had something they would beg to save—he knew that firsthand. Being the final survivor of the invasion would be a heavy enough burden to carry; to be the last warrior of his species was a concept beyond horrific. A battle that couldn’t be won by strength, the only chance for victory was in weakness, contrary to what seemed to be every facet of the Wrexwren culture.

Unable to read the emotions on what passed for Zerle Salvrin’s face, Fornax nevertheless watched the storm of them flow. Eventually, the Wrexwren leaned forward, using one hand to extend his head slightly, while dropping the three working legs into all right angles, creating a sort of suspended crouch. Not quite a bow by human standards, yet clearly meant to convey vulnerability in the same way. Head angled toward the floor, Zerle Salvrin’s whistles echoed around the room before being translated.

“I ask... on behalf of the Wrexwren species... for time to discuss terms of surrender.”

“Terms? What terms do you think there will be? Which pieces of you we dissect versus which ones we try eating? Terms are for people with leverage, Zerle Salvirin. You don’t have that.” Fornax paused, waiting a moment for reply before deciding the wound needed a dash more salt. “Want to know what’s really funny? There was never a point where you had a chance. The only reason you’re here is that someone on my planet wanted to occupy the AHC, so they sent bait to lure you down. And my people decided to make better use of you. Do you understand what I’m saying, Zerle Salvirin? You didn’t even warrant a warning shot. Instead, you are the warning we’re giving to rest of the universe. All you’ve been from the start are pawns in an Earth scheme. Countless Wrexwren slaughtered, for nothing more than a game.”

There was a moment where Zerle Salvirin appeared to be on the edge of taking a swing, only to feel the confidence that would back such a play suddenly absent. Every other avenue of hope had been cut off by Fornax. There was no fighting a way out of this, no rescue was coming, and even if he escaped, where would Zerle Salvirin flee to? A cosmos full of formerly conquered planets would have quite a few entities looking for payback against the last known Wrexwren soldier. The only hope of living long enough to preserve his people’s legacy was in front of him—that was the conclusion there was no skirting around.

“Mighty Fornax, great warrior of Earth. I humbly beg of you, please spare me. Let me live on in my shame, a worthless coward weakling. We greatly erred in challenging this world. Your power was more than even the Wrexwren could handle. Please, let my cowering life serve as testament to the collective strength of Earth.”

It had taken some time, yet Fornax delivered as promised. The leader of the invading alien forces, hunkered over, pleading for his life, with most of Earth and unknown viewers across the galaxy tuned in for the show. Beating Zerle Salvirin would have been simple and proved just as little. Breaking him completely was far more terrifying, all the more so to any who’d faced the Wrexwren and their seemingly endless pride.

“That was excellent,” Fornax said, peering down at his former opponent. “You held nothing back. I couldn’t ask for a more earnest, sincere pleading. Well done, Zerle Salvirin.” The words were slightly softer, encouraging the alien to look up, providing a momentary view of Fornax's boot lifted high overhead. "But my answer is no."

One stomp, a spray of liquid, and Zerle Salvrin was nothing more than a headless torso flopping about on the ground. Soon even those movements slowed.

Fornax, however, was only getting started, gaze darting between the body and the cameras.

"No, because the Wrexwren were garbage, nothing but a species of brutish fodder. You died the way you were always meant to: cut down effortlessly by those with real power. Yet in your death, and the death of your entire species' armed forces, you will serve one actual function: our warning message to the rest of the universe. Because if those of you out there watching haven't realized it yet, Earth is not a place for amateurs. To even face us, you have to get past Lodestar, and the lesser capes at her aid. So if you'd like to test your mettle, feel free to come take a swing."

Fornax lifted Zerle Salvrin's body from the floor, hurling it against the wall, where it collided with a damp thud, largely splattering across the gleaming metal. "But unless you're already the strongest being in your corner of the galaxy, don't bother. We don't want your refuse. We want your conquerors, your kings, your gods and demons. Prey worthy of sinking our fangs into, something that can offer up a proper challenge."

Grabbing the middle camera, Fornax pulled it in close, making sure his rune-covered eyes filled up the entirety of the shot. "Earth is riddled with monsters, and we are all so very... hungry."

Rick was shaking. Not violently, not even noticeably, if one wasn't paying close attention. His mother's arms slipped over his shoulders, and even as the logical part of his brain insisted that she was part of this too, it was drowned out by how much of him needed that hug.

How had he not seen... because why would he? How would he? In what world could his dad, Ivan Gerhardt, the plain, dull, middle manager be... no, even the thought was too much. But those words floated back up: "rip the moon in half." Who talked like that? Ivan did, when he was being serious. Such a stupid turn of phrase, yet it had been like a pin pricking the side of a balloon, and now, there was no way to put back all the realizations that were escaping.

Twisting, he meant to speak to his mother, only to recoil in horror at the expression on her face. Was that pride? Admiration? It absolutely was not the appropriate reaction to a man saying he'd wiped out part of a species and then brutally murdering a beaten foe.

"Why?" That was surprising—he'd thought the question of how would win out, but much of Rick's brain was working on autopilot at the moment. "Why is he doing this?"

"On the immediate level, to help keep the world safe," Janet replied. Not one sliver of hesitation to her voice. She'd been ready and waiting. "In a longer term sense, to help keep us safe."

Now, Rick did throw off her arm, physically scooching over on the sheet. "How does that have anything to do with us?"

Never had Rick seen an expression like what darted over his mother's face. Dark, harsh, determined and set, he wondered how many times she'd had to wear that, given who she'd evidently married. "It has everything to do with us. Your father just walked onto a stage in front of the universe and sent two very clear messages. The first is not to challenge Earth idly, which should give any other potential invaders a long pause before they pester us. The second message is what happens specifically to anyone who crosses Fornax. After seeing what he just did to someone he had no grudge against, would you ever want to incur that man's true wrath?"

There wasn't an easy answer for that. Rick had a hunch it would be a long while before he found any easy answers at all, in fact. Laying his face in his hands, Rick closed his eyes, trying to clear his mind so he could think.

Instead, all that waited for him in the darkness were those horrible eyes with the glowing red runes. Only now, he couldn't stop seeing them embedded on his father's face.

---

Chapter 124

---

The sudden cold of metal shocked Lozora nearly as much as the force being exerted. Someone was yanking on her shoulder, trying to pull her up to a standing position, despite her weakened leg. She turned to find Hephaestus staring down, gauntleted hand on her, while the free digits motioned back to where everyone else was either stricken with grief or slowly emerging from the pile of collapsed debris.

“We should be gone.”

Given the state of the superheroes, Lozora could see the wisdom there. Logic said she’d just been double-crossed by the same person who’d attacked them, putting everyone on the same side. But they’d just watched a friend die to save them all. Logic wasn’t necessarily the current captain of decision-making. With emotions running this high, the last thing they needed was an outlet.

Much as she detested the help, there was no way she could escape with her leg’s current condition. Doing her best not to appear annoyed by the gracious assistance, she allowed herself to be hauled up onto Hephaestus’s shoulder and steadily walked out into the hallway. No one seemed to notice or follow. They were all lost in the moment, looking up to the sky, though whether it was searching for their lost ally or admiring Lodestar’s handiwork was anyone’s guess. Only the dragon appeared unconcerned, gently lifting up the ski-mask woman, who was still sleeping soundly.

Together, Lozora and Hephaestus trudged down the hall, weaving their way through the groaning, injured bodies of her former crew. The capes weren’t going to come down easy on this group, not with one of their own now dead. All the better to get clear before they started arriving. Nevertheless, she didn't trust such a kind gesture, even as she needed it.

"I'm surprised you didn't want to stay with your friends back there," Lozora noted. "One of them seemed to have gotten knocked out."

"Which is why Bahamut's job is to take her somewhere to get help," Hephaestus explained. "Sorry to disappoint, but you weren't the first item on my checklist when the dust settled. You're not even the first thing I picked up. Still, with the capes always having each other's backs, we villains have to look out for one another occasionally, too. Otherwise, those saps will always have the upper hand."

Though "enemy of my enemy" wasn't the most original reason to lend aid, it was one Lozora could wrap her head around. Desperation formed strange alliances; she'd seen that borne out a great many times through her unnatural life. Besides, it wasn't as if she had some item or information worth stealing. With her employer disposed of, Lozora would have to start all over again. Perhaps this next time, she'd take a few solo jobs to build up some funds, then form her own crew.

"The way you say villain, I take it to mean you're part of the club." This meta-suited fellow was clearly not Fornax—aside from him being broadcast on television for everyone to see, he would never hide in a fake identity when a real fight presented itself. Plus, Fornax shouldn't even know she'd had a hand in trapping him and his daughter. Nevertheless, it didn't hurt to sniff around, just in case.

"Only in the most technical sense. I made it through initiation, haven't really done much since then. Getting access to backup is great, though. Makes this life not so scary, having people to turn to, especially considering how capable some of them are."

There was no arguing that point. Even Alfred—such a strange name to put to the man she'd known all these weeks—had acknowledged the strength of the guild. That was why he'd taken pains to keep them busy. Finding herself suddenly helpless and in need of aid, Lozora was less dismissive of the notion than normal. "You may be right. Perhaps it's time I gave consideration to the benefits of working together." Turning down a new hallway, they were nearly to the stairs, which Lozora's leg was already groaning about.

"You should know up front, getting in isn't without risk. Some of tests can kill you, and even with the help of mentor, there's no promising you'll make it through.”

Lozora bit back a scoff only by necessity; she couldn't risk offending the person hauling her around. “I've been on the scene longer than this admittedly embarrassing situation might indicate. Normally, I'm quite a force to be reckoned with. The man was simply... anomalous.” Some metas were just too strong. The world didn't play fair, not every fight was winnable. Learning that early on was one of the keys to surviving in their world.

Round a new bend, only to find a pile of moaning bodies and huge, torn-out chunks of wall blocking the path. “Crap, looks like Medley or Bahamut got rowdy over here. We'll have to circle around.” Together, they continued back down the last hall, passing the turn-off to the blockade. There was another set of stairs at the far end of the building, made for fire emergencies. Not as spacious, but it would work, or failing that, a window could allow them to fly out.

Lozora was so lost in thoughts of escape, she didn't quite notice the way Hephaestus adjusted his grip on her, the same way he'd had to several times already. That this movement also shifted the position of his gauntlet ever so slightly was a detail that would have grabbed her attention on a day with less occupying her mind.

At last, they neared the edge of the hallway, one that would give them access to the outside. Lozora felt so thrilled, her leg even seemed to stop hurting for a moment. “Seems as if we're fr—”

The sound of blasting energy and sizzling flesh interrupted Lozora, followed swiftly by horrific pain rising out of what used to be the middle of her torso. She collapsed, already dying, yet kept conscious by her own damned durability, which even now struggled to save what was plainly lost.

“Like I mentioned, the guild sometimes gives mentors to new members. Some are better than others, and at first, I thought mine was a terrible fit. Still might be, on a technical level. But Fornax has been the only person consistently in my corner since a very long time ago, and we do share at least one core philosophy.” Hephaestus paused, looking right into the dying eyes of Lozora.

“Actions have consequences. You fucked with my mentor, which was bad, but understandable. Then you brought his kid into it. So you don't get to die in a grand battle or display. You don't deserve to face a living legend and fall by his hand. Your ending is here, led to a hallway far enough away that the capes wouldn't have arrived in time, even if they had heard the shot. Die alone, helpless, knowing you'll be forgotten, and understand that this is still getting off easy."

Hephaestus couldn't fathom what Ivan would have done in her place. Something more creative, and certainly more painful, but she was working with what she had. An energy beam at point-blank range left minimal room for delicacy. Didn't hurt to be safe, so Hephaestus headed back to a section where bodies were piled up. From one, she rooted around and produced a gleaming object, its sharpness flashing in the flickering hallway lights.

Who brought a machete to a meta-fight in the first place? Well, it wasn't like she had room to complain. This would make hauling out her second prize of the day much easier. Moving swiftly, Hephaestus hurried back to the corpse, already aware of the wicked work that awaited her.

The stream cut out just before Ivan turned away from the camera, forcibly reasserting control. That had been a dangerous dance. More than once, his darker impulses threatened to overwhelm the proceedings, but the staged nature of the pageantry helped Ivan keep his head straight. Having a pseudo-script kept his mind on the next task, prevented it from reveling in the pain of the moment.

Across the chamber, the giant doors parted to reveal Doctor Mechaniacal and Xelas, both of whom were splattered in some of the Wrexwrens' internal workings, though neither looked nearly as much of a fright as Ivan.

"How are we doing?" Ivan asked.

"Based on reports from the ground, the initial invasion waves broke against our shores as expected. Most have already been killed or captured. How well they're being treated depends on who snatched them up. There are a few still trying to go down in a blaze of glory, but mostly the AHC is now dealing with humans who sought to take advantage of the confusion."

Stepping in, Xelas added, "Plus, we blew up every ship in our solar system not originating from Earth, so there are no reinforcements to send."

"Which just leaves..." Ivan trailed off, looking up to the screen overhead. The Scralthor was retreating; there was no other possible interpretation of the situation. This massive beast was sent fleeing by the burning light coursing through the stars. In a very odd way, Ivan felt kinship with the creature. He knew that feeling, that fear, it was experiencing far too well. “Seems Lodestar has the Scralthor handled.”

“Which means she’ll soon turn her attention to Earth, and us, so we should be gone before then,” Doctor Mechanialcal suggested. “Anyone need to use the restroom before we get in the ship? Mostly looking at you, Fornax, as you’re the only flesh-and-blood body up here.”

It took some doing for Ivan to tear his eyes away from the screen. Seeing her like this stirred up a lot of memories, not that this was the appropriate time for any of them. Ivan yanked his gaze away, looking to his allies. “I’ll hold it somehow. It’s not like we’ve got a long trip.”

Together, the three of them hurried through the vessel, occasionally passing scenes of grim carnage telling the story of what happened to the ship’s remaining crew. Evidently, he hadn’t been the only one cutting loose up here. Ivan couldn’t even imagine what sort of havoc the guild as a whole had wreaked upon their targets.

No sooner was Doctor Mechanialcal’s ship safely out of range than the final Wrexwren vessel detonated, blast briefly lighting the sky before it became nothing more than a mass of floating wreckage. Some would make it to Earth, but the AHC had systems in place to break up any chunks that were too large, so they’d burn up one way or another. That would be the final reminder of the Wrexwren invasion: a bastion of debris that occasionally lit the sky when a piece tumbled into the atmosphere.

It was, to Ivan’s thinking, exactly the sort of memorial he wanted. A clear warning to any extraterrestrials who came calling of what they could expect from starting trouble with the planet called Earth.

Chloe’s eyes snapped open without warning, followed by her drawing a large gasp of air, despite the fact that she’d been breathing steadily the entire time. It was like she’d burst forth from a deep pool, blinking at the sudden onslaught of light and sound.

In seconds, Beverly was there, holding her friend steady by the shoulders in case of vomit.

It took a few seconds for Chloe to come all the way back, to leave that unreal place fully behind. She wasn't sure she succeeded, in truth. Something felt different from before, like she was more connected to whatever systems her power influenced. She worked hard to put that out of her mind for the moment, along with deeper concerns of what she'd seen. Chloe was neither cape nor villain, and had no serious desire to be either—at least, for the moment. Digging into the sorts of questions her vision raised would invariably drag her deeper into that world, so she simply chose to ignore it. Sometimes, the classic tactics were still the best.

Able to pay some attention to her surroundings, Chloe realized they weren't at the apartment, or a hospital. For a fleeting moment, she was seized with terror that Beverly, unaware of what else to do, had brought her to the guild. That notion was quickly dispelled. She didn't imagine the guild guest quarters to have a huge antique sewing machine, or pictures of family that bore a striking resemblance to Beverly.

"What happened? Where are we?"

"My guess on what happened is you used too much power in a short span of time. I don't think we've ever heavily cycled your sayings like that before—might be a toll, though you'd know better than me on that front." Beverly paused, looking around her surroundings as if seeing them for the first time. "As to where... I wasn't sure what to do with you. Everything seemed stable, but you wouldn't wake up. I figured step one was to get you somewhere safe, a place I could trust, then find someone to help once they wrapped up dealing with the invasion."

Loud noises came from some ways outside the door, a commotion of bustling and voices all yelling over one another, until a quiet one silenced them all. Beverly, looking more sheepish than Chloe had ever seen her, seemed to take that as a cue to press on. "I brought you to my family's house. A few of them have field medic training, in case you took a turn for the worse, and there are enough munitions to drive back an actual force of aliens, let alone the scraps wandering the streets."

Chloe was still moving sluggishly, like her energy couldn't catch momentum. Realizing where some of that juice might be flowing, she hurriedly switched her active saying. "A penny saved is a penny earned." The change wasn't instantaneous, but there was a change. Instead of her power flowing out of her like a sinking rowboat, it felt more akin to a giant jug, one where the overflow began to accumulate. While she wasn't suddenly bursting with gusto, the dull ache in her head did quickly vanish.

"Where are the others? Did everyone make it out okay?"

The pain that flickered across Beverly's face gave away the ending of her tale before the first word was spoken. "We won, in a way. But there was a price."

Before the conversation could spiral into the true depths of despair, noise rose from outside once more, this time closer to the door. Beverly looked from her patient to the room's entrance, visibly doing speedy mental math on how this would play out. "It wasn't Tori. I'll explain the rest later. For now, it looks like it's time to meet the family."

Perhaps on cue, the door burst open and nearly a dozen people poured through, all eager to meet Beverly's newest friend, and perhaps discuss why their kin had arrived in the shape of a flying dragon.

---

Chapter 125

---

Upon return to the guild, Ivan was both surprised and grateful to hear that Tori was waiting for him in his office. Pausing only long enough to call Janet, checking in to be sure his kids were safe, Ivan hurried to the designated meeting space, one he rarely had use for in these facilities. It wasn't as if Pseudonym welcomed many callers, or made efforts to. He truly hoped that wouldn't change now that Fornax had made a special appearance, but life had taught him the world was rarely so kind.

The first thing he noticed after walking through the door was the state of her armor: banged up, missing a gauntlet, and with more than a few pieces torn out, exposing bits of wiring. The second thing he noticed, which should have been the first, was the burlap sack oozing a green puddle on the corner of his desk.

"What... who is that?" Ivan had seen enough decapitated heads to know what they looked like when stuffed into a bag. Why one was on his desk was a genuine mystery, on the other hand. Tori had been expected to lay low during the invasion. If things turned messy, that would be understandable, but it didn't account for why she would bring a severed head to him like this.

"It's a thank-you present," Tori explained. "For everything you've done. For being around even after the mentorship ended and you didn't have to. For teaching me how to be a villain."

After a day like this one, Ivan had more or less run out of tolerance for things like cryptic hints. He opened the bag himself, stunned in confusion by the unexpected bolt of familiarity. “Lozora?” Ivan’s head shot up, looking Tori over in a brand new light. “How... Tori, did you kill her?”

“I had some help. Her employer pulled the oh-so-shocking double-cross and left her injured. I took advantage of her weakness and confusion, then blasted a hole through her middle. The head was easier to transport. Plus, it just felt right, considering the context.”

The context? Tori had no idea about the context this implied. Lozora was not some no-name minion. She’d been around for decades, and that was before being hurled into Rookstone. His former apprentice had just taken out an actual player in their game, the sort of move others would take note of, to say nothing of the allies who might come looking for payback.

“I see. Mind if I ask how, exactly, this is a present for me?” Troublesome as it all was, Tori was nothing if not rational. With everything she did, there was a reason. What remained to be seen was if it was a good one, or not.

Any traces of a smirk fell from Tori’s face as she looked back to the bag. “Her employer was the mystery man who set up that whole Starscout-labyrinth situation, and that green bitch was the trigger-woman. She’s the one who put Beth in danger.”

Whatever trains of thought Ivan had been engineering were instantly knocked off-track by that revelation. It changed a great many things about the circumstances, including how much fallout he would allow to get near Tori. Killing wantonly wasn’t something he’d wanted to encourage, but paying back what was owed? That was a different matter entirely. “Tell me everything.”

Which was exactly what Tori did, laying out the labyrinth voice’s cryptic hints, the visit from Nexus, the attack on her apartment, and the revelation regarding Alfred Settler, a tidbit which actually managed to draw surprise from Ivan when it was reached. She wrapped things up by explaining how the fight ended, quickly detailing her moment of thievery followed by tricking Lozora, then escaping. The only bits she may have skimmed over were those involving Chloe’s power, where possible.

“Damn.” As she spoke, Ivan had pulled some plastic wrap from in his desk, coating the head-bag and putting triple layers on his desk to prevent more general ooze drippage. “Some capes dying today was inevitable, but I’d have preferred all of the blame to be on the wiped-out aliens. At least this guy wasn't one of ours. If anything, we can cite our members who offered critical help in dealing with him."

"Did you know about him? Alfred Settler?"

Ivan finished cleaning the head juice and wiped off his fingers, exuding a moment of magic to burn his hands clean—not that the rest of him wasn't still coated in Zerle Salvrin's internal workings. From within his desk, he produced a bottle of fine liquor, one he reserved for special occasions. "I knew about Alfred Settler in the same way as everyone else: a piece of history that died in our new world's creation. The meta you're describing rings a bell. We crossed paths here and there—I once had to belt him to send a message, but I punched a lot of people in my heyday. He wasn't part of the Order of the Final Dawn, though, meaning I never had any reason to care beyond that."

"So you wouldn't know... or maybe, could make a guess..."

"I have no idea if he's alive or not," Ivan intervened, saving her from finding a way to ask the question without sounding afraid. Of course she was afraid. Tori was too smart to experience something like that and not better understand her place in the world. She was stronger than humans, yes, but in the world of metas, Hephaestus was still barely starting out. Understanding the difference between what power lay at the summit and how much she could muster would make anyone afraid. "Were I to guess, I'd say yes. Doesn't seem like the type to need air or food, and given the durability you've described, space alone may not finish the job. That said, while he might still be alive, Alfred has effectively been taken out."

From another drawer, Ivan produced a pair of glasses, setting them both down in succession. Tori watched the act, waiting until he was about to pour before speaking. "Just a sip for me. I've got more work after this."

With a nod, he poured her enough for one toast—all they would need. As he moved on to his own glass, which got substantially more, Tori continued, "How do you figure he's gone, if he might not be dead?"

"Between our respective run-ins and the general rumors I've heard of such a figure, he has no movement-based powers to speak of. No flight, no teleportation, nothing that would permit him to navigate the far reaches of space. If he is alive, he's stuck out there, waiting to be found. The only ones capable of such a feat are ourselves, and the Alliance of Heroic Champions. If they find him, he gets Lodestar. If we find him, he's going to wish the AHC had. Either way, won't be much of an issue."

There was an implied “for now” that neither chose to comment on. In a world like theirs, when reality was such a fickle enforcer, nothing could ever really be taken for granted—not until they were dead, like Lozora. That was the price of living in a world of miracles.

Shifting forward, Ivan set the less-filled glass in front of Tori, then lifted his own. “I didn’t know Presto, either as a cape or a person. In truth, he likely would have been an enemy in almost every circumstance imaginable. Yet today, his bravery and determination helped keep my former apprentice... my friend, safe. To Presto, one who deserved to chase the title of superhero.”

“To Ike.” Tori whispered the words, more to herself than to Ivan, before gulping down the single mouthful of liquor. It was excellent, yet horrible, for reasons that had nothing to do with flavor. “Okay, and with you brought up to speed, it’s time for both of us to go clean off. I need to meet with Doctor Mechanical in a few. This is the perfect chance to kick off our new project, and we’re not going to miss it. After that, don’t expect to see me around outside the lab for a bit.”

“Got new plans in mind?”

There was real danger in Tori’s smile, a look Ivan knew all too well. When faced with a power that much greater than themselves, most people’s reactions fell into one of three camps. The vast majority were scarred by it, forever made afraid by the knowledge that there were some limits they simply couldn’t overcome. Some took that pain and grew, however, resolving to be as strong as they could, to minimize how many times that gap would appear. Then there was the third group, the ones who saw how high the mountain stretched and were filled with one all-consuming notion: if they can be that strong, then so can I.

“Lots,” Tori confirmed. “It’s time for a updated model—past time, really. Especially now that I’ve got a lead on a new material. One that can stand up to the leagues I want to play in. A long road ahead on that front, though, so I’m jumping in as soon as possible. Not going to have as much free time pretty soon.”

Ivan watched as she set the glass back down, keeping it a healthy distance from the head-bag. “Care to elaborate?”

“Nah, it’ll be more fun to let you see with everyone else. Time for a shower, anyway.” Tori slowly pulled herself from the chair, suit not moving with the usual grace in its current condition.

“Before you go...” Ivan wasn’t quite sure how to phrase this. It had the potential to be taken wrong, but he and Tori generally understood one another fairly well. Sometimes, it was best to just plug ahead. “Tori, are you sure you want Hephaestus to be the one who killed Lozora? She is not unknown, nor without friends. I won’t deny you the glory you’ve earned, but there is much less baggage if Fornax did the deed. Otherwise, you should expect eventual consequences.”

“When the guild reopened, you asked me what kind of villain I want to be.” Tori’s eyes darted from the bag to her right hand, still clad in the killer gauntlet. “That head is my answer. I want to be the kind of villain people fear, because they should. The person no one dares to fuck with, knowing what awaits them. The world needs bogeymen, things to rightly fear. I want everyone to understand what happens to those who cross Hephaestus, or her guild.”

It was a path Ivan knew all too well, one he’d just recommitted himself to on intergalactic television; he had no room to cast judgment, no matter how much he wished she’d found a safer road to travel. But Tori Rivas didn’t want normality or safety, and only she could live the life that was best for her. Even if it meant one that might end up significantly shorter.

“Then we tell the truth. Hephaestus killed Lozora. Make sure that new suit is a good one, Tori. You will have enemies coming to test it.”

The first coherent thought Donald had was when the cocoa burned his tongue. That sharp jolt of pain finally yanked him from his reverie—a mix of injury, exhaustion, and emotional fatigue. By the time all of the other superheroes climbed free, the fight was over. Presto was gone, and the rest of the New Science Sentries were near inconsolable. Since then, Cyber Geek had been running on what felt like autopilot, forcibly putting one foot in front of the other.

Backup arrived eventually—they’d caused too much destruction to not get noticed—and from there, they’d all largely been swept into more experienced hands. He’d gotten some texts from Tori that they were evacuated, but safe, which left him with nothing to do except dwell on the fight they'd just had. On how, once again, he'd been ultimately useless when the threat turned severe.

The gruff voice in his ear might have caused him to leap right up, if the cocoa hadn't already brought him partially out of the fugue. "It wasn't your fault." Ren's rough hand fell on his back a moment later.

"How did you know?" Donald didn't even glance up from his Styrofoam cup. He couldn't stand the same zoned-out stares on the faces of the other capes in this area: a place for those who'd seen too much this night to decompress.

"Because Ren feels the same way, just like the rest of us." Lucy plopped down to his right, still clad in her costume, save only for the mask. "We're all aspiring superheroes. We all take too much responsibility when things go wrong. He's right, too. In this case, there was no victory to be had. Presto... he saved us."

Tears welled up in Donald's eyes. He'd barely even known Ike, but this was the first time he would be burying a fellow superhero. That fact alone was scary enough to draw the waterworks. "There might have been ways to escape."

"There weren't." Irene took the final spot near him, sitting closer than she normally preferred. "Not without risking innocent lives. Presto saw the chance to make a difference. He had the ability to matter, the opportunity to act, and the willpower to see it through. That's what it takes to be a superhero, if only for a moment. He made the hard call to keep us alive."

In a way, that was true, but largely by coincidence. The real people he'd been protecting were the New Science Sentries, none of whom were currently in the same room. Probably off for a debrief—the same treatment his team would be in for once they'd had a chance to recover. With the chaos of the day, everything had to be tackled in waves. The ones who needed more time were shuffled around to the end of the queue.

Last time he'd been in a real pinch, he'd made it through thanks to the power of his team. Today, it was thanks to another superhero, one who wouldn't be around to pitch in next time. Donald was tired of being saved, frustrated to feel like he was making progress only to hit one wall after another. Yet painful as it was, his other choice was to accept that weakness, to simply say that this was the league where he could play and leave it at that. Be left behind by the friends who were taking time to make sure he was all right, even after living through the same hell themselves.

He had to get stronger; only now, Donald was starting to understand that this wasn't some temporary condition. For as long as he lived in this world, he'd forever be climbing, striving, reaching just a bit higher, all in the hopes that the next time they hit a major threat, he'd be the one making a difference, not another person getting saved.

Presto had perished protecting them all. Next time, Cyber Geek wanted to make sure no one had to die. Not if he could become strong enough.

---

Epilogue

---

“I’d like to thank you all for being here today.”

That opening was the only traditional thing about the morning’s event, the strangest funeral Tori had ever attended, though she’d really only been to a few. None of those had been in bars, however, let alone ones rented out for private mourning. The others had also had dead bodies present; in the case of her parents, barely recognizable ones, but bodies all the same. While this was not a traditional funeral, it did feel fitting. Presto hadn’t really been a traditional cape.

“I put a lot of thought into what I could say about Ike Pemberton, whether I should lay more emphasis on the man or the mask to eulogize him properly. In the end, I realized that to honor my friend, there was only one clear choice: I have to emphasize the truth. Because almost above all else, Ike hated bullshit.”

Austin’s line drew a small chuckle from the audience, meager as it was. Aside from her, Beverly, and Chloe, all seated at one small table, the crowd largely consisted of the remaining New Science Sentries, Cyber Geek’s team, and a few strangers Tori didn’t recognize, along with one she very much did. As a newer cape, Presto had gotten little time to make an impression. The world would mourn their hero through the AHC’s public memorial and upcoming ceremony for all those lost in the invasion. Today was for those who knew the man beneath the moniker.

“That trait could make him abrasive, hard to work with, and even harder to befriend. It also kept him honest, upfront, and one of the few voices I could always trust to tell me when I was making a mistake. Ike valued truth over sentiment, and would hate nothing more than being held up as a saint just because he passed. Ike was our dear friend, and also an asshole much of the time.”

A loud sniff from Ellie in the front, though she was holding up better than Kyle, who was already crying openly. Some folks cracked smiles at the sudden swearing, but there were no titters this time. The moment no longer felt right for such mirth.

“I’m not going to stand here and tell you that Ike had the natural disposition of a superhero, that he was always fated to fight for the side of side of good. None of that. Yet even though he didn’t especially like them, he still used his power to help people. In the end, Ike passed us all up, going out in the most heroic way I could imagine, saving the rest of his team.”

Chancing a glance over her shoulder, Tori noted that the woman standing at the edge of the room wasn’t crying. The look on her face was more severe, almost guilty looking. There was no logical reason for the woman to wear such an expression, but Tori understood why it was there. This sort of failing probably always felt personal to her.

Standing at the bar, which they were treating as a makeshift podium, Austin lifted his glass, and the others followed suit. Tori wondered what the capes would say if they were to learn that the world’s most feared villain had lifted his glass to Presto in the same manner. Sadly, posing such a query would essentially be opening a case of worm-filled-cans, so some things had to remain a mystery.

“To Ike, a reminder that the seeds of true heroism can spring from any one of us, when defending what we love. I’m sorry you had to save us, and I promise we’re not going to waste the second chance you provided.”

An echo of “To Ike” rumbled through the bar as everyone tipped back a glass, toasting to the cape missing from the room. Since the invasion, apparently the AHC had begun scanning space, searching for Alfred or Presto’s remains. No luck so far, which was about as expected, given how much area they had to scour. It meant there was no corpse to lay to rest, however. Instead, they were gathered around one of Presto’s spare costumes, laid out artfully inside a glass case.

With Austin’s speech done, some of the crowd headed over to the bar for refills, while others trekked to the bathroom with relief in mind. As for Tori, she decided it was time for light mingling, making her way around to the back of the room where the lone figure had been watching from the shadows. Her target made no effort to escape, even as Tori drew close enough to speak softly.

“I didn’t think Ike warranted a personal appearance from Lodestar at his funeral.”

“He most certainly did. Unfortunately, when she shows up, the focus shifts from where it’s meant to be, so I’m here instead,” Helen replied. She wasn’t in a disguise, necessarily, though her outfit was more stuffy and professional than Tori would have expected, creating a different vibe altogether. Tori wondered if she’d have recognized Helen were she not in the know about her secret, and just how potent that identity cloaking of hers really was.

“Do you always go to cape funerals?”

“Not always. Job often gets in the way. All the ones I can though, yes. It’s the least I owe them.”

Did she really feel guilty over not being there for Ike? The woman had been battling a space monster intent on eating their sun, a fight that only she could have won, protecting the entire planet as a whole. Maybe that was what it cost to be so powerful; when you could do anything, it meant what you chose to save was all the more important.

“How have you been?” Helen broke Tori out of her reverie with a slight turn and a friendly smile. “With Starscout meetings temporarily suspended, we haven’t gotten to catch up in a couple of weeks. I was glad to see you made it through alive. Especially knowing what a good helper you can be to your friends.”

Her eyes darted pointedly to the rest of the room, making it clear she knew what Hephaestus had done but had no intent of airing that secret out here. It was bizarre, realizing Lodestar was keeping tabs on her. That was likely unavoidable, one of the encumbrances of being Fornax’s apprentice.

Thinking of Ivan made Tori uncomfortable. She had no idea how Lodestar reacted to the guild’s move against the Wrexwren. News outlets had called it horrific, unconscionable, an extreme overreaction. Tori, on the other hand, had gotten to see the results. It wasn’t as if the world had suddenly become a clean and sparkling utopia—there were still a great deal of criminals out there, all at varying degrees of morality. However, after Fornax’s appearance, the guild was suddenly deluged by debts being repaid and oaths of loyalty being reaffirmed. Most of the rule-skirting had thinned out quickly, helped along by the guild’s new commitment to enforcing their edicts. They would never be powerful enough to influence every action of every criminal, but they were once again a threat to be considered. Worse than before, in many ways. Under the old system, they'd been a rumor; now, they were fact.

"I've been okay. Mostly busy with work. In fact, I've got a big event later today. Thankfully, they didn't set this at the same time."

"Glad to hear it," Helen replied. She rummaged around in her pocket, producing a small white card. "In all our time together, I don't think I ever gave you my number. Shoot me a call if you need anything, Tori. Even just perspective or guidance."

Despite an initial wave of hesitation, Tori accepted the card. Odd as it might be, having direct access to Lodestar was not something she was dumb enough to pass up. There might well come a day when that phone call saved her life, or the lives of her friends. "Holding out hope I'll switch over?"

"Let's just say that I think anyone willing to put their lives on the line in a fight that isn't even theirs has superhero potential. You can call about other issues, too." She checked her watch, then noted that the official part of the funeral seemed to have wrapped up with the speech. "As for me, time to get back to it."

Tori was mostly braced for the hug farewell—she'd gotten accustomed to Helen enough after their few weeks together—though it was still bizarre knowing who had their arms around her. After pocketing the card, she turned to find Kyle walking over, a pair of beers in hand.

"Do I see Tori making new friends of her own free will?" He handed over the spare drink as he arrived, which Tori accepted. In truth, it was hard staying sober at this event, not only because of the palpable sadness in the air. The timing couldn't have been worse. After working so hard to get things ready so fast, their big premiere had to come on the day of Ike's farewell.

"More like making small talk." Tori instantly realized she should have come up with a better lie—by this point, Kyle knew she hated that sort of chitchat—but the words were already out, so she took a long drink to cover them. "How are you holding up?"

At her question, he paused to wipe his shining cheeks. The tears had halted, but their effects remained. "Good as can be expected. The AHC was able to mend my injuries, so at least I'm not out a job, too, but losing Ike was a bigger blow than any of us were prepared for. Doesn't help that Professor Quantum already wants to start interviewing replacements."

That did seem soon, after little more than a week and change. Then again, how long was a superhero team expected to operate a member down? Getting a replacement might be safer, not that Tori was quite socially inept enough to voice such a notion.

"I'm not sure if I ever said this or not, but I wanted to come over and apologize," Kyle continued, halting only for a healthy sip of his own drink. "Our team was the reason you all got put in danger. They were using you to draw us out." A dark laugh slipped past his lips. "It seems like every other time we talk, it's me apologizing for putting you in danger."

"Yeah, seems about right," Tori agreed. "Maybe you should stop."

The words hit like she'd kneed him in the groin, so Tori hurried to elaborate. "Stop apologizing. You fucked up once and got me exposed, there's no sugarcoating that, but it was only once. Everything the world does following that isn't on your shoulders."

"Be that as it may, we're not going to let it happen again. When the apartment building is repaired, we won't be there. Another team can take over protective detail, one with less baggage of their own, inherited or otherwise."

Had this news come on any other day, there was a good chance Tori would have leapt upon it. A chance to be free of the New Science Sentries, with no suspicion on her in the process? But today wasn't that day. Not with what they'd lost, and with the twist of the knife she knew was still coming. She couldn't steal this, too.

"Look, the water takes forever to get warm, our front door lock sticks, and people keep pissing in the alley out back, but it's not that bad of a place to live. No need to go running back to your fancy superhero lair just like that."

"Tori, I meant—"

"I got what you meant. You want to move to keep me safe. Well, guess what: I'm not safe. Because the world isn't safe. Shit happens, human or meta, and we all do our best to muddle through. You want to leave, by all means go ahead, just don't do it for me. Live where you want to live, how you want to live."

This time, the drink nearly drained half of Kyle's glass. "Maybe it's just because of where we are, but that almost sounds like something Ike would say.”

“He was a smart guy, when he wanted to be.” Tori checked her own watch, realizing that time was nearly up. Crap. She’d wanted to talk to Donald, too, give him a proper warning. “Listen, I have a meeting to get to. Sorry to duck out early.”

“No, we understand. The perils of holding it on a weekday. Just when we could get the time; things have been crazy since the invasion.” Between rebuilding, missing persons, and general chaotic fallout, Tori could imagine how thin the capes were spread at this point. The world was steadily coming back together, though. That was the silver lining of surviving multiple worldwide catastrophes: humanity was getting adept at bouncing back.

Tempting as it was to bolt on that, Tori had to say something; otherwise, it would go over even worse. “Before I head out, I wanted to let you know... look, Kyle, I think of you guys as friends. Ellie, Austin, Donald, Kyle—those people. Not the masks you wear. Keep that division in mind, and please believe me when I say none of it is personal.”

“What does that mean?” Kyle said, noting the way she was already edging toward the door.

“You’ll see. And this time, for what it’s worth, I’m the one who’s sorry.”

Sitting outside the house, Rick thought the day was too nice. This wasn’t how the world was supposed to feel after horrific revelations. It was expected to be gloomy, drab, morose, tainted by the new perspective he’d obtained. Instead, there was sunshine and mild winds, a perfect final day before fall’s true onslaught. The world didn’t care that everything had changed for him. It just went right on turning how it pleased.

A slam of a car door jolted him into the moment, one brief warning sign before Beth came scampering up the drive, clad in a hat with a stuffed shark on it. Not far behind was Ivan, Rick’s father and a homicidal villain who’d tortured a sentient being on live television, only to eventually crush his head. If only those were separate entities, instead of being crammed all into one body.

“We missed you at the aquarium today. They had some new exhibits, one last big event before school restarts.”

Ivan sat down next to him on the bench, one Janet had picked up years ago and restored to sit outside her home. Or had it been stolen from a dead superhero’s lair? Rick really had no idea how much of what he thought to be true actually was, save for some points he’d have much rather lacked clarity on.

“I wasn’t feeling up to it.”

“That’s what your mother said.” Ivan sat there, listening closely as Beth dashed through the house, on a direct track for the bathroom after getting a whale-sized soda. He waited until he was sure she’d left earshot. “You figured it out.”

“Is it that obvious?” Rick wasn’t sure what words were coming out of his mouth next, nor why he’d waited out here in the first place. Things had spun so far out of control, he barely understood his own thoughts at this point, let alone actions.

Slowly, Ivan nodded. “Frankly, yes, but I knew it was just a matter of time. You’ve got too much of your mother’s wiles to not put the pieces together eventually. There is more to the story than you know, than my old reputation would let on. Though it doesn’t change what I did, nor excuse it. I am a man who has lived a strange, terrible, occasionally wonderful existence, and I own every choice within that life. Including last week’s display.”

“Display?” The word got choked halfway through, like even his own throat couldn’t believe that that’s what Ivan was calling it. “I watched my dad beat someone to the brink of death, make them get down and beg to live, then kill them anyway. I don’t... what the hell am I supposed to do with that? With who you really are?”

“Make peace with it, or reject me from your life entirely. Those are my guesses for how this eventually goes,” Ivan replied. Still calm and steady, same as he’d always been. Except now, Rick knew how deep those still waters ran, and what sorts of terrors were waiting down below.

Could he do that? Kick his dad entirely out of his life? It was entirely viable, given his age and his mother’s awareness of the situation; Rick just wasn’t sure he had it in him. Because on top of the images of Fornax wreaking havoc, he couldn’t stop seeing flashes of Ivan, of his dad. Nights spent on homework, working as a chaperone on school trips, offering support and guidance wherever possible. Rick's father was a rock in his life, something he'd always counted on, and the idea of losing it scared him nearly as much as knowing about Fornax. "Would you be okay with that, if I did reject you?"

"Okay with it?" The calm demeanor cracked, and for a flash, Rick could see just how deeply hurt the idea of that left Ivan. "It would break my heart losing even a piece of you. To be cast out entirely would leave a wound no meta-human or monster could ever dream of matching. No, I would never be okay with it, but I would respect your choice. I grew up being forced at every turn, chained to my destiny. Your life is yours, and if I'm no longer welcome in it, then it's on me to deal with that fact. I did my best as a father, but sometimes, the past refused to stay buried."

"You're the one who dug it up. Who went on TV, who wore that mask... Fornax was gone. Supposedly dead long enough that he was more legend than history. You brought him back, Dad."

Sounds from inside betrayed that Beth was done, and Ivan didn't want to be lingering on this conversation if she popped back out for a second goodbye hug. Best to be heading out, anyway; his day wasn't finished yet. "Yes, I did. A choice I made; one I don't regret. Because even if you never understand why, Ivan had just as much reason to be in that fight as Fornax. They were coming for our planet, threatening my children."

Another break in the calm; however, this wasn't a flash of pain. Instead, Rick saw his father's determination laid bare, and even a glimpse of that was staggering. Staggering, and ferocious. There was no limit in that gaze, only absolute will. Whatever was demanded of him to keep them safe, Ivan would rise to the occasion, even if he had to stand on Fornax's shoulders to do it.

"Oh yeah, that's what I feel right now. Overwhelmingly safe."

Ivan rose to his feet, departure imminent. "When you look at the stars, are you afraid of what might be out there? Given that a previously unknown sentient race tried to invade us barely more than a week ago, it would make perfect sense."

To that, Rick said nothing. He realized the answer in his heart, as did Ivan, but speaking it was a step further. Instead, he managed to shake his head, just barely.

"No. Because you know the monsters that any aspiring invaders will have to get through first. And now, so does the rest of the galaxy. It will break me to lose you from my life, Rick, but understand that no matter how things go between us, I will never stop keeping you safe, protecting you, and loving you. None of the powers, title, accomplishments—nothing in that world matters more to me than you and Beth.”

“Then why did you choose to resurrect Fornax?” Rick demanded.

“He was necessary, and though it would make my life somewhat easier, I truly hope you never have to understand why.” Ivan started to go in for a hug out of habit, then halted when he caught Rick’s stiffened posture. “If you ever have questions, want to know more, or want to just talk, I’ll answer them honestly. No more secrets worth hiding, not after that one. Until then, I’ll give you space to think.”

Ivan didn’t look back as he walked to his car. It was a silly point of pride, but he loathed to let anyone see him cry.

“Are you sure? The results keep ending up the same.” Beverly stared at her friend, concern evident on her face.

She and Chloe were alone in their apartment, despite the building still undergoing repairs. A huge tarp still clung to the side of the brick complex, even as people came and went through the front door. It was incredible, the speed with which their home was being rebuilt. Only two nights in a hotel were needed, then they’d been able to move back in to their miraculously untouched apartment. Several areas were closed off, and obviously, the owner of the room where the New Science Sentries had fought Alfred Settler was going to take a lot longer for repairs, but other than the steadily shrinking hole in the building’s side, Beverly was amazed at the rate of their home’s recovery. Amazed to the point of suspicion, in fact. Since Thuggernaut assured her that the guild wasn’t gassing things along, her current guess was that the AHC was speeding the process through for the sake of the New Science Sentries.

“Only from your side,” Chloe replied. “I can feel myself making progress. Not as much as I might like, but every time we do it, I hold out a little longer.”

“And that’s worth the migraines?” The skepticism on Beverly’s face made it clear how she felt, especially as the one who had to carry Chloe’s unconscious body every time. “You really want access to dragon forms that badly?”

Looking away, Chloe chewed her lower lip for a few seconds, mulling over the question. “It isn’t about your powers, specifically; they just happened to be the right setup I needed. Something out of reach, but not by an impossible amount. What I’m really trying to figure out is if I’m capable of growth. Can I get better, my power stronger, or is this what I’m working with for the rest of my life?”

“Be certain that’s a rabbit hole you want to go down. The stronger you get, the harder it is to stay on the sidelines,” Beverly cautioned.

This time, Chloe didn’t need consideration time for her response. Instead, she lifted the pink and black umbrella resting at her side. “I accidentally killed someone in my first real fight, when I got this souvenir. Then, it managed to block an attack from the otherwise unstoppable bone-guy, pissing him off in my direction. Whether I like it or not, sometimes this is a dangerous world, and I’m not going to ignore my power when it could help save my life or that of someone I care about. Still no desire to do that professionally, I’m just tired of feeling helpless on the sidelines. If I’m going to use this power, then I have to be able to control it, maybe one day even understand how it works. All which is to say... yes, I think figuring out growth potential is worth the migraines, even if it does cause me more trouble down the line.”

Worried as Beverly was, she couldn’t find much fault in Chloe’s logic. With everything that had happened, it was no wonder she didn’t want to feel helpless, to her power or the strength of others. Besides, the truth of the matter was that this was now the second time having Chloe around might well have saved her life, the first being that same fight where Chloe had distracted the umbrella’s original owner. Without her helping Tori on the gauntlet, drawing Alfred’s fury to Plasmodia and causing Presto to make the ultimate sacrifice, Beverly genuinely wasn’t sure if any of them would still be alive.

More than that, though, she realized Chloe’s sentiment echoed her own. Fighting Alfred had been a stark reminder of how far behind the meta-curve all of them were in the grand scheme of things. Beverly herself had begun experimenting again, attempting to draw out new dragon forms without luck. Knowing her own frustration, she didn’t have it in her to refuse someone else the chance to make progress.

At last, Beverly relented. “Fine, but only just the once. Last time we went for two, your nose started bleeding.” She walked over, sitting down on the couch next to Chloe, who was already propped up carefully with her back braced on cushions.

Taking deep breaths, Chloe centered herself and looked Beverly in the eye. “Anything you can... do...” Her eyes were attempting to take on the sharp green of a dragon’s iris, warping and flexing, shifting in place, yet unable to stabilize. “I... can—” Chloe’s shifting eyes snapped shut as she collapsed backwards into the cushions, passed out on the spot.

It was the result Beverly had been expecting, the same one they’d gotten every time Chloe tried this since the day of the invasion. A phrase that let her copy someone’s capabilities—not just their power, but something like Tori’s talent for mechanics—was incredibly powerful, and Beverly had been as eager as her friend to see someone else take on a dragon form. Unfortunately, it appeared there were some limits in place as to how much Chloe could handle. Someone who could do a single phase-shift was evidently not as draining as turning into a multi-formed magical shifter. Or perhaps it was something to do with their power sources. As Tori had put it, “With only two points of data to consider, any conclusion we draw is basically a glorified guess.”

But the activity hadn’t been entirely a waste. As Chloe’s training partner for this exercise, Beverly had kept careful track of just how far into that saying she could get before losing consciousness. Although Beverly hadn’t been sure at first, today was the first time she found real certainty in her observations. Chloe had been squeaking ahead a syllable at a time, and today, she got out a full word further than she had on their first try.

It might take a tremendous amount of time and effort, but she had a hunch that Chloe was indeed capable of growing stronger. Beverly wasn’t sure if she was more curious or terrified to see what that power could do when fully realized, but she was damn glad it was in the hands of a friend rather than those of an enemy. Fists and fangs, even strength like Alfred’s, she could wrap her head around. The power to do near anything, assuming one could find the right words—that was truly terrifying.

Ivan and Tori were together backstage, waiting for the call. There was no technical reason for him to be present. The project was publicly between Wade and Tori, secretly between Doctor Mechaniacal and Hephaestus—neither situation called for Ivan’s talents. No, there was no need for him to be here, but after everything they’d gone through, Tori and Ivan no longer felt much requirement to justify their presence around one another. He was her teacher, her friend, and in some ways would always be her mentor. Given how long Tori had been entirely on her own, it was nice to feel like she finally had someone to lean on.

“Nervous?” He knew it was a silly question, one asked purely for the sake of talking. Tori’s pacing through the room made her emotional state plenty clear without any words needing to be spoken.

“Terrified,” she admitted. “The hell was I thinking? I can’t go on camera. On live TV, at that. I come off as surly with just normal socializing—add in nerves and I’ll probably call the host a pig-fucker or something.”

With minor effort, Ivan smothered a chuckle before it could reach his lips. “Give yourself a little credit. You’re not the same thief with an attitude problem Wade put in front of me. Over the months, you’ve grown exceptionally well into your civilian identity, even getting along with our most mundane of coworkers. Besides, the hard part was shot last week, and editing can make anyone charming. All you have to do is go out there with Wade and do the introduction. After that, everyone’s focus will be on the screens.”

“Uh huh. See, I know that rationally, but the twisting nerves in my stomach just refuse to listen to reason.” Tori glared down at her own stomach, as if angry at her body for not being more stalwart. “Let’s talk about something else. Any news on Presto or Alfred?”

Solemnly, Ivan shook his head. Considering that the cape’s death had saved two of the guild’s own members, it was deemed appropriate to use some resources to search for Presto’s remains, as well as the potentially still-living Alfred Settler. Ivan was a man who believed in repaying debts, both the positive and the negative. He owed both of those men proper burials, though one might take more work to prepare for the grave.

“Figured that was a long shot. How about Lodestar? Have you heard anything?”

“Still haven’t been able to get in touch. She’s been busy helping put the world back in order. I imagine whatever fate she has planned for me, or should I say, Fornax, she'll get to it when time permits." Ivan resisted touching his phone, checking for a text or phone call that he knew wouldn't be there. Thus far, he'd only gotten one commination from Helen, a single text reading "We'll talk later" and nothing more.

Tori's pacing slowed momentarily. "Fornax's fate? The hell are you talking about? You fought back an alien invasion, put yourself at risk to keep the entire world safe, and covered the AHC's ass in the process. Hell, you even praised their leader for the world to see. What are they going to charge you with, defending the Earth?"

"In the eyes of the law, I've done no wrong," Ivan agreed. "But Lodestar is not the law. Her power is far beyond such human concepts and limitations. I think now, at last, you all better understand that."

The flash of terror in Tori's eyes told him she was remembering the same sight that the rest of the world had seen play out on video screens billions of times since the invasion. Although no one knew where the recording had come from, thanks to Wade's technological adeptness, a mysteriously high-res video of Lodestar's triumph over the space monster began circulating before the invasion day was even finished. Ivan had spent too long being the only one who truly understood just how strong Lodestar was; it was nice to have company in that existential dread.

"Yeah, that was... well, impossible seemed to capture it best." Tori hesitated, her curiosity and fear battling with one another over the prospect of more information. In the end, as it always did, her curiosity took the upper hand. "Can she really do anything?"

"Not anything," Ivan corrected quickly. "There are a few limits we've learned through the years. She's bad with intangible enemies, can't travel through the multiverse, and at the end of the day, she's still only one person, with all the limitations that implies. However, if she truly believes in what she's doing, that she's in a fight that must be won, then she will triumph. That's why I live in fear of the day Helen no longer wears that title."

Her pacing had come to a total stop as Tori grew more invested in the conversation, her focus helping to settle her nerves quite a bit in the process. "About that. I get that you like Helen, and so do I, but you've said the power passes on. We'd still have a Lodestar, right?"

"Yes, we would, and they would be a force of good—the power always seeks a suitable host. That said, what is and isn't 'good' has many subjective pieces. We've scanned the multiverse time after time for various reasons, and while every person who carries that power is on the side of the capes, they don't always share Helen's sense of empathy and compassion. To put it bluntly... now that you understand just how powerful Lodestar really is, that none of us could stand against her, how many people do you know that you would trust with that strength? With that level of unchecked, absolute power keeping watch on the world? Because for me, the answer is exactly one."

Tori's anxious energy dissipated as she sat heavily on the couch across from Ivan, a thousand-yard stare settling down in her eyes. "Now that, I get. A more authoritarian Lodestar could reshape our whole world in a matter of years, especially with the AHC at their disposal."

"Precisely. Add in that Helen is an actual friend, and you can see my concern, admittedly misplaced as it is. Even among the Lodestars of the other worlds, Helen is exceptional." Ivan should know. He'd been there when she bucked the system and broke the rules—except, that wasn't really how it worked for Lodestar. She didn't break the rules. Even when she thought she did, it was far scarier than that. Lodestar changed the rules, sometimes without even realizing she'd done it.

Tori leaned forward in her seat, pushing the couch cushion to a precarious edge. "Why is that?" Most in the guild would have let the cryptic statement hang, but Tori's love of learning easily outpaced any sense of respect for unspoken secrets. Luckily, she was clued in enough that he could give her part of the answer.

"A few factors, but the most important of which is her bonds to other people. This is, admittedly, some speculation, but I believe Lodestars are designed to slowly lose their connections to the world they protect. As time goes on, the job wears them down, the burden of that power becomes too heavy to bear. Being the absolute strongest is a lonely proposition, especially when the whole world counts on you. Slowly, they lose the fire to fight, and the next time they're pushed, the power moves on, finding a fresh host filled with the desire to make a difference. Even Helen had some rough patches along the way, but she managed to stay connected to friends, enemies, and some who fall in the middle. She's held her sense of self for an already impressive amount of time, which let her grow into the power more than most. But all of that was just the warm-up, because very few Lodestars have children. She didn't even think it was possible for decades."

“With Penelope in the mix, there’s no way Helen will run out of will to fight,” Tori realized. Unfortunately, she also had the mind of a villain, as well as someone who’d recently seen the depths some criminals would stoop to. “That also makes the kid a vulnerability, though. If anything happened to Penelope, would Helen be able to hold on?”

There wasn’t an easy answer for that, so Ivan didn’t try to give one. “I’ve no idea, and have worked very hard over the last few years to not find out. That is not a version of Helen, or Lodestar, I ever want to see.”

Leaning back into her couch, Tori let out a long breath. “Well, that’s sure not going to keep me up at night or anything. Thanks for the eventual existential crisis, Ivan.”

“You could always look on the bright side,” he suggested.

“Which is?” Tori’s words were barely out before the knock at the door brought her jerking back to the reality of the situation, just in time to see the wily smirk on Ivan’s face.

“I took your mind off the stage fright, didn’t I?”

The gun clattered onto the concrete, knocked away by a barely seen blur as it whipped by, seconds before a powerful blow knocked the crew’s muscle two feet off the ground before landing, visibly dazed. With their muscle pushed back, the others were exposed. They turned toward the street, hoping to find some passersby that might serve as makeshift human shields. None were within reach, and as the blur did a sweep around the perimeter of the bank, they realized that was no coincidence. The New Science Sentries hadn’t just been drawing fire. Tachyonic was clearing civilians every time they were distracted.

Agent Quantum walked up to their stunned brick of meta-muscle and executed a simple trip, sending him to the ground without inflicting any more damage than necessary. Half the crew tried to make a break for it, only to have the ground in front of them sear and bubble as burning hot beams of focused energy tore forth from Plasmodia. There was no getting away that easily, not unless they were willing to take their chances on her aim, which didn’t really have to be that good to hit under these conditions.

The blur stopped next to Agent Quantum, marking the first time in the fight Tachyonic had slowed down enough to be seen. “Area is clear. No civilians left to be in danger.”

“Good job. That means we can wrap things up.” Agent Quantum looked over the crew, many of whom were still reared up and spoiling for a fight, not content to be taken out so easily by some rookie team with a spotty record. Eyes flicked to Plasmodia, guarding the rear, and Tachyonic, always at his side. The missing presence pained him. No taunting voice or vanishing form. Perhaps that was why the words found their way to his tongue and felt strangely right perched there. Agent Quantum wasn’t especially prone to improvisation, but he knew when to listen to his heart.

“New Science Sentries...” Despite the ache in his soul, Agent Quantum’s mouth still twisted into a smile as the words broke free, a moment he liked to think Ike would have appreciated. “Time for the Big Finish.”

“Isn’t that Tori?”

Lucy’s voice startled Donald. The team had been largely silent for the last hour, seated in the general AHC facilities, mentally recovering from Presto’s funeral. The New Science Sentries were already back on patrol—everyone handled grief in their own way, and it seemed that team was the type to work through it. As for Donald’s group, they had no pressing business, and after a morning of heavy workouts all around, had simply fallen into a state of rest, save for Ren, who was doing pushups in the corner next to Irene reading her book.

Only Lucy had been paying much attention to the communal television, set to a local news station in case of emergency information being broadcast. Donald had appeared to be napping, though he was in fact cycling through his lists of items and games, trying to find something that might have helped in the battle with Alfred Settler. It had become his new hobby, or a reincarnation of his previous one. Before the powers and items, Donald was just a guy who loved gaming, and one component of that was loss. Failure was part of games; it was why they had multi-life mechanics. But he’d yet to find any item trustworthy enough to bet a self-resurrection on, which meant he had to make sure to learn his lessons well when he was lucky enough to survive. He'd keep digging until he found a viable strategy. Even if Settler was gone, there were other dangerous threats out there—no reason a sound tactic couldn't be used elsewhere.

Pausing the programs with an opening of his eyes, Donald realized that Lucy was right, that was indeed Tori on the screen. The subtitles were a few seconds behind, so he missed the initial context. It seemed like she was being interviewed in a nice place, lots of natural light and gleaming fixtures. When the camera cut away, it was to a genial face framed by a fading hairline of copper. Donald nearly fell back in his chair. What in the hell was Tori doing on the news with famous billionaire Wade Wyatt?

Hopping up from his seat, he darted over to the side table near Irene, where the remote was sitting, quickly turning up the volume. His movement also got Irene and Ren's attention, both of them taking note of a familiar face on the screen. Finally, Donald found the sound button and clicked it.

“—which is what inspired me to reach out through the corporate chain and speak to Mr. Wyatt,” Tori finished. She was clearly nervous, though not rattled, voice surprisingly calm and steady despite her body's occasional fidget.

The screen cut back to the reporter, a generic, handsome face Donald couldn't have picked out of a news anchor lineup. “Is it standard policy for the company's owner to hear out such requests from employees?”

Another cut, this time to Wade Wyatt, who was in no way showing the slightest bit of unease. He looked as if he'd been born on camera, a genial grin fixed in place and a sparkle of brilliance shining from his eyes. “As a matter of fact, Indigo Technologies and all subsidiaries have many programs for advancement that self-starters like Tori have used to get attention on their excellent ideas, though her case was indeed special. Learning what one of our employees went through, I reached out to see if there was anything she needed that we could provide. And lo and behold, what does she say? Not a request for more time off, or even a joke about hazard pay. No, Tori Rivas took that opportunity and told me she didn't want this to happen again. More than that, she had ideas for how to make a difference, if I was willing to listen.”

Tori looked almost sheepish as the camera returned to her for a few seconds, circling around to Wade Wyatt once more soon after. “I think we've teased this out enough, don't you? Let's let Tori tell us, in her own words, about the new product line from Indigo Technologies."

"The hell is all this?" Irene had closed her book, getting up from the chair just as the interview cut out, switching over to prerecorded footage.

"Genuinely no idea," Donald replied. The screen was currently showing footage of Tori's kidnapping, the event that had catapulted her right into the public's eye after Tachyonic gave her the initial bout of exposure. Watching the attack on his friend hurt, filling Donald with a desire to show those jerks what-for, if any of them were still alive.

The clip didn't show it all, just the highlights, as Tori's voice began to play. "My name is Tori Rivas, and if you know me, it's as the woman who recently got snatched off the streets of Ridge City— despite me having training." The clip showed Tori's attacks to the kidnappers' joints, brutal and accurate as she made them work for their prize. "Despite the crowds nearby." A new angle, flashing on the multitude of bystanders who'd stood idly by as the fight took place, some even having produced their phones. "Despite all of this happening in the Alliance of Heroic Champions' same neighborhood." Now the shot was of a sweeping view of the city, giving context for the few blocks that separated Tori's point of abduction from the home base of what was supposed to be the greatest superhero organization in the world.

Tori was on-screen again, but not in cobbled-together found-footage, nor as the stiff woman giving a live interview. This was still prerecorded, and apparently, with enough time and takes, she could manage to smother her discomfort. She looked right down the barrel of the camera, expression bordering on severe. "We live in a dangerous world. A world where the balance of power swings wildly from person to person, and often, there's no telling who, or what, you're up against until it's too late. While we appreciate the help of superheroes and their organizations, there's no denying the fact that they can't save everyone. In light of the recent invasion, that has become all the more clear."

"What is she talking about?" Ren was no longer working out, a true testament to how attention-grabbing Tori's interview was. "We fought the Wrexwren back on the first wave."

"We won," Lucy agreed, a touch of melancholy in her tone. "Just not for free. Innocents still died, people lost their loved ones. The big victory doesn't always seem so worth it when you're the one who has to pay the price."

Much as Donald felt like he should ask more about that, Tori was speaking again, and this wasn't a situation where he wanted to miss the details.

She was standing now, walking forward down a white hallway. "What you might not know about me is that I'm more than the internet's favorite damsel of the moment. I'm also an inventor, a problem solver. So, after experiencing that terror for myself, I decided that next time would be different. And thanks to the generous support of Indigo Technologies, we've been able to make that ambition into a reality."

A podium appeared in frame as she kept walking, holding what appeared to be a handbag and collection of accessories. Tori scooped up the bag, showing it off to the camera. Under her breath, Donald heard Lucy whisper "So cute!", probably without realizing she'd spoken aloud.

"This was our starting point, the product launching this week, from which we've already grown. A seemingly simple purse capable of releasing a toxin that will render all but the most powerful of metas incapable of action while you make your escape. It's also compliant with all federal regulations for self-defense weaponry, and specifically engineered to keep it from being used by even the most fashionable of criminals."

Her hand wandered now, tapping on a few of the featured accessories. "A small preview of some upcoming options we think you'll find especially useful: video-recording earrings with remote cloud storage for evidence, lipstick that can create incredibly painful dermal abrasions, watches with sonic charge capabilities—an entire arsenal hidden in plain sight. If you're like me, if you feel the same fear of this world's dangers, then you don't just want a weapon. You want an armada, an ambush waiting in your hand for the next time someone decides you look like an easy target."

Gesturing to the display, Tori graced the camera with her first real smile of the whole spectacle. "With great pleasure, I'm honored to announce Indigo Technologies' newest line: the Rivas Personal Defense System. Because it's about time we were allowed to save ourselves."

Ivan hadn't been sure what to expect from the knock at his door. Most people who knew this address would also be the type to reach out before heading over. Of course, the surprise made more sense when Ivan saw who was standing on the other side. After over a full week of radio silence, some conversations needed to be done in person.

"Helen," he greeted, looking around his townhome's entrance courtyard to see if there were any other people to overhear. "Would you like to come in?"

"Sorry, can't stay for long." She rummaged around in her purse, producing a small stack of pages and handing them over. "Just came to give you these. Congratulations, Ivan, your sentence as a Starscout leader has officially come to an end. When the cluster reopens, they'll have new, permanent staff for the kids. I already vetted everyone myself. There won't be a repeat of the Haywood incident."

Moving without thinking, Ivan accepted the papers, unfolding them to reveal exactly what had been described—an official notice from the Starscouts thanking him for his time and explaining the leadership handoff process. "Thank you. Stability will be good for Beth, especially after all the excitement."

"Of course. Any child welcome means any child welcome, and so long as that organization uses my likeness, they're going to uphold that tenet." Helen looked him over, not quite able to hide the awkwardness that now lay between them.

Tempting as it was to let her walk away while the mood was still polite, Ivan couldn't permit the moment to pass. He had no idea when the next chance might arrive. "About the other stuff..." he began, before Helen put a single hand on his chest.

"Ivan, I have always known who you are, and what you're capable of. Do you really think you need to explain this to me, of all people? That I don't already know it was for your kids, yes, but also about maintaining order the only way you knew how. I think, deep down, maybe even a little bit of you thought it was for me, saving me the trouble of working toward peace with invaders that had no taste for it. I understand your reasoning. I just... can't accept it."

"The world is safe," Ivan pointed out.

"At what cost?" Helen looked up, and he realized that her eyes were watering. "Even beyond the loss of life you caused, did you ever think that maybe there were things beyond this planet worth knowing about? Technologies, medicines, new ways of living we could benefit from, all of which are likely lost to us now, because you just painted Earth as a backwater hellpit that no sensible species would come within a hundred lightyears of.”

He nodded, already aware of the effect such a message would have. “A necessary risk to ensure our planet is left undisturbed.”

The hand against his sternum turned into a finger, poking him roughly. “Because you decided it should be that way. You made that choice for all of humanity, for untold generations to come. That wasn’t your right to decide.”

“Forgive me if I have trouble taking that critique from you.”

The tears were fading fast now as anger began to outpace sadness on Helen’s emotional spectrum. “Do you think I sought those choices out? That I ever wanted to make them? I am tormented daily by the fears that I made the wrong decisions along the way and set something in motion to doom us all. But at least I was trying to think of everyone when I made them. All you were thinking about was yourself, about the kind of world you wanted. Congratulations, Ivan. You got your way.”

Her rage petered out toward the end. Fury was never Helen’s strong suit, unless she was truly motivated, and on those occasions, even Ivan ran for cover. Part of him wanted to reach out to her, yet once again that day, Ivan felt the distance separating them keenly.

“Helen, I did what I thought was necessary to keep the world safe. I’m sorry if you don’t agree with my methods, but the low body counts alone speak to how efficient it was.”

“I know you did, Ivan. Like I said up front, I’ve always known who you are,” Helen said, a distinct tinge of sadness unmistakable in her voice. “It had just been so long, I guess I let myself pretend otherwise.” The sigh from Helen was long, as her hand finally moved away from his chest. “Even if you break a chocolate bar in half, it still has the same calories.”

A fear unlike any Ivan had experienced in battle gripped his heart. “What does that mean?”

“It means that you and I are a pair of unlikely friends. Best friends, sometimes, when things aren’t so complicated. After everything we’ve gone through with and for one another, I don’t see that changing quite so easily. But you also reminded me why that’s the most we can ever be, no matter how nice these last few weeks have been.”

She didn't need to explain herself any more than that; not to him. He too had been enjoying their temporary partnership, a facsimile of domestic life that perhaps other versions of them could have enjoyed. Unfortunately, no matter how Ivan and Helen felt, Lodestar couldn't take up with Fornax. Even their friendship pressed at the edges of acceptable morality. Lodestar was the golden standard the world looked to—a scandal like that could undo literal decades of positive work for the world.

Moving carefully, watching for any sign of resistance, ready to halt, Ivan reached out and lifted Helen's chin, their eyes meeting in the lonely courtyard. "I understand."

"I know you do. That's part of why it hurts." She put her hand over his, gripping it tightly. "Another world, another life, huh?" Wielding inner strength that had nothing to do with Lodestar, Helen pushed Ivan's hand back to his chest, patting it once. It wasn't the first time either had spoken those words to one another, though the occasions never seemed to get any easier.

"Who knows what could have been," Ivan said, finishing out the phrase. "I'll give you some space for a while."

Helen nodded, despite the pained look on her face. "Penelope has a dance recital next month she'd hate for Uncle Ivan to miss. Let's see how we're feeling then." For a moment, she looked over her shoulder to turn before pausing. "Goodbye, for now."

"See you in a few weeks." Ivan had wanted to say goodbye, as well; however, his tongue betrayed him, refusing to form the words. Not to her. For Helen, this was the most he could manage.

Ivan stood in his doorway, watching her leave, waiting until the courtyard gate clanged closed, and for five minutes afterward before finally closing the door and heading inside.

Sparks flitted from the shattered television, remote still embedded in the glass near dead center. Professor Quantum paid them no mind. He'd get around to fixing or replacing it when the need arose. For now, the art-piece on the nature of rage soothed him every time he looked at it. How dare that ungrateful little whelp use her position to slander their reputation in an attempt to build her own. Was it not enough that the AHC had given her and that guild adequate room to commit their atrocities thanks to “respecting the law?” Had they not dispatched Lodestar to her aid, in spite of knowing there were resources already willing to save her? This was her repayment? A line of products built on the assumption that the superheroes would fail?

His office door opened without warning, which meant there was one of two people who should be walking in. Only fellow members of the Champions’ Congress were permitted such free entrance, and moments later, he was relieved to see Quorum appear. The last thing he needed right now was one of Lodestar’s tiring speeches.

“Afternoon,” Quorum greeted. “Stopping by to let you know we moved the call with the Defense Department to five—only time we could get everyone you wanted on at once.”

“I am up to date with all emails and changes to the schedule.” Professor Quantum tapped his device—calling it a phone would be a genuine injustice to the amount of technology bundled inside. “I’m also too busy to bother with politeness. What do you need that had to be said in person?”

The brusqueness didn’t bother Quorum—who knew if anything did, really. He was truly impossible to get a handle on, the amalgamation of over a thousand unique voices and perspectives creating something wholly unique, and unnatural. “Very well. I came to tell you not to make any moves against the woman.”

While Professor Quantum briefly entertained the notion of playing dumb, there was little purpose. Quorum might not be a meta-genius; however, he had excellent observation and deductive skills, not that the embedded remote left much need for speculation.

“I could hardly help it if someone anonymously tipped off a few reporters about the new Indigo Technologies spokeswoman living a secret, villainous life. It’s not as if her identity is protected by the Orion Protocols the way that beast’s is.”

“Which would accomplish nothing, at this point,” Quorum explained, having already seen the situation from that and untold more angles. “Tori has no warrants for her arrest; she is at most wanted in connection to a minor museum robbery that insurance has already paid for. If you expose her now, she can pivot, using the chance to come out into the open about just how advanced her creations can be. Building a suit for self-protection already fits into the narrative she’s spinning, and currently, you’d have little support internally for trying to move against her. Hephaestus was on-site helping the New Science Sentries in their battle. None of them will care more about one potential heist than that.”

It was frustrating, being told that what should be such a simple fix would only end in error, but one ignored Quorum’s insight at their own peril. “I suppose you’ll advocate we take the high road and only strike through proper channels.”

“There would be no point in speaking such words to you,” Quorum replied, not incorrectly. “What I am advising is patience. Let her continue working in the shadows, sowing the seeds of her own destruction. There are no warrants for Hephaestus, currently. In time, thinking she’s slipped our notice, chances are strong she’ll take larger risks. Once there is a crime Hephaestus has committed, one significant enough to weaken the public’s approval and her own support within the AHC, then drawing a link between the villain and Tori could produce the results you’re after. Move too soon, lose the chance before it’s ripe. Not to mention, we don’t need the guild angry right now.”

Professor Quantum had been looking over the same reports, and the data was almost undeniable. Between the guild’s threat, Lodestar’s showy battle, and the AHC’s exceptional response to the alien invasion, crime was trending down once more. Even the misconduct still being committed was generally more low-key—the New Science Sentries had run down the first bank robbers of the week earlier that day. Peace was good. It kept the AHC looking effective and made the public more docile, easier to manage. The current situation was tenuous; tipping the guild to retribution could indeed cause more harm than momentary vengeance would be worth.

“Very well. I’ll wait for a better opportunity to strike with her identity. Until then, I’ll have to busy myself by checking each and every one of her devices for the slightest violation of federal defense statutes. Perhaps we can get them all recalled.” Hitting his keyboard without delay, Professor Quantum pulled up Indigo Technologies’ website, now with Tori’s face and new product line splashed across the front page. A few clicks, and suddenly, a distinct frown settled on the usually distinguished face.

“Something wrong?” Quorum asked.

While still professional, it was impossible to miss the terse annoyance sliding through Professor Quantum’s voice. “It seems the launch announcement struck a chord. There’s already a two week backorder.”

The guild was bustling. Tori had no sooner walked up from the teleportation chamber than she nearly collided with Gork, who pivoted her tremendous mass with delicate grace, stepping to Tori's side at the last moment.

"Whoops, sorry," Tori quickly sputtered.

"Happens to everyone." Gork readjusted her position, revealing Stasis and Arachno Bro, who'd both been blocked by her substantial size.

Pointing up to the ceiling, Stasis gestured. "We need to get one of those office bubble-mirror thingies installed there, make it easier to see who is coming from every angle. Also, going to need a high-five from Hephaestus over here. Caught your commercial this afternoon and loved it. 'Save ourselves,' that's going to piss the capes right off."

Tori accommodated the high-five, hitting one with Arachno Bro as well when he lifted one of his several arms, the others largely encumbered with a large metal case. It was somewhat off-putting, hearing her villain name bandied about like that, but then, she did generally use the official nomenclature for everyone aside from Ivan or the other rookies. It was part of guild protocol, though not the code specifically, which made enforcement far more voluntary among the ranks.

"Thanks. I tried to walk the line and not seem like I was coming after them. Figured that would bring down more heat than we wanted." To say nothing of how it would impact the friends she had in that organization, hearing her speak those words. In the end, Tori had found her peace with the marketing strategy in the simple facts of the matter: everything she'd said was true. The AHC had failed to save her, because they couldn't be everywhere at once. Beyond that, Tori sincerely did believe her inventions could help others from ending up in the same situation. If the capes had a real problem with the fact that they weren't able to protect everyone, then maybe they should take it as a sign to step up their game.

Gork gave her a slow, unmissable nod. "Doc wouldn't let you cross any lines. With apologies, we have a facility appointment to keep."

"That's right!" Stasis slapped the metal box in Arachno Bro's arms, causing an unexpectedly harmonic note to ring out. "We hired the Bytes to play around with some of the Wrexwren tech so handily left on their corpses—need a place with special shielding to test this out."

“Gonna be loud,” Arachno Bro added, adjusting his many-armed grip to ensure the device was perfectly snug. He was putting in enough effort to make Tori wonder what would happen if it was dropped, and how close she should really be standing.

With a wave, Tori opted to take the graceful exit they’d presented. “Have fun! I’m off to go do some tinkering myself.”

The trio headed out, barely missing getting run into by Pod Person and Killcitate as they emerged from the teleportation chamber, proving that Stasis was indeed right about the need for a bubble-mirror. Tori went another way, winding her way along the exterior path even though there were more direct routes inside.

It was startling to realize how much the island had changed just since its unveiling. New buildings were added to the town, a fresh green bubbling pit of unknown goop had appeared to the north, and it appeared that some sort of trees with faces were beginning to dot the nearest shoreline. The rest of the guild had been busy with their own activities and projects, most of which were likely even more bizarre than her own. Perhaps it was time to start spending more time around her fellow villains. The bonds formed here wouldn’t necessarily be any less complicated, but at least they’d be on the same side. Unless another insurrection formed, anyway.

Rounding a corner, Tori caught sight of Lance and Warren, or maybe Pest Control and Glyph. She needed to start thinking of them in their villainous roles with or without the costumes, but it wasn’t as if the other guild members weren’t familiar with one another. Maybe she’d just ask if they cared; sometimes, there were upsides to a reputation for bluntness.

The duo were part of a quartet hauling a giant red cube lashed onto a hefty cart, with one person manning each corner, shoving it along. Both offered a sweaty wave, forgoing verbal greetings due to their gulping breaths. Tori walked a bit further and found herself looking at an identical cube, only this one was being pushed by a single meaty hand belonging to Thuggernaut.

“Looky here, we got ourselves a celebrity.” Johnny Three Dicks poked his head around the side, making no pretense that he’d been in any way helping with the task. “What’s the going rate on one of those handbags paired with your signature?”

“I’m going to shoot straight with you, Johnny: you don’t have the shoulders to pull off that model.”

He clutched his chest, reeling back as if struck. “I like the attack, but you’ll have to pick a target other than these perfect shoulders if you want to land a blow. Besides, the design is a bit too splashy for me. I like clean lines. I was going to sell the thing online—you do know there’s already a backorder, right?”

“What Johnny means is congratulations on your new endeavor. It sounds like it’s already been very successful,” Thuggernaut stepped in to add.

The eye roll of Johnny Three Dicks was so perfect, it very well might have qualified as a superpower in itself. “Spoilsport. Anyway, nice to see you, but we’ve got to get these... materials to... a place or something will... are meltsplotions officially a thing? Can’t remember how the voting went.”

“We’re on a schedule. Good to see you, Tori, and congratulations from me, as well.” Thuggernaut resumed pushing the block, which had darkened slightly in hue, unless Tori was mistaken. She gave them a wide berth to head past her.

Watching the odd pair wander down the slope, Tori momentarily marveled at how normal the whole exchange had felt. Less than a year with these maniacs, and she was already getting accustomed to the madness. Craving it, at times, especially when normal life was fraught with more complex problems. Dealing with a meta-suit that wasn’t strong enough: simple. Start upgrading one piece at a time until one reached the desire level. It was people who made things complicated.

On her phone, an unanswered text from Donald lingered. A simple, short message: “Saw the commercial, congratulations on starting your new business. Let me know if you want to go celebrate.” She’d implied the entire enterprise he was devoting his life to wasn’t adequately doing its job, and he’d responded with an olive branch. That was the trouble with capes—they took the higher path, which made her feel all the more shitty about the slight. Were they just going to ignore it? Because her gut said the rest of Cyber Geek’s team might have different words the next time they all hung out. She didn’t know what to say back, which was why the message lingered, every passing minute potentially making the reply all the more awkward.

Suddenly looking around, Tori realized she’d taken a wrong turn. Instead of her initial destination, she’d veered off toward the council offices, where one might find Pseudonym when he was around. Of course, Ivan didn't have an express reason to be here, so he wouldn't be. Tori spun around, absolutely secure in that knowledge right up until she nearly collided with Ivan's elbow.

He didn't dodge, merely vanished and reappeared in a different point. Sometimes, she forgot he could do short-range teleports at will—one more talent piled atop so many others. If she wanted to climb into that league, the world where people like Alfred Settler couldn't make her feel powerless, then there was very long trek ahead, and today was only one step of countless.

"Didn't expect to see you here," Ivan greeted, stealing her own line quite effectively. "Don't you want to go out and celebrate the new endeavor? I imagined Beverly would have put together an enjoyable outing for you all."

"Fancy dinner and unfancy drinks at some swanky place uptown." Tori was already annoyed by the dress code, but it wasn't as if she hadn't gotten accustomed to office attire at Vendallia; she could certainly muddle through for a high-end meal. "It's on Indigo's dime, at least. Now that I'm a public figure, Wade wants me seen around town more, flaunting the merchandise."

"Making yourself a target for anyone who wants to give them a test," Ivan pointed out.

The idea had occurred to Tori, and she responded with a mild shrug. "I was a target before, I'm still a target now. The difference is, if the AHC lets me get attacked, they give me a chance to show off while also proving that they can't always be there. The smart money is I'm going to be very protected by the superheroes until they figure out a countermove."

"Which means it will be dangerous to act as Hephaestus." Lifting his hands, Ivan gestured around them to the villainous volcano lair in which they stood. "Part of why I thought you might take a little time to lay low. There are a lot more eyes on Tori Rivas than there once were."

"But only a fraction of the ones on people like Wade Wyatt," she countered. "You are sort of half-right. I'm planning to lay low on the villain stuff for a while. The suit is due for an overhaul. Between everything I've learned and the new resources I've got access to, it no longer represents my best efforts. Doing a new build right takes time, so Hephaestus can take a breather while Tori gets her empire running."

Ivan let out a half-sigh, half-chuckle as he shook his head. "It's my own fault for expecting anything less. I'll let you get to it then."

He started to step past her, but Tori shifted her weight to block him. Despite the fact that he'd moments ago proven that she was no obstacle, Ivan still allowed her to halt his progress. "Hang on there, bucko, what are you doing here? There's no council meeting I'm aware of, not with Gork and Stasis on some weird weapons test, and no pressing emergencies to handle. That tends to be all that draws you to this place."

It was bizarre, seeing Ivan look uncertain, like watching a mountain crack a joke. He shifted back slightly, scratching under his chin. "In truth... I was a bit bored. The kids are with their mom, no Starscouts work to do, and even the office is still closed until next week." Although Ivan didn't mention the other friend he might have wanted to spend time with, Tori already knew things were tense with Helen; no need to rub salt in the wound. "I thought perhaps there might be tasks to do around here, get ahead of things for a change."

Whether or not it was wise for Ivan to spend more time here, Tori couldn't be sure. He clearly needed to keep himself busy, and being around friends was a good move in rough times, but this place had a way of drawing people deeper in. Ivan himself had been the one to warn her about that. Still, if anyone could handle the balance, it was likely to be one of the guild's own founders. There were surely better places to direct her concern.

"You know I'm not going to be coming into the office anymore, right?" Tori had already been transferred off Vendallia's payroll—though since it was an Indigo Technologies subsidy, she was technically getting heavily promoted rather than changing companies.

Ivan nodded. As her manager and former mentor, Wade had probably looped Ivan in before even she got the final confirmations. "I may never find a more competent, or surly, assistant."

"Oh, you absolutely will not," Tori agreed. "My point was that I'm glad you'll be around here, since I won't see you as much in the outside world. Probably still going to need a lot of advice, now that I'm a small-time celebrity on top of being one of the world's most promising new supervillains."

The lifted eyebrow of skepticism was much more akin to the Ivan expression Tori was used to, and she even took some comfort in the mild incredulity of his tone. "Decided on that title for yourself?"

"I stood against one of Professor Quantum's old nemeses and killed a crook with a much grander reputation than my own. If any of the other newbies can top that, they're welcome to claim the title for themselves."

"They can't." Ivan's words were praise, yet the ones that followed were tinged with warning. "For now."

"Like I said, I'm already in the process of making sure I don't fall behind the pack." Tori checked her watch, realizing that all these delays had put her behind schedule, and she did not want to make Beverly late. Her roommate could be a tad tyrannical about staying on time—at least when it was something Beverly wanted to do. "On that note, better hustle. Let's do a dinner around here next week, though. I heard Scrap-Rabble opened a spot on the island with food like no one has ever tasted before."

A momentary look of mock-fear washed over Ivan's face. "Knowing Scrap-Rabble, that could encompass a great many options indeed." The pseudo-terror was fast replaced by a genuine smile. "I'll look forward to it."

They broke apart on that note, Tori wasting no more time on winding paths. All that slowed her pace was a short text reply to Donald reading: "Love to. I'll call you tomorrow and we can talk schedule." No sense in having a mentor if she wasn't going to learn from him, and Ivan was a prime example on the importance of balance. Maybe staying friends with someone on the other side would prove to be impossible long-term; however, she still wanted to try. Aside from everything she'd gone through with some of the capes, having bonds outside the guild would keep her from slipping in too deep as well—something important to keep in mind while laying low.

That done, she made as direct a line as possible to her guild laboratory, now hers long-term thanks to the deal with Wade. He'd comped her a year for free, after which, they'd revisit the issue and see if the space still suited her needs. By the time she needed to pay actual rental rates, money from the venture would be rolling in, though most of it was already earmarked for meta-suit development.

Finally making her way inside, Tori went straight to the reason she'd popped in for a visit: her new material was ready. She powered up the huge machine carefully, checking to see that everything had executed as programmed before opening the release chamber. Considering the unknown substance she'd been working with, there was a chance her creation could be toxic, if not outright destructive.

Resting atop a large podium ten feet away, suspended in a miniature gravitational field, was the bony finger of Alfred Settler. Even disconnected from the main body, it was corrosive—the damn thing had eaten through nearly all of her suit’s hidden compartments by the time she got it back to the apartment lab, and rigging up transport to the guild had taken half a day. From there had come the material scans, trying to figure out precisely what this nigh-indestructible substance was made from, and how much could be replicated.

Several of the elements the scanner found were totally foreign, unlike anything Tori had ever seen. Others were rarer, certain trace meta-minerals like erlestrite and cadinphode that were formed by exposing more common materials to meta-elements, such as setlium. Or vernium, apparently, since Alfred’s own internal energy must have formed them in his body. Those would be integrated in later versions, when Tori had the cash to spare.

Right now, she’d found a hopefully stable build at around a seventy percent structural match. Replacing the missing elements had been the hardest part; up until today, every attempt had resulted in a pile of sludge, at best. Getting an alert that one of the sequences had produced something viable was all it took to send her rushing back to the guild.

Hitting the final buttons, a section of the large machine spun away from the wall, revealing a tightly sealed chamber. After a few seconds and some loud clangs, the door began to release its locks before slowly swinging open. Tori waited as the soft hiss of smoke cleared, showing her a rectangular hunk of metal. All readings indicated it was non-corrosive, but she still tapped it gently with a pinky finger, waiting for any telltale burn or tingle. Nothing: only cold metal, though Tori wondered if it shouldn’t be a tad colder. Trusting her instruments, she lifted the material up, bringing it out into the bright lights of the laboratory.

“Guess it’s a good thing my suit was already black.” She’d anticipated as much, given the coloration of the source material, but this was a step further than expected. More than dark, it absorbed a higher amount of light than anything she’d seen short of specialized cloaking fabrics. Handy for working at night, she supposed.

Setting the material against a far wall, Tori headed over to a table, where the remains of her meta-suit were splayed out. A few bits would be salvaged for version number two; however, most of it was going to need to be rebuilt from the ground up. She was planning to do cosmetic repairs on this one, even if it was getting retired, then see about procuring a glass case for display. Just because it was time to move on didn't mean she wasn't proud of where she'd started.

From the table, Tori plucked her still-functioning gauntlet, the only piece of the suit to already receive full repairs. As the strongest weapon she had, it was also the best option for testing her new metal. Alfred had taken this kind of shot without missing a step, and soon, she'd be able to do the same. Because that was the danger in fighting a thief and letting them live. A good one never walked away entirely empty-handed.

Tapping the side of her laptop to wake it up, Tori clicked on the recording program and activated various scanners. The silver lining to a week of failed attempts, she'd had plenty of time to prep for once something stable came along. "Hephaestus Version Two, Settler Metal Test Number One." Flexing the gauntlet, she fueled it with power, flames cascading off her hidden hand and into the system. Without the helmet on, there was no indicator signal—she'd just used the weapons enough to learn the timing. Bit by bit, the energy level climbed as Tori got herself into position, drawing a direct line on the square of metal waiting across the room. By the time she was ready, so was the gauntlet, and she saw no reason to keep Beverly waiting with needless delays.

"Let's see just how tough I'm going to be."

With EMTs keeping the driver calm and his car set safely back on the ground, Lodestar was preparing to leave. There wasn't any crime to record, just a tired driver on a mountain road who'd tried too sharp of a turn. Lucky for him, Lodestar was flying the skies.

She'd been doing that quite a few times over the past week—whenever a certain young woman named Penelope was otherwise occupied, in fact. It was getting excessive, and she knew it, but for the moment, it was nice to have control over some part of her life. As Lodestar, she could always make a difference, always be of use, always know the right path forward. It was the human side where things got muddled. Yet that same uncertainty and confusion were what made it essential. Humans weren't sure of every move they made—losing that would mean losing a piece of what kept her... Helen.

A step down a path she was determined to avoid for as long as absolutely possible.

Before she could take to the skies, a figure appeared next to her. If the sudden emergence from nowhere and the dirty overcoat hadn't tipped her off, the kaleidoscope eyes would have. Nexus was a thorn that couldn't be plucked, not permanently. Beating him didn't matter. He always came back, the same as before. Lodestar decided to open politely tonight. She didn't want there to be any more conflict than necessary, especially given the scales of destruction Nexus could operate on.

"Out for an evening stroll?"

"Countless," he agreed. "Though only the one with you. This you, anyway. Others who wear the name, or the power, there are scant few worth watching. This world is special, however."

"I'm already aware that we have multiple Singulars, just like I know that I'm not one of them. What else can I help you with?"

He stalked around the grass at the road's side, looking with eyes that saw far more than even his most cryptic ramblings went on. It would be easy to dismiss Nexus, as many had early on, except that he constantly knew more than anyone should. Not always accurate information, but often enough that he couldn't be fully ignored, no matter how much smarter a tactic that might be. "You can heed my warning: you need to be more careful. I have seen what happens when a Lodestar dies, and do not wish for a world as interesting as this one to share the same fate."

Something in her, a piece of human fear long left dormant, stirred slightly. "Lodestars don't die. You can get rid of the person, not the power. Basically every villain I went against with any multiverse access hunted for weaknesses, and the results always came back the same."

"Ah, yes, no worlds where a Lodestar has fallen. But that doesn't mean such worlds didn't exist. I saw it happen, in a place many degrees separated from your universe, yet you wouldn't find entirely unfamiliar. Another world with multiple Singulars, such a pleasure to watch unfold. When they decided to use their abilities in tandem, I expected the same result as you, but to my surprise, they succeeded at the seemingly impossible task. Combining talents found solely in their world, the trio managed to slay their version of Lodestar. It was such a battle, the very planet shook by the end. I was enraptured at the pageantry. Then, it ended."

“That’s it? In a different corner of the multiverse, somebody allegedly killed a Lodestar, and you were so concerned that it seemed prudent to give me a warning?” Was he playing at something? Madness didn’t mean Nexus couldn’t be cunning. Perhaps this was part of a larger plan.

Something like a sad cackle split from Nexus’s lips as he stared at her with those shattered eyes. “There are plenty like you to watch, same story of self-denial and sadness echoed over and over. But this world has Singulars which make it fascinating, because their presence renders everything harder to predict, yet also means you might be killable here. That is why I came to give my warning. I do not want to see this world share the same fate.”

Thinking back on Nexus’s exact words, Lodestar caught a turn of phrase she’d initially missed, and suddenly, she felt as nauseated as if she’d been using super-speed for too long. “Nexus, when you say it ended, you do mean the fight, don’t you?”

Reaching into the roadside grass, Nexus tore up a handful, then blew it into the wind, each piece drifting over the mountain’s edge. “Gone, in a matter of moments. One light after another simply faded away, an entire universe collapsed into nothingness. Some of me barely made out it; some didn’t at all. I felt it to the end, the crushing obliteration. That power you wield may well be each universe’s greatest defense, but in balance, it also represents a critical weakness. No one can find a universe where Lodestar has died, because to kill a Lodestar is to end that universe. They do not leave remains, only emptiness.”

It was an absolutely lunatic statement—except deep down, part of Helen always knew there had to be a cost. That was the way things worked, or had worked, for a long time. Just the act of wielding the power had taken nearly everything from her, time and time again. That its existence represented a danger as well as a defense... it tracked with her understanding. However, that didn’t mean she was going to take Nexus at face value.

“I suppose it would be pointless to ask you for proof.”

“Very much so. I have none to offer, save only for the truth in my words.” He lumbered toward her, half lunge, half fall, stopping a few feet short. “Take care, Lodestar, and if I arrive to give you caution, then heed it. This world is too entertaining. I’m not yet ready for the curtain to fall.”

Then he was gone, as instantly as he’d arrived.

Lifting off, Lodestar flew up into the night sky, trying not to dwell too hard on his ramblings. Even if the story was true, the world he'd cited had needed multiple Singulars to accomplish the task, and by definition, none of them would be present here. Nevertheless, she already knew this was a lead that had to be chased down, as discreetly as possible. If her death would put the entire universe in danger, then that was something she'd quite like to know.

Floating up higher, she looked down upon the planet below. So messy, chaotic, flawed, and human, Helen loved this world so very much. Even now, people were making mistakes, getting into danger, looking to the heavens in the hopes of some sudden miracle to save the day. And she, of all people, was lucky enough to be able to give that help, to offer that second chance when it was needed most. Despite all it had taken from her, Lodestar enjoyed this view and everything that came with it. Even the burdens of the role were familiar weights at this point.

Shooting down from the sky, her eyes scanned about, searching for those in peril. Theoretical deaths could wait for another day. Right now, she had an entire world to keep safe. In a burst of light, Lodestar shot down into the city, flying toward a cry for help that was about to be answered in spectacular fashion.

End of Villains' Code: Book #2

Other Novels by Drew Hayes

About the Author

Drew Hayes is an author from Texas who has now found time and gumption to publish a few books. He graduated from Texas Tech with a B.A. in English, because evidently he's not familiar with what the term "employable" means. Drew has been called one of the most profound, prolific, and talented authors of his generation, but a table full of drunks will say almost anything when offered a round of free shots. Drew feels kind of like a D-bag writing about himself in the third person like this. He does appreciate that you're still reading, though.

Drew would like to sit down and have a beer with you. Or a cocktail. He's not here to judge your preferences. Drew is terrible at being serious, and has no real idea what a snippet biography is meant to convey anyway. Drew thinks you are awesome just the way you are. That part, he meant. You can reach Drew with questions or movie offers at NovelistDrew@gmail.com Drew is off to go high-five random people, because who doesn't love a good high-five? No one, that's who.

Read or purchase more of his work at his site: DrewHayesNovels.com

Mise en gare de : Le Mans, 14/10/11 Camionneur J. Jolly
Mise au canal de : Le Mans

| Paiements    |             | Destination des Vins retirés |           |                  |                |             |           |                  |
|--------------|-------------|------------------------------|-----------|------------------|----------------|-------------|-----------|------------------|
| Date         | Montant     | Reçu                         | Payé      | Reçu de :        | En fût         | Quantité    | Reçu de : | Reçu de :        |
| 14/10 | 1335 | 14/10                 | 14 | Reçu de : | Le Mans | 1335 | 14 | Reçu de : |

THE UTTERLY UNINTERESTING

Transport & UNADVENTUROUS TALES

OF FRED.

THE VAMPIRE ACCOUNTANT

Transport à Lunel: 14/10

Drew Hayes

1335

ewThe Utterly uninteresting and unadventurous tales of Fred, the vampire accountant    D r e w
H a y e s

Published by

Electronic Edition License Notes

This ebook is licensed for your personal enjoyment only. This ebook may not be re-sold or given away to other people. If you would like to share this book with another person, please purchase an additional copy for each recipient. If you're reading this book and did not purchase it, or it was not purchased for your enjoyment only, then please visit your favorite retailer and purchase your own copy. Thank you for respecting the hard work of this author.

Table of Contents

*Dedication*

A Note From The Author

A Vampire at the Reunion

Book One - Chapter One

Book One - Chapter Two

Book One - Chapter Three

Book One - Chapter Four

Book One - Chapter Five

Book One - Chapter Six

Book One - Chapter Seven

A Zombie at the LARP

Book Two - Chapter One

Book Two - Chapter Two

Book Two - Chapter Three

Book Two - Chapter Four

Book Two - Chapter Five

Book Two - Chapter Six

Book Two - Chapter Seven

A Weresteed at the Slots

Book Three - Chapter One

Book Three - Chapter Two

Book Three - Chapter Three

Book Three - Chapter Four

Book Three - Chapter Five

Book Three - Chapter Six

Book Three - Chapter Seven

Book Three - Chapter Eight

A Mage at the Park

Book Four - Chapter One

Book Four - Chapter Two

Book Four - Chapter Three

Book Four - Chapter Four

Book Four - Chapter Five

Book Four - Chapter Six

Book Four - Chapter Seven

Book Four - Chapter Eight

A Monster in the Pews

Book Five - Chapter One

Book Five - Chapter Two

Book Five - Chapter Three

Book Five - Chapter Four

Book Five - Chapter Five

Book Five - Chapter Six

Book Five - Chapter Seven

About Drew Hayes

Connect with Drew Hayes

Copyright

Dedication

This book is dedicated to the uncool, uncoordinated, unexceptional, uncharming, uninteresting, and especially the unashamed. To everyone from the Awkwards to the Zeroes, living as the proud oddballs they are. This book is dedicated to my people.

A Note From The Author

I almost certainly do not know you; however, I shall assume you are a lovely person, and it is my loss for not having the opportunity to meet you. Still, I must assume you and I are connected in some way, for the works you are about to read are some selections from a journal of my memoirs. I compiled these not in the belief that the stories within are so compelling they must be told, but rather because I found my unexpected life transition to be so shockingly uneventful, at least initially. I place the blame for my aggrandized expectations squarely on the contemporary media, filling my head with the belief that a ticket to the supernatural also put one on an express train toward coolness and suave charm.

This is simply not the case. Or, at least, it was not in my case. I recorded my journeys in the hopes that, should another being find themselves utterly depressed at the humdrum personality still saddling their supernatural frame, they might find solace in knowing they are not the only one to have felt that way. Names have been changed as I deemed necessary. Given the lengthy lifespan of many people with whom I associate, there is no guarantee they will have passed on by the time this is read.

So, dear reader, whom I suspect is a wonderful person merely in need of a bit of reassurance, take comfort in my tales of uneventful blundering. One's nature is hard to change; sometimes even death is insufficient to accomplish such a task. Be assured that, while you might find yourself still more human than anticipated, you are far from the only one. You will eventually discover that under the movie stereotypes, imposed mystique, and overall inflated expectations, each and every one of us is at least a touch more boring than our images would indicate.

And that is not a bad thing.

—Fredrick Frankford Fletcher

A Vampire at the Reunion

1.

I was midway through packing when I paused to contemplate whether it was appropriate to bring the blood. I mean, sure I needed it and all, but there's always been something so garish about pulling a bag of O Negative from my little, leather luggage. I weighed the options for a few moments, pitting my desire for stylish secrecy against my nutritional needs. In the end, I forged a compromise, pouring the blood into my faux silver (obviously the real deal is off limits) flask, sealing it well, then placing it between my freshly pressed shirts.

My name is Fredrick Frankford Fletcher, and yes, that name did get me beaten up quite frequently when I was a child. For those of you who are a little slow on the uptake, I am also a vampire. It was a relatively recent life change. It happened only about one year ago. I'll spare you the gory details, but one night I was a mild mannered accountant with a heartbeat, and the next night I wasn't. Oh, I was still a mild mannered accountant, but the heartbeat was long gone. I took it well, I feel, or as well as one can handle such things. I attempted to go hunting and feed; however, while I might have been a fearful predator of the night, I still chafed at the idea of physical violence. I can't even watch slasher films without covering my eyes. After a few failed feeding fiascos left me leaning toward starvation, I opted to use a different set of my skills to secure sustenance.

John Smith, as I will call him here, was a local hospital director that had paid me to cook his books and keep his failing enterprise above water in previous years. Generally, all criminal activity gives me ulcers, but the cause of keeping a hospital afloat allowed me to feel that the karmic scales balanced out. After my life change, we struck a new deal in which I would offer the same service each year, in exchange for the opportunity to purchase my dinners of choice from his blood supply.

The rest of my lifestyle adaptations were fairly simple. I began having files delivered to my home in the day so I could work on them at night, I refitted my refrigerator for a predominantly liquid diet, and I resumed my life as it was. I was even able to continue indulging my penchant for fine cheeses, despite what voluminous lore had told me. Without being crass, let me simply say an undead body handles normal food as a human one handles gum. While not built for nourishment, it is capable of disposing of such materials. This was far from the first discrepancy I uncovered in my cinema-based education.

Perhaps if I had any true friends or family, the transition might very well have been more difficult; however, that was not a burden with which I had been shouldered. My life was just as grey and dull as it had been before.

In a way, that was the most difficult part of my transition, going from the thrill of something new back to the dreariness of the old. I suppose a part of me had believed the Hollywood hype about vampires living (in a non-literal sense, of course) adventurous lives filled with sex, danger, and riches. My own undead experience had been . . . somewhat less thrilling. I'd spent ample time raiding the video stores in my town, and I must say I had yet to uncover any tales of vampires whose unlives continued so perfectly parallel to their days of breathing and sunshine as mine did. I would have taken great comfort in such a film. It was that nagging sense of disappointment that toiled away in my subconscious, and it was the need for something—anything really—to be different that prompted me to make such a dangerous decision.

I was going to my ten-year high school reunion. Now, I know that this must seem like an impulsive and idiotic idea, and, in truth, it was. I saw that clearly when the invitation arrived. I recognized it, analyzed it, and catalogued it in my mental filing system as I had done everything else in my monotonous twenty-eight years on this earth. This time though, something caught on the corner of my cranial cabinet, and I saw an opportunity. Here was a chance to take a risk, albeit a small one, and do something that qualified as unsafe. Whimsical even, if one discounted my previous analyzation of the situation. Before I could talk myself out of it, I mailed my confirmation reply and booked a non-refundable ticket to my hometown of Kent, Idaho. It was only later I realized the flight was scheduled during daytime and was therefore useless to me, but the grandness of the gesture remained poignant, and I resolved to attend my reunion anyway.

Some three weeks later, as I packed up my supplies for the weekend to come, I began to wonder if other vampires felt this skittish before seeing people who knew them in life. The only other vampire I had even encountered was the one who turned me, and he was gone before I awoke. I prowled the darkness at first, hoping to find others of my kind, but after a few movies depicting the vampire political system, I started staying in more. I didn't really have the constitution for such constant subterfuge and betrayal. A pleasant evening with merlot, blood, and brie worked just fine, thank you very much.

I zipped up my bag and hefted it onto my shoulder. This would have been an ordeal in itself three years ago, but with the night hours and the new allergies to garlic, silver, and sunshine came a few undeniable perks. Eternal life was pleasant enough I suppose, though I'd become concerned about what I would do once I finished viewing every movie in the rental store. At least I might be around long enough to truly enjoy the appreciation of my smarter financial investments. The enhanced strength, durability, and dexterity were all quite nice, though. I was more than a minor klutz in my human days, so it was an enjoyable change to walk around without injuring myself.

After locking my door and setting my alarms, I stepped into the new night air. It was crisp with the chill of late October. Admittedly a strange time for a high school reunion, but Kent was a farming community. The fall holidays were close to harvest time, and therefore the heaviest celebrated. For those of you fortunate enough to not understand that reference, harvest time is one of the hardest working periods on a farm. A night off is not just reason to celebrate; it is reason to celebrate to the umpteenth degree. Since Thanksgiving is spent with family, Kent will often hold its reunions on or around Halloween. This year was my class's turn, and as Halloween fell on a Saturday, our event was planned for the night of the pumpkin-themed holiday. As a real live (again, only in a matter of speaking) vampire would be in attendance, I felt this was particularly appropriate. Even if I was the only one who would know it.

I loaded the leather suitcase into the back of my grey hybrid. I had always tried to be eco-conscious, but realizing I could actually live to be affected by eventual environmental disasters had doubled my efforts. Once the suitcase was secured, I placed a travel mug of blood into the cup holder and buckled myself in as well. I would have to drive through the night to make it to my hotel in time, but that hadn't been an issue for over a year. If I were still human, I would have taken a deep breath to steel myself for the expected adventure ahead. Since I was not, I checked my mirrors and turned on my signal, pulling into the road with both hands firmly on the wheel.

2.

I made it to the hotel approximately an hour before the sun would crest the western horizon. Almanacs were never something I gave much thought to before my change. Now they were like credit cards; I never went anywhere without one.

Check-in was a simple process. An advantage of my timing was that none of the other alumni were entering at that time. They had either come earlier or would be showing up during the day. That was well and good for me; I had neither desire nor intention of seeing them outside of the controlled environment that the reunion would offer. Less chance of anyone remembering favorite old games of beating me up or throwing me naked into the girl's locker room. Just the memories were giving me a stress headache, if I were still susceptible to them.

I received my key packet from a girl working the front counter and ventured up to my room. Once there I opened my suitcase and pulled out my safety materials. I had several rolls of tinfoil and tape. It took me only twenty minutes to seal off every possible venue the sun might utilize to enter my room. That was one skill sheer survival had forced me to practice at length.

I gently removed my costume from the suitcase and began shaking out the obvious wrinkles. Yes, since we were having the reunion on Halloween, it had been designated a costume party. My costume was a set of scrubs and a white doctor's coat. Now, I'm sure some of you will wonder why I didn't simply throw on black clothing and bill myself as a vampire. The sad truth was that I looked precious little like an undead demon of the night. Granted, the dying had slimmed me down and taken away my need for glasses, but I still had the same mousy brown hair, round face, and unappealing arrangement of features I'd always been cursed with. I'd already favored a pale complexion, so that difference was scarcely noticeable. My fangs only extended themselves if I was feeding, exceptionally hungry, or . . . um . . . ah . . . otherwise excited, to put it properly. It also didn't help that I almost immediately took to wearing fake glasses with similar frames after the change. It might not seem rational, but after twenty-five years, they were as much a part of my face as the eyes they stood in front of, and I couldn't bear to part with them.

All of that reasoning aside, the point of a Halloween costume is to be something you are not. Since I was a vampire, that would have been cheating. At least that's how I rationalized it to myself as I ironed my costume and hung it in the hotel closet. I did a few shirts next, making certain I would have appropriate clothing to wear on my return drive Sunday night. There was really no rush; I had gotten a week ahead on my work so that I could spend a few more days here if the desire struck me. I couldn't possibly conceive of a reason why that desire would strike me. I had left this town as fast as my awkward human legs would carry me, but it was my understanding that impulsive people were given to inclinations such as that. This weekend, if never again, I was determined to be impulsive. Or as impulsive as a vampire with four clean pairs of clothes and a four-day supply of blood can be.

I settled into the bed and turned on the television. Contrary to popular mythology, I neither sleep in a coffin, nor am I rendered powerless during the daytime. The difference between the two is that in the daytime I can sleep, which is an ability I lack under starlight. I don't have to, and in fact spent three weeks without any rest during last year's tax season; however, I am a creature of habit as much as of the night. I slept my whole life. I saw no compelling reason to change that in my undead incarnation. I switched through the channels until I was satisfied that there was nothing worth staying up for. I then set my alarm for 5 o'clock sharp and put in a wake-up call for the same time. The reunion began at 7 p.m., and sunset was at 7:17 p.m. This way I had ample time to shower, get into my costume, and enjoy some blood before heading into the night. I didn't really need to drink every night; twice a week would serve my needs quite well. However, I have a tendency to stress eat, which caused my human form to become somewhat doughy in the first place. The effects weren't quite so negative this time. I simply increased my blood bill for the month.

I could tell the sun had risen by the time on my clock. My foil shielding had worked flawlessly, and not a speck of light leaked through. With a minor expenditure of effort, I pushed my mind away from consciousness and into what was, I assumed, the vampiric equivalent of an REM cycle.

3.

I must admit, my former academic colleagues were quite adept and varied in their costume conceptions. The only rules of the evening were that one could not cover one's face, which served to fuel the creative fires in fashioning a functional costume, and that a visible nametag was required all night. The latter of those two killed any sense of realism I might have felt while staring at Anne Boleyn, Elvis, or Jake Blues. My doctor garb was relatively untainted by the cheap tag. I had read the invitation carefully and therefore procured a name-badge holder that real doctors use and slipped the identifying piece of plastic inside. There are times when it pays to be careful and prepared.

As I slunk, for lack of a better word, around the cheaply decorated cafeteria, I found myself taken aback at the changes that had clearly not taken place in my fellow Kent High alumni. Near the entrance sat a fairy princess in a low cut top: Joyce Trainer, homecoming queen turned mother of four. To the human eye, she appeared a miracle, still firm, fit, and perky even after four rounds with hormones and weight gain. She was significantly less miraculous to me, since I could actually smell the plastic and Botox that riddled her body. Ah, the crux of vanity. The upside of never having good looks was that I didn't have to fear losing them with age. Pity I wasn't pretty though; then they would have kept for eternity. Although for all I know, I wouldn't have been bitten if I were good looking, so I suppose there's no sense second-guessing fate.

Brent Colter, one of many of my school-day bullies, was standing near the refreshment table, romancing a collection of former co-eds whose names I couldn't recall. His cheap Spartan costume covered him fully, but it was tight enough that his frame was hardly obscured. His former football-player's physique had softened around the edges, but as the ladies' attention indicated, he was still a broad-shouldered, muscular man. I felt mildly disappointed; I was hoping he would devolve into full blown obesity, but I suppose ten years is a little soon to expect age to have caught up to him so severely. It dawned on me that I wouldn't be able to attend many more of these. Sooner or later someone would notice that the rest of the class was growing older, while dear Fredrick stayed frozen in his mid-twenties. Brent was clearly aging though, which was pleasant to see in my former tormentor. I was hopeful that I could visit him in the nursing home one day, and rub in that I was still young and fit while he had grown weak and decrepit. Assuming I could find time to keep track of him, of course . . . and only if I could be assured he wouldn't spill my secret to others . . . and if it wasn't during tax season.

Maybe I would just settle for a trip to dance on his grave.

The nameless clustered herd of my class was filled with people who were as much the same as they were different. Bodies had grown or shrunk with mass, and minds had been filled by knowledge or numbed by boredom, but the people under the faces were nearly the same as before. The basketball team was dressed predominantly as pimps and rowdily slapped high fives with each member to enter the gym. The chess club was in their own corner, dressed in superhero costumes that bore exceptional detail. The theater club was here and there, danced as characters I could only half recognize from famous plays and films. Amidst it all, I felt just as I had in the human days, different and set apart. I took a seat at an unoccupied table, sipping on the poorly flavored sugar water they had the gall to call punch. I should have been up and mingling, but that just wasn't me. I wasn't like these people . . . even back when I was still biologically like these people.

I was on the verge of giving the whole trip up for a bad idea when the devil sat down next to me. She was wearing a black and red corset, with black leather pants and red boots. Two horns sprouted from the blonde hair that hung to her shoulders; red contacts obscured the brown eyes that I could still make out underneath. She was fit and sexy, not a whiff of plastic on her person, either. A vampire in the movies would have delivered the perfect opening line that conveyed mystery, power, and sex appeal.

Instead I said, “You’re supposed to be wearing a nametag.” She arched an eyebrow and stared me down for a few moments. I had begun contemplating faking a bathroom emergency to escape when she replied, “Well, I am the ultimate rebel.” I laughed a little in spite of myself. I liked rules, and they only worked if they applied to everyone, but I also liked a beautiful woman who would talk to me. Guess which one was taking precedence at that point?

“Seriously though,” I said, “how do we know who you are if you aren’t wearing a nametag?”

The devil leaned toward me, offering a more apt view down her corset in the process, and whispered conspiratorially, “And why do you want to know who I am, doctor?”

“Well . . . um . . . I suppose we might have known each other . . . back when we went to school here.”

“Did you know many women who looked like me?” she asked with a hint of a purr in her voice. All her body language indicated that she was flirting with me, but her heart rate was steady, and I didn’t smell any pheromones or hormones being released. If only I had these senses during my formative years, I could have saved myself a multitude of embarrassments when girls thought it was funny to flirt with the nerd.

I pulled my back straight and made a significant effort not to look down the appealing ravine of her corset, and then spoke. “I feel I knew far too many women like you in those days. Granted, none bore your particular physical features, but the streak of cruel humor was most notably the same. I don’t know why you are pretending to flirt with me, but I assure you that I am on to your little game. I would very much like it if you left me alone now.”

If I were still human, then my face would have been bright red from embarrassment. I expected her to be grumpy that I spoiled her fun, or fake anger at me for calling her out. The devil did neither. She threw her head back and laughed whole heartedly. I became increasingly uncomfortable as she devolved into guffaws and then to chuckles. Finally, when her humor was little more than a low murmur in her throat, she responded.

“Well look at you, Freddy, ten years and about fifty pounds ago, you never could have stood up to a girl like that.”

I blinked a few times (another trait that is all habit and no need) before tentatively answering her. “Krystal?”

Krystal was the only female friend I had in my younger days, and, truthfully, saying “friend” is stretching it. We were both out of shape and had more caution than ambition in the social world. We didn’t really spend time together per se, but our friend group was the same, so we knew one another well enough. She had an annoying habit of nicknaming people, so I was thusly deemed “Freddy” in her eyes.

“You got it, Freddy, and in one try, too. I think I should be a little bit offended.” She smiled at me as she reached into her purse and pulled out her own name tag, sticking it in a very high-profile area on her corset.

“Wh . . . what . . . what on earth happened to you?”

“About the same as happened to you, I’m sure. Lasik for my eyes, diet and exercise for the body, just plain old growing up for the rest. You look good, by the way, very lean.”

“Thank you,” I murmured. I was glad I didn’t have blood pumping through my system anymore, otherwise I would have been so red faced my costume could have been titled “Dr. Tomato.”

“So catch me up, Freddy. How has life been? What do you do? You have a wife?” She began blathering, eschewing the calm and seductive vibe.

“Life has been . . . well, pretty boring, to be honest. I work as a CPA. No wife or girlfriend, but I do have a very robust film collection. Yourself?”

“Eh, not so far off from yours. No relationships . . . They don’t work so well with my line of work. I can’t say my life is boring, but it is more predictable than I would like sometimes. All in all not too bad though. I make a living, and that’s something to be thankful for.”

“True. So what is it that you do?”

“Ahhhh, what now?” She tripped over her words as her heart rate went up. I had just caught her off guard.

“You mentioned your job was counter to relationships, but didn’t clarify what it was. Therefore, I asked what your job was.”

“Oh. I’m a . . . cosmetologist. You wouldn’t believe the hours they make us work. No time for dates at all. Look, Freddy, I need to use the ladies’ room. I’ll be back in a few minutes,” she lied as she hustled herself off to the restroom. I turned my attention back to my glass of punch. If I had thought I wanted to leave earlier, getting recognized and ditched by one of the few people I thought of as close to a friend had undoubtedly strengthened that resolve.

I left my sad little corner and ventured to the refreshment table. Brent was still talking to two girls, one a slutty cop and one a slutty nurse, but otherwise the area was unattended. They detached themselves from him and headed toward the restroom. With the looks they were throwing back, it was not at all likely that he was being abandoned in the same fashion as me. It wasn’t even eight yet, so the party was relatively sparse. I had been led to understand that it was more fashionable to arrive later, but it was a talent I never had the inclination nor the opportunity to cultivate. After all, the few times I was invited places I was too afraid of missing things to arrive late, and I was too tired to stay when things worth seeing actually happened. I blended into the background, and no one ever remembered to invite me a second time. As I took a small block of swiss onto my plate and refilled my punch glass, I began thinking if maybe it had been better that way. At least at home I was comfortable. Being out here, with these people, I was just being reminded of all the things that I wasn’t. And alive wasn’t even the highest item on the list.

I stayed in my funk until an hour later, when the lights went out and the chaos began.

4.

The crowd had swollen with costumed, former students. The range and variety of outfits were actually rather fascinating. There was everything from vampires and werewolves, to pixies, to knights, to what I was 90% sure was a local fast-food chain's mascot. I had plucked up enough courage to speak to a couple of people whose names I vaguely remembered, though my attempts were not well received. There had been a select few I would have been comfortable talking with, but, unfortunately, aside from Krystal and me, none of the formerly socially outcast individuals had elected to attend. I had kept an eye (and perhaps a nose) out for Krystal; however, she seemed to have utterly vanished since her trip to the ladies' room. I was standing by the gym's bleachers, fighting with myself on whether staying or leaving would be more cowardly, when the power in the building suddenly died.

At first there was an awkward chuckle that rippled through the attendance. Power outages happen, and when they do, it is human nature to assume that someone is already on the problem fixing it. I scarcely even noticed. I didn't need light to see anyway. After a few minutes, some of the more responsible members of my former class elected to open the doors up and let in some light from outside. That was their intention, anyway. I heard the rattling from the door frame and recognized the sound even before the shout of clarification accompanied it.

"Hey . . . Hey! This isn't funny. Somebody locked us in!"

I was remarking in my mind how much more at ease I felt when everyone was as invisible as me, when the second scream tore through the party, this one much bloodier than the original. Everyone turned in the direction of the yell, but I'd bet I was the only one who could actually see a pudgy, brunette mummy being pulled into the hallway. I was sure I was the only one who could smell the sweet, tangy blood pouring across her sadly appropriate bandages. Odds were good I was still the only one who could make out the form of a hulking creature in the doorframe that was doing the dragging. All of this told me quite clearly that being at this party was no longer a minor risk. In that moment, I decided to do what any intelligent vampire would do in my position.

I ran like hell. Admittedly, I jumped the gun before the rest of the revelers, but they had only heard a horrific scream. I had seen what caused it. They joined in a few seconds later, though. Say what you will about humans; they have a flight-or-fight instinct that is surprisingly well developed. They didn't even know what was going on, and they were making the right move.

Or were they? I slowed my sprint to the door and moved toward the side of the wall. The rest of the crowd assaulted every exit, only to find each one reinforced and wrapped in chains on the outside. I could have ripped them down if it came to it, but then I would have had to explain how I did it once we were outside. Being hunted as a monster by a group of angry townsfolk wasn't much better than the situation I was already in, so that was a last resort.

There were two other ways out of the gym. Doors that led into the school were at the north and south ends. Since the scream had come from the north end, everyone began stampeding toward the south exit. As I watched them, I was struck by how much they resembled livestock being herded into a chute. That thought solidified my decision. No way was I leaving with the crowd. I could just wait until they all left and then rip open a door and be on my merry way. I know it seems like I was being a coward, but let's be fair. These were hardly people I had fuzzy feelings toward, and dying scared me quite a bit more since I had already done it once.

I was watching them stumble over ill-conceived costume decisions as they fumbled in the dark, when something caught my eye. There was a commentator's box near the top of the gym. It had a catwalk and opened into the 2nd floor of the school. With all the bleachers pulled out, it would be easy enough to access; however, since they were shoved into the wall, it would be nearly impossible to reach from here. That is, assuming one didn't have enhanced physical abilities and a fear that served as an exceptional motivator. It was pitch dark, and no one was looking at me anyway.

I scaled the bleacher wall in under a minute. If anyone noticed sounds from the room behind them, they opted not to try and peer into the darkness, but rather to just escape faster. The door on the side of the commentator's box was unlocked, so I slipped in without needing to break off the handle. From here it would be an easy journey to a balcony to the outside where I could hop down to my car and to safety. I was halfway through the small cube when a surprising scent caressed my nostrils. Leather, human, sweat—and recent familiarity. Krystal. Now that I was listening, I could hear her heartbeat as well. She was bound and gagged, taped under the table where the commentators would normally sit.

I reached for her very quickly. Helping a former friend was all well and good, but I still needed to get the hell out of there. She immediately began thrashing against her bonds and screaming into her gag. I'd forgotten I was the only one of us who could see in the dark.

"Krystal, calm down. It's Fred. Something very strange is happening, and I'm trying to get you out of here." She stopped struggling immediately and looked in my direction with gratitude and what seemed like a bit of embarrassment. I dismounted her from the table's underside with relative ease. The tape was a more gradual process, but once I freed her arms, she was able to help the escape effort.

"What happened to you?" I asked as she spit the last fibers of her gag from her mouth.

"I got ambushed in the bathroom. Stupid bitches."

"Ambushed? By whom? Why would they do that? What the hell is going on? Do you know why the power's out?" My frustration at the evening's sudden turn from unenjoyable to potentially deadly apparently decided to manifest itself in the form of verbal diarrhea. Under my articulated assault, Krystal's heart rate spiked again, then subsided. Her face took on a resigned look. Much as it had when we were kids and she was on a diet. She might not like what she was about to do, but she would do it anyway.

"Okay, Freddy, slow down. I owe you a little bit of truth for helping me out tonight. I gotta keep it brief; this isn't exactly the safest area to hide since it's the first place anyone who wants me will look."

"That's fair." In reality her point made me far less concerned with my own ignorance of the situation and more interested in extricating myself from it. However, I was genuinely curious, and Krystal was still wearing her corset. Besides, if push came to shove, I would probably be okay. Vampires can really haul some ass when needed.

"To begin with, I'm sorry I flaked out when you asked me about my job."

"It's okay, Krystal."

"Nah, it isn't. You're a sweet guy, Freddy, and I know how personally you take that kind of stuff. See, I didn't actually come here planning to talk with anyone tonight, but when I saw you sitting by your lonesome, I couldn't help myself. Then you caught me off guard with the job thing, and I didn't have a lie prepared."

"So, why did you come tonight if you weren't going to talk with anyone?" As I asked my question, she began rooting around the room blindly, groping under chairs and in cabinets.

"I came here on assignment for work."

"Will you elaborate this time?"

She let out a heavy sigh. "Damnit, Freddy, this is the kinda shit I was specifically trying to avoid. Look, I'll tell you what I do, but you won't believe me." She had finished the obvious places and began checking behind speakers and electronic equipment.

"Given that I just found you bound and gagged, my mind is somewhat more receptive than it might normally be."

"Well, then, here's the deal," Krystal said as she sat down next to me. "Everything you think you know about monsters is a lie. Ghouls, ghosts, werewolves, all of them and more are real and hiding out behind the scenes in our world. Officially they are known as ‘parahumans,’ and part of my job is to hunt down the ones that get out of hand. I work for an agency without an official name or address. I’m here because we learned that some local werewolves planned on using tonight as an all-you-can-eat buffet. You know, you can call me crazy at any point here, and I’ll shut up.”

“What about vampires?” I asked. From the look on her face, that was hardly the response she was expecting.

“Um, yeah. Vampires are real, too. They’re hard as shit to root out, though, and major league badasses to boot. Only the top operatives deal with those things.”

“I see,” I said. I was a little relieved. If they had thought that highly of vampires, it was unlikely I’d have to deal with this “agency” anytime soon.

“I gotta tell you here, Freddy. You’re taking this a hell of a lot better than I was expecting,” Krystal said, before resuming her hand-guided search around the room.

“It’s been an interesting few years. Besides, as I said, finding you stuffed under a table lends some credence to your story. What are you looking for anyway?”

“My purse. I need my gun and my silver bullets. I thought I heard them put them in here somewhere, but I didn’t really have a great vantage point, so I might be wrong.”

I could feel my skin prickle at the mention of silver. Still, if she was going to gun down several monsters, then she would need her weapon. I smelled carefully, trying to ignore her immediate scent. I needed to track the same smell, but a version that was muddled and fading. That would lead me to any objects that had spent long amounts of time around her, such as her purse. It took me only a few seconds to find it; the kidnappers had oh-so-cleverly put it inside one of the speakers. I got up to pull the speaker open, but a power cord had entangled my foot. So, instead I went crashing into it head first.

“Shit!” Krystal whisper-shouted. “Are you okay?”

“Fine. Just fine. Cheap plastic, and all that. Also, I think I found your purse.” I handed it to her as I pulled myself up and extricated my leg from the diabolical power cord.

“Awesome! You still rock, Freddy.” She pulled a handgun out from the purse, followed by a series of clips exuding a smell that made my stomach start churning. She tucked all that into her pants, then pulled out what appeared to be a pair of swimmer’s goggles with electronics glued to them. She adjusted the band and slipped them over her eyes. When she turned to me and waved, the gears clicked in my head, and I realized she was wearing extremely compact night vision goggles. I also realized I should probably pretend to be far less capable of seeing in darkness than I really was.

“Thanks for the assist, Freddy. You literally saved some lives tonight. Once this is all said and done, we should get lunch or something before we head home.”

“Sounds like a pleasant way to spend an afternoon.”

“Yeah.” She went to the door that led into the school’s second floor, pressing her ear against it and keeping her gun at the ready. Her free hand crept down to the knob, turning it slowly until it came to an abrupt stop. “Damn, it’s still locked.” Her head flicked toward me for a moment. Then she took a knee and produced a set of picks from her hair. In seconds she had the lock disabled and resumed her careful opening of the door. She pulled it open inch by inch, minimizing the sound and getting a full view of the hallway. After stepping out to make sure it was clear, she walked over to me.

“Okay, Freddy, listen close. The nearest balcony to here is to your right. Once you walk out the door, go right till you hit a wall, and then go to the left. Trace your hand along the wall on your right, and when you feel the third door, open it. It should be a classroom with a big window and door to an outside balcony. I know it will hurt, but you need to jump off that balcony and run to your car. Roll with the landing if you can—it will minimize chances you’ll break something. You got all that?”

“I believe I can handle it.”

“Good. One last thing.” She pushed a stiff, smooth rectangle into my hand. “That’s my card with my cell number. Give me a call when you’re safe, and let me know you lived through this. Okay?”

“I certainly will,” I lied.

She got up and headed back to the door. Gun in front she exited, pausing only to look at me once more. I remembered that I wasn’t supposed to be able to see those looks, and then that made them all the more curious. At any rate, I was ready to get out of here. Krystal had handed me an exit, and I had no inclination to let that information go to waste. I’m sure a Hollywood vampire would have run after her, swept her into his arms, and handled all the villains himself. That, however, was not me. All I wanted to do was get back to my hotel room safely and relax.

Werewolves, real or not, most definitely fell into the realm of someone else’s problem.

5.

Staring down from my hiding place on the balcony, I discovered that the werewolves fell squarely into the realm of my problem. There were three of them patrolling the parking lot, three sedan-sized mounds of fur and muscle, with teeth that looked as though they could tear through metal. They were staying low among the vehicles, visible only from a higher vantage point. So far two separate groups of humans had made it to the parking lot, only to be struck down before they could get near their cars. The werewolves weren't killing yet, just subduing. Every so often a howl would echo from the school's interior, and the sentries would perk their ears. I could only guess at what messages were being conveyed.

I was lying flat on the balcony, my eyes watching the scene from a nearby window's reflection. None of the options placed before me were too appealing. I could either vault the balcony and make a run for it, hope to stay here until the werewolves moved on, or sneak back into the school. The problems were that I didn't know if I could outrun these things. If I stayed here till sunup, I'd be dead anyway, and from the sounds inside, it seemed like other werewolves were working their way through the building. Once they caught my scent, I'd have no hope of hiding out. The heavy padding that arose from down the hall, behind my hiding spot, made my decision for me. At least with a running sprint, I'd have the advantage of surprise.

I shot upward and leapt the balcony's railing in a single motion. On pure instinct I rolled with the landing, and promptly cursed myself for wasting time instead of hitting the ground running. I recovered quickly and took off through the lot. I kept my speed in human limits to start with. I might only get one chance to outrun or maneuver these things, and I didn't want to give them any warning of what I could really do.

A pair of werewolves rushed out from the parking lot's entrance, trying to pincer me from both sides. They angled themselves diagonally, blocking the lanes to the left and right, and prepared to charge if I tried to go around them. I must admit; these things were far smarter than mere animals. The only options they had left me were to fruitlessly try to dodge and get torn to pieces, or to run smack into the grill of a pickup truck in front of me.

I chose the latter. I jumped atop the truck and over its roof without breaking stride. If you have never been fortunate enough to see a look of utter surprise race across a werewolf's face, I highly recommend you do so. My furry foes were forced to backpedal and change directions, getting into the rows on either side of me. No doubt they expected me to disembark from the truck and give them a chase on the ground. Their hopes were dashed when I vaulted directly from the truck onto the next car in line and kept running. Going from car to car would have been hard for humans, but not impossible. They would have to be exceptionally well balanced and in excellent shape to use the strategy at a full run, though. In life I was neither of those things; however, I was rather happily enjoying my advantage at that moment.

The chase continued across several lanes of parked cars. A few times one of my pursuers would try to mount a vehicle in hopes of overtaking me on higher ground, but their vast size and weight always made the footing unstable. They contented themselves to snapping at my heels, never quite snaring me but doing considerable damage to the metal beneath my feet. I sincerely hoped everyone who made it out of here was insured. Speed wise they were able to keep pace with me, unfortunately. The upside was that I could move faster than this if I needed, and while they would tire out eventually, I was under no such limitations. I allowed a cautious amount of optimism to creep over me. Once I tuckered these two out, I could make an earnest break for my car and escape. It seemed like I was going to be okay.

In keeping with the ways of the universe, it was at that moment I was run over by a third werewolf. I was so preoccupied with handling the two below me I had forgotten there was another to watch for. He slammed into me from his hiding place in the bed of a nearby truck and hurled me from my position. I crunched into a motorcycle a few yards away and lay there. A hit like that would have easily incapacitated a human, and as far as these things knew, that's what I was.

The one who hit me, a grey beast whose size seemed closer to the bear family than the wolf one, came over to me and sniffed. I kept myself still as death, which is ironically still quite difficult for me. Just because my body doesn't have to move doesn't mean my consciousness doesn't want to. The only concession I made was to move my chest up and down, making sure they all knew I was still "breathing." A sharp tug on my leg let me know they were dragging me to wherever they had taken the others. I kept my eyes closed and my false breathing steady.

My therapist says I have confrontation issues. He's not wrong. At least he better not be at his prices. As I lay there, being dragged toward who knows what, my thoughts were not on fighting my way free or saving the rest of the class. My mind was in my apartment in Winslow, Colorado, all those miles away, fervently trying to think of a way back there.

6.

By the time I felt like it was safe to “wake up,” I had been blindfolded and tied to a metal bar in, of all places, the gym. I couldn’t see anything through my black-fabric blindness, but I could smell the fear and blood coming from all my fellow victims. It seemed like nearly all of us were here, and from the sounds of struggling, they were just as restrained as I was. Four figures were moving around freely, two of them on four feet, and two of them as bipeds. There was no talking, only barks and snarling. In the far distance, I could vaguely make out the sounds of someone drawing closer to our location. Part of me hoped Krystal was coming to help out, but part of me wished she would just see it was hopeless and leave. She had been kind to me that night, reminding me of the few people I had liked and trusted in my living days. I didn’t want to see her get killed in some pointless attempt to save us. A loud, booming voice interrupted my attempts to track the approaching figure.

“Ten years!” It echoed, “Ten years since our pack was formed, ten years in secret, ten years in silence, ten years in darkness!”

It sounded familiar. Guttural and with a canine undertone, but familiar nonetheless. It continued, “You have all come here to reunite over what you once were, while we have come to see the last you will ever be. Tonight we no longer hunt in secret! Tonight we force the world to see us and accept us for what we are! A superior species to the weak humans!”

The voice I might never have placed; however, the ego shone through crystal clear. Brent Colter. Looks like my old bully had traded up in the world.

No wonder he was still so muscular and strong. Doesn't it figure? I become an undead creature of the night, and I can't even get a date. He becomes a glorified mutt, and he manages to pull off a grand murder plot. Jerk.

"Tonight we sacrifice all these souls to our goddess, Grwlbrkgrwl [Look, I'm doing my best to be accurate here, but if you know a way to transcribe a name that's pronunciation sounds like nails in a garbage disposal, then I'd love to see it.], who will bless us with the strength to overcome all who stand against us. Then we shall spread our strength until it is the humans who hide and live in fear, and never again the True Wolves!" Howls, of what I assumed was agreement, followed Brent's speech.

The bonds holding me in place were suddenly severed, though the ones binding my hands were left in tact, as I was pulled into the air by rough, coarse hands. A tug tore away my blindfold, affording me a full view of my surroundings. The party atmosphere had been largely wrecked by the mad trample for the doors. Tables and chairs were overturned, streamers and bits of costume littered the floor, and unclaimed nametags were scattered like confetti that yearned to be identified. In the center of the room now stood a small platform, and atop it a metal framing with straps for holding appendages. The roof had been opened, and moonlight was spilling down onto the new platform, illuminating a series of blades and blunt instruments attached to it.

My fellow classmates were all bound to the bleachers, arms tied together so they had no hope of getting free. They were blindfolded as well. It made a bit of somber sense—give someone a feeling of fear, and they get passive. Let them know inescapable death is at hand, and they'll fight with every measure of strength they have.

The hands holding me in the air did indeed belong to Brent, though they were much bigger than normal. He stood below me, half in wolf form, and half in human. He was at least seven-feet tall, covered in shaggy black hair, and his face was contorted into a hideous partial muzzle. The other two werewolves from the parking lot were still in full-fuzzball mode, though the grey wolf had shifted into a form similar to Brent's. I didn't recognize who the grey wolf was, but I'd had a voice and a personality to help me figure out Brent's identity through this morphed and furry visage. He smiled, I think, and his voice rumbled.

"Well, well, well . . . Faggy Freddy came back for the reunion, huh? I can't think of a better person to start with." With that he tossed me over his shoulder and began sauntering slowly toward what I had already come to think of as the Death Rack. He took his time, moving in a rhythmic precision that I can only assume was part of the ceremony. Panic was welling up in me, and it was looking more and more like my only chance was going to be showing my nature and making a dash. As I looked at my old classmates, though, my constant plan of flight faltered. These people weren't ones I particularly cared about; however, it still sickened me that they were lined up like cattle waiting to be slaughtered. In fact, that's exactly what they were. As I stared at them, I began wondering what kind of lives they had, what families would miss them when they were gone. Sure, I'd coped with my death easily, but my life hadn't been that great either. I hadn't had anyone who would miss me. All of this was bouncing around my skull during Brent's slow march toward the Death Rack, my eyes trained on all these helpless people. And then, staring at them made me realize something entirely different.

They were all blindfolded. That meant they couldn't see me. For the next ten seconds or so, I was free of the rack and there were no human witnesses. My eyes began darting around, desperately searching for something I could use to turn this situation in my favor. We were halfway to the rack when I saw what I was looking for. It would be close, but I had a shot. Brent continued moving forward in that strange, faltering manner. When we were only a few steps away, I sprang to life (so to speak). I snapped the cords tying my arms, pushed off Brent's shoulder, and knocked him off balance. I had a feeling he wouldn't let go. Thankfully, I was able to stagger him enough to make a diving lean for my target.

As I look back, it seems like there were a number of options available to me. I could have grabbed a plank off the bleacher wall and cracked it into my adversary's spine, I could have sunk my fangs into his arms and ripped myself free, or I even could have used my strength to punch him in the head. I didn't do any of those things. The problem with all of those solutions is that I was never a violent person, and a few death and near-death situations weren't going to change that. I was still me. So, I took advantage of the fact that the Kent party planning committee had anticipated all foreseeable (or so they thought) emergencies.

I pulled myself to the wall and chomped down on a fire extinguisher. I don't know if this is something you've ever had occasions to do; however, I recommend against it unless you have a vampire's jaws and body temperature because that stuff comes out fast, and it comes out cold. In seconds a white mist had filled the air around me, coating everything with the slick, white, flame-dousing foam. I said a silent "thank you" that it was a full-size model and not a dinky miniature. I wriggled free of Brent's grip in the confusion, taking care once I hit the ground due to its slipperiness. From the startled yelps and sounds of impact, it seemed that the werewolves couldn't maneuver so well in these conditions.

I felt Brent shift from beside me and rear back. By the time his fist struck the wall, I was on his opposite side. It took only a well-timed shove to send him sprawling to the ground where he scuttled around, trying to get footing. I must say I took extreme pleasure in that part. The initial mist was already clearing, though the white foam was going nowhere, so I capitalized on the chance to free my fellow classmates.

I didn't bother freeing their hands; instead I pulled a knife from a nearby gladiator costume and began cutting the cords that held them to the wall. Tearing off their blindfolds as I went left them free to escape if they wanted, albeit their hands were still tied in the matter. Heh, heh.

They were funneling out of the door to the south, and I was making good progress, but the werewolves were regaining their footing. I was only a quarter of the way through, and it began to look like that was all I would get done. The whole pack was in pure wolf form now, and with four feet on the ground and no mist in the eyes, they were rising like the tide from that cold, damp floor. I'd done all I could do, and now my only choices were to free as many as I could before they attacked, or to run like the hounds of hell were chasing me . . . which they would be.

I flipped over the knife in my hand a few times and swallowed out of habit. No more clever justifications or stall tactics left, no way to convince myself the people I left behind would find their own way out. Anyone I left here would undoubtedly die. Painfully. Whatever I did now, I'd have to live with for the rest of my unlife. I looked at the four, behemoth killing machines advancing toward me, then at the shivering humans helplessly lined up along the wall.

I made my decision.

That's when the gunshots rang out.

7.

“You were really waiting back in the commentator’s box that whole time?” I asked.

“Well, not the whole time,” Krystal said. “I saw them take you down, so I followed where they brought you. The box had been trashed and I figured they’d realized I was gone. It seemed like the best place for me to be was the one I knew they wouldn’t look.” She poured five packets of sugar into her coffee, followed by at least three creamer packets. Stirring without spilling was shaping up to be an ordeal.

Krystal and I, still in costume no less, were sitting in a small all-night diner a few miles away from the high school. It was 3 a.m., and the emergency vehicles could still be seen heading to and fro along the highway.

“I have to wonder, what will the official story be on this?” I said as she began slurping down her diabetes in a cup.

“Mental breakdown by charismatic former athlete prompted him to create a murder cult.” Her words came between rapid gulps of the steaming beverage.

“And our part in it?”

“Never happened. Local law enforcement responded with quick, surgical precision and averted a potential catastrophe. Sadly, the cult members were unwilling to listen to reason and had to be brought down. Two men on the force will be getting promotions.”

I shook my head. “You don’t think the two men receiving these rewards will be a little suspicious?”

“I think that this happens more than you might expect, and that the men who receive them will be chosen because they are either too dumb or too smart to question it.”

Our conversation was cut short by the doddering waitress finally arriving with our food. Egg white omelet for me, waffles and bacon for Krystal. I lectured her for at least five minutes on cholesterol after she ordered. We dug into our food, but my eating was more for appearance's sake. I'd taken a healthy draw from my flask while driving over, so I was quite full after the night's festivities. We dined in peace for a few minutes. Krystal spoke up midway through the food, words slurred and muffled by her syrup-slathered batter morsels.

“So, when did you die anyway?” she asked. I started to choke on my omelet, then remembered I didn't need to breathe. I swallowed the lump down slowly.

“I have no idea what you mean.”

“Sure you do. You're a vampire.” She didn't look at me or slow down her intake while making her accusations. Impressive.

“I'm an accountant, Krystal, though tonight I was costumed as a doctor. I live alone in my two-bedroom apartment and watch a lot of movies in my free time. Nothing about me really screams vampire.” As I finished my rebuttal, she took a long draw from her coffee cup. Putting it down, she wiped her mouth and pushed her food to the side. She locked eyes with me.

“Fact number one, you rescued me where the door to the corridor was locked, which means your only way in was to scale the wall. You did so without making any noise, or I would have noticed. Fact two, you were one of the most skeptical people I ever knew, and yet when I told you the world was full of monsters, all you wanted was information on one type of them. Fact three, I tailed you after you left the commentator's box and watched your little circus show on top of the cars. You've never been nearly athletic or coordinated to pull anything like that off. Fact four, you jerked free of a werewolf and bit through a damn fire extinguisher. Despite what you might think, I'm good at my job and you're not very practiced at hiding your nature.

Now will you give it up and just answer my question so I can keep eating?” She cocked an eyebrow with her ending question, waiting for me to respond. I motioned for her to go ahead and she began shoveling her food again.

“It’s nothing too exciting. I got grabbed off the street about a year ago and fainted from the shock. When I woke up, I was like this.”

“Kept the same job, huh?”

“Yes. I like what I do, and I didn’t see any reason to give it up.”

“Makes sense. Want to go out tomorrow night?”

“What?!!” In my defense, I didn’t have a lot of experience with beautiful women asking me out. She took it in stride.

“You’re a nice guy. We’ve got a good history. Plus, you aren’t that hard on the eyes. Besides, you actually know what I do for a living. Do you know how nice it will be to go out with a guy who I don’t have to keep lying to?”

I mulled it over. “How do you know I’m not a bad vampire? What if I’m the kind you have to hunt down?”

“You aren’t. I called in your plates while I drove over here. You’ve got a spotless reputation. A pretty boring one, actually.” She gave me a wink with a grin tugging on her mouth.

And there it was. My unlife was so boring that even the woman who hunted monsters saw me as harmless. The one risk I had taken had backfired horribly. I wound up chased, beaten, and nearly killed by werewolves.

Of course, I was sitting across from a very good looking woman who was asking me on a date. Maybe my first risk hadn’t played out so badly in the end. Maybe it was time for another. After all, I did still have four days of clean clothes and blood. Plenty of time to schedule some spontaneity.

“I’ll pick you up after sunset,” I told her, mustering all my courage and including a flirtatious smile with my invitation.

A Zombie at the LARP

1.

When I woke up the morning after being turned into a vampire, I knew some things were going to have to change. I would not be able to make it into work at the accounting firm anymore, I would have to forgo any walks into sunshine, and I would need to get used to a far more liquid-based diet. These were things I understood and accepted with a humble grace. What I did not expect was that the accounting business I started to accommodate my new lifestyle would explode with popularity.

At a time when most people were making plans for the upcoming Thanksgiving holiday, I was working around the clock trying to meet deadlines for all the new clients I had recently received. I'm not exaggerating, either. We vampires don't have to sleep during the day; we just have the option. At night I can take enough Percocet to kill a bear and still be wide eyed. In the day, however, the mystical forces that animate my now-dead body relent and allow me to slip into slumber. At least they did before the rush of work had kept me up for three nights and days straight.

It was really my own fault. I had taken some time off to attend my high school reunion and come back to a mountain of new assignments that had arrived in my absence. I could have turned some of them down, of course, but that would have involved talking on the phone, and possibly yelling or shouting, and the truth is, I'm just not very good at confrontations.

Now, I know what you're thinking. Who ever heard of a vampire that was scared of conflict? Well, I was non-confrontational in life, so I am still non-confrontational in death. Yes, we vampires are portrayed as a group of, for lack of a better term, “badasses,” but as far as I can tell, we are greatly similar to who we were when our hearts still beat, only with paler skin and more physical prowess. Granted, that is based solely on my experience because I have made no effort to seek out others of my kind. The only run in I had had with other supernatural beings happened at my aforementioned reunion, and it had been anything but low stress.

As I clapped a pair of documents together and joined them with a paperclip, I let out a sigh. Yes, I can still sigh, and I still make a habit of intaking oxygen with my lungs, though I do not know if it still qualifies as breathing at this point. I was nearing the end of this week’s work, but I still had hours of filing and data entry left. It was tedious work that required no special skills and was usually outsourced to temps or assistants. Since I had neither and suspected none would be willing to work with someone of my . . . condition, that meant the grunt work fell firmly on my own narrow shoulders.

I went to the fridge and pulled out a thermos, then popped it in the microwave. After a few minutes it was ready, and I all but cannonballed it. I overeat when stressed, which is why I was a portlier fellow in my living days. Now all I have to worry about is a larger bill for the blood I buy, but with all this work, it would be easy to afford. I could always cut that cost in theory, but my few attempts at feedings were less than spectacular. The last of these excursions, a pitiful effort capping off a string of failures, began with trying to skulk along a rooftop as I trailed a lone pedestrian, followed by tripping on loose brick and cracking myself in the mouth, then ended with me taking a tumble into a nearby apartment’s dumpster. That was when I learned the downside of vampire senses, along with the fact that the building in question hosted an unusually large number of babies still in diapers. There was no dry-cleaning out that smell from a pair of khakis. So, I just purchase my blood from a business acquaintance that runs a local hospital and has need for the services of an exceptional accountant.

Dabbing my mouth with one of my black napkins (you can only imagine the stains I got when I still used white ones), I washed out my thermos and began heading back to my desk. I worked in my apartment, which was windowless and possessed excellent security. I also had all work sent and returned via a courier service. It made sure I could lead the lifestyle I desired in the privacy I loved. Aside from the courier, there were only a few people who knew my address, and my apartment complex was not the sort where uninvited guests could saunter in to talk to the residents about religion or the incredible savings opportunity that they were presenting to a select few.

Which is the reason the thundering knock on my door garnered such a severe and shocked reaction from me, as I leapt several feet in the air and let out a small squeak. I am not exaggerating about the distance I jumped. I did mention the undead lifestyle comes with a few side perks. One of them is muscular ability beyond the range of human limitations. Another was heightened senses, which told me there was the heartbeat of one person outside my door at that moment. I know what you're thinking; if I could hear so well, how did they catch me by surprise? Well, I don't go around using my heightened senses willy-nilly. Just think of how distracting that would be, especially when I am trying to get work done.

Gathering my composure, I walked over to the door, undid several deadbolts, and pulled it open a few inches to see who would disturb a working vampire in the evening. As it turned out, the answer was a tall, curvy blonde in grey slacks and a red, buttoned-down, collared shirt. The colors didn't do much to accentuate her chocolate brown eyes, but the confidence reflecting out of them was all the accentuation they needed.

"Hey, Freddy," Krystal said, slipping her way past the door and giving me a hug.

"How did you know where I lived?" I asked. I was excited to see her, and should have really done a better job showing it, but at that precise moment, the fear from the surprise was still surging strongly through me.

"We've been through this, Freddy. Mysterious agency, no name that I can give out, impossible connections and information sources—you know the drill. Got any beer?" She kissed me on the cheek and meandered over to my fridge. Getting a hold of myself, I shut the door firmly and re-engaged all of my locks, then turned my attention to the blonde rifling through my meagerly stocked refrigerator.

Krystal and I had gone to school together and had run in similar social circles. By that I mean we were both shunted to the bottom with the rest of the dregs and forced to be friends with other people no one else liked. Time, along with a good dietician and an active lifestyle, had changed her body and found her in the employment of an agency dedicated to dealing with supernatural creatures and events. We had become reacquainted at our high school reunion during an attack from a group of former football-star werewolves, and struck up something of a romantic interlude before I had returned home. Again, though, I wondered if we were drawn together out of necessity, her living a life she couldn't tell a normal man about, and me . . . well me being of those things that aren't allowed to be talked about.

"We have got to get you stocking some beer. Merlot, blood, and brie are all that's in here. You're killing me, Freddy." She shut the fridge door and gave me one of her careless smiles. Whatever her lifestyle had done to her over the past ten years, it had certainly made her beautiful. Perhaps this wasn't just about convenience.

"Well, I would have prepared if I had known you were coming by. I haven't seen you since our date after the reunion fiasco," I said.

"Ugh, I know. Sorry about that. Had to fly to Greece to track down some marauding ghouls. Took forever, and the company plan doesn't cover unauthorized international calls to undead romantic interests," she said, waltzing over to my couch and plopping down.

"Ah yes, well . . . they, um . . . they don't actually know we went out, do they? I mean, I imagine they would be less than chipper to learn one of their agents is dating a vampire," I said, sitting down in the chair set catty-corner to the couch.

"Of course they know. I reported it in before we even went out. No cares about that though. They just wouldn't pony up to pay the long distance charges," she said.

“They don’t care that you’re dating a vampire?” I don’t think I did a very good job keeping the shock out of my voice.

“Nope, that would be discriminatory. We work hard to maintain good relationships with all parahuman communities, and that includes Undead Americans,” she explained.

“You must be making this up.”

“Totally serious. There are equal rights laws, a set up voting system, even tax benefits to hiring Undead Americans if you run a business. It’s a big, wide world, Freddy. You should really leave your little bat cave sometime and go see it. You’d be surprised at some of the things out there,” Krystal said, getting up from the couch and coming over to my chair. She set herself gently on my lap. “For example, you could come out with me tonight. We could go to a greasy diner, pick up some decent beer, maybe take in a midnight showing at a movie theatre and not pay attention to what’s on the screen.”

“I, uh . . . um . . . yes . . . well . . .” Being a vampire grants you many things. A sudden burst of intuition and confidence with the opposite sex sitting directly on top of you is sadly not one of them.

Krystal laughed. “Glad to see you still get flustered so easily. It was always one of your more adorable traits. So, you want to come?”

“Well . . . ahem . . . I suppose I have almost caught up on tonight’s work.”

“Great!” Krystal hopped from my lap and pulled me up with her. “It’ll be tons of fun. Just you, and me, and the city at night.” She began unlocking my door and pulling it open. “There’s just one little thing I have to stop and do while we’re out. Quick errand, won’t take a minute.” With that she unlatched the final lock and all but bounced out the door.

“What kind of errand?” I asked as I hurried to catch up, stopping outside to lock all of the bolts. She paid no attention to me though, galloping down the hallway and out into the parking lot.

“Krystal?” I called as I finished locking and moved briskly out into the parking lot. “I’m serious. Where are we going? What kind of errand?”

2.

“Welcome, everyone, and thank you for coming to this week’s Black Banshee Role Playing Game.” The speaker was young, maybe sixteen or seventeen, wearing what had to be a suit from the 1950’s and sporting glasses and a haircut that matched. He moved with a strange confidence; then again, perhaps it was just strange because it was confidence of any kind in this setting.

Scattered around me were a variety of people, ranging in age from the frequent teenager to the more elusive adult. Most were wearing somewhat elaborate costumes. Many of them sported fake fangs and were wearing makeup in order to pale their skin, a few wore heavily furred gloves and wolf masks, and there was even one person who looked to have stolen his ghost-sheet costume straight out of Charlie Brown.

“As all of you should know, my name is Neil, and I will be your Game Master this evening. Now, since all of you registered your characters beforehand, my assistant Albert will be working the table near the front. We do ask that you check in, take your badge, and keep it somewhere visible all night long. Your badge identifies your character name, race, and what faction you belong to, if any. I’ll remind those of you who are new to our LARP, any information on the badge that is in black is considered general knowledge, and information on the badge that is in red is known only to those of you in the same race. Gaining that information will have to happen through interaction, so please, no metagaming. Albert will also hand you our general rules sheet, so check in as soon as possible. Once everyone is accounted for, we can get this game started!” He threw his fist in the air at that last line, then took a deep bow. He left his soapbox of a stage (yes, it was actually a soapbox; no, I have no idea where he found such a thing) to the sound of scattered clapping.

If you are wondering, I was most certainly not one of those clapping.

“Please explain to me how this is an errand,” I told Krystal with as much unfriendliness as I was able to conjure into my voice. It wasn’t much.

“It’s no big deal,” she said, taking my hand and leading me over to a line that had sprung up around a large folding table decorated with badges, sheets of a paper, and one solo attendant (presumably Albert) doing his damndest to keep up with the influx of people swarming him. “There have been some reports of a shambling figure seen here after hours, and a few reports of missing animals. Ten bucks says it’s just some kid staying late to practice his act and a coincidental upturn in runaways, but I have to come check this out anyway.”

“Well . . . how long does it usually last?” I asked, already feeling the familiar symptoms of caving in to doing what someone else wanted me to.

“Only three hours, and we should be gone in half of that,” Krystal said. She wrapped her arms around me, then slithered her hand up to my head and gently raked her fingernails through my hair while pressing close to me, making her . . . non-mental assets very apparent. “I promise there will still be ample time to go ignore a movie,” she purred.

One thing about being a vampire that doesn’t entirely suck, pun unremorsefully intended, is the ability to sense and pick up on things humans miss all the time. For example, when Krystal wrapped herself around me like that, I heard her heart beat increase, felt the warmth of blood flow to various places, and smelled the increase of pheromones she was putting out. It’s one thing to have a beautiful woman blatantly flirting with you; it’s a whole other thing to have biological evidence she really means it.

“Um . . . well . . . we . . . okay,” I said, giving in, to no one’s surprise (especially not my own). Krystal kissed me on the cheek and pulled back her body while dialing down the sex appeal, though not quite letting either slip away from me entirely.

“You’re the best, Freddy. And who knows? You might even have fun.”

“I seriously doubt that,” I said as we moved ever so slowly through the throng of would-be players clamoring for their badges.

“Why not?” Krystal asked.

“I can’t do pretend very well. I mean, I like the idea of acting, but I get so nervous. Remember when I tried out for the theatre program sophomore year? I vomited all over the stage before I finished my first line.”

“Oh yeah, you know I’d forgotten that,” she said. “Still, it wasn’t as bad as when you tried out for choir.”

“Let us not visit that rest stop on memory road. My stomach is churning already,” I said.

Krystal let out a surprisingly throaty laugh. It drew looks from the few un-distracted players around us. I suppose they were sensitive to the idea of laughter, but upon seeing it wasn’t directed at them, most just turned their attention back to the table. There were a few who didn’t, and given how Krystal looked in comparison to most of the others there, I could hardly blame them.

“You can’t throw up, dum-dum,” Krystal told me when she was done giggling. “I mean that literally. Your kind doesn’t have the ability to do that.”

“We don’t?” I asked.

“Have you tried?”

“Why on earth would I try?” I said, a touch exasperated that she still seemed to know more about what I was than I did.

“Hmm, good point. Yes, you can’t puke. It’s one of those things you lost.”

“Oh,” I said. I didn’t mean for it to sound sad. It certainly wasn’t a great loss, the ability to void my stomach in a backwards direction, but it was yet again one more thing that made me less human. Those were becoming all too frequent for my liking.

“Cheer up, buttercup,” Krystal said as we reached the front of the line. She whispered to me before turning to Albert the attendant, “One day I’ll help you discover all of the things you've gained. I think you'll be pleasantly surprised by a few of them. I know I will." With that line lingering in my ear and echoing through my libido, she did an about face to speak with the young man staring up (though not quite as up as he should have been to see her face) at her.

"Krystal Jenkins and Freddy Fletcher checking in," she said with a warm smile. It seemed to catch poor Albert off guard, as he suddenly turned flustered and began digging about for our badges. Of course, given how unfriendly everyone seemed to have been to him, I could understand why he would falter at a changeup. He was young and wore a dirty black shirt and dirtier black pants. I wasn't sure what the organizer had made him do before this, but I only imagine it involved digging because that kid reeked of earth. Not a bad smell really, just a potent one.

He finally found our badges and handed them both to Krystal. He hesitated for a moment before letting go and looked at mine, then up at me, then back at mine.

"Is that what you're going to wear?" Albert asked in a not-quite-squeaky, not-quite-grown-up teenage voice. Though the question was probing, his tone was surprisingly friendly.

I looked at my ensemble. I was wearing a robin's egg blue sweater vest on top of a white buttoned-down shirt along with a pair of black slacks and sensible black shoes. I did stand out a bit compared to everyone else, but I hadn't really been told to dress for this, now had I?

"Um, is that a problem?" I asked him.

"Not a problem, just wondering. Your character is your character," he said, handing me a sheet of paper, then motioned me to the side so he could help the next person. "Personally, I think it's really neat that you decided to take your costume in a different direction. You two have a great night."

I joined Krystal a few strides away from the line. "What's wrong with my outfit?" I asked her.

"It doesn't fit your character so well," she said, a wicked grin lighting up her face.

“Oh, yes, on that note, this whole event requires registration and character creation beforehand. So how is it that you just happened to have an ID badge ready for me and under my name?” I asked, really just for form. The answer was all too obvious.

“I thought this would suck, so I wanted company. Sexy, dangerous, vampire company,” she said, the laughing smile staying firmly on her face as she reached out and put her hand against my chest.

“Shhh!” I fervently whispered, welling up with panic. “What if someone hears you?”

“Check your badge there, Freddy. It’s black-print information. Everyone will know when they see you,” Krystal said, pulling her own badge out and affixing it to her shirt.

“Huh?” I said idiotically, and I looked at the front of my clothes. Sure enough, clearly slipped on there when she touched my chest, was my badge affixed carefully on the breast pocket of my sweater vest. It took me a moment to unravel its words as I read them upside down.

It said: “Name: Count Fredrick. Race: Vampire.” Then in red print below that it said: “Faction: Revivalist. “

“You made me a vampire?”

“You did say you hated pretending.”

“Are you one too?” I asked, not bothering to read her tag. Given where she had attached it on her shirt, I could see no easy way to read it without being something of a pervert.

“I’m Sunny the Succubus,” she said, her voice up a few registers and her tone lilting. She sounded like a mixed breed between the stereotype of a cheerleader and the stereotype of a valley girl.

“What’s a succubus?” I asked.

“Demon slut,” she said simply in her own voice. Ah, well then, that made the accent quite appropriate. I wondered for a moment just how much time she put into preparing for this role. This short thought process was interrupted as she took my hand once more.

“Looks like they’re almost ready to start,” she said, slipping back into her character tones. “Come on. Let’s go mingle!”

3.

“All right, everyone, thank you all for checking in,” Neil the Game Master said as he climbed back atop his soapbox to address us. Something about this kid still struck me as weird. It wasn’t the clothing or the style either; he was odd, but nowhere near the weirdest guy in attendance. It’s just something in the way he moved. I couldn’t put my finger on it, but I knew it was there. I didn’t really pay that much mind to it, though. I mean, after all, I was a vampire who hid the fact that he was a vampire who was standing in a park pretending to be the thing that I usually pretend I’m not. Who was I to throw stones at weird?

“Before we begin, I just want to go over the rules on your sheets so that everyone knows the system, and we can all have fun. To start with, we do not do realistic battle simulations here. I saw some of you bring your foam weapons, but, unfortunately, we’ve had some lawsuit trouble in the past and have decided it’s not worth the risk. Any fighting will be resolved by a match of rock-paper-scissors. If you fight someone of the same race, then it will be a best 2-out-of-3 match to represent how much more difficult these fights are,” Neil said, reading from his sheet out to the crowd. I heard mumbles as a few costumed participants set down large, foam-weapon recreations on the ground, faces all but dripping in disappointment. Albert scuttled around swiftly gathering up the weapons and setting them on the folding table where the badges had been.

“Now then, aside from combat, all of you have your own powers and abilities. These are written on the backs of your badges should you forget or need to prove to another player this is a power you really possess. Success is considered automatic, unless another player has immunity to that particular ability. In cases where a player with a power deals with another player who only has a resistance to that power, and not an immunity, we will again be going to the rock-paper-scissors method of resolving who comes out on top,” Neil continued. If that made no sense to you, don’t feel bad. I was slack-jawed and flummoxed by the time he finished that part. I simply hoped I would either figure it out as I played or be gone soon enough that it wouldn’t matter.

“Last, but certainly not least, this is a Live Action Role Playing game. All of you being of different races and factions have gathered here as the new emperor of the city requested to try and forge an alliance between the various supernatural cultures living in his domain. For this to be the most enjoyable event it can be, I ask that you truly commit to your roles. Do not break character unless it is a vital emergency. In this way, we can forget the names we have behind our badges and truly immerse ourselves into tonight’s identities.” I had to admit, I was a touch envious; this kid was a better public speaker than I had ever been. I’d tried to correct that particular failing on many occasions, each an unmitigated disaster, often with gastrointestinal consequences. “And now, I’ll ask you to meet up with those of your race and faction as you arrive at the emperor’s ball. When I step down from here, the game has begun, and I am your ruler: Emperor Nikolai.”

He didn’t step down as much as hop, but the symbolism was there, and we got the message. I turned to ask Krystal what I should do now, only to find her gone. I whipped my head around looking for her, but before I could do more than look to my side, a small hand grabbed me by the shoulder.

The small hand belonged to a proportionally small woman, maybe early twenties in age, wearing heavy white makeup and a long black trench coat coupled with a corset and leather pants. Her badge told me her character name was Maria, and that she was a vampire like me. The fake fangs I saw a moment later when she spoke assured me that she was definitely a vampire only while this game was in progress.

“Good evening, Count Fredrick. Our Lord Drake will be so pleased another nightwalker loyal to the cause has joined us this evening,” she said, slurring slightly due to the fangs.

“Um . . . yay, and verily I hath come?”

The look she gave me said quite clearly my vampire impression had missed the mark. Luckily for me the girl was a pro; she rolled with it well. “There is no need to imitate the high language, Count Fredrick. Clearly you were turned recently, so this generation’s tongue is your own. Speak freely and comfortably, for our Lord Drake cares nothing of cultural differences, only of loyalty and dedication. We are all equally united under our cause.”

“Okay . . . thanks. And, you know, just so I know we’re on the same page here, which cause are you talking about? I’m active in a few of them actually. I used to do walks for cancer before the whole turning thing and—”

Mercifully Maria cut me off with one finger against my lips and one pointing to the red writing on my badge that said “Revivalist.” I finally noticed she had the same writing on her own. The pieces fell into place. Well, admittedly, they were more jammed into place forcefully, but I got the point, and that was what mattered.

“Oh, yes, right! The true cause. Forgive me, I have not eaten anyone in a few days, and I’ve grown a bit muddled round the temples, if you know what I mean,” I said, thinking on my feet. I really did get foggy when I went a few days without blood, so hopefully that was a part of this vampire mythos as well.

“Of course, good Count. With the preparations for tonight’s event, all of us have been exceptionally busy. I can hardly fault you for putting the cause’s success over the needs of your own thirst. Worry not, for tonight enough blood shall flow to sate the hunger in all of our throats. But enough talk here . . . we must hurry to meet with Lord Drake. Time is already short, and even the lesser monsters have ears with which to hear,” Maria said, tugging me toward a big cluster of trees.

We went through that cluster, then through a few more, down a twisting dirt road, and then through more trees. I was making a mental note to myself to take a free night and see just how big this freaking park was when we broke into a clearing. It would have seemed like a natural clearing one might stumble into in a real forest, save for the dozen figures in makeup and the picnic table located in the center.

“Ah, my maiden Maria returns to us from her mission seeking stragglers,” said a large man wearing a velvet ruffled shirt, a leather cape, and what looked like combat boots.

“Aye, my Lord Drake, I come bearing Count Fredrick. His invitation to meet us separately from the others of our ilk was lost, so I escorted him to join us tonight,” Maria said, using her jacket to do a curtsy as she spoke. I had to give the girl credit; she was good at this. She knew I had no idea what was going on and had still managed to weave me into this story quite nicely.

“Arise, my servant,” said the large man who I could only surmise was Lord Drake. “We have much to do this eve, and so precious little time to do it.” Lord Drake turned to me. “And you, good Count, we thank you for your support. As you can see, our force is small, so we shall seek victory through strategy and cunning. A single, loyal vampire may very well be the difference between success and failure.”

Lord Drake walked back over to the picnic table and settled down his considerable heft. The other “vampires” followed suit, so I made my way over as well. I had no idea what Krystal was up to, but it seemed like my best bet was to play along and blend in until she finished her job, and we could bail.

“My dark children,” Lord Drake began. “For too long we have been forced to live this way. Feeding in secret, locked within the shadows, existing as nothing more than myth and fancy in the eyes of the cattle we call humans.” There were mumbles of agreement that rippled through the table. I myself made mumbles of non-committal curiosity. The differences are subtle, but very important.

“We have suffered much humiliation at the hands of those in charge. Worse yet, most of our kind have been domesticated. They truly believe a vampire is meant to slink and sip, instead of dominate and destroy. We are the strongest beasts here, and yet we walk as if dogs with tails between our legs, ashamed of our own power and grandeur.” The agreement was getting a touch more boisterous now. I was oddly reminded of pep rallies in high school. Everyone was getting fired up around me, yet it was abundantly clear that I was not a part of what was going on.

“And now, the final insult. A mere human trickster, a mage, being made the emperor of our sweet city. This is a blow which I fear we cannot bear. I will not bow to cattle. I will not scrape my knee to the ground for nothing more than a human with a few cantrips. That is why we gather here tonight, my dark children, so that we may carry out our plan to revive our rightful place in this world’s hierarchy.”

They weren’t mumbling anymore; they were downright cheering. The only ones who were moderately subdued were me and my guide, Maria, who just stared on with wonder and fascination in her eyes.

“Tonight, we do what should have been done long ago. Tonight we remind this world that vampires are creatures to be feared, not handled. Tonight we leave the shadows and put ourselves back on the path toward our rightful place of rulers over the cattle and the lesser monsters.” Lord Drake leaned in closely now, and the cheering died in an instant. Everyone was still as death, no pun intended, as the great Lord Drake licked his lips and let his next words fly.

“Tonight, my dark children, we kill the emperor!”

4.

“I have got to stop leaving the apartment,” I mumbled to myself as we skulked through the forest towards the main area where everyone was assembled. I mean “skulked” in a very literal way. It seems all of we Revivalist vampires had an ability to blend in with the scenery and become more or less invisible. According to the back of the badge, the way we signified this was by moving hunching over and moving carefully, as well as putting up our index fingers on both sides of our heads.

That’s right; I was hunching my way through the forest with finger horns. Somehow, when I was human and dreamed about a different kind of life, one where I was powerful and immortal, this was a scenario I had never imagined. Most of those fantasies had been cheap rip-offs of well-done films, involving me being socially gregarious as well as unstoppably cool. I couldn’t even fathom what would make someone incorporate something this asinine into their own fantasies. Still, I was supposed to blend, so blend I did.

It took us considerable time to get back to the main event, mostly because of our slow moving pace, but finally we parted a section of trees and found ourselves facing the mingling crowd and a folding table stocked with foam weapons. Lord Drake jerked his head northward, and we began our agonizing walk in that direction.

Let me tell you something: I’ve been forced to do some ridiculous things in my lifetime. I’ve put my head in the toilet for swirlies, eaten dirt, even been made to dance like a cha-cha girl on one humiliating occasion, all to avoid being beaten up. For the dickens though, I cannot imagine what would make someone willingly do what we did as we crept through the crowd. We did our hunch walk with our finger horns, skulking through them, all the while pretending they couldn't see us. Adding to the oddness, they all clearly noticed us and wanted to know what was going on, but had to pretend we were invisible.

It was like embarrassment and stupidity, compacted. To their credit, not one person broke character and approached us, and we moved past the majority of the players into a more open area on the north side of the park. From there we could see Emperor Nikolai speaking in hushed tones to some of the other players. One of them was the person with the Charlie Brown ghost costume, and one looked to be wearing a werewolf mask, so they were pretty obvious. The other two I recognized even more easily, though. They were Albert the Henchman and my own dear Sunny the Succubus.

I briefly wondered why she was a part of the little pow-wow, but I guessed it made sense. If you need to investigate, why not go right to the top?

None of that changed the plan, though. Lord Drake had known that Emperor Nikolai would be speaking to a few delegates at a time, with only his servant Albert as protection. I wasn't sure what kind of monster Albert was, and I hadn't had a chance to ask, but Lord Drake seemed pretty certain we would be able to overpower him easily. The goal here was for us to creep up on the separated few and spring into action. Each of us was supposed to do battle with one of the delegates, while Lord Drake and two of his servants took down the emperor. That way the "kill" would be assigned to Lord Drake and he would then have cause to lobby that he should be the new emperor. New emperor means he makes the rules, which means no more hiding from the humans, and yada yada yada.

The main point I had gleaned from all of that was I needed to pick a person and play rock-paper-scissors with them. Either they won, or I did. After that none of this was my problem anymore, and hopefully Krystal was ready to go.

We resumed our skulking, moving delicately, yet purposefully, toward our soon-to-be-deposed emperor. Lord Drake, Maria, and another girl broke off to circle around toward the rear where the emperor was located. The rest of us continued creeping up on our targets. Since I was near her side anyway, I locked my vision on Krystal and decided to “battle” her. I think it was because I was focused only on her that I noticed the quick gesture she made, scratching the top of her nose with her thumb. I had only an instant to ponder why she would use a thumb instead of a finger, when strange words rang through the air.

“Ectorim Novendum, Bicradalio.” It was Neil’s voice, and it rang out with authority and power, more than I would have ever thought the kid capable of. When he spoke again, it was somewhat less impressive.

“As you have all noticed, you are now frozen in place thanks to my spell,” Emperor Nikolai said, closing the large black tome he had obviously read from and handing it to Albert. “None of you have applicable immunities or resistances, and yes, we are quite aware that you Revivalists are here. Your camouflage power was dispelled the moment I froze you.”

There was a ripple of gasping and shock from our vampires as well as nearby players.

“I’d suspected for some time you might try an uprising, so I took necessary precautions,” he continued. At this point Krystal, or I should say Sunny, bounced over and stood smiling dumbly as he slipped an arm around her. “My new consort here is a succubus, and as most of you should know, they possess the ability to see past all veils and illusions.”

Emperor Nikolai released his grip on Sunny and walked over to Lord Drake, who, to his credit, was remaining stock still, and leaned into Drake’s face. “So, the great Lord Drake reduced to nothing more than a mere mannequin. How elegantly pathetic. You underestimated me Drake; you thought that just because I was genetically a human I would go down easy. After all, what possible threat can a mere mage be?” Emperor Nikolai stepped back from Drake and walked back over to his own group, picking up the black book from Albert’s waiting hands.

“You should have done a little research first, Drake. You might have realized I’m not just a mage. I’m a necromancer, a spell caster with power over all forms of death, and that includes the undead. Binding you walking corpses required little more effort from me than turning a page.” Emperor Nikolai gave Drake a look of sheer condescension, gloating without restraint. “Now the only question is what to do with you all. I think I shall unbind you, after wrapping you in silver chains of course, so that Albert may escort you back into the forest. I will finish up my party with my dear subjects, and spend the time thinking of a fitting punishment for you.”

With that the emperor clapped his hands, and Albert pulled a large chest from behind a tree. He began pulling out long lengths of chain as well as several padlocks. Albert started with Lord Drake, then slowly made his way to each of us, covering us in the chains so we could barely move, and connecting us into one giant undead chain gang.

None of which was my biggest concern. You see, my problem had started the minute good old Neil had shouted those gibberish words. I was frozen like ice, unable to move even my own eyes. That spell of his had been real, and I was captured by it, which meant three things:

1. I wasn't the only real monster here.
2. I was the worst possible race to try and stop him.
3. We were in deep shit. Again.

5.

Walking back into the forest was something of a chore. Neil had used another spell to unfreeze us, and it had given me back my range of motion, but there was still the fact that we were all shackled together that made the commute pretty challenging. Adding onto that was that Albert had been oddly thorough in chaining our hands behind our backs and our legs close together. Everyone else seemed to be pretty into the scene, impressed that Neil had planned this far ahead and gone to such lengths for realism.

I was the only one truly concerned, but that was because I was the only one who knew Neil had used a set of real spells and had bound us with real chains, though thankfully not real silver ones. Silver doesn't hurt me, per se, but it does weaken me and, if exposed to my skin, makes me break out in a terrible rash. Even with undead regeneration, it takes days to fade. Seriously, ten buckets of calamine won't soothe the itch that gleaming metal leaves behind.

Albert was moving up and down the line, giving direction to the front while coordinating our movements in the back. Officially he was there to make sure none of us tried to escape. I think in truth he was just making sure we didn't go tumbling down like a row of dominoes. I watched him as he moved, watched him more carefully than I had the rest of that evening. He was quick with his movements, not quite fluid, but well above jerky. He was about as pale as the rest of the made-up vampire squad, but a few shades above my own dead skin. And he still reeked of earth. This kid must have either been playing in the mud every time we didn't see him or have spent a few days marinating in dirt.

I'm sure a few of you have gotten there already, but this was the point where it all finally sunk home. Constantly obedient, reeked of earth, dirty clothes, and paler than normal skin; it was clear Albert wasn't alive. I focused my hearing, first noticing the sounds of the forest, then the mingling partygoers to my rear, and then at last I heard the heartbeats of those around me. My senses seemed to hone in on that, like they'd been looking for it all along. I shook off the implications of what that probably meant and began listening to one person at a time. Once I was confident I had heard a beat from everyone of my captured cohorts, I turned my focus to Albert.

I got nothing. Not a heartbeat, not a gasp for air—nothing but the sounds of his bones scraping and muscles twanging as he scampered about. Hey, I said vampire senses were powerful, not that they weren't gross.

All of this sounds like it happened quickly, but the truth is that between splitting my focus on listening and walking we had finally reached our destination by the time I confirmed my Albert hypothesis. He moved down the line, wearing a giant smile as he was helping each of us sit down on the ground so we would be comfortable while we waited for the emperor to come judge us. I was at the end of the line, so I was left standing till the end.

By providence or coincidence, I had been further away from most of the others when we were frozen, which meant I had a fair amount of chain separating me from the player in front of me. I began carefully inching my way backwards. When Albert sat me down, I wanted as much space from anyone else as possible. I had some questions that were most definitely not for public hearing.

It took some time due to Albert's care with helping each player down, but he finally reached me. He stood behind my back and told me to slowly lower my knees. I did as instructed, waiting until my butt was on the ground, and he was bent over my shoulders just about to let go of me before speaking.

"So," I said, trying with all my might to be casual. "What are you anyway, Albert?"

Instead of answering he released his grip and walked around in front of me. He then took a knee so we were eye to eye and pointed to his badge. There, in clear black ink, it said: “Zombie.”

“Are you really?” I asked, doing what I hoped was arching an eyebrow.

“Of course, I am Albert the Unstoppable Zombie, raised by Emperor Nikolai and existing only to serve his every whim,” Albert declared proudly.

“No . . . damnit, you’re not getting the point. Forget the game. Are you an actual zombie?” I asked again.

Now Albert’s relentlessly cheerful face was getting wary and worried. Even I could tell I was at least on the right track. “Don’t be silly,” he said, hushing his tone slightly. “There’s no such thing as zombies.”

“Right. Just like there’s no such thing as real necromancers who cast real spells and take a bunch of real people chained up out into the woods with no witnesses.”

Albert didn’t say anything after that, just widened his eyes and began chewing on his lower lip.

“Okay, I’ll be honest with you,” I said. “I know you’re a real zombie, and Neil is a real necromancer. I don’t really care about either of those things. Live and let live. That’s my expression. Just tell me that all of this is part of the game, and there is nothing sinister afoot, and I’ll hang out and play along until my date comes to pick me up for the movie. I really don’t want trouble; I just wanted to go to the movies. So just say it’s part of the game. Please.”

Albert stopped chewing and just looked at me. He looked very much like a puppy going through potty training that slips up and pees on the rug. Guilty and apologetic, with the resignation that he couldn’t change what had already happened.

“Fudge,” I swore.

“I’m really, really sorry,” Albert said, rocking back off his knee and sitting next to me Indian style. “I wanted to warn you guys, or to stop him, but I just couldn’t.”

“Because you’re a supernatural being under his thrall?” I asked.

“No, because he’s my best friend. My only friend, actually. Even when I was alive it was the two of us. He’d come up with crazy schemes, and I’d follow along with them. He just got so wrapped up in things. I could never seem to talk him out of stuff. Besides, most of the time I just felt lucky to have even one friend. I mean, there was never all that much interesting about me, and now that I'm dead, I'm even less socially desirable."

"Yeah, I know how that goes," I said, summoning the most consoling tone I could under the circumstances. Okay, sure he had been part of a scheme to kidnap a bunch of people out into the woods for heaven only knew what, but I couldn't help feeling for the kid. I'd been in about the same boat for my whole life, and most of my afterlife. "I wasn't exactly Mr. Popular myself."

"Few people who come to these events are. That's why they were so much fun. I don't imagine you've had it quite that bad, though. I saw the girl you came here with. And besides, at least you're not some undead freak," Albert said. It was weird. Even when trying to mope, his voice still had a happy, sing-songy style.

"Um . . . well . . . that's not entirely true," I said.

Albert looked up from the ground he had been staring at and directly at me. It was less like he was looking at me, though, more like he was studying me carefully. "Just how untrue is it?" Albert asked.

In response I opened my mouth, showing my human looking teeth. With a bit of concentration I did the trick I was finally getting the hang of, letting my canines extend to long, razor-sharp points. I then pulled them back to normal, which was much harder than letting them grow, and closed my mouth.

Albert's, however, hung open in surprise. After a few minutes of opening and closing his jaw, he finally got his tongue back in working order and said, "I guess that explains how you knew Neil was the real deal."

"Unfortunately, yes it does. Wait, you're undead. Why didn't it work on you?"

Albert shrugged. "I think creatures that you animate are immune from your own generic spells. You have to target them directly, or some such protocol. Neil explained it to me once after he brought me back, but I've never been smart enough to understand stuff like that."

“Oh,” I said. We lapsed into silence after that, captor and captive deciding where to go from here. I opted to try and ask the question I’d never been able to ask anyone else since my transformation. I mean, when was I going to get another chance like this?

“So, if it isn’t prying,” I said carefully. “Can I ask how you died?”

There was only silence at first, then I heard Albert’s voice say softly, “I’d rather not talk about it.”

“I understand,” I said quickly. “I can barely even remember my death. It seems like I’ve almost totally blocked it out. If you do remember yours, then I can only guess at how traumatic that must be. I’m sorry I asked. It’s just . . . You’re the first other undead person I’ve met.”

“Ummmm, it isn’t really that it was traumatic. Just embarrassing,” Albert said.

“What makes it so bad?” I asked.

“How much do you know about autoerotic asphyxiation and the accidents that come with it?”

“You know what, I think I’ve got the picture,” I said, words so hurried I nearly broke into a stutter. “So . . . that happened, then Neil brought you back. Was he always a necromancer?”

“Nah,” Albert said quickly, obviously grateful to be off the topic of his death. “He was a science geek for years. He used to make fun of me for loving the occult and stuff like this. But after I died, apparently he went off the deep end a little bit. He even went to his grandpa for help.” Albert gave his head a small shake, sending strands of his long, moderately unkempt hair in front of his dark eyes.

“Was his grandfather a necromancer too?” I asked, getting drawn in a bit.

“Not that we know of, but his grandmother was a real famous medium back in the day. Before she died, she accumulated a bunch of supposedly magical stuff, and one of the things there was that black book.”

“Gotcha. So he found the book, gave it a try, and, low and behold, it’s the real deal,” I said, finishing the story in my mind.

“More or less. Apparently, you also have to have the talent for the magic to work, which Neil has, and he tried a few times before he brought me back. But yeah, one day my eyes popped open, and I'm underground. Crawl my way out, and there's my best friend, cackling like a mental patient and saying he's uncovered the magics of the gods."

"Sounds like your friend went on a power trip," I said carefully.

"I know. He's gotten more and more obsessed with it, too. He keeps saying he needs greater power, needs to expand his abilities, needs to steal people's life force—" Albert shut his mouth quickly, but unfortunately not even zombies can clam up fast enough to steal their own words back.

"Ah, so that's what this is about. Let me guess . . . ancient rite, kills us all, and uses our souls, or life force, or whatever to gather tremendous power for himself?" I asked already knowing the answer.

Albert was clearly impressed. "Are you a necromancer too?"

"No." I sighed. "I'm just a numbers guy, and that means I can see an obvious pattern when it's set in front of me. Look, Albert, you seem like a good guy. We need to get out of here, and you're the one with the keys. You know what your friend is doing is wrong, so hurry and help us before—"

"Good evening, my rebellious subjects!" Neil said as he stepped into the clearing, large black tome in hand. "I trust you have all had time to contemplate your crimes and are ready for penance?"

"—that happens."

6.

“Albert!” I hissed quickly as he scurried up to a standing position, and Neil began touring through our little makeshift captive camp. “Albert, there’s still time. Don’t let him do this!”

Unfortunately, I was wasting my . . . well, okay, I don’t have real breath, so let’s say “words.” Albert was back in full submission mode. He all but scampered over to Neil, making the report that we were all here and thoroughly subjugated. The other players confirmed this, bewailing their fates at having put their trust in Lord Drake instead of the clear superiority of Emperor Nikolai. The only exceptions to this were Lord Drake himself, Maria, and me. Lord Drake and Maria out of some sense of fictional, generic vampire pride, and me because I knew kissing ass was going to be a pointless gesture. Otherwise, I would have puckered up with the best of them.

Neil held up a hand, and everyone fell silent. “My poor, misguided subjects, your Emperor has had time to cool his head and give thought to what you’ve done. While I am hurt that you would try to tear me from my throne, I am also complimented that a faction as powerful as your own would consider me a threat. Therefore, I am going to give you all a second chance.”

There was a murmur of happiness that ran through the crowd. It seems some of my fellow captives had been sincerely concerned he would kill off their characters. The irony was palpable.

“Now, my dear assistant Albert will help you all to form a circle around me. I am doing this so that I might hold a binding ceremony. I will be letting you all live, but your powers will be sealed until the next new moon. By then

I hope we can be on better terms than we are now, and you will use your gifts to aid my kingdom instead of work against it,” Neil said as he opened his book and began flipping through it.

Albert was off like a flash, starting at the front and arranging us in a chained circle around Neil. It took relatively little time, since Albert was less helping more and just picking up and moving. There were some confused faces as the scrawny kid picked up large men like they weighed nothing, but after all, it was a night of magic and characters, so they let it slide.

Once again, I was last. As soon as Albert plucked me up, though, he whispered in my ear. “Listen, don’t worry, okay? Nothing bad will happen to you. Neil is out to steal life forces, and we dead guys don’t have that. Just sit through the ceremony, and you’ll be fine.”

“And everyone else?” I whispered out the side of my mouth.

“You’ll be fine,” Albert repeated a moment later, quickening his step and setting me down, thus finishing the circle of chained vampires.

It was a fairly wide circle, with plenty of room between each of us. I suppose Neil had wanted some room to work. I wondered how he would keep us in place once he started his spell if anyone decided to move about. My question was answered quickly as I saw Albert moving from person to person, wrapping their chains on each side around a tent stake, and then driving it into the earth. It took a few moments, even with his strength, but when he finished everyone but me would have found it impossible to put up even a half-hearted struggle.

The chains and stakes weren’t any sort of problem for me, though. No, I was even easier to stop. All Neil needed was three simple words, and I’d be exposed and powerless. I probably couldn’t even run away before he’d snap off his magical phrase and pin my ass down. Which meant my only options were to sit through the ceremony like Albert said, or wait until Neil was distracted and try to rush him. The thought of trying to fight someone, even a small geek like Neil, made my stomach turn a bit. At least I knew I couldn’t throw up thanks to Krystal.

For a moment, I thought my mind was playing tricks on me. No sooner had I thought of Krystal than I saw her walking into the clearing. A moment later I noticed Charlie Brown ghost guy, and finally the man in the werewolf mask. Now I was really confused.

“Well, my good players, I think it is time for me to break character and let you know what is really going on,” Neil said. “I’m afraid I lied earlier. None of you will be leaving this circle alive.”

“We are already the proud and powerful dead!” Lord Drake shouted from his spot in the circle. I could see Maria nodding her head violently in agreement, and the rest of the vampire characters joined in with some show of support.

“You are NOT!” Neil thundered from the center of his circle. “You are sad people living a sad life playing a sad game to escape the misery of reality. The only person in this forest with any real power is myself. Behold, I’ve expanded my spell library and learned to take over the minds of the living.” Neil held his hands and indicated to the three people behind him. “These three each came to me as individuals with thoughts and dreams. Tonight I turned them into nothing more than puppets for my enjoyment.”

I really wasn’t comfortable with the way his eyes lingered on Krystal when he said “enjoyment.” I tried taking some deep breaths out of habit to calm my stomach. It was looking more and more like our only chance of getting out of here would be if I could rush him fast enough. Behind my back, I gently snapped through a few links of chain.

“I am a god among men, and you are nothing but painted-up children playing pretend,” Neil continued, sneering as he talked, no longer able to hide his sense of superiority. The players were beginning to get a little antsy. He had broken character a long time ago, yet he still seemed intent on doing them harm. A few even tested their bonds, realizing for the first time just how helpless they had really become.

“Tonight, however, your pitiful lives will have meaning,” Neil said as he began flipping through his book once more. “Tonight your souls, your life essence, will be used as a catalyst to fuel my own power. As your life flows into me, it will gain the purpose it lacked all these years with all of you. It is a beautiful trade, don't you agree? You trade your lives, and in exchange you gain the fulfillment of having helped this city's next ruler rise to his position."

The players were panicking now; you'd have had to be an idiot not to see how drunk on his own magic Neil had become. Some were flexing violently against their chains. Others seemed to be crying and giving in to whatever this mad child had planned for them. I just kept my eyes trained on Neil and worked my way through the chains, bit by bit. I probably wouldn't have a chance until he began reading his spell.

"But enough chatter. I'm anxious to begin my life as a super being, and I'm sure you are all anxious to help. Minions!" Neil called. The three behind him stood at attention. "You will surround me now. Should anyone break free somehow, your job will be to restrain them until I am able to finish my spell. Let nothing disturb your exalted master!"

The three followed his orders instantly, forming a tight triangle around him so that no angle of entry would go unseen. They stared out at us, revolving slowly to keep fresh eyes on each prisoner as they turned. No one would get bored; no one would let something slip. Credit where it was due. I had to admit Neil had not fallen into the villain trope of overconfidence, even if he had monologued his evil plan.

"Well, this just sucks," I muttered, still breaking through the chains but with less enthusiasm. I had enough trouble getting my mind around the idea of trying to charge Neil head on. I didn't know how I was going to get through an innocent puppet without hurting them, especially if that puppet happened to be my date. I watched her as she moved: smooth, definite, without hesitation. In that moment, I could clearly see how she was an agent that dealt with supernatural beings. The girl had some physical training, which only served to make my job harder.

"Ah, here it is," Neil said, stopping his turning and lighting up his face with a terrifying smile. "Goodbye, mortality. Oncidentum, rapishadum, GHAAAA!"

For the record, that last line wasn't part of the spell. The moment he had begun chanting, I had snapped through the remainder of my chains and sprung to my feet as fast as my vampire abilities would allow. As it turned out, though, even a hopped up vampire takes longer to stand than it takes for a trained agent to withdraw and utilize a taser. Into his crotch. And hold it there.

“Three things, shithead,” Krystal said as she released the taser, and Neil fell to the ground. “First off, you are under arrest for use of necromancy magic without a license. Secondly, never monologue. It gives away your intentions and gives everyone else time to prepare. Lastly, magic is fantastic, but it’s no match for my wand of brain shocking.” With that she knelt down and gave him one last blast to the chest. Neil was out, and I mean “out” as in “drooling and twitching out.” The other two puppets, unfortunately, seemed to be still carrying out orders. They rushed at Krystal, attacking the woman who had broken their master’s commandment.

She whipped around quickly, tripping the werewolf with her leg and slamming it with her taser as it tried to get up. The werewolf dropped like a hammer, and Krystal quickly turned expecting the ghost to be attacking her other side. What she found instead, though, was me holding the ghost by its hips horizontally over my head.

“I thought you might need a hand,” I said in what I hoped was a lighthearted manner.

“My hero,” Krystal replied with a grin. She ambled over, pulled off the ghost’s sheet and put the taser into the arm of the young woman who had been beneath it. The struggling over my head ceased, and I gently set down the girl, rolling up her costume and putting it under her head as a pillow.

This all sounds like a peaceful ballet of coordinated movements, but it was amid the screaming, shock, and crying of the other vampire prisoners. All of this was topped off by a wail from Albert, and he rushed forward and cradled Neil’s head.

“You killed him! You killed my friend!” Albert moaned.

“Did not,” Krystal said, ignoring the calls of the prisoners surrounding her and walking back over to the unconscious mage and the grieving zombie. “Anyone who can use magic has a slight resistance to all forms of energy. That includes electricity. It just required three bursts to take him down like it would a normal person. He's fine, or at least he will be once he wakes up."

"But, he's under arrest," Albert said, worry thick in his voice. "Won't he be killed once he gets charged with what he tried to do tonight?"

"Don't be an idiot," Krystal said. "Ceremonies aren't illegal. I'm only charging him with magic usage without a license. You have to be trained and certified to do magic out in the open like this."

"Oh," Albert said, relief washing over his face.

"Truth be told, you should be worried more about yourself than your friend," Krystal said as she knelt down and picked up Neil's book. "Zombies are only allowed to exist on work visas."

"What does that mean?" Albert asked.

"Zombies need a job, or they lose focus and create havoc. Your buddy here is unlicensed, so he can't offer you employment. It's almost impossible for zombies to get work other than with the necromancer that created them, so we have to terminate them," Krystal explained.

"And when you say 'terminate' . . ." Albert let the sentence trail off.

"'Return you to your place in natural world' is the way the higher ups put it," she said, finishing his thought.

"Oh, no," Albert said, shaking slightly, despite the lack of any biological need to.

It was a heartbreaking night for the poor kid. He thought his only friend was dead, he discovered he needed a job he wouldn't be able to get, and he found out he would likely wind up dead again. My empathy went out to the now not-as-upbeat zombie. He obviously had some self-worth issues, and he definitely needed to stand up for himself more, but it seemed like he really had a good heart. That was a set of circumstances I found all too easy to empathize with.

"Hold on, Krystal," I said, butting into the conversation. "Exactly what kind of tax benefits come from employing Undead Americans?"

7.

“This movie is god-awful,” I said, taking a handful of popcorn and crunching down.

“Mmhmm. That’s why I picked it. I knew no one else would be here,” Krystal said, gesturing to the empty theatre.

“That couldn’t have anything to do with the fact that it’s three in the morning. Or that this theatre doesn’t even do late night showings.”

“Hey, I promised you a movie, so I called in a favor.”

“Uh huh. One day we need to have a talk about you and your job and your favors,” I said with a mustering of authority.

“Did you want to do that tonight?” Krystal said, her eyes growing serious. There was a hardness there that worried me a bit. I might be the more powerful between the two of us, but I didn’t really think I was the stronger.

“Well . . . no, not tonight. I think we’ve had enough of your job for this evening,” I said, as I verbally scampered away from that previous authoritative tone.

“Oh, like it was all bad. You got a new assistant and roommate out of the deal,” Krystal said, her eyes softening and her usual smile dancing into place.

“I couldn’t let the kid just be put back in the ground. Besides, I really did need the help. Still, I guess now I’ll have to buy blood and animal corpses to keep us both fed,” I said.

“Zombies don’t eat flesh, Freddy,” Krystal corrected. “They don’t eat anything, not for nutrition. That’s what makes them perfect servants. They don’t need to eat, drink, or sleep. All they do is work, and in the case of yours, file documents.”

“Wait,” I said. “The whole reason we went out there was reports of a late night lumbering figure and an increase in missing pets. If that wasn’t Albert, then who was it?”

“Neil,” she said as she turned her attention to the frankenbeast skulking on the screen. “I got a full confession out of him while you were getting Albert set up at your place. He was out at night practicing to try and bring Albert back. He would kill the pets, then try to revive them. The one time he succeeded he let the damn thing wander away, which means I get to spend tomorrow hunting for a freaking zombie rabbit.”

“That will be an annoyance. Won’t you have to wipe the memories or something of all the vampire characters that saw Neil lose it too?” I asked.

“Feh, I wish we had mind-wiping abilities. That would be sweet,” Krystal said. “No, we already had the cops that came and unchained them feed them a story. Neil was just some kid who went off his meds and was going to chop them up. Luckily, they had an undercover agent there in the form of me, and I was able to subdue him before he committed any real crimes.”

“What about when you said he was under arrest for magic without a license?”

“Playing to his delusion so he would come along more peacefully.”

“Oh,” I said. “Well, I guess that makes sense. You know, for all his faults, Neil really did seem to care about his friend, though. The whole reason he started this was to bring back his buddy.”

Krystal nodded. “He’s talented, and he got into it for the right reasons. He just went a little nutty. It happens to everyone without training. Part of the sentence will be enrolling him in courses with a master. In a few months, he’ll be able to control the megalomania and still use magic. Kid with his talent will probably be certified in a year or so.”

“Yeah, I wanted to ask you about that. If Neil is so good at magic, why didn’t his mind control spell work on you?”

“Pshh, no one tells me what to do,” she said with a wink.

“That seemed like a dodge,” I said.

“Very good, fang boy.” Krystal lifted up the armrest that separated our two seats. “Now, do you want to chase this topic and keep talking,” she said as she wrapped her arms around my shoulders and pulled herself onto my lap, “or do you want to make some use of this empty theatre?”

For the record, I knew this was another dodge. A more sophisticated one admittedly, but still, obviously, her changing the subject to avoid me asking more questions. I knew that quite clearly.

I just didn’t care. Relationships are built on trust anyway, right?

A Weresteed at the Slots

1.

My girlfriend's truck had balls. Not literal ones, of course. These were chrome facsimiles that attached to the hitch. They looked strangely in place on her vehicle, which looked strangely in place enclosed around her as she drove me and my assistant down the sun-parched highway. It was a black pickup, enormous in size and decorated with polished chrome on the grill and interspersed periodically across the frame. She, on the other hand, was a medium-height blonde woman with muddy brown eyes, a low cut spaghetti-strap top, and faded blue jeans. If not for the gun strapped to her hip, she would have looked like the average southern belle. On second thought, I suppose the gun didn't disqualify her from fitting that stereotype.

"I'm still amazed by this glass," I said as I stared at the noonday sun from my seat on the passenger's side. A lesser man might have objected to the woman taking the wheel on such a long journey. A lesser man would also have been a stupider man, and one with a severe crotch injury to boot.

"Yeah, our R&D guys are something else," Krystal said, as she passed a motorist moving too slowly for her tastes, and by "too slowly," I mean "under ninety miles an hour."

"Assuredly. When did you get the glass put in anyway?"

"Oh, I've always had it. I'm something of a fang junkie so it only makes sense to keep it in my car."

"Ah . . . oh," I said. It was hardly surprising. Krystal worked for an agency of the government that dealt with supernatural beings on a daily basis. It wasn't farfetched that she would be seduced by the confidence and power of a vampire. Not one like me—a more classic, suave vampire.

"It's a joke, Freddy. You're my first light-allergic boyfriend. I promise," Krystal said with a wide, cheerful grin.

We both had good reason to be happy. Krystal and I had reconnected at our high school reunion a few weeks back, amidst a pack of murderous werewolves, and had begun dating. It had taken some time, but a few days ago we had formalized our relationship as being committed. I suppose that doesn't sound like much, but when the majority of your mortal life was spent cuddling up to a tub of ice cream and a classic film, getting a girlfriend still held something of a primordial thrill.

"I'm just glad we get to come," chimed in Albert from the back.

"Of course, I wanted you guys to come," Krystal said. "This is Thanksgiving, after all. It'll be a nice change to eat with friends, instead of camped out in some motel room on a stakeout to figure out if the local murders are the work of a serial killer or a ghoul."

"We're glad to spend it with you," I said truthfully. This was my first Thanksgiving in years with other people, and I was all but brimming with joy in anticipation and appreciation. "Though I'm still not sure why we'll be spending it in Vegas."

"There aren't many of us Agents to go around, and when you take out the few who have managed to wrangle families along with their careers, it's even less of us. So while we get the holidays themselves off, we pretty much have to work right up until them. Besides, they have great restaurants, and I can't cook for shit."

"Right, but why Vegas?" I asked again.

"I used to do life counseling for parahumans who were having trouble," Krystal said. "One of my old clients called and asked me to come out and advocate for him. Apparently he got into trouble with the local dracolings."

"What's a dracoling?" Albert asked from the back. I was thankful he didn't know because the truth was I certainly didn't either.

“Dracolings are basically humans with dragon blood. They aren’t much physically stronger than mortals, but those bastards have a touch of magic and are sly as foxes when it comes to money. Not to mention they own all of the casinos in Las Vegas,” Krystal said, swerving past another motorist while throwing up the finger.

“That’s impossible,” I said. “Vegas is a town owned by many different corporations and investors. One group of people couldn’t possess all of it.”

“And no human would burn to a crisp just from a little sunlight. You want to crack open the door and see how things go?” Krystal asked.

“Touché,” I sighed as I admitted defeat. Living as a vampire and dealing with Krystal had forced me to re-evaluate my definitions of what was and wasn’t possible. It was rarely an enjoyable process to indulge in. “How exactly does this glass let in the light without reducing me to cinders?”

“Magic,” Krystal said simply. “I’d go more in depth, but I’m not an arcane specialist. All I know is that they enchant the glass, and my boyfriend can come along for the ride.”

“And his assistant,” Albert said, poking his face through ever-so-slightly from the backseat.

“And who could forget his charming assistant?” Krystal reassured him. Perhaps it was because of how he died or who he was, but Albert could be a bit insecure at times. Then again, I was the last person to be throwing stones in that regard.

“So these dracolings, they own all of Vegas somehow. What does that have to do with your client?” I asked.

“Bubba has a bit of a gambling problem.”

“Bubba?” I asked.

“Bubba?” Albert echoed.

“Bubba,” Krystal affirmed. “And I’ll thank you to be nice to him when you boys meet. He’s a good guy and a sweetheart. Aside from the gambling problem, he’s hardworking and responsible.”

“Sounds as though the gambling might have gotten ahead of the other stuff,” I said.

“It’s the damn holidays,” Krystal said. “If all you have is an addiction, then seeing everyone connecting with friends and family leaves you feeling lonely. So they run off to the only thing that seems to give them joy and validation. It’s a sad scenario, and I wish my agency was doing more to help it.”

“Why aren’t they?” I asked.

“Budget and manpower limitations. If we have to choose between putting down a revolution of mages or offering counseling to depressed pixies, guess where the funds end up?” Krystal said.

“I see,” I said. “So your friend Bubba was caught up in gambling, and these dracolings own Vegas, so I assume they acquired his debt?”

“More or less. Dracolings love gambling because they’re good at it. They have sharp minds and sharper senses, so it’s hard to get one past them,” Krystal said.

“If they’re so good, then why does anyone ever gamble with them?” I asked.

“Because they share their ancestor’s weakness as well as their strength.”

“They eat virgins?” Albert asked uncertainly.

“What? No. They can’t resist a bet. If you play for high enough stakes and can trick them into betting on something you know you will win, then you can make a fortune.”

“So, it’s like playing the lottery, except instead of risking a dollar, you basically risk everything you own,” I said.

“That’s not the worst analogy I’ve ever heard. Anyway, they have a lot of treaties with my agency, and there’s respect for us, so if I go in and advocate for Bubba, I should be able to at least get him on some sort of payment plan.”

“I’m guessing I don’t want to know what the other option for him is,” I said.

“Smart man. The other option is he works for them at minimum wage until he pays off his debt,” Krystal said.

“He could always declare bankruptcy.” Albert’s voice was raised slightly, and there was a touch of pride in his tone. I had been teaching him some basic financial terms, and it seemed he was anxious to show he had listened.

“That works with human debt, but dracolings have special provisions that allow them to enslave people who are indebted to them,” Krystal said. “It’s actually not so far off from what happened with the Native American treaties as far as cultural preservation, though dracolings had much better leverage and representation.”

“What was there leverage?” I asked.

“Same as their representation. They called in a great grandparent to negotiate for them. Those negotiators agreed to help in the country’s war efforts in exchange for certain privileges. The result was that the dracolings got special areas with limited government interference and the right to keep their customs and traditions alive without sanction,” Krystal said.

“Help with the war? This must have been a long time ago, was it World War One?”

“Las Vegas existed way before that, dear,” Krystal said. “It’s actually been around for centuries, though it didn’t go the way of glitz and glamour until the last fifty years or so when that became the best money-making campaign.”

“For centuries . . . was it the civil war?” I tried again.

“Still too late. Parahumans were actually forced to align with the North during the Civil War, since their treaties and contracts were with the United States of America, and that’s the title that the North retained. It’s one of the reasons Lincoln knew he could win if the South seceded.”

“Huh . . .” I sighed. “The things they leave out of the history books.”

“In defense of ‘them,’ we’re the ones who ordered those things to stay out of books,” Krystal said.

“‘We’ being your employer,” I said.

“Bingo,” Krystal affirmed.

“How long has your non-existent little agency non-existed?” I asked.

“Since the beginning,” she said. “We were formed at the same time the treaties and agreements with the various supernatural groups were so that we could police and enforce those contracts.”

“Wait a minute,” Albert said, leaning up from the backseat. “When you say ‘since the beginning,’ do you mean . . . ?”

“It was a good deal all around. The supernatural creatures wanted a country where they had rights as citizens, and the founders of the country needed some way to drive back the superior numbers and might of the English.”

“Are you telling me that vampires and werewolves are the reason America won the Revolutionary War?” I asked, dumbfounded.

“No, I’m saying America somehow managed to pull it out thanks to the French,” Krystal scoffed.

There was a beat of silence, then Albert said: “You know, when you think about it, her version makes a lot more sense.”

I shook my head. “The things you think you know.”

“Be proud, Freddy, there were powerful vampires in that war,” Krystal said. “They eliminated entire British platoons in a single night, saving the lives of American soldiers and civilians in the process.”

“Yeah . . . but still,” I said. “It’s a lot to take in.”

“I tell you what—once we get done with the business with Bubba and our Thanksgiving, I’ll request clearance to show you a few files. I think getting in touch with your vampire heritage will do a lot for your pride as an Undead American,” Krystal said with a gentle tone I had forgotten she could use.

“That sounds surprisingly nice,” I said. “You think things with Bubba and the dracolings will be that easy to deal with?”

“I’m sure of it,” Krystal said.

One day, one beautiful and glorious day, I will stop listening when she says things like that. One day, but that night was not the day.

2.

“Okay, boys, the name of today’s game is called keep your mouth shut,” Krystal said as we took a seat at a long conference table. We had checked into our hotel, Excalibur, upon arriving and were told to come straight to the meeting room. Our bags were swept away, and we were hustled down the hall into a pleasant looking room that seemed suspiciously absent of cameras or windows. Krystal had attempted to protest that neither Albert nor I were a part of the meeting; however, the security said everyone who arrived with her had to show up, and do so immediately. She hadn’t even been allowed to change into her business-appropriate attire; instead, she was stuck to attending her meeting in dusty jeans and a red tank top. Thus she was giving us a quick rundown in what we were to do during her meeting, which essentially consisted of not speaking a damn word.

“I’ll talk to Morgan as soon as he comes in, but there is a chance you two will have to sit through the whole meeting. Dracolings can be odd about some things, and he might see you two as necessary additions just because you’re with me. If that’s the case, then stay quiet no matter what,” she said.

“I don’t think either of us would have anything to add anyway,” I said.

“You think that now but . . . look, dracolings don’t like when things change. They’ve been holding on to the same traditions for millennia. They might say something or do something that seems offensive to you modern guys. Deal with it. You have to stay quiet. Working with dracolings requires a two year long certification process that has to be renewed annually. That’s how complicated interacting with them is.”

“That seems a bit excessive,” I said.

“These are a people who have government protected rights to do things as their traditions dictate regardless of certain laws. Additionally, they are shrewd gamblers and place a tremendous amount of emphasis on a person’s honor. Anything that is said to them is taken as a legally binding commitment. A poorly-timed joke could cost you your entire life savings. Still seem excessive?”

“Can I go to the room?” Albert asked. He was fidgeting and biting gently on his lower lip. I didn’t blame him, Krystal had put a generous amount of fear into me too with her explanation.

“Hopefully, yes,” Krystal said. “But if not, just remember to stay quiet. You can’t make any mistakes if you don’t say anything.”

She likely had more to tell us, but at that moment it became too late. The doors opened, and four men walked into the room. Three of them wore suits that were clearly custom tailored by master craftsmen. Jewelry adorned them in ways that seemed just a touch elaborate on men, and each moved with an oddly fluid grace and supreme confidence. In one glance, I knew they owned this room, this building, and everything their eyes surveyed. These were leaders, men who would have been kings in another time and place. As they sat down across from us, folding themselves into the high-backed leather chairs, I finally tore my gaze from them and looked at the other man who had entered the room.

He looked . . . different. This man stood at least a foot taller than the dracolings, and likely a hundred or so pounds heavier. His broad frame was clothed by a short-sleeved plaid shirt and a pair of jeans. A baseball cap hid his hair, but a pair of surprisingly kind eyes peered out from its brim. His bulk was primarily muscle, though a gut did betray that at least some of his lifestyle was unhealthy. He gave a big grin and a small wave to Krystal, then took a seat a few spaces apart from the dracolings.

“Pleasant evening, Enforcer Jenkins,” said the middle dracoling, an older man with jet black hair.

“Pleasant evening, Lord Ackers,” Krystal said. She seemed composed, but colder than normal. Krystal always seemed to have a devil-may-care attitude about her, trusting her skill and smarts to see her through any trouble that life could dish out. That was absent now; in its place were careful eyes and conservative body language. It was a very peculiar shift, and one that made me realize how much I preferred the everyday version of her.

“Before we begin our discussion on Mr. Emerson’s debt to you, I would like to request permission to speak with you on a matter pertaining to the meeting itself,” Krystal said.

The black-haired dracoling, Lord Ackers I suppose, leaned back in his chair a moment and appeared to genuinely consider it. It seemed like a simple request to me, but I noticed the other dracolings looking at him anxiously. It was beginning to dawn on me that Krystal hadn’t elaborated when she talked about how serious tradition and honor was when talking to these people.

“I will permit your request, on the condition that we may address each other informally,” Lord Ackers said. “We have met together many times, and I see no reason why we should not be able to be familiar with one another.”

Krystal hesitated for a moment, then nodded. “I agree, Morgan. You and I have had dealings before.”

“Excellent, Krystal. I prefer engendering comfort with those I work with regularly,” Morgan said. Funny thing though, Krystal didn’t seem more comfortable now that they were using first names. If anything, I was picking up more signs of stress from her body. I hoped that dracolings sight, hearing, and smell weren’t on par with my own.

“Now, what would you like to speak of?” Morgan asked her.

“I would like to formally request that my two attendants be sent back to the hotel room,” Krystal said. “They are not affiliated with the Agency, and as such do not have clearance to be present at this meeting.”

“Why not? The one wearing false glasses is a vampire, and the one wearing a T-shirt is a zombie. Both of them are parahumans and therefore are allowed to know of others of their kind,” Morgan said. It was a bit creepy that he knew what Albert and I both were, and even that my glasses were fake. I didn’t need to still wear them after I was turned, but I had been donning a pair of frames since my childhood. My face didn't feel right without them.

"What you speak is true. However, this meeting involves the financial status of another person and his arrangement with you. Those are things that are considered private and those not involved would not be privy to such information," Krystal countered.

"Yes, but the privacy control is all on our end," Morgan said with a small grin. "If I have no objection to their presence, then there is no legal need for them to vacate the room."

I braced for Krystal to tell him to shut up and just let us out of the damn meeting already. She wasn't known for her patience and an argument about keeping non-essential people here had to be taxing her limits. I was sure at any moment she would be lighting into this smug, suit-wearing jerk.

"You are correct, Morgan. I thank you for hearing my humble request. The matter has been satisfactorily concluded," she said. I don't think I kept much of the shock off my face. Krystal being subservient at all, let alone to this degree, was mind blowing.

"Good," Morgan said. "Now we move onto the matter of Mr. Emerson's debt. As of today he owes us four hundred ninety-two thousand, eight hundred and sixty-two dollars. We have stopped counting the cents and begun rounding to the nearest dollar for convenience's sake."

"Four . . . hundred . . . thousand?" Krystal asked. Though her words were direct to Morgan, her eyes were digging straight into Bubba. I had seen those eyes before, and clearly Bubba had as well since he was avoiding her gaze and looking very thoroughly ashamed. The man had every physical advantage over her, but it was evident he had a healthy amount of fear from this thin blonde woman, which only showed that he was much smarter than his name would indicate.

"Four hundred ninety-two thousand, eight hundred and sixty-two dollars, actually," Morgan corrected her. "As you know this is well above the level where we are allowed to place him into our custody until he has worked off the debt. Additionally, he has passed the point where there is any legal recourse to adjust his debt or payment."

“I am aware of this now,” Krystal said slowly. “Though, when Mr. Emerson requested my presence, it was with the indication that I would be acting as advocate. In matters of over two hundred thousand, it is well known that no outside entity holds any authority to alter the decisions of the dracoling who holds that debt. I am a touch confused as to why, then, Mr. Emerson asked me to come all the way out here.”

“I cannot speak to that,” Morgan said. “I do not claim to understand what goes on in Mr. Emerson’s mind. However, I took your meeting because we strive to be in compliance with all clauses of our treaty with your government, and to try and foster good relations between we two.”

“I thank you for accepting my meeting, and your good will is noted and will be reported. In the spirit of such good will, I have another boon to ask of you, Morgan, since it seems our meeting will be coming to a swift end. I would like to request that Mr. Emerson be permitted to tell both you and I why he felt it necessary to draw us both into a meeting with no possibility of resolution,” Krystal said in a strained voice. Her eyes were dead set on Bubba, who for his part seemed more resigned than nervous about his problematic situation.

“I daresay that would play directly into what he was hoping for,” Morgan said. “I am not in the habit of aiding those who seek to waste my valuable time and resources.”

“I would consider it a high token of friendship between your people and the Agency,” Krystal said slowly, pronouncing every syllable with care and consideration. Given what she had told us, speaking on behalf of her office must have been something exceedingly dangerous.

“Well, then, I would be a fool not to offer such a token,” Morgan said, his grin deepening noticeably. “Mr. Emerson, you may speak with Krystal on the topic of why you called in an advocate on this case.”

“I didn’t call in an advocate,” Bubba said, a snarky tone and southern twang reverberating in the strong bass of his voice. “I called in my friend.”

Bubba turned his body and met Krystal’s gaze. “I knew as soon as I lost my last bet that it was over. I just wanted to tell you goodbye in person. You were a lot of help to me after I lost Mom and Dad, and you helped keep me on the right track for a long time. You're the only person left in this world to miss me, and I just wanted to thank you for what you did. You're one of the few that cares, and I didn't want you to think you had failed me somehow when you heard about this. I wanted you to know that if you hadn't been there, I would have wound up in a much worse place much sooner. So, Krystal, for everything you did and for all the people I know you're going to go on to help, thank you from the bottom of my heart."

Bubba stood from his chair and looked back at the dracolings. "Okay, shitheads, we can go now."

"That concludes our meeting," Morgan said to Krystal as he rose. "I hope you enjoy your stay at the hotel, and please feel free to call on me if you have any other issues that need discussion." The other dracolings echoed his movements, and all four men began heading for the door.

"Wait!" Krystal yelled. She stood up from her chair and knocked it back. Her eyes were sparking and her jaw was set. This was a Krystal I was more familiar with. This was the Krystal who was about to whip some ass.

"I invoke the right to challenge for the debt of Bubba Emerson," she declared.

That's pretty much when all hell broke loose.

3.

Bubba bellowed out a powerful “NO!” and leapt forward. Before he had taken two steps, one of the dracolings touched his shoulder and Bubba dropped to the ground in wild spasms. Krystal . . . well, there’s no other way to say it . . . . Krystal growled gutturally and leapt to Bubba’s shaking side. The other dracoling pulled Morgan away and stood between him and a now clearly pissed-off Krystal. Albert, meanwhile, let out a squeak and dropped from his chair to hide under the table. I desperately wanted to follow suit, but a part of me was screaming that if I dropped down and didn’t keep my eyes trained on the altercation, there was a very good chance I would soon be single again. I knew I was physically stronger than everyone else in the room, but that didn’t mean much when just the yelling was making me feel skittish.

It was Morgan who broke the silence: “Enforcer Jenkins, given Mr. Emerson’s outburst and the sudden commotion, I am willing to acquiesce that I may not have heard you correctly. Would you be so kind as to repeat yourself?”

“I demand the right to challenge for the debt of Bubba Emerson,” Krystal said softly as she held Bubba’s shoulder while his twitching subsided.

“Acknowledged,” Morgan said. “You are aware that, as a woman, you are ineligible to challenge in our traditional manner?”

“I am,” Krystal agreed.

“Then we shall conduct the match using our secondary method. You may follow me,” Morgan said, straightening his suit and not quite hiding the greedy glint in his eye.

“I request our stakes be held in escrow,” Krystal said, rising slowly from Bubba’s side.

Morgan nodded. “That is your right as well. Bubba Emerson shall stay with your attendants, but they shall remain within this casino. Are those conditions acceptable?”

“They are,” Krystal said. “I will instruct my attendants on the handling of our stakes, and then we may begin the match.”

“Acceptable.” Morgan took a step back and waited against the wall. His attendants followed his cue, leaving the massive, dropped body of Bubba alone in the center of the floor.

Krystal hurried over to me. “This shouldn’t take long, so as soon as Bubba wakes up, get him down to the restaurant. That shock will have taken a lot out of him, so get some food in him fast. I should be able to join you guys within the hour.”

“I would very much like to be told what is going on,” I said in a hushed whisper.

“I know, sweetie,” Krystal said kindly. “And Bubba will fill in the gaps when he comes around. Just have some faith that I know what I’m doing till then, okay?”

“Of course. We’ll take care of him, but please join us soon.”

“No problem,” she said with her usual, confident grin. It was picture perfect, the heartwarming familiar image of Krystal about to lay waste to some unsuspecting fool who had dared to take her on. If only I hadn’t heard her heart rate jump, or smelled the surge of fear that ran through her, I might have been able to be comforted.

Sometimes being a vampire really blows.

4.

“It’s an ancient rite,” Bubba said as he began doing considerable damage to the steak that was resting innocently in front of him. I had hauled Bubba downstairs and found shelter in one of the buffets. It had taken him half an hour to come around, and as soon as he did, he had leapt up and sworn he would tear Morgan limb from limb. After that it took us another ten minutes to calm him down somewhat when he realized Krystal had gone through with the challenge. Once we finally convinced him it was happening, he’d agreed to fill in Albert and me, but only after visiting the buffet table.

“Basically,” Bubba continued, “those who are equal or better to the one enslaved may challenge for the ownership of the debt. If the challenger wins, they get the debt and the slave is either set free or serves ’em. If the dracolings win, the challenger is assigned a debt equal to the original slave’s, and they get enslaved, too.”

“So, Krystal just put her freedom on the line for you?” I had known something was up, but I had never imagined it went this deep.

“Yup,” Bubba said. “Which is why you shoulda stopped her, dammit! I didn’t call her down here to get caught up in my mess. I just wanted to say goodbye to someone who mattered, and that’s a short list.”

“I didn’t know.” Even to my ears, it seemed a lame defense. “Besides, have you ever seen anyone stop Krystal from doing something she was set on? Ever?”

“Well . . . no,” Bubba admitted. “But that don’t mean you can’t try.”

“I’m sorry.” Albert was fidgeting with the pile of peas on his plate, not making eye contact with either of us. “Krystal had said how cunning they were, and when things got bad, I just panicked. I should have tried to stop her, too.”

There was something oddly disarming about Albert’s apology. It brought how helpless we had all truly been into glaring light.

“It ain’t your fault,” Bubba said. “If it’s anybody’s fault, it’s mine. I know that girl. I should have known she'd pull something crazy like this the minute I got her involved. I was being a self-absorbed jackass, and now she's in danger."

"What kind of danger?" I asked. "All they said was something about a match. What's happening right now, anyway?"

"Dracolings are big on tradition," Bubba said. "So they only have two forms of trials. Since Krystal's a girl, she'll be doing the one for those they don't consider to be warriors. They're playing a game of chess right now."

"Chess? That's it? I thought she'd be fighting a bear with a stick or something, from how serious everyone was," I said.

"I think I'd rather she was fighting the bear. At least then we'd know she'd be okay."

"Yeah, Krystal would come back with a new rug." Albert chuckled. It was pretty hard to imagine anything, animal or otherwise, getting the best of Krystal in a fight.

"So . . . what if she loses?" I didn't want to ask, but it seemed pointless to ignore the possibility.

"If she loses, she becomes bound to them, something they own. That means she works for them, does whatever they say, and is susceptible to their magic," Bubba told us.

"Is that what they did to you earlier?" Albert asked.

"Yeah, the fuckers could have just frozen me in my tracks, but dropping me like a sack of rotten potatoes is also an option they have," Bubba said.

"Why would they take the bet, though? As an Agent, Krystal has training, experience, and cunning. Plus, she hung out with the chess team in high school. Doesn't that seem like a bad bet to the dracolings?" I asked, though I didn't bother explaining the point of how I knew she had hung with the chess team in high school. I did say we once ran in similar social circles, after all.

"Dracolings take all kinds of bets, usually because they have an ace up their sleeve," Bubba said. "I promise you whoever she's playing is a chess master. That aside, if she loses that means they own an Agent. Dracolings love power, connections, and leverage. Having someone they own in the Agency is a payoff they couldn't pass up the chance on—forget the odds.”

“So, they think they can win,” I said.

“They know they can win. They always know they can win. That certainty is probably their only weakness. The only way to beat them is to come totally out of left field.”

“If anyone can do that, Krystal can,” Albert said with force.

“Damn right,” Bubba agreed.

“She is something amazing,” I said. “How did you two meet, anyway?”

“I lost my parents when I was young and fell in with a couple of rough kids from the neighborhood. Weresteeds don't get much respect from the outset in the supernatural community, and I was kind of an exceptional case even in that regard,” Bubba told us.

“Weresteed?” Albert asked.

“Yeah, I turn into a horse.”

“Okay, hang on,” I said. “I sort of get the werewolves thing. But horses? How does that even work? Horses don't bite people. Where would werehorses have originally come from?”

“Weresteeds.” Bubba's tone was surprisingly firm as he corrected me. “And no, we don't bite people. It's passed on through lineage like lots of other kinds of supernatural abilities. As for where we came from, I have no idea.”

“You don't?” I asked.

“Do you know how vampires were created?” Bubba shot back.

“I suppose I don't, actually.”

“Exactly. Parahumans ain't that special. We get to wonder about the origins of our kind just like the humans do. Maybe some of the really old ones might have an inklin' or two, but if anyone knows for sure, they ain't talking.”

“I guess that does make sense.” I said.

“I know where I came from,” Albert announced.

“You know the source and details of the magic that pumps through your body, keeping your undead but moving?” Bubba asked.

“Oh . . . no,” Albert said.

“You see what I mean,” Bubba said, polishing off the last of his steak. “Anyway, the point was that weresteeds don’t get much respect, so I was working triple hard to make a street name for myself. I got busted one night, and Krystal was the one they sent down to deal with me. Instead of just beating me down, or putting me in a cage, she took an interest in me. She got me a part-time job, found me a real place to stay, and helped get me on my feet. If not for Krystal, I’d still be some idiot kid on the streets.”

“That’s pretty ama . . . zi . . . ” I trailed off as a familiar scent hit my nostrils. Within moments I had picked out the footsteps that corresponded to the smell I’d noted and could tell they were coming toward us. “Company,” I said. Albert stiffened, and Bubba cracked his knuckles.

The dracoling, one of Morgan’s nameless attendants, glided up to our table showing no surprise that we were waiting for him.

“Gentlemen, if you will accompany me to the conference room. The match is done, and it is time for the winner to claim their prize.” With that the dracoling turned and began heading out of the restaurant.

“Do we go?” Albert asked.

“No option,” Bubba said as he finished a long draw of tea from his glass. “You heard him. It’s time to settle up. Let’s just hope things came out in our favor.”

5.

Filtering back into the room felt odd. Things had been so hurried and wild when we left, yet when we entered the room, it was quiet and calm. Morgan and his attendants sat on the same side of the table, hands crossed and neutral expressions on their faces. The only blatant difference in the room was that Krystal was sitting on the same side of the table as the dracolings. Before I smelled her, before I heard her heartbeat, before I even saw her face, that fact alone told me all I needed to know.

“You lost,” I said simply. I hadn’t even made it to my chair. Albert, Bubba, and I were still near the door. I probably should have just walked in and taken a seat. I know I should have let Bubba do all the talking since he was already in deep. But I didn’t. Instead, I blurted out those words because I didn’t want to dance around the truth. I needed to know, right then and right there, standing by that doorway.

“Perceptive,” Morgan said. “But not surprising for one of your ilk. Yes, Enforcer Jenkins did not triumph in her match and is now one of my belongings.”

The word “belongings” grated against something inside of me. I couldn’t tell you what it was because it felt raw and hard, and those were things I wasn’t accustomed to discovering in myself. Bubba apparently echoed my sentiment, though, as I heard his knuckles crack behind me.

“Now, now, no need for posturing,” Morgan said with a slimy smile. “Mr. Emerson is already under our power, and while you two gentlemen do possess more physical strength than us, I think you will find Enforcer Jenkins and Mr. Emerson harmed quite brutally should you attempt to escalate our little confrontation.”

I could feel Bubba’s tense body slacken. I doubted he had any concern for his own safety, but if they were going to hurt Krystal, then he wouldn’t fight back. As for me, the idea of throwing a fit hadn’t even occurred to me. I had an entirely different backup plan ready for this situation.

“I demand the right to challenge for the debt of Krystal Jenkins and Bubba Emerson,” I stated loudly.

Hell didn’t really break loose this time. Krystal did gasp, and Bubba seemed a touch surprised, but the dracolings only laughed at me.

“You are a silly little vampire, aren’t you?” Morgan asked. “First off, you are not an Agent nor a knight, so you have no rights to challenge. Secondly, you cannot challenge for the debt of two slaves. One warrior, one slave—that is the way the bets are structured.”

“What if he doubled up?” Albert said.

Morgan raised an eyebrow. “Explain.”

“Fred will bet his freedom . . . and mine. It will be one battle, but if he wins, he gets both slaves. If you win, then you get two new slaves. The rules are the same. We’re just raising the stakes,” Albert said, not without some hesitation.

“You can’t do that,” I whispered.

“And you can? Fred, if I can’t work for you, then they’ll put me back in the ground anyway. You doing this is an unlife or death bet for me regardless. At least like this maybe they’ll take it.”

“You gentlemen are aware we can hear you, correct?” Morgan asked. “And while I do find the raising of stakes acceptable, I still have no reason to take the bet. Neither of you can demand a challenge, so it must be agreed on to be accepted. Yes, gaining two undead servants would have some use to us, but nowhere near as great as ownership of an Agent. The potential gain is simply not great enough to justify the potential loss.”

“Well, if it sweetens the pot any, I do own my own accounting agency. Maybe I could be used to help with the books,” I said in desperation. It was a stupid long shot. I was under no illusions that the dracolings would actually find a vampire a more desirable bet because he was an accountant.

As it turned out, I was dead wrong in that assumption. It was like I’d jolted each of the dracolings with electricity, the way they reacted when I mentioned the word “accounting.”

“You are . . . an accountant?” Morgan asked.

“Um, yes. I run my own business out of my apartment, and I do pretty good work,” I said.

“Do you know how difficult it is to find a parahuman that is both capable and willing to balance books?” Morgan asked me again.

“I’m sure there are plenty of humans who are glad for the work,” I said.

“Humans, bah!” Morgan said. “Due to secrecy agreements in our treaties, we can never reveal to them what we are, so any expenses incurred that relate to our nature must be hidden from them, forcing us to do the work ourselves.”

“So, if you won Fred, you wouldn’t have to do that anymore,” Albert said. “You would finally have a parahuman who could all of the numbers work for you.”

“Indeed,” Morgan said. “May I ask your full name, vampire?”

“Fredrick Frankford Fletcher.”

“Well, Mr. Fletcher, in light of your occupation, I will admit that I do find this bet to be enticing,” Morgan said. “It is accepted; however, our champion is currently out of the casino this evening. Would you be willing to wait until tomorrow morning to have your match?”

“How are they out of the casino?” I asked. “Krystal just had her match.”

Morgan chuckled. “Mr. Fletcher, Enforcer Jenkins had a match with me, which was a game of chess. It is the trial used for women, since they are not strong enough to endure a man’s trial. As a man, you will of course be doing battle in our traditional form.”

Krystal had warned me they were stuck in the past. “Wait, so I won’t be playing chess?” I’d been something of a chess champion in my youth, and I still played online to keep my mind fresh. I had been certain I could handle anything some dracoling could throw at me on the checked battlefield. If that wasn’t the contest, though, my confidence was somewhat lower. And by “somewhat,” I mean “extremely.”

“You will do battle with our champion in the manner of the only true adversaries that our dragon ancestors ever faced. Of all the menaces in the land, only knights conducted themselves with the honor, strength, and determination that allowed our ancestors to acknowledge them as worthy warrior combatants. As such, since we dracolings cannot do battle in the way of the dragons, our trial is the one that the knights themselves used,” Morgan said.

“Okay, so just so we’re all on the same page here, what did I just sign up for?” I asked.

“At tomorrow morning you will be battling our champion in a joust,” Morgan said. “You may have access to our stables and equipment until then to prepare as needed. You also may use any steed on the premises, with of course the exception of the grey mare that our champion rides. Be in the stables at seven sharp ready to compete.”

“What about Krystal? Do we get to keep her in escrow?”

“You have no more neutral parties to entrust her to. All of you are involved in this wager,” Morgan said. “Therefore, she will stay at my casino under my attendant’s watchful eye. Since Mr. Emerson’s debt is still in question, our previous agreement to escrow remains valid, and he may stay with you. See you in the morning, Mr. Fletcher.” With that he gave us a wave toward the door. I looked at Krystal before turning around, something I hadn’t dared to do the entire time I had spoken with Morgan, for fear she would somehow talk me out of it.

When I did meet her eyes at last, I was nearly knocked back. Her eyes were all but screaming at me, her face contorted in frustration as she tried to communicate. I had known Krystal for a long time in my youth, and I had seen much of her since we reconnected, and I knew one thing for certain. Krystal could have never restrained her mouth if she felt that strongly about something, which only left one option . . . . They had used their magic to render her silent.

Terrified as I was, I turned on my heel and strode out as powerfully as I could. There was no way I would let these bastards know I was shaking in my comfortable brown loafers.

6.

“You really screwed the pooch on this one,” Bubba said once we were comfortably far from the conference room and heading toward the stables. Though it would be foolish to assume the dracolings wouldn’t have eyes and ears on every inch of their property, there was no sense in making our conversations easier for them to overhear.

“Maybe it will be okay,” I said, more out of desperate hope than actual optimism. “I mean a joust is sort of a physical event, and I am a lot stronger than humans.”

“A joust is closer to a shooting match than a fight,” Bubba corrected. “You have to aim your lance at a precise spot to try and topple your opponent, while steering your horse at just the right pace and keeping your balance, all while dodging the lance heading straight for you. The only place strength really comes in is in lifting the damn lance, which I’m sure you’ll do great at.”

We reached the gaming floor then, and after some quick directions from an attendant, headed to the arena. Evidently, Morgan had already called down and alerted everyone to our new level of clearance because as we left the casino area and stepped into Excalibur’s arena, not one worker stopped or bothered us. In fact, a pair of well-muscled men wearing suits specifically let us into the arena, then locked the doors after we stepped through. We kept silent as we moved during this time, even Albert, because the last thing we wanted was for everyone to see that we knew how good and screwed we were.

“It still doesn’t seem hopeless,” Albert said once the doors had been secured behind us. “Vampires are more than strong; they also have enhanced coordination, reflexes, and speed.”

“The key word there is ‘enhanced,’” Bubba said as we walked through the spacious tournament floor. There were stadium seats that stretched far above us, and the ground beneath us was covered in dirt and straw. In the center of one side of the seating was a boxed off area adorned with curtains and jewels, with a pair of thrones resting inside of it.

“If Fred had been some sort of fighter, or athlete, or anything like that before he got turned, then we might be a little better off,” Bubba continued. “But given that he’s wearing glasses and a sweater vest AFTER becoming a vamp, I’m guessing he wasn’t much of a tough guy when he had a heartbeat.”

They both paused and looked at me, at which point I did my best to look inconspicuous. It wasn’t as though I could really debate Bubba on that point.

“He still got enhanced, though,” Albert said.

“And if I multiply ten by two, I get twenty. Much higher than two, but not as good as if I’d multiplied ten by ten and gotten a hundred,” Bubba said. “Anyway, this is all pointless. Did you really think Morgan and his boys didn’t know vampires were stronger than dracolings? Dracolings always take bets they know they can win, so you can be damned sure there’s an ace in the hole.”

“What do you think it will be?” I asked.

“Oh, I don’t wonder. I already know what it is,” Bubba said. “Follow me.”

With that he began walking off across the arena, toward a set of large wooden doors near the rear. Albert and I kept pace, unsure of what to expect. Bubba reached the doors and threw them open with ease. He strode into a room that would have been dark to human eyes, though Albert and I could easily make out the horses resting comfortably in their stables. We ventured after him, and that’s when the world came tumbling down.

The moment my foot crossed the threshold of the dark room, a cacophony of screaming noise pierced my ears. Let me tell you something—having senses beyond the human threshold isn’t always a blessing. As the horses began to buck, and kick, and whinny in their stables, my ears overloaded, and I stumbled backward . . . backward into peaceful silence. Just as fast as the horses’ tirade had begun, it ended.

“Whoa,” Albert said.

“Vampires spook horses. Bad,” Bubba said as he emerged from the stables. “You blood suckers are some of the ultimate predators, and a horse’s senses are finely tuned to that sorta thing. Hell, even I get goose bumps when I stand too close to you.”

“So, I can’t ride one?” I asked, still trying to get my mental feet back under me.

“You won’t even be able to stay in the same room as one. The minute you’re there, every nerve and sense that poor horse has will go haywire. Since you’re strong, you’ll probably be able to subdue one and climb on top of it, but riding it with any real control? You can forget that shit right here, right now.”

“Bastards.” Albert said.

“Maybe, but this might work to my advantage,” I said. “I mean, their guy will be riding a horse, too. Won’t me being there spook his horse as well? At least I can put us on an even playing field.”

“Yeah! Good thinking.” Albert was clearly on board, but Bubba was already shaking his head no.

“Dragon magic,” he said simply. “They have control over their possessions, including their horses. You being there will surely spook their guy’s horse, but it won’t matter. He’ll just override its fear. I told you already; the damn dracolings think of everything. You have to come out of left field.”

“Well . . . what about you?” Albert said. “Can you turn at will, or are you only a full-moon shifter?”

I briefly wondered why I hadn’t hit on that idea, but seconds later I became quite glad that Albert had beaten me to it. In motion that was shockingly fast given his height and bulk, Bubba had snapped Albert off the ground by the neck and held him several feet in the air.

“Now, I know,” Bubba growled, “that you are not suggesting Fred ride me. I am positive you would not insult me and my kind so blatantly as to suggest I submit myself to bearin’ a rider to control me. I’m right, aren’t I?”

Albert nodded as vigorously as he could with his neck being held in a hand the size of a ham, and Bubba dropped him to the ground. In truth, there was little Bubba could have done to hurt or injure Albert. Raised zombies are a ridiculously hardy lot, but Albert hadn't been dead all that long, and he still hadn't gotten used to things like not fearing death. He and I were similar in that regard. The difference was that I was ever so slowly learning to pick my battles.

"He's right, you know," I said. "If you can turn at will, then you're probably the only chance we really have."

Bubba turned on me, and for a second I thought he was going to throttle me by the neck, too. His eyes were big, and there was a vein bulging in his neck. Knowing I was stronger than him didn't do much to cut the fear of having a giant man stare at me that way, so I finished my proposal with extra haste.

"It's the only chance Krystal has, too."

It was like I'd stuck a pin in a balloon. Bubba's sudden ferocity slipped away like mercury running off a table, leaving me looking at a large, proud, powerful man who suddenly seemed very tired and unsure.

"I can turn at will, but it's one of the highest dishonors for a weresteed to be ridden like a common horse," Bubba protested weakly.

"Don't think of me as a rider," I said. "Think of me as a partner. Or think of me as a friend you're doing a favor for. I don't really care what titles we put on it, as long as it gives us a fighting chance of winning our freedom back."

"You know, pride aside, it seems like the dracolings would have remembered that Bubba was a weresteed," Albert said. "That makes the whole horse thing just a small pain in the ass instead of a deal breaker. I mean, they even gave him his freedom on casino grounds so he could work with us. Weird."

I blinked in surprise. He was right. They had to know that Bubba would consent to being ridden if it meant saving Krystal and himself. Which meant there was something we were still missing.

"Actually, I think I can guess why they didn't count me as an option," Bubba said with a sigh. "I told you I was in a different situation than most weresteeds. Well . . . you know what? Just watch."

As I kept my eyes trained on him, Bubba seemed to ripple, like a pond that a stone had just been chunked into. His skin became darker, and his hands grew hard as his fingers merged together. His eyes became huge as his face elongated. His body began to shift, and a small popping sound registered to my ears as his clothes unsnapped. It seemed everything he wore was designed to snap off without tearing when he turned. I suppose that would be something of a must for a shape shifter on a budget.

It sounds as though it took some time, but that is only through my own amped up perception. In truth, only seconds passed between Bubba telling us to watch and Albert and I gazing upon a beautiful black-haired steed. It seemed strong and powerful, the kind of horse that made other horses slink back to their stables and munch on an oat bag rather than occupy the same track as such a beast. There was really only one problem.

“You’re a pony!” Albert shrieked in odd delight. He was right through. Massive as Bubba was in human form, he was somewhat less imposing while hooved. He came up to maybe my waist, and my figure was not one of height and intimidation. Albert raced over and began stroking Bubba the horse’s head. There was a sound like a rubber band snapping, and Bubba was back in his normal form, immediately gathering up his clothes.

“So,” I said to gently broach the subject once Bubba’s pants were back on.

“He’s right,” Bubba said curtly. “I’m a pony. I’m thirteen hands high, which makes me a big damn pony, but still a hand short of being a horse. Joust horses are supposed to be the biggest of the breed, so they can bring more power and height for their rider. If we use me, then we’ve as good as lost.”

“Maybe,” I said. “But then again, I’m not anyone’s ideal jousting. I took this bet because I’m really good at chess, which is ultimately the same thing as saying I’m bad at everything physical.”

“So, we’re double fucked?” Bubba asked.

“Probably,” I admitted. “We have to try, though. I mean, I hate sports, and competition makes me a little nauseous, and the idea of physically engaging with someone turns my legs to jelly. But what other choice do we have?”

“We’ll get our asses kicked,” Bubba said.

“I’ve gotten my ass kicked a whole lot of times. One more probably won’t kill me. Besides, at least with a steed who won’t buck me, we have a shot at getting lucky.”

Bubba chuckled. “A vampire riding a pony. It certainly does come out of left field.”

“So what now?”

“Now, we practice. We’ve only got a few hours before we’re all slaves for life.”

7.

“How’s it looking out there?” I asked as Albert came scurrying back into our stable. We’d discovered that the stables on the opposite of the arena were empty of horses and used for equipment, so we’d set up shop there to get gear for the match. We’d spent several hours riding and getting comfortable with the lance and made some key discoveries. Bubba’s height really was a detriment, my aim was one as well, and it was damn hard to find a saddle that would fit a pony in a stable stocked for jousting horses.

“Pretty full,” Albert said. People had been filtering in for nearly an hour, and sooner or later, we’d be called out into the arena. Some casino workers had given us the rundown a few hours previously. Apparently, we would be called onto the floor and make introductions. Then Morgan would explain the rules, and we would bow to one another, and the fight would start. I guess I wasn’t surprised a shrewd businessman like Morgan was filling the seats for this show; I just hoped that didn’t mean I was in deep shit if I did something supernatural. If only Krystal were here, I could have asked her who was responsible for secrecy in this situation.

I felt a pang in my stomach when I thought about Krystal. It seemed like every time I’d wound up in this scenario before, she’d rushed in and saved me somehow. A part of me had kept expecting her to come into the arena last night and explain how she’d worked everything out, and we could go home. Sitting there, wearing rusty armor and holding a large wooden lance, it finally sank in all the way. Krystal wasn’t coming to our rescue this time. Today, the only cavalry we had was a werepony, a bumbling zombie, and a chickenshit vampire. I wondered if it was too late to place a bet on the other guy to win.

“You got a good grip on your lance?” Albert asked.

“Huh?” I said, yanking myself out of my reverie. “Oh, yeah, it feels just like holding a baseball bat.”

“When did you ever play baseball?”

“I tried for the team in high school. Didn’t do so well,” I said, purposely keeping my answer brief. No need to go into details about accidentally whacking the coach in the balls when the bat slipped out of my hands.

“Fred,” Albert said. “Do your best.”

“I’ll give it my all, however much that’s worth.”

“Contestants, please report to the arena!” A loud voice thundered through our stable, indicating it was time for the match to begin. Albert hustled over to the doors and worked them open. They were a touch rusty, so it took a few moments before they were wide enough for Bubba and I to exit through. As a result, the dracoling champion was already out in the arena, garnering cheers and roses from the fans. He was a strapping young man, long blond hair and large physique under his glistening armor. There was no way he was stronger than me, but from the way he moved across the arena on his horse, it was clear I could have ridden for ten years and not had the same equestrian ability he possessed. My only hope was that he was worse with a lance than he was on horseback, and that was admittedly a very dim hope.

Bubba whinnied, and began moving forward, pulling us out into the sight of the crowd. I’d expected the noise to suddenly stop, like a needle on a record, but instead it grew larger. With laughter. I’ll admit we did look fairly humorous, but as I felt Bubba tense up beneath me, I put my hand on his head to steady him. I turned it delicately to where the throne box was. Sitting in one was Morgan, wearing a lavish tunic and drinking from a jeweled goblet. In the other, wearing a scoop neck dress and an angry scowl, was Krystal. He’d dressed her up like a medieval Barbie just to prove that he could. Bubba stamped the ground once and loosened his muscles, telling me he understood. These people didn’t matter, their laughter wasn’t important, and the only thing we needed to focus on was saving our friend.

“Good morn, my loyal subjects,” Morgan bellowed out to the crowd. “Today we hold a joust, for the hand of my own beautiful Lady Jenkins. Standing to the east, representing your king, please greet Sir Galvin!” The laughter decreased as the cheering was turned up a few notches.

“And to the east, representing himself, I present to you: Fred!”

“I think I got shafted on that introduction,” I muttered to Bubba as the waves of laughter and pointing increased. I almost wished I had worn a helmet to cover my face and hide my shame, but Bubba had pointed out that it could obscure my vision. Besides, it's not like a lance to face was going to do any damage to my head anyway.

"Now, my dear subjects, this match shall be the first to three points. A broken lance anywhere on the body will count as a single point, and as always, should a rider be knocked to the ground in any way, he has lost the match," Morgan said. "If our jousters will bow to one another." I inclined my body as best I could in armor, and Galvin across the arena did the same. "Excellent, now take your positions."

Bubba trudged over to the railing that ran through the center of the arena. We took our place on the right side and waited as Galvin did the same. It took him longer despite his superior skill, since he insisted on walking sideways and blowing kisses to the ladies in the audience. I noticed he threw several extra air smooches at Krystal and tightened my grip.

A small man dressed in period clothes came to the center of the railing and checked to see that we were both in position. He took a few steps back, and then with a jerking motion waved his flag telling us to charge.

I wish I could tell you it was over in a flash and I don't remember what happened, but thanks to the damn vampire sense, I saw the whole thing clearly. Bubba was off like a shot, his size not diminishing the considerable power that being a werecreature afforded him. Galvin was moving quickly too, though, his horse's size and power nearly broaching the speed gap. As we approached each other, I focused on his chest, visualizing it as one of the rings I had practiced with all night. I steadied my lance and drove it right for his sternum.

In a motion as fluid as running water, Galvin rolled his own lance in a circle, knocking against mine to deflect it and arriving back at the perfect position to skewer me dead center, smashing his lance and nearly driving me off Bubba. The only thing that kept me seated was the ludicrous amount of strength in my legs, strength that had been of no help when he'd used simple physics to remove my leverage and redirect my thrust.

As Bubba slowed down to a trot, I became vaguely aware of the loud cheers coming from the crowd. I righted myself and adjusted my seat as an attendant rushed forward with another lance.

That had been unreal; I'd never even had a chance at striking Calvin. He'd read my movements like a book and reacted to them perfectly, all of which was only made easier by the difference of several feet in height between us. I looked across the arena to see him being handed another lance, smiling freely. For a moment I wondered why he hadn't bothered to put a helmet on, either. Then it hit me, he knew he didn't need one. If I'd had any sense of pride at that moment, it might have been crushed.

Bubba and I pulled into position at the railing, and I took a deep breath to try and steady my nerves. I knew I didn't actually need to breathe, of course, but stimulus response is ingrained deeply in the human mind, even after death. It worked too, and I felt myself become more in control. I knew if I used the few advantages I did have, I'd be able to strike Calvin dead center. The attendant came to the center and waved the flag, and Bubba and I surged forward, bent on destroying our opponent.

A few seconds later, we were trotting up to the other side with a new dent in my armor and another unbroken lance lying on my side of the arena. It was no good. He was just too well trained at this for me to overcome him with a few physical advantages and a night of practice.

Albert rushed to my side. "Fred! Fred, are you okay?"

"Well, I'm trying to get used to the idea of living and working in Vegas for the rest of my life, but other than that, I'm peachy," I said as I pulled myself up.

"Yeah, you're not doing too good," Albert agreed.

"No, I am not." I looked up into the throne box. Krystal was staring down at me, looking . . . I wasn't sure. I didn't think I had ever seen such a look on her face. It was desperation, sadness, and helplessness all rolled into one and smothered with guilt. She knew we were going to lose. So did Morgan and the audience. Hell, for that matter, even we knew we were going to lose.

"Guess we didn't come far enough out of left field." Albert sighed resolutely.

I paused for a moment, looking up at Krystal, then at Albert, then Bubba, then working very hard to remember something Morgan had said earlier, word for word. A light clicked on in my head, and I had a plan. Go figure; I was tweaked out and amped up physically thanks to my vampire status, but the thing that might actually save us was my good old steel trap of a memory.

“Get me a lance,” I told Albert. As he hustled off to take the lance from an approaching attendant, I began working on my armor. After messing with the buckles for a few frustrating seconds, I gave up and just tore the armor off. I stretched my limbs, then leaned into Bubba.

“Can you run faster than you have been?” Bubba stamped once, indicating “yes” in the code we’d worked out during our training. “Good,” I told him. “Do that. Run as fast and as hard as you can. Stay straight along the rail no matter what. And try to trust me because I think we’re about to go for broke.”

Bubba stamped his hoof three times which meant, if I was remembering correctly, “Let’s go beat these bitches.” It had been a long night, and we’d had a bit of fun with the code.

Albert came scampering back and handed me my lance. “Where’s your armor?”

“I don’t need it for this one,” I said.

“Okay . . . why not?”

“Because if we keep trying the same thing, we’ll definitely lose, so at least this way we have a one-percent chance of winning.”

“I kind of figured that,” Albert said. “I meant why don’t you need armor for whatever you’re trying?”

“Just watch,” I said with a sigh. Bubba moved slowly into our starting position, and I checked my legs in the saddle to make sure they were just where I wanted them. Galvin hesitated to take his spot though, staring across at me as I sat sans armor on the back of my pony. He reached up to the tip of his lance and broke off a chunk of the wooden tip. Then he smiled at me and began riding to his starting position. The meaning wasn’t lost on me. Right now he was essentially holding a giant wooden stake, and if he hit me this time, I'd be nothing but a pile of dust on the floor.

I tried very, very, very hard to keep the sudden rush of fear that hit me from showing on my face. I hadn't expected him to raise the stakes (no pun intended), and in truth, if I'd known Galvin would do that, I likely would have just taken the final blow and lost the match. That option wasn't on the table though, so all I could do was take another stabilizing breath and pray.

The starter attendant jerked his flag, and we were off.

My first thought was that Bubba really hadn't lied about holding back. That black, little pony was thundering down the track like it was a mini-horse of the apocalypse. I was ninety-percent certain that if I'd been able to turn back and look, I would have seen hoof prints in the ground from how hard he was striking it.

Galvin noticed the difference, too, and began spurring his own steed vigorously to match pace. It was all for naught, though. His horse might have had more size, but Bubba was a pissed off weresteed running all out. That meant the only advantages Galvin still had were the height of his horse and his skill with a lance.

As I pulled up my legs and secured my balance, I took away his height advantage the only way I could think of. I stood up on Bubba's back, riding him like several hundred pounds of angry, charging surfboard. It was a precarious position, and if I'd been human, there was no chance I could have pulled it off. But being a vampire isn't all sun allergies and blood dependency. Even with my balance it was a challenge, but it was one I could handle for a short while. With the way Bubba was closing the gap between Galvin and me, I wouldn't need to keep it up for long.

My antics had taken the crowd, and, more importantly, Galvin by surprise. Unfortunately, as we drew nearer, any uncertainty slid off of his face, leaving only focused determination in its place. This man was truly a warrior, and even with the advantage of speed and the leveling of our heights, there was no chance I'd be able to best him in a joust.

Luckily, he didn't know that I was no longer competing in the joust. I'd moved on to a more modern game.

The two of us drew within lance range, and Galvin waited the split second to deflect my thrust. The thrust never came, though. I kept both hands locked on the lance raised on my right side, but made no movements to aim it at Galvin's body. In a fraction of a second, Galvin read the course of my lance and knew I wasn't aiming for him. I'm not sure if he paused to wonder why, or simply didn't care, but he aimed that giant stake at my heart without hesitation and went for the kill.

My left hand smashed against his lance, leaving my own weapon and protecting my heart by pushing his blow over my shoulder. Disappointment smeared across his handsome face as he realized it would take another run to bring me down, but there was no fear or wonderment. We were too close for me to hit his heart with my lance. As our eyes met in the moments before we were even with one another, he saw the arch my arm was moving in, and comprehension dawned across his face. I was impressed he'd figured it out.

With every ounce of power I could pull from my one arm of undead muscles and the momentum of Bubba's run, I swung my lance like a baseball bat and sent it smashing into Galvin. The force of my blow sent him flying off of his horse several feet away, and it seemed to knock over the horse as well. Unfortunately, it also sent me twirling around, losing my footing and tumbling over. I bounced off Bubba's back and grabbed uselessly for something to hold onto. As I started to lift into the air on the rebound, I wondered if I could make a case that Galvin had fallen first. Before I could fully commit myself to losing, I felt a sharp pain in my shoulder as something grabbed hold and pulled me back onto the pony. Glancing upward, I saw it was Bubba himself who's pulled me down, rearing his head back and chomping into my flesh. I'd never been happier to have someone surprise me with an attack.

The arena greeted me with the dead silence I'd expected when Bubba and I first came out as they decided what to make of the final round. I'd unseated their champion, but in a way they'd never seen nor dreamt of before. At last one man in the top row began clapping, and like a landslide the applause and cheering began pouring down upon us.

I leaned over to my trusty steed and whispered, “We should both be very thankful I’m no longer physically capable of pissing myself in fear. Otherwise, we would have been doused.”

Bubba stamped once.

8.

“You cannot possibly expect that ludicrous spectacle to count as a victory!” Morgan hollered as we entered his conference room. “That wasn’t jousting at all. It was a circus act!”

“Should a rider be knocked to the ground in any way he has lost the match,” came a female voice from behind him. “A direct quotation from the rules you set down, Lord Ackers. Fred was still on top of his horse, while Galvin was gasping on the ground. Fred won, or does this conversation not serve as adequate proof?” Krystal stepped forward from her place at the rear of the room, still wearing the dress but sporting her old ass-kicking grin as an accessory. “Your magic can’t keep me silent because you don’t own me, or any of us. You bet and you lost.”

She strode over and gave me a large kiss on the cheek. “I have to admit, Freddy, you caught me by surprise.”

“We’ll list gymnastic miracles as things we’re thankful for at lunch today,” I said. “Now can we please get out of here?”

“Yes, get out,” Morgan spat bitterly. “None of you are welcome in my hotel any longer. Your things will be waiting at the front desk.”

“No worries,” Krystal said with a smile. “Lord Vestrin owns the Bellagio, and I think he’ll welcome us with open arms after hearing how we aided in your humiliating loss today.”

Morgan’s face grew white as he clenched his fists with rage. I began to realize that dracolings could handle a lot of things with casual calm, but losing bets and face were certainly not on that list.

“Oh, before we go, though, there is one last piece of business to attend to,” Krystal said, walking back over to Morgan.

“And what is that?” Morgan asked, sneer firmly affixed to his sour face.

Krystal gave him a large grin, then drilled her knee directly into his groin. Morgan let out a guttural gasp and crashed to the ground, his attendants surging forward to help him, and the bodyguards making a beeline for Krystal. Bubba took two steps forward and cracked his knuckles, while I opened my mouth and allowed my fangs to extend. I was useless in a real fight, but after today they didn't know that. The bodyguards reconsidered just how much they needed this job and backed off as Krystal turned and strode out the door. We followed quickly, pausing only as Krystal turned and tossed a final word to Morgan over her shoulder.

"Next time you tell me to be seen and not heard, I won't just kick them, I'll take them home as my fucking trophies."

"Can I just say how much I love this town for being anti-sunlight?" We were sitting at the table of yet another buffet while Krystal and Bubba plowed their way through a Thanksgiving smorgasbord. The truly shocking part was that Krystal was keeping pace with our gigantic new friend. "I mean, it's noon, and there's not a shred of natural light anywhere in this building. Plus, there are underground lots for us to park in. It's great. I feel great."

"Maybe you feel great because you finally got to put the smack down on someone." Krystal laughed. "My little Freddy is all grown up. This mean you're going to hang up your calculator and turn into a real ass-kicking vampire?"

"I somehow doubt it," I said. "Today was . . . well, let's call it a fluke."

"What do you mean?" Krystal asked. "You were awesome! I know you always say you can't stand physical confrontation, but you floored that douchebag without hesitation."

"I wouldn't say 'without hesitation,'" I protested. "I just used a visualization method to get my mind working in a more proper alignment with what my body needed to do."

"What the hell are you trying to say here?" Bubba asked, looking up from a huge rack of ribs.

"Um . . . at the last moment, I closed my eyes and pretended he was a baseball,” I admitted.

There was a beat of silence, then horror as everyone realized I was serious. The tension was broken by Krystal’s unrestrained laughter, then Bubba’s, then Albert’s, and finally my own, joining in for no other reason than we were finally safe, and I could laugh without fear.

“You know, I have to admit that does make a lot more sense,” Krystal said as her laughter died down to mere giggles. “I was wondering how Freddy finally found the balls to whack the crap out of someone. Now I know. All the balls were in his head.”

“Don’t sell him too short,” Bubba said. “After all, he went into the final run planning on doing it, even if he had to cheat a bit to pull off the execution.”

“True. Even that’s a big step for Freddy.”

“Never underestimate what a man will do to protect the people he cares about,” Bubba said with just a hair too much intensity.

“I won’t.” Krystal’s voice had a rare tone of sincerity.

“Right . . . well, then I could go for some ice cream,” Bubba said quickly, as he seemed to realize the direction our conversation had taken. “Albert, what do you say we hit the sundae bar?”

“But I don’t need to eat,” Albert half-heartedly protested.

“And I don’t need to drink beer, but that sure as shit ain’t stopped me. Now, come on, zombie boy,” Bubba said, all but picking Albert up and dragging him across the buffet.

“I think someone might have a crush,” I said when Bubba was gone.

“You noticed? I’m surprised. You’re usually not too perceptive with that sort of thing.”

“Well, he’s not doing much to hide it,” I said.

“No, you’re right,” she said. “I hope it doesn’t make you too uncomfortable, though. If you’re okay with it, I’m going to suggest Bubba set up roots in our city for a little while. I think having some friends around might help keep his addiction under control.”

“I guess that makes . . . Wait—what do you mean our city?” I asked. “I live there, but you only come in for business and the like. Isn't your actual apartment somewhere in the Midwest?"

"I wanted to make it a surprise, but I put in a transfer request, and it got accepted," Krystal said with a big grin. "The Agency is already looking for suitable apartments in your area."

"Really?" I said in shock. I knew things had been going well, but I'd never imagined she would go out of her way to be closer to me.

"Really," she assured me. "I'll still be gone a lot, of course. I have to go where the job takes me and all, but this means I don't have to keep making special trips. My default place in the world will be in the same town as you."

"And Albert," I reminded her.

"And your live-in zombie assistant," she said. "And Bubba, if his feelings don't make you feel too awkward."

I stopped to think about it. Yes, I was massively insecure that a girl like Krystal was with me, but her moving closer to me had given my confidence a shot of vigor. Aside from that, I knew what it was like to feel all alone in the world. Since I'd met Krystal, and even Albert, my life had felt far fuller than it ever did when I was alive. Would it really be right of me to deny someone else that experience just because I had low self-esteem?

"Okay," I said, caving. "Tell him to get a place in Winslow. Just see if you can get him to not hit on you blatantly in front of me."

Krystal snorted out a laugh. "Hit on me? Freddy, Bubba is gay. Like really gay. Gayer than a unicorn butt-fucking a rainbow. You're the one he has a little crush on."

"What?"

"Yeah, you showed some real huevos today, and you saw how he stuck up for you a minute ago. I think you may have wooed him with your manly determination," Krystal said, barely suppressing her mirth at my misunderstanding.

"Oh . . . Ohhh," I said. "Well, that makes it easier. Invite him out then."

"You're sure?"

"Positive," I said. "Let's get him away from this town of gambling and sin.”

“Agreed,” Krystal said with a smile. “I did have another question for you, though. What were you going to do if the challenge had been a chess match?”

“Win, of course,” I told her. “I’m not sure if you remember, but I was quite the chess prodigy in high school.”

Krystal reached over lovingly, then smacked me across my head.

“Ow!” I yelped in reflex. “What was that for?”

“I’m not sure if you remember, Freddy, but I was the only person you never managed to beat at chess all through high school,” Krystal reminded me. “So if I didn’t beat their guy, what shot did you think you had?”

“I . . . might have forgotten that little detail.”

“Thank god you’re good looking,” Krystal said, giving me a half-hearted smile.

“You think so?”

“Nope, but you are my champion today, so shut up and give me a kiss while the boys are distracted with hot fudge.”

All things considered, I’d had much worse Thanksgivings.

A Mage at the Park

1.

““Periodontist,”” I said, carefully placing the tiles in position. “Thirty-six points.”

The larger of my opponents surveyed the board, eyes darting about in the shadow of his ever-present ballcap, carefully examining his options. The man cut an intimidating figure, standing well over 6’6” and sporting a physique that years of loading trucks had honed. Indeed, he would have been quite the adversary on another field of battle, but in this coliseum, muscles counted for nothing. He delved into his own supply of letters and made his play. His large fingers moved with surprising grace as he shuffled the new letters into position.

““Beer,”” said Bubba, leaning back in his chair. “Seven points.”

“Good play!” Albert cheered.

“Go with what you know,” Bubba said, picking up a fresh silver can and cracking it open.

I sighed inwardly and took a sip of my own drink, a glass of freshly decanted pinot noir. It was a bottle that had cost more than my usual range; however, things had been going quite well for my business as of late, so I felt it was a justified splurge. My guests had palates that were lower maintenance than my own. Bubba was drinking beer that came for ten dollars a case, and Albert was gulping down soda. Albert had only been seventeen years old when he died, so his tastes still ran to the adolescent. Of course, he’d only been dead for a few months, thus he hadn’t had much time to mature his beverage preferences anyway. Ah, but I should explain.

Albert died in an unfortunate accident some time ago and was raised as a zombie by his amateur necromancer friend, Neil. Bubba was a new friend we had acquired in Vegas when helping him gain back the freedom he had previously gambled away. The fourth member of our group, a government agent (and my girlfriend) named Krystal, was out of town for work this week, thus I was conducting my first weekly Scrabble tournament with just the three of us. Which leaves only me to be accounted for in the explanation.

My name, as I hope you know by now, is Fredrick Frankford Fletcher, and I am a vampire, though still not the type that inspired swooning or terror. As I'd learned already, it turned out admittance into the club of ultra-powerful undead beings is much like buying a fantastic new home-theater system. Once the novelty wears off, you find yourself realizing that while the method of presenting it has greatly improved, the content generated is still just as lackluster as it was previously. In the same way that my robust flat screen is still shackled to showing reality TV and poorly-thought-out game shows, being a vampire didn't particularly make me more interesting. If nothing else, it was proving to expand my social circle though, and for that I was grateful.

"Albert, you're up," I said, prodding my assistant to make his move. He leaned across the table and stared at the board, tongue poking out ever so slightly in his fevered, yet cold-as-earth, concentration. Albert was an interesting fellow, easily the most upbeat person I'd ever met, both during my life and in the vampiric-after. Krystal had explained to me once that zombies were locked into the physiological state they'd been in at death, and it seems Albert had been . . . midway through . . . servicing him . . . Well, let us just say he was in an excellent frame of mind.

"Pony," Albert said, placing his tile and sitting into his chair.

Bubba cast a sidelong glance at the youthful undead. He could be a bit touchy about his size; however, nothing in Albert's chipper face betrayed a malicious intent, so Bubba shrugged his massive shoulders and refocused his attention on the beer. My own attention was settling back on the board, a bevy of tactical possibilities unfolding in my mind, when I heard footsteps thumping down the hallway outside my apartment. It took a few seconds for the others to notice. Their hearing was not quite on par with mine.

"Sounds like someone is in a hurry," Bubba noted.

"Indeed," I said. "If not for Krystal's absence, I would find myself fearful that it was a troubled parahuman out looking for—"

“Help!” The cry was followed by an immediate rapping on my recently fortified door. Once upon a time, I had contented myself with the level of security provided by my apartment. However, the past few months had reminded me all too well that there was no such thing as too much precaution.

“Sir,” I called cautiously. “I believe you have the wrong apartment.”

“Albert! Please open up! I need your help!” And suddenly the whiny, pubescent tones of my unrequested visitor slipped comfortably in place among my memories.

“Oh, you must be joking.” I sighed, walking over to the door and undoing the deadbolts before my assistant could beat me to it. I pulled back the heavy door to reveal another youthful face, though this one was aged a wee bit more than Albert’s. It was bespectacled like my own, but leaner, with sandy brown hair that was sopping wet. The slightly freckled face was streaked with what looked like tears, and he was breathing raggedly, scarcely able to gulp the air down fast enough.

“Neil? Are you all right?” I asked.

“I’m fine,” Neil spat out. “I need Krystal, though. I have to talk with her right now.”

“Krystal is out of town,” Bubba tossed in, his large eyes clearly curious about the visitor.

“She left for work,” I said. “We don’t know if she’s in the state, or even the country.”

“No, no, no, no, FUCK!” Neil smashed his small hand against my door. To put it simply, the door won.

“GAH!” I yelped, a bit overtaken by his sudden display of emotion. “What’s wrong? Why do you need Krystal? Are you hurt? Can we help?”

“It’s not me,” Neil said, the tears making a renewed entrance to his pupils. “It’s my mentor. She’s missing, and her place is a wreck. I think someone kidnapped Amy.”

“Ah. Well, then yes, I suppose that would be more a task for Krystal,” I admitted.

A small whimper escaped from deep within Neil’s throat.

“Fred,” Albert said from back at the table, “we should try to help him. He’s my best friend.”

I took a mental tally. Neil had tried to overtake my girlfriend’s mind, murder some innocent (if rather annoying) people, and had magically bound me in place for the better part of a night. But . . . he was Albert’s best friend, and while I hadn’t been blessed with an abundance of experience in the world of friendship prior to my death, I did understand the principles it entailed. Since I considered Albert something of a friend as well as an employee, I had to assume the transitive property was in place here. I cared about Albert, Albert cared about Neil, therefore I cared about Neil as well.

Curses.

“Right, well, at least you should come in and rest for a few minutes,” I said, stepping aside to allow him entrance. “You can tell us what happened, and then we’ll figure out if there is anything we can do.”

In retrospect, that was the first of many mistakes.

2.

“Let’s take it from the top,” Bubba said.

Neil nodded and took a sip of his water. He’d been sitting on my couch, chugging glass after glass for around five minutes. He still looked haggard, clothes stained with sweat and messenger bag tossed unceremoniously on the ground. He also looked less goth than last time I’d seen him as well, clothed more in pastels and muted browns with the exception of an onyx collar around his neck. It didn’t go with the rest of his ensemble, but I suppose change doesn’t happen overnight. One could consider me an excellent example of that very point.

“I showed up at her place tonight at six,” Neil said, a hair of shakiness tickling his tone. “I go there every night at that time for tutoring. This time Amy didn’t answer when I banged on the door, though. That’s not so out of the ordinary. Sometimes she gets caught up in her work, so I went around to the back door she leaves open.”

Neil took another gulp of water and swallowed harder than it could have possibly required. “The place was wrecked. Beakers and glasses knocked on the floor, tables overturned, just a general sense of catastrophe. I searched for her through the house, yelling out her name, but I got nothing in response.”

“That sounds really scary.” Albert rested a hand on his friend’s shoulder in silent support.

“It was,” Neil said. “And it got scarier the longer I couldn’t find her. I didn’t know what to do. I can’t exactly call the cops to come snoop around a mage’s home. God only knows what they might set off. Then I remembered the girl that arrested me that night, and how Albert said she hung out in Fred’s apartment a lot of the time. It was the only thing I could think of, so I ran over here as fast as I could.”

“You looked pretty wiped,” I said.

“It was seven miles,” Neil informed me. “And I’ve never been much of an athlete.”

“I feel your pain there,” I said. Living Fred had been far from what one might be inclined to describe as graceful.

“Yeah, normally I’d make a snarky comment about vampires and cardio, but honestly right now I’m just hoping you guys can do something,” Neil said.

“Look, Neil, I’m sorry about your mentor, but Krystal isn’t here,” I said, choosing my words carefully. The kid might have been all kinds of worked up and strung out. However, he was still a necromancer, and I was still a vampire. That’s not the type of dynamic where you go pissing off the guy with magical powers. “She’s the one with the training and experience at this sort of thing. I’m just an accountant.”

“You aren’t just an accountant,” Neil snapped. “You’re a vampire. Your kind is supposed to be crazy powerful. There has to be something you can do.”

“I don’t know. I mean, I guess maybe I could try to get her scent or something. I’ll be honest, though. I played around with that back when I first got turned, and I’m not terribly good at it,” I said. “Isn’t there some sort of tracking magic you could do?”

“Sure I could, if I had access to my powers,” Neil said, his eyes dropping groundward.

“What’s stopping you?” Bubba said.

In response, Neil pointed to the black collar around his neck. “It’s part of my probation. The collar binds my power unless I’m within twenty feet of my mentor, who is outfitted with a matching bracelet that acts as a key. Without Amy around, I’m just a normal human.”

“That sucks,” Albert chipped in, surmising the situation nicely in my opinion.

“Royally,” Bubba chimed in.

“Indeed,” I agreed.

“Yes, it blows goats, but it’s not really the point right now,” Neil said, pulling himself up from the couch. “What matters is that Amy is out there, in danger, and probably terrified.”

“We understand. However, the fact remains that you’re consulting people ill prepared to assist in the job at hand,” I said.

“I get that you guys don’t know any more than me,” Neil said. “But you’ve at least got some abilities. And you’re the only people I can turn to with this. No matter what, I’m leaving here and trying to find Amy. I’ll probably fail alone, though. So, please, I need you to help her.”

I wanted to protest our lack of suitability once more, but something in his words stuck out to me. Neil said he needed us to help her. He was specifically asking for assistance for another person’s well-being. Mere weeks ago he’d been willing to toss aside human lives for the chance at attaining greater power, yet here he was unwavering in the need to save someone that was not himself. Whoever this Amy was, she must be quite the positive influence.

“I might know someone who can help,” Bubba said, his thick drawl stretching out his words.

“Really?” Neil said. His eyes lit up with renewed hope.

“No promises,” Bubba warned. “I can’t guarantee he’ll lend us any sort of a hand. If he does, though, we might have a genuine shot at finding your girl.”

“‘Long shot’ is better than ‘no shot,’” Neil said, scooping up his bag and walking to the door. “Let’s go.”

“We’ll need something that belongs to her, something thick with her scent,” Bubba informed him.

Neil patted his bag. “I thought that might be the case. I brought one of her spell books, a couple of scarves, and her favorite pipe.”

“Then go outside to Fred’s car and wait while we get our stuff,” Bubba said. “Albert, you go keep him company.”

“Aye, aye,” Albert said, bounding over to his friend and exiting the apartment with him.

“What do we need to get?” I said once the other two had left.

“Mentally prepared, because we might be stepping into a world of shit,” Bubba said, setting down his beer. I could hear from the sloshing that it was only half finished, yet Bubba was abandoning it, his drinking clearly done.

That, more than his tone, told me just how serious he was.

“Oh, dear. I take it you’re on less-than-stellar terms with this acquaintance?”

“It’s not that. It’s just that we’re about to walk into the home of some serious heavy hitters among the parahuman world,” Bubba said. “I’m hoping everything turns up roses. That said, if things start going south, you should be aware that we’re in real trouble.”

“You know, I think the three of you can handle this,” I said hastily. “I don’t see that I’ll be able to contribute much at all.”

Bubba laughed and slugged my shoulder. If not for my considerable undead augmentations, it would have doubtlessly sent me sprawling across the floor.

“That’s the way to stay calm. Just keep joking,” Bubba said.

“I’m not so much joking as you might hope. I’m pretty awful at this type of dangerous-situation, life-on-the-line sort of stuff.”

“Nah,” Bubba said, waving me off. “I thought that at first too, but after Vegas I know you’re a guy who comes through in the clutch. Just keep a level head, and we’ll walk out of this fine.”

As I was forcibly marched out my door, scarcely giving me time to secure the lock, it occurred to me that perhaps my previous fever of momentary bravery had set an unrealistic standard in my companion’s eyes. That wouldn’t normally be so bad, but given my history of caving to peer pressure and the expectations of others, it could prove to be problematic.

3.

“Are you sure we’re in the right place?” I yelled into Bubba’s ear. I was yelling because we were in a nightclub in the posh section of downtown Winslow, with the noise so loud it was nearly impossible to hear anything else. Having enhanced senses has often been a boon to me since my change. As the (and I’m being generous with this term) “music” pulsed with such vigor that it vibrated into my bones, I became keenly aware of the extent to which I missed my crappy mortal hearing.

Rather than imitate my shouting technique, Bubba merely nodded and gestured toward a set of elevators in the back of the building. We traversed the terrain thick with gyrating bodies, slowly inching our way closer to the steel-doored salvation.

As we made our way, it was quite apparent we stood out, and not in a positive way. These people were dressed in designer clothes, buying rounds of shots at a place where the beers cost fifteen dollars. In contrast, Bubba was wearing a flannel shirt and jeans, I was adorned in my usual button down, sweater-vest, and slacks, while Albert and Neil were both rocking an ensemble that would be considered dressed down even in high school. Factor in Bubba’s exceptional height and the youth of the boys, and we should have been drawing a veritable abundance of sideways looks. And yet . . . no one was giving us a second glance. Their disinterest in our absurdity left me feeling all the more uncomfortable.

At last we reached the elevators, only to be immediately stopped by two muscular men in identical black suits. Bubba began what I can only describe as a game of high-stakes charades, trying to communicate to them some concept that I was unable to glean. Fortunately, the doormen were either more skilled or better informed than me because after some furtive gestures of their own, they stepped back. Bubba strode forward, and we followed suit. Once the elevator doors whispered shut, the blaring sound was almost completely silenced.

“Wow,” I said. “That is some kind of sound insulation.”

“Only the top of the line at this place,” Bubba said. He punched the button for the highest floor, and the world jerked briefly as we ascended.

“Is that what all clubs are like?” Albert’s eyes were wide, the sight had clearly left him a bit overwhelmed.

“No,” I said. “Normally the drinks are less expensive and the décor less tasteful. Also generally quieter, though that part can be variable.” In truth, my experiences with clubs listed out at a total of two, though now I supposed I could count it as three. I’d been drug out twice during my time at college, and neither had ended particularly well. Please be aware that I would have happily considered being safely home in my bed as ending well, so that should give you some scope on just how poorly the evenings had turned out.

“I’m more of a bar man myself,” Bubba said. “Get me a nice beer and watch the game, maybe have some conversation. These damn places are too loud. You can’t even hear yourself drink.”

“Which begs the question—why are we here in the first place?” Neil said. “You said you knew someone who would help.”

“I said I knew someone who could help. Big difference there. And we’re here because this is where he lives. The club is only the first floor of the building. Higher-up ones are offices for certain persons engaged in often less than legal activities.”

“And we’re going to the top,” I said.

“Yup, because this guy is the worst kind of criminal,” Bubba said.

“Smuggler?” Albert asked.

“Gun-runner?” Neil ventured.

“Assassin?” I guessed.

Bubba shook his head. “Politician.”

We “oooohed” collectively as a group as understanding set in.

“What sort of politician would set up in a building with this reputation?” I wondered aloud.

“One whose mere existence is a matter of national secrecy. We’re here to see the head of the therians in this area.”

“I see. And therians are?”

“Shapeshifters,” Bubba said. “It comes from ‘therianthropy,’ which is the term for everyone who turns into animals. There are way more of us than just wolves.”

“So, this man presides over all of you,” I said.

“Sort of. It’s mostly a position of honor. I had to come make nice with him when I moved to town, sign a few forms, initial a few boxes sayin’ I wouldn’t reveal myself or act like an asshole. I know he also deals with other bureaucratic issues when they come up among therians in town. I guess you could think of him as a weremayor,” Bubba said.

Albert chuckled. “That rhymes.”

Despite the dire situation, I felt a brief, unbidden smile rise to my face. Only Albert could take joy in the sparse rhyming of “were” and “mayor” under such circumstance, but it was impossible not to take joy in Albert.

A loud ding informed us we had arrived at our destination. The doors slid open to reveal a white marble hallway leading forward. Immediately outside were another set of guards, though this set made the other pale in comparison. If the men we’d met when entering the elevator looked as if they could handle trouble, these men looked as though trouble would be sleeping with the light on for a week and double bolting its doors after even a brief encounter with them. They scanned us as we stepped out, assessing our overall threat level, and presumably came to the conclusion that we were acceptable to continue. I had a feeling that process only had one other potential outcome, and it was one I was quite thankful I wasn’t experiencing.

We tread across the plush red carpet, moving slowly forward. There were a set of steps some feet ahead that made it impossible to see what lurked at the end of the hallway. Instead, I contented myself with observing the tapestries hung along the walls. They showed a variety of man/animal hybrids in different historical scenes. One showed a creature I took to be a werebear wearing a Viking helmet and driving back a battalion of human warriors. Another seemed to feature a werewolf donned in armor kneeling before a king, the king’s blade on the werewolf’s shoulder in the process of bestowing knighthood. The last one before the beginning of the steps almost caused me to stumble, as it featured a wererat dressed in a crisp business suit with the White House in the background. I opened my mouth to ask Bubba about that one, then decided perhaps it was better pursued after our business at hand was dealt with.

We crested the top of the stairs some minutes later, a whole new view meeting our eyes. What stood before us was a large room, the marble floor utterly covered in faux fur rugs. A myriad of people lay on these rugs, some in various states of transformation. They looked on us hungrily as we walked into their line of sight, eyes unwavering from our all too fleshy forms. It was because of their aggression that they drew attention first. That is the only explanation I can give as to why I noticed them before the man sitting in their center.

I've previously described Bubba as one of the largest men I'd ever met, and while that description was apt at the time, seeing this man rendered it invalid. Seven feet tall and certainly several feet wide, this man was the thing NFL scouts' wildest fantasies are made of. His entire humongous body was carved muscle. Golden hair, wild and untamed, fell to his ludicrously broad shoulders. His teeth were just a few shades too white and far, far too many shades too sharp. He rested on a white throne of the same marble the hallway was constructed of. There were no rugs, faux fur or otherwise, softening the seat for him. If it was uncomfortable (which I'm certain it had to have been), he banished any such indicators from his square-jawed face. His bright green eyes moved over us one at a time. When his gaze fell on me, I found myself profoundly grateful I no longer needed to breathe, since hyperventilation was not a possibility. When he finished scrutinizing us he spoke, his voice rough as a law degree and deeper than Plato.

"Bubba Emerson. What brings you, and your guests, to my den tonight?"

"We come seeking aid for a mage who has gone missing," Bubba said, his words concise and his tone subdued.

"A mage? What do I care for the life of a mage? My duty is to the therians of this city. You know that."

Bubba nodded. "I do. However, I had merely hoped that you might be willin' to direct us to a therian with strong tracking skills in hopes of fostering good will. Besides, there are worse people to have owe you a favor than a mage."

The giant of a man sat silent for a few moments, pondering Bubba's appeal.

"No," he said at last. "If the mage has been taken, it is undoubtedly at someone else in our world's behest. I see no benefit in embroiling my people in such a potentially dangerous situation. I wish you the best, but I can provide no aid."

"I understand," Bubba said. "Thank you for hearin' our request." Bubba turned around and motioned for us to do the same. I turned around readily, and Albert did with some reluctance.

Neil was having none of it though.

"You said he would help us," Neil whispered furtively.

"I said he could help us, and I tried hard to make you recognize the difference in the two. We got a 'no.' Now, turn around and leave," Bubba whispered right back.

"No . . . no, this can't be it," Neil said, shaking his head. Before Bubba could react, Neil darted to the side and dashed by him, moving closer to the weremayor. Instantly, there were growls from the rug chorus, matched by tensed muscles ready to pounce. Neil seemed to notice none of this.

"Please! I'm begging you, sir. Please help us. My mentor is a good woman, kind and loving to everyone she meets. She's a great person in addition to a great mage." Neil dropped to his knees and lowered his head. "I'm not asking for much. Just the name of someone who can track her. I'm begging you. Please help Amy."

Bubba pulled the small adolescent up by one hand and firmly clamped the other over his mouth.

"I'm sorry 'bout my guest, sir," Bubba said, haste garbling his words slightly. "He's a whelp and hasn't learned better yet. I assure you I'll instruct him of these lessons myself. We'll leave your den in peace now." Bubba turned around once more, but this time the weremayor spoke before he could take a step.

“Wait. The boy said the mage was named Amy. Amy Wells?”

Neil nodded from his hoisted position above the ground.

“That changes things,” the giant said. He pointed to a door near the rear of the room. “I will deal with you all in my quarters.”

Bubba swallowed hard, but complied with the order and began walking toward the door. Albert and I followed, though I direly wished the weremayor had chosen a term besides “deal with” to describe our impending interaction.

4.

The massive door, also marble, closed with an audible THUD behind us. The weremayor switched some mechanism to lock it in place, though for the afterlife of me, I couldn't have told you why he bothered. The thing weighed several hundred pounds, so I'm not sure who could have possibly moved it besides him. Well . . . me, I suppose. Perhaps Bubba, if he were transformed. Albert could probably budge it, too. Zombies were surprisingly strong. And then, of course, if Neil had been in control of his magic, he almost certainly would have been capable. Actually, in light of the fact that everyone in the room could move the door, a locking mechanism made much more sense than I realized in the moment.

"Amy Wells," he growled as he finished locking the door. "I'm very unhappy to hear that something has happened to her."

"With the services of a good tracker, we hope to recover her," Bubba said.

"I cannot merely assign you a tracker," the hulking man said down to us. "This situation is somewhat . . . complicated."

We all stood around quietly, uncertain of what to say next. Generally speaking, I'd learned over and over again not to pry into the life of someone stronger than you. Admittedly, that category had once consisted of a much larger percentage of the population, which might help explain my lackluster social skills; however, the principle was a sound one. The man stared each of us down, as though he were looking deep into our minds, past our souls, where we hid our deepest fears, and he was taking notes.

At last he let out a sigh. His shoulders appeared to sag a bit, and the tension in his neck relaxed. He was still an enormous, imposing man, yet somehow a good portion of the fear he inspired seemed to be diminished.

"Bubba Emerson," he said.

"Yes, Mr. Alderson?"

The weremayor waved him off. "Please, call me Richard. I think you and I will soon be on far more familiar terms. Bubba Emerson, the things I am about to tell you are not secrets, per se. That said, I do not relish the idea of them being freely discussed. Do you take my meaning?"

"Quite clearly." Bubba nodded.

"And the rest of you?"

"Implicitly," I replied.

"Clear as day," Neil said with more confidence than he possibly could have felt.

"Yup!" The last one was Albert. I have a feeling you already figured that out, though.

"Good, then here is what you need to know," Richard said. "Amy Wells is currently acting as a private tutor to a therian in my town. This therian is very special to me, so I do not take the abduction of her teacher lightly. I take it, in fact, as a personal insult."

Bubba let out a low pitched whistle between his teeth. I didn't know much about therian society, but I could piece together that when a man Richard's size said "personal insult," this dilemma would likely end with someone spending a long time in a hospital contemplating the error of their ways.

"With that as the case, I will be personally assisting you in locating the mage," Richard concluded.

"That's great," Neil said, relief practically dripping out of the kid. "I've got the things you can use to track her right here."

"There is something I must attend to first. It will take some time, but I will be as quick as possible. I trust there are no objections?" Richard said, a tremor of growl slipping back into his voice.

We all nodded emphatically, quite possibly in perfect unison.

Rather than acknowledging us verbally, Richard strode across the room to another set of doors. The room itself was quite impressive, oversized furniture for someone of his mass, lush, ankle-deep carpets, paintings hung across the walls, and a roaring fireplace easily big enough to roast a pig in. When Richard reached the room's edge, he threw open the double doors and revealed to us another space.

This one was painted pink, with small bits of furniture all over the place. Drawings hung on the wall rather than majestic framed artworks, and the pink, carpeted floor was littered with craft supplies. This room also held two new people in it, a small boy and girl. Upon seeing the doors open, the girl leapt from her position coloring on the floor and dashed toward our host.

“Daddy!” she squealed as Richard scooped her up in one of his massive arms. He set her on his shoulder, where she immediately entwined her hands in his hair to give herself a safe grip. She couldn’t have been more than five or six, with golden locks the same as her father’s, tied off in a pair of pigtails. Her voice was high and squeaky, peppered with levels of enthusiasm attainable only by children and drug addicts.

“You finished early today!”

“Not exactly, Sally,” Richard said. “Daddy still has some work to do tonight.”

“Awwww,” Sally moaned, pulling on his hair. “You always have to work late. You said tonight would be early. You promised.”

“I did not promise.” Richard sighed. “I said I would try my best.”

“Same thing.”

Richard cast us a quick glance and shrugged as if to say “Kids.”

“Sally, Daddy has to do a favor for Miss Amy tonight.” Richard delicately plucked her from the perch on his shoulder. It looked like the endeavor wound up costing him about two five-years-old’s fists full of his hair, but he bore it with nary a grimace.

“Miss Amy is coming? Yaaaaaaay!” Sally began running around in circles, waving her hands like she was certain the secret to flying was just in how hard she flapped.

“No, Sally, Miss Amy needs Daddy’s help with something. That’s why he has to work late. Daddy has to go out to her.”

“Oh.” Sally’s disappointment could not have been more palpable. It’s curious that children can either be expert liars or utterly incapable of hiding their emotions, and the classification changes from minute to minute.

“I guess if it’s for Miss Amy, then it’s okay.” Sally relented after a few moments. “But tomorrow I want to have dinner with Daddy.”

“Daddy will try his best,” Richard said. “Now, if you go wash up, Daddy can tuck you into bed before he goes.”

“Okay!” Sally cried, dashing off into a connected room and slamming the door behind her.

“Sorry.” Richard turned and apologized to us, though precisely what for I had no idea. “She’s at that age.”

There was a derisive snort, and for a moment I was confused. It hadn’t come from one of us, and it hadn’t come from Richard. The girl was out of the room, so who was left? That’s when I once again noticed the other child in the room. He’d been sitting at the same plastic table, quietly coloring during Richard and Sally’s entire exchange. The boy’s skin was so tan it bordered on copper. His hair was an ink black. Noticing him for the second time, I couldn’t shake the feeling that there was something . . . off in the way he moved. Nothing I could pin down, just something different.

“Did you have a comment, Gideon?” Richard asked the young boy whose attention seemed to be fully occupied by the act of coloring.

“Just that I happen to like you people best at ‘that age.’” Gideon didn’t even bother to stop coloring as he responded. I blinked in surprise. His voice didn’t fit with his form. Physically, he couldn’t have been a day over seven, and was likely closer to Sally in age. His voice was strong, though, strong and mature. More than mature—old. “Old” not in the way of denture cream and dinner at four. “Old” in the way of mountains.

“I suppose I can see the appeal,” Richard said, his eyes darting to the door Sally had sealed herself behind. A gentle smile, one I could have never imagined ten minutes ago, crested his chiseled face for a moment.

After that we were blessed with a brief bit of silence until the door flung open and Sally’s voice thundered forth from its interior.

“Daddy! Come read me a story and tuck me in!”

“If you gentlemen will excuse me, we can leave as soon as I’m done,” Richard said, heading toward the door. He paused as he passed the young boy.

“Gideon, these people are my guests. Please treat them as such.”

“Yes, yes, laws of hospitality and etc. Nothing to worry about,” Gideon replied without glancing up from his paper. With that reassurance, Richard went into the other room and shut the door.

The four of us looked at each other at first, no one entirely sure what was going on or what to say about the situation. A few of us threw glances at the boy, Gideon, but it seemed I wasn't the only one who was a little spooked by him. Our eyes dashed over his diminutive form, curious to get a better look, yet terrified of being caught. It was the boy who broke the silence. In retrospect, he might have been the only one who could have.

“So, something happened to Mage Wells,” Gideon said, setting down his crayons and standing from the small chair he'd been resting in. “I find that unfortunate.”

“Did she teach you too?” Albert asked.

Gideon snickered. “Other way around, deadling. Sally is very fond of her, though, and I am always displeased to see Sally sad.”

He began walking toward us, a simple endeavor, yet one that made me feel like I had swallowed a brick. I shook my head and tried to get control. I had never been a particularly brave person; however, fighting the urge to cower in front of a child was a step beyond even my usual levels of conflict aversion.

Bubba and Albert also squirmed uncomfortably next to me. Neil was the only one who seemed to be blissfully unaware of the aura being generated by this dark-haired child.

“A therian, a deadling, a bound mage, and blood eater. Not exactly the rescue party I would put together in this situation,” Gideon said.

“Me either.” The words slipped out from me before the overall feeling of dread could warp or silence them. Gideon smiled at that, and as he came within a few feet of us, he raised his eyes for the first time, gazing into mine. In that moment, I understood why I'd been so uncomfortable since I first noticed him.

The funny thing about becoming a vampire is how little things seemed to change for me. My weight, sure, and of course all the physical boons were readily apparent. The downsides (silver, sunlight allergies, etc.) were also pretty obvious. The mental aspect, though, that was more subversive. It manifested in realizing that on some primal, subconscious level, I regarded everyone around me as prey. I'd made peace with it early on and rarely spared a thought about the subject since. But I should have because when I looked into Gideon's purple eyes, my brain slammed me with the realization that my mind had been too stupid to comprehend. It wasn't just prey that existed in the world around me.

There were also predators.

5.

By the time we got to Amy's office, I'd mostly recovered from my scare, though I was still a bit shaken. Thankfully, the raging impulse to run and hide and pray to whatever god happened to care about accountants had mostly diminished. It was still a bit embarrassing that I cowered in the corner while the rest of the team waited for Richard, but given what he told us when we piled into Bubba's extra-large truck, I felt at least somewhat justified in my primal-brain-powered cowardice.

"A dragon," I said for what was approximately the seventeenth time. "How do we have a dragon in our city? I mean, it seems like someone would have noticed."

"Gideon likes to keep a low profile," Richard explained, fidgeting as he tried to get comfortable. Despite the extended cab on Bubba's truck, the two robust men had little space to move, especially with me, Albert, and Neil crammed in as well. "Dragons have a vast amount of magic. Taking the form of a lesser being is easy for them."

"Can he turn into a dog?" Albert asked, eyes sparkling as untold shape-shifting possibilities danced through his head. Whatever panic mechanism Gideon had triggered in my brain, it clearly wasn't installed in zombies.

"He can turn into almost anything," Richard said. "But he usually stays in that form."

"A child seems like a curious choice for a powerful dragon." Much as Gideon terrified me, I couldn't quite resist the urge to understand more about him.

Something flickered across Richard's face, an emotion between guilt and uncertainty. I wasn't so stupid as to dig further. Whatever he was feeling, it obviously didn't engender a desire to chat, but at that moment, Bubba swerved into a driveway and killed the engine. We had arrived at Amy's abode.

She lived in a reasonably-sized house surrounded by ample foliage.

There was more greenery on her property than in the entire square mile around my apartment. There were other houses nearby, but none too close to hers. We were only a few blocks outside of downtown, so whatever Amy did to pay the bills, she must have been good at it. Lots this size, in this area, were far from cheap.

“Her lab is in back,” Neil said, darting out of the truck and speed walking around the side of the building. Albert kept up with him, though barely. Bubba and Richard took their time extricating themselves from the vehicle. The caution was understandable. With their size and strength, it would be all too easy to bend a door or break a window. Eventually they got free, and we followed Neil to a large wooden door in the back of the house. There were symbols scrawled all over it. They might have been magical; then again, they might have been Japanese, for all I knew. I was about to step through when it occurred to me that a mage might have security features in place more effective than just a dead bolt. None of the others seemed worried about it. Since they walked past and didn’t seem to disintegrate, I followed.

I hadn’t known what a mage’s laboratory would be like, but the one thing I didn’t expect was an actual, well . . . laboratory. Beakers, tubing, microscopes, three computers, a bevy of plants, and shelves of materials greeted me upon entrance. Not literally though. Animated tools—that I actually would have expected. Instead, I got a sterile environment that looked more like it belonged to a botanist than someone who dabbled in the arcane arts. Though the fact that about a quarter of it was wrecked or broken did somewhat dilute the effect.

“Shit,” Richard growled from the other side of the room. He was hunkered into a squat, looking at a pile of broken glass and burned book pages. There were scorch marks on the table next to him, as well as a half-melted, cylindrical beaker. I took a breath in surprise, and a very familiar scent caught my attention. It was one I could have picked out of a thousand, one my brain was unfortunately programmed to prioritize above all other things.

Blood. There was blood on the table. I moved over slowly and took a closer look. It was smeared across the corner, a solid swipe about three-inches long by two-inches wide.

“Looks like the kid was right,” Richard said. “There was a struggle.”

“The blood is fresh. No more than four hours old.” I spoke before I even realized the objective strangeness of such a statement, but fortunately none of the others were bothered by my blood-assessing abilities.

“Neil arrived at Fred’s place around two hours ago,” Bubba said. “So, whatever happened, it probably happened half an hour before six.”

“Why does it matter what time it happened?” Neil shuffled lightly as he spoke, eyes darting around the room with a frantic energy.

“It matters because Amy is not some powerless human,” Richard snapped. “She is a mage with significant skills and a wealth of experience. There is a small list of things I can think of that can break into a mage’s lab, abduct her, and not leave behind a few pounds of flesh in the process. Knowing it happened at five-thirty tells us it was just after dusk, which expands the list. Whatever took her is powerful, and we’d better hope we figure out what it was before we catch up to them.”

“Oh.” Neil lowered his head and slunk quietly back over to Albert.

“I’ve got her scent,” Richard continued. “Fred, what about you?”

“I think so. What do we do now?”

“We follow it.”

Our group went back to the truck, but when I went to climb in, I felt a massive hand close around my shoulder.

“We’re in the back,” Richard informed me. I hopped into the bed of the truck, then scrambled out a few seconds later when Richard bounded over the side and nearly landed on top of me. The truck dipped down under his weight, losing several inches before rebounding most of the way back up. I climbed back in and found some space near the tailgate while the others entered the front. Bubba turned the keys, and the engine barked harshly to life. Richard pounded once on the roof and pointed south, further down the street we’d traveled to get here. I sniffed experimentally and found that I could still pick out the scent of Amy’s blood in the air.

“Thank you for doing this, by the way,” I said, raising my voice over unmuffled engine sounds and the wind blowing past us. “I didn’t get to say it back at your club.”

“Sally does not have the easiest life. My position makes great demands on my time, and I must leave her alone far more than I would like. Amy is not just a teacher to Sally—she is a friend. She adds a level of familiarity and happiness to my daughter’s life. That is not something I care to see taken away from her. The one who owes thanks is me, for bringing her dilemma to my attention.”

“I think that credit goes to Neil. He’s the one who has been screaming his head off until someone would listen.”

Richard slapped the roof again and yelled “Left!” so loudly that I imagine everyone in the neighborhood suddenly turned that direction in their sleep. He turned back to me as Bubba yanked the wheel and sent us onto a worn, blacktop road. “Yes, her apprentice is very loyal. Not that I’m terribly surprised. Amy has a way with people.”

“Sounds like it.” I drew in some air and confirmed I could still smell her. I probably could have found out where she went by veering around to see when I could and couldn’t smell her, but I had no idea how Richard was able to pin down her direction so effortlessly. It could have been that his sense of smell was that much stronger than mine, or it could have been that he’d practiced his. I had never really been chomping at the bit to expand my vampire repertoire, though since meeting Krystal, my horizons were definitely widening.

“I’ll introduce you, when we recover her,” Richard said. He lapsed into silence save for the occasional thud on the hood and hollered direction. I wondered if Bubba would need the number of a good mechanic to buff out the dents in his roof, then realized Bubba was the kind of person who was perfectly capable of fixing that himself. We were nearing the heart of the suburban community, a large park that was partially obscured by trees. I could make out a winding sidewalk that seemed to wrap around the edge as well as branching off toward the center.

We passed a gazebo situated on a small lake, and it hit me: Amy's smell was stronger here. Much stronger. Evidently, Richard reached the same conclusion because he yelled for Bubba to find a parking spot. The truck lurched around, eventually coming to the park entrance where a small, wooden sign informed visitors it was closed for the day. It was the kind of sign used in neighborhoods full of nice, law-abiding people who have great respect for the rules. It shattered to splinters as Bubba drove over it.

"We could have just moved it," I said to no one in particular.

"Therian Emerson is a good man, but not the most delicate."

"You can say that again." The truck shuddered to a stop and I hopped out, eager to put a little distance between me and Richard when he exited. The others were still in the truck, so I headed forward and tested my nose's abilities. I stepped onto the grass, my loafers immediately growing damp. The scent was less intense than it had been in her laboratory. Probably because by the time she got here, the cut had stopped bleeding. I could still find her scent, but it was duller, muted. The damn thing was everywhere, though. If she wasn't in this park, she had been very recently.

I turned back to relay my findings to the others when I felt something wrap around my leg with incredible speed. There was a rustling sound, a snap of motion, and suddenly I found myself being hauled further away from the parking lot. I flipped over on my back and found my abductor was a long, leafy vine. Breaking it should have been no problem. The issue at hand was that I couldn't bend forward far enough to reach it. Inwardly cursing myself for not sticking to my morning stretches, I clawed uselessly at the ground, tearing out chunks of wet sod, but not visibly slowing down.

When I was able to glance back, I saw the others hadn't noticed my kidnapping yet. I opened my mouth to yell for them; however, that was when the vine stopped pulling me on the ground and lifted me into the air. I twirled about, spinning helplessly as I rose. I was very thankful that vampires couldn't throw up. What I was somewhat less thankful for was that my shifting view treated me to the occasional look at what the vine was connected to.

The creature was twenty-feet tall and resembled a pile of moss with vines and branches sticking out. It had no discernible eyes or face. In fact, the only thing it did have aside from foliage was a mouth. Oh, and teeth. A giant mouth with rows and rows of what looked like very sharp teeth. I know this because as I was dangling in its grasp, that mouth was opening wider and wider. With those contextual clues, even Albert could have figured out what was going to happen next in this process. Now was clearly the time for action, so I resolved myself to do what I did best.

“HEEEEEEEELP! SOMEBODY HELP ME!”

6.

Fun physiology fact: the human body is wired to respond in a cacophony of terror when it hears certain sounds. This is a leftover of our hunter days, when the people who didn't have such instincts wound up dead. It turns out that some of these responses are wired so deep that not even undeath can purge them. This is why, as scared as I was of the moss monster intent on turning me into an amuse bouche, the tremendous roar of an approaching lion cranked my fear levels up to where I was too frozen to even scream. I thought I was as terrified as I could possibly be . . . Then I saw the beast that had made the noise.

This king of the jungle was massive. It was easily bigger than a horse, and I'm not talking about one Bubba's size. Its huge muscles propelled it forward with astonishing speed. The extra size did nothing to diminish its graceful movements as it leapt from the ground and sank tremendous fangs into the moss monster, or "mosster," as I would later deem it. The creature let out a wheezing moan. Whatever force of the universe had created it evidently forgot to put in a tongue or vocal chords. The mosster turned its attention on the several-hundred pounds of slashing-and-biting lion that was screwing up its dinner plans.

Not one to waste an opportunity to run away, I swung myself upward and snatched at the vine holding me. It took a few tries before I finally got my hand around the leafy appendage. After that the rest was easy. Vampire strength might not let me lift cars, but I will tear up some shrubbery all day long. My landing was far from graceful. Cats might always land on their feet. However, the same cannot be said for accountants. After a quick scramble up from the ground, I checked on the status of my savior.

The lion had carved away large swatches of the mosster's outer layer, exposing a sort of tree-root skeleton beneath. Now, for a real lion, that would have been a challenge. People underestimate how dense a live branch can be. This particular over-sized feline was far from normal, its powerful jaws turning the skeleton into splinters as fast as it was revealed.

“Fred, you okay?” Bubba had jogged over while my attention was focused on the strange spectacle. Beneath the brim of his faded ballcap I could see a worried expression on his sizable face. “That thing didn’t get a piece of you, did it?”

“No, thankfully the giant lion managed to intervene before I found out if vampires can survive digestion.” We both turned to watch the battle. Even in the strange parahuman world that we occupied, it was still an odd and captivating show.

“Impressive, isn’t he?”

“That’s definitely a word. So, unless Neil or Albert learned some new tricks, I’m guessing that’s Richard?”

Bubba held up a shirt and a pair of pants that had previously been on the weremayor. “Yup.”

“Why is he so big? I know therians usually turn into larger forms of their animals, but . . . my goodness.”

“Like all animals, you get some that are runts and some that are alpha sized. Richard is one of the biggest around. It’s part of why he can stand over the therian community. We tend to respect people who can kick our ass.”

Richard was definitely demonstrating that talent on the mosster. It had been reduced to little more than a flapping mouth and mulch, even its vine tendrils unable to stop the lion’s relentless assault. As he snapped through one of what could probably be called its legs, I noticed the edges of it were melting away. They smeared along the ground in tiny, green rivers, vanishing after getting a few feet from the source.

Neil was the one who answered my evident look of curiosity, he and Albert finally catching up to the rest of us. Zombies can move quickly when they want to. Nerds who ran LARPs were generally less inclined toward cardiovascular exertion, though. Tugging at the collar around his neck and wiping sweat off his brow, Neil panted for a few moments before commenting on the dissolving mosster.

“Magic,” he said, as though that was all the clarification that was required.

“Augmented construct, actually,” Richard added. He’d shifted back to his human form so rapidly there hadn’t even been time to register it. Bubba coughed with a deep rumble, turned his eyes purposefully toward the ground, and thrust out his hands with Richard’s clothing. The rest of us followed suit, giving the man what privacy we could while he covered himself.

“Amy has taught Sally the basics of such magic. It revolved around creating a mindless servant from the materials at hand. Her lesson merely involved dancing paper figures, though.” It didn’t take long for him to slip back into his pants—it seemed like this was a situation he found himself in with some frequency. He didn’t even bother with the shirt, tucking it into his waistband and leaving his massive torso exposed to the chilly November air. To his credit, Bubba did an excellent job of not staring despite Richard’s objectively impressive physique. The man looked like a living statue from a civilization of oversized warriors. I didn’t play for the same team as Bubba, and I was struck with admiration.

“As much as I like knowing what that was, could someone tell me why it was here? Or better yet, why it decided to eat me?”

“Amy’s scent is strong here. I think we can surmise her abductor is another mage, one who thought to leave traps for anyone who might pursue them. As to its appetite, you were merely the first one to get close. It was fortunate you did. Now we know to be on the lookout.”

“Magical traps and monsters.” I sighed. Not for the first time that night, I wished Krystal was here. Despite being the only human, at least as far as I could tell, in our group, she was the best skilled for this sort of work. Wishing didn’t make things happen, at least not unless genies were real, which actually seemed like something I should check into. But, at any rate, she wasn’t with us, and we still had a kidnapped mentor to find.

“Oh, and thank you for saving me. Almost forgot my manners in the craziness,” I added after a moment.

Richard gave me a sideways glance that I was getting used to seeing from a lot of people. I got the feeling I didn’t mesh too well with other people’s expectations of vampires. That was fine. I didn't match what I'd expected either. "You are welcome. Amy's trail leads into the woods. Is everyone ready to pursue?"

"Hang on." Bubba shrugged off his denim jacket, removed his faded baseball hat, kicked off his boots, and stuffed them all into a backpack he'd brought along from the truck. He kept his grey T-shirt and worn jeans on. However, it was clear he wanted to be able to shift rapidly if required. I bit my tongue at suggesting he might be more effective in his human form. As I've already said, Bubba could be a little sensitive about his size. Besides, even if he wasn't as big as most weresteeds, he still packed a lot of kick into that little form.

Neil walked over while Bubba was stripping down and picked up a pair of sizable tree limbs that were left over from the monster. Though most of the magical construct had dissolved, and thankfully the mouth was part of that, there was still a pile of grass clippings and branches. Rejoining us, Neil handed one of the limbs to Albert and let the other rest against his shoulder. It seemed everyone was getting ready for a throw down.

We darted into the nearest cluster of trees, Bubba right on Richards (not literal) tail, Albert and I hanging back a bit with Neil. After a hundred yards, it became clear that the mage wouldn't be able to keep up with us on foot, which was fair, given that two of us had supernatural endurance, and two of us didn't have to breathe. So, we paused while Albert allowed his friend to climb into piggy-back position. Our pace increased after that, leaving the first cluster of trees and coming out near the gazebo I'd seen from the road.

Richard turned and began following one of the sidewalks, dashing past the small lake and ducking under a lamppost. I wondered what a human observer would take us for if they saw our strange parade. Drug addicts seemed like a solid bet, stoners chasing some invisible target or running from some imagined beast. I missed the days when I would silently judge seemingly crazy people in a park, instead of being one of them.

We ran up a small hill toward another cluster of trees, but as we crested the top, Richard stopped short. It only took a few steps and a slight shift in perspective to see what had brought him up short. Bustling about the border of the treeline were squat, semi-human-shaped creatures about three feet in height. Their color was somewhere between an eggshell and a pasty yellow. Squished faces with beady eyes sat atop their muscular bodies. The large caps on their heads made me think they seemed like pale midgets wearing sombreros.

“Heh, heh,” Albert giggled. “Does anyone else think those look like . . . never mind.”

“Dicks,” Bubba said. “Like walking dicks that have been juicing. I guess that means they started off as mushrooms.”

“Regardless of what they started as, I trust we all know where there are going.” Richard said, bringing us back to the task at hand. Bubba started to pull off his shirt, but the weremayor held up a hand and stopped him. “I don’t think there is any need for that. Half-form should be enough for these pests.”

I’d learned at a very troublesome high school reunion that therians could be full human or full animal, but they also had a step in between. It’s weaker than their full animal shape; however, it has the benefit of getting to hang onto things like opposable thumbs and the ability to speak.

Richard’s change was so rapid that even watching him closely, I barely caught all the details. Golden hair sprouted around his neck and across his entire body, which somehow managed to add several inches in height and tens of pounds of muscle. His face flattened into a cat-like nose set just above a large mouth filled with teeth clearly meant for evisceration. Each of his fingernails elongated sharply, tapering off to a point that I had no doubt was sharp enough to cut flesh. Possibly bone.

Bubba’s hybrid form was somewhat less impressive. Though he did grow wider and a touch thicker, he lost about a foot of height, putting him at eye level with the rest of us. His arms were longer than before, a thick, shiny black surface running across the back of his hands along the knuckles. Dark brown fur about an inch long seemed to be growing out of every visible area except for his head, which had darkened to a near black. Facially, he looked like someone had run his face through a funhouse mirror, stretching it up and down like flesh taffy.

“You three, stay back,” Richard growled, making Neil and me both leap off the ground in terror. Remember what I said about sounds and genetic wiring? He had crossed the vocal threshold. “This will go faster if we don’t have to work around you.”

Bubba snorted, though whether it was in agreement or derision, I had no idea. Richard clearly did, as he bounded down the hill toward his unsuspecting prey, a significantly smaller, but equally hairy, form only a few steps behind him.

For my part, I crouched down into a squat and tried to get comfortable. It was going to be nice to finally see what winning an easy one looked like.

7.

“Faster. Faster. FASTER!!!!” Neil yelled, clutching Albert’s back in a death grip while swinging back on occasion to check the progress of our pursuers. I had no such need. My excellent hearing had become a curse, informing me of just how close the giant-mushroom men were. It helped that their enormous feet made a truckload of noise with each step.

It seemed that not all constructs are simply made and then bound to their form. I would later learn that a particularly skilled mage can impart special properties to their creations, properties such as, for example, the ability to grow nine-feet taller and proportionally larger when threatened. Of course, that alone would actually have not been an unassailable hurdle, not for Richard and Bubba anyway. No, what had taken them down was the other aspect these mushmen possessed. A sound like pudding being churned came from behind, and I dearly missed the time in my life several minutes ago when I didn’t know what that meant.

“Incoming!” I risked a glance back as I yelled, trying to calculate which one was firing and where to dodge. Two of them had swollen cheeks and closed mouths, as though they were holding their breath. If only that were the truth. I veered left and saw Albert go right, both of us dodging the thick wads of acid that landed where we had been only seconds before. The goo covered a wide patch of ground, hissing and bubbling as it destroyed all it touched. Even the seemingly invincible Richard had looked pretty horrific after getting doused in it, right before he screamed at us to hightail. From Bubba I knew that, short of silver and beheading, there wasn’t much a therian couldn’t regenerate from. I was far less certain about the effects of acid on undead flesh, and I knew for certain it would dissolve Neil down to bone, hence our escape. In sheer panic, we were run into the very trees that the mushmen had been guarding, since I thought their sudden growth spurt would hinder their pursuit. I’d been right, however not by nearly as much as I needed to be.

The dodge had kept us alive, well, in a manner of speaking. Yet I could hear more churning pudding from behind me, so we were far from in the clear. There was another issue, as well; the wide splash zone had separated Albert and Neil from me. We were now running at a right angle, growing steadily further apart. I tried to alter my course, but the next volley of acid wads forced me to scramble in a zigzag line to keep from becoming a vampire-accountant puddle. If you're wondering how I was so adept at this, given my usual track record of efficiency, let me just say that while I am not skilled in many things, I am a twentieth-degree black belt in running away.

The mushmen had split up to follow both of us. I had two on my tail, which meant that wherever Albert was, he was running from three. I worked to push that thought out of my mind, not out of lack of concern, but rather because there was nothing I could do aside from trust him. Besides, I still had pressing matters of my own barreling down on me. Vampire speed mixed with an inability to feel fatigue meant that there were very few things I couldn't outrun. However, their enormous size, stride, and similar endurance seemed to register these creatures in that category. The only blessing I had was that they took time between acid blasts, presumably meaning there was some sort of recharging process. I used the grace period to double down on my speed, pushing with all I had to place some distance between us.

The gap between the mushmen and me was widening slowly. I probably didn't have much time left before they could fire again. I leapt over a particularly large fallen log, misjudging its height and barely clearing the top, and landed in a sprint. It was a few steps away when I heard something that was tremendously confusing. Silence. No great crashing feet wrecking their way in pursuit of me. I risked a glance over my shoulder to see something truly surprising, and by this point in the night, that was not an easy bar to reach.

Both mushmen had stopped at the log. They were milling about, looking at me with what I would guess was hate or frustration, though given the inhuman composition of their faces, that is obviously a guess. What was certain was that they'd hit some sort of barrier. Each was careful not to so much as brush against the log, keeping away from it with the same careful fear I'd shown in avoiding their acid. Eventually they turned back and lumbered slowly away, twisting their heads around occasionally to see if I would leave my area of protection. They were in for quite a disappointment.

Without the focus-narrowing stimulation of eminent destruction, I found my mind wandering about what my next move should be. Bubba and Richard should be safe. With us leading the mushmen away, they could have time to regenerate. Albert might still be getting chased. If the constructs had one area limit, it stood to reason they had more. Perhaps the enchantments that sustained them were bound to a particular region. I was seemingly safe; however, that was likely a temporary status. We still had a kidnapper loose, skilled with magic and fond of setting traps. I couldn't very well go back. I knew the mushmen to be beyond my ability to deal with. At least the next challenge might be something more my speed. Like a turtle, or a three-legged frog.

Walking away from my savior log, I realized that though it had seemed silent with the sudden ceasing of the mushmen's stomping, there was still a sound pricking at my ears. It was a strange combination of hoots, chirps, whistles, and brush rustling. And it was close.

Moving with as much care and silence as I could, I crept through the trees and over the shrubbery. The noise grew louder, and somehow stranger. These weren't just random wilderness noises. There was a pattern to them, one that was somehow familiar and unfamiliar all at once. About a quarter of a mile from the log, the ground sloped down, creating a divot in the forest, like a grassy bowl. Sitting in the center of it was a woman in her mid-thirties, brown hair tied in a series of complicated braids that had come out halfway, and clothed in a flowing dress that had been stained with grass and mud. She sat on a rock, swaying quietly as the various animals and plants around her continued their odd serenade. Her eyes were open, but I had no idea what their natural color was. That was because there was no visible iris or pupil. Instead, a rainbow of shifting colors moved along her eyeball, obscuring whatever lay beneath. It reminded me of looking at an oil sheen in sunlight. I might not know a lot about magic, but even I could deduce the woman to be under some sort of spell. Even alone that would have been enough, but my nose was giving me additional confirmation as to this woman's identity.

I had found Amy Wells. Now I just had to get her out of here before her kidnapper came back. I leapt into the clearing, the noise growing disproportionately larger despite my small amount of movement. Amy didn't react, so I touched her shoulder gently.

"Miss Wells, my name is Fred. I'm a friend of Neil's, and I'm here to help you."

"Neil . . . yeah." Her voice was distant, ungrounded. No wonder she hadn't had the sense to run away. This guy had cast a doozy of a spell on her.

"That's right—Neil. He got us to come save you. We need to hurry, though. I don't know when your abductor will be back."

"Conductor? I'm the . . . conductor." To illustrate, she raised her hands, and the forest exploded with noise. Only after she lowered them did it return to its strange series of sounds. Okay, that was weird. Weirder still was there was something about the noises that was nagging at me. It was as though I knew it somehow, like a song lyric you are certain you've heard but you still can't recall.

"No, Miss Wells, your abductor. The person who took you from your lab. I need to get you out of here." I reached to pick her up, and the small girl placed a hand on my shoulder.

"Buzz off, narc." I can't tell you the next word she said because it was gibberish to me. What I can tell you is that I found myself hurled by some unseen force through the air, my head smashing into a tree with enough force to kill me, had I been human. It still rung my bell quite nicely. I had to sit on the ground while my brain swam and tried to recover. In my addled state, the nature sounds somehow seemed to grow more cohesive, and suddenly I was struck by a memory from my college days.

I'd had a roommate in my freshman year at the dorms. Everyone did despite their not being adequate room for one person, let alone two. We hadn't gotten along terribly well. I liked to study, and he would consistently blast music on his side of the room. I didn't particularly enjoy it. Then again,

I've always been a fan of classics and opera, and I didn't understand what the appeal of it was. Until one day, when I'd come home from a particularly grueling exam to find he'd gone to the communal kitchen and whipped up brownies. As I've said before, I used to have a bit of a weight problem, so I accepted his offer without a second thought. That night, sitting in our dorm, I finally saw why he enjoyed this music so much. In fact, I couldn't get enough of it. The memory was buried down under a combination of time and chemical influences, but now that it had surfaced, everything made a bizarre sort of sense.

"This is Pink Floyd," I announced, more to myself than anyone else.

"Shhhhh," Amy said. "We're at the good part."

My cellphone chirped loudly, earning me a dirty look from the girl with the rainbow eyes, and I flipped it open to an unfamiliar number.

"Fred," Bubba's voice came out low and rough. There was a tremor of relief too, as though he'd been fearful I'd be unable to pick up. Clearly, he was under a lot of stress. "Are you okay? Did you guys get away from those things?"

"I did, though I'm not certain about Albert," I said. "Did you two recover?"

"Yeah, took a few minutes, but we're more or less fine now. We found a payphone in the parking lot after our cellphones got melted. Have you run into anymore trouble?"

"Somewhat, though in this case, 'trouble' was our missing mage."

"You found Amy? What about whoever took her?"

"No one took her." I sighed. "We've been wrong the whole time."

"What do you mean?"

"She isn't kidnapped. She's just really, really high."

8.

Three hours later, the six of us sat around a table at Taco Bell, watching a woman who couldn't weigh more than a hundred thirty pounds work her way through a small mountain of Cheesey Gordita Crunches. It had taken that long for Amy to come down enough to effectively communicate, and though her eyes were largely back to normal, I still caught the occasional swirl of color along the edges. She'd explained on the way to the fast food eatery, which she had been insistent we go to, about what had happened.

Amy, it seemed, was more than just a talented magic user. She was an accomplished alchemist. She'd been working on a new kind of drug for a very powerful client and had decided to test it on herself. It had worked. Only since the drug had been calibrated for one much stronger than herself, she'd lost all sense of reality and wandered off into the night. The mosster, the mushmen, and the music had all been her doing, though she only remembered the last one clearly. When asked why on earth she would conjure things like that, her response had been a shrug and the words, "I was suuuuuper messed up."

Neil sat next to her, the fact that she'd never been in any real danger clearly not factoring into his sense of relief or hero worship. She was a pretty woman, but she had over a decade on him, and I was pretty certain his crush was a one-sided affair. Still, she'd managed to turn the kid from an aspiring murderer to a devoted and caring apprentice in a few weeks, so who was I to argue with results?

Bubba and Richard were putting a serious dent in some food of their own. Both of them were wearing clothes that were closer to scrap cloth than actual attire, the acid having eaten holes in all the available garments. Red splotches of skin still decorated their bodies, the only remaining sign of the eroded flesh that they'd suffered, and even that was fading away rapidly. Evidently, healing worked up an appetite, though, since they'd each ordered twenty-dollars worth of food, no small feat at this establishment.

Albert and I were in relatively good shape, a few small holes in our clothing where we hadn't noticed acid splash in our hurried escape. I was streaked in dirt thanks to Amy blasting me into a tree, and my sweater vest was shredded beyond repair on its back.

I'd thought we might get refused service due to our rough appearance, but, shockingly, we were not the most wrecked group in the Taco Bell that night. Hell, we barely made third place.

"Ohhh man, is that better," Amy said. Usually these words accompanied the cessation of eating. In her case, they merely came between finishing one taco and unwrapping the next. "Super sorry for all the trouble guys, but I appreciate the ride over."

"I still don't get it," I said, since evidently I was the only one in the dark. "Why would you make something like that in the first place?"

"Fred," Richard said, his tone surprisingly careful for a man of his station. "People of our . . . type are still people. We still have the same desires. We get hungry, we grow tired, we laugh, we love, we hurt. And sometimes, like many other people, there are those among us who yearn the occasional escape from those feelings."

"Even parahumans want to get high," Amy summed up, swirling down some sugary soda in a few rapid straw sips. "Problem is, most of the usual stuff doesn't work on them. You know how much booze it takes for a therian to get drunk?"

I glanced around nervously. Talking in the open about supernatural things was supposed to be strictly taboo. None of the other patrons seemed to be paying attention to us, and since one cluster was debating the viability of robot designs in science fiction worlds while another argued if Lincoln was a time-traveler, I didn't imagine our conversation would stand out too much.

"A lot," Bubba answered before I could guess. "Goes with the regeneration. I can down an entire bottle of moonshine and only get a light buzz that lasts half an hour."

"Right, exactly, and that's just one hurdle for one type of consumer," Amy said cheerfully. "Zees and Vees and all the other UnDees have their own physical limitations toward tasting sweet release. Through alchemic augmentation, I can create stuff that gets them where they want to go.”

“She is brilliant, the best in her field.” Yeah, that was obviously Neil.

“I guess that makes sense, but it still kind of seems wrong somehow,” I said.

“You drink wine,” Albert pointed out.

“But because I like the bouquet of flavor.”

“Oh. Does that mean you never drank it back before your change?”

Damn. Outfoxed by Albert. If that didn’t prove I was in the wrong, nothing would.

“Right, same thing,” Amy said. “I provide various means for various people of means. I even comply with all the regulations from the ATF.”

“Why do I have a feeling that doesn’t stand for Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms?”

“Cause you’re right. Alchemy, Thamataulogy, and Freshness.”

“Freshness?”

“Yeah, I’m not sure that last one wasn’t just out of convenience. The other ATF was founded first, and they figured it would be easier to be covert if they worked under a title regular people already knew. Plus, it saved on stationery and uniforms. It is still the government, after all.”

“This is giving me a headache.” I went to set my forehead on the table, then realized exactly where I was and thought better of it.

“I have some stuff back at the lab that can make you forget all about it,” Amy offered. “No charge, as apology for all the trouble.”

“I’ll pass. I’m sorry if I came off as judgmental. I guess I just didn’t expect a mage who was mentoring a kid to have gotten involved in something like that.”

“Other way around,” Amy said, opening the wrapper on her final piece of food. “I got into magic because I got into alchemy. Which I got into because I was into chemistry, which I was learning about because I wanted to get better with botany, which I had taken up studying in an effort to grow some killer weed.”

“She really is a prodigy,” Richard interjected, having finally finished wolfing down (It’s not offensive to use that term. I checked.) a series of Double Decker Tacos. “She got a late start and is still considered more accomplished than mages twice her age. Neil is lucky to have such a teacher.”

“Turns out I’m lucky to have such a dedicated apprentice,” Amy said, ruffling Neil’s hair with the hand that wasn’t cramming food in her face. He still got taco sauce streaked on his forehead, but it could have been actual human feces and he wouldn’t have cared.

“I guess that’s it then,” I said. “Everyone is safe, so we can all go home.”

“Totally with you there. If I don’t whip up a batch of hangover cure, I’m going to be regretting it in the morning. Plus, it sounds like I messed some stuff up while I was tripping.”

“On that note, why were there burn marks, blood, and melted glass along with a destroyed lab?” I asked.

“The drug used a lot of fire magic, and before it was done I had a little accident. As for the rest, I have no idea. Maybe I cast a tornado to cool down. Shouldn’t take too long to fix, but, Richard, will you tell Gideon I need a few more days on his order?”

“He will expect adequate compensation for the delay,” Richard reminded her.

“Of course he will. Fucking dragons. Tell him I’ll add in three extra doses to the order, and to the one after that. If he bitches, you can offer extra on the next one too, no more than that though. A girl’s got to eat.” Amy illustrated this point by polishing off the last of her food. Neil set a bag of Cinnamon Twists in front of her, which she immediately went to work on.

“That should do it. He’ll like the symmetry of the three-by-three offer.”

“I’m sorry, are we talking about the Gideon I met tonight? Looks like he’s around seven years old?”

“You got it,” Amy said. “He’s a pain in the ass about the details, but there are worse clients to have than The King of The West.”

“The what now?”

“King of The West,” Richard said. “He is the highest parahuman authority in our part of the country, answerable only to The Agency. Various types of our kind will appoint their own regional leaders, people with positions like my own. However, they must all be confirmed by Gideon.”

“Because he’s a dragon?”

“Because he is incredibly powerful, and he is an excellent negotiator. All three dragons that assisted in our rebellion demanded vast lands of territory for their aid.”

“Our rebel . . .” I stopped as my memory flared up. Krystal had told me something about this over Thanksgiving. America was different from other countries because parahumans had been instrumental in its founding, so much so that they were afforded rights and consideration under the laws. Which meant there was only one plausible rebellion Gideon could have helped with where he would have been able to negotiate such power. “You’re saying he was there for the Revolutionary War.”

“Very much so. He led a battalion of warriors in some of the key victories, and he is often fond of telling the story of them over and over,” Richard explained, clearly a little weary of the tales. I could surmise a dragon with insane power and innumerable years of experience could make a tiring houseguest.

“Glad to know I made a fool of myself in front of someone so important,” I joked. I tried to make it sound light hearted, but my nerves shone through.

“No need to worry. Gideon is not offended by people cowering in fear of him,” Richard assured me. “In fact, he prefers it. Reminds him that he’s still got the mojo, even in his current shape.”

“No question he does, though for the life of me, I don’t get why someone with all that clout wants to be a kid, or is crashing with one of his subjects,” I said. The shadow of some deep pain rippled over Richard’s face again, and I decided it was time to move the subject. “I just hope I never give a repeat performance. I’m ready to go home, drink some liquid refreshment, and pass out until the next sunset.”

“I’ll give you a ride,” Bubba said, flashing me a warm grin. He’d been exceptionally cheerful since we met back up, no doubt relieved to know Amy had been found safely. “Look at it this way—at least you have an interesting story to tell Krystal when she gets back.”

I chuckled despite myself. “That is true. I bet she thinks all I did while she was gone was sit around and play . . . Hey!” I slapped my hand on the table, leaving an accidental dent in its cheap-plastic surface. “I almost forgot.”

“What is it?” Richard asked. The whole table leaned in tensely. After a night of constant surprises, they had immediately shifted back into Ready For Anything Mode.

“We still have a game of Scrabble to finish.”

“Oooh, can I come? I love that game,” Amy said. I was admittedly not overly fond of the woman who had given me a night full of stress and horror, but she had apologized, and it wasn’t like she meant to do any harm. Besides, I had spent most of life with very few people to pal around with. It wasn’t in me to turn away anyone’s advances of friendship.

“Sure,” I told her. “The more, the merrier.”

“Awesome.” She hopped up from the chair and gulped down the last of her drink. “Let me just get some more food to go.”

A Monster in the Pews

1.

It would be lovely to say that the stockings were hung by the chimney with care. However, for all the amenities my apartment provided, a fireplace was sadly not one of them. Instead, we'd used a large wooden stand that I think had started its life as a paint easel before Bubba undertook remodeling it. I have to say, it was a far better piece of craftsmanship than anything I could have managed, though Bubba tended to skimp on the more aesthetic details like paint. And symmetry.

"Hey, Betty Crocker, your cookies are nearly done," Krystal called from the kitchen. No, I don't know why she insisted on telling me this rather than donning an oven mitt and extracting them herself. By this point it hardly surprised me anymore. I pinned the final stocking, our new friend Amy's, to the makeshift mantle, and headed into the kitchen.

"How's the decorating coming?" Krystal asked as I walked in. She sat at the counter polishing off yet another glass of homemade eggnog. At this rate I'd have to put together another batch before the guests even arrived. I had the supplies for it. I was nothing if not a contingency planner, but it was the principle of the thing.

"Slowly," I told her, taking a look at the crisping chocolate cookies for myself. I'll give her this—she'd been right about their level of doneness. "I could use some help."

"Guess you shouldn't have given Albert the day off, then."

"He put in the form three weeks ago. Besides, he and Neil were going Christmas shopping."

"On December 23rd? I see that being real productive."

"I suppose all your gift buying is done?"

Krystal turned away, pretending to be sheepish. We'd been dating long enough for me to know better. That girl rarely had a sense of shame about anything.

“I might have a few last-minute items to buy. I didn’t expect someone to befriend a damn therian lord and The King of the West, both of whom protocol demands I make seasonal gifts to.”

I was tempted to ask more, but I knew Krystal would just button-up on details. The agency she worked for, just known as The Agency among people of my type, was so secret that most of Washington didn’t know it existed. They made sure all the parahumans in America held to the treaties and adhered to the laws that pertained to them. It was a job that kept her pretty darn busy, so I was glad they’d given her Christmas off. I pulled open the oven and delicately picked up the trays, setting them on the stovetop to cool momentarily before transferring the cookies to wire racks. The heat from the metal trays registered across my naked hands. However, since it wasn’t actual fire, there was no damage or pain.

“These should be perfect by the time the guests arrive,” I said, checking the clock and realizing with a start that I only had thirty minutes left. That would have been plenty of time normally; my friends could be a bit disregarding of social convention, though. There was no telling when they’d start pounding on my reinforced steel door.

“You might need more nog,” Krystal informed me, filling up her now empty glass once more from the punchbowl.

I scowled at her. “There’s a tub of ice cream and a dozen eggs in there. You should have made yourself sick by now. I’ll never understand how you eat so much and stay so lean.” Krystal and I had both been overweight in high school. Add in social anxiety, and you can see how we traveled in similar social circles. My weight loss had come after the change. A liquid diet is quite slimming. As to hers, well, I’d never quite unraveled that mystery. It definitely wasn’t her diet; that much was quite evident.

“Ancient Chinese secret.” She gave me a playful wink that was half-obscured by her blonde hair.

“Says the brown-eyed, white girl.” I sighed. “Can you get the new nog started while I go check the lights on the tree?”

“Weeeell, okay. But only because I want to make sure there’s enough of this stuff.”

I headed back to the living room, momentarily interrupted by the surprise slap to the rear end that Krystal delivered as she moved past me into the kitchen. I shook my head, but there was a smile on my face she couldn’t see. We were a strange couple. I’d be the first to admit that, yet in a curious way, we seemed to balance one another well. I helped her plan a bit more, and she helped me do things more spontaneously than I normally would.

Halfway through adjusting the lights, I heard a deafening crash come from my kitchen. My first instinct was frustration and certainty that Krystal had broken my punch bowl. Then I noticed something strange. Vampire hearing is exceptional, so good that I’ve worked on tuning it out most of the time. As I focused, I realized that there were three other people moving about my apartment . . . and only one of them was breathing.

I’d dashed into the kitchen before rational thought could kick in, which is likely for the best since my rational thoughts all center on the principles of running and hiding. The sight that greeted me was far from pleasant. Though I’d reinforced my door after my first few interactions with other parahumans, I had stupidly left my windows unaltered. After all, I lived on the twelfth floor. Who was going to scale a wall and break in?

The answer, it seemed, was the set of men standing in front of an annihilated window. Both were pale and held themselves with a level of balance I was far too familiar with. One wore jeans, a black v-neck shirt, and tattoos covering several hundred pounds of muscle. The other was lean and dressed impeccably in a designer suit, sans tie. He was the one that immediately drew my focus, chiefly because his hand was wrapped around Krystal’s neck as she dangled several feet off the floor.

“Good evening, Mr. Fletcher,” the one holding Krystal greeted. “Forgive the sudden interruption, but I felt it was high time you and I had a discussion. My name is Quinn Thames, though given the closeness of our relationship, you may call me Quinn. My burly compatriot here is Beauregard.” The muscely man smiled at the mention of his name, confirming my suspicions as he flashed a pair of long fangs where his incisors should be. A vampire's fangs usually only come out when excited, feeding, or if we will them to. I really hoped those were extended because he felt like showing them off. Neither of those other situations ended well for Krystal and me.

"Close relationship?"

"Certainly. There is no greater bond than between a sire and their child."

The trepidation that had been seeping through me catalyzed into outright fear. I'd never seen the vampire who made me. I'd just been attacked one night coming home from the grocery store. When I awoke there was no note, no guide, no nothing. I'd been changed and cast aside, which Krystal had eventually explained to me meant my sire was a sick son of a bitch. In the vampire world, that was the equivalent of tossing a newborn baby in a dumpster.

"I never met my sire," I said carefully.

"No, unfortunately I was called away on unexpected business after your change," Quinn said, ignoring Krystal's attempts to kick him in the head. "However, I had great faith that you would become an exceptional vampire. All the makings were there. You were repressed, weak, and constantly trod upon. I anticipated I'd return to this city to find you'd nearly drowned it in blood. To say I am disappointed to find out you were coddling around with an Agent does not begin to capture my displeasure." He tightened his grip as he spoke, and I could actually hear Krystal's heart slow down a few beats.

"Let her go. She doesn't have anything to do with this."

"That's where you're wrong. You see, Fredrick, I specialize in this. I can sense a simmering bloodlust from across a country. Someone like you only needed the power to strike back against the world, power I provided. Given your spectacular failure, I must surmise that the element which kept you suppressed is this young woman right here." Thankfully, his grip loosened enough to allow more airflow again. Krystal tried to mouth something to me, but without her voice I couldn't understand her.

"What do you want?"

"Finally to the quick of it, eh? I'll make this simple. I want you to fulfill your potential. To that effect, I am going to take Agent Jenkins with me. If you want her back, then come to the church at the corner of Eighteenth and Madrigold at midnight. Should you be able to retake her, then she's yours. If you fail to come, I'll kill her. If you come and disappoint me again, then I'll call it quits on this project and kill you both."

"Whatever you want, let's just do this now," I said. There was no way I could take her back. These guys were real vampires, and I was just a guy in a sweater vest. Still, maybe I could give her the chance to escape. Krystal was an Agent, I'd seen her pull off some crazy things before.

I took one step forward and found myself slammed forcefully into the floor. The attack was so hard that it knocked the air out of me. Admittedly, I didn't really need it. Breathing was mostly habit, but it was still an unpleasant experience. Beauregard looked down at me and flashed another toothsome smile. Even as a new vampire, I can move pretty quickly, and I hadn't even seen him close the gap between us, let alone grab me. This was not boding well.

"Midnight," Quinn called to remind me. "And much like yourself, I greatly value punctuality."

Beauregard gave a swift kick to my torso, then vanished. By the time I pulled myself up, they were both gone. The only evidence they'd even been real in the first place was the inwardly obliterated window that was letting in the cold December air. Oh, and the fact that Krystal was now nowhere to be seen. With more effort than I'd have expected, I dragged myself to the refrigerator and threw open the door. Grabbing a packet of blood, I bit through the top and began guzzling it down, not even bothering to get myself a glass first. The minor wounds Beauregard had given me were already almost healed, but the last thing I needed was to be running on empty tonight. This would top me off and finish the recovery.

"Merry Christmas!" My door slammed open to reveal Bubba, dressed in a Santa suit that barely fit him, along with Neil, Albert, and Amy all in tow. They made it three steps inside before they abnormal surroundings registered and their welcoming cheer gave way to sudden concern.

“Guys,” I said, finishing up the last of my blood packet. “We have a problem.”

2.

By the time I finished explaining what happened, the last of my injuries had finished repairing themselves. Albert was hugging his legs on the ground, a look of intense worry clear on his face. Given Albert's unnaturally cheerful brain chemistry, that was saying quite a lot. Neil, for his part, was digging through book after book, looking up with cursory glances to indicate he was listening, but continuing his research as I spoke. Bubba and Amy both sat quietly, though midway through my story, Amy pulled out a small flask full of purple liquid and took a quick nip. Other than that, they both listened intently until I reached the part where they'd entered.

"Sounds like the big one had been draining therians," Bubba said as I fell silent. "As for the guy who grabbed Krystal, we should assume he's even more dangerous. Vampires on therian blood can be wild and hard to control. If he outpaced you by that much, then he's had a lot, and that means this Quinn guy is all the more impressive for keeping him as a lackey."

"There's no traces of any psychic interference or magic," Amy said, her eyes glowing the same color as the liquid in her flask as she scanned the room. Sometimes it slipped my mind that Neil's mentor wasn't just the girl who spiked our punch with moonshine. She was also a mage regarded as one of the nation's top alchemists. "Quinn must keep his pet beast on a leash of intimidation, which meshes well with Bubba's hypothesis."

"I hope Krystal is okay," Albert whimpered softly. It was so quiet, in fact, that I'm not sure any of the people with human senses heard it. Bubba and I both did not fall into this category.

"Krystal will be fine," Bubba assured him. "They don't just hand out Agent badges to anyone. That girl could kick a dragon in the teeth if it gave her too much sass." He was doing a good job of sounding sure. However, I was less convinced.

When Krystal and I first reconnected, she'd told me that vampires were big league monsters. It was strange, since I didn't think of myself as more dangerous than other things I'd seen her curse out without so much as batting an eye, but it seemed obvious these two weren't like me. They were real vampires. The way Beauregard had trounced me exemplified that perfectly.

"Bubba, what did you mean when you said he was draining therians?" I asked as the curious phrasing meshed with my own recollection of Beauregard's physical power.

"Drinking the blood of werecreatures, obviously."

"Oh. Can you smell that in here or something?" I knew from experience that most therians had an adept sense of smell, though my own powerful nostrils weren't picking up anything out of the ordinary. Of course, that didn't mean someone with more experience couldn't notice a subtle cue I'd missed. I got so absorbed in sniffing that it took me a moment to realize everyone save for Albert was staring at me. Even Neil had been drawn out of his rapid page flipping.

"Fred," Amy broached carefully, "Krystal explained to you what makes vampire such dangerous creatures, didn't she?"

"She said we were very powerful. I just assumed she meant the strength, speed, and general difficulty to kill."

Bubba snorted something halfway between a laugh and a grunt of frustration. "That explains a hell of a lot."

"I feel like I'm missing something."

"You're missing a tremendous amount," Neil told me, returning to his books with a shake of his head.

"Be nice," Amy snapped at him. "Not everyone has a teacher to ease them into the parahuman world."

"I'm sorry," Neil mumbled immediately.

"Good." Amy turned to me, pausing only to take a pill from a vitamin bottle and dry swallow it. Given that it was glowing a light blue, I highly doubted that it was actually what had originally come in the container. The purple glow began fading from her eyes as soon her throat gulped the pill down.

"Fred, are you familiar with the variety of classic vampire mythology?"

“You mean how in some movies they can fly, in others they turn into fog, or can shape shift into rats or wolves?”

“Exactly,” Amy said. “Most people think the divergence comes from different cultures taking the myth and adding their own spin on it, incorporating aspects they found particularly frightening into an existing monster template. However, that only makes sense if vampires are fictional, which you now know they are not.”

It was strange dealing with Amy sober. I could almost feel the weight of her intellect as she processed the information and made it more understandable for me. Her eyes flitted about constantly, absorbing observations and taking in every piece of data around her. No wonder the woman spent so much time in altered mental states. This must be exhausting for her.

“The reason vampire mythology is so convoluted about what they can and can’t do is that your kind has an ability unique to their species. Vampires can actually take on characteristics and powers of other supernatural creatures.”

“How do they do that?” Albert asked.

“How else?” Neil said, his tone much kinder than I suspect I would have received. “They drink their blood.”

“They . . . we do?” It took considerable self-control to keep my jaw from hanging open in surprise.

“You can,” Bubba said. “The stronger the person they drink from, the more potent the effects, and the longer it lasts. My kind are their favorite targets, since we give them even greater strength, speed, and senses. If they drink from a powerful enough therian, they even gain the ability to change into their animal for a short while.”

“So, we prey on parahumans just as much as regular humans?” Comprehension was shining like the sun, illuminating the strangeness of my encounters with other parahumans in a blinding light of explanation. “That’s why so many people have been wary around me. That’s why even in the supernatural world I was treated with suspicion. They all thought I wanted their blood.”

“Not all of us,” Bubba said, jerking me back to reality. “Most vampires are assholes, admittedly, but everyone in this room knows you aren’t like them.”

“This is crazy,” I said, walking over to the couch and sitting down. “You’re telling me that these people who took Krystal could be capable of anything. Shape changing, flight, magic—”

“Not magic.” Amy was quick to correct me. “Only living creatures can access the mana that flows through the world. Drinking the blood of a mage will give them some resistance to magic, especially from the caster they drank from, but no vampire can actually weave magic.”

“Well, that’s something I guess.”

“It doesn’t matter. We can’t let you go in after her anyway,” Bubba said. “It’s obviously a trap.”

“Why trap me? They already had me dead to rights before you got here. Beauregard was so fast he could have gotten my head before I even saw him coming.”

“Wrong kind of trap,” Neil said, partly closing his tome, but marking the spot with his finger as an impromptu bookmark. “The guy already told you—he doesn’t want you dead. He wants you deadly. The goal is to turn you into another pawn like his guy who drinks therians, or maybe make you crazy and unleash you on the city. Either way, I’m sure that whatever is waiting for you at that church is designed to turn you into a monster.”

“I think Quinn already accomplished that a year and a half ago,” I said.

“No he didn’t.” This came from Albert, who managed to uncurl himself and put a reassuring hand on my foot. “Don’t say that kind of thing. You gave me a home and a job when I would have been put back to death without them. You risked your freedom to save Bubba and Krystal in Las Vegas. You even helped us find Neil’s mentor even after he once tried to kill you. You’re a good man who happens to be a vampire. We aren’t human, but that doesn’t make us monsters.”

From the mouths of babes. Or, in this case, zombie assistants.

“Thank you, Albert. That was very kind of you.” He returned my praise with a lopsided smile, then scuttled back to the center of the room. I looked back over to Bubba and Amy. “So, what do we do?”

“We call The Agency,” Bubba said immediately. “I’m not sure what kind of idiot tries to kidnap one of their people, but I know I’ve seen powerful beings turn white as a pale moon at the thought of bringin’ down The Agency’s fury.”

“They haven’t kept the treaties enforced for over two centuries without having a fair bit of power to swing around,” Amy said. “I’ve heard rumors that if things get bad enough, they even have the right to call on Gideon for assistance.”

I swallowed reflexively. Gideon was The King of the West, a full-blooded dragon who was several millennia old. I’d only met him once, and he’d been shifted into the form of a small child. He still scared me so bad I’d gone catatonic.

“There is one flaw in that plan,” Amy continued. “As it stands, an Agency task force might, and I do stress might, be able to be rallied in the span of the next hour and make it here in time. While they would doubtlessly bring enough force to take care of two vampires, we must also face the bitter truth that Quinn has shown all the signs of a man who would kill Krystal as soon as he realized we’d decided not to play his game.”

“That’s suicide,” Bubba whispered.

“Undoubtedly. Yet we have to assume anyone willing to kidnap an Agent is already either too delusional to see the danger or so far gone into madness that they no longer care.” Amy touched the side of her head and winced. She reached into one of the countless pockets on her dress and pulled out a small vial that seemed to swirl with green light. A quick motion upended the bottle into her mouth, and a look of tranquility immediately began replacing her pain.

“I agree with Amy,” Neil said. “That’s why I’ve been digging through my books. I knew I’d read a spell for something like this. I just had to find it.” He reopened the book that he’d had partly closed. I realized it was the one I’d seen him with at the LARP, the inherited tome that taught him his first bit of necromancy.

“The simplest solution is just to make him think he got what he wanted. Let’s make Fred a monster.”

3.

Author's Note: Since I was not present for the duration of the kidnapping after Krystal was taken from my apartment, she has requested to tell this part of the story in her words, rather than have it relayed.

In a world full of vampires, werewolves, fey, dragons, and all the countless other subvarieties of parahumans we've classified so far, I tend to stand out as an easy target. Bad guys take one look around a room and decide the blonde gal with the nice cans and the lack of any markings of a supernatural heritage is the easiest prey there. Some of these bastards are hundreds of years old, yet they still haven't learned the lesson of not judging a book by its cover. Well, until they meet me, that is. My point is that while I was very inconvenienced by being kidnapped from my boyfriend's apartment, it was hardly my first abductee rodeo.

"Could you put on some music or something?" I was currently chained to an altar in the rear of a formerly abandoned church. Quinn had done a nice job setting the ambiance. Then again, the crazy ones always do have a flair for getting the décor right. All the symbols of Christianity had been wrecked or torn, what looked suspiciously like blood was splattered in key places along the walls, and hanging in the front of the church were the corpses of two sizable men, both clearly supernatural given the spots of fur and animal features interspersed across their bodies. Oh, and there were ghouls scattered about, hissing and snapping as they awaited a command.

Ghouls can be split up into two categories, lesser ghouls and greater ghouls, or Ghoul Lords. The first kind are mindless, ravenous, flesh-devouring machines. They have no sense of who they were in life. All they know is an endless, unabating hunger. Somewhere along the line, people mixed up the mythology of ghouls and zombies. Zombies are like Albert, corpses reanimated for service. It's the ghoul apocalypse people are actually stockpiling for and writing endless fiction about, though a lesser ghoul won't turn a human with its bite. The only ways to make lesser ghouls are with necromancy or from the bite of a Ghoul Lord.

Those guys are far more dangerous, able to command any lesser ghouls they create and still in possession of their full mental faculties. If not for a vampire's ability to steal powers, Ghoul Lords would likely be near the top of the undead power structure.

Anyway, while the ghouls milling about weren't attacking anything, the sound of their clacking jaws was still annoying as hell, hence my request for music. Plus, I was bored. So sue me.

"Such a brave damsel," Quinn said, perched a few feet away on a decaying pulpit. I'll give him this—the man picked a theme and stuck with it. "There's no need for such demonstrations of bravery. It will not change your fate."

"Uh huh. That's great and all, but I was serious. You guys have obviously been holed up here a while. You've got to have a television or something. I'll take a boombox. The clacking is starting to give me a headache."

Quinn threw back his head and laughed, a rich and elegant tone that had clearly been worked on until it was perfect. Great, this was a motherfucker who actually practiced his evil laugh.

"I do love the bravado you Agents show in the face of certain death," he said, I think intending it as a compliment. "Sadly, we have no such entertainment devices. Our kind is beyond the need for such petty distractions."

"Buddy, there's an all-vampire group in my department that goes and sings karaoke every Wednesday night. They also took three days off when the last Call of Duty game came out. I happen to know for a fact that Freddy still has an active World of Warcraft account and a giant movie collection. Save the Anne Rice shtick for someone who doesn't work with, and freaking date, your kind."

Quinn had me by the throat in less than a second. Whatever he'd been drinking imparted a lot of speed. His face had contorted into a wild snarl, fangs bared as room-temperature breath swept over me. I could feel the tension in his fingers, the concentrated effort not to crush my throat. He had so much strength it was hard not to, especially because it was obvious how much he would enjoy it. A smart hostage would start playing nice very quickly.

“Well, I know you haven’t been drinking the blood of a mouthwash monster, that’s for damn sure.”

A bulge of the eyes, a tremor of the fingers, and then I was hurled back to the ground. Damn.

“Nice try, but I’m afraid I won’t be giving in that easy,” Quinn said, walking back to his pulpit. “If you were dead when Fred arrived, he might feel compelled to turn tail and flee. I’ve no intention of letting him go that easily.”

“Right, you think you can turn Freddy into a blood-thirsty monster. Someone didn’t get quite enough oxygen to the brain when they changed, did they?”

“Oh, I’ve come to terms with the fact that I misjudged your boyfriend when I turned him. I’d assumed his spineless nature was a result of his physical frailty, and that a bit of power would allow years of anger and repression to take hold. Imagine my surprise when I came back to discover the man I’d turned really was just a fearful, weak-willed coward. So much so that even with the powers of a vampire, he still shrinks back from confrontation and challenge.”

“You’re wrong. Freddy isn’t bold. I’ll give you that, and, yeah, his first instinct is usually to take cover, but he’s also the kind of man who always does his best when the chips are down. I’ve seen him face his fear several times to help when people he barely knew were in need.”

“So I’ve heard. Which is what I’m counting on,” Quinn said. “You see, I know that he is currently trafficking in the company of a necromancer. Once upon a time, that was my specialty as well. Dedicated student that Neil is, I’m sure he’s uncovered the spell of Mortis Invictus by now. It’s a charming little ritual that taps into an undead creature’s true potential. All our powers are augmented tenfold.”

“Let me guess—it also amplifies your bloodlust proportionally?”

“And our aggression. Though the spell’s description leaves out those choice tidbits, they must be gained through experience. How did you know?”

“Because, otherwise, you wouldn’t be so cheerful about the possibility of a super vampire knocking on your door. Though I’m still not sure how you win if you temporarily turn Fred crazy, and he tears your head off.”

“I’ll be fine. Thank you for the concern. That’s what the ghouls are for. And while the physical effects of Mortis Invictus are temporary, opening the door to that side of the mind is something that can never truly be undone. Add in the guilt over his inability to save you, and the rage from when I kill the rest of your friends, assuming he doesn’t gut them himself the minute the spell takes hold, and I suspect dear Fredrick will be a wild beast before New Year.”

“Hoo boy. This night is not going to end well for you.” I should have been more concerned. Quinn was crazy, but the kind of crazy that thought well ahead. Luckily, I knew what he hadn’t noticed. I’d mouthed a message to Fred not to follow me because I would be fine. Coupled with his own natural reticence, there was no way he was going to come try and save the day, so there would be no need to cast some stupid undead steroid spell. Still, it had been a good plan. I’d have to make sure to kill Quinn first when this came to a head. Guys like him usually had escape plans to enact if given half a chance.

“Keep telling yourself that,” he said.

I opened my mouth to pop off another reply, but a familiar sputtering engine cough slammed my jaw shut in surprise. Bubba’s truck was bearing down the street, which meant those damned idiots were going to try and play cavalry despite all basic logic. I was an Agent, for hell’s sake. Did they really think I couldn’t deal with a Bond-villain wannabe who happened to sport fangs?

“Sounds like the fun will be starting soon.” Quinn stationed himself at the pulpit in a somber, expecting pose. We were both tense, waiting for the crunch of brakes and sound of approaching footsteps. In that anticipation, we were both sorely mistaken.

The front of the truck smashed through the partially-rotted wood doors, crashing through the first two rows of pews and rolling over several ghouls before coming to a stop. The driver's door flew off, and I do mean "flew," as it was thrown effortlessly against the wall by a pair of pale hands. With aching slowness, the creature emerged from the truck's cab, moving like a snake as it danced around a mongoose.

His glasses were gone, revealing a pair of eyes that were throbbing with a dark red light. The normally-fastidiously-fastened collar had been left open, blood staining the fabric along with his mouth, throat, and chest. I really didn't want to think about where all that blood had come from. Strangely, the sweater vest still clung tightly to his torso, adding a surreal element of familiarity to the monster that had formerly been my boyfriend. His fangs were fully extended, and he greeted the room with a hissing snarl.

"Fuck," I whispered. This had just gotten much more complicated.

4.

Freddy, or whatever remained of him in the red-eyed monster staring at us from across the church, let out a snarl and smashed his hand through the nearest pew. Splinters went flying, tearing through a few of the nearby ghouls, much to their confusion. Those things would have been on Freddy like drunks on an unguarded bar tap if he'd had a heartbeat, but whatever supernatural hunger drove them didn't crave undead flesh. The working theory was that this instinct was woven into the magic that animated them, since without it, creating ghouls would just become a wild feeding frenzy on one another. They would still attack if they were commanded to, though I still wasn't sure who was pulling their strings. They were definitely under someone's control. That much was obvious. Otherwise, they'd have tried to devour me as soon as they caught a whiff of my scent, and this whole ugly incident would have been over already.

Quinn let out a low whistle. "That necromancer had some serious skill. This is quite a transformation. Pity, I imagine at least some of that blood staining your boyfriend's neck belongs to the would-be magician. Or should I say 'belonged'?"

That line was probably already clichéd in whatever century this dick was turned, yet for some reason, it got under my skin. Probably because I had already had the same thought moments before. Who all had been coming to the party? Nick, Bubba, Albert, and Amy. Amy or Bubba might have been able to fight off Freddy, but if he'd drank from one of them first, then the others were fucked. My stomach turned the longer I stared at the red streaks on Freddy's skin and clothes. Stupid idiot. Why hadn't he just stayed away?

"Hey, Quinn," I called, working hard to keep my more fearful emotions off of my face. The only thing he was allowed to see was my anger, and I had plenty of that to spare. "When this is all over, I'm going to tear your limbs off and leave you with your dick exposed to sunlight. Then I'm going to get a mage that can heal you and repeat the process until I get bored."

He glared at me. I think he imagined I would have started begging for my life by now. I probably didn't fit into his expectations for how this was supposed to work. Welcome to the Krystal Disappointment Club, asshole. Tell my father and ex-fiancé "hi" at the next meeting.

"I've had enough of your mouth," Quinn said at last. "I was going to kill you first, but I think I'll let you live a bit longer while we subdue the man you seem to care so deeply for." He raised his hands, the sleeve on his right arm falling back enough to reveal an ornate bracelet giving off a dark glow. At least that explained the ghouls. Undead couldn't cast magic, but they could use enchanted items, if they knew how. "Ghouls, Beauregard, put our guest in more of a listening mood."

Just like that, the murder switch in the ghouls' brains was clicked on and they began rushing toward Freddy. I noticed the hulking form of Beauregard moving forward as well, but he did so at a much more casual pace. Thankfully, Freddy saw all of this too, though it seemed his sense of priorities was different. Rather than swatting at the ghouls bearing down on him, Freddy did what he'd always done best. He jumped, dodged, and evaded. He ran like hell. The only difference in this and the Freddy I'd known since high school, the one I started to . . . have feelings for, the one I'd been with only hours earlier, was that this Freddy didn't try to get away from danger. He was running, all right, running straight at Quinn.

This, far more than the previous command, seemed to kick Beauregard into high gear. The large vampire clearly hadn't been expecting Freddy to make a beeline for his boss. It took him so long to correct his course that Freddy was able to make it halfway to the pulpit. Then again, Beauregard didn't intercept Freddy so much as crash into him, so the progress was definitely balanced with some setback.

Freddy surprised all of us, though. Instead of just collapsing like he had in his apartment, he flipped over the shoulder cracking into him and landed on his feet on the other side. As soon as his loafers . . . Oh, sweet heaven, he was still wearing those, wasn't he? Anyway, as soon as his loafers touched the ground, he was off again, fangs glinting in the light as he snapped furiously.

Whatever was driving him along, it seemed to be single-mindedly set on Quinn.

Beauregard was surprised by his opponent's gymnastic talents, but that wasn't enough to make him forget what his job was. With more grace than a man his size had any right possessing, he spun around, tried to grab Freddy by the arm. It was unsuccessful, though barely. The magic amping up Freddy was impressive, no doubt about it, but I could see why Quinn was relatively unconcerned. If his lackey had enough skill and power to keep up with Freddy, then the mastermind almost certainly did.

A few more failed swipes, a few more frantic steps forward, and Freddy was nearly in spitting distance of his goal. Unfortunately, that was because Beauregard got tired of pawing at him and took it to the next level. He surged forward, wrapping Freddy in a powerful hug that no amount of nimble movement was going to get out of, then threw the two of them to the ground. They met the concrete with a mighty crunch, and for a moment, the world was silent. Had either of them been living, the sounds of heavy breathing would have filled the air. Instead, there was only smug satisfaction practically echoing from Quinn, the clacking jaws of the pursuing ghouls, and a sullen quiet from the vampire pinned only a few feet away. He'd made it so close, though I had no idea what he'd thought would happen if he—

"NOW!" Freddy yelled, startling everyone in the room with a sentient mind. Well, everyone we'd all known about.

"Ectorim Novendum, Bicradalio!" The words were familiar, though not so much that I could place them. The voice, on the other hand, I knew in an instant. Neil's spell echoed through the church, the force in his voice so strong I thought it was going to knock the dust from the rafters. I felt a soft pulse of magic from nearby, again familiar in a way I couldn't quite place. As the words faded, I realized the world had gone silent again, but this time it was different.

This time the world had frozen. The ghouls stood, still as fucked-up wax figures and at least twice as ugly. Quinn was unmoving, which made the look of surprise on his face all the more appropriate. Beauregard was stuck as well, his head halfway up as he twisted his eyes to find the source of the voice. I followed his eyes to find a small figure climbing out of the back of the truck, chunking an enormous blanket back into the vehicle's depths.

"Neil?"

"Hey, Krystal," he called, giving me a wave. For a young man surrounded by ghouls, he seemed extraordinarily unconcerned.

I noticed one more area of movement, this one far more relevant to my situation. Freddy had peeled off the frozen form of Beauregard and was approaching my spot near the altar. His eyes still glowed with that strange red light, but there was something different in the way he was moving.

"Freddy? You okay in there?"

He reached down and pulled apart my chains with a small grunt of effort.

"No I'm not okay," he said, his voice even and normal despite the strange glowing eyes and crazy-ass antics. "I was halfway here when I realized that in all the chaos I forgot to take the roast out of the oven. It's going to be ruined by the time we get back."

I grabbed that wuss by the shirt collar, pulled him close, and gave him a kiss that would make the dead stand up in their graves.

Sex pun absofuckinglutely intended.

5.

Author's Note: Here, since I was on the scene once more, it only seems appropriate that I resume the duty of recounting the incident.

When Krystal finally let me go, which I was both happy and sad to have happen, the joy of seeing me not a monster was at last overcome with her need to understand just what the hell was going on. I could hardly blame her for that. It was a trait that likely made her successful in her career. Still, it was nice to, for once, know something she didn't, and I was half-tempted to savor the moment. Then I noticed the sternness in her eyes and remembered that I was not only helping my girlfriend to her feet, but I was also helping an Agent. In this situation, I had no doubt which trumped the other.

"Spill," Krystal said, once she was standing. "What the hell was all that? And why aren't you some crazy, blood-hungry monster?"

"Neil proposed a spell that would have amplified my vampiric abilities by several fold, but we ultimately decided against it. Even though he said it would have made me strong enough to stand against them, I had to raise the point that I would still be . . . well . . . me. I'm not good at conflict, definitely not good enough to overcome two men who seem to relish it, even with a strength boost. He suggested altering the ritual to dull my human sensibilities, but when he and Amy looked it over to see if that was even viable, they realized that a big component of the spell was already mind altering. From there, Amy put together the working theory that Quinn had known I had a necromancer as a friend and was counting on us utilizing the spell to come save you."

Krystal rubbed her ankles where she's been bound, then stood up to her full height. She surveyed the room carefully, checking for threats. There were none she could discern, or at least none I could discern her discerning. Still, she walked over to Quinn and began to test his paralysis, or at least that was what I presumed she was doing by thumping him in the eye.

“So you didn’t use Mortis Invictus. Then what was all of . . .” she paused pestering Quinn to gesture at the wrecked church and the frozen ghouls, “. . . this?”

“Once we knew what they were expecting, it seemed like we might be able to use it to our advantage. Amy cast a spell to give me the scary eyes. A little creative tailoring and some blood from my fridge completed the image of a magically-altered brute.”

“Uh huh, but why?”

I held up my wrist to show her a tiny metal charm. “Amy taught Neil about talismans sometime back. She removed his collar, so he was able to use it to cast that undead freezing spell he used at the LARP from wherever the talisman was located. Evidently, with stronger vampires, you need proximity to be effective. Good thing the ghouls were weak enough to be taken at a distance. We didn’t know they’d be here.”

“That’s great, but what about—”

“All the dodging?” I said, gushing over her question. It was poor etiquette, but I was excited. I’d never really gotten to do the big reveal before. “Amy gave me a potion that enhanced my speed, perception, and dodging. She calls it ‘cat’s dexterity,’ or something like that. Turns out she makes more than just drugs for dragons.”

“Fred,” she said, taking in a long sigh that told me she was trying not to let her frustration get the better of her. I could have told just from her choice of words she was serious. I couldn’t remember the last time she called me something other than “Freddy.” “You aren’t getting it. My question is not how you all managed this little coup—it is why you bothered in the first place.” She turned away from Quinn, evidently satisfied he was truly held. His eyes lingered on her, somehow still managing to convey a sense of fury despite their unmoving status.

“I told you not to come,” she said. “I mouthed it at you when they were pulling me away.”

“I didn’t catch that.”

“Fine, but you still should have known not to bother. I’m an Agent, damnit, and I know you're still learning what that means, but I'd hoped you'd have figured out by now that it's a title given to people who can take care of themselves. Yes, I have some limitations that let me get captured more easily than others. I've been doing this for a long time, though. I survived just fine without someone riding in to play cowboy and save me from the train tracks."

"I think you sort of mixed genres there. Dudley Do Right did the train-track thing." I knew it wouldn't help un-rile her. I just wasn't sure what else to say. Krystal was the Type B Personality in our relationship. I so rarely saw her serious, even in dangerous situations, that I wasn't used to calming her down.

"It doesn't matter." She thrust a finger in Quinn's face, her exposed flesh mere inches from his mouth. "This is not a threat to me. He is an inconvenience. He is a dinner-plan wrecker. He is an apartment smasher. But that's all. He's an annoyance to me. To the rest of you, he is a very deadly opponent. You should have let me handle my own business."

"I'm sorry. I didn't know. I . . . I just didn't want anything to happen to you."

We were interrupted by sounds from the front of the church. A glance over showed us Amy, Bubba, and Albert had arrived and were trying to extricate Bubba's truck from the pews smashed beneath it. They'd followed at a distance during the front-door-smashing bit. Neil was only along so he could cast his spell, and Amy had only consented to letting her apprentice do that much after laying several protection spells atop him. Between the magic and the armored blanket, an item none of us wanted to ask Bubba why he kept on hand, the amateur necromancer was probably safer than I was during the drive.

"You brought the rest of the crew?"

"They insisted. We care about you, Krystal. None of us was comfortable with sitting around while two vampires did who-knows-what to you. When we first met, you even told me that vampires were only assigned to really powerful agents, and you've never mentioned dealing with one."

"That isn't because they can kill me. It's just because subduing them isn't my specialty.”

“I didn’t know that. Neither did they. We were worried about you, and no matter how mad you get, I’m afraid none of us is going to tell you we regret what we did tonight because you’re standing here safe and sound. Maybe we were wrong, but we were the sort of wrong that ends with getting our friend back, and I think I speak for everyone when I say we can make peace with that.” Despite my brave words, I took a slight step back and braced tentatively. Krystal was a passionate woman; I was prepared to receive a emotional, if not violent, response.

She let out a long breath and ran her fingers through her hair. After a moment, she walked back over to me and placed her arms around my shoulders. “I know, Freddy. I realize it was well intentioned. This is just a touchy topic for me. I’m a little prone to overreaction.” She leaned in and gave me a kiss, not one like she had when she saw me, but one that still would have taken my breath away if I’d had any. Once she parted, she continued talking.

“I’m serious about this, though. You and the Scooby Doo crew have to rein in any cavalry impulses when my safety is all that’s on the line. Trust that I can handle myself in situations like this, especially against pissants like Qui —”

Later on, I’d be able to reconstruct the memory, noticing what my vampire eyes had seen and distracted brain had missed. The hot spray of her blood splashed across my face as her throat disappeared. It had happened in an instant, a pale hand reaching around from behind her, clutching her too-tan-for-the-season throat, and ripping it out. That would come down the line. In that moment all I felt was the sticky spurt of blood strike my face. All I heard was the moist gurgling of her next words oozing out of her now-exposed throat. All I saw was her fall sideways and flop to the ground, lifeless save only for an occasional twitch.

Once she was gone, I got a great view of Quinn, movements clearly unhindered and right hand coated in blood.

“I told you to stop talking,” he said, eyes on her body as the intermittent jerking began to slow, “but, like all women, you just didn’t know when to shut up.”

6.

Before the last reverberations of his words had finished bouncing off the church's wall, Quinn had closed the meager gap between us and hurled me back several feet. I was able to land on my feet thanks to Amy's potion, but they'd no sooner touched the ground than Quinn was there, delivering a quick blow that knocked me to the ground and shattered the bones in my shoulder.

"Did you think the curse of some apprentice was going to be enough to hold me? I once commanded the magical forces with my own will. The first thing I did upon turning was set up precautions against such manipulations." He reached down and plucked me from the ground, holding me with the hand still caked in Krystal's blood. The smell was nauseating, which was strange in itself. Even if I loved the woman it came from, blood should still smell like blood. If Quinn noticed, he didn't seem to care.

A jerk of his wrist smashed me into the solid, wooden wall behind me. His grip tightened, though it was more symbolic than painful. I wasn't going to be suffocated anytime soon. Under different circumstances, I might have been thankful for that fact. I kicked futilely. He didn't even seem to register the impacts against his torso. Switching tactics, I clawed at the wrist pinning me to the wall, but even my undead nails couldn't so much as scratch his flesh. If Beauregard had been dense, then Quinn was like living dark matter.

"You couldn't even make yourself useful at the end," Quinn lectured. Over his shoulder, I saw a sight that gave me the barest flicker of hope. Bubba had shifted, and now a large pony was barreling down at us, followed some distance behind by Amy, Albert, and Neil. Maybe together, the four of us could—

"Beauregard," Quinn commanded. "Kill the rest of them." As he spoke, a strange symbol flickered across his throat, too complex and too brief for me to make it out clearly. Whatever it was, it evidently gave his words more weight than Neil's spell, since the larger vampire rose at the floor and turned to meet the impending mini-steed. The two collided with a sonorous crash, and then Bubba was airborne as Beauregard hurled him away with, apparently, little effort.

My struggling grew more frantic. I tried every move I could remember from a life of being bullied and held down. Wriggling, kicking, scratching, even trying to poke him in the eyes. None of it loosened his grip in the slightest.

“No, Fred, no happy escape or quick death for you. It’s clear I made a mistake in turning you . . . I’ll own that failure. But you must be punished for disappointing me. So, before I tear your head from your body and leave it out for daylight to char, you’re going to watch me turn all your precious friends into bloody chunks. Just like I did to your girlfriend.”

If I could have begged, or pleaded, or whimpered, I’ll freely admit that I would have. Sadly, even the undead, or at least my type of undead, need vocal cords to make coherent sound. Instead, I was forced to flounder silently as Beauregard turned his attention to my more vulnerable friends. There was nothing I could do. I was stuck. We were all going to die. And just when life, in a general sense rather than referring to being alive, had stopped being so lonely.

That was when history repeated itself.

One moment I was stuck there, watching death, shaped like a roided-up vampire, draw inevitably closer to my friends. The next, I was falling to the ground. I surprised myself by landing on my feet, then remembered Amy’s potion was still in effect. I had all of a half-second to appreciate the sense of freedom before Quinn’s bloodcurdling screams began crashing against my ears.

He was hollering in pain, the likes of which I hope I die (the permanent kind) long before experiencing. The stump at this shoulder where his right arm had been was leaking blood at a rapid pace, though substantially slower than a living heart would be causing it to spurt out. I cast my eyes about for the missing appendage, finding it with little difficulty. For one thing, it was on fire, turning to ash at an astonishing rate.

For another thing, it was clutched in Krystal’s hands. Well, sort of. Her hands were now about half-claw, dark twisting things that extended from her middle knuckle and stretched much further than her normal digits. Her skin seemed to be shifting, like something beneath it was rearranging itself. The blonde hair I'd come to know so well turned blood red midway down its length, before ending with a fire red at the tips. That last part isn't creative description; the tips of her hair were literally burning. It was a strange effect, but at least it matched the mini-infernos blazing where her eyes used to be.

"Awww, does the big, bad vampire miss his arm?" Her voice was still partly hers, yet there was another tone coming out in concert with it. The second voice sounded like the screams of a thousand children waking from nightmares, only to find their families slaughtered around them. If I were still capable of bowel movements, I'm certain I would have pissed my pants upon hearing it.

She blurred for a moment. Then she was next to Quinn, her movements so fast not even my eyes could track them. Casually, she held up the flaming remains of his arm. A wide—too wide in fact—smile drew across her face, revealing teeth serrated and sharp, and too many rows deep. There was a slight surge, and the arm crumbled to the ground, nothing more than flakes of ash.

"I told you I would tear off your limbs. Did you think I was bluffing? Did you imagine it was really that easy to kill an Agent?" Krystal ran a claw along his face. Quinn was either too terrified or too much in pain to react. Where it touched, his seemingly invincible skin split open with a faint sizzling and puff of smoke. "You tried to kill me, which means I'm well within my rights to take you apart in any way I see fit. You also tried to kill my friends, which means I'm going to get a tremendous amount of joy from doing just that."

"Krystal? Is that . . . what's going on?"

"Sorry, honey," she said. She didn't move her head, but she might have been looking at me. With the blazes in her sockets, it was hard to track her vision. "I guess I have some explaining to do, but it will have to wait until after."

I didn't need to ask what "after" meant, and I am certain Quinn didn't either. He was finally getting a grip on himself, marshaling some control over the pain he was gripped by, but that seemed to be getting replaced by a rapidly rising sense of panic. Fortunately, for him, in the chaos we'd all forgotten that he wasn't here all by himself.

Beauregard leapt on Krystal's back from ten feet away, no doubt expecting to send the slender-framed woman sprawling as he had the rest of us. In that regard, he was in for a very unpleasant surprise. Krystal barely twitched at the impact, reaching up and behind her at an angle that should have been impossible for even the most lithe gymnast, and sank her claws into his exposed flesh. She ripped him off and spun around, her free hand running across his torso and shredding his skin like wet toilet paper.

"I appreciate your dedication, but it would have been wiser to learn how to pick your battles when you had the chance. Still, you were just under orders, so I guess there's no need to be cruel about this."

With a single swipe of her hand-claw, Beauregard's head toppled from his shoulder, beginning the burn before it thumped off the dirty carpet. His body was starting to smolder as well, so Krystal released her grip on it and let it tumble away. The lackey finished, she turned her attention back to the true subject of her wrath.

Only it was nowhere to be found. In the ten seconds Beauregard had diverted our attention, Quinn had somehow managed to scramble away. I sniffed the air, thinking perhaps I could pick up the scent of his blood since he was injured. The smell was thick in the air all right, but it didn't extend beyond us. Whatever Quinn had used to vanish, it had somehow covered his tracks very effectively.

"And that's why I hate his type," Krystal mumbled. "They always have escape plans." She turned to me and I put all my effort into not letting out a yelp of terror. "Come on. Let's go check on everyone."

I complied and followed immediately, partially out of genuine concern, partially out of overwhelming fear.

7.

Several hours, a long phone call, and many assurances to our friends later, Krystal and I were finally holed up in time to avoid the coming sun. We were at her place, which I had never been to, since mine currently had a broken window and a hole in the brick where it had once resided. For most people, that was an inconvenience, but obviously the sun would do more to me than leave a tan. Thankfully, Bubba had promised he could get it at least quasi-repaired before the next dawn, so I would keep my tenure as a houseguest to a minimum.

Her domicile was surprisingly elegant, smooth marble floors and modern décor along with stainless steel appliances. She'd only been here for a month, so I concluded that everything in here was brand new. I hadn't realized Agents made so much money. Evidently there were a multitude of things I wasn't aware of, though at least one of those was about to change.

I settled into a comfortable chair, glass of a pinot noir in hand, and readied myself. Krystal plopped in an opposing seat and cracked open one of her beers. She was almost completely back to normal, though the tips of her hair were still tinged with crimson. Her eyes, real eyes thankfully, were back to their usual brown, though the bags beneath them spoke to how exhausting her endeavor had been. I strengthened my resolve, this was not a time for pity. Krystal had promised me some answers once we were safe, and now that the night was done and her call with the home office was completed, the time had come to collect.

"So," I probed gently. "You turn into a fire monster."

"Sort of," she said, pausing to take a long sip from her beer. "It's complicated. Are you really sure you want to hear this? You've adjusted well to the parahuman world, but there's still a lot you don't know. Stuff you are probably much happier not knowing. Vampires can be tough bastards, but they are far from the baddest guys on the block."

"I noticed. Look, if you'd asked me last night, I'd have probably declined. However, after today, I think not knowing is more dangerous than dealing with the knowledge that boogeymen might be under my bed.”

“Don’t be silly. Boogeymen don’t prey on undead,” Krystal said.

“You’re stalling.”

“Yes, I am.” She took another sip of beer, this one much deeper than the first. “Devil.”

“Beg pardon?”

“It’s not a fire monster. It’s a devil. A being of Hell significantly more powerful than mere demons. Most of our more religious Agents believe they were the angels that fell in Lucifer’s rebellion, but we’re never seen defensible evidence of that being the case. The more secular Agents see Hell as a dimension that runs close to ours, and devils as beings at the top of its food chain.”

“Okay, and you’re, what, part devil?”

Krystal snorted. “Heck no, only demons can cross-breed. Devils are too powerful. No, I’m significantly more complicated. Do you remember my mother?”

I nodded. “Nice woman. Sold real estate.”

“She got cancer in my first year of college.”

“I’m so sorry.”

Krystal waved me off. “It was a long time ago. I’m okay. Point is that before I was a sophomore, she was gone. Then, on Christmas break of that year, I got into a car accident. It was bad. I was T-boned against a concrete barrier. Steering column went through my chest and crushed my heart. I died.”

I stayed silent as she spoke, watching her carefully. Krystal was never an overly emotional person, but as she recounted her own death, it was clear she was fighting back a full sobbing breakdown. Strangely, on this account, I could relate.

“I died,” she repeated. “That was when I felt this . . . thing bubble up from inside me. I woke up like you saw me tonight, carved my way out of the car, out of the world I thought I’d known, and out of my nice, normal life.” A quick motion killed her beer, then she walked over to the fridge for another. I waited until the top was popped before speaking.

“I’m sorry, I still don’t really understand what you are.”

“That’s okay, there’s not many of my kind, so we don’t get a lot of press. Sometimes, very rarely, a devil will break into our plane. When they do, it’s a horrific event, more damage than you can even imagine. Killing them is damn near impossible. It’s only been accomplished twice in known history, and the parahuman-history books go back much farther than the regular ones. There are other ways to deal with them, though. Banishing, if you can swing it. Sometimes they’ll go back on their own if properly bribed. Then there’s the method relevant to our discussion: imprisonment.”

“I have a feeling you aren’t going to tell me you send them to Alcatraz.” I took a gulp of my own wine. It wouldn’t get me drunk, yet the motion reassured me nonetheless.

“There’s a ritual that can be used. Binds them, seals them, holds them. You need a virgin girl and a powerful mage to do it. It . . . well it gets sort of technical here, and I don’t even have the magic chops to really understand it all, but the easiest way to say it is that the devil is sealed in a soul and bound by the blood. The spell is tied to that person’s blood, the circulatory system acting as a constant prayer wheel, every pump of the heart reinforcing the cage.”

“So, wait, you were—”

“No. God no. One of my ancestors, waaaay back when. The curse, or duty, or whatever you call it, is passed down along the bloodline. When a woman has a daughter, the onus of the spell begins to transfer. It completes itself when the girl hits puberty. From that point on, if the girl dies, well . . . what you saw tonight happens. The devil that’s bound in me shares my fate. If I die, it will kill him too. So until I bear a child, it will always come out like that to revive me.”

“Why didn’t it help your mother then?”

“She already had me. If I had a daughter, I would lose its protection the minute she hit puberty. Mom never died before having me, so she never knew about any of this. I don't think any of my recent family did."

"I see. Then it seems like the easiest way out would be to not have children and let your physical clock run out. Surely, it can't revive you when you die of old age."

"You wouldn't believe what it can do," Krystal told me, her eyes darting to the wall, though I sincerely doubt that is what she was seeing. "I won't get old. I won't get sick. I'll be like this until I pass on the curse."

"Wow." Okay, not exactly eloquent, but I'd like to see how you dealt with that sort of revelation. "That is some heavy stuff. I guess your agency filled you in on everything?"

Krystal bobbed her head. "They found me after the wreck, gave me answers and counseling, then eventually offered me a job." Her eyes came back to me and a small smile graced her lips. "I'm not as powerful as most people in my field, though I do get a few perks from my condition. A little bit strong, a little bit fast, metabolism that helped me shed all that high school fat, plus a hefty resistance to certain magics. My ace in the death hole is what qualifies me for this job, and that's the one part that almost makes all of the rest worthwhile."

"I'm glad you found a way to make it into a good thing," I told her. "Honestly, you seem much happier than you ever did when we were both normal."

"Thanks. You too."

I don't even imagine debating her on that point. My life and my unlife couldn't be more different in terms of enjoyability.

"Look, Freddy, maybe we rushed into this thing. There's a reason people in my career tend to date co-workers. Our lives are dangerous by their very nature, and sometimes that danger spills over onto the people near and dear to us."

"Oh please, don't even try to play that card. If you recall, those men broke into my apartment, looking to make my life more problematic. You were collateral damage, and if you hadn't been there, then they almost certainly would have done the same thing using Albert, or Amy, or someone who doesn't have a get-out-of-death-free card."

"Point taken. They were after you . . . this time. I've had more jumpings and break-ins than you can imagine. Do you know why you've never been to my place before? Because I don't know if it's being watched yet. It will be eventually, and I didn't want you on anyone's radar."

"We aren't worried about that anymore?"

"Not with Quinn the psycho on the loose. He'll blab to anyone who wants to listen. Agents aren't universally reviled, but that doesn't mean we don't have enemies, though. Sooner or later, being with me will mean trouble for you."

"Because I would handle myself so well without your protection."

"I think you'd do better than you realize. We'd line up protection for you, anyway. Sadly, this is far from the first time an Agent has hit this situation."

"I see." I finished off my wine and tried to keep the sweeping sense of sadness off my face. "I have to say, as far as break-up excuses go, this is better than 'it's not you, it's me', but only marginally."

"Wait, I thought you'd want to break-up with me," she said, her eyebrows rising significantly. "I just finished telling you I'm a flesh cage for a devil."

"I'm an undead blood drinker," I pointed out.

"Being with me will put you in danger."

"Tonight tells us that vice versa could also be true."

"Freddy, this life, it isn't for everyone. I know you. I know how you like to live. You think these past two months are as bad as it gets? You've barely gotten past the tip of the iceberg, and the longer we're together, the harder it's going to be to get your peace and quiet back."

I set my wine glass on the table and rose to my feet. Krystal mimicked my motions, I suspect to give me a final embrace before I walked out of the door. Instead, I took her face in my hands and pulled it upward so it faced mine.

"I spent my whole life being very cautious and very safe, and it ended with me very dead under a dumpster. Perhaps I'm not the sort who can overhaul his entire personality with one death. However, I have at least learned enough to not shy away from something that has made my world, while more dangerous, also impossibly more worth being in.” With that I kissed her, an awkward peck far less gallant than I’d been hoping for. As I admitted, I am not the sort to easily change. Perhaps suaveness will come to me in another hundred years.

“I’ll give you this,” Krystal said once we parted. “You sure impressed me tonight. I get all the magic helping you dodge and making you look scary. How did you pull off the snarling and insanity act, though?”

“If you’ll recall, I’m an ardent fan of cinema and theatre. I even auditioned for our high school’s theatre program.”

“Yeah, then you got so nervous you threw up midway through your monologue,” Krystal added. “I will say, the first half was pretty good at least.”

“Well, there’s your answer.”

“Where’s my answer?”

“In what you said. I vomited every time I tried to act. A physical impulse that vampires don’t have.”

“Wait, so you’re saying the reason you were able to put on that performance is because vampires don’t puke?” Krystal’s already impressive grin collapsed into a din of laughter which grew increasingly hard to interpret as kindly meant the longer it wore on.

“I don’t see what’s so funny.”

“Of course you don’t,” she managed to choke out between guffaws. “Oh, Freddy, honey, you really are one of a kind.” She stifled her laughter long enough to pull me in for her own show of affection, this one far more charismatically executed than my own.

Someday I’d get the moves down. Someday I’d be the cool action star type of guy who could make a moment his own. Someday I would figure all of this stuff out.

Ah well, at least there’s no shortage of time to practice.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Drew Hayes is an aspiring author from Texas who has written several books and found the gumption to publish a few (so far). He graduated from Texas Tech with a B.A. in English, because evidently he's not familiar with what the term "employable" means. Drew has been called one of the most profound, prolific, and talented authors of his generation, but a table full of drunks will say almost anything when offered a round of free shots. Drew feels kind of like a D-bag writing about himself in the third person like this. He does appreciate that you're still reading, though.

Drew would like to sit down and have a beer with you. Or a cocktail. He's not here to judge your preferences. Drew is terrible at being serious, and has no real idea what a snippet biography is meant to convey anyway. Drew thinks you are awesome just the way you are. That part, he meant. Drew is off to go high-five random people, because who doesn't love a good high-five? No one, that's who.

CONNECT WITH DREW

Thank you for reading my book. If you enjoyed it, won't you please take a moment to leave me a review at your favorite retailer? Or, connect with me below!

Follow my blog: <http://www.drewhayesnovels.com/>

Follow me on Twitter: <https://twitter.com/DrewHayesNovels>

Follow me on Goodreads:
https://www.goodreads.com/author/show/7077654.Drew\_Hayes

COPYRIGHT

The Utterly Uninteresting and Unadventurous Tale of Fred, the Vampire Accountant Copyright 2014 by Drew Hayes. All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopy, or any information storage and retrieval system, without permission from the publisher, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews.

Cover design by Ashley Ruggirello

Cover art Copyright 2014 hloranna/StooStock/theRomancee/withmycamera/Giallo86/freetextures/Falln-Stock on DeviantArt.com and book image courtesy of jaysonhome.com

ISBN: 978-0-9896499-8-8

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events or locals is entirely coincidental.

REUTS Publications

www.REUTS.com

THE FANGS OF FREELANCE

Table of Contents

Title Page

Copyright

Preface

An Interview at the Agency

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

An Assessment at the Castle

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

8.

An Appraisal in the Carnival

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

A Negotiation at the Table

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

An Inventory in the Base

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

6.

8.

9.

10.

About the Author
Connect with Drew

THE FANGS OF FREELANCE

Drew Hayes

The Fangs of Freelance Copyright 2017 by Drew Hayes. All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopy, or any information storage and retrieval system, without permission from the publisher, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews.

Cover design by Ashley Ruggirello

Edited by Kisa Whipkey

Book design by Ashley Ruggirello

Electronic ISBN: 978-1-942111-38-2

Paperback ISBN: 978-1-942111-37-5

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events or locals is entirely coincidental.

Preface

I almost certainly do not know you; however, I shall assume you are a lovely person, and it is my loss for not having yet had the opportunity to meet you. Still, I must assume you and I are connected in some way, for the works you are about to read are selections from a journal of my memoirs. I compiled these not in the belief that the stories within are so compelling they must be told, but rather because I found my unexpected life transition to be so shockingly uneventful—at least initially. I place the blame for my aggrandized expectations squarely on contemporary media, filling my head with the belief that a ticket to the supernatural also put one on an express train toward coolness and suave charm.

This is simply not the case. Or, at least, it was not my case. I recorded my journeys in the hopes that, should another being find themselves utterly depressed at the humdrum personality still saddling their supernatural frame, they might find solace in knowing they are not the only one to have felt that way. Given the lengthy lifespan of many of the people with whom I associate, there is no guarantee they will have passed on by the time this is read. Therefore, names have been changed as I deemed necessary.

So, dear reader, whom I suspect is a wonderful person merely in need of a bit of reassurance, take comfort in my tales of uneventful blundering. One's nature is hard to change; sometimes even death is insufficient to accomplish such a task. But be assured that, while you might find yourself still more human than anticipated, you are far from the only one. You will eventually discover that under the movie stereotypes, imposed mystique, and overall inflated expectations, each and every one of us is at least a touch more boring than our images would indicate.

And that is not a bad thing.

—Fredrick Frankford Fletcher

An Interview at the Agency

1.

“Happy birthday!”

We all leapt out from behind couches, chairs, and, in Bubba’s case, an oversized armoire that I’m almost certain was brought in specifically for him to hide behind. Neil let out a high-pitched yelp, dropped the stack of books he’d been carrying, and leapt backward, smacking directly into Albert. Luckily, zombies weren’t pushovers (forgive the literal use of an expression), so he managed to steady the shocked necromancer as Neil fully recovered his bearings.

“Wha—how did you all know?” His voice was shaky, probably from surprise, although embarrassment at the sound he’d just let out wasn’t off the table.

“And just what kind of mentor would I be if I forgot my student’s eighteenth birthday?” Amy made her way over to Neil, shaking her head all the way. It was a small gesture, but notable because small flecks of rainbow-colored light swirled away from her hair. Amy’s usual penchant for testing alchemic products on herself had evidently taken a festive turn for the occasion.

Ah, but if that last statement made no sense to you, then perhaps this is the best moment to pause briefly and explain. My name is Fredrick Frankford Fletcher, and I am an accountant by trade. Also, I’m a vampire. Yes, I probably should have led with that second bit, but to be honest, the accountant part factors far more frequently into my daily life than does my status as an Undead American. Aside from a sunlight allergy, a predominantly liquid diet (bought through appropriate and legal sources, thank you very much), and the power to work for days at a time, being a vampire hadn’t changed me much. It had, however, dramatically impacted my social circle. From Krystal, my girlfriend who worked for a parahuman policing organization known as the Agency, to Neil and Albert, a pair of best friends who also happened to be a necromancer and zombie, respectively, all the way to the very house we were standing in, since Charlotte Manor was a living entity with unique powers all her own. While I’d had very few friends as a human, my parahuman social circle was full to near-bursting, a fact that I was always grateful for.

Charlotte appeared next to me as Amy, Bubba, and Krystal all gathered about Neil and Albert, congratulating Neil on the milestone and Albert on managing not to blow the secret of the surprise party. Although her exact appearance varied with the occasion and her mood, Charlotte was tonight dressed in one of her usual gowns. It looked as if it had been pulled straight out of a Victorian romance, complete with a wide skirt that had to use magic to avoid knocking things over.

“Dinner will be ready in ten minutes, Fred,” she reported dutifully. Since most of us rented some form of space or another from Charlotte, be it offices or living quarters, meals were part of the package, not to mention one of her greatest selling features. Even if it was woven together mostly from magic, Charlotte was a fantastic chef, and she’d agreed to put together something special for the evening’s festivities. “I’m going to be a waiter coming around with champagne, beer, and soda in a few minutes as well. Also, Arch and Lillian have both asked me to send you to their respective quarters as soon as possible.”

I’d been wondering where the newest employee of Fletcher Accounting Services was, as Lillian was rarely one to miss a party, or any of Charlotte’s meals. In the months since she’d been freed from her old vampire clan and joined the one I’d hastily founded (The House of Fred, thanks to Krystal muddling with the paperwork), she’d slowly been acclimating to life outside a rigorously controlled organization. Arch, on the other hand, generally only popped in for brief stints between missions and often took his meals in his room—though, given that he was training Albert, and therefore Neil by extension, I had somewhat expected him to make it down. Some manner of Agency task had probably demanded his attention instead, since he was employed by the same people as Krystal. Neither of them spoke much about work due to the secretive nature of what they did, but I was slowly piecing enough together to suspect that despite their both being called “Agent,” they had a lot of differences in their actual jobs.

“Charlotte, when Lillian asked for me to come by, was she hunched over a large stack of documents or swearing at her laptop?”

“The latter. It’s actually quite nostalgic. I haven’t heard some of those curses being thrown about for decades.” Charlotte smiled, looking briefly wistful for the tenants who had constructed her a very long time ago. “But she didn’t break anything in frustration, so I’d say she is making progress.”

Well, that made the choice of who to see first simple. Lillian was working on her study materials and some small-scale assignments I’d handed over, so she was likely calling me for help. The woman was a hard worker and a dedicated student, making tremendous progress in learning the trade of accounting, but no one could master the craft without occasional bits of guidance. If she was asking for assistance, then it must be something quite difficult. It was probably better if I encouraged her to take the night off for Neil’s party and deal with the issue tomorrow. But even that might require some convincing, as she was determined to get her credentials as soon as possible. Better to start with Arch, who was nothing if not quick to the point in every conversation. The term “blunt” had been bandied about more than once when discussing him. So had “heartless” and “robot,” although I’d found that Arch did have some sentimentality in him. It just required a keen eye and lots of patience to spot.

“Tell Lillian I’ll be there in ten minutes, and let Arch know I’m on my way, please.” While I didn’t see Charlotte so much as move a step, I knew versions of her were relaying the message as I headed over to Neil. Although the two of us had never gotten along as well as I did with most of the others, it would have been rude to slip away without so much as even a cursory greeting to the birthday boy.

I waited my turn behind Bubba, who delivered a handshake so hearty I feared for the necromancer’s bones. He finally finished, stepping to the side and helping himself to a cold silver can from the tray held by one of Charlotte’s waiter forms. Stepping closer, I met Neil’s eyes and stuck out my own hand. “Happy birthday. And welcome to the official world of adulthood.”

Despite the fact that I’d been looking at Neil, I couldn’t help but notice a brief expression flash across Albert’s nearby face. The look stood out to me not because of its severity, but rather its strangeness. Albert was a perpetually cheerful, upbeat person, which is what made the flicker of sadness in his eyes seem so alien.

Before I could dwell or comment on it, Neil had taken my hand and given it a shake. “Thanks, Fred.” Then the exchange was done, and I moved away to let Neil begin partaking in the festivities. As the party moved toward the dining room, a once more smiling Albert with them, I headed upstairs to see Arch.

Looking back, I should have been wondering why he would summon me to a meeting, but my mind was stuck in that moment with Albert. Besides, I was assuming this would be more non-news from the Agency. When I’d officially founded my parahuman clan to fend off the aggression from other vampires moving into town, I’d also signed Fletcher Accounting Services up to do freelance work with the Agency. It was a dangerous alliance that wouldn’t endear me to most other parahumans, but it had given me and my friends a measure of protection from the House of Turva. Yet, in the months since I’d signed on, no work had come. Every time I asked Arch, he’d merely told me that my application was under review. I expected more of the same as I knocked on his slightly ajar door and walked through, but at a glance, I knew I was wrong.

Arch was zipping up a small duffel bag, one I’d seen him carry with him when leaving many a time. He was dressed in layers, as usual, and I knew from experience that hidden amidst those folds of cloth were weapons designed to take down countless types of creatures. Of all my friends, Arch was the only one whose parahuman nature remained a mystery to me. No one talked about it, especially not Arch, and I never asked. Partly out of politeness, partly because I suspected that I wouldn’t like the answer. Sometimes, in the parahuman world, ignorance was preferable. I’d learned that lesson by asking an ancient dragon one too many questions.

“Charlotte, would you mind putting my gift for Neil with the others?” Arch nodded to a small package in dark purple wrapping paper on his dresser. “If you know where Fred’s is, get that too. I’m afraid we’re going to miss the party.”

“Do I get to ask why we’ll be missing it?” I hadn’t moved from the doorway, but that didn’t stop Charlotte from walking by me and scooping up Arch’s gift. She said nothing as she made her way past; although this time I did step aside for her. Charlotte was an expert at knowing when to be a landlord, a friend, or a house.

“I think you’ve already put it together,” Arch told me. “But if you want confirmation: word came down a few minutes ago. Your freelance application has been processed; it’s time to move on to the interview and skills portion.”

“Which means meeting them in person.” Somewhere, in the back of my mind, I think a part of me had grown accustomed to the months of being put off, convincing myself that I’d be able to stay in limbo forever, protected by an alliance that I never had to put in work to maintain. It was a silly notion, and I’d recognized it as such even when I held it, yet that didn’t stop it from stinging ever so slightly as the idea was unceremoniously destroyed by Arch. “I’ll get my briefcase and laptop. Are we heading into town? If so, I’d like to pop by my apartment and change into something more professional.”

Truth be told, I wasn’t in what most would call a casual ensemble, with my button-down shirt, khakis, and sweater vest, but if I was meeting someone in the Agency, I felt like I should go for a full suit. Arch stared at me for several seconds before shaking his head.

“No, Fred, we’re not going into town. I just told you, I’m taking you for an interview and skills test.”

“Right, which I took to mean that there’s a representative in Winslow, probably staying at Richard’s or something. I mean, it’s not like they’d invite me to their actual offices, the locations of which I assume are national secrets.”

Arch lifted the duffel bag and tossed it easily over his shoulder, a show of surprising strength for his short stature and slight frame. “Our fiscal people tend to stay at the offices, and they’re the ones who are interviewing you. That means it’s my job to take you to them. You were right about one thing, though.” Reaching into his pocket, Arch produced a thick swath of dark fabric and tossed it over to me. I snared it from mid-air and unfolded the item, quickly realizing what I’d been handed. It was a hood to cover my head, and based on the small arcane runes woven into the fabric, I had a hunch it was strong enough to block out even my enhanced senses.

“The location is a secret. Once we’re in the plane, I’ll need you to put that on.”

Folding the hood carefully and tucking it into my pocket, I considered the situation. “May I have half an hour to help Lillian and say my goodbyes? I’d like to at least explain why I’m ditching out on Neil’s party.”

“No one down there needs an explanation, Fred. They know what a summons from the Agency means.” Arch glanced down at his watch and stared at it for several long moments. “But I did pack fast, so I can give you fifteen minutes to grab your stuff and say whatever you’d like to everyone.”

“Thank you, Arch.” I turned and bolted from the room, well aware that, as soon as those fifteen minutes were up, I’d be out the door whether I liked it or not. Still, I appreciated even the small window of time I’d been handed. Like I said earlier, Arch does have a heart; you just have to pay close attention to see it peeking out.

2.

The one upside to the hood was that it blocked out the bickering. And that was, truly, an amazing accomplishment. While I rarely have use for them, outside of sniffing the bouquet from a fine glass of Pinot Noir, vampire senses are quite exceptional, so it was all the more impressive that, immediately after donning it, I could no longer hear Krystal squabbling with Arch.

The fifteen minutes of goodbyes had been relatively painless, although ten of those were spent helping Lillian along in her work and rapidly setting up plans for how she and Albert were to handle any business that might come in over the next few days. Theoretically, I'd still have email, but when dealing with parahumans, it pays to put contingency plans in place. Better they be able to let inquisitive clients know I was temporarily away on business than have people who trusted me with their finances think I'd suddenly skipped town.

It wasn't until Arch and I went downstairs to let the party know we would be leaving early that we hit something of an issue. Most took the news with immediate acceptance; they understood that when the Agency called, it was unwise to refuse. Especially for someone who needed their protection as much as we all did. The House of Turva hadn't taken the slights against them lightly, and the moment they saw a weakness, they'd pounce on it. While originally, that would have only impacted me, everyone had signed on to join my clan—albeit without my knowledge—which meant they'd be targets as well. The Agency and some official alliances with friends were all that kept the angry vampires at bay.

Krystal, however, had not reacted well to the news of my being suddenly pulled away. She was . . . unhappy that the order to bring me in had come to Arch rather than her, although, given our personal relationship, I understood why her higher-ups would make that call. Not that I said anything to that effect, mind you. I may have put myself in life-threatening situations several times over the past few years, but I wasn't so suicidal as to disagree with Krystal when she was angry. In the end, she'd decided to accompany us. Arch had voiced his disapproval, to which Krystal had responded by pointing out that she was an agent and could go to headquarters whenever she damn well pleased. There were also a lot of suggestions as to what Arch should do with his opinions—most of which centered around him shoving them places—but I'll omit those for the sake of brevity and tact.

Once we were finally out of the house, it was a short car ride to a private air strip where a plane was waiting for us. I'd have been impressed by such opulent transportation for a mere interview if I hadn't seen how free the Agency was with providing air transport in the past. If they did actually bring me on to do some finance work, one of the first things I'd suggest would be having agents fly commercial more often. Surely not every trip demanded such expensive privacy.

After that, there was nothing to recall but darkness. Nearly every sense I had was completely muted, which was actually a rather strange experience in itself. Sort of like being asleep while staying lucid. The one change I was able to register came during the flight, when I felt a familiar hand lay itself in mine and interweave our fingers. Krystal had apparently switched from arguing with Arch to comforting me. I can't say how long we were like that, or even how much time passed at all. Floating in darkness, it becomes difficult to keep track of things like minutes drifting by. There was simply the void around me, the hand in mine, and the occasional shake as the plane moved along.

Then, without warning, the plane bounced twice, and I realized that we had landed. I waited for someone to help me up, no doubt guiding me to a car that would bring us from the airport to our location. Instead, the plane rolled along the ground for a while before finally coming to a full stop. Moments later, my hood was peeled away and I found myself peering into Krystal's lovely brown eyes.

"Hey, Freddy. We're here."

I looked around at the plane and out the windows, not entirely sure what to expect. From what I could see, we were in a hangar, although it might have just as easily been a giant metal warehouse. There were no windows, just a closed set of heavy steel doors where the plane had presumably come through, along with a smaller matching set at the other side of the building. Outside, Arch was talking to someone in a pilot's uniform as he smoked his way through what would in no way be his only cigarette of the day. Putting it all together, I did some mental calculations and positively reeled.

"Krystal, does your agency employ the use of a private air strip?"

"Sure do. They used to just land at nearby ones, but building one on site made things a lot easier for all of us."

"Do you have any idea how much that must cost? I mean, for as many planes as you'd need to be flying to make it pragmatic, the fuel costs alone—"

I stopped talking, not because I'd run out of things to say on the topic, but rather because Krystal had leaned in and kissed me firmly on the mouth. We stayed like that for several long seconds before she pulled away. "You talk about numbers and costs a lot when you get nervous, you know. But you don't need to be scared. This is my office, Freddy. It's a place of business. They just want to see if you've got the chops to be a useful freelancer."

"Given that our tentative status is all that's keeping some very unhappy vampires at bay, I'd say this situation comes with ample reason to be nervous.” Looking down, I realized our hands were still intertwined. In the rush of my senses coming back, I’d failed to notice that. “What if I mess this up? Failing to land a client is one thing; falling short here could come with very dire consequences.”

“First off, even if something did go wrong today, which it won’t, the House of Turva still can’t risk moving against you. Not with Richard’s people being official House of Fred allies. And secondly, are you really worried about this? Come on, Freddy. I know you lack confidence, but this is accounting. Even you have to admit that this is your jam. The booming business is proof enough.”

“I’m good with numbers, not people, and Arch specifically called this an interview.” Taking a deep breath—a habit that helps settle one’s nerves regardless of whether or not they actually breathe—I rose from my seat. “But I suppose I’m going to have to try and make a good impression anyway.”

Krystal got up from her chair as well, finally letting go of my hand as she smoothed the wrinkles in her red blouse. “Just be you, Freddy. That’s always been enough for us, and I’m sure it will go over well in the interviews. After all, it’s not like you’ll be interviewing with agents. You’re going to talk to other numbers people. I bet you’ll mention investment accounts, and they’ll get tingly, and by the time this is done, all of you will be overhauling the agency’s pension plan.”

“You get pensions?”

“Shit yeah. Government job, Freddy. We get all kinds of perks. But lots of free time isn’t among them, so shake a leg.” Krystal swatted me on the rear, and the two of us headed down the plane’s folded-out stairs.

By the time we reached the ground, Arch was already on his second cigarette and the pilot had wandered off. Wordlessly, Arch nodded as we approached, and then led us to the small set of doors at the far end of the building. They were metal, incredibly thick with no handle in sight. Instead, there was only a small keypad to the left side of them. Arch punched in a few numbers, and seconds later, the soft crackle of an intercom filled the air.

“Agent Davenport escorting Fredrick Fletcher for an interview and skills test, as assigned.” Arch paused, taking a long drag from his smoke. “Also, Agent Jenkins is here.”

I was still trying to process the facts that a) I’d never heard Arch’s last name before, and b) it was Davenport, when the doors began sliding open. They parted to reveal a short hallway that ended in another set of identical metal doors. Interestingly, this short stretch of interior was painted a crisp white color, which made all the runes and arcane scribblings covering every inch stand out all the more. Some of it I semi-recognized from glimpses at Amy and Neil’s books, or the night I saw dragon magic woven around a building, but by far the majority was completely alien. Arch stepped in immediately, while Krystal waited for me to take my first step before following. No sooner had we entered than the doors behind us sealed shut.

“I’m guessing this is the Agency’s version of airport security scanners?” I ventured.

“If the airport scanners were designed to detect enchantments, shape-changers, illusions, or a myriad of other tricks some parahuman might use to try and sneak their way in, then yes, it would be just like them.” Arch finished his cigarette and dropped it into the small box he always kept on hand for disposing of butts and ashes. They probably didn’t let him smoke indoors here either, which explained the surly response. Arch had a tendency to get grumpy when he had to quit smoking even for a brief period of time, which happened with exceptional regularity. Charlotte had created a smoking lounge in the manor just for Arch, although occasionally Richard, Bubba, and Krystal would adjourn there to puff on oversized cigars.

Whatever magic was working around us, to me it felt like we were simply standing in a hallway with weird writing all over the place. Evidently, and thankfully, none of us tripped any alarms, and soon the second set of doors began to part. This time, there wasn’t another hallway full of magical symbols awaiting us. In fact, it looked almost conspicuously mundane on the other side. Fluorescent lights, cheap gray carpeting, and a white tiled ceiling made it identical to countless other offices all throughout the nation. The only thing that stood out was the man waiting for us on the other side. He was lean, almost gaunt really, with a head so perfectly bald and pale that it seemed like someone had painted a face on an egg and set it atop a scarecrow in a suit. His smile was surprisingly affable though, and the man greeted us as we stepped out from the magic-scanning hallway.

“Agent Davenport, Agent Jenkins, good to see you both again. Mr. Fletcher, it’s a pleasure to make your acquaintance. Your reputation as an accountant precedes you. My name is Roderick Knox, and I am the head of the Agency’s finance division. I’m also the man who will be interviewing you today.”

3.

“Can I get you anything? Water? Blood? I know the summons came out of the blue, so I’ll understand if you need to eat.” Roderick’s office was substantial. Not the biggest I’d ever laid eyes on, but certainly sizable enough to mark his importance to the Agency. It was also unexpectedly comforting. The sight of file cabinets, stacks of folders, and an out-of-date desktop were familiar hallmarks of my corporate accounting days, which made me feel far more at home than I normally would have in a secret location for a government agency.

“No, thank you. As a rule, I always keep some emergency blood on hand for just such occasions.” Reaching into my briefcase, I held up the enchanted flask I’d picked up in Boarback, Texas. Between having to run from a vampire hunter and getting stuck for days in the mansion of a pair of bickering mage siblings, I’d discovered it was prudent to always have more nutrition on hand than might seem necessary.

Roderick took note of the flask and sat down at his desk, which was both spacious and impossible to see under the thick layer of documents covering it. “Prepared for the unexpected. I like that. It’s an attitude that will serve you well if you work with us.”

“In working with parahuman clients, I’ve found preparation and redundancy to be indispensable tools.”

“Yes, let’s talk about your prior work.” Roderick reached into a drawer under his desk and pulled out a thick, cream-colored folder, the same brand I kept in my own office for compiling documents. Despite the folders being an industry standard, I suddenly felt a curious kinship with the bald man before me. Just like parahumans, accountants have a culture of their own.

“In life, you did good work. Always precise, but never especially aggressive in terms of taking on new responsibilities. Post-death, however, you’ve shown far more initiative and entrepreneurial spirit.” The pages fluttered within their folder as Roderick flipped through them. “You founded Fletcher Accounting Services, gained a Certified Public Parahuman License, and almost immediately began taking on a wealth of new clients, many of whom were high profile. Very high profile, in a few cases.”

Although I rarely dwelled on it, Roderick was right that some of my friends held stations far above my own. He was probably talking about Ainsley and Zane, a pair of mages I’d helped sort out the inheritance left by their father. “Are you referring to the Clover siblings?”

“No, wealthy as they are, that duo is hardly the most prestigious account on your record. I was referring to your work with Gideon, the King of the West,” Roderick said.

“Ah. To be fair, Gideon never directly engaged my services. I was called in to work for Richard Alderson, and handling Gideon's finances was simply part of the package. It wouldn't feel proper for me to claim him as a client."

Roderick gave me a long, careful look before flipping to the next file. He was clearly searching my face for something, but I wasn't entirely sure what it might be. If nothing else, I took comfort in the fact that, so far, I'd told only the truth, so if he was hunting for signs of falsehoods, he would come up short.

"Proper or not, he's part of your client history," Roderick said at last. "As are the aforementioned Clover siblings, Richard Alderson and many of his therians, the enchanted home that houses two of our agents, and countless other parahumans. To be honest, Mr. Fletcher, I'd heard your name well before the application to work as a freelancer ever came across my desk. There was some worry from up top that you were up to something, so I was asked to look over your paper trail for any discrepancies. What I found instead was a meticulous, well-prepared set of documents on every occasion. You do fine work, and from the testimonials we've gathered, all of your business practices are aboveboard."

"Beg pardon, but what do you mean by testimonials? I very much hope you haven't been bothering my clients about this." I'll admit, this objection might seem a touch petty; however, my time as a CPPA had cast a light onto just how highly many parahumans valued their privacy. Especially where the Agency was concerned. If they'd been hunting down and pestering people that had used my company, then word would spread, and within a year, I'd likely be filing for bankruptcy.

"Only the ones we already had official dealings with," Roderick assured me. "As a rule, we tend to let the parahumans who want their distance from us have it, at least so long as they don't do anything that requires reprimanding."

Not the most reassuring of statements, but it was something. "That is somewhat reassuring. So, my reputation is good, and you've evaluated my work, which means you know I'm competent—"

Roderick lifted a single finger into the air to halt me before I could continue. "I know the work I've seen is competent. Beyond that, really, the work is exceptional. Whether you are actually the one doing it or not has yet to be determined."

It took me several moments to fully process what Roderick was suggesting. "Hold on, do you think I've been acting as the face of the company, only to shove the actual accounting onto someone else? How does that make sense, given my career in life? For that matter, who would choose me as the face of a company?" I gestured to myself for good measure. While I don't find myself especially hideous, I was self-aware enough to know I hardly came off as smooth or classically handsome, and my taste in clothing wasn't entirely aligned with what was trendy and hip.

"Mr. Fletcher, as a rule, the Agency doesn't assume competence when looking for scams or tricks. Just because a plan is bad doesn't mean someone might not try to pull it. And this one does make a certain amount of sense. As a vampire and former accountant, you make the perfect front. Strong enough to deal with more powerful parahumans as a peer, experienced enough to sell the story. That said, on a personal level, I think you're on the up and up. Part of my parahuman nature allows me to have a keen sense for liars, and your words ring consistently true. However, we are a branch of the government, and doing work for us would allow you access to highly restricted documents. We would be remiss if we didn't do our due diligence in making sure you were the real deal."

"I . . . suppose I understand." I didn't love the implied accusation, but Arch had been upfront about the fact that this was an interview and skills assessment. Really, the whole situation was rather ideal. If the hardest hurdle I had to clear was proving I knew my stuff as an accountant, that was something I could do. The interview was the harder part, and as Roderick closed the folder and stowed it in his desk once more, it became clear that our chat was winding down.

"I had a feeling you would." The sound of another opening drawer came, and this time, Roderick held the contents out to me. It was a small stack of papers, which I accepted and began looking over while he continued. "Those our standard non-disclosures, although I'd still recommend fully reading each page, as what the Agency considers standard and what the rest of the world uses are far from identical. The long and short of it is that, from this point on, if you share any of the information you see with someone who lacks proper clearance—which would essentially be all non-agents—there will be serious consequences."

I flipped ahead a little to see what Roderick was referring to and found myself thankful that, as a vampire, I had a naturally pale skin tone. Otherwise, the blood might have visibly drained from my face as I read over what happened to those who broke the non-disclosure. "Serious consequences" was accurate, but it somewhat belied the harshness of what was waiting for those who spilled Agency secrets. Even if I didn't go pale, my expression still evidently betrayed my concern.

"I realize the penalties are a bit stiff. Try to understand, this Agency is tasked with keeping parahumans in check and obedient to their treaties. Our reputation for efficiency and ruthlessness is a huge part of that. If we had people walking around, babbling on about things they shouldn't, it would undercut our image. And that is something we simply cannot tolerate."

Making a mental note to never talk about my freelance work, even in general terms, to anyone, ever, I pulled a pen from my pocket and began etching my signature onto the document. Harsh as the penalties were, they still only applied to those who told tales they shouldn't. As a professional accountant, I'd already known the importance of confidentiality and discretion in my trade. Upping the stakes for failure was scary, true, but on a fundamental level, it really didn't change anything about my job.

"Mind if I ask you a question, Mr. Knox?"

"Please, call me Roderick," he replied. "And by all means, feel free to ask whatever you like."

"Then I insist you call me Fred, as nearly everyone else already does." I paused, rereading a small section twice, then finally initialing next to it. "Forgive me if this is pressing too much, but I'm curious. You use a lot of 'we' terms when referring to the Agency and its employees; am I to understand that even the finance department and its workers are considered to be agents?"

The smile stretched across Roderick's face slowly, like a cat that had just woken from a long nap in sunshine. "No, the majority are just people who are good with numbers. I'm something of an exception, in that I had skills that made me useful in the field while also adept at handling finances. I spent a few decades working as an agent, but decided to leave field work behind and pursue something a little more stable. Don't worry, Fred, no one is expecting you to do what Agent Jenkins or Agent Davenport do. We'd just be looking to lean on you in hectic times, as even this department can get flooded, and perhaps do the occasional external audit or finance assessment."

"An agent and an accountant. And here I thought I was the oddball for choosing this job as a vampire."

"There aren't many who straddle both lines, and most of them are Greeds like me." It took several seconds for Roderick to notice the blank stare on my face as I waited for an explanation. "Fred, have you never dealt with half-demons before?"

For a moment, I nearly broke the pen in my hand. The only thing related to hellfire I'd encountered was Krystal, after she'd had her throat slit, and that had been a truly terrifying experience. As I understood it, Krystal's soul played prison to a powerful, evil entity that had been sealed in her bloodline generations ago. If she died, it died, so it manifested when she was gravely injured, turning her from functionally human to one of the most dangerous creatures in the world, albeit temporarily. Thankfully, I remembered that Krystal had very specifically referred to what she had as a devil, whereas demons were lesser creatures.

"Half-demons would be new to me. I've never met one in Winslow," I admitted.

"With Agent Jenkins there, you likely wouldn't have. Many of my kind avoid her type out of instinct, even if they don't understand why." He paused, and for the first time since we'd met, I could see Roderick choosing his next words carefully, rather than letting the conversation flow. "Half-demons can, if they wish, live as normal humans. So long as we don't feed our demon-selves, we are functionally mortal. However, if we do allow our demon sides to feed, then we gain strength, longevity, toughness, the usual parahuman boons, along with some perks depending on our exact nature. What among the seven deadly sins is food for us depends on our demonic heritage. Mine, for example, is the sin of greed. Hanging around casinos or stock brokerages will fill me up in no time. That's why we tend to refer to ourselves by our natures: thus I am known as a Greed."

"Wow, that is a new one by me." I stared at him for a little longer than was necessary, still watching for a pair of horns or a burst of hellfire to spring forth. Instead, there was just a patient expression waiting for me to finish my paperwork. With a few more signatures, I closed my pen and handed the stack of documents back over to Roderick.

"The parahuman world is a wide one, and if you work with us, you'll learn more about it than you ever would have in Colorado." Roderick checked the pages over, then tucked them back into his desk. "For now, though, I'm going to get everything prepared. When it's ready, we'll take you to a designated room and give you some sample work to do. Assuming your skills live up to your reputation, your freelancing application will be approved. It will take about half an hour, so I'd advise you to drink some blood and maybe grab a coffee. I'm sure Agent Jenkins will show you the way. When I'm ready, I'll have Agent Davenport bring you down."

Roderick rose from his desk, so I took the cue and followed suit. "Good luck, Fred. I truly hope you are able to join us, even if only as a freelancer."

Well, at least that made two of us, even if we wanted the same outcome for very different reasons.

4.

“Come look, this is my desk!” Krystal dragged me across the cheap gray carpet, nearly spilling my newly acquired cup of coffee from the modest break room, toward a large room full of desks. It was, as I recalled from my corporate days, referred to as an open-concept office, which always felt to me like a fun way to say that a company didn’t want to spend the money on cubicle walls. Then again, given how rarely Krystal ever actually seemed to visit her home office, it did make a certain amount of sense that they wouldn’t want to dedicate too much floor space to agents.

We moved briskly through the largely empty room, as apparently, she wasn’t the only agent who spent most of her time in the field. The lone exception was a tall woman in the back, so broad-shouldered she could have been Richard’s cousin, and a pale male several feet away that I instantly recognized as a fellow vampire. That explained why there hadn’t been any windows since we walked in, at least. They had to keep the place parahuman friendly at all hours of the day.

“This is me.” Krystal pointed to a desk that was almost identical to every other one on the floor, save for the fact that it was messier and had three picture frames bunched up near her computer’s monitor. The first was of a couple I might not have recognized if Krystal and I didn’t share a hometown, but I’d seen her mother and father often enough to know who I was looking at. They lined up a little too well with my memory, actually, which meant the photo was an old one. Not surprising, since her mother had passed away while Krystal was in college. The next photo was filled with familiar faces. It was inside Charlotte Manor, and featured every one of our friends. Even Charlotte was there, dressed in a festive flapper outfit.

“Is this from the night we drove off Petre?”

“You know it. Everyone was there and dressed snazzy, so it seemed like a good picture for the desk,” Krystal explained.

My eyes moved to the final photo in the line, and had I been human, I’d have blushed so thoroughly that the other vampire’s stomach would have rumbled from the amount of blood in my face. This was a picture of Krystal and I, taken mid-kiss. Given the angle, she’d clearly held up her phone to snap a photo, doing it so slyly I hadn’t even noticed.

“I would have posed for a regular photograph.”

“Freddy, you always look stiff when we try to take regular pictures. I wanted one where you were you. And that meant getting your guard down.” She leaned in and whispered the next part in my ear. “But if you want to do a reshoot, I’m always game.”

Although my embarrassment deepened, and I frantically glanced around to see if we’d been overheard, I still appreciated what Krystal was doing. She knew I was nervous, and was trying to keep me from getting too in my head. Not that she wouldn't have done the same thing in other circumstances—I often suspected my public shyness toward affection was why she loved teasing me so much—however, she might have been a bit less overt normally.

“Maybe when we get home,” I replied. “At the moment, I’m afraid all I’d be thinking about is whatever test awaits me.”

“Is that a challenge? Because if you think I can’t take your mind off numbers, then—”

The sound of running footsteps interrupted, followed by a familiar voice yelling, “Krys!” And then Krystal had a pair of toned, slender arms wrapped around her in a loose hug. June’s speed was impressive; I’d literally just scanned the room and seen no sign of her. Then again, as a half-fey, she had more than a few advantages in her favor. Once she released my girlfriend, I noticed that June didn’t look quite the same as before. Aside from the external alterations, such as her favoring jeans and sneakers rather than overalls this time, her eyes had also changed color. Before, they were a lavender that worked well with her blue-white hair, but today they gleamed a deep cerulean color. I hadn’t realized those with fey blood could shift such things, although that was hardly surprising given how little I knew about parahumans overall. There were just so many types of us, and each with our own quirks and traits.

“Hey, Fred, good to see you too.” June gave me a brief hug—nothing like the embrace she’d thrust upon Krystal, but still a steep improvement from our first time meeting at CalcuCon.

“What are you doing here? Get wrangled into filing some reports?” Krystal asked.

“No, we just got our assignments. There’s a nest of—” June’s words halted, her eyes darting to me. It began to dawn on me that I was something of an invader to the agents here, my presence restricting their ability to speak freely. After seeing the non-disclosure that Roderick had given me, I could see how seriously they all took confidentiality. “A nest of bad things, in a place, that need clearing out,” she finished. “What about you? You never come to the office unless you have to, and I don’t recall Fred having clearance.”

“He’s applying to do some freelance accounting work,” Krystal explained. “And I came along for support. Well, support, and to make sure he didn’t panic and lock himself in a broom closet. Mostly support, though.”

Another set of footsteps reached my ears—as well as Krystal and June’s, since they turned to look behind me. Both of them had instantaneous reactions: Krystal’s relaxed posture turned stiff, and her cheerful face grew unexpectedly harsh. For her part, June merely went from happy to uncomfortable. Even before I started to turn, I already knew what would be awaiting me there. I am, as indicated by job and history, good with numbers, and this wasn't a difficult situation to add up.

June had been saying "we" a lot during her description of activities. That meant she was here with someone. I didn't know a lot of agents, but I could think of one who would garner such reactions from these two. The likeliest candidate to go on a mission with June that would cause Krystal to suddenly turn harsh was June's own brother: the agent who also happened to be Krystal's ex-fiancé.

Sure enough, the man behind me was definitely related to June. Same blue-white hair, same inhuman beauty, with flawless skin and powerful bone structure. Aside from gender, the biggest difference between the two was eye color, as he currently had a deep orange, and fashion-sense. While June seemed to favor comfort and function, like Krystal, this man was wearing an impeccable suit that had clearly been tailored specifically to fit his lean form. While I'd known since meeting June that Krystal's old flame was a fellow half-fey, and therefore would be far more handsome than any human could equal, it was still intimidating to meet him in person. This was the sort of man Krystal had dated before me?

"Fred, let me introduce my brother: September Windbrook." June had snapped out of her momentary awkward coma and stepped over next to the newcomer. "Bro, this is Fredrick Fletcher. He's here to interview for accounting work."

"Mr. Fletcher. A pleasure to meet you." September offered his hand, which I accepted. To my surprise, I got a normal handshake in return. No squeezing or posturing, just perfect politeness. I hadn't known what to expect from this fellow, but no one I knew who'd met him had seemed especially fond of the guy. Still, if he was willing to keep it civil, I certainly wasn't going to object.

We finished our handshake, and his eyes turned to Krystal. No . . . that wasn't quite true. His eyes passed over the desk and lingered for the barest of moments on the picture of she and I, then they continued on to Krystal. "Agent Jenkins. You look well."

"Go fuck yourself, Tem."

And there went the plan to keep things civil.

He stared at Krystal for a long moment, then turned to June. "We should get going. The case is time sensitive. Mr. Fletcher, good luck on your interview. Agent Jenkins, take care of yourself." With that, he began walking once more, neatly sidestepping Arch, who was making his way into the room as September left.

"Sorry, I should have warned you he was here too. I just . . . sometimes it slips my mind that it's an issue," June said.

Krystal grabbed her fellow agent and pulled her close, giving the woman a tight hug. “Don’t worry about it. Ever. His shit has nothing to do with you and me, okay?”

“Thanks.” June gave Krystal a hug back, then extricated herself. “I have to go, though. September is the one who got the plane, and he might not wait for me. The nest thing really is time sensitive.”

“I understand,” Krystal told her. “Give me a ring when you get back. Maybe we can meet up in Winslow. You’d love the crowd I’m running with now. Never a dull moment with that group.”

“Sounds like a plan.” June lingered for a moment longer, giving me a brief nod, and then darted off after her brother.

Arch, using the void of diplomacy that allowed him to ignore social cues in that way that only he really could, walked right by her and approached us. “Fred, they’re ready for you.”

Moments prior, I’d been dreading Arch’s arrival, mind entirely occupied with fears, most of which were quite irrational, about what sort of test the Agency would put me through. The silver lining to our encounter with June and September, however, was that it had driven such worries completely out of mind.

I leaned in, forcing away my shyness for a brief moment, and gave Krystal a kiss on the lips. “I’ll try not to take too long.”

“Take as much time as you need, Freddy. Go kick the shit out of this test.” Krystal pulled me in and kissed me back, although hers was far less gentle or brief. “I’m fine. It takes more than seeing some asshole from my past to rattle my cage. My life is too damn good to let dipshits like Tem bring me down.”

With nothing else to say and time burning, we finally stepped away from each other. “Arch, please lead the way. It seems I’ve got some accounting to do.”

5.

The room itself was reminiscent of the hall we'd gone through when entering the building: vacant space surrounded by stark white walls with a few arcane scribblings painted in seemingly erratic intervals. It was empty, save only for a simple desk with a white top and a folder holding a dense stack of papers. My instructions were the height of simplicity: do the work. No time limit, although I assumed my speed would be part of the equation as much as my precision. They wanted to see if I really did have the skills to succeed at the jobs they might hand me, and that meant testing every aspect of what my accounting entailed.

Rest easy, dear reader, because I am not going to bore you with the details of what was in that folder, both because I am utterly certain you have no desire to read the fine fiscal details, and because, even now, I make it a point never to air Agency business. All you need to know is that the work was complex, taxing, and tough enough to make for a thrilling challenge. Nearly every section dealt with some manner of the tax code for various parahumans, and without my usual access to reference books, it took all I had to work through them. If I hadn't spent the last year constantly dealing with the subject matter, there was no chance I'd have been able to complete it. Which, looking back, was almost certainly the point of the test in the first place.

It's hard to say how long I was in that room for; with no clocks on the wall and my mind absorbed by the task at hand, time seemed an unnecessary concept. This was, in truth, a somewhat common occurrence for me at home as well. It's surprising how easy it is to lose one's self in work without the biological needs of the living to act as regular interruptions.

All I knew was that, as I finished entering numbers in the final column, the door creaked open and Roderick made his way through. Holding out his hand, he accepted the file wordlessly as I made one last pen stroke and offered it over. Silence reigned as Roderick perused my efforts, turning the pages slowly, scouring each one. Perhaps it was meant to be an intimidation technique, an oppressive silence to force any falsehoods from my mouth as time wore on. However, I actually rather enjoyed the quiet. It was an element I was accustomed to, yet had managed to get less and less of as my life had become filled with more chaotic people. Besides, I had nothing to hide, and had done my best on the task given to me. If I fell short of their requirements, then I simply wasn't good enough. Terrifying as the consequences of that would be, it didn't change the fact that nothing I did now would change the outcome. So I sat, meeting Roderick's silence with peaceful quiet of my own, until he was nearly to the end of the pages.

"Remarkable." He ran his finger down the page, no doubt adding up my totals in his head to double check them. "I'll admit, Fred, I initially had my doubts about you. As a whole, vampires don't tend to go in for this sort of work, so when rumors about one not only doing it, but doing it well, began to circulate, I had some misgivings. Your association with two of our agents, to say nothing of your more prestigious clients, certainly painted the picture of a man amassing connections and influence while playing the role of a harmless number cruncher. But even if that's the case, you've certainly gone the extra mile. We included plenty of obscure parahuman loopholes in here, things you never would have encountered as a living accountant. To have done such good work on this document speaks to a man who is pursuing his craft ardently and constantly improving."

"I'd like to be more offended by the suspicions, but given my dealings with other vampires, I have to admit I understand. Although, perhaps the reason you don't get more of my kind working as accountants is more due to the clan system than an actual aversion to the job."

Roderick paused, looking up from the papers for the first time since he'd gotten them. "That's an interesting sentiment, coming from someone who just founded his own clan."

"A move born of necessity," I explained. "Given the thoroughness of your research on me, I'd be foolish not to assume you know what happened between myself and the House of Turva. But in dealing with them, I also saw what life was like for other vampires, the ones who don't get abandoned by their makers and left to their own devices. And when I did, for the very first time, I felt a sense of gratitude to Quinn, monster that he was. If I'd been made normally, then I would have been put into one of those clans. My own goals, talents, and desires would have become secondary; I would have become a cog in their machine, serving the clan's greater goals."

"You got all that from a couple of meetings?" Roderick asked.

"Much of it, yes. But some came from speaking to my new employee, Lillian, over these past few months. Lillian, a fellow vampire, who, when freed from the oppressive rules of her original clan, chose to take on the same trade as me of her own volition. Perhaps the reason you don't get more vampire accountants, or botanists, or data analysts, or any other manner of more mundane jobs, is because they aren't permitted to pursue jobs they might like to."

Silence fell upon us once more as Roderick turned the final few pages and snapped the folder shut. "Not every clan is the House of Turva, Fred. Some allow their members a great deal more freedom. But all of them do demand a high level of fealty, and most are greatly concerned with image and reputation. We know the system is archaic; most parahuman systems are. Change usually only happens between generations, so when people live as long as we do, it is a far slower process. It does happen, however. You're proof of that."

“I highly doubt I’m the first vampire to be abandoned and take up a less than impressive career,” I said.

“No, but you are the first to allow non-vampires into your clan. As founding members, no less. It was a bold decision, one that sent ripples through the parahuman community.”

Though Roderick’s face was still placid and his tone calm, those words sent shivers through my spine. In general, I’d found that the less attention I garnered from other parahumans, the happier and less deadly my life tended to be. Me sending out ripples of any kind was dangerous, especially in a community that was probably already less than happy about my supposedly boring job tarnishing their suave image.

“Um . . . what sort of ripples?”

“Let’s just say that the Agency has gotten a few complaints challenging the authenticity of such a clan.” Roderick tucked the folder under his arm and motioned for me to get up. “But the treaties back you up, and your application paperwork was flawless. That lawyer you used did a stellar job, every T crossed and every I dotted. There are no grounds to attack your clan’s legitimacy. Some of our objectors took that news better than others.”

“I suppose I’d better really hope my test holds up then,” I said, getting out of the desk and stretching. Despite not actually getting stiff or sore, a nice stretch still felt good after a long session of work. “It sounds like that freelancer association is more important than I realized.”

“We’ll have to go over it officially, but from what I’ve seen, I can’t imagine you won’t be approved to take on some jobs for us,” Roderick told me. “That said, you know there are limits to what this business relationship can protect you from, right? Working with the Agency tends to bring down some heat on those who do it, so taking care of our freelancers is a necessity if we want to keep having them, but that doesn’t insulate you from your own actions. If you do something to earn retribution, you’ll be on your own.”

My stretching done, I made my way over to the door and pulled it open, holding it there so Roderick could pass first. Even if the official testing was over, the interview was clearly still happening, and that meant common courtesy was all the more important. “Trust me when I say that that is the furthest thing from my mind. All I want is to do my job well and keep the people I care about safe.”

Roderick narrowed his eyes for a brief moment, then shook his head. “You are either the world’s greatest liar who found a way to skirt my senses, or you’re telling the truth. All things considered, the latter seems more likely.” He walked over, pausing as he was about to pass through the door and speaking with a much softer voice than usual.

“But you aren’t the entirety of your clan, Fred. There are other people in it too, parahumans with much more colorful histories and personalities than yours. If they do something to cause trouble, it lands on your doorstep as well. That's part of what it means to be a clan, and that's why most of them keep their members on a short leash."

"I trust everyone in the House of Fred with my life," I told him, my own voice not softened in the slightest.

"Good. That's how the head of a clan should feel. Just keep what I said in mind in the decades to come. There will be people who want to join what you've created, some because it offers opportunities they've never had before, but others because they want to tear it down from the inside. You made something new, something different, and that happens far less than it should in our world. How it fares, good or bad, will depend on you, the people you let in, and the choices you make. You're a leader now, Fredrick Fletcher. Never forget that, because the people looking to and at you certainly won't."

Then Roderick was through the door, back into the cheaply carpeted hall lit by fluorescent tubes. I stood in that doorway for several seconds longer, absorbing his advice fully. In truth, I hadn't really planned on founding a new kind of vampire clan; my friends had joined without my knowledge as a show of support. Planned or not though, it didn't change our situation. And worrying as Roderick's words had been, I was still grateful to have heard them.

At least like this, I knew to be wary. Sometimes, in the parahuman world, a bit of advanced warning could make the difference between success and failure. Even for those of us who just wanted to work as peaceful accountants.

6.

Krystal and Arch were both waiting for me further down the hall. I happened to see a clock as I walked by and realized that it was once again evening. Evidently, I'd been working for quite a while, if an entire day had ticked past. Before I could reach the two of them, Krystal bolted forward, wrapping her arms around me and planting a kiss that would have embarrassed me greatly if I weren't still preoccupied with Roderick's warning.

"We saw Rod already. He let us know that things looked good," she said, finally parting her lips from mine. "See, I told you there was nothing to worry about, Freddy."

As my mind was currently reeling from just how much there actually was to worry about, it took me a moment to pair the nickname she'd used with the only possible owner. "Hold on, did you just call Roderick 'Rod'?"

"Sure. I've had to work with him enough that he gets a nickname." Krystal released her hold, yet stayed at my side, taking my hand in hers once more. "I don't want to brag or anything, but I've been called in to answer for my account discrepancies and collateral damage a lot."

"You shouldn't want to brag," Arch pointed out. "Those are bad things."

"Look, just because you always keep up with every receipt and never get creative when handling your threats doesn't mean the rest of us wear boredom like a badge of honor." She stuck her tongue out at Arch, then patted me on the shoulder. "No offense, Freddy."

I actually hadn't taken offense right up until that moment, but it was clear Krystal was in high spirits. A little too high, if I was honest, which I suspected might be related to running into her ex during our time at headquarters. Krystal rarely let herself seem bothered or vulnerable; those moments only came when the two of us were alone, somewhere safe. Levity and sass were her defenses, just as sweater vests and numbers were mine, so I simply nodded as if I were unbothered and walked with her and Arch back to the room filled with various agents' desks.

"I've got one more meeting to attend to. After that, we can board the plane and head home." Arch didn't bother asking how we'd fill the time as he peeled off from us, aiming for a different hallway. Personally, I appreciated that he'd even let us know about the delay at all.

For Krystal's part, she led me past the room full of desks—now completely empty, as even the two workers who'd been present had apparently headed off on assignments—and to a small break room. This one lacked a coffee pot, but it did have an old soda machine hosting knock-off brands I'd never heard of before. While Winslow might have hosted a lot of specialty grocery stores, never had I glimpsed a Philosopher Pepper can on its shelves. Taking a seat at one of the small round tables, she motioned for me to do the same.

“Freddy, I think I owe you an explanation for earlier. The way I greeted Tem, I mean.”

“Krystal, your history is yours. We’ve talked about this before. If you reacted too harshly to the man, then I trust you had good reason for it. You don’t owe me anything.” Although I was rather curious, since she rarely discussed her former beau, over our time together I’d learned the importance in not pushing Krystal on the emotional issues. She would get to the right places when she was ready, and I would be there waiting for her, but rushing her would do neither of us any good.

“A good reason . . .” Krystal looked past me for a moment, clearly staring into some unseen moment from her past. “Yeah, I’d say I’m not short on reasons to hate Tem. But I’ve got a lot of people I hate, or at least dislike, and I hold my tongue better around them. With Tem, there’s a purpose to being constantly abrasive, though. The guy is so concerned with diplomacy, protocol, and form—not really a shocker given the family he comes from—that it’s my way of keeping a lot of distance between us. Well, between him and I, as well as myself and who I used to be when I was with him.”

She reached into her back pocket and produced a folded photograph, setting it down on the table and sliding it carefully over toward me. “I hunted through some of my old stuff in storage while you were taking your test. Most pictures from that time got destroyed, either by the fire or me personally, but I missed a couple. Take a look.”

The trouble with a skewed sense of the unexpected from dealing with constant surprise and dangerous parahumans was that I had genuinely no idea what would be waiting for me as I unfolded the picture. Would it be Krystal standing atop a pile of skulls? Holding a pair of shotguns on some unsuspecting vampires? Drunkenly riding a therian through a convenience store? All far-fetched, of course, but my girlfriend was not in the habit of hiding things—or even feeling shame, so far as I knew. If this was something she’d buried, then it must have been quite the doozy. Steeling myself as best I could, I finally worked up the courage and looked at the photo.

To say I was initially underwhelmed would do disservice to both the word and the concept it represented. There was no scene of gore or crime, just a photo of Krystal and September standing in front of a red brick building, arms intertwined. Although, if I hadn’t known it was supposed to be Krystal, I doubt I could have recognized her. There was no scarlet stripe of red lipstick or wild mane of blonde hair. Everything about her seemed subdued. Hair carefully styled, just enough makeup to accentuate her features without being brazen, a white summer dress that was more on par with my level of modesty than the garish outfits she normally favored. More than anything, however, it was the smile that seemed off. Krystal handled joy the same way she dealt with nearly every other emotion: enthusiastically and without reservation. The woman in the picture, on the other hand, was smiling only because a photo was being taken. It was posed, false. Hollow. Not overtly, but for anyone who knew the real Krystal, the difference was impossible to miss.

“Tem likes everything in his life carefully controlled. Well managed. Sculpted. He has a firm idea of propriety, and a keen awareness of image at all times. When I was with him, I was part of that image, and I had to be managed appropriately. And I let myself be, because I was young, and in love, and he was the first stable place I’d found in the parahuman world. So that’s why I tell Tem to shove his nice greetings up his ass when we see one another, no matter the situation. I want to remind both of us that the woman who played his games is gone for good, and I’m the one in her place. Probably not the most mature way to handle it, granted, but it works for me.”

It was a curious moment, seeing who Krystal had once been. Had I known that version of her, before this new model dragged me into the strange community I now considered home, I think I would have rather liked her. The old me and the old her would have seemed to pair well, on paper anyway. But looking at the pristine lady in the photograph now, with all Krystal and I had been through in mind, I couldn’t imagine trading away the wild woman I loved for her. Where would the fun be in that bargain? Carefully, I refolded the picture and handed it back to Krystal.

“If Tem didn’t see what a rare treasure he’d found and tried to hide your true nature, then he is, without question, the greatest fool I’ve ever shaken hands with. And I am immensely thankful for that fact, because without it, he might not have lost you, and I would have missed out on the chance to reconnect with the real Krystal Jenkins.”

She took the photograph, then rose from her chair and walked over to a nearby cabinet. From inside, Krystal removed a ceramic mug and filled it halfway up with water from the sink. That done, she walked back over and set the mug down in the center of the table before reclaiming her seat.

“Truth be told, Freddy, Tem didn’t lose me because I realized what a controlling dick he was. And deep down, I still sort of hate myself for that. I wish I’d seen that he wanted a prop more than a partner. I wish I’d had the gumption to walk away on the principle of wanting to be myself. But that’s now how it went down. I didn’t wise up until I found out he was cheating on me. Banging some fey diplomat’s daughter. He tried to explain it as a political necessity or some such nonsense, but thankfully not even this version of me was willing to wade through that much bullshit.”

“What a bastard,” I said, because based on his actions, Tem clearly was.

“Yeah, he’s a real piece of shit. At least I got to meet June out of the whole ordeal. She's the younger sibling, so the family isn't nearly as demanding or expecting of her. Fey culture stuff. I'm glad we stayed friends, although it was touch and go for a bit after I burned down the guest house."

"Well, I can see—wait, what?"

Krystal shrugged as she reached into her front pocket and produced a familiar object: Arch's lighter. "I was still getting the hang of controlling this whole inner-demon thing. When I found out my fiancé was screwing someone else, I had a bit of a flare up in the guest house on his estate, where I was living. Probably could have put it out if I wanted to . . . but I didn't. I just threw the few pieces of my shit that I cared about in bag and left that burning beacon in the rearview mirror. Fire is supposed to be cleansing, anyway."

Tilting back the lid, Krystal struck the lighter's wheel, conjuring a small, bright flame. Moving deliberately, she ran it under the photo, which immediately caught fire and began to burn. "Remind me to give this back to Arch, not that he'll let me hang on to it for more than a few seconds once we're somewhere he can smoke again."

"I'll make sure you don't forget," I promised. "If you don't mind me asking, what happened after you drove away?"

"My training was done, so I put in a transfer request and told management I never wanted to be paired with Tem again, then buried myself in work. I focused on being a good agent, doing things my way. Figuring out what that even meant took time. That was pretty much how I burned the next few years, until we got word about some werewolves in a town where I happened to have the perfect cover." Krystal grinned as she watched the last of the photograph turn to ash, dropping it into the mug of water. "And that was where I met a man who didn't need a prop, because he was about as unconcerned with image as one could get. Plus, he was kind of cute, in a nerdy way."

"How can you say I'm unconcerned with image?" With an exaggerated, sweeping motion, I gestured to my current ensemble. "Can you not see how fashionable this sweater vest is? I'm pretty sure I spotted it in a magazine once."

"Ah yes, magazines, where people without the internet go to learn about last decade's trends," Krystal shot back. She paused, glancing down into the mug once more, then back at me. "I love you, Freddy."

"I love you, too."

Her smile deepened as she brushed the mug aside and gently rested her hand on my arm. "You'd better, because I've still got Arch's lighter, and I'm not above burning some more shit."

7.

The trip home was mercifully uneventful. When Arch's meeting finished, he found us in the break room, although how he knew to look there was a mystery to me. After that, it was back to the plane, and my head slipped into the sightless, soundless void that was the enchanted hood once again. I didn't really mind it, though. The day had been a long one, with new possibilities and unexpected revelations, so I was glad for a chance to be by myself and truly reflect.

It hadn't occurred to me when my friends were making their grand gesture to join my clan that there would be more consequences than just angering Petre and the House of Turva, but it should have. While the mistake was forgivable, the fact remained that I was still thinking like a human more than a vampire. The things I did, the people I dealt with, all of it went on for much longer than the partial century a normal lifespan occupied. Many of the beings I was dealing with had no natural expiration date, and even the parahumans who aged did so at a greatly decreased rate. The takeaway from my meeting with Roderick wasn't just how important the alliance with the Agency was for my clan, although that point had certainly been driven home. It was also that I needed to start looking at things in the long term, rather than scrambling about to solve only whatever problem was directly in front of me at the time. After all, as an Undead American, there was no telling how long I'd be around to deal with consequences from any given choice.

And as that realization hit me, I also solved the mystery of my assistant's flickering moment of sorrow.

Once we were back in Winslow, it was something of a return to normalcy. Arch assured me that I'd get official results in a few days' time, after which they would send me assignments as needed. It took even less time than expected though, as by the next dusk word had come through that I was no longer a temporary freelancer. Instead, I was an official accounting asset to the Agency, with all the protection, and obligation, that came with such an affiliation. It was good news—great, really—but I wasn't able to celebrate quite as exuberantly as I wanted. Not until I'd dealt with an issue that was technically less pressing, yet much dearer to my heart.

Three nights after my freelancing approval came in, I called Albert over to my apartment. While it no longer served as his home, or the offices of Fletcher Accounting Services, I did still do remote work out of my dwelling on occasions. Albert was accustomed to coming over to grab documents for filing or delivery, so I assumed he would think nothing of it, or the fact that I'd specifically chosen a night when Neil would have training with Amy and thus couldn't tag along.

My locks turned as Albert let himself in, the duffel bag at his side banging against the doorframe as usual. His sword, a Weapon of Destiny known as The Blade of the Unlikely Champion, didn't care to be away from Albert for very long. It had a habit of falling over and breaking things when that happened, no matter how securely it was stored. And while he'd never actually admitted it to any of us, we all suspected that Albert felt the same about it. The two were joined at a level that not even brilliant mages like Amy truly understood.

"Hey, Fred," he called, shutting the door behind him.

"Albert, good to see you. Come on over." I was waiting for him, sitting at my desk, prepared for the conversation about to take place. It wouldn't be an easy one, and in truth, I'd have preferred to avoid it, but this needed to happen. Roderick was right about one thing: whether I liked it or not, I was the head of a clan now. That meant it was my responsibility to look out for the people in it.

"Are the documents not ready?" Albert asked, clearly confused by the empty surface of my desk.

"There are no documents for delivery tonight, Albert. I called you here because I wanted to have a talk with you, friend to friend, and employer to employee." Gently, I motioned to the empty chair in front of my desk.

Albert eyed it suspiciously, but took the seat nonetheless, setting his bag down on the floor. "I . . . did I do something wrong, Fred?"

"Not at all. You have been a model employee from the first day you came here, Albert. True, mistakes occurred, but you've always tried your best and made sure to learn from them. You are pleasant, and dedicated, and a fine young man. I would be proud and happy to keep you in my employ forever." My words halted, unintentionally. Right now, I could still call this off. Pretend it was a performance review, and that I was giving him a raise. But it wouldn't be right. Sure, it would make Albert happy for the evening, maybe for a whole week. Eventually though, the issue would rise again. It was time to start looking at the long-term.

"Yet I have to ask myself, is that what would make you happy, Albert? I saw the look in your eyes at Neil's party. Neil's birthday party. The one marking his age increasing, him physically growing older. You and I are rising in years; however, we aren't really aging, not anymore. That bothers you, doesn't it?"

For a long moment, the room was silent, and I thought Albert would clam up rather than address the issue. Finally, he tilted his head forward in a slight nod. "This one wasn't so bad. It just got me thinking. Ten years from now, twenty, fifty. Neil's going to keep getting older. He's going to turn into a man. And I'll always be stuck as a sixteen-year-old kid. I guess . . . part of me started feeling scared that I was going to get left behind."

"I understand. It's something I've grappled with myself. I imagine all undead have to find a way to make peace with the dilemma,” I told him. “But before we go any further, allow me to say one thing: of all the fears and concerns we might have in our lives, Neil leaving you behind shouldn’t be one of them. The friendship you two share is remarkable, and I’d say he’s at least as joined to you as that sword, if not more so.”

The distinct sound of metal rattling echoed from within his duffel bag, and we both pointedly ignored it. “However,” I continued, “as far as the fear about having stopped growing, you’re right to be worried. We don’t age anymore, so I think it’s easy for our kind to become stagnant. Perhaps that’s what happens to people like Petre and Quinn. They reach a certain point and then simply halt, ignoring the changing world around them, or willfully shutting it out to maintain their status quo. People like you and I will not change naturally, Albert. Which means it’s all the more important that we take it upon ourselves to keep growing in the non-physical ways.”

“I kind of get your meaning, but I don’t totally understand what you’re saying.” There wasn’t an iota of shame in Albert’s voice. Of all the great and important beings I’d met, Albert was the humblest of the lot, never hesitant to admit to his failings or need to improve. In many ways, I respected that far more than Richard’s strength, or Gideon’s raw power.

“What I’m getting at is that perhaps it’s time to move on from this job.” It pained me to say those words, just as I could see it hurt Albert to hear them. But pain was an aspect of growing; it came part and parcel with the process. “When I took you in, you lacked any other options. That’s no longer the case. With that blade and Neil’s elevated station, there are several new possibilities in front of you. Maybe you don’t want any of them, and are holding out for something that suits you better. If that’s the case, then I’ll let the issue drop here and now. However, it struck me that you might be staying on as my assistant because it’s comfortable, and those new options are as scary as they are intriguing. Should that be the case, then I’d be doing you a disservice by not urging you to consider moving on. It would be a failure as your boss, and your friend.”

Another rattle rose from the duffel bag, this one more subdued. I had no idea what to make of that, but seeing as I wasn’t the one bonded to the blade, that was okay. All that mattered was that it meant something to Albert, and as an expression of uncertainty danced across his face, I had a feeling that it did.

“Do you need an answer right now? I’d like to think about this for a while, if that’s okay,” Albert replied.

“Take all the time you want, Albert. This isn’t a firing. This is just me making sure you’re on the path you want to be on. If the answer is yes, then so be it. If the answer is no, then know that you will be missed, but I would much rather see you growing in a direction that makes you happy. However, if you decide to stay on for now, you will need to continue in your position for at least a week.”

“Why a week?” Albert looked up at me, his inner turmoil momentarily displaced by the bright flash of curiosity that only he could wear so nakedly.

“The Agency has requested that Fletcher Accounting Services conduct a cataloging and value assessment for the contents of a recently cleared out property,” I explained. “It was apparently home to a nest of . . . something. They’re sparse on the details in that regard. Anyway, I’ll need to bring both you and Lillian along, given the scope of the job. Neil as well, if he’s willing, since the report indicates there might be magical items to sort through. We leave in two days, so once we’re at the location, you won’t be able to come back until the work is done. Thus, you’d have to stay on for roughly a week, based on how long I expect the job to take.”

“I can do that. I think a week is good. It gives me time to think things over, anyway.” Standing up, Albert reached down and scooped up his duffel bag, effortlessly tossing it over one shoulder. “Do you need me to do anything else tonight, Fred?”

“No, you’re free to spend the evening as you wish. Just have a bag packed before it’s time to depart. I’ll meet you both at Charlotte Manor, and we’ll go from there.”

“Can do.” Albert walked back over to the front door and put his hand on the knob. “Fred . . . thanks. I get that it probably wasn’t easy to tell me all that, and hearing it sort of hurt to, but I think I needed it. Thank you for caring enough to say it. No matter what I choose, you should know that you’ve been the best boss anyone could ask for, zombie or human.”

He bolted through the door before I could respond, not even bothering to lock it behind him. Rising from my desk, I made my way over and turned the deadbolts back into place, then walked to the wine rack and pulled off a Pinot Noir I’d purchased for a special occasion or an especially rough day.

Pouring a tall glass, I sniffed it briefly before taking a long drink. Albert hadn’t been wrong about the difficulty of the discussion, and even now that it was done, my head was filled with worrying voices, all whispering to me about whether or not I’d actually done the right thing. I took another long gulp, trying to quiet them down. There wouldn’t be a way to know if I’d made the right call, not until Albert and I were much further down the line. All I could do was trust that my intentions and concern had come through well, and try very hard not to dwell on all the ways this could go wrong.

Leadership was proving to be even harder than I expected.

An Assessment at the Castle

1.

A realtor, motivated as much by thoughts of commission as the desire to never visit such a place again, would have called the property rustic. Spacious and rustic, with good bones, that was just aching for someone with a can-do spirit to give it the spit and polish needed to restore its former glory. All of which would have been a very cordial method of saying this place was a hellhole that served as a living testament to how lax the community's building codes were.

But, all of that said, it was still a castle, and as a man who'd grown up in a small town, only to move to an urban environment, there was something fundamentally awe-inspiring about looking up at a real life castle. Behind me, Albert and Neil stepped out of the van, both reeling back in wonder at the massive stone estate sitting—crumbling, really—before us. Only Lillian seemed unaffected by the sight, slipping out of her seat and strolling over with a briefcase in one hand, a duffel bag full of equipment in the other.

“Guys, come on. You look like this is your first castle.”

“It is,” Albert told her.

“Oh. Well, it's kind of a shitty one, heads up. Dial back the stares, act like you've been there.” She strolled past us, not bothering to wait as we finally stopped gaping and got ourselves into gear.

Fenmoore Estates, the proper name for the castle and grounds we were visiting, was the site of what my documentation had referred to as an “attempted planar breaching” that had been quelled by the Agency. Neither Krystal nor Arch had been particularly forthcoming with what exactly that meant, only that it had probably been a pain to deal with and required quite a bit of cleanup. Since it seemed all those with claim to the estate were either deceased or under arrest for, and again I'll quote the document, “crimes against the commonly agreed upon reality,” the estate and everything within had become government property. Obviously, this would have been a more cumbersome process under normal law; however, parahumans had many aspects streamlined in their treaties, and not all were crafted to their benefit.

As a freelance accountant, it was my job to inventory the assets, look through any financial information I could find, and present it all to the Agency with a nice little bow. They'd have their own specialists determine the value of antiques and artifacts; all we had to deal with was sorting and combing through fiscal records, if any existed. Truth be told, that last part seemed like a hell of a longshot. Parahumans in general avoided keeping fastidious records, if they kept any at all, and this certainly didn't seem like the home of someone who was adapting with the times. Still, it was an assignment, and my first one for the Agency, so I was set on ensuring we did a good job.

We made our way across the drawbridge, which would have been more intimidating if it had been over an actual moat instead of a muddy ditch with a trickle of water running through it, and Lillian easily yanked open one of the heavy wooden doors despite the burden in her hands. As a more . . . classically trained vampire, Lillian had actually needed the brute strength that came with being a blood-enthusiast, and she wasn't shy about using it. I'd never inquired as to what sort of blood she'd been drinking when we met, as it seemed like too personal a question to broach, but so far as I was aware, she'd been buying her nourishment through the same Agency-approved source I did since joining the House of Fred, so at least I knew she wasn't breaking any laws.

As we followed her in, I took note of the doors, thick wooden slabs that they were. On the outside were an array of etched symbols, sprawling lines that actually made a rather becoming pattern. The inside, however, was a different story. I couldn't tell if similar symbols had been scrawled in because the door was almost completely covered in scratch marks—no . . . claw marks. Whatever had been in here had wanted out, bad. Scary as the Agency could be to most parahumans, I nearly shuddered at the idea of what might have gotten loose had they not been around to deal with this issue.

Once past the doors, our eyes were drawn to the wreckage of the entranceway. It might have been beautiful before, but all we could see now were gunshot holes, broken marble floors, and entire sections of wall that had been knocked in. Evidently, this fight hadn't been an easy one, or the owner had really let the place go to hell before the incident occurred. Either way, all that remained was but a ghost of the grandeur this place had once possessed.

Movement came from further down the entrance hall, and all of us froze. Well, all of us save for Albert, who was still staring up at the ceiling with his mouth open. Thankfully, it didn't turn out to be an issue, as I quickly recognized the inhuman beauty and grace of the person stepping into view.

"June? Is that you?"

She glanced up from the papers in her hand, easily sidestepping a pile of debris despite the fact that she should have had no way of noticing it, and grinned at us. "Hey, Fred. Didn't realize you were the one taking custody of this place. Short time, no see."

I started over toward her, only to quickly realize that no one else was following. One look over my shoulder showed that Albert and Neil were both staring with far more reverence than they'd shown for the castle, and Lillian, much to my surprise, harbored an expression that was nearly as awestruck. I've mentioned before how lovely June and September—and presumably all those with fey-blood—are, but I thought my fellow vampire would have been a little more composed than the two teens.

“Fredrick,” Lillian whispered through clenched teeth. “Is that a . . . fey?”

“Half-fey, actually.” June pulled up her hair to reveal ears that ended in a very visible point. “And these puppies aren’t just for show. Don’t worry, though; the stories about us are worse than the reality. Usually, anyway. Plus, you’re here as friends, so it’s all good.”

“Is there something I’m missing?” I asked, giving up on the rest of the group and walking over to June.

“I’d guess it’s half wonder and half terror,” June replied, apparently unbothered by the staring. “There aren’t a whole lot of people with significant fey blood, so seeing us is something of a rarity, and then there’s the fact that fey-blooded Agents are often used to handle troublesome vampires. We’re on par with most of you physically, and you all can’t just drink our blood from the tap. Fey blood has to be specially treated by a skilled alchemist before vampires can ingest it; otherwise, there are some . . . adverse reactions.”

“You’re . . . lovely.” It was the first thing Albert had said since we got out of the van, and while he wasn’t wrong, it was also hardly an appropriate thing to say in the midst of a job. June, thankfully, merely responded with a quick smile and a wave.

“Thanks so much. It’s just good skincare and healthy eating.” She chuckled to herself, and then turned back to me, business-face back in the position. “Don’t worry about them; they’ll be fine after I leave. We tend to cast a bit of an aura of wonderment by nature, and it gets stronger in places where we’ve thrown around a lot of juice. Which I definitely did in here. This was a tough fight. September and I were against the wall a few times, but we came out okay in the end. I just finished the last sweep, and while there is a ton of lingering magic in the air, I can officially say there are no more . . . the nest is gone and the infestation is wiped out.”

Her eyes had darted over to the others at the last second, clearly remembering that she was talking to freelancing civilians rather than fellow agents. She thrust the stack of pages over to me, a pen resting on top. “Anyway, here’s the turnover forms. Give me a few signatures saying I waited and did the hand-off properly so I can get out of here. There’s a library down the left hall that’s more or less still in one piece. I’d recommend using that as a base of operations. A lot of the rooms are less stable, and as a bonus, the library doesn’t have any windows. No pesky sunlight to worry about.”

“I appreciate the suggestion. Lillian, Albert, Neil, would you all mind taking the equipment to the library while I finish up with Agent Windbrook?”

None of them moved with much enthusiasm, and I noticed that Lillian gave June a wide berth, but slowly they left the entrance area as I worked my way through the paperwork. Bothersome as I’m sure some found the pages, it was actually a rather reassuring process for me. Paperwork felt familiar, like the situation was well under control and everything was neatly handled. That feeling alone probably should have tipped me off that there would be trouble, but I am nothing if not a dedicated optimist, so I put the final signature onto the documents without so much as a twinge of dread and handed them back to June.

“The handover is done, and you are free to go, Agent Windbrook.”

“Glad as I am to hear that, let’s stick with June, at least when the lackeys aren’t around,” she said, flipping through the pages to make sure I hadn’t missed anything. “I appreciate that you’re trying to be professional while on the clock, but you’re my best friend’s beau, and neither Krys nor I are big on formality. May as well keep things friendly.”

“You raise a good point,” I agreed.

“And on the note of friendship, make sure you and your people don’t poke around here too much,” June added. “September and I handled the main threat, but like I said before, there is a lot of lingering magic. It’s been deemed clear for Agency workers, not the general public. Do your work and all, but if you walk into a room and every instinct you have screams that you should run, then run. In my experience, vampires usually have pretty solid survival instincts.”

It was sound advice, although perhaps giving it to me while I stood in the rubble of the entrance hall wasn’t the most useful of locations to support it, but I still nodded my head. “We’ll keep that in mind, thank you.”

“No problem.” She folded the papers up, made a flourish with her hand, and suddenly, they were gone. “One last thing. The sword strapped to that zombie’s back—am I losing my mind, or was that The Blade of the Unlikely Champion?” I’d nearly forgotten that June had grabbed onto the same sword, still in the sheath, when she almost fell from the catwalk at CalcuCon.

“It is indeed. Turns out my assistant was the new wielder it wanted.”

“Small, strange world.” June chuckled again, a sound like bells being rung atop summer hilltops. “You all be careful. Oh, and tell Krys I’ve got some vacation saved up and I’ll be visiting soon. Still hammering out details, but I’ll let her know when I’ve got the dates set.”

“I know she’ll look forward to it,” I replied.

I watched as June made her way out the door, opening the heavy wooden slab with as much ease as Lillian, if not more. Only when it was shutting did I realize I’d wanted to ask about the scratches on the inside, but I made no move to stop her. She probably wouldn’t have been able to tell me, anyway. After all, I was just here to do inventory.

2.

Despite what movies had conditioned me to expect after an ominous warning in a creepy area, there was no sudden appearance of a supernatural entity or unseen terror that descended upon us. In fact, the work went rather smoothly for some time. Neil and Albert were our exploratory team, checking the nearby areas for anything of measurable value, which turned up surprisingly few items. Granted, the furniture would have certainly been considered antiques if it hadn't all been smashed or chopped into splinters. But whatever had gone on here, precious few areas were spared, and as a result, they more often returned with a few dented candlesticks or simple rings than anything truly valuable.

Lillian and I, on the other hand, were dealing with the library itself. While I trusted that Albert would be able to spot any financial ledgers during his scouting work, I also knew enough about parahumans to assume that some might toss their monetary records in with the rest of their books. After all, pages were pages—at least to some folks. Besides that, a generous amount of tomes had managed to survive whatever battle had been waged inside these walls, and many appeared old enough to have considerable worth. Since it was the only real treasure trove we'd yet located, inventorying and storing the books seemed like a good place to start. And while the subject matter varied greatly, we did start to notice a very clear trend as the first night's efforts were drawing to a close.

"More Lovecraft," Lillian announced, plopping several books down into a pile. "How many first editions does one person need, anyway?"

"To be fair, we don't know how many people were using this space," I reminded her. "Maybe several people with the same passion shared this as a common area."

"Uh huh. Or we've got one person who went looney and started hoarding books."

Even as I took the next book from the top of the pile to log into our records, I fought hard to suppress a grin. Lillian was, for the most part, a cosmopolitan vampire who was well-adapted to modern times. Every now and then, however, her language use would slip and reveal her age. Given that she'd been around since somewhere in the 1800s, a few archaic terms were bound to worm their way into her vernacular—words like "looney," which I was reasonably sure I'd only ever heard Arch use without referencing children's cartoons.

"Also, I have a few more for the Neil pile." If Lillian noticed my amusement, she didn't show it. Instead, she dropped two more tomes onto the small stack we were holding for Neil to look over. While only a Journeyman in his mage training, he was still by far the most educated among us in terms of magic. As soon as we flagged a book as relating to the arcane, it was put away for him to evaluate. Much as we wanted to catalog everything properly, this was as much about safety as it was accuracy. Magic was dangerous stuff; even books about it were best left in the hands of those who knew what they were doing.

“So, what do you think went down in this place, anyway?” Lillian had paused after unloading her latest armful of books and was staring around the massive library with a wistful expression.

“You’ve seen much more of the parahuman world than I have. It seems like you’d be able to make a better educated guess,” I pointed out.

“Yeah, you say that, but I’ve never been on a first-name basis with a half-fey. Or a dragon, for that matter. But I guess neither of those are likely suspects, anyway.” Lillian walked along the stone floor, her feet making a distinct click with every motion. From our vantage point, we could see out into the hallway, where several broken walls gave us views of decimated rooms. “Not ghouls, for starters. They nest, but I can’t imagine why dealing with them would leave lingering magic. The agents probably would have just set this whole place on fire and shot any that escaped. Obviously, vampires are out; most of us have too much taste to live somewhere so . . . stereotypical. Besides, I’d smell it if that much blood had been spilt.”

Lillian paused her walk and looked over at me, her expression suddenly surprised. “Hang on . . . Fredrick, do you smell any blood?”

I paused my book-gathering, tilting my head up and taking a deep sniff. Although I usually worked hard to keep from focusing on my senses too much, no amount of selective attention could block the electric thrill that raced through my brain at the barest sniff of blood. We were hardwired for it; it was our sustenance. No such jolt hit me as I inhaled, however. Just a lot of lingering sweat, gunpowder, and the overwhelming smell of books. “None that I can detect.”

“Me either. Which is weird, don’t you think? This place has been ripped apart. It looks like a tornado tore through the interior, but we can’t pick up a single drop of blood? I’ll give you that it’s hard to make a fey bleed, so maybe the agents didn’t shed any. But none of the things they were fighting? That’s hard for me to swallow.”

“It was probably scrubbed when the corpses were cleared out,” I told her. “I assume the Agency is quite good at handling cleanup.”

“Maybe.” Lillian looked out into the hallway for a few seconds longer, taking several more deep sniffs. “But they’d need some powerful cleaners to keep it from us. Alchemic grade. I guess it could have been something they did as a nicety, since they knew two vampires were coming. Or maybe, and this feels a lot more likely, whatever they were fighting in here didn’t have any blood.”

“No blood?” My forehead grew creased as I scoured my brain, searching my memory for the various parahumans I’d met. With the exception of Charlotte, all of them had been creatures capable of bleeding. Even partly dead ones like Albert and myself. “What sorts of parahumans don’t have blood?”

“Very few types, and almost none of them good.” Lillian turned from the entrance and headed toward the bookshelf she’d been working her way through. “Also, the boys are on their way back. I caught their scent getting stronger. Should only be a few minutes.”

Sure enough, less than five minutes later Albert and Neil entered the library. Between them, they’d collected only a few items, most of which would almost certainly be classified as junk. One piece in particular stood out as bad: a half-burned black candle that Neil had put into a plastic baggie.

“Candle, huh?” Lillian looked over my shoulder as Neil set it carefully onto the floor, well away from anything else. “You worried the power might fail, and we didn’t bring enough flashlights?”

“I know how it looks, but this isn’t for cataloguing. I just didn’t think it was safe to leave it lying around,” Neil explained. “Someone used this as a magical implement, probably in a ceremony, and it’s still giving off a glow like its active. Amy always says abandoned implements are like forgotten land mines, so I’m going to do a quick sealing ceremony on it.”

Sometimes, especially in the more recent year, it was hard to look at Neil and remember the power hungry mage who’d tried to sacrifice a crowd of his fellow LARPers (as well as me and Krystal) to gain a bump in power. Amy’s influence was evident, but some credit also went to time and maturity. Neil had begun to realize the scope of what he was messing with, how powerful magic truly was, and he’d taken the responsibility seriously.

“We found it right by a basement door, so we’re going to check that out next,” Albert added. “Neil just wanted to take care of his candle and put some wards on us first.”

“Wards?” I set my pen down, staring at Neil. “You know I’m never against being prudent, but why the sudden increase in defenses?”

Neil had produced a piece of chalk from the pockets of his robe and was just finishing up enclosing the candle in a circle as I asked my question. “Nothing I can put a finger on, precisely. It was a vibe I got when we went near the door, like all the magic lingering around was a little more potent there. It’s probably no big deal, maybe the site of a ceremony or something, but I figured it wouldn’t kill me to spend ten minutes on warding us before we went down.”

June’s warning pinged through my mind, her explicit instructions to run if it felt like running was what I should do. The advice seemed a touch redundant, as I’d never been shy about putting my feet into motion when danger was near. However, Neil hadn't said the room felt particularly dangerous, only powerful, and with so much residual magic in the building as a whole, we probably wouldn't be able to skip every room where it was a little stronger. This was our first job for the Agency; we needed to be thorough and prove we were up to the task. Half-assing it because some rooms gave us the willies wouldn't fly as an excuse. Even knowing all of that though, I couldn't ask them to go into the unknown on their own. June had said vampires had good instincts, so I needed to see what mine told me.

"Neil, if you don't mind, can you ward me as well? I'm going to tag along with you both to check out this basement. And if I say we need to turn back once we're in there, I expect both of you to listen and obey. We're still in dangerous terrain, and our safety is the most important part of any job."

Putting the chalk back into his pocket, Neil pulled out a small golden watch and checked the time. "We'll have to hurry. There are a lot of places between here and there with windows, and it's going to take longer to put wards on you than on Albert and me, so we'll be racing the sunrise."

"It's a risk, but we'll just have to be careful as we make our way over," I told him. "Even once it starts to come up, I'm sure there are plenty of shadowy areas I can maneuver through."

"Worse comes to worse, you could always bust through a few walls," Lillian suggested. Evidently my expression must have conveyed how shocked I was at the idea, because she shrugged her shoulders and responded. "What? It's not like anyone is going to notice a little more damage in this place."

"If neither of you minds, I would greatly like to concentrate on my current task so I can get us prepared to head back out." A little of Neil's usual grouchiness had slipped back into his tone, which had been polite around Lillian. He reached into the same pocket he'd drawn the chalk from, but this time pulled out a familiar book that in no way should have fit in such a small space. It was the tome of magic he'd found in his grandparent's attic, the one that had started him on his magical journey to revive a best friend who had passed away: namely, Albert. Clearly it had other uses, too, as he sat down next to his chalk circle and began to read from the pages.

Something in the air seemed to ripple near the candle, and for a moment, I was sure I felt a cold breath run across the back of my neck. I quickly convinced myself that it was either my imagination or a side effect of the spell Neil was casting. Whether it was true or not was irrelevant at that point; I couldn't head out to a spooky magical basement with those sorts of thoughts in my head.

3.

In my time working with parahumans, I'd seen much scarier things than the basement door. Gideon stood out as the frontrunner, aided in no small part by the menacing aura he projected naturally; although, even after I'd gained immunity to that, he'd still terrified me, because I'd gotten a glimpse of just how strong he really was. There were also plenty of other things I'd had genuine cause to be afraid of: the therians who'd kidnapped me, my sire and his assault on my home, the mad vampire hunter who'd shot me with a harpoon . . . I could go on for some time. Which, now that I write that, is a somewhat horrifying statement in and of itself.

However, while I'd seen plenty that actually scared me, few things up to that point had ever been so . . . creepy. Forgive the stale description, but it's hard to find accurate words for the sense that filled me as I stared at the dense wooden door, made from the same material as those in the front of the castle. I wasn't afraid; none of my primal vampire senses were saying I was in danger. All the same, something just felt off. Wrong. Like I was near something not meant to be. Which, given that I had an office in a magically animated house, meant that it had to be pretty far along the weird spectrum.

"Not that I don't love standing here watching you stare at a door, but we might want to get somewhere a little less bright soon." Neil pointed behind us, to where a surprisingly intact window was being slowly filled with the sun's rays. Our position was currently protected by the shadows, but sooner or later, the hall would inevitably become inhospitable to me.

In retrospect, perhaps deciding to explore the basement just before the sun would make escaping it highly dangerous had been a poor decision. Then again, it wasn't like I'd known the exact layout we'd be dealing with before I'd thrown out the idea. None of that mattered, though; I was there, and having seen how many windows and holes in the wall dotted our journey back, leaving would be nearly as risky as staying.

"I suppose we should head on in." I walked forward, taking the metal handle (which felt colder than it rightly should have) in my grip. Before I pulled it open, I turned briefly back to Albert and Neil. "Listen up. Even if I can't leave, if I say you need to run, then do as I say."

"We won't leave you behind, Fred," Albert told me. Neil looked less sold on the sentiment, but he kept the opinion to himself.

"Yes, you will. I'm your boss, and I'll be giving you an order which I expect you to obey. And you don't need to worry. Vampires are a tough lot. We can withstand quite a bit. My larger concern is for Neil. As the only one of us completely alive, he's the most vulnerable, and I'll expect you to watch over him as he escapes, Albert."

My assistant didn't have a counter ready for that, and even Neil seemed a bit taken aback by my concern. I didn't wait for either of them to rekindle the argument. Instead, I pulled open the door to the basement and revealed a flight of stone stairs. "At least they stuck with the décor."

Unlike the rest of the castle, which had at least hosted a few working bulbs in every room we'd seen so far, this area was pitch black within the first few steps. Of course, that was no issue for me or Albert, and I heard Neil mumble some seemingly gibberish words from behind us before advancing. Since he made it down several steps without tripping over his robes and tumbling into us, it seemed a fair wager that he'd just cast a spell to see in the darkness.

After staring at the door, meditating on the sense of creepiness that came off of it, what lay before us was somewhat anti-climactic: just stone walls and floor, a few more bullet scars and scratches along the ground to mark the battle that had taken place, and a pair of doors at opposite ends of the room. In other words, exactly what one would expect to find in the basement of a castle where something wicked had been recently wiped out. We made it to the end of the stairs without anything leaping out at us or striking from the shadows, and did a quick sweep of the area. No one found anything we hadn't seen when walking in, which made it all the stranger that the creepy vibe wasn't dispersing. If anything, it was getting stronger.

"What now?" Albert asked. It didn't escape my notice that even though we'd yet to encounter a single tangible threat, his hand was still perpetually near the hilt of his sword. I wasn't sure if Albert knew he was doing it, or if such habits were just part of wielding magical weapons. Even more worrying, I wondered briefly if the sword itself was piloting the gesture, a thought I chose not to cling to, as it raised a myriad of potential questions and this was not the time to linger.

"We've come all the way down here, and our way back will be difficult for me to get through until sunset, so I'd say our best option is to go ahead and fully explore the area," I told him. "Obviously, we're going to stay together, but it looks like these doors lead to small tunnels. Best case: perhaps we find a way back to the library. Worst case: we can at least take a full inventory and catalog this area while you two run whatever we find back to Lillian." Admittedly, that was something of an optimistic worst case scenario; however, I didn't see the need to worry Albert any more than was necessary.

"Fred's right. We're here, so let's work." Surprised as I was to hear Neil agree with me, it struck me as interesting that his whole body was tenser than usual. Whatever strange vibes this area was putting off, I clearly wasn't the only one feeling them.

We made our way through the nearest doorway, at what I was guessing to be the south of the room, and down the hall. For the most part, it was more of the same: chips in the rock where bullets had hit next to claw marks. Idly, I wondered just how many bullets September and June had fired during their battle. Neither had particularly struck me as the gun-toting type, yet it seemed like they'd emptied an armory's worth of ammunition into this castle. Maybe whatever they'd been fighting was particularly susceptible to bullets, although that could be said of pretty much all creatures, assuming the bullets were made of the right material. Strangely though, I realized there were no flecks of metal or casings. Had they all been cleaned up? Just like the blood, it seemed as though even the most thorough of scrubblings should have left at least a few telltale signs behind.

After checking out a small broom closet (literally, it was filled with nothing but old brooms), and a room stacked nearly to the rafters with cans of creamed corn, we eventually made our way to a doorway that was blatantly out of place. It was metal, new, and had everything save for a neon sign with the words "Does Not Belong" on it. Albert's hand crept a little closer to the hilt of his blade, and Neil reached into his pocket to pull out a few vials filled with strangely colored substances. Given who his teacher was, there was no way on earth to predict exactly what those potions might do, so I waved him back a few feet.

Upon closer inspection, I noticed that while the door was very out of place, it did have one thing in common with the rest of the house: it was damaged. The locks on the edge had been violently sundered or ripped clean out. This wasn't some area that June had missed; it was just one more cleared out room where she'd happened to leave the door closed. I relaxed, slightly, and motioned for the others to come closer. As I was moving my hand, I leaned in a little closer and caught a strange whiff in my nose. Not of blood, or gunpowder, or any of the things I'd been searching for. No, this was something that ticked off a very different reaction in my vampire mind, one of instant fear and recoiling.

Silver. Clearly not the whole door—it was much too sturdy for that—but woven through the structure like veins. It made a certain amount of sense; not many parahumans could even be near the stuff, let alone touch it, so having a door with silver added in was a smart way to keep out those strong enough to rip through steel. Too bad for whomever had built this place: the fey were among the few who were unaffected by such materials. If someone had wanted to keep the Windbrooks out, they should have used iron.

"Albert, hang back for a moment. This door has silver in it." Zombies were among the many who were weakened by silver, though not to the same extent as vampires. I never completely understood how it worked, but from what I could put together, the more magic a parahuman had, the more susceptible they were to the effects of silver. Up to a point, anyway. Dragons had more magic in them than nearly any other kind of creature I'd encountered, and apparently they were barely bothered by the stuff. Whether they were immune by nature or just too powerful to be affected was up for debate; magic, like life, rarely came with explicit rules and instructions.

Thankfully, of the three of us, I at least didn't have to worry about the silver issue. Taking a firm grip on the door, I yanked it forward to reveal the room inside. Unfortunately, I didn't get the chance to take in the sights before something bolted right into me. No, right through me. It burst past the door I'd opened, flinging itself into the hall and hovering a few feet between me and Neil.

"Trespassers!" The voice was odd: booming and deep, yet more like an echo than something that had come from so close. Now that the figure had stopped moving, I could see that it was male—a lanky fellow with wild hair, crazed eyes, and a patchwork ensemble that might have made sense when it had distinct colors, but that sort of all blended together in the indistinct, foggy form that composed this person.

"Well, hot damn," Neil said, seeming far more at ease than he was when we were all creeping through the halls. "My first ghost. Amy isn't going to believe this."

4.

While Neil was taking the revelation in stride, the rest of us were momentarily dumbfounded. And I do mean all of us. Albert and I were both staring up at the semi-transparent figure in shock, while he was glaring down at Neil with a very clear expression of disbelief.

“You can see me? But I’ve not marshalled my energies together enough to appear to mortal eyes.”

“Ghosts have to work to be noticed by most people.” Neil looked to Albert and me as he explained. “Human senses aren’t built to pick up the spectrum where they naturally exist.”

Our floating new acquaintance jerked his head around, taking note of the people besides Neil. “And you two as well? How is this possible?”

“Taking a wild guess here, maybe I can see you because I’m a vampire?” I tossed out.

Albert jabbed his thumb into his chest. “Zombie.”

“They can both see you because they’ve stepped partway across the threshold between life and death,” Neil said, taking a step closer and examining the ghost. “Whereas I am a mage who specializes in the magic revolving around the power of death: a necromancer. Learning to see through the veil is one of the first tricks we learn.”

“A sorcerer of corpses. How pointless.” The ghost sneered, floating further away from Neil. “I suppose I must thank you, trespassers, for setting me free. When I built that room, it was to keep prying snoopers out. I hadn’t calculated the possibility of being trapped in there myself. As reward for your aid, I shall ensure that the wave that washes over the world will devour you all quickly, without making you endure needless suffering.”

I couldn’t speak for the others, but that sort of declaration left me with more than a few questions, none of which I got to ask. Kicking off the empty air, the ghost bolted upward, vanishing through the ceiling over our heads.

“Should we be worried about that?” Albert asked.

“Possibly, though it’s not likely. Based on his density and composition, the man is a recently formed ghost. That means he’s not going to have enough strength to do more than maybe knock a book off a shelf or slam a door. And since the only other person in here is Lillian, it’s not like he’ll be able to get a drop on her,” Neil said.

I was still looking at the ceiling where he’d vanished, trying to mentally map what I knew about the castle and predict where he’d risen up at. “And if he leaves the estate?”

Neil shook his head. “No way. Some spirits—really powerful ones with a lot of experience and mojo—can sever themselves from their point of departure, but most are, far and away, anchored to the place where they died. My money says he won't even be able to get past the moat, and even if he does, there's nothing nearby for miles."

"Hey. Um, Fred, Neil . . . I think you should look at this." Albert had stuck his head through the open doorway and was peeking into the room where the ghost had been hiding. He walked forward, making room for Neil and I to follow, which we did.

Silence descended as we took in what had been tucked away from view by the slab of metal. It was a lab—I'd seen Amy's often enough to recognize that much—or at least it was the wrecked remains of one. Broken glass littered the floor in all directions, partially burned tables were flipped over, and shredded pages decorated the ground indiscriminately. More stunning by far, though, were the machines. Great metallic pieces that had been sundered into bits, it was like finding the bones of a massive mechanical beast. Even though it no longer posed a threat, the mere reminders of what had once been were enough to put my nerves on edge. Without thinking, I took a sniff of the air and, finally, it hit me.

Blood. Not a lot, and severely reduced by the cleaning products that had been run over it, but it was a smell I would never mistake for anything else. I followed the trail toward the back of the room, where I found a cluster of bullet marks in the wall and a few dark smears: all that remained of whoever had been brought down here. As I examined the chips in the rock the bullets had left behind, I caught a small glimmer near the edge of one hole. Leaning closer, I took a test whiff to confirm. Sure enough: there was silver woven into the walls of this room as well. Probably the ceiling and floor, too. While that did explain why the ghost hadn't simply exited through one of the walls the way he did in the basement, it only raised more questions as to what exactly had been going on in this place.

"Found a television!" From across the room, Albert was hauling up an antique TV from the ground. It had a crack down the center of the screen, but was otherwise surprisingly intact—at least compared to the wreckage that decorated the rest of the room. "It probably needs some repairs, but maybe it's worth money, since it's an antique? If it's just the screen, that's a small fix."

Before I could protest, Albert began to fiddle with the knobs on the front of the set. To my surprise, the cracked screen flickered to life, a green glow radiating through the dark room. The picture was distorted, warped, like tuning in to a premium channel that one hadn't purchased. But as Albert adjusted the knobs, it began to change. Some of the static vanished, and blobs of shadow amidst the green glow began to take on actual shapes. Not the shapes of anything remotely familiar, mind you, just shapes that were slightly more stable than before.

I inched my way over without meaning to, craning my neck to get a better view, and nearly bumped into Neil, who was doing the same thing. As my eyes left the screen for a brief moment, I noticed a detail that I'd missed previously: there were no cords running to the TV. Admittedly, battery technology had been around for a long while, but I had a pretty solid hunch that that wasn't what we were dealing with.

"Albert, perhaps you should set that down," I suggested.

"Come on, Fred, aren't you a little curious about what we're seeing?" Neil asked. "And it's not like the agents would have left anything behind if it was dangerous."

That didn't ring entirely true—June herself had cautioned me that places like this came with some inherent risk—but before I could say so, Albert made a twist of one of the top knobs and the picture snapped into clear view. I stared at the jumble of images, trying to make sense of what I was seeing. Limbs pawed at the glass, so numerous it was hard to make out how many belonged to each being. Some were like tentacles; others had sharp, single-bladed claws; a few were adorned with eyes, ears, and a myriad of things that I have no point of reference from which to describe. These creatures, these things, they were utterly alien, no more like a human than I was like a giant squid. And there were so many of them. If not for the small sliver of sky visible at the top of the screen, it would have been easy to think they were all trapped inside the actual television set, trying to slice their way out.

The sky itself was a curiosity as well. While it, like everything else, was tinged by the green glow of the ancient screen, I could still make out three distinct moons hovering overhead. What in the hell were we watching? Some old sci-fi movie made with exceptional practical effects?

"Oh no." I turned to Neil, only to notice that much of the blood had drained from his face. "Oh, holy shit . . . oh shit, this is bad."

"What's wrong?" Albert was at his friend's side in a moment, leaving the television behind but the screen still on.

Neil's head jerked about, taking in the wreckage with new, panicked eyes. "Do either of you realize what happened here? That ghost we saw, he's the one who did all of this. He's a planomancer, a mage who specializes in manipulating and breaking through the dimensional boundaries between different planes of existence. All of this . . . it was caused by him bringing those things over."

I stared at the television with new perspective. Those clawed appendages—they did look like they could leave the right type of gashes on the stone floors, a solid match for countless slices we'd encountered. "But the agents took care of it. The nest is gone, all the big equipment is scrap, and the guy who was running things seems to have been . . . handled." I faltered a bit on that last word. It seemed pretty obvious that June and September had killed that man, and looking at what he'd been trying to let through, I couldn't say I disagreed with that decision. Still, it was strange to imagine the ethereal man alive only a few days ago, brought down by a hail of gunfire from the same people I now worked for. "Besides, I thought the dead couldn't wield magic in the first place. That's what Amy once told me."

"That's the thing, though. A planomancer isn't the same kind of ghost as most people turn into. No wonder he knew we shouldn't have been able to see him, even as a newly made spirit. He knows ways to manipulate the veil between the ethereal world and ours, and that's assuming he didn't make any prep—fuck!" Neil slapped himself in the head so hard there was an audible thump. "The candle! That's why I could feel it humming with power—it was still in use. The thing was a magical bolt-bag. He probably left it behind as a just-in-case measure, in the event agents came through and busted up his little plan."

"But you sealed the candle," Albert pointed out.

"And if that's the only contingency he had, then we're fine, but color me skeptical at the idea that someone who builds an entire room encased in silver will only have a single backup tucked away." Neil spun around to face me. "Fred, we have to find that ghost. If he did leave some magical contingencies, there's a good chance he'll be able to cut his connection from the site of his death. And if that happens, then we've got a skilled mage who knows how to bring those things over and who can literally disappear the minute he's cornered." He pointed to the television, as if I'd forgotten what he might be referring to.

"The wave of darkness that washes over the world." I didn't plan on saying those words; they just bubbled up as I remembered the ghost's promise before vanishing. "That's what he meant. Those creatures are the wave he wants to bring over."

"Unless we stop him." Albert lifted the television set in one hand and hurled it to the ground, turning the device into more scrap upon the floor. It was a little dramatic, but it made the point well. We had to stop this ghost, or else next time we saw those things, it could very well be up close and personal.

5.

“I still say we call in some agents,” I protested.

“We can and should do that,” Neil agreed. “But it doesn’t change the fact that they won’t be here for at least a little while, and in that time, the ghost might get free.”

Our group had cleared out of the destroyed laboratory and back into the hallway, where there was room to move about without tripping on rubble. Neil was sitting on the ground, his necromancy tome open on his lap, while Albert stood guard nearby. For my part, I pulled out my phone to try and dial Krystal, who would hopefully be able to get a message to June. Sadly, the magic of horror movie tropes was with me this time, as I found myself completely without signal. Not a big surprise since we were in the middle of a basement beneath a massive castle sitting in the middle of nowhere, but still an extreme inconvenience. Rather than waste time, I typed out a text for Krystal and set my phone to continuously attempt to send every minute until the battery died or it went through. That small measure done, I tucked it back in my pocket and redirected my attention to Neil.

“If we’re the ones who have to deal with it, is there at least a plan to work with?”

“Sort of. Best I can come up with on the fly, anyway.” Neil had reached into his pockets once more and produced a pair of tea candles, the sort one would put inside a decorative sculpture on a dinner table. One more trip inside the pocket brought out a needle, which he began using to carve symbols into the soft white wax of the candle. “The candle I found gave me an idea. I’m going to try and make some guides to lead you both toward any big manifestations of magic. Even if the ghost can get to one, it will probably take some time for him to draw the energy out and wield it. We just need to grab all of the totems he might use, and then gather them in one place. When he comes to try and get them, I’ll be able to trap him.”

“And how do candles help us with this?” Albert asked, saving me the embarrassment of posing the query myself.

“With a few runes and a quick spell, I can make them into magic-detectors. I think I can, anyway. When Amy showed me how to do this, it looked a lot easier.” Neil finished etching symbols into the wax and set the needle down. Lifting the first candle up, he closed his eyes and whispered unintelligibly beneath his breath. Seconds later, the wax seemed to shift slightly, like the carvings had just grown deeper. That done, Neil pulled a lighter from his pocket and put a flame to the wick. It sputtered into existence, then leaned in the direction of further down the hallway, like someone was blowing on it, despite the fact that there wasn’t so much as a single draft of wind in the basement. Neil let out a whoop of triumph and handed the candle off to Albert.

“It works! Just follow the direction of the flame like a compass, and it will lead you to nearest source of potent magic.”

I examined the item along with Albert, quite impressed at what Neil had managed to cobble together on the fly. Sometimes I forgot that he wasn’t growing solely in maturity, but was also being taught magic by one of the most revered mages in the whole state. “One problem jumps to mind: if this leads us to a magical object, won’t the flame just keep pointing at it once we pick it up? It would be like using a compass to hunt down a huge magnet.”

“Yes, Fred, that’s why I took out two,” Neil snapped as he worked on etching symbols into the second candle. “We split up, hunting our targets separately. As soon as you get yours, hightail it back to the library, since that’s where Albert and I will set up shop.”

“Hang on, why are you just assuming there will only be two of these things?” I asked, beating Albert to the punch for a change.

“Three.” Neil finished his etching work and dropped the needle into his pocket. “I found the first one already, so we just have to hunt down the other two. But it’s going to be three in total. That’s how these things work. It will either be three, and we can do this, or it’s seven or thirteen, in which case we’re screwed no matter what. So let’s just assume he stuck with the standard of three and get our butts in gear.”

As Neil lowered his head to cast a spell on the second candle, Albert looked from the flickering light to his friend, and then to me. It wasn’t hard to figure out what was on his mind. “Don’t worry, Albert. You’re going to be teamed up with Neil.”

“But you might need help, too,” he protested.

“We talked about this on the way in. I’m a vampire; he’s a human. Besides, the two of you have always been stronger together. You’re going with Neil, and that’s an order from your boss.” It took a lot of effort to sound confident as I told Albert how things were going to be, but based on the reassured look on his face, I felt like he’d bought it. The truth of the matter was that I did not like the idea of splitting up one bit, especially in unfamiliar terrain. That didn’t matter, though. If we were playing against a clock, then every second mattered. Besides, I’d probably be fine. I was a vampire, after all, and our kind surely weren’t that easy to kill.

The flick of a lighter broke the tension, as Neil created a flame on the second candle. It tilted in the same direction as the first, and Neil rose from his seat on the floor. “We’re going to have to get further away from whatever is down that hall if we want a new target. Albert, hand your candle to Fred. Since he’s not going to be able to explore the upstairs, he gets to tackle the basement. You and I will head back to the stairs.”

Gingerly, as though he were afraid it might burn us both, Albert set the candle down in my hand. Once that was done, he reached up and adjusted the position of his sword to make sure it would draw easily. Aside from cleaning and training, he rarely ever pulled the blade from its sheath, but I knew he wouldn't hesitate if they found themselves in danger. I'd seen firsthand the depths of resolve Albert could summon when his best friend was in danger, and for the sake of the ghost, I hoped we found the magical objects before he found Albert and Neil. That sword had chopped a chimera back into its base creatures; I could only imagine what it would do to an insubstantial being.

"Be careful, Fred," Neil told me, stealing the words right out of my mouth. "We're going up against a mage on his home turf, and that's the most dangerous type of place to engage a magic-user, dead or not. Try to make it back to the library in one piece, or at least enough pieces that we can put you back together."

"Encouraging," I replied. "You two keep each other safe."

"We will." There was more force in Albert's words than usual, and his hand tightened on the hilt of his sword as he and Neil headed back down the hallway. It was hard to worry about them, honestly. Between Neil's expertise and Albert's raw power, I imagined there was precious little left in this house that could be a real threat to them.

When they were back to the stairs, I turned and started making my way further into the basement. The candle's direction was unwavering, but it was no substitute for a good map. More than once, it would be pointing directly into a wall, forcing me to work my way around the tunnels until I found a way past the obstacle and got back on track.

By the third detour, I had lost all sense of where I was and had begun to consider taking Lillian's advice by breaking down the next wall I encountered. Not my usual style, true, but time was of the essence, and I didn't imagine anyone would notice one more broken element in this castle. All that stayed my hand was the knowledge that any one of these might be load-bearing, and while I could be trapped under a sudden collapse, the ghost wouldn't be inconvenienced in the slightest. Mercifully, the way around was a short one, and as I rounded a bend, I found myself staring into a nearly empty room, directly where the candle was pointing.

I say nearly empty, because there were a few things in there: a busted bed frame with a stained mattress, a tattered stack of books next to a threadbare armchair, and a single glowing gem in the center of a cheap golden necklace. The gem probably didn't glow normally, or else whoever cleaned this place up certainly would have taken it into agency possession, but it was casting quite a bit of light now—dark, hunter green-colored light that was swirling up into the substantially less see-through form of our ghost.

He was hovering over it, hands outstretched as the swirling light filled him, turning the misty form into something dark green and visible. I stepped in as the last of the glow faded from the gem and flowed up into the ghost. The candle I was holding sputtered once, and then died, leaving only a small trail of smoke behind.

“The vampire.” He was looking at me, definitely not surprised this time. “I see you were looking for my trinket. Have you come here to pillage my home? Is that why you freed me? Because you wished to loot the legendary treasure of Josiah Fenmoore, and instead stumbled upon his trapped spirit?”

The ghost, evidently named Josiah, floated closer to me. Despite the initial urge to bolt, I stood my ground. Scary as he might be, I was still a vampire, and I was hoping that perhaps he could be talked out of whatever he was planning. It was pretty much the only shot we had, since I’d already failed the plan and let him gather magic from one of his hidden caches.

“We just came here to catalog what was left behind after you died, Josiah. I’m an accountant, not an agent. I don’t know exactly what you were trying to do here, but it didn’t work. You don’t need to hang on like this. It’s okay to let go. To pass on.”

“Pass on?” Josiah’s face was growing more distinct by the moment, and I could see the fury in his eyes as he spat those words. “Do you have any idea the glory I was trying to bring to this world? The cleansing would have been perfection beyond words. I’ve spent my life communing with beings beyond the realm of human understanding, looking at the gorgeous chaos of their worlds and understanding how flawed ours was. My dream was to spread that beauty over the entire Earth, and just when I stood at the precipice of seeing it come to fruition, those damned agents showed up and ruined everything.”

He kept getting closer, and it took all of my self-control not to back away. Some part of my mind was looking at this as predator and prey, and if I flinched, it would mark me as the latter. I couldn’t do that, not if I wanted to keep any hope of controlling the situation.

“So I should just let it go, vampire? Move on? Forget a lifetime of effort because of one failure? Folly! One does not let a single setback keep them from success. We learn, adapt, and move forward, but never give up. And really, who are you to lecture me about passing on? You are a dead man who insists on walking about, subsisting off the blood of the living. Just a soul inside a corpse, nothing more. But I am glad it was you who found me, vampire.”

He’d closed the distance before I realized what he intended, his glowing hands already reaching out to grab me. “After all, one soul in a corpse is as good as any other, and once I take your flesh, I’ll be able to start my work anew.”

6.

Just when it seemed like Josiah was about to plunge those glowing hands through my sweater vest and into my sternum, they stopped. Sorry, they were stopped is more accurate. Sparks flashed across his fingers as a burst of light darted around me, driving the ghost momentarily back. He glowered at me, caught between surprise and fury.

“Protection charms?”

Right . . . Neil had cast some warding spells on me before we left for the basement. I’d never been entirely sure what those did, but apparently stopping ghost possession was one of the benefits. Josiah looked down at his hands, the green light momentarily burned away, and then back to me. “No matter. Such paltry wards cannot stand up to a focused effort, or a—hey!”

That last bit came because I’d dashed out the door midway through his monologue. Between the very clear threat that he thought the wards could be beaten and having a few seconds to put my thoughts in order, it became clear what the obvious course of action was: I had to get out of there, fast. Partially because, yes, standing around and letting him wear down my protection to try and steal my body was the height of idiocy, but also because I knew something Josiah didn’t: there was another vampire on the premises, and she didn’t have any protective spells around her. If he chanced upon Lillian before I could warn her, she could be in serious trouble. As would we, actually, since she was easily the strongest person in the castle.

There was no time to plot a course, not that I really could have even if I’d wanted to. Without the candle as guidance and no time to stop and look around, I had little idea of where I was heading. Rather than dwelling on it, I focused on moving. I could hear Josiah mumbling curses from behind me, though from how far back was impossible to say. He might be able to move through walls, but I was fairly certain he couldn’t see through them, so as long as I kept up my frantic pace, I could theoretically lose him.

It’s hard to say how long I was down there for, bolting around hallway after hallway, turn after turn. It all quickly ran together, and I could have easily been backtracking without realizing it. The only part that sticks out in my memory is when I dashed around a corner and found myself staring up at the loveliest thing I’d seen since entering this place: a set of stone steps leading upward. They were different than the ones I’d used to enter the basement; however, that was a blessing given how much sunlight had been around that first entrance. Without pause, I all but leapt up the stairs, my hand only slowing when it gripped the knob.

I had no way of knowing what was on the other side of this door, and while it probably wasn’t as immediately scary as a vengeful ghost, it might be far more dangerous. If it was in direct sunlight, I’d be burned before I had a chance to leap back. Granted, I had some blood in my briefcase back at the library, and with what I'd brought, I could handle healing a minor injury. Still, that briefcase might be a long way from here, and that assumed I was quick and smart enough to only get partly scorched.

In the end, it was a simple equation. If I opened the door, I might get burned, but if Josiah found Lillian, we would be in serious danger. Better to play the odds—or at least, that was what I told myself as I pulled the door carefully open.

Shadows fell across my arm, and I nearly choked on the relief. Peering through, I saw a hallway with several overturned tables, a few patches of easily avoidable sunlight, and more claw marks along the ground. It was more beautiful than it had any right to be, and I darted out the door quickly, putting a touch more emphasis on moving silently as I sped along.

Navigating the castle in daytime was no small feat by itself, and more than once I had to turn back when I found myself staring down a patch of hallway completely filled with sunlight. Much as I enjoyed my silver immunity, I'd have traded it in a heartbeat to never fear another dawn. Since such bargains were not on the table, I resolved myself to doing the best I could with what I had and continued my trek.

Finally, I found myself looking at a stretch of rubble that seemed familiar, and I realized that I had nearly arrived at the library. Taking a few more turns, I blasted through the entrance, only to feel an object slam into my chest, sliding right between my ribs. I looked down to find the handle of a dagger sticking out from my sweater vest, still trembling in place.

"What the heck?" My eyes turned upward to find Neil, Albert, and Lillian all staring tensely at me. "I can't believe I have to ask this, but who just stabbed me?"

Neil raised his hand, not even bothering to look sheepish. "I wove a throwing charm on the dagger's handle, had it cocked to throw as soon as you came tearing in."

"That's the who and how. Now, if one of you could be bothered, I think I would very like to hear the why." Grabbing it in my hand, I yanked the dagger out. A small pool of blood formed on my sweater vest, although it was far less than a human would have yielded. Vampires could certainly bleed, just not as much as mortals. A sticky red residue of my own inner fluid was coating the blade, yet even through it, I could catch the barest whiff of silver.

"Neil said that you might not be you," Albert explained. He walked over with a hand towel, and I began the pointless endeavor of trying to mop up the blood from my clothes. Nothing short of an expert cleaner, or perhaps something magical from Amy, was going to get this stain out.

"When the ghost drained one of his magical implements, it made our candle go nuts," Neil explained. "Since we'd already found our item, it stood to reason he'd gotten the one you were after. An amped-up planomancer wasn't going to let a perfectly good vessel get away, so we hightailed it back here and prepared to deal with you."

"You, uh . . . you okay there, Fredrick?" Lillian was eyeing me cautiously. She couldn't think I was really possessed, but her eyes wouldn't stop darting between the blade in my hand and the stain on my shirt. "You're healing that wound pretty fast."

Of course . . . I'd forgotten that Lillian wasn't in on my silver secret. Much as I might have loved to explain, this hardly seemed like the time or place, so I just shrugged my shoulders. "I've been keeping well-fed."

Whether she bought it or not—which she almost certainly didn't—was a matter that would have to wait. As I stood there, mopping up the last of my blood, I heard a gasp from Neil and saw Albert take a step back. It didn't take much to figure out what had happened, yet I still played into the theatrics and slowly turned around. I don't have any excuse for this, save only that it felt like what I should do in the moment.

Sure enough, floating above us was the still glowing form of Josiah Fenmore. On the upside, that probably meant he hadn't used the recovered power to free himself from the castle, but on the other hand, it meant he had all of that magic to throw at us. I spun around, putting myself directly between Lillian and Josiah. At least if he went for me, he'd have to break through the wards. Hopefully that would buy enough time for Neil to cast something.

"Josiah, I urge you one last time: pass on. Let go of this world. Move on to somewhere better. You can't really expect to defeat all of us."

He stared down at us, looking less intimidated than I would have preferred, and sneered. "You are no challenge to me, only tools to be wielded. With your flesh and strength, I shall repair what the agents destroyed, and this time, I will be ready when they come to interrupt me."

"Still want my body? Well then, come and try to take it. That's if you can break through my wards before my friends find a way to stop you, I mean." It was, admittedly, a risky gambit, but if I could keep Josiah distracted for even a minute, I was sure Neil would be able to bind him. Whether we liked each other or not, I respected his skill and trusted him to do what was right. In a pinch, Neil would come through. I truly believed that.

Which made it all the more worrisome when I heard his voice come from behind me. "Um, Fred . . . silver dagger, remember? That's enough to unravel all but the most serious of enchantments. Those wards are toast."

Josiah grinned with ghastly delight, as I whipped my head around and glared at Neil. "Perhaps that was something you might have shared with me before the ghost arrived. Or at least out of his earshot." The last few words came out as a hiss; my nerves were fraying as my vision darted frantically between Neil and Josiah.

To my surprise, Neil was smiling too, even as Josiah flung himself forward with his hands outstretched. “Why would I? Come on, Fred, you’ve got this.”

Those were the last words to reach my ears before Josiah flung his whole being through my chest and took a firm grip on my very soul.

7.

Having two souls in the same body was not a pleasant experience by any stretch of the imagination. We both were there, yet not, and as we fought for control, bits and ends seemed to come loose. I found myself reliving some of Josiah's memories: of the first time he'd managed to cast a spell, of the day he brought a creature from another plane successfully over, and of the day the agents came.

That memory was the clearest, which was no surprise since it was the most recent. But it was also the most terrifying. I could see June and September sweeping through the lab, Josiah huddled in the corner. There was no levity or joy in June's face; her eyes were hard and cold. Frozen. Both of them moved with perfect teamwork and precision, gun in one hand and blade in the other. With their every motion, a creature fell, splitting open to reveal ashes inside, nothing like what lay inside the animals of our world. Then June turned, and those hard eyes were on me. No, on Josiah. She yelled something at him, urging him to give up, but instead, he raised his hands and tried to cast. For a moment, I caught a flicker of sadness behind those cold eyes, then the hand with her gun twitched and there was no more memory to watch.

Watching Josiah's death was draining, which only made matters worse. He was already the stronger of the two of us; I could feel my hold weakening. Soon, he'd get full control of my body, and when he did, I had no doubt he would cast me from it. Would I be a ghost then, as he'd been, or would I simply pass on as most of the dead did? It wasn't a question I was keen to find the answer to, so I redoubled my efforts and fought him every step of the way.

Why . . . why had Neil told him I was vulnerable? Why had he been so sure I would have the matter well in hand? Neil wouldn't betray me, not like this, not in front of Albert. I had to believe there was a way out, if only I could find it. He wouldn't be counting on me to overpower the ghost; Neil would never think so highly of my will. It had to be something tangible, something I could do. But what was there? All I had around me were a bunch of books and a bloody . . . knife. A bloody silver knife. And while I wasn't bothered by the stuff anymore, it still acted as a grounding agent for magic, which Josiah was almost entirely composed of. Sure, no normal vampire would risk plunging a silver dagger into himself, but he didn't know that I was no normal vampire.

Unfortunately, this realization came just as I was losing ground in the battle for control. He was winning, and it wouldn't take him much longer to grab that victory. So, rather than try and hold on, I abandoned control of everything else. All that I was, all that I had, went into my right arm. Using every last bit of willpower left, I twisted the blade around and jammed it back into my chest.

Pain. Horrible pain. Not mine, but so close and tangible it may well have been. I could feel Josiah burning away, his magic unraveling as he futilely tried to find refuge from the poisonous metal that had been plunged into his nice new body. He tried to pull back, but he'd burrowed in too deeply, and with every passing second, more of his strength eroded. Finally, Josiah succeeded in pulling free, bursting out of me with an ear-splitting howl.

Though it was nearly drowned out in his scream, I still heard Neil mutter a few words of gibberish, and suddenly the howling stopped. For my part, I was slumped over on the floor, trying to remember how to move my own limbs. It's not a thing that generally requires much thought, until a vengeful ghost nearly ousts you from any connection to them. They were mine again, though, and as someone yanked the dagger from my chest, I could feel it slide free. My body was my own. Seconds later, Lillian appeared, tilting my flask into my mouth and pouring blood down my throat. Thankfully, I didn't need control to drink; my vampire instincts took care of that without hesitation.

Slowly, I came back to myself, eventually managing to sit up. Standing would take longer, but at least I could see the room. Josiah was floating nearby—a little too near, if I'm honest—opening his mouth and yelling as he slapped at an unseen barrier. His glow was almost entirely gone, the magic either destroyed by the silver or used to escape my body, with only the barest traces of green light dancing through his form. My eyes trailed lower, to where a chalk circle marked the boundary Josiah was struggling against.

"You had a trap for him."

"Dozens, actually." Neil pointed to the ground, and sure enough, there were identical circles chalked out all along the floor. "He could break through a holding circle with enough power, so we needed to drain him first. I assumed stabbing you would handle that, but when you showed up non-possessed, we had to think on our feet. Luckily, he took the bait and gave you another chance to weaken him."

"And when he came flying out, Neil sealed him in the first circle he passed through," Lillian added. She was still next to me, looking uncertain yet relieved. "Good thing you're such a badass about silver."

"Lillian, about that—"

"Not the time or the place, Fredrick. We've all got secrets. But let's worry about finishing our business first." She nodded to Josiah, who was still punching thin air, mouth opened in what I assumed was him cursing all of our names from here to hell. "What do we do about him?"

Neil walked around the chalk circle, eyeing it carefully. "This should hold for a while. If the agents don't have a way to deal with him, I can reinforce the barrier with some extra magic, and then it will be enough to keep him contained indefinitely. He'll just stay in there—forever, or until he decides to move on. So, probably forever.”

“That’s kind of sad, when you think about it. Stuck in a prison he could escape, but he refuses to use the only way out,” Lillian said. It was a more sentimental thought than I expected from her, at least back when we first met.

“It’s not just sad, it’s wrong.” Albert was walking back from the other end of the library. Judging from the smear of blood on his hands, it seemed a fair guess that he’d been the one to pull the dagger from my chest. He was probably moving it far away from Lillian, putting safety first. “We can’t leave someone trapped like that. It’s cruel and inhumane.”

“You do realize this guy was trying to flood the world with monsters and usher in an apocalypse, right?” Neil pointed out.

Albert nodded. “And he paid for it with his life. Isn’t that enough? Should he really have to be trapped like this forever as well?”

When he put it like that, Albert had a point. Stopping Josiah had been one thing, leaving him bound like this, with no end in sight, felt wrong. But, feelings aside, there was the practicality to consider. “He’s too dangerous to let go, Albert. And he has the power to escape anytime he wants.”

“I know we can’t let him run free, but I also know he’s never going to take that chance to get away. Look at him. He’s all knotted up in anger, regret, and loneliness. The same things that put him on this path in life are keeping him here after death.”

“So, what would you like me to do?” Neil could clearly see Albert was conflicted about this; however, that didn’t mean Neil had any answers to offer. “I can manipulate, empower, and utilize the dead, but I can’t force them to move on. No necromancer can. That’s not the way our magic works.”

The sound of metal ringing filled the air, and I knew before my eyes made the journey that Albert had drawn his sword. “I know you can’t, Neil. But maybe I can.”

Before anyone could react, Albert took a step toward the chalk circle. That was enough to kick Neil into gear, as he bolted forward and planted himself directly in front of Albert.

“Whoa there. What are you talking about? Yes, you’ve got a magic sword, but do you have any idea what you’re doing? You can’t just . . . cut through someone’s connection to our plane like the string on a balloon.”

“I cut the chimera without hurting it,” Albert reminded him. “I don’t see how this is any different.”

“Really? Because I can walk through the basic theorems of how amazingly different they are in a couple of hours, and you’ll see—” The words faltered as Albert raised his free hand and placed it on Neil’s shoulder.

“I can do this. I believe it with all my heart. This is the sort of thing my sword was made for. So please, trust me.”

They stood like that for several seconds, until finally, Neil moved wordlessly to the side. Albert smiled at him, then began walking forward once more. Part of me wanted to run over and do what Neil had given up on: talk some sense into my assistant before he got into trouble. For all he knew, Josiah would break free, or possess him, or pull some other trick out of his ghostly sleeves. But instead, I just sat there with Lillian and watched. Whether I thought it was smart, or even possible, was irrelevant. Albert said it could be done, and he was the one with the sword.

He was the Unlikely Champion.

Albert didn't pause until he was at the edge of the circle, staring into the still silently screaming mouth of Josiah. Lifting his sword carefully, he met the ghost's eyes with his own and pulled back to swing. Just before he let loose, Albert whispered a trio of words in the softest of voices, probably only audible to Lillian and me.

“We forgive you.”

Then he swung. The sword sliced past the unseen barrier, which was no surprise, and slid into Josiah's form. There, however, it slowed as if it had hit something dense, yet never stopped. The blade kept inching along, and as it did, Josiah began to burn with a new light. This one wasn't pale and green like the power he'd been carting around. It was a golden-white that seemed to flow from where the edge of the sword was moving through him. The deeper the sword went, the brighter the glow, until it didn't seem like light at all. It was a searing fire, burning through Josiah's soul. Whether it was because our spirits had so recently shared a body or the magic of Albert's sword, I had no idea, but as I sat there, I could see it destroying the worst parts of him. His anger, his stubbornness, his fear, all the pieces that were keeping him bound to a place he no longer belonged, each was burned away one by one in the power of the sword's glow.

Finally, the swing finished, and Albert's blade came out the other side. The light faded, and once more, we were staring at the intangible form of Josiah. He seemed different now, his face no longer clouded in madness and fury. Looking over each of us, he stopped at Albert, and mouthed the words, “Thank you.” With no more warning than that, his form began to unravel, turning to little more than smoke and drifting upward toward the ceiling.

Seconds later, no trace of Josiah remained, save for the chalk circle that could no longer contain him.

8.

With Josiah handled, the rest of our work went smoothly. Well, that's not entirely true. Things calmed down for about two hours, after which June burst through the front door, gun in hand, looking like she'd come ready for war. Apparently my text to Krystal had gone through once I was aboveground, and she'd reached out to June since she was the closest agent in the vicinity. Once we'd assured her that the issues were indeed handled, she put the gun away long enough to hear what had happened. Neil turned over the sealed candle, as well as the totem he and Albert had recovered—a small bell with runes all over it—and June headed off to give it to whomever dealt with that sort of thing.

Other than that bit of business, we went back to handling our respective tasks. Bit by bit, items were catalogued and stored for pick-up. In a surprising stroke of luck, Albert even managed to find an old checkbook under a table. While not a lot to work from, it did allow me to hunt down Josiah's accounts and get some semblance of his finances, not that there was a lot find. It seemed he had spent almost the entirety of the Fenmoore fortune on the equipment we'd seen downstairs, and in fact had a couple of creditors with debts to collect. I wasn't sure how that would work with the Agency seizing the estate, and I didn't need to figure it out. My job was just to compile the information; someone else would have to actually deal with it.

As we worked, I kept expecting Lillian to broach the subject of my unusual ability to walk off being stabbed by silver; however, that moment never came. She just kept plugging along with the rest of us, cheerful and attentive, doing her best to learn on the job. By the final day, I'd gotten so anxious over the seemingly inevitable discussion that I'd turned jumpy, startling slightly every time someone drew near. So when a hand finally clapped on my shoulder, causing me to nearly drop the papers I was holding, my body flooded with relief. This wouldn't be a fun conversation, but it would feel good to have it done with.

That relief faded as I turned around and found myself looking not at Lillian, but instead at Albert. He'd been quiet since the incident with Josiah, still smiling but without his usual air of joviality. I'd suspected that this was coming as well; I just thought it would happen once we were back in Winslow. One look at his eyes told me I was wrong, however. He was ready to tackle the issue here and now. I glanced around the room, noting that it was empty.

"Neil and Lillian are loading up the van," Albert explained. "I asked for a few minutes to talk to you, just boss and assistant."

"Then by all means, Albert. Let's talk." I set the pages I was holding down gently, and then made my way over to some of the few unbroken chairs we'd found in our exploration of the castle. They were mismatched and largely uncomfortable, but they held our weight, and that was all a chair really needed to do. I took my seat, and Albert did the same, although he had to pause to adjust his sword before finding a comfortable position. He kept adjusting, and I realized he was stalling, his nerve momentarily faltering. It was a dilemma I'd faced many times as well, so I didn't force him to recover. Instead, I broached the subject myself.

"This is about our last discussion, I assume. Whether or not you should stay in my employ. Tell me what you're thinking, Albert. It's okay if you don't have a fully formed response yet. You're more than welcome to bounce thoughts and ideas off of me."

He looked visibly relieved, finally ceasing the sword adjustment and sitting still. "I gave what you said a lot of thought. I really did. About what I should be doing with myself, and my sword. And I had decided that I was going to keep on working for you. This sword might have a destiny, but I don't have to give up my free will for it. The blade chose me, not the other way around. We do good, you know? I mean, you do, and I get to be part of that. I see it when I drop stuff off with clients. You give them a sense of security where their money is concerned, and it takes a big weight off their shoulders. I like being a piece of that process, no matter small. You asked me if I was happy, if this was the path I wanted to be on, and my answer was yes to both. I loved this job not because it's comfortable, but because I got to make the world a little better by doing it."

Touching as the words were—and make no mistake, it took all I had not to look away or stammer—there was a detail within them that didn't escape my notice. "You're speaking about all of that in the past tense, as though it's no longer true."

"It's all still true," Albert protested, his words coming quickly. "All of it. I just . . . I realized something else while we were on this job. When I cut the ghost free and helped him move on. No one else could have done that, could they? Neil said necromancers didn't have that ability. So none of the others, not even Arch or Krystal or Amy, could have set that man free. I don't know a lot about this sword, even after all the training I've done, but Arch tells me that Weapons of Destiny have power outside the normal range of what's possible. They can do amazing, incredible things. And for better or worse, this one did choose me."

He paused, his eyes drifting over to the table where we'd sorted dozens of pages cataloguing the castle's contents, most of which had been hauled up by him. "I love working for you, Fred. I love what you do, but the truth is that my part in it is a small one. With a little training, anyone could do it. Things like the ghost, sword-things . . . there might only be a handful of people in the world who can do those, and I'm one of them. I just keep thinking . . . how many other people like Josiah are out there? In need of help that nobody else can offer? That's a really scary thought; I've never had responsibility on that level. Heck, I barely had any at all when I was alive. But I asked myself, if the sword had picked you, Fred—if you were the one wielding all this power—what would you do with it? And I know this is the choice you would make.”

“I appreciate the kind sentiment, Albert, but I think you're giving me a bit too much credit.”

Albert shook his head. “No, I'm not. You always step up when someone needs you, and that's the kind of man I want to be. So I'm going to step up, for all the people out there who need the kind of help only this sword can offer them. I'm going to . . . I mean, I guess I am . . . Fred, I have to quit working for you.”

“I know.” Despite the fact that my emotions were reeling—an issue not at all helped by Albert looking like he was fighting back tears—I did my best to keep an even, comforting voice. This had to be hard enough on Albert as it was; he didn't need me making things worse. No, what he needed was reassurance that everything would be okay. I wasn't honestly sure if it would be, the path he was choosing was a dangerous one, but that was irrelevant. He just needed to believe things would turn out okay, if only for a little while, and as his friend, it was the least I could do. “You have been a wonderful employee, and it is with a heavy heart that I accept your resignation as such. But I hope you know that you will still be one of my dearest friends, no matter where your new role takes you.”

He smiled softly, the tears losing the battle to his willpower and retreating momentarily. “Thanks. But I don't think I'll be going anywhere for a while, at least not permanently. Winslow is my home, it's where all the people I care about live. Besides, Neil is part of my team, and I couldn't tear him away from Amy. Maybe I'll get to do the occasional trip to Boarback for training, but we live at Charlotte Manor, and that's how I want it to stay. For now, anyway.”

While Arch would probably protest, Albert's eyes were locked in resolve. Even though I knew it was selfish, the news still lightened my heart. Saying goodbye to Albert in one capacity was bad enough; I loathed the idea of losing him from my daily life altogether. But even as he spoke, part of me knew I needed to start steeling myself for that inevitability. Whatever destiny that sword planned to drag him toward, it would no doubt take him beyond the boundaries of Colorado. When that day came, it would be our job to assure him that no matter how far he wandered, he could also come back to a home. He needed a safety net, not an anchor. However, I hoped that day wouldn't arrive for a very long while.

We chatted a little more, and then I scooped up a closed box of files and headed off to the van, passing Neil in the entrance. Neither of us said anything, merely exchanging a brief look. I had no doubt he knew what Albert and I had been talking about, and was on his way to cheer his friend up. At least Albert wouldn't have to face his destiny alone; of all the things I could say about Neil, he was loyal above all else. So long as he could move, he would take every step of that journey at Albert's side.

The moon was high as I walked across the grass, making my way to the van. Lillian sat on the bumper, looking up at the sky. She tilted her head down slightly as I approached, eyes still trained upward.

"Did you two finish your little chat?"

"We did indeed." I set the box down carefully in the van's rear, nestling it in with a dozen other identical containers. "It seems I'm going to have to find myself a new assistant."

"You had to know it was coming, Fredrick. That boy has been bound for greater things since the first day he pulled a Weapon of Destiny out of its sheath."

"I disagree." Shutting the rear door, I took a seat next to Lillian on the bumper. Albert and Neil would emerge when they were ready to deal with other people once more. Until then, I could give them space. Besides, Albert's courage had inspired me. I had my own tasks to attend to. "Albert has been bound for greater things long before he set his hands on that blade."

"Maybe so," she replied.

"Lillian, I'm immune to silver." The words burst forth, and I paused for a reaction of shock and surprise, but none came. Instead, she just kept looking skyward, giving me the slightest of nods.

"I figured that out already, but thanks for finally coming clean. I don't suppose you'd mind telling me how?"

"If I could, I would. The truth is, no one is entirely sure how such a thing is possible. But I'll freely tell you what happened to me, along with anything else you want to know." I hesitated, then pressed forward. "I owe you that. You left your clan, trusting in me to provide a home for you, and by keeping this secret, I haven't reciprocated that trust. I'm sorry, Lillian. All of this is new to me, but that's not an excuse. I need to do better, and I'm going to give my all to accomplish that. Just bear with me if I make some missteps along the way."

Finally, her eyes left the stars, and her entire face pinched in laughter. It wasn't uproarious, merely a soft, shaking chuckle that seemed to stretch on for a full minute. "Sorry, sorry. I don't mean to act like I don't appreciate the sentiment. It's just funny to me. I left a clan where they'd keep us from blood for weeks at a time for the slightest infraction, and came to one where the leader is feeling guilty for not immediately sharing a pretty huge secret with the newest member. Maybe funny is the wrong word. 'Wonderfully absurd' captures it better. I didn't think there were clans like this one. You really love all these people who stood with you, don't you?"

"With all that I have," I told her.

"Good. Because I've seen the way most of them look at you, and it seems like the feeling is mutual." Her eyes opened and turned to me as she jammed an elbow gently into my ribs. "Now, enough with the build-up. Tell me how the hell you got yourself immune to silver."

With a night sky overhead and nothing to do while we waited for the others, now seemed as good a time as any to tell her the story of what happened the night I helped save Gideon.

"Ah, that. Well, as I said, we don't understand how it's possible, but we do know the cause: dragon magic."

Her eyes got wider, and a sharp smile split her face. "Ohhh shit. This is going to be good."

An Appraisal in the Carnival

1.

The headlights of Bubba's truck lit the metal fence, bound together by thick chains and sealed with a massive padlock. Beyond the obstacle, I could see faded blotches of red, yellow, green, and blue all dotting the shadowy landscape. The colors matched the rest of the decor, which is to say it all looked old and worn. Here and there, my eyes caught sight of some bits of metal that still shone or a tent without frayed edges; however, these were the rare exceptions amidst a veritable ocean of lost splendor.

"Honest first impression: the curb appeal is going to need a lot of work."

"It's an abandoned carnival; we knew that much going in." Bubba looked out the window, squinting slightly. His night-vision wasn't quite on the same level as my own, so it took more effort for him to see what lay on the other side of that fence. "But you ain't exactly wrong either." He killed the engine, and the two of us stepped out of his truck and into the night air.

Despite the theoretically festive nature of the destination, Bubba and I were both at the carnival to work. Richard Alderson, head of the local tribe of therians and a man we both considered to be a friend, had been approached by one of his people looking for a loan to restore this place, having recently inherited it from a dead family member. (If it seems strange that someone would approach the head of a supernatural organization for money, please do keep in mind that parahumans are both poor record keepers in general and held to different tax codes than regular people, making it exceedingly difficult to just go get a loan from a bank. I'd been taken aback as well, yet it seems such things happen all the time.) Richard, however, was not a man to invest his money foolishly, and had therefore hired Bubba and I to come out and do an evaluation of the premises.

Bubba was to check over the mechanical issues and see what repairs would run, while I was supposed to evaluate the facilities as a whole and calculate the potential revenue stream. It was, admittedly, a bit outside my wheelhouse, and I'd told Richard as much, but it was closer to my specialty than anyone else he knew, so I'd still been given the job. I could hardly say no after that, both because Richard was asking as a favor, and because his tribe and my clan were officially aligned together. It was another layer of protection against the Turvas, one that needed protecting, though honestly, I'd have probably taken the job anyway. While Lillian had proven more than skilled enough to make up for the extra work after losing Albert, things still weren't quite the same as they had been. I missed having him around. Though we still saw each other at Charlotte Manor with some regularity, it just wasn't the same. Much of his time was spent training with Arch these days, and even now, they were on a trip to Boarback for a week. Getting myself out of the office was a nice change of pace, and spending the time with friends made it all the more enjoyable.

“Here he comes.” Bubba nodded up the long, winding dirt road to where a pair of headlights could be seen slicing through the darkness. This place’s location, no doubt chosen to keep any other businesses from complaining about the noise and lights, was somewhat out of the way. That was going to be a hurdle if they wanted to reopen the establishment, one of nearly a dozen I’d mentally tallied before we were even through the front gate.

The vehicle moved slowly, taking every bump with extreme care, until it circled the last bend and came into full view. I’ll admit it; I stared in shock at what appeared before us, my mouth hanging slightly agape. Of all the cars I’d imagined Richard might drive—massive monster trucks or luxurious stretch limos, mostly—this one had never even entered the competition.

Richard Alderson, head of Winslow’s therian tribe, host to the King of the West, and all-around imposing figure, pulled his minivan to a stop only a few feet away from Bubba’s truck. When he popped the door and stood up, it made a little more sense. This minivan had been modified to accommodate his incredible size, as Richard towered over pretty much everyone and had so much muscle he’d have made every other participant in a bodybuilding competition immediately admit defeat. Then he yanked the sliding side door open, and the vehicle choice became a perfect fit. Because, above all the other things I listed already, Richard was a father, and minivans tended to have exceptional safety features.

Sally Alderson, Richard’s daughter, bounded out the side of the minivan, eyes shining as she raced to the front gate and stared into the carnival’s depths. It was curious; despite all the grime and general wear the place had suffered, she still seemed utterly entranced by the idea of a carnival of any sort. From behind her, moving at a steady pace that in no way matched his childish form, was Gideon. An ancient dragon who had taken the appearance of a child, there was something unsettling about him, even before one caught sight of his lavender eyes and dangerous smile. Gideon was terrifying, easily the scariest person or creature I’d ever encountered, yet he was also dedicated. He had taken up the role of Sally’s playmate, best friend, and guardian, and to my knowledge, none who’d ever tried to harm her had lived to see another sunset.

“You brought Sally?” Bubba asked.

“Wasn’t planning on it, but once she heard I was coming to look over a carnival, she got all excited . . .” Richard rubbed the back of his neck and glanced down, slightly embarrassed. The man could stand toe-to-toe with nearly any parahuman and never flinch; however, even he was weak when it came to his daughter. “She’s never been able to go to a real one—with crowds that size it’s just too dangerous—so since this place is empty, I thought it would be okay.”

“A real one would be fine as well,” Gideon said, standing a ways back from Sally as she pressed against the gate so hard I began to fear she might accidentally push her head through. Though, given all the parahuman strength we had on hand, snapping a few metal bars wouldn’t even be an inconvenience. “I would make sure she was unharmed.”

“We tried that once, Gideon. You left so much blood on the glass, they had to close the aquarium for a month,” Richard reminded him.

Gideon merely shrugged. “I assumed thoroughly discouraging the first attempt to take her would give any who planned on trying again reason to reconsider the idea.”

“Daddy! Can we go inside?” Sally had finally turned from the gate and was looking back at us.

“One moment. Daddy just has to get the key.” Richard patted his pockets, eventually coming up with a moderately sized key that looked positively diminutive in his massive hand. “Okay, guys, let’s do a nice, thorough check of the property. Lonnie—that’s the wererat asking for the loan—says his grandpa built and ran this place for a few decades. Started as a cover for a moonshining operation in the woods, hence the location, but ended up making enough to turn it into a legitimate business. Even after the people stopped coming, he had enough of a soft spot for the old joint that he kept paying a maintenance company to come out and keep the carnival from falling down, which means it should be mostly safe. Plus, the place still has power, so the first thing we need to do is find the main office and turn on the juice. That should give us an idea of what works and what doesn’t.”

“Sally and I will be amusing ourselves with rides and games,” Gideon announced.

Bubba looked over at the carnival. “Hate to tell you this, but even with occasional maintenance and power, I doubt any of these old rides are still working.”

“I’ve made things move under my will since long before you humans managed to bend lightning to your bidding. Sally wishes to have a genuine carnival experience, so that is what she will receive.” Gideon started forward toward the gate, as though the conversation was concluded. Which I guess it was, for him, and that meant it was done for the rest of us, too. Gideon spoke with us only when he deemed it worth doing, and even that was a sizable courtesy.

The rest of us followed him over, and Richard began fumbling with the lock. It was old, but sturdy, probably one of the last few well-constructed items in the entire park. Now that I was closer, I could see that despite the place being run-down, it was surprisingly clean, and the lingering scent of human still danced in the air. The maintenance company had clearly just been out, perhaps even that day. Well, at least Lonnie was smart enough to put his best foot forward; that spoke to someone who cared about the project he was undertaking. If the maintenance was thorough, and the attractions were not in need of dire repairs, this might just be something worth putting money into.

“Get in the—damn it.” Richard’s shoulders slumped, and in his hand I could see the snapped off remains of a key. “Must be rusted or something. I couldn’t get it to fit right. Fred, do me a favor and make a note that we need to buy Lonnie a new lock.” Before I could even take out my notepad to jot the order down, there was a muted crunch and Richard was tossing the broken remains of a lock to the ground.

He pulled the chain through the gate’s bars easily, then yanked the massive metal structure open as if it were made of cardboard. “Welcome to the carnival. Please enjoy yourselves, and remember to be safe above all else.”

That last part seemed aimed at Gideon, who met Richard’s stare without so much as a flinch. “As if you needed to tell me that.” Gideon took Sally’s hand, and together, the two of them bolted off into the darkness. Part of me wanted to call out for them to stop, to wait for the adults so it would be safe, but that was ridiculous. Not only was Gideon older than all of us combined, he was also far and away the most powerful. The truth of the matter was that Sally was worlds safer at his side than ours.

As they darted off, Richard pulled a small map from his back pocket and looked it over. “I think the main office is to the north. Should be a quick walk. Let’s get the power on and start checking this place out.”

2.

Finding the main office was a relatively painless process—the walkways were clear of debris, and most of the signs pointing to rides and attractions were still in place. True, the paint had chipped and writing had faded; however, the bones were still there. The longer I looked at this place, trying to see it through the lens of what it could be rather than what it was, the more convinced I became that it might be salvageable. Of course, most of the real information we'd need on that front was going to come from Bubba. Paint and tents were one thing; if the rides were in need of serious overhaul, that was a whole other level of cost.

We'd found the office and were nearly inside when light suddenly filled up the sky. From our vantage point, we could see over the tops of the other booths and attractions to the Ferris wheel, which was burning brightly in the night sky as it began to play music and slowly turned in place. I was amazed it moved so fluidly, and that all the lights worked. Then I remembered that we had yet to actually turn the power on, and it made much more sense.

"Gideon?" I asked.

"Unless Sally has suddenly gotten much better at magic, I'd say that's a fair guess," Richard replied. "We'll check that one out once they're done with it."

Stepping inside, we made our way through the small building, passing up the nurse's station and a tiny office with a desk that took up nearly all the space, arriving at a door that led down to a basement. Once inside, Richard and Bubba turned a few knobs and flipped a large switch that would have taken a normal person both arms to move. A soft hum of power filled the room, and overhead, several bulbs flickered and began to glow.

"Huh, thought those would have been dead by now," Bubba noted. "Does maintenance turn the power on when they come out here?"

"Given how easily that switch moved and the lack of dust around here, I'm guessing so," Richard said. "Now that we've got some juice flowing, what do you want to start with?"

"Makes the most sense to start with the big-ticket items. Don't mean shit if the deep fryers are an easy fix but the roller coaster needs thousands of dollars of work."

"I think I'll look at the food stalls," I said. "Concessions are going to be a big part of the overall income stream, after admittance fees and ride tickets, so getting a sense of what the place is equipped for, along with what it could potentially handle, will give us a good idea of whether or not that can help keep the carnival in the black."

Richard checked his map once more. "Looks like there's a spinning ride not far from the Ferris wheel, and right next to it was a big café that sold .

.. hot chowder?” His nose wrinkled slightly. “I think I’m starting to see why this carnival closed in the first place. Anyway, why don’t we head there? Bubba can check the ride, Fred can look over the café, and I can make sure Gideon isn’t levitating the Ferris wheel halfway to the clouds.”

I was reasonably sure that Richard was joking—not that Gideon couldn’t do such a thing; I just presumed he wouldn’t be that ostentatious—however, I didn’t ask for confirmation as we made our way up from the basement and out of the building. Through the years, I’d learned that the less I knew about what the ancient dragon wanted and could do, the happier I was overall.

It took a few turns to make our way toward the Ferris wheel—which was still brightly lit and easy to see, but required navigating around the rest of the area to get to—however, we eventually made it. Sure enough, there was the spinning ride Richard had mentioned. A surprisingly intact sign above the platform labeled it the “Lunch Thief,” which was a name that both conveyed what it would do to those who rode and made me wonder who on earth would ever get on such a thing. Rebranding was going to be critical for a lot of these elements, it seemed, if the carnival was going to make money once more. I made a few notes as I walked away from the Lunch Thief, which Bubba was already pulling up panels on so he could dig around inside.

The café was indeed directly by the Lunch Thief, just around a corner which in no way would have obscured the sounds of people losing their stomach contents or blocked the smell of cooking chowder from those on the ride. It was like the exact opposite of synergy, and part of me couldn’t help wondering if the whole set-up was an intentionally cruel joke played by the original owner. Location aside, though, the café had actually held up rather well, despite years of abandonment. Most of the tables and chairs were a loss, which meant the whole lot would need replacing, but since they were the cheap plastic kind, it was a relatively minor expense. It was a nice space overall, with plenty of room to host lots of folks taking a break to get food. Near the edge of the seating was a slightly blocked off area that looked as though it had been used for storage. With minimal restructuring, I imagined it could host a stage instead, something to provide some live—or even pre-recorded—music to block out any sounds making their way over from the Lunch Thief.

Inside the café, I found things in similar condition. There was wear, sure, and some dust, but minimal rusting and rot. While Bubba would need to come check all the appliances over to be sure, it looked from a cursory glance like the place could be easily salvaged. It would need to start serving something other than chowder, obviously, but that was an easy fix. Maybe it could focus on smells not so taxing to the senses of those being spun around a ride. Sandwiches, fried foods, things like that. Actually, why not pick something with a fragrance that might be an aid, rather than a hindrance? Homemade ginger snaps would fill the air with a pleasant scent, and make a good nausea aid for those who'd already ridden the Lunch Thief.

I stooped down to examine the counter space, mentally trying to find space for two extra ovens, and that was when I heard it: the sound of footsteps racing along outside. I'd have assumed it was Sally and Gideon, except that there was only one set of feet, and they were much too heavy to belong to a child. Or a dragon masquerading as a child. Hauling myself back up, I peered through the dirty windows and out into the eating area, trying to pin down the source of the steps. I'd nearly located them when a new noise burst through the air, loud screeches of terrible rock music obscuring every other sound nearby.

Darting out the door, I looked around, only to find the same empty café I'd left moments prior. With horrid guitar and off-beat drums in my ears, it was impossible to hear even my own thoughts, so I followed the noise back over to its source: the Lunch Thief. It was spinning out as Bubba smacked at something on the controls, with Richard a few feet away covering his ears. Both of them appeared to be in pain, until Bubba finally found the right button, which mercifully ended the noise and caused the ride to slow down.

"Well," Bubba said, speaking much louder than he actually needed to, "the good news is that this one still mostly works. Bad news is that if we don't find a way to install a better soundtrack, no one's going to get within a mile of the damn thing."

"Make that two miles for therians." Richard rubbed his temples and shook his head, sending his long golden hair spraying around. "Did Lonnie's grandfather owe some garage band a favor, or did he just genuinely hate his own customers?"

"Given that he put a chowder café next to a ride designed to make people queasy, I'm leaning toward the latter," I said. "But I've got good news, too. It looks like the café is in good shape overall. If Bubba gives the thumbs up on the appliances, you're looking at a solid venue in need of mostly cosmetic alterations."

Bubba patted the Lunch Thief's console gently, careful not to accidentally turn the music back on. "Same here. Needs some tweaks, and some safety features added, but overall, it ain't too bad."

"That's surprising, and encouraging." Richard finally stopped rubbing his ears, though he watched the ride warily, as if he didn't trust it not to spring back to life. "Lonnie may just get his money yet. Anyway, Sally and Gideon are still on the Ferris wheel, and after that, they're going to the carousel, so I think our next stop should be the Haunted Fun House. There's a whole row of small food booths by it, and if the mechanics are in good condition, it could be a major draw."

“Lead the way.” I paused, remembering why I’d originally darted out of the café to begin with. “Hey, Richard, did you run over here before the music started?”

“I was on my way,” he told me. “Run might be a strong word for it, though. Why, did you hear something?”

“I thought so. It sounded like someone running.”

Richard and Bubba exchanged a brief look. “You hear anything?” Richard asked.

“Had my head in the guts of this machine,” Bubba replied. “May have been a wild animal; bound to be some holes in the fence around here somewhere.”

“Hmm.” Richard glanced back at the café, then to me, and then back to Bubba. “It could have been me; my natural pace is brisker than most people’s. Since I didn’t hear anything either, that seems like the most likely explanation. Still, everyone keep an eye open just in case. Places like this sometimes draw in unsavory sorts of parahumans. It’s unlikely, since the maintenance company is regularly coming through here without incident, but anything is possible.”

“Should we tell Gideon?” I asked.

Richard hesitated, then shook his head. “I don’t think that’s necessary quite yet. All we have are a set of footsteps that might have been mine. I don’t smell anything out of the ordinary, plus Gideon is virtually impossible to sneak up on. If I told them, all it would do is scare Sally, and I’d like her to enjoy this. It may be the only time she can go to a carnival without Gideon having to kill someone. Let’s just all keep our eyes peeled and our wits about us. Should we actually discover something dangerous, we can decide how to proceed from there. Until then, we focus on the job at hand.”

It made sense, and the more time went by, the less sure I was about the speed the steps had been moving. Richard was probably right; I’d just overheard him and mistaken the pace. Not every place I went was some seedy parahuman nest waiting to attack. Sometimes, an old carnival was just an old carnival, and if Richard financed the restoration, it wouldn’t even be old for much longer. I was almost certainly just being paranoid.

At least, that’s what I told myself as we headed off toward the Haunted Fun House.

3.

Unlike the café, the long line of food booths weren't nearly as well persevered. Then again, since they'd been constructed from canvas and cheap lumber, that wasn't especially surprising. Bubba gave the machines inside a once-over—what few appliances there were to be found—and declared that while some might still work, they were so old and had seen enough exposure to the elements that using them would almost certainly be a safety violation. I wasn't as put off by the news as might be expected though, because, in truth, I could see more potential for this area than just a string of unconnected food stalls.

I imagined it would be cheaper to create one centralized kitchen and use the booths only to host service personnel, each one offering a single specialty item. That would spread the lines out, give more room for clerks at each respective booth, and overall increase the general speed and potential profit. Plus, we could update the menu offerings. I couldn't read many of the signs left, but it was hard to imagine "Hot Cherries on a Stick" and "Fried Bubblegum" were quite the draws they'd once been.

Despite my initial hesitation to take on this job for Richard, I found myself getting more and more enthralled with it. I'd been in many businesses through the years, usually just working on their books; however, it seemed I'd picked up a small bit of practical knowledge here and there. While he'd clearly need to bring in a real specialist to get things optimized, I was having fun working outside my usual boxes.

Perhaps that cheerful mood was why I followed along with Richard and Bubba as they headed to the Haunted Fun House, straying from my proper duties to take in one the carnival's main attractions. It was certainly an imposing structure, built to resemble a Gothic manor, though only in the most cheap and cursory of ways. A small track with a line of three cars meant to seat two people each was set in front, flanked by a wide pair of doors on either side. Further over, off to the left, was a massive arc of a doorway closed off by a door so tall even Richard could pass through without ducking. It was painted pure black, a feature that would have been far more intimidating if not for the chips showing the oak color underneath.

"Looks like they decided to save space and combine two attractions into one." Richard surveyed the structure carefully, no doubt checking for any outward signs of decay—aside from the decorative ones, obviously. "The cars probably take you through a standard haunted house with stuff jumping out, and I bet the door leads up to the usual fun house fare, probably with a spooky theme. Given that space is at a premium in these sorts of places, it's not a bad idea."

As Richard had been speaking, Bubba walked over and fiddled with the control panel. The sound of cackling laughter filled the air as lights flickered on and the attraction sprang to life. Mercifully, this was not a repeat of the Lunch Thief's soundtrack, as the laughing quickly gave way to someone doing a terrible Vincent Price impersonation, beckoning people to come inside if they thought they could survive.

"Want to see if we can take this thing for a ride?" Bubba gently tugged on the lead cart to see if it could move. "We can roll through and write down everything that don't light up or jump out, then I can walk the tracks afterward and see how much work they need. Be a lot faster than checkin' it all one piece at a time."

"Is that safe?" My eyes were on the cart that, while seemingly able to move, certainly didn't appear as if it had done so in many years.

"Not for most people, but I can't imagine there'd be much in there that could hurt us," Bubba replied.

Richard walked over and began easing himself down into one of the cars, filling the space meant for two and then some. There was a lot of creaking and groaning, but nothing snapped or broke apart, so that seemed like a good sign. "I'm glad to go if you can actually make this thing move, Bubba." After a few more seconds of adjustment, Richard turned to me. "Fred, would you mind checking the upstairs? Just note anything broken that needs fixing, or anything mechanical that Bubba needs to check out when we're done down here. It will save us a lot of time."

"Happy to help," I told him, because I was, and because I'd have done it even if that wasn't the case. Fun as this trip was, I was still being paid to do a job, and that meant following the boss's orders. Especially when he was nice enough to frame them as requests.

I walked up to the chipped black door, preparing to use as much strength as needed to shove the massive thing open. To my surprise, however, it took only the barest of pushes to send it moving inward. Grabbing the knob, I wiggled the door back and forth for a few moments, trying to figure out why it was so easy to move. The best I could figure out was that the wood was especially light, and there appeared to be some special hinge at the top of the entrance helping it along. I chided myself for not expecting something so mundane; this was supposed to be used by humans, after all. My time with Krystal and the others had given me a predisposition to seeing everything through a parahuman lens, it seemed. But this was just a fun house inside a carnival, one of countless thousands throughout the nation that normal people went to every year. Even I'd visited a few, back when the traveling ones came through my hometown. They hadn't been a favorite pastime—I was never much of one for large crowds; however, in high school, it was an occasional entertaining diversion.

Making my way up the stairs, which were also painted black with the exception of two that had been replaced by new boards, I scanned the narrow entrance, searching for any areas with structural compromise or mechanical components. Bubba was right. While we were in little danger wandering a potentially unsound attraction, the same wouldn't be true once the carnival had human guests. They were such fragile creatures, really. The longer I spent as a vampire, the harder it was to believe I'd survived as long as I had with a normal body. Sure, I had to worry about stakes, sunlight, and supernatural threats, but the overall number of things that could harm or kill me had shrunk to a fraction of its former size. No wonder the older vampires I'd met seemed so inhuman; if I wasn't still around humans, it would be easy to forget what I'd once been.

When I crested the staircase, I found myself staring at a man. A pale man—thoroughly unremarkable, if I'm honest—wearing a sweater vest and khakis. Me, in other words. It seems the first attraction of the fun house was a classic: a hall of mirrors for guests to bump their way around in.

Allow me to digress for a brief moment, because while I've never explicitly covered this before, I'm sure some of you will be wondering at just how I was able to see myself in a mirror when vampires are supposed to lack reflections. The simplest answer is that the whole thing is bunk. How would that even work? Assuming our flesh was magically not to be seen in a mirror, which is a silly premise to start with, why would our clothes be absent as well? Does donning a shirt as a vampire somehow transfer some aspect of vampirism to the shirt, but only for the length of time that it stays on our skin? The whole premise is quite strange. As near as I can figure, and this is pure conjecture on my part, the rumor started because there was a time when a "mirror" was just a large hunk of polished silver, which vampires would of course avoid for obvious reasons. Still, that is only a guess; I have no certain idea as to where such an odd rumor came from.

At any rate, I found myself standing in a hall of mirrors, and proceeded to do what I'd been instructed: make my way through it. A steady thrum of ghostly music and standard spooky sounds played from speakers on the walls, likely meant to instill a bit of terror as I wandered about. Cackling laughter, like at the entrance, heavy panting, doors slamming, wailing moans, muffled footsteps, unintelligible whispers, all the usual stuff one would find on a $3 Halloween album. When I listened carefully—a feat I rarely engaged in—I could make out the same music being played downstairs as well. Why pay for two soundtracks when they could just run the audio to different outlets? Food aside, I found myself with a bit of respect for the previous owner of this place. Pragmatism and creativity were always aspects to admire in an entrepreneur.

The whole area was something of a boon as well, since nearly all the mirrors were still in one piece. True, several were dusty, and occasionally I would find a shattered one with broken shards shimmering on the ground, but overall, it wouldn't cost much to replace the few that were needed. If the rest of this fun house was in as good of shape, it was yet another tick in favor of making the investment.

Turning a corner near what I assumed had to be the end of the mirrors, I once again found myself looking at a man. This one wasn't me, however. It was someone in dark jeans, a heavy coat, and with their face obscured by a bleached cat mask speckled with dirt. I froze as soon as my eyes fell upon him, and I stood there for several seconds, waiting for him to make a move. When nothing happened but a fresh round of cackling in my ears, I remembered where I was. Right: spooky fun house. There were bound to be a few surprises scattered about to give the guests a scare.

It was a pretty good one, too. I'd certainly been taken by it. Stepping forward, I moved closer to examine the prop. Unfortunately, that was the exact moment that my true mistake became clear. Whipping his arm forward, the man in the mask stabbed something sharp between my ribs. I yelped, more in shock than pain, and looked down to find a shard of broken mirror poking out from my sweater vest.

By the time I looked back up, the cat-masked assailant was gone. I tried to listen for him, but with all the music and sound effects blaring, it was impossible to tell what was real and what was just noise. I darted around the hall for a few moments, scouring for my attacker, but there was nothing to find. He'd apparently vanished after stabbing me.

With a grunt of annoyance, I grabbed the mirror shard and yanked it out. At least this time I knew I wasn't mistaken. There was definitely something else in the carnival with us.

4.

“Yup, that’s a stab wound all right. Or what’s left of one. Y’all heal faster than we do, and it doesn’t look like it did much damage to start with.” Bubba examined the slice in my chest, now looking like little more than an accidental scratch, then nodded, indicating I could lower my shirt.

Getting out of the fun house had been a quick affair. Rather than plunging further into the unknown and trying to find my way out, I’d simply doubled back the way I’d come. It was a tactic probably frowned upon when the ride was operating normally, but given the circumstances, I felt justified.

“Damn. This complicates things,” Richard said. “Fixing broken-down rides and repairing booths is one thing, but if some parahumans have made this place a home, then I’ve got to worry about the backlash from flushing them out, or if I’m even going to be able to. Depends on what they are, and if they’ve got allies. First things first though, we need to find Sally and Gideon. Fred, can you tell us anything else about the assailant? We can keep a lookout while we head their way.”

“Just that he was large—by normal standards, I mean—wore a cat mask, stabbed me, and then vanished.” I’d have loved to provide more information, but nothing more jumped to mind, no matter how much I wracked my brain. In the moment, I hadn’t realized the need to pay attention, and by the time I was smart enough to look for details, he was already gone.

Bubba rubbed his chin as I listed off the small bits of information I had. “Could be a ghost, maybe. Been here alone long enough, might have gone crazy and just started tryin’ to drive off intruders.”

“Then why haven’t any of the maintenance people had issues?” Richard pointed out. “We’re probably dealing with something nocturnal. Ghosts are stronger at night, true, but I can’t imagine that one strong enough to use a physical object wouldn’t have caused at least a little daytime trouble. Given our location, it might be a lost forest spirit that made this place its home. Plenty of those only manifest at night.”

“Um, didn’t you just say ghosts weren’t nocturnal?” I asked.

“Ghosts are a type of spirit, one that used to be human,” Richard explained. “But there’s a whole list of other spirit types out there. Most are so weak you’d never notice them if you weren’t looking. Every now and then, you come up against one with real power though, and those can be awfully territorial.”

Bubba yanked out his phone. “I can call Amy and Neil, have them here handling this place in no time.”

“Hang on. Right now, all we have is a best guess. I’d prefer to get my daughter to safety, regroup, and come back here during the day with some experts.” Richard took a few steps away from us, lifted his head up, and took a long, deep sniff. I'd seen firsthand how good his tracking skills were, so I wasn't remotely surprised when he nodded down the fairway in a direction we hadn't been yet. "This place still stinks of cleaning chemicals and humans, but I can smell Gideon over there. Dragon is a hard musk to mistake for anything else."

We began jogging down the fairway, eschewing an outright run so that Richard could take his time following their trail. Bubba quickly fell into line next to me and began speaking loud enough to be heard while still staying quiet enough that he wouldn't break Richard's concentration. "If this is a spirit, then none of us can hurt it. You fight those usin' silver and magic, so we're shit out of luck on both fronts. Gideon can whup their asses no problem, so we're fine once we get to him. The upswing is that they won't be able to hurt us either."

"Tell that to my ruined vest," I muttered. Perhaps I was an extra bit miffed because it was yet another that needed replacing, and in the span of only a few weeks. I bought quality, so the things weren't cheap.

"I didn't say they couldn't annoy us." Bubba grinned, and we took a sharp turn as Richard suddenly changed direction.

He led us deeper into the carnival, bringing us to a midway where he began to slow down. Richard turned to and fro, squinting his eyes and wrinkling his nose. "How much cleaner did these people use? It stinks of chemicals all through here. I can barely follow Gideon's scent."

Richard came to a full stop, looking up and down the different paths leading through the midway. I took a test sniff as well and found that he was right. This whole area did have a heavy scent running through it. It smelled like they'd dumped a whole vat of chemicals on the ground. The lingering stink made detecting almost anything else impossible. Still, I tried my best, because with every passing second, I noticed Richard was getting a little less composed. Even if she was with Gideon, he worried about Sally constantly. I didn't know the whole story, but apparently she'd been the target of many a parahuman trying to turn the innocent girl into leverage. After Richard's position cost his wife her life, he'd been determined not to see the same happen to Sally. And that had led to his strange bargain with Gideon: giving the ancient dragon his blessing to wed his daughter when she was of proper age, but only if she agreed to marry him. The blessing was one thing, but Gideon had to win her heart on his own. It was an uncomfortable situation rooted in a culture that wasn't my own, so I tended to try not to think too hard about it. Richard was a man who loved his family, and when he'd been put in a hard position, he'd made the best call he could. That was the most any of us could do.

The sudden impact of Bubba's hand smacking me on the back got my attention away from futilely sniffing the air. Nodding over to one of the game booths—the kind with undersized rings and oversized milk bottles—he drew my attention to movement. Someone was rising up from behind the booth. For a moment, I thought it was my attacker, but the body wasn't right. Plus, on closer inspection, this one was wearing a rabbit mask, albeit one as sun-bleached and dirt-stained as the cat version.

Now that I was paying attention, I saw more figures popping into view, rising up from different booths on the midway. They said nothing, their dirty, pale animal masks gazing eerily at us as they appeared. Could one spirit manifest in so many different forms? Or was this a collection of them, who'd all decided to make the empty carnival their home? I deeply wished I'd asked a few more questions before we starting running; information would have been extremely useful in this moment.

"Shit, that's a lot of 'em." Bubba took a step back, eyes darting between assailants. Even Richard had noticed now, although he looked far closer to furious than fearful. I could hear his heart hammering in his chest from several feet away. Bubba's as well, which was odd—he didn't seem that worked up. Then I noticed the next one, and it finally clicked.

No wonder I hadn't realized it before, with the blaring music inside the fun house and my general tendency to block out the cacophony of sounds vampire hearing dragged to my ears. Now that I'd noticed, there was no mistaking the noise for anything else though. It was a sound my senses were fine-tuned to recognize: heartbeats. The sound of precious blood being moved through a body.

"They've got heartbeats!" I yelled. "All of them have heartbeats. That means they aren't spirits, right?"

"That's right, Fred." Richard's expression had darkened. His fingers were flexing at his sides, the sharp nails already beginning to take on a more claw-like appearance in the flickering lights of the midway bulbs. "That means they have flesh and blood, both of which can be torn apart if they keep standing in our way."

"Looks like the Scooby approach didn't work." This voice was new, coming from a man in a dart-throwing booth. It was my cat-mask wearer, features still hidden as he finally spoke. "Too bad you boys didn't take the warning when you had the chance. Now, we've got to get messy."

Bubba cracked his knuckles, and Richard lowered his stance, winding up for a pounce. They were preparing to fight, and while the masked people had a numbers advantage, they were still in for a hell of a brawl. Unless it was an entire crew of fey or therians, I had a strong suspicion that Richard was about to rip a swath of blood through their ranks.

None of us were prepared for what came next, however. Instead of jumping out from the booths to fight us, the masked men all pulled out guns and took aim. We barely had time to register what was going on before Cat

Mask yelled an order to the rest of the gang. “Fire!”

And just like that, the world was suddenly drowned out in a sea of bullets.

5.

Prior to reconnecting with Krystal, my only real exposure to firearms was in the form of action films. However, after we began spending time together, I grew more accustomed to the presence of guns, mostly because she rarely left a room without one, and once Arch joined our group, they became even more commonplace. Rather than making me apathetic to the danger of guns, this fact only served to heighten my respect and awareness of their danger. Crazy as Krystal could be, she took firearm safety seriously, and being around her made it impossible for some of that attitude not to rub off on me.

That was why, in spite of knowing rationally that a mere bullet would be little more than an inconvenience to me, I still hit the ground as soon as the first shot rang through the air. Assuming safety in a shoot-out was ludicrous, vampire or not. To my surprise, Richard and Bubba were both lying on the concrete as well, dodging the initial volley that ripped through the air overhead.

“Huh, I wasn’t expectin’ this.” Bubba was close enough for me to hear him over the bullets cutting through the air, unlike Richard, who was stuck several feet away. He’d grabbed a plastic flask from somewhere in his pocket and had the cap halfway unscrewed. Something had stopped him from drinking whatever lay within, though. “It’s hard to get a good whiff with all the chemical stink in this place, but those don’t smell like silver bullets.”

He was right. While the scent of gunpowder was slowly choking out the chemical stench from the cleaners, there wasn’t so much as a single whiff of silver in the air. Not too surprising; no reasonable person would expect their hideout to be assaulted by a vampire and two were-creatures. Regular guns were more than enough to handle normal threats, especially this many of them, but they wouldn’t do much to the majority of parahumans. All of which begged the question: what were we dealing with? What sort of creature made a home in an abandoned carnival, tried to scare off intruders with stabbings, and then resorted to murder by impromptu firing squad?

I’m not especially proud of how long it took me to snap to this realization, but as I said earlier, spending so much time around other parahumans has a tendency to color the way one sees the world. “I think . . . I think they’re humans, Bubba. Just regular, run-of-the-mill humans. Or maybe I should say criminals? People who turned this place into a gang hideout.”

Bubba stared at me, then tilted his head back and took a long, careful breath. “Son of a bitch. That ain’t the smell of no damn cleaner. These assholes are cooking meth.”

While it took substantial willpower, I resisted asking exactly how Bubba could recognize that scent so readily as he craned his head up and shouted. “Richard! They’re just a bunch of meth-cookers using regular bullets.”

“Seriously?” Richard looked to us, then over to one of the shooters who was wearing a bear mask. They were angling their firearms down, leaning over the top of the booth’s counters to get a line of sight on us, preparing to shoot while we were on the ground. “Oh. Well that makes this a lot easier.”

I can’t tell you exactly what motions Richard made, as his movements were too fast for even my eyes to follow. I just saw him press his hands to the ground, grin a mouthful of sharp teeth, and bolt forward into the booth where Bear Mask was taking aim. There was a brief scream from inside, which stopped without either warning or climax. The dirty mask was tossed over the counter, bouncing along the ground in plain view of the other attackers. Only now, it was almost completely covered in blood.

Instantly, the mood around us shifted. Guns that had been brazenly waved about were suddenly pulled in closer, and people standing out in the open shrank back. They were turning defensive on instinct, having just seen something unnatural, bordering on impossible. Right now, their understanding of what was real was at war with the sight before their eyes. This wasn’t the way things were supposed to go, and they knew it. If they hadn’t just tried to kill us, I probably would have felt genuinely bad for them.

When Richard rose back into view, his mouth was smeared in blood, a red circle around rows of teeth too big and sharp for any human. Tufts of fur ran down his face and arms, down to hands which ended in long, serrated claws stained vermillion. As Bubba rose from the ground next to me, I kept staring. Being around Richard the father and friend—the kind, oversized man I was used to—it was easy to forget just how terrifying he truly was when the situation demanded it. Richard was an alpha therian who’d earned and held his position at the top of his tribe through no one’s strength but his own. It wasn’t the first time his fangs and claws had been coated in blood, nor did I have any illusions it would be the last. Now, I really did feel sorry for our assailants.

One of the criminals in a rabbit mask started to tilt their gun toward him, and Richard let out a roar that made the man shriek and draw back. Even if he consciously still thought he could win, his instincts knew to draw back from the sound of an angry lion. The rest cowered, save for Cat Mask, who seemed to be watching it all unfold warily. He knew the situation was dangerous; however, he’d yet to give in to his fear. I got to my feet next to Bubba, keeping my eye on him. No need to take pointless chances and let him surprise us.

“You poor, stupid bastards.” Richard’s voice was deep and gruff, closer to animal than human. His whole body was tense, poised to strike at a moment’s provocation. “You really have no idea who you’ve fucked with tonight. I'll give you one chance, and one chance only. Toss your guns into the midway and lay down on the counters. We're going to call . . . I guess they'd be our version of the police, and they'll turn you over to the regular cops. Eventually. If anyone doesn't like that proposal, then feel free to try something." His tongue, now inhumanly long, stretched out and licked the blood from around his mouth.

"I'm still plenty hungry enough for the rest of you."

The sound of metal hitting concrete filled the air as guns clattered down in the midway. I knew enough to be aware that dropping a firearm didn't actually discharge it, yet I still winced a little every time one landed. Some ideas from movies are harder to root out than others. While the guns rained to the ground, I kept my eye on Cat Mask, noticing he'd yet to surrender his. After a moment, I realized that his face was turned in my direction as well. Right . . . he thought he'd stabbed me. Well, I mean he had stabbed me, but he'd expected me to stay stabbed. Although I could never be as terrifying as Richard, I could still make sure this man knew he was dealing with beings outside his realm of understanding. With a wide smile showing off my fangs, I carefully lifted my shirt and sweater vest, displaying the now completely healed and unblemished skin.

"Monsters." The voice was less composed than the body language, shaky terror replacing the authority he'd spoken with before. "No, there's no such thing as monsters." Cat Mask lifted his gun, unsteady as his hand was, and pointed it at me. "We just made a bad batch, guys. That's all this is. We're seeing shit. They noticed, and they're bluffing us."

"I seriously urge you to take us up on the chance to surrender." Bubba's voice was surprisingly gentle, given the situation. I noticed that he'd tucked his plastic flask out of sight once more. "This is already not endin' well for any of you, but life is long. One day, you might turn yourself around and discover some happiness in the world. Fire that gun, and you ain't never gettin' the chance to find out."

They were sound words of advice, and as Cat Mask kept his gun trained on me, I dearly hoped he'd listen to them. If he pulled that trigger, I'd be fine, but Richard would undoubtedly be on him before the recoil was finished. Cat Mask didn't understand that the person he was really holding the gun on was himself. We stood like that, silent, waiting to see what choice he made. Then a new voice rang out, shattering the silence and changing the situation entirely.

"Daddy?"

All eyes moved to the edge of the midway. Sally was standing there, looking over at her father with worry and confusion. And unfortunately, I do mean all eyes, including those of Cat Mask, who swung both his attention and his weapon in her direction.

6.

All of us were moving, dashing, as fast as we could. I dimly heard the tear of canvas and snap of wood as Richard plowed through the booth he was in without being slowed by even an instant. There was no discussion or thought, only a mad race to reach Cat Mask before his arm finished its journey. While it's true that—and upon looking back, it's easy to realize that his movements may have been reactionary—there was no guarantee he planned to shoot, and even if he had, Sally was a therian as well. But none of that entered my, and I presume the others' minds at the time. The only thing we understood or saw was a gun moving in the direction of a child, and we moved our bodies with all we had to stop it.

None of us were fast enough, however, and that includes Cat Mask. The weapon's muzzle was just approaching Sally's general direction when it vanished, along with Cat Mask's hand and a big chunk of his forearm. I heard a thud from behind the midway, one that I had a firm guess was the gun and limb in question landing, and then Gideon appeared.

He stood between Sally and Cat Mask, the barest flecks of blood visible on his nails. I was a little surprised the criminal wasn't screaming in pain, and then I noticed that I couldn't actually hear any noise coming from the booth he was in, even as he grabbed his stump of an arm and stomped about. Of course. Gideon was magically silencing him for the same reason he'd tossed the arm out of sight. He didn't want Sally to see or hear such things.

"You dare point a weapon at her? Make no mistake, pitiful creature, I have woven so many spells and protections around her that even another dragon would struggle to do her harm, yet for you to even attempt such a thing is a dire insult. An insult to me, which is bad, and to her, which is infinitely worse."

Unlike Richard, Gideon wasn't trying to be scary. He was calm, detached even, looking at Cat Mask and the other criminals as if they were no more concern than garbage in his path. In a way, that was much more terrifying than Richard's performance. I knew too well that Gideon could kill everyone in this carnival—hell, everyone in the state—with little effort and even less remorse. The only person I'd seen him show any concern or care for was Sally, and they'd just turned a gun on her. In that moment, I knew that Cat Mask had just gotten his entire gang killed. Richard might have been willing to let them be turned over to the cops, but Gideon wasn't nearly so kind-hearted.

As it turned out though, someone else was.

"Gideon, no." Sally reached out and grabbed him by the arm, yanking him back over in her direction. There was a surprising amount of authority in her voice; it was easy to see that she was indeed her father's daughter. "They didn't hurt me. Daddy and Bubba and Fred look okay, too. No blood. Not tonight. Don't ruin the carnival."

Gideon met her eyes, nodding over to the booth where Cat Mask was still silently stomping about. "That man would have happily done harm to you, your father, and his servants. The air reeks of bullets and gun smoke; that was the noise we heard earlier. They are bad people, Sally."

She crossed her arms and stared him down, refusing to budge an inch on the issue. "Everyone has good in them. No blood, Gideon. If you do, I won't . . . I won't talk to you or play with you for a whole week."

I genuinely had no idea what reaction to expect from such an ultimatum, but to my surprise, the ancient dragon tilted his head back and let out a genuine laugh. He was smiling as he finished, and he reached over, bringing Sally in close. Gently, he rested his forehead against hers, though his few extra inches of height meant he was leaning slightly to do so.

"My leardrun, you truly are too kind-hearted for this detestable world. But I cannot abide such punishment, so I have no choice in the matter. As you desire, no blood." His eyes darted down to the crimson stain on his nails. "No more blood, anyway. Yet these are still criminals. Will you at least permit me to restrain them until the agents arrive?"

"You won't hurt them?" Sally asked.

"Not so much as a scratch or a bruise. Words, only words, with perhaps a bit of magic to ensure my orders are truly heard. You have my promise." Gideon lifted his head up and slowly moved away from Sally. Once they were parted, he turned to the midway, where a gang of criminals in dirty animals masks looked like they didn't know if they should bolt, void their bladders, or beg for mercy. There really wasn't a wrong option in the situation: none of it would have mattered to Gideon. His punishment for their sins would be carried out no matter what.

"Humans. Pitiful, useless humans with lives as short as the flicker of a candle, be at ease. You will survive to see another sunrise. Her mercy has spared your pointless lives, so gather the few years remaining to you and clutch them close. They are a gift, given to you in spite of what you've done here. Use them well, greet every morning with the knowledge that your days were meant to end tonight, here in this battered old carnival."

Gideon had moved to the center of the midway, every eye upon him. I wasn't sure I could have looked away, even if I wanted to. His lavender irises were shining brightly, too brightly, and occasionally, I would catch glimpses of his shadow from the poorly burning bulbs of the carnival. Sometimes, it was the shadow of a child, but sometimes, often for only the span of a blink, it was something else. Something vast, and old, that made my eyes ache to look upon for even less than a heartbeat. From the booths, I could hear tears and sniffing. Behind those masks, the criminals were weeping. Not in joy; their hearts were racing much too fast. It was more like they were staring death in the eye, crying in terror at their utter helplessness. And that was the moment I understood that we were only getting part of the show. The humans were experiencing a speech that was worlds more potent, and horrifying.

“But with that gratitude, you should also greet each day fearfully.” Gideon was getting louder, his eyes brighter. I couldn’t look away, yet it hurt every second I watched him. “Tonight, you have learned the truth of the world. You now know why your ancestors flocked to the first fire, trying so hard to fend back the darkness. For it is not empty shadows as you’ve trained yourself to believe. You have regained the truth that your kind has fought so hard to deny: there are monsters in the darkness, waiting for the moment that you step away from the light. Remember that, when your time in cells is over and you’re tempted to slink back to another shaded hole like this one. Remember that there are worse things than humans who have stepped off the righteous path. Remember the nightmares who drove your kind toward the light in the first place. And remember me, above all else. Remember the beast with gnashing jaws and scaly hide, who rules over these shadowlands, devouring lesser nightmares. I will be watching, waiting, to see if you dirty her kindness with more wicked acts. And if you do, there is no force that can save you, pitiful, worthless humans.”

Gideon paused, letting a moment of silence wash over us all. He was smiling again, though this was nothing like the kind grin he’d shown Sally. Once, for a brief time, Gideon and I had been magically connected, and perhaps because of that, I could see too much in his smile. Millennia of blood, battle, war, pain, loss, and suffering, all of which he’d borne. There was no hubris in his words. He was a nearly unstoppable being, bound only by his pride and promises. As well as a single friendship to a small therian child.

“No one will help you. No one will save you. Not your drugs, not your guns, not your gods. For I am a force beyond your comprehension. I am a killer, a ruler, a king of these shadowed lands. And my name is dragon.”

At the last word, something in the air seemed to snap. It was like a brief wave of air washing over us, and when it was done, the spell was broken. Broken for the parahumans, anyway. Everyone wearing a mask had fallen to the ground, clutching themselves—some praying, some still weeping, some just babbling incoherently. Gideon had kept his word, though. None of them, aside from Cat Mask, had so much as a single scratch.

“Someone call the agents to clean these messes up,” Gideon commanded. His eyes, shadow, and voice were all mercifully back to normal. “I promised Sally that we would take a ride on the carousel.”

7.

The relationship between traditional law enforcement personnel and agents is a strange one. While the agents have higher clearances and the authority to get away with hand-waving off very reasonable questions from officers, the normal cops still always seems to know that something is off when they deal with one. That said, police officers are also generally experienced enough to see the difference between a fight they want to pick, and an easy win that it's better to just roll with.

Finding an entire gang of meth dealers ready and willing to surrender as soon as they saw flashing lights was just that sort of win. In the days to come, we'd learn that these people were originally employees of the maintenance company hired to keep the place up. One of them, Cat Mask, had seen the opportunity in a remote location with almost no oversight. He recruited some of his fellow workers and crooks, set up shop, and suddenly the carnival wasn't quite so abandoned anymore. As an added boon, Lonnie's grandfather had apparently done some bootlegging along with his moonshine business. That, or there was some other reason for hidden tunnels running between the attractions. The honeycomb of routes beneath the grounds allowed the meth dealers to vanish when the maintenance workers came through for their monthly cleaning. It was an ideal set-up, until a few parahumans came sniffing around looking to restore the place.

I sat on the lowered tailgate of Bubba's truck, watching as Krystal barked orders at several overworked and visibly annoyed officers. The night had taken such a strange turn. All I'd wanted was an evening out, getting my mind off my vacant assistant position. Which, to be fair, I hadn't really dwelt on since we arrived. But still . . . I'd been enjoying the work until things went crazy. This had been planned as a simple, normal gig. Sure, the owner was a therian, but a carnival was a carnival. It wasn't supposed to end in a gunfight. Staring at the once again closed gates, part of me wondered if it was always going to be like this. Were my days of routine work behind me for good? Sure, I liked the occasional burst of excitement; yet I'd also really treasured the straightforward task of normal accounting work. It seemed like the deeper I got into the parahuman world, the fewer and further between the mundane moments became. And as a freelance accountant for the Agency, I was in pretty damn deep by this point.

From behind a cop car, Gideon and Sally emerged. They'd finished up on the carousel before the police arrived and were now strolling about killing time while Richard finished giving a statement. Bubba and I had completed our conversations more quickly, since we were just hired help, while he needed to explain his presence here. It was strange to watch the children—well, one child and one dragon—knowing what Gideon had done to those people. I had tried to talk to a few of the crooks while we waited for Krystal, and none had let out more than gibberish and whimpering. They'd been broken on a fundamental level. Maybe they'd improve with time, but I doubted they'd ever truly recover. And that had been Gideon showing mercy. Even though I was a vampire, I'd still grown up human, with human ideals and morality instilled in me. I sometimes forgot that such wasn't the case with all supernatural creatures. They had their own ideas of right and wrong. Ideas I wasn't sure I ever wanted to fully understand.

The truck sank down as Bubba took a seat next to me on the open tailgate. He followed my eyes, staring at Gideon and Sally as they chatted with an officer who did her best to keep them from paying attention to the parade of criminals being marched to cars. Bless that woman's heart, she was trying to protect them from understanding what had happened. She had no idea that one of the children she wanted to shield was the very thing those hardened criminals were scared witless of.

"Why do I have a feeling there wasn't bourbon or vodka in that flask of yours?" I'm not sure where those words came from; I certainly hadn't planned on confronting Bubba about what I'd seen. But the moment I opened my mouth, that was what came out. Perhaps some part of me was dwelling on the night Amy had accidentally turned Bubba into a giant, flame-coated version of himself, which Lillian and I had needed to punch down so he could be cured.

"Amy's a determined gal. She ain't one to let a single failed experiment put her off course." At least he wasn't trying to deny it or play games. Dealing with Bubba was refreshing; he was one of the few people in my life who tended to shoot straight by habit.

"So that stuff would have done what? Turned you into Nightmare Bubba two-point-oh?"

"Nah, we passed that a long time ago. I think this is version eight or nine, but Amy's the one who keeps track of that." Reaching to his pocket, he tapped the top of the flask gently. "And it's a hell of lot better than the one you saw. I don't lose control anymore. Trust me, Fred, I wouldn't have even considered drinking the stuff around my friends if it wasn't safe. Especially with Sally on the scene."

I believed him. Bubba wasn't the sort of man to take careless risks with others' lives. I only wished he showed the same amount of concern for himself. "That's all well and good, but I don't see why you need it in the first place. You're plenty strong and tough on your own. And you help Richard as an assistant, not a mercenary. Why do you need more power so badly that you're willing to go to these sorts of lengths?"

Bubba laid his hand on the top of his truck bed, using it as an armrest. "First off, if you think working for the head therian of a tribe doesn't involve busting some heads, then you don't know jack about the job. But yeah, I can deal with most of that on my own. I grew up a runt, and that means I learned to handle myself early on. The potion is because . . ." He paused, rubbing his face and adjusting his ballcap.

"Damn it, Fred, I can't rightly explain this kind of shit to you. Since you got turned, you've always had more power than you needed. A little dollop of vampire strength is more than enough to get you through a life of crunching numbers. You don't know what it's like to be around people outside your weight class every day, dragons and mages and alpha therians who tolerate you, maybe even like you, but ain't your peers. Imagine you spent all your time around accountants with much higher educations and certifications than you've got, and they let you pitch in on the little stuff, but left you behind whenever a big case came in. Would you accept that? Be happy just to be hanging around? Or would you start upping your own education in the hopes of one day standing alongside them?"

"I guess I don't know," I admitted. It was strange. Though I tended to think of Bubba as vastly more experienced and powerful than me, the truth was that, in the therian world, his small shifted form did make him weak. Weaker than he should have been, at any rate. While I'd been mentally lumping him in with the likes of Richard, in truth, Bubba was probably closer in power to me than the head of the Winslow therians. "I'll try not to judge, Bubba. This is your life, and if Amy is the one making the potions, then at least I know she'll be safe. Just promise me you'll be careful going down this road. You're not our friend, any of us, because of your strength. You're our friend because you're you. And I think we'd rather have you be human than lose you entirely."

"Thanks. I appreciate . . . it means a lot." Bubba seemed to falter, his long speech having used up most of his words for the evening.

"Also, if you're trying to catch up to others, aim for Richard, not Gideon. I don't even want to imagine what kind of potion Amy would need to whip up to put us on his level."

"If that recipe existed, I think all the dragons would band together to destroy it," Bubba said. "They're not big on competition."

We looked over to Gideon and Sally again, the latter of whom was now wearing the policewoman's hat. "Do you know what leardrun means? I heard him call Sally that, but I've got no clue what language that even is."

Bubba nodded, albeit slowly. "It's draconic, doesn't have a perfect translation to any other language. The closest we'd get on the words is 'dear one,' but that can't really encompass the meaning. It's a word they use for a being they prize above all others, beyond life itself. There's no direct relationship implied. It can be used between friends, siblings, and spouses freely. What matters is the context of it, that the word is a pledge to shelter, aid, and protect their dear one in all situations, regardless of the cost. Dragons take their words, and their promises, very seriously.”

That more or less fit with what I’d guessed the meaning would be, although I’d underestimated the depth of the sentiment. To his credit, whatever else could be said of Gideon, I had always seen him treat Sally just as the word implied. There were legends of kings pleading with dragons lesser than he, only for their words to fall on deaf ears, but Sally had held Gideon back with only a simple demand.

“Do you think he loves her?” It was another question I hadn’t intended to ask, yet it popped out all the same.

“I don’t know if dragons have the same concept of love as we do,” Bubba replied. “I don’t know if Gideon is even capable of love. But I know that he’s devoted to her. He reshaped himself and lived as a child solely so that she would grow up with a friend and guardian at her side.” Bubba paused again, though this time, it wasn’t lack of words that stalled his tongue. He’d grown nervous at the topic, which was fair with Gideon so close; it would be foolish to assume he couldn’t hear us. “Fred, do you know what Sally is?”

“Not all the details, but . . .” I turned to him, not wishing to speak this out loud even if it wouldn’t fool Gideon. This was more for the sake of discretion; some things were not to be uttered in public regardless of circumstances. Carefully, I mouthed the word “Tiamat” before turning away. Gideon had explained part of the situation to me once, and while I didn’t have all the details of what made Sally into one, I knew that a tiamat was a being who could birth dragons, yet wasn’t subject to their issues with low conception rates. Tiamats were named after a dragon mother-goddess for that reason. “I don’t understand everything that comes with that, but that makes her special, right?”

“More than special. Crucial. If one only comes every thousand years, it’s a miracle. They need her, and he knows that. That’s why Gideon prizes her above even his own life. He’s just one dragon. Sally is vital to their entire species.”

“She’s just a kid.” I watched as Sally gave the woman back her hat, and for an instant, I saw Gideon’s gaze turn to us. There was no threat in his eyes, no smile promising bloodshed. He didn’t care that we were talking about them. He probably barely even cared that we existed. The only one he gave a damn about was standing at his side.

“For now. One day, she’ll grow up, and when that happens, a lot of dragons are going to try and make demands of her. If nothin’ else, I’m glad she’s got one in her corner. Gideon is dangerous, powerful, and ain’t got much regard for human life. But he’s promised to protect her, and I’ve never seen him break his word. Whatever is waiting for Sally on the other side of adulthood, at least Gideon will make sure she meets it on her terms. That’s more than the rest of us would be able to do for her.”

We were interrupted as Richard made his way over, finally released from police questioning. “Well, this whole thing turned into a pain in the ass. So help me, if I find out Lonnie had any idea of this, I’m going to knock his oversized teeth out.”

“Lonnie is a wererat. They ain’t known for their guts, and I sure as shit don’t expect he planned on a group of drugged-out crooks bringing you down,” Bubba said.

“All the same, I think I’m going to pass on this investment opportunity. Sorry to drag you both out here for nothing other than a shootout.”

My eyes finally left Gideon and Sally, turning once more to the gate of the carnival. “Actually, Richard, you should reconsider that.”

Richard looked at me like I’d just suggested he shave off his golden locks and start wearing a bright blue wig. “You’re joking. The place is a crime scene.”

“True, but eventually, it will be cleaned up,” I said. “And when that happens, you’ve got a carnival in surprisingly good shape that can be restored at a reasonable cost. But even better, you have a network of tunnels running underneath. With a little re-tooling of the rides, some shading and sun-proofing, along with bigger seats, you could make a carnival that was parahuman-friendly. You’ll tremendously expand your customer base. Plus, during October, let them visit in their natural states and poof: instant haunted park the likes of which no one else can match. There’s money to be made here, Richard. Bring in some experts to do a serious assessment and get real numbers, but I’m sure they’ll back me up on the profit potential. I might even throw in some cash of my own, if you’re open to other investors.”

He followed my eyes, staring past the gate to the worn-down carnival inside. Only now, he was seeing what it could be, instead of what it was. “If I was part-owner of this place, I could close it off occasionally so that Sally could come through without Gideon needing to kill anyone.”

“Bring along your friends and loyal employees, turn the whole thing into a morale-building event,” I added.

“All right, Fred, you’ve got me interested again. I’ll hire some pros to figure out what it will cost to turn this place around, then see if it’s worth the investment. You can stay in the loop, too, if you were serious about buying a stake.” Richard winced as soon as the word was out of his mouth. “Sorry, poor choice of phrase.”

I waved him off. “Don’t worry about it. And I’m definitely interested. It’s time to diversify my portfolio anyway, and I like the idea of putting cash into something that makes our town a little better.”

After the night we’d been through and what I’d seen Gideon do, maybe it was only a small bit of good to try and bring a place of fun and entertainment back to town. But it would still be some amount of positivity, and at that point, I was willing to take whatever I could get.

A Negotiation at the Table

1.

“Shirts, slacks, sweater vests, socks and sundries, shoes, my flask of blood, some backup blood in case we get trapped in a time loop, laptop, snake-bite kit, flashlight, rope, bottle of water, flare guns, a compass, a lock pick set, and a ten-pack of batteries. What do you think?”

Krystal stared at me from her seat next to the bed, occasionally peeking over the side of my suitcase to see if the items I was listing were really in there. “I think it sounds like you’re packing for a weekend at some sort of camping sex resort, not hanging out with a couple of mages. Snake-bite kit and a flashlight? Freddy, vampires don’t get poisoned by something as mundane as snakes, and you have perfect darkvision.”

“For now, I do. One random spell and for all we know: poof! Suddenly I’m as blind as a human in the shadows.”

“Okay, and the lock pick set? I’m pretty sure you have no idea how to use one of these,” Krystal said, reaching over and snapping it up from within the bag.

“True, but I have access to the internet, tutorial videos, and depending on what’s happening, I might be highly motivated.” I grabbed the lock pick set back and tossed it into my suitcase, along with the other odd accoutrements for the trip.

In all honestly, I knew Krystal was right and I was being a touch ridiculous, but I felt as though there was some merit to my attitude. Mages were one of the aspects of the parahuman world I understood the least. Therians and vampires, even demons and dragons, I could wrap my head around. Different species, the evolution of strange viruses or creatures that spawned in unique environments—there was a path to understanding those for one as rooted in a life of normalcy as me. But magic, and those who wielded it, was a whole other story. The mere idea that a few drops of herbs and spoken words could conjure power to defy the laws of nature was just a little too much. It hadn’t really been that bad at first. I considered what Amy did just exceptional use of natural plants and a bit of off-brand science. But then I’d spent several days in a time-bubble conjured by a pair of bickering mages: the Clover twins. That was when I’d first started to get a taste of just how far outside the bounds of reality magic was able to operate. I’d walked away more than happy to never get too involved with the practice of magic again.

And yet now I was going to meet a grand mage, which was apparently similar to, yet quite distinct from, an archmage. Amy had stopped by earlier that day to let me know that the head of her district—yes, it seems mages sorted themselves by districts in their hierarchy; news to me as well—had requested a meeting with me. Not as myself, mind you, a humble accountant able to help streamline most businesses. No, the grand mage was calling on me as the head of the House of Fred, one that Amy had joined in a show of solidarity last year. I'd known even then that there would be a price to pay for such things, so there was no chance I could, or would, shirk the duty. I just wished I had a better idea of what to pack.

"You sure you don't want me to tag along? There's bound to be some precedence we can use. I bet Arch will be able to think of something," Krystal offered.

Tempting as it was, I shook my head to the negative. "The grand mage requested a closed meeting, just me and Amy. This isn't Agency business; I don't have a good reason to bring an agent along for backup. Trust me, if I could think of a way to take you with me without starting us off on a bad foot, I'd use it in a heartbeat."

Krystal grinned, a touch of mischief in her smile. "I do make a great diplomacy asset. Like a hammer you can bust out and smash through a table."

"There is that, yes, but mostly I'd just like the opportunity to spend some time together. It feels like we've both been doing nothing but traveling over the past few weeks." To be fair, that had somewhat always been the case. It was in the nature of Krystal's job as an agent—she went where the trouble was. Only now, between taking on Agency work, coping with being down an assistant, and pitching in to help Richard with the carnival whenever I could, my own hours were at a premium as well. I'd been hoping to schedule a break over the weekend; however, it seemed that life had other plans.

Slowly, Krystal made her way around the bed and draped her arms over my shoulders. "I've missed you, too. Maybe once you wrap this up, I'll put in for some vacation time. If you work ahead and let Lillian handle the little stuff, I bet you could swing a long weekend. We could head down to Boarback, have a nice trip exploring the town, away from all the craziness."

"Personally, I wouldn't say no to a wine-tasting tour in Napa, or maybe a nice ski-cottage, but the details are up to you. All that matters to me is that we make some time for one another." I kissed her—not to drive the point home, but because she was nearby and I loved her. It had taken a lot of strange events in my life, up to and including a slight death, but I'd finally reached a point where I was comfortable in a relationship with someone. That wasn't something I planned to let slip away by taking it for granted.

"I'll put out some feelers to see what kind of dates I can get," Krystal said. "In the meantime, you need to finish packing. I bet there's a portable generator or set of drill bits you can still fit in your suitcase. Never know when you'll need those."

A crisp knock on the bedroom door dispelled our romantic mood. "Come in," I yelled. The door didn't open; however, Charlotte was standing in front of us a moment later, appearing in her usual form. It had taken a few tries and one powerpoint presentation, but she'd finally understood that, even if we knew she could see everything that happened within her walls, it was still easier for us all if she knocked before appearing in a room. It was a small illusion done for the sake of formality, yet it made a big difference in overall comfort. If we could delude ourselves into thinking we had privacy, that was enough.

"Fred, you requested notification when Amy had returned. She has arrived in the parking lot. At least, I assume the long golden Humvee limousine is hers. I'd have told you sooner, but I needed to look up what sort of vehicle it was online. Humans have taken their transportation in . . . curious directions."

It wasn't what I'd expected Amy to arrive in, but as a rule, I tried never to expect anything with Amy. She was a little too out there. Whatever I tried to predict was invariably wrong, so instead, I just resigned myself to always being surprised. Even with that attitude, my dismay over the vehicle in question must have shown on my face.

"Word to the wise, Freddy: Amy is a little more down-to-earth than most mages. You should be braced for more ostentatiousness than I think you're expecting." Krystal patted me, half with love and half with amusement, on the back. "A big-ass limo is not going to be the weirdest thing you see."

"So long as it has a driver and avoids the sun, I'll be fine," I assured her. "Amy is part of my parahuman clan. I'll be sure to represent her well."

"Just be you," Krystal told me. "Or a version of you that's thirty percent less skittish. And whatever happens, roll with it. Spell-casters love keeping normal folk off-balance. Don't try to question things too deeply. Accept the reality you have to work with, and power through."

"The more you talk, the more I regret not finding a way to bring you along." I finished packing my suitcase and zipped it up, hefting it off the bed easily. "Charlotte, you were constructed by mages. Is there any advice you'd like to offer?"

She hesitated, as she always did when discussion of her previous tenants surfaced. If I'd been less hurried and more considerate, I would have realized the question might be too personal. Just as I was about to apologize and retract the inquiry, however, Charlotte answered.

"Mages are humans at their core. Humans whose bodies are altered by constant exposure to magic, and who age at a decelerated rate, but still humans. They enjoy and indulge in the culture of other humans, but because of their dedication to the craft and their unique relationship with time, it's not uncommon for a higher-ranked mage to get . . . stuck, for lack of a better term, during whatever culture was predominant the last time they dealt with normal humans. Case in point: of my builders, one favored fashions from the revolutionary war, one enjoyed Victorian sensibilities, and one embraced the simple rustic look of farmers. So if you meet people who seem a bit out of place, as Krystal already encouraged you, just roll with it. And keep in mind that a mage's power is not like a vampire's bite: it is transferred through knowledge and practice, not a simple swapping of blood. Every mage you meet is capable and dangerous, if they wish to be."

Part of me really wanted to ask about the clothing thing; just how long did mages live past normal human lives? Unfortunately, time wasn't on my side, and I already felt like I'd pried deeper than was respectful into Charlotte's past. I nodded my head in thanks, gave Krystal a quick peck as a goodbye, and headed down the stairs with my suitcase in hand.

Sure enough, waiting out in the parking lot was a huge, golden Humvee limo. I could smell the exhaust before the front door was even open, and as I darted across the parking lot, I wondered how much of the tank had been burned off simply waiting for me to finish packing. Making my way to the back, I pulled open the door to find Amy already seated, her normally brown hair glowing a soft cerulean and a glass of champagne, clearly poured from the included bar, in her hand. She offered it to me as I took a seat, though I declined.

"Before you say anything, this wasn't my idea." Amy took a long drink from the glass I'd refused, quickly finished it off, and poured herself another. "Cyndi promised to handle transportation, since she was calling the meeting, and this is what showed up. I think she might want to impress you."

"It is quite the overt display of—hang on, did you say the grand mage I'm meeting is named Cyndi?" Of all the things to get hung up on, I'll admit it was an odd one, but that was what leapt out at me in the moment. "Sorry, I suppose I expected something grander, like Merlin or Gandalf—"

"Or Amy? Or Neil?" She chuckled under her breath as she took another drink of champagne. "We start off as humans, remember. A few take new names when they get to new ranks, but it's a lot of pain in the ass for very little gain. Get that hokey D&D shit out of your head, otherwise you're going to be in for a really tiring trip."

"Speaking of Neil, where is your apprentice tonight?" I asked. Neil was, technically, a part of my clan as well, so if this concerned Amy, it stood to reason he might need to be present.

"As far from this shit as I can keep him." Amy's relaxed expression hardened for a brief moment before fading away in the calming glow of her hair. "Dealing with the kinds of mages who care about status and rank is the sort of thing he needs to be ready for. For as long as I can swing it, he stays away from the politics of this job."

I settled in, placing my suitcase to my side and buckling my seatbelt as the massive vehicle lurched into motion. "Interesting. I never expected riages to have much in the way of politics.”

With a grim stare, Amy grabbed the champagne bottle and topped her glass off once more. “Then you’d better brace for a lot of surprises, Fred. Otherwise, we’ll both end up floating on shit creek.”

2.

Our drive was a surprisingly brief one. The limo got onto the highway for approximately forty-five minutes—enough time for me to mentally go through nine scenarios in which I said the wrong thing and got us all killed—before turning off on an exit that led to a small farm-road. Twenty more minutes of driving through trees and dirt roads, some of which I was legitimately certain would be too tough for the limo to navigate, eventually led us to a faded red barn in the middle of a field. The doors unlocked as we arrived, and Amy immediately began to exit, so I followed her lead. As I grabbed my suitcase, I tried very hard not to dwell on the fact that this was exactly the sort of place where it would be easy to kill us and destroy our bodies.

The unseen driver kept the lights of our limo on as we disembarked, making sure the barn's front doors were well illuminated. Hardly a subtle hint, but at least we didn't have to waste time guessing where we'd be headed. Amy took the lead; her small backpack (that I knew held more than it appeared to) was tossed over her shoulder as she trekked through the field without hesitation. It was a strange sight, and not just because we were in the backend of nowhere during the middle of the night. Among the huge bodies and personalities of our friends, Amy often tended to slide into the background. She seemed happy there—part of the action, yet away from its center, around the warm glow of friends without always needing to be engaged. However, that didn't mean Amy wasn't a brilliant, capable person in her own right. I'd heard many a time from different sources how highly regarded her work was considered, and as I watched her plow ahead to the mysterious barn without so much as losing a step, I could see the sort of steadfast determination that might account for such a reputation.

The door opened before Amy arrived, albeit only by a few seconds. It slid itself ajar, revealing an empty barn, which I should have expected, yet which still caught me off guard. Amy wasn't put off in the slightest. She kept right on walking, passing the forgotten hay bales and empty pens, keeping on track for a door near the back of the barn. I missed it the first time I scanned the room; in fact, even when Amy stepped right next to it, I had to squint and focus to notice the cream-colored door. Unlike the rest of this place, it was clearly new, with golden symbols painted all along the edges and around the knob. Amy paused for the first time since leaving the limo, looking over her shoulder to me.

"I'm pretty sure you've already figured this out, but the door isn't just going to lead us out of the barn. I don't know where we're going, mind you; only that it won't be here. Cyndi can be a bit distrustful at times, so she tends to prepare all her meetings in secure locations. Anchoring doorways at meeting points is the easiest way to get people there without having them know where they're going."

"Hang on. So we're going to teleport?" You'd think after being stuck outside time this wouldn't have seemed like so big of deal, but it was still something I'd yet to encounter. Even Krystal and Arch took planes to get around, so if teleportation existed, I'd assumed the Agency would use it.

"Technically, no. It's more like space has been folded over on itself inside the small span of this door. We're going to step over all the space between and arrive at the destination instantly. Very different from pure teleportation, and please don't ask me to explain it in more detail than that. The whole thing is highly theoretical. Doing the spell requires an expertise in conjuration, and setting it in a door is only an option for those with a subspecialty in enchanting. Spatial rearrangement is a talent of Cyndi's though, so you don't need to worry about anything going wrong in transport."

I actually hadn't even considered the idea until Amy mentioned it. I'd just been wrapping my head around the idea of teleportation; it hadn't yet occurred to me that the fact the spell existed didn't mean it would necessarily go perfectly. I'd seen the trial-and-error nature of magic firsthand during my friendship with Amy, and none of that had involved hurling people across rifts in space. Suddenly, I could understand why the Agency might prefer to stick with planes.

Given enough time, I'd have worked myself into quite a panic, which was perhaps why Amy didn't give me the chance. She pulled open the door, revealing a white hallway, and stepped through. I followed quickly, afraid that without her around, I might never find the door again after it closed. My movements were so quick that before I even noticed, I'd passed through the doorway. It was completely painless, not so much as even a tingle or a buzz in the ears as I literally stepped across unknown space to arrive at my new destination.

It was sunny. I noticed that right away, my survival instincts kicking into full gear as I held up the suitcase to try and shield myself from the glowing rays. After a few seconds of hiding, I noticed that the bits of me that had touched the light were neither cooked nor smoking, so I lowered my bag to take a better look. All of the sunlight was coming through glass, and I could make out a few runes engraved on every pane. Enchanted glass to keep the sunlight from hurting vampires, clearly, though this was a step above what I'd seen before. Generally, the stuff always came with at least some amount of tinting, but these panes were so clear it was like I was looking at the sky. I stood there, numb to the rest of my surroundings, as I looked up at the sun. How long had it been since I saw it like this? My eyes watered, perhaps from the bright light, more likely from sentiment, though I wiped them and remembered myself before I lost all sense of composure. I'd come to do a job, and I couldn't afford distractions, no matter how beautiful they were.

When I'd first looked through the door—a door I turned around and realized was no long present—I'd taken the white hallway to look sterile. And compared to a filthy, abandoned night barn, it had seemed that way. But these weren't the white halls of a hospital or government building. No, these were white because they were meant to glow in the sun which came in from all angles, lighting the room and the beautiful turquoise water only steps away. We were at a beach house—a spacious and modern one at that. Had they always used a glass that was vampire friendly, or was it retrofitted just for this meeting? It was a strong message, if they'd done it intentionally. An olive branch to give me something I'd thought forever lost, but also a threat to remind me how vulnerable I was here.

Following the hallway, I turned to find myself in a vast, stainless steel kitchen. In all my excitement about the sunshine coming in from the ceiling, I hadn't noticed the music playing in the background, but now that I'd made the turn, it was impossible to ignore. While the tune was one I couldn't quite place, the amount of synthesizer and general style made it abundantly obvious that this was music from the eighties. For a second, I wondered if I'd somehow jumped through time as well as space when I caught sight of the woman standing in the kitchen, dancing and cooking eggs even as she greeted Amy.

She wore her light hair in a simple braid which fell halfway down the back of her denim vest atop a garishly bright shirt, a combination that went surprisingly well with the choice of brightly colored tights and leg warmers for her bottom half. At first, I hadn't really grasped what Charlotte meant when she said mages sometimes got stuck in moments of culture, but as I stared at this woman who looked for all intents and purposes like she'd stepped out of a portal in time, it clicked nicely.

“Grand Mage Cyndi Gussoff?”

The woman winced at my voice, twirling around in time with the beat and waving a spatula at me. “No need for titles, Mr. Fletcher. We're at my home; you can just call me Cyndi. Also, how do you like your eggs?”

“Over-easy,” I replied, trying for all I was worth to look unbothered by the curious greeting. Krystal and Charlotte had both said to roll with it, so I was doing my damndest to roll like the best of them. “And if we're eschewing titles, please call me Fred.”

A curious, cheerful gaze greeted my request. “Interesting. You know, you're the first vampire I've ever dealt with who didn't fight me on ignoring titles. Not to mention took me up on the eggs. Usually you folks are stuffier, and strict about sticking to blood.”

“I'm still a relatively new vampire, all things considered. I was only turned a few years ago. Perhaps the stuffiness comes with age.” I walked over and took a seat next to Amy, who had grabbed a bar stool at the kitchen's counter and hunkered down. "As for food . . . well, I spent most of my life human. Blood is delectable, but there many other flavors to enjoy."

"Why am I not surprised that Amy managed to find the only fun vampire out there?" Cyndi cracked two more eggs into a fresh pan—one I wasn't sure had been on the stove moments prior—and let them cook.

"To be fair, I'm the least fun member of my clan. If I'd brought along Lillian, you'd have seen a vampire with far more appetite for life than I have."

Cyndi poked the eggs gently with her spatula. "Appetite is never the issue I run into with vampires; you've all got plenty of that. But most of the time, it's for the life that's flowing through our veins. That's why I was a bit concerned when one of our top earners suddenly lined herself up with a gentleman of your . . . persuasion. Amy is an up-and-comer in the magical world, you know. We've all got a lot of hope for what she'll accomplish one day. So you'll forgive me for wanting to meet this vampire of hers in person, just to make sure everything is on the up-and-up. You wouldn't be the first to blackmail or trap a mage and turn them into a living meal."

It was a fair concern, and one I'd been braced for. The vampire stereotypes were dangerous and well-earned. Even having only met a few, I could understand her worry. "Let me assure you, Gran—er, Cyndi, that I would never hurt Amy, or any of my clan members in such a manner. We are friends, first and foremost, and treat one another with the respect entailed in such a relationship."

"That's what everyone I talked to about you said, which is why I decided to have this meeting and see for myself," Cyndi replied. "But let's save the nitty-gritty for after breakfast. My family had a rule that I've kept with me through the years: no politics, religion, or business during meal times. We're going to talk, at length, Fred. Just not until after breakfast."

I contemplated pushing the matter, but Amy shook her head as my mouth opened. Evidently, this wasn't a trick or a test, which meant my only polite recourse was to respect the rules of her dinner table while I was a guest in her home. It was nerve-racking, yet also a bit reassuring. After the nightmare of dealing with Petre and the Turva clan, a simple request for peace over a meal felt strangely grounded.

Teleportation and eggs. If the level of weirdness stayed this high, I might just be able to hold my own until the end.

3.

The eggs were quite good, which was surprising. Not because I'd assumed a high-ranking mage would be unable to cook, but because I never actually saw Cyndi do anything more than dump the eggs into a pan and heat them up while we made small talk. I'll admit, I'm not a veteran chef; however, even I know the importance of things like salt and pepper in basic dishes. Yet, when they arrived on a plate in front of me, the eggs were seasoned with shredded cheese and diced chives atop them. As far as magic went, I doubt it ranked higher than a parlor trick, but I was still a bit impressed as I went to work on breakfast.

Amy, on the other hand, may not have even tasted her food. She blazed through it, stuffing the eggs down as quickly as Cyndi could fill her plate. Granted, Amy had always been one with a prodigious appetite, but there was something different about this. It was like she was stress-eating, trying to hide her nerves in her plate. That was both interesting and worrisome; Amy was never the type to get anxious. Even when we'd been stuck in a room with therian lackeys pounding on the door, trying to find a way to free Gideon from a magical prison, Amy had kept her cool. But this cheerful woman with dated fashion had put her on edge, and I trusted Amy's judgment enough to take note of that. Nice as Cyndi was acting, that didn't change the fact that this was a formal visit, not a social one.

At last the final helping of eggs was consumed, Cyndi managing to put away nearly as many helpings as Amy. Part of me wondered if something about using magic sped up one's metabolism, but there wasn't time to ask before Cyndi dropped her plate into the sink. I winced, waiting for the smash or clatter, yet there was only silence.

"Don't worry, Fred," Cyndi assured me, clearly taking note of my reaction. "The plates can't be broken. They were only partially real to begin with. Once their purpose was served, they fell all the way back to not existing."

I glanced at Amy, wondering if there was clarification on the way, but in response, she simply hurled her own plate over her shoulder. Quick as I spun to watch it fall, the plate vanished in the fraction of a moment it left my sight, or perhaps it ceased to exist altogether. Taking a moment, I steadied myself, keeping in mind that there would be many things I didn't understand when dealing with mages. What mattered wasn't knowing how these things worked, I had merely to accept that they did and work within that reality. It was the only way I'd make it through this without getting hopelessly sidetracked.

"Thank you for the lovely meal." I scooped up my own plate and set it carefully into the sink, purposefully not looking to see whether it was still there or not once I let go. “It’s been some time since I did breakfast late at night, which is what time my internal clock believes it to be. Speaking of, Cyndi, do you mind if I ask where we are? Given the change from night to day, I can only imagine we crossed quite a distance.”

“It’s a fair question, but not one you’ll be getting an answer to.” Somehow, Cyndi managed to still sound cheerful even as she turned me down. “The politics of magic are not always above board, so I make it a point not to let the location of my homes or myself at any given time become widely known. As for the sunshine, don’t overthink it too much.” Looking around as though there might be people listening, she waved me in close, and then whispered loudly in my ear. “It’s imported.”

It was right about here that I began to consider the possibility that Cyndi was less eccentric than she seemed and might be outright messing with me for her amusement. Whether that was the case or not, I was still a guest in her home, so I held my tongue and looked perplexed, which wasn’t a very hard look to pull off given how I felt. “What mages can do truly seems to be astounding. Now that breakfast is done, however, may I ask if it’s proper to begin our official discussions?”

“Asking permission to start . . . you might be the most polite vampire I’ve ever met, Fred.” Grabbing a towel, Cyndi cleaned off her hands and motioned to the living room, where a pair of large, overstuffed golden couches were waiting. I’ll give Cyndi this: the woman picked a signature color and stuck with it. We made our way over, Amy and I taking one couch, and Cyndi sitting on the other.

There was a lot of silence as we sat there, until Cyndi snapped her fingers once. I blinked in surprise, and when my eyes opened, there were three champagne flutes filled with bubbling orange liquid on the coffee table between us. “Can’t very well do brunch business without mimosas,” Cyndi said, reaching out and taking one. I mirrored her, though I made no motion to actually drink from the glass. Alcohol might not mean much to an undead constitution; however, I’d been around Amy long enough to know there were plenty of other chemicals that could rob me of my wits. She seemed to be thinking similarly, as Amy sprinkled a bit of purple powder over her own drink before gulping it down.

“Let’s get down to business, as you’ve requested.” If Cyndi was bothered by me not drinking, she hid it well, taking a long drink from her own glass without so much as a waver in her smile. “Fred, you may not realize this, but Amy is a very special alchemist. Her natural talent is incredible, her magical capacity means that one day she could be an archmage, and she’s received personal lessons from the King of the West. I know we mages are mere humans with cheap tricks to you real supernatural creatures, but you’ll find—”

“I beg your pardon?” The words slipped out, and if I could have blushed, I would have. Interrupting someone during such a formal occasion was the height of rudeness, and I knew far better than to let such a failing of the tongue occur. “I’m so sorry, that came out in surprise. I didn’t mean to interrupt. Please, continue.”

“No, let’s halt here for a moment. What did I say that took you off guard?” She leaned in, just a little, and I caught a hungry glint in her eye, not unlike how she’d stared down at the eggs.

“It’s just . . . your comment about me thinking less of mages. I was surprised to hear such an expectation. The things you all can do . . . I feel like I’ve barely scratched the surface, and it’s mind-blowing. Do the other parahumans really look down on you?”

Cyndi took a long draw of her mimosa and turned her eyes to Amy. “He sounds curiously sincere.”

The champagne flute in Amy’s hand was turned up, bottom in the air as she finished draining it. I also noted that her glowing hair had shifted color to a lavender shade, one that seemed to be actively moving around as I looked at it. “Fred is a bit of an odd one. Abandoned vampire, so the old prejudices weren’t bred into him.”

“I see. That would account for much.” Cyndi turned back to me, still grinning. “To answer your question, Fred, mages are rarely granted the same respect as other parahumans, until they need something from us. Because our skills can be learned, theoretically every human could be a mage, which they believe cheapens what we do. Never mind the fact that anyone can also paint, yet only a few will be true masters of the craft, while many will merely push colors around a canvas. The mere fact that our skills are teachable is a strike against us. Again, until they need something.”

“For what it’s worth, I know Amy is special, even among people who wield magic, and I value her highly. As a friend, and as an alchemist.” In truth, the former was the only real part I’d ever looked for in Amy. While her skill with potions and the like had helped our friends many a time, I’d never needed much from her in the way of magic.

That seemed to please Cyndi. She settled deeper into her couch, pushing herself back against the cushions. “Well, this meeting is going better than I’d dared to hope. Very well, Fred. You seem like a genuine fellow. Plus, you didn’t trip any of the wards I set up to detect dishonesty, and Amy isn’t flashing any of the secret signals to indicate that she needs help, so it appears to me that there’s nothing unsavory afoot here. A mage belonging to a vampire’s clan is unorthodox and strange, but as a whole, we mages tend to be less hung up on tradition than some of the older parahumans. If she’s happy being with you, and you’re happy having her, then I don’t see why you’d need me to intervene.”

I started to relax, right up until I felt something land on my lap. Glancing down, I found myself staring at a stack of white papers, all neatly typed-out. “What’s this?”

“Just crossing the Ts and dotting the Is,” Cyndi said. She swirled her glass in her hand, and it refilled with mimosa before my eyes. “Since Amy is part of your clan, you could technically use that position to try and force her out of various contracts, or into renegotiations for deals long settled. That contract is you waiving the right to cause such mischief. You don’t seem the type to start trouble, but the higher-ups will only be at peace once you show them that by signing.”

I picked up the contract, eyeing Amy carefully as I did. She still looked nervous, but not outright bothered. If she was worried about something, this contract probably wasn’t it. Still, I’d spent far too long in the business sector to sign anything without reading it carefully. Taking a cursory flip through the pages, I noticed that I wouldn’t be signing away any more rights than what Cyndi had indicated, but there were a lot of those rights I’d be giving up. Just how much power did a leader have over his clan?

“If you don’t mind, I’d like to read this thoroughly,” I said.

“Of course,” Cyndi replied. “I’d expect nothing less. I’ve got an office you can use; please look over it until you are absolutely satisfied.”

“Great.” I took the pages and stood, putting my mimosa back on the coffee table, untouched. “While I’m at it, would you mind if I looked at copies of all the contracts Amy is currently beholden to? Wouldn’t be very smart of me to sign away these rights without knowing if she might need some renegotiation help.”

“Certainly. They’ll be in the office when you arrive.” Despite the agreeable words, I noticed that Cyndi’s smile dipped, just for a moment, at my request. It was too late to retract it though, and even if I could, it wouldn’t have been a wise move. There was something in those contracts that the mages didn’t want me to see, which meant I needed to hunt it down. Knowledge was always useful after all, especially when they might have a grip on one of my good friends.

4.

Mage contracts, as I learned that day, were extremely arcane. I realize that sounds like I'm trying to be cute and make something of a pun, so let me pause to assure you that I mean the word exactly as it was intended: these contracts used outdated terms and language that was highly difficult for anyone not exceptionally well-versed in business matters. While my own contract was simple and straightforward, the ones that Amy had signed were a whole other level of complexity. I spent several hours looking through them, using my laptop to cross-check digital books on parahuman law, and by the end, I had reached an undeniable conclusion: Amy was getting screwed.

Her business, which had originally been funded by more established mages who covered the start-up costs, was paying back huge percentages every month for interest rates that ballooned and escalated seemingly almost at random. Whoever had built these trappings was a fiscal wizard; they'd set Amy up so that no matter how her business grew, it was virtually impossible for her to get out of the initially incurred debt, in spite of the fact that she'd now paid off the amount by nearly ten times over. It was no wonder they didn't want anyone having the power to force a renegotiation for any of Amy's contracts. Cyndi could have probably paid for this beach house and all the "imported" sunshine off Amy's previous year's payments alone. Did she have any idea how badly she was getting screwed, or was she, like so many parahumans before her, just cutting a check every month without really questioning where it all went? It was the biggest failing I'd found in the supernatural world: no one bothered to understand the ins and outs of their financial burdens the way they should have. Someone really needed to start an education outreach program, or something along those lines.

For now, however, I had my plate full with Amy's situation. My first impulse was to kick down the door, stride into the living room, and boldly declare that we would be voiding everything she signed and the mages could go to hell if they didn't like it. I quickly tossed that idea aside for several reasons, firstly being that I didn't know if I actually had the authority to do that, and secondly because I'd never really been the type for striding or bold declarations. While the second issue wasn't going away anytime soon, I did have the power to change the first problem. Cyndi had, mercifully, left the wi-fi password along with my stack of contracts in the office—a room that was mostly tasteful, aside from the framed album covers of eighties bands—so I composed an email to the only lawyer who dealt with parahumans that I knew and trusted: Asha Patel. Finances I could handle, but for this, I was going to require a precise understanding of the laws applying to me, Amy, and Cyndi, so it was time to consult an expert. Hopefully by now, it was approaching morning in Colorado, so she'd see the email and get back to me. I'd have texted as well, just to cover my bases, but there was zero reception inside Cyndi's beach house. Given her concerns over privacy, it was hard to begrudge her that, though it did make my task more difficult.

That done, I shut my laptop and headed back to the living room, where I found Amy still seated on the couch. She'd pulled a book from her bag, some weighty tome with a language I didn't speak, and was deep in its thrall when I entered. At least, I thought she was until she spoke, eyes never leaving the page. "You finish signing yet? I'd rather not stay here any longer than we have to."

I looked around, scanning for Cyndi's bubbly presence, but her braid and denim were nowhere to be seen. "Where's our host?"

"Went to check on some experiments and take a dip on the beach," Amy replied. "She tried to make small talk after you left, but eventually she got the hint that I wasn't interested."

"Why not?" I sat down on the couch opposite Amy, where Cyndi had been before. "Granted, the fashion is a bit odd, but she seems nice enough."

"Cyndi's fine for what she is; I just don't enjoy associating with anyone like her." Amy let out a long sigh, closing the book and dropping it into her bag. "It's hard to explain what magic is to someone who has never held it or molded it, but trust me when I say that it's incredible. The feeling . . . try to imagine holding the power of creation between your palms, shaping reality with your will, altering the very composition of existence, even on a small scale. Every mage who has reached journeyman-level has felt that experience, but instead of chasing after it, some of them do what Cyndi did. They have the world's greatest miracle in their grasp, and rather than devoting themselves to studying and understanding it, they get caught up in the politics of deciding who should wield what. She could be an archmage by now, if she hadn't decided to become a politician."

I'd heard magic referred to as an art before—even Cyndi had compared them to painters just a few hours ago—but it wasn't until that moment that I truly understood that Amy saw herself as an artist as well as a scientist. It certainly explained some of her more reckless, impulsive behaviors through the years. She was swept up in her craft, taking bold risks and experimenting on herself to achieve that fleeting sense of perfection. But it also meant that I needed to rethink my plan for her contracts. Bad deals though they were, I wasn't the one bound to them. Being a leader didn't mean deciding what was right for the people trusting me, it meant finding out what they wanted, and then fighting for that.

"If you'd like me to, I'll sign the contracts right now and we can leave," I offered. "However, I feel you should know that the deals you're already in are terrible. They're gutting your finances deeply, and if we can push the terms even a little bit, we could drastically change how much income you're keeping. That's only if you want to, though. If you're happy with things as they are, then that's all I need to hear. And if you're not, then I'll use every ounce of leverage my position offers to get you into better deals."

"Fucking money. It always comes back to that, doesn't it? You know, when I first found magic, when I first discovered how much more there was to the world than what I'd been led to believe, I thought this kind of shit was behind me. Who would spend a lifetime chasing the almighty dollar when there was fucking magic in the world, right?" Amy reached into her bag and pulled out a bottle that had once been full of water, but was currently holding something that looked like blue lava. She sipped it slowly, the veins under her skin glowing visibly once she did. "Turns out, even the power to reshape the world around us has a dollar value tacked on. What am I going to do if I get more of it? I like my house, and my lab. I make enough to do my research, and I never miss rent. I just can't see how it's worth the fight."

"For you, it's probably not," I said. And that was true. While they were gouging Amy left and right, she was a highly valued alchemist with a robust list of clients, including the King of the West. She made enough to be fine. "But it is worth noting that nothing about that contract seemed tailored to you, Amy. Most of it looked like boilerplate. I think they've used those terms to get a lot of new mages under their thumbs, people who didn't know any better or couldn't imagine they'd need to get a contract vetted after just discovering magic. If you had more of your own income, you could afford to invest in new mages yourself, offering them much more fair conditions than what they'd otherwise see."

Amy took a long gulp from her lava drink, her veins shining so brightly that, for a moment, I could actually see the blood pumping through them. I had no idea what that, or any of her other potions, did. She was constantly fiddling with her own chemistry, brain and body, which probably should have made me concerned. But at the end of the day, there were few people I knew who showed as much wisdom and keen judgment when it mattered as Amy had in the past. Sure, she'd also gotten messed up on her own product before, and had caused us to hunt through a park for her; however, that was during a peaceful moment. In the clutch, Amy was someone I could count on. So I waited, patient and silent, as she considered all the things she might be able to do with more of her income left in her own hands.

"I really don't want to deal with any of that." It was a disappointing answer; however, I resolved myself to respect Amy's wishes. As it turned out though, she wasn't done speaking yet. "It sounds like a huge pain in the ass. All I want to do is work on my magic, hang out with my friends, and maybe hit a nice buffet here and there. Even if you were able to do something with my contracts, it would be this big ordeal and probably get a lot of other mages chapped at me. Then I'd actually have to deal with doing the investing and what-not, which is even more trouble and a drain on my time. No, I'm not doing that stuff. But at the same time, you're right. If I turn a blind eye to the shit the older mages are pulling, I become complicit in it, and I'm not cool with that either. Since both options suck, I'm going to just hand all of that shit over to my business manager. And since you're the only one here, I guess that's you, Fred."

"Flattered as I am by the offer, are you sure you wouldn't prefer to find someone more qualified?" I asked. "I know next to nothing about mages or how they work."

"But you've got lots of time to figure it out. It's not like I'm going to have enough spare cash to start funding new mages right out of the gate." Amy caught sight of the expression on my face and let out a low whistle. "Wait, I will? Just how much are these jerks taking every month?"

"Let's just say that if I cut your payments in half and take ten percent of the savings as my fee, you'll still be one of my most lucrative clients."

"Damn. Okay, so we'll take some time to figure things out while we let the cash grow, assuming you even can bust me out of those contracts at all." Amy finished off her bottle and got up from the couch. "I trust you, Fred. Do your best to handle this, and when the dust settles, we'll go from there. You've got my permission to renegotiate on my behalf, if you've got the grounds to do so. Just try not to take too long. This place kind of gives me the willies."

Looking around, I took in all the sunshine coming in from every angle. The more I stayed here, the less it seemed like a warm welcome, and the more it felt like an implicit threat. If the glass broke, I'd have almost nowhere to hide. It was a subtle form of intimidation, and one I might have been imagining; however, I didn't put it past Cyndi. It seemed mages counted on being underestimated by other parahumans, and that wasn't a mistake I planned to make.

"Hopefully it won't be long," I assured Amy. "As soon as I hear back from Asha, we can get this started."

5.

Neither stalling nor feigning ignorance had ever been skills I possessed much talent with, which made me deeply thankful that Cyndi didn't try to hurry me along throughout the day. She only popped in twice—once to let me know lunch was being cooked, and once to bring along a nice pressed sandwich with a side of homemade slaw. I couldn't fault her as a host; if nothing else, she was considerate of her guests while still offering personal space. And that was a good thing, because it took several hours for Asha to get back to me.

Not that I was sitting on my duff the whole time, by any means. While Asha calculated my angles of approach, I was working on a new set of contracts for Amy. I built a few variations, depending on how much leverage I would actually be walking into the negotiation with, but all of them were built around the idea of reorganizing Amy's "debt" (I hesitate to use the word, truthfully, since the principal sum had been so thoroughly paid off) and getting her paid out entirely from the burden in the next few years. Timelines and numbers were tweaked so that I'd have wiggle room; however, even the most placating of options was still fairly aggressive. They'd been screwing over my friend, and I knew it, and I wanted them to know that I'd caught them.

By the time Asha's return email arrived, I was more or less ready to present, and the news she sent was quite encouraging. In parahuman terms, my role as the head of a clan was something like a parent or guardian in the mundane world. I had to give permission for any of my people to enter serious fiscal or legal arrangements, and deals lacking such permission were retroactively suspect until finalized. It was, in truth, a lot more power and responsibility than I was comfortable having over anyone. For once though, I managed to keep things in perspective. What I was entitled to do and what I did were wholly different values; the power was only bad if it was abused. At that moment, the work I was doing came with Amy's blessing, so I was still seeing her wishes through like I would for any client. It was like holding a power-of-attorney, nothing more, and I promised myself to never let it grow beyond that.

Armed with legal backing and a slew of potential contracts, I finally emerged from the office, just in time for what was ostensibly dinner, although it was hard to mark any change of time in this beach house. The sun never moved. The house was always flooded with a gentle, yet full light, like one would encounter in early morning. Part of me wondered if Cyndi only dismissed it when she slept. Another piece of me questioned if she slept at all.

"Fred, so lovely to see you," Cyndi called. This time, she had apparently skipped the cooking, as there were a stack of pizza boxes lined up on the counter. "Don't worry, I told them firmly no garlic anywhere on the pizza.”

“I greatly appreciate the consideration, and I’m pleased to report that I’ve finished looking over the contracts.”

“Good for you. Those things are dreadful, aren’t they? So thick and technical, I can’t believe you managed to read them all. And in just one day, too. Very impressive.” She tore into a piece of pepperoni, leaving me unsure of whether she was joking with me or not. Cyndi had obviously done some homework; she must know I ran an accounting firm. Did she really think I wouldn’t be able to parse through their contracts? I glanced to Amy for clarification, but she merely shrugged her shoulders and grabbed a slice of mushroom-and-onion pizza from a different box.

“Now that you’re done with the reading, I assume you’ve signed your contract and we can finally relax and get to know one another. I’ve got a few board games in the closet we can play, or I could transport us all to somewhere nice at nighttime. I haven’t been to Paris in a few weeks; that might make for a good trip.”

“Cyndi, forgive me if I misspoke and led you to a false conclusion.” No sense in putting this off; she was going to realize sooner or later that railroading us toward fun wouldn’t deter me from my job. “I have not signed anything, nor do I intend to do so.”

Her slice of pizza froze halfway to her lips, lowering slightly as she turned to look at me better. “Oh? And why is that?”

“Because I fully intend to exercise my rights as the leader of the House of Fred in relation to the mage Amy Wells. Primarily, my capacity to overturn existing contracts in favor of renegotiation. If you’d like to set up a time for a formal discussion of the issue, I’d be more than willing to accommodate that. You’ve been a gracious host, and isn’t my intent to try and catch you off guard and unprepared, so we can adjourn if needed.” I was dearly hoping Cyndi would take me up on the offer, because I was still a little too aware of just how much home field-advantage she held in our current situation. The law was on my side, yes, but we were in a sunlight-filled house where she seemed to freely manipulate matter.

“I see. You disappoint me, Fred. For a moment, I really thought you were going to be different, but it seems you’re just another ‘true’ parahuman looking to use mages. The only difference is that you’ll be squeezing one for coins rather than magic or blood.”

Cyndi rose from her seat at the bar, placid look and grin both quickly dissolving. What remained in their place was a set of fierce, determined eyes, the sort that belonged to someone smart and dedicated enough to have achieved such mastery over the domain of magic. The tension in the air nearly crackled, and it might actually have sparked a few times—with magic, nothing is off the table. Before Cyndi could unleash either a verbal or mystical tirade upon me, however, Amy stepped in between us.

“Fred is doing what I asked him to do. Nothing more. If you’ve got a problem, take it up with the jackass elders who use money to keep us under their thumbs. And make no mistake here, Cyndi, Fred is acting with my full cooperation and what sure sounds like the backing of our treaties. Try to do anything to him other than talk calmly about contracts or terms, and I will protect him like I’d protect any friend getting attacked.”

Previously, I’d thought the room’s tension had reached a zenith, but I quickly realized how wrong I was. Cyndi and Amy stared one another down, and it was quickly apparent that while I was a catalyst today, whatever was between them had been simmering for a long time. Cyndi’s smile was back, although it looked nothing like the dopey grin she’d masqueraded behind all day. There was danger in those gleaming teeth, and a wicked curve at the top of her lips. “So, is today the day you finally do it then, Mage Wells? Are you going to challenge me for my title at long last? You may be a prodigy and the favorite now, but don’t think for a moment that you’re the first to try and take my position. I won’t be as easy a stepping stone as you’ve imagined.”

“That’s the problem with you old casters; you forgot how to think outside the box.” Amy reached into her pocket and pulled out a small vial of green liquid. “The moment I break this, an entire square mile is going to be flooded with a gas that, while non-lethal, is going to leave you itchy, doped up, and all around miserable for the next few days. Since Fred doesn’t breathe and I dosed myself with the antidote this afternoon, I’d say that means you’ll be the only one affected.”

“Unless I transport it away,” Cyndi countered.

Amy snorted, almost a laugh but not quite. “You think I didn’t trap this bad boy in case of meddling? One bit of magic touches it, and the vial blows. It’s thin, too. Easy to break if someone tried to wrestle it out of my hands.”

“So, you’ll render me helpless, and then strike while I’m weakened?”

“No. We’d render you helpless, leave, and report whatever bullshit you tried to do through the proper channels,” Amy shot back. “I don’t want your fucking job. I don’t want to climb the political ladder at all. I just want to be left alone to do my work and live my life. Now, if you want to deal with Fred like what he is—a friend, and the head of my clan exercising his legal rights—then we can go on. If you’re planning to try anything else, then take a deep breath and hold it for as long as you can.”

Everything fell silent, and I found myself wondering if Amy had an actual escape plan beyond her vial. We were, after all, in a house we didn’t know the location of, surrounded by sunshine, so getting away was easier said than done. Thankfully, Cyndi’s body grew less tense, and she raised her right hand.

“Upon my magic, I swear that, so long as he acts in accordance with the laws of parahumans, I shall do the same. I will make no acts of aggression, only defense, and even then, only if a threat is clear, present, and provable. Does that satisfy you, Amy?”

“It’ll do.” Amy relaxed, putting away the vial once more.

“Good. But with that settled, I think your intervention has proven that three heads are not better than two, so with your permission, I would like to speak with Fred in private,” Cyndi said.

Amy’s head began to cautiously nod. “I guess that’s okay, if you—”

It wasn’t that Amy stopped talking; her mouth was still open, tongue still midway through forming a word. But she, like everything else in the house, had frozen still. Having already seen a time bubble before, I was less struck with shock by the sudden temporal shift, though I was worried by how easily Cyndi seemed to have conjured such a potent spell.

“I needed her permission, otherwise she’d have fought me tooth and nail,” Cyndi said. I think she meant it as an explanation, though it didn’t help me understand much. “Well, Fredrick Fletcher of the humorously named House of Fred, it seems you and I need to have a negotiation. Let us adjourn to the place where properly skilled mages settle such matters, shall we?”

Before I had a chance to answer—not that I imagined it would have made much difference—the entire world fell away from us.

6.

Despite my friendship with Amy, I'd never been much for drugs. Even in my human days, when leaving my state of perception behind didn't require the talents of a specialized alchemist, I'd eschewed such mental adventures. Control was a thing I felt I had a fleeting amount of in my life, and I never felt compelled to give up the small amount of it I possessed. I say all that to lend context to the next statement: while having never actually experienced an acid trip, I imagine that they are quite similar to what happened when Cyndi pulled us out of the beach house.

Every wall fell away, dropping off into space and nothingness, from what I could tell. There was no sunshine waiting for us, however. Instead, it was a sky of stars, too many to be accurate, with glowing colors one never normally encountered in the real world. We floated up toward them, sometimes racing at incredible speeds, sometimes barely drifting, until we finally came to a stop. Before us was a conference room table, a football stadium, a battlefield littered with bodies and armor, and chessboard. I don't mean each of those things was there side-by-side. It was all of them at once, and none of them. Cyndi and I were right next to one another, and also miles apart. I understand how mad this all sounds—trust me, I do—so please take solace in my poor description by remembering that, as frustrating as it is to read about such striking contrasts, living them was a far greater challenge. Especially for someone as rooted in reality as me.

"Do you like it?" Cyndi's voice was all around me, not an echo or a shout, yet it filled the space we occupied effortlessly. "It's an old spell the archmages' created ages ago. One that only the grand mages and higher can tap into. Amy likes to pretend there's nothing to be gained from playing the political game, but membership does have its privileges."

"If I ask something like, 'where are we'? I assume I won't get a straight answer, right?" Cyndi could hear me, I saw her register my words, but I decided not to wait on a pointless answer. "Instead, let me ask you what the purpose of this place is. I had everything I needed to discuss terms back in the beach house."

"I'm sure you did, and you'll have it all here, too. For the record, you and I are still in the beach house. This is just a space our minds are occupying. See, the trouble with making deals around other parahumans is that they like to throw their might and powers around. You ever tried to negotiate with a fey? Forget it; they'll glamour you into signing over your whole savings for a twig. Mages built this place to remove those advantages. Here, we are mere projections of our thoughts. You can't hurt me, nor I you, nor can you utilize any powers you might have gained from drinking other parahumans' blood."

While I'm sure Cyndi meant the statement to scare me, to rip away advantages I'd been counting on, in truth, I was more fascinated than anything else. The mere idea of being able to deal with other parahumans on grounds like this was enough to make me want to crack open a magic book, if not for the fact that corpses, even ones as lively as I, couldn't cast. Still, if the mages rolled this out widely, it could be incredible. Conference calls would never be able to match this level of interaction.

"Wow. This is incredible." I spun around once, doing a front somersault through the air like a child in a pool. Not the most dignified opening, I'll admit; however, it was hard not to be a little charmed by the experience as a whole.

Cyndi was grinning again as she nodded her agreement. "Incredible, and useful. Because this does more than just yank us out of our bodies, Fred. It puts up a few negotiation safeguards. Whatever we swear to in here, it's binding. Binding on a deep level. You can't break a contract signed here; you can't even contemplate the idea of it. And you can't lie, at least not without it being plainly obvious."

I finished my somersault and took a standing position once more. "Fantastic. That will speed things along. So, how do I summon what I need? Do I just think of it—whoops, looks like I answered my own question there, huh?" Midway through my sentence, a stack of pages had appeared in my hand. Looking them over, I found it was the contract I'd planned on opening my negotiations with, replicated precisely. Somehow, the spell had pulled a perfect copy from my memories, fleeting as they were. Archmages didn't do things by half-measures, it seemed. "Here, let me think you a set as well, and we can get started."

Another stack of pages appeared directly in front of Cyndi, who reached out and grabbed them, but made no attempt to read so much as even the first sentence. She was eyeing me uncertainly; somehow, I could actually see the confusion surrounding her. There really were no secrets in this place. "You made contracts?"

"Of course. What did you expect me to do, just tell you Amy worked for me now and barge out the door?" I was joking, yet from the combination of her face and the sense of surprise that rippled around her, I realized that that was more or less exactly what she'd been expecting. "Cyndi, I won't insult your intelligence by assuming you didn't do your homework before inviting me for this visit, so why are you so surprised to see me doing business like any accountant would?"

"Oh, I read up on you, Fred. Or more accurately, I read up on your cover. I'd say you went over-the-top with it, but I've committed pretty hard to mine, so that might be overstepping. Seriously though, the accounting firm wasn't enough for you? Sweater vests, slacks, and glasses, too? You don't think you're playing this role a bit too hard?" There was no uncertainty around Cyndi now. She was sure of her words, which only made them all the more confusing to me.

"You expected me to be less competent because of my fashion sense?"

"Come on, Fred, we're playing the same game." Cyndi lifted her arms and twirled, sending out a shower of glowing lights that illuminated her dated outfit. "Nobody knows this act better than me. I bet it's just as easy to underestimate a vampire in a sweater vest as it is a mage in leg warmers. But I'm not falling for my own scam. You're playing a part, a wolf in sheep's clothing, and now is the time to let the facade drop so we can get down to business."

And with that, it all fell into place. She thought all of it—my firm, my job, my reputation, each piece was part of a con to make people think I was a harmless, numbers-loving vampire. "Cyndi, you just said it was impossible to get away with lying here, right? Please look at me very carefully."

She halted her spin, training her eyes on me.

"None of this is an act. I wear these clothes because I like them and they feel right on me. I do my job because I love it, and I believe I'm making the parahuman world a slightly better place. I came to represent Amy because she is my friend, one who has saved my life before. You keep waiting for me to surprise you and drop the mask, but there is no mask to drop. This is me, plain and simple."

Her eyes went wide, and a whole new wave of uncertainty rolled off of her. I could see it all, the surprise, the doubt, and then the realization that here there could be no falsehoods. Finally, I saw a glow of acceptance surround her, and it was unexpectedly beautiful.

"My apologies, Fred. It seems I misjudged you. For all the times I've railed against other parahumans thinking little of mages, I was quick to lump you in with all the other vampires. I am sincerely sorry."

"Quite all right. It happens more than you might think," I said. "All that matters is that we put it behind us and get down to determining how to proceed with Amy's contracts."

Cyndi raised her hands, and a page appeared in front of me. "Since I still feel guilty about the error, I'm make this simple and clean. The elders authorized me to give you up to fifty percent of her income each month in exchange for not overturning the contracts. If you want more than that, you'll have to walk away and wait for them to reach out, but they'll be petty about it."

Carefully, I checked over the page she had presented. Unlike Amy's contract, this was quite simple. Nothing would change, except that half of the fund Amy paid toward her “debt” would go to me. While that would make things easy—all I’d need to do was hand Amy her cash right back—it still didn’t address the long-term fiscal robbery she’d be enduring by allowing things to stand as they were. It was an appeasement, not a negotiation, and for the first time since arriving, I had a doubt about Cyndi.

“Forgive me if this is insulting, I don’t mean it to be, but are you actually trained in parahuman accounting regulations and law?”

“You think I have time to learn all that and get this good at magic?” Cyndi asked. “Nah, like most grand mages, I’m just here to keep the newer casters in line and deal with any issues that pop up. We tend to self-regulate more than other parahuman groups, for obvious reasons. I can contact someone with that knowledge, if needed though.”

“Then you should do that.” Tempting as it was to crumple the page, we were just getting onto good terms, and I saw no need to undo that progress. Instead, I folded her offer gently in half and set it aside. “Because I didn’t come here to take a cut of Amy’s money. I came to create a stable, fair plan to pay off the remainder of her debt at reasonable interest rates and to move her entirely out of the pseudo-debt you’ve caged her in. And I came prepared.”

More pages showed up around me, documents detailing my rights as the head of her clan as well as the basic principles of financing. Books appeared as well, though I’ll admit that, at that point, I may have been showing off a little. Within seconds, I was surrounded by stacks of pages and a library’s worth of law and finance books. There may have even been a few rogue numbers just floating about, added more for effect than function. That said, they seemed to be working.

“Well, shit,” Cyndi said as the last of my tools was gathered around me. “In retrospect, maybe I should have left us in the beach house. But don’t count me out just yet, Fred. I may not know the details, but I know what my people are entitled to.”

It was my turn to grin as I sent over a new contract—one of the more aggressive versions. “Then, by all means, let’s get down to it.”

7.

Have faith, dear readers, for I am not so ignorant of my profession's reputation that I would bore you with the details of our negotiation. While I would certainly enjoy rehashing each aspect of the exchange, and I'm sure those of you in the accounting field would relish reading such a play-by-play, I understand that to the vast majority of people reading this, it would be incomprehensible. Thus, I shall spare you the tedious details and simply skip to the end result.

Cyndi, in spite of her initial reticence, managed to regain her footing and put on quite an impressive display of contract-negotiating skill. It clearly wasn't her field of specialty, yet she held her own regardless. Still, this very much was a field in which I was competent, and by the time we'd reached an agreement, Amy's finances were in far better shape. As things stood, she'd be free from any debt within three years, assuming her business stayed level, and the release would be even sooner than that if her income grew, which, based on history, it probably would.

By the time Amy snapped out of frozen time, I'd finished printing off pages, and Cyndi and I had signed nearly every necessary line to make it all official, since oaths sworn in the dream realm didn't translate neatly to paper without someone typing them out.

"How did it go?" Amy stretched her jaw like it was sore, which made sense since it had been hanging open since time froze, but very much didn't make sense because time had frozen. Or had it? I realized that the only proof of that I had was silence and Amy growing still. It was probably a lot easier to kill an air conditioner and bind another mage than it was to entirely halt the flow of time. My eyes darted over to Cyndi as she responded. I'd gotten the better of her on this exchange only because she'd underestimated me. Something told me that if we ever met again, I wasn't going to have that advantage, and she was far wilier than the outfit implied.

"You've made a competent friend," Cyndi said, making a grand swoop of a signature on the final line. "And I've met worse leaders in my time. Fred will walk you through the specifics, and I'm sure you'll be quite happy with what you see. Congratulations, Amy. To be frank, I didn't think you had it in you."

"The ability to ask my clan's leader to get me a better deal? It wasn't really that hard." Amy was eyeing Cyndi as well; she didn't trust something about that last statement. As it turned out, she was right to be suspicious.

Pushing the documents together, Cyndi clapped them against the table so they made a neat, orderly lined-up stack. "No, the willpower to push back against the system. Few mages ever do, you know. They're too preoccupied with their own studies and work. So long as they have enough to live on, which we always make sure they do, that's enough to keep them content. The rare ones who try to fight off the yolk we've shackled them with, and the even more precious few who succeed, are the mages we know to keep an eye on. They've got the makings of what it takes to help run things one day."

Amy darted back so quickly that, for a moment, I thought Cyndi had struck her with some manner of invisible attack. She put her arms up and waved them furiously. "Nope. Nuh-uh. Not me, not happening. All I wanted was a fair amount of the money I was making so I could do a little good with it. Maybe give rookie casters a better option than I had. That's it. You all can keep your politics and your bullshit. I want none of it."

"Of course. The sort of woman who would fight for a larger percentage of her income and funnel it into less binding financial opportunities for new mages would never have any desire to get involved in the greater mage community. Come on, Amy. Your very explanation proves that sooner or later, you'll start playing the game. If you want to make changes, it's inevitable." Cyndi handed me part of her document stack, and I handed her part of mine.

Now, we all had copies of everything, and Amy's release was nice and official. Although, the more they talked, the more I started wondering if I'd accidentally walked her into a different, more complex cage—and if I'd really come out as far ahead in my battle with Cyndi as I thought. She sure didn't look like someone who'd gotten the short end of the stick; her grin was back, and wider than ever. What I didn't fully understand back then was that it's not the magic that makes mages dangerous. Well, okay, I mean yes, the magic absolutely makes mages dangerous, to say otherwise would be silly. But it's not the biggest threat when working with them. No, the most dangerous aspect of dealing with mages was that they all had minds sharp and smart enough to handle the working of magic, and it takes quite a brain to manage that.

"I still say it's not happening," Amy protested. "And if you two trading pages means this is over, can Fred and I go home now? I'm ready to be done with this place."

Cyndi checked a large golden watch on her wrist, then nodded. "It's well into nighttime back home for both of you, and the limo is still waiting, so I think you'll be fine to return now. You're both welcome to stay for a few more days, though. I'd be happy to walk you through what it takes to start climbing the political ladder, Amy."

"Raincheck." Amy paused, reconsidering her words. "On second thought, what's the right term for a 'never-check'? That, whatever that is, pretend I said it. Fred, grab your bag and let's go."

While I didn't want to be discourteous to our host, it was plain that

Amy was leaving soon, with or without me. Taking her cue, I went to the office to grab my laptop and travel bag, which was barely even opened. It was a shame, in a way. Some part of me had hoped for a little downtime, a bit of vacation amidst the work. Then again, if I was going to take a vacation, which I was overdue for, perhaps it would be better to do it officially. That way I could spend the time with Krystal. Maybe we'd head down for that weekend in Boarback, or go check out Alaska during the time with no sun. It was something to consider, at least, as I hauled my stuff back to the living room and down the entrance hall, where the golden door we'd come through had reappeared.

Amy and Cyndi were both there, waiting for me; although, just as I appeared, Cyndi gave Amy a large hug, pulling her in tight. "Don't be such a stranger. Come visit next time and hang out for a little while. I'll even hook a door to some dank lab where you can work when we're not out in the sun."

"If you promise not to talk politics, I'll promise to think about it," Amy replied, hugging her back. "And thanks for worrying, even if you didn't need to."

"You are on a strange journey, I won't deny that, but I think I've known that would be the case since the first lesson I gave you." Cyndi released Amy, turning to me. "As for you, Fred, it was a pleasure to meet you, and to negotiate with you. Next time the elders need some heavy lifting of our books, I know who I'll call."

"I'd welcome the opportunity." We forewent a hug in favor of a handshake, though Cyndi did pull me close just as we were about to part.

"Make sure you take good care of my student, Fred. I'm not so set in my ways that I can't make a quick trip to Colorado if I think it's warranted."

I glanced between the two women, momentarily confused. "Wait, I thought Gideon taught Amy?"

"He's given me lessons, sure, but do you really think he has the time or temperament to train a mage all the way up from scratch?" Amy asked. "Cyndi was my mentor. She watched over my education like I'm doing for Neil. Although, she was a lot more pushy about what I should do with my talents."

"I saw potential, and I tried to nurture it. I'm not apologizing for that." Cyndi released her grip on my hand and motioned to the door. "Now out, the both of you. I've got some jams to put on, and you're cramping my style."

Amy didn't need to hear any more than that; she grabbed the knob and yanked it open, revealing the dark interior of an old barn. We stepped through, the door slamming shut behind us, and just like that, the white walls covered in imported sunshine were gone. I let out a small sigh of relief. Enchanted glass or not, I hadn't felt entirely comfortable in a place with that much light. It felt good to be back home, or at least back in the proper time zone. As soon as we walked out of the barn, the golden limo flashed its lights at us. I really didn't know if it had been waiting the whole time, or if Cyndi had somehow summoned it, and I didn't particularly care. It was there, that was the only thing that mattered, and once we were in it, it began driving us back to Charlotte Manor.

We didn't say much. Amy drank a few vials from her bag and downed a bottle of champagne on the ride, so that, by the time we made it to Charlotte Manor, her eyes were glowing yellow and sections of her hair were fighting with other strands. It was only when I reached for the door to let us out that Amy spoke.

"For what it's worth, I think you've been doing a good job. With heading the House of Fred, I mean. I know you've been worrying about it a lot, but you don't need to fret quite so much. Just keep making sure you're looking after your people's best interests, not what you might think they want, and you'll be fine. Take it from someone who had to figure out being an authority figure on the fly."

"Is Neil your first student?" I asked. Amy had always seemed so competent as a teacher, I'd just assumed she'd trained mages before.

"Yup. I might be respected, but that doesn't mean the higher-ups think I'm responsible, so I never got any of the trainees with real talent. Neil was a necromancer, strike one, who'd already messed up and gotten busted, strike two, and was considered to have a 'bad attitude,' which made strike three. Nobody wanted him, which was why I was able to swing in and scoop him up. In a few decades, when he's got his shit sorted out and his powers under control, there are going to be a lot of mages pissed they didn't take the chance to train him when they had it. That kid is going places."

"In a few decades, you might be, too." I slipped from the limo and extended my hand, helping Amy down from the high perch. "Cyndi's right, you do tend to jump in and help when the need arises. Maybe you are suited for mage politics."

Amy's face scrunched in disgust and her hair . . . hissed at me. She shut the door, grabbing her bag and handing me my suitcase before she did. "Mages live a long time, and a lot changes during our lives, but I don't see me going down the same path as Cyndi no matter how old I get. Time will tell, I guess."

We crunched along through the parking lot, toward the warm glow of Charlotte Manor's porch lights. "Just because you pick the same job as her doesn't mean you have to do it the same way. I'm sure there are lots of ways to be a grand mage. Maybe you could be obsessed with seventies music and wear lots of tie-dye."

"With how many drugs I do? Way too on the nose." Amy laughed, and her hair waved in what—and bear in mind, I am purely guessing—seemed like a cheerful manner. “But thanks, I’ll think on that idea. Tomorrow, though. Right now, I am ready to rest and relax.”

“You and me both.” I pulled the front door open to find not only Charlotte waiting there, which she usually was, but also Krystal and Arch in the middle of what looked like a heated discussion. The moment we entered, all eyes turned in our direction and Arch stepped toward me.

“Good, you’re already packed. We’re running behind and need to head out now.”

“Like hell he does,” Krystal snapped. “He’s an accountant; he’s not going to an active field site.”

“It’s never non-active and you know it, but that doesn’t change the fact that inventory and cost assessments are part of the bargain,” Arch replied. “Fred, if you need to refill your blood flask or get anything from your room, you have five minutes to do so. After that, we’re heading out. The Agency sent down orders this morning, you’re going to do a full work-up of one of our more . . . bustling field locations.” He patted me on the shoulder lightly, in what I think was a gesture of reassurance.

“And if you have any body armor, you might want to pack that as well.”

An Inventory in the Base

1.

There was no limo or teleportation door this time, just a black SUV that I suspected was armored, an unnamed driver with a stoic expression, and a trek to the same airport we'd visited when I was going for my Agency interview. Despite the fact that I was worn out, curious, and more than a little anxious about where we were heading, it was hard not to wonder about these drivers everyone kept using. Were they a service parahumans could call on, like a secure ride-share, or did everyone employ their own drivers to haul people around in various fleets? Maybe they were like interns, working their way up each organization's respective ladder, although I'd never seen anyone with such deadpan expressions in the higher roles of any parahuman outfit. It was a question I meant to ask Arch about once we were safely on the plane and out of earshot, but no sooner had we gotten aboard and begun to taxi down the runway than Arch started to speak, and given the subject matter, there was no way I was going to cut him off.

"I know you've done a little work for the Agency already. The trip to the castle, and of course, all the digital tasks they've been sending your way to take care of remotely. This isn't going to be like any of that, not even the castle. Where we're going, there is serious danger. It's a base used by active agents whose location is fairly well-known. They're a boots-to-ground, first response team for their area. We don't employ these very often, mind you, but sometimes a lot of chaos all gathers in one city, and having agents constantly around becomes a necessity. So I need you to understand that there is real danger in going to this place, and if I tell you do anything, you cooperate immediately. Before we move on, tell me you understand that."

"I understand perfectly," I said. Arch didn't look any more flustered or anxious than normal, which was about zero percent on any given day, but there was something heavy in his voice. This was serious, and he wanted to make sure I treated it that way.

"Good." Arch didn't relax, exactly—he never seemed to relax as far as I knew—but his tone did get a touch lighter. "Right now, no one is expecting there to be any issues. They've just put away an alchemist who was peddling parahuman potions to humans, so there should be a little time before anyone fills that power vacuum. But, as you can imagine, just because things should be peaceful doesn't mean they will be. Thankfully, you'll be exposed to minimal danger. All you need to do is check the inventory of the base's food, ammunition, fuel, and other basic supplies that have to be stocked in case of a siege. Compare it to what they were at last quarter's inventory, figure out how regularly orders need to go through, work out a budget . . . I think you've got the point."

I had. It wasn't a tough concept to understand in the first place.

However, there was something odd about it. “Arch, I made this deal with the Agency, and I’ll honor it, but what you’re asking me to do doesn’t really demand an accountant. Anyone with the ability to do basic math and maybe build a spreadsheet could knock this out no problem. What’s going on? Is this some kind of power play to show me the kinds of places the Agency can send me if I start pushing back on assignments?”

We had to pause our discussion as the engines flared to life, thundering in our ears as they strained to get us up from the ground and into the safety of the clouds. It dawned on me then that I still had no idea where we were even going, although that felt like the least of my problems in the moment.

Finally, the engines died down to a steady roar, and Arch was able to reply. “Maybe. I don’t know for sure what’s going on. This stunk to me too, so I tried to shake out a little information before you arrived. All I was able to suss out is that the order to send you over didn’t come from Roderick. It was higher on the chain of command, high enough that no one was giving me a straight answer. That’s why I decided to tag along.”

“Wait, you weren’t assigned to transport me?” I asked.

“Fred, I know to you, it seems like I don’t do much when I’m at Charlotte Manor, but trust me when I say they don’t have agents like me spend time being flight-buddies with freelance assets. No, I decided that if they were sending you out like this, then you’d at least have the courtesy of a bodyguard. Technically, I’m doing a spot-visit on the base to see how the team is holding together, but I’m going to be at your side the whole time, just in case.”

“Thank you for that, sincerely. I’m honestly amazed Krystal didn’t storm onto the flight as well.” When I’d kissed her goodbye, Krystal had looked like she was ready to pistol-whip the first person who looked at her sideways, but she’d let us leave. Evidently, even she had some orders she couldn’t refuse.

Systematically, Arch pulled guns out from under his coat, checking the sights and clips in each one. “Oh, she would have if I didn’t, no matter what the brass up top said. But she doesn’t have the seniority I do. She can’t just start shoving her way onto missions whenever she feels like it. Not without cause, anyway. Besides, I have an in with this group. I used to be part of it.”

“I thought you did training,” I recalled.

“I do whatever I like in between times when they really need me,” Arch replied. “For a while now, it’s been teaching. Before Albert came along, I was helping to get this team up and running. They’re all good agents, mind you, but like most of our kind, they weren’t used to teamwork. I had to smooth out those wrinkles, although it didn’t take very long. By the time

Albert needed help, they were already running like a well-oiled machine.”

This time, I was the one who let the conversation lapse, and my reasons had nothing to do with the roar of the engines. Talk of Albert made me feel . . . actually, I wasn’t sure how to feel. The office wasn’t the same without him, and while we saw each other semi-often, it was almost always in passing. We both had jobs to do, and they demanded much of us. He looked happy, and I hoped he was. Part of me was afraid that the fleeting smiles I saw were an act, though. I’d pushed him into a new direction with his life, and in my heart, I was terrified by the idea that I’d steered him wrong.

“How is Albert’s training going, anyway?” I tried to be nonchalant about it, but from the way Arch half-rolled his eyes, I didn’t think it was a successful attempt.

“Good. He’s growing much faster now that we’ve got time to train properly.” Arch didn’t slow down his inspection of his guns as he spoke; if anything, he cleared through them faster.

“And is he happy?”

“Most days he is, although sometimes, he wishes he could go back to being an assistant.” If there was one thing I could count on Arch not to do, it was mince words. “He’s been handed a weapon of destiny, with all the duty and weight that entails. It’s a lot to bear, especially for a kid his age. Wanting to run from it is natural, so of course there are days when he feels like going backward. But in the end, this will be better for him. The thing about destiny is that it keeps on coming whether we like it or not. Thanks to you, when his arrives, he’ll at least be prepared to face it.”

I nodded, looking away from the guns and out the window to the night sky. “As long as he’s happy.”

“He will be, and he won’t be. Nobody gets a fully happy life all the time, and if you’re trying to lead your friends to one, then prepare for a lot of disappointment. Just listen to what they want, and try to remind them of that when they hit a crossroads. Good leaders point you toward the right path; they don’t drag you down it. Because if they did, it wouldn’t be your choice anymore, and that’s not leadership. It’s tyranny.” Arch finished cycling through his weapons and put the last one away, tucking it seamlessly under his jacket, where it became impossible to spot. “If we’re done talking about Albert, do you have anything else you want to know while we’ve got the downtime to talk?”

“Where we are going seems prudent,” I said. “And how long will we be there? I do have other clients and appointments, you know.”

“They checked with Lillian to make sure you were clear for three days, so I doubt it will be any longer than that. Like you said, it’s not a hard job, especially for someone as experienced as you. As for where, have you ever heard of Northview, Maine?”

I shook my head, since it didn't ring so much as a single bell.

"Yeah, didn't think you would have. Used to be a midsized town until they created a big incentive program to get businesses to build their headquarters within city limits. Tax breaks, cheap land, the works. It was effective. Lots of companies moved or started there, which brought jobs, money, people, and of course, parahumans. It's a new slice of metropolis, and every parahuman is scrambling to make sure they end up on top of the heap," Arch told me. "The agents' job is to ensure they do so within the confines of the treaties and don't get humans caught up in the turf-war."

The plane shook as we hit a patch of turbulence, and I buckled my seatbelt. "Sounds tough."

"It's the job agents sign up for." I noticed Arch didn't bother fastening his safety belt as he spoke. "But you didn't, so I'm going to do my best to make sure you don't get caught up in anything besides inventory. Remember: keep your head down, stay in the base, and do what I say at all times. Stick with that, and we should be fine."

I wasn't sure if Arch was genuinely optimistic or lying to keep me calm, and he was too inscrutable to figure out which it was. Instead, I turned my head back to the window and looked up at the stars. Something told me this was going to be the last bit of peace I might get for a few days, so I'd better savor it while I could.

2.

When Arch had described the place we were heading as a “base,” I’d immediately pictured something heavily fortified, set well away from the general public, with spotlights and big chain-link metal fences around the perimeter. The failing there was on me, because in my curiosity, I’d allowed my imagination to run wild, forgetting the very real obligation agents had to get their work done while blending in with the rest of the human world. So of course their base wouldn’t stand out so overtly. Still, I felt like it was something of a stretch to call the rustic brown townhome near the center of a newly built downtown a “base.” The gate around the yard didn’t even come up past my waist, for goodness’ sake.

I was suitably more impressed a few seconds later, as we crossed onto the property and I felt the ethereal tickle of passing over a ward. I hadn’t been through many at that point in my life, but it wasn’t a sensation that was easy to forget. Almost like fingers running gently down your bones. We made it to the front door without issue, and Arch rang the bell. Loud footsteps raced from behind the door, followed quickly by the sound of something metal and heavy being moved. It took a few seconds—a few seconds where I felt oddly exposed given how suburban and pleasant my location seemed—before the door was flung open to reveal a large man with shaggy brown hair in a leather jacket.

Now, let me pause here, because I recognize that the word “large” has a somewhat shifting meaning in my social circles. This fellow was large by human standards, standing well past six feet tall, with broad shoulders and a muscular frame. It was adequate bulk to be intimidating, even if he would have paled in comparison to someone like Richard. Still, he was big enough that Arch seemed to disappear in the giant, wide-armed hug the man wrapped the smaller agent up in.

“We just got word that you were coming!” The larger man was squeezing so hard I wondered if Arch would pop, or simply start shooting. I couldn’t remember anyone hugging Arch before, or at least not so freely as this. To my surprise, Arch didn’t fight back or object, he just let the hug run its course until he was set back down on his feet once more. Only then did the man in leather turn to me and extend a friendly hand. “You must be Mr. Fletcher. I’m Agent Persimmons, but everyone just calls me Wallace.”

I shook his hand, noting that the grip was firm, yet never veered into anything aggressive. “A pleasure to meet you, Wallace. Please, call me Fred. I’ve never been one to stand on formality, especially with friends of friends.”

“Oh, someone else willing to call this old curmudgeon a friend. Arch, you must be getting soft.” Wallace motioned for us to step inside, which we did as he shut the door behind us. As it turned out, the innocuous townhome had metal walls all throughout the interior, with arcane symbols painted around every window and door in sight. Wallace had to shift several heavy bars back in place to fortify the front door, making it even harder to get through. This sort of set-up was probably a serious fire hazard in terms of easy exits, but it did make me feel less nervous about where I'd be spending my next few days.

Arch and I followed Wallace down the hallway as he spoke, visibly excited about the visit. "Harris is putting together a meal that should be done pretty soon, Paula and I were cleaning out your old room, and Marj is prepping a cot and cell for Fred. Sorry about that, by the way, but the cells are the only spare space we've got to put guests."

"Fred can have my old room. I've slept on plenty a prison cot in my day," Arch offered.

"A cot is fine. I plan to spend most of my time working, anyway," I replied. In a way, this was better. No comfort meant no distractions, which meant I could get the job done all the faster and we could go home. Amiable as Wallace was, I still had no desire to stay here any longer than needed.

We turned a corner, of which there were an odd amount in these halls, and nearly ran smack into another vampire. Unlike Wallace, she wasn't wearing anything leather and had normal human proportions. Dark pants, a gray shirt, and a pair of guns on her waist, she looked professional and collected. Our eyes locked, studying each other, until she smiled with more sincerity than I'd been expecting. No fangs in the grin either, which was a nice change of pace for new vampire meetings.

"Paula, this is the accountant that goes by Fred," Wallace said, making quick introductions. "He's the one the Agency sent for inventory."

"I read the memo, but I didn't believe it. So, you're the vampire who's been working as a freelance accountant, huh?" Her voice was gentle, yet I had no trouble making out her words. After the overt evil of Quinn, Petre's visible disdain, and Lillian's bombastic nature, it felt odd to meet a vampire that was so composed.

"I am indeed. Fredrick Frankford Fletcher; though, as Wallace said, please just call me Fred."

"And I'm Paula. Pleasure to make your acquaintance." She walked past me, to Arch, though she didn't wrap him in a hug like Wallace did. Instead, they just shook hands briefly before she smiled again. "Will you have time to face me while you're here? My accuracy has improved quite a bit since our last duel."

Arch didn't answer right away, which was unusual for him, but eventually he tipped his head forward in agreement. "As long as we hit the shooting range when Fred is working nearby, I don't think that will be any sort of conflict."

Paula smiled again, then continued down the hallway in the opposite direction. Quiet and to the point, now there was something I hadn't seen a lot of among parahumans. We kept walking, stepping into a kitchen where a man who looked like he was in his early twenties was racing about, various foods flying around him.

That's not hyperbolic language, by the way. Eggs, celery, carrots, and a whole chicken were wobbling through the air as this man ran between the stove, oven, and several mixing bowls on the counter. Occasionally, he'd reach up and snatch an ingredient from mid-air, tossing it into a bowl almost haphazardly before turning his attention elsewhere. Wallace tried coughing loudly several times to get his attention, but eventually, he gave up and spat out the cook's name. "Harris!"

"Huh? What? Ten more minutes!" Harris whirled around on us, a streak of flour on his cheek that I couldn't imagine he'd gotten through normal means. "Oh shit. Arch is here already?"

"I told you he was here when I ran past to get the door," Wallace said. There was exasperation in his voice, but the sort that was resolved to knowing that no amount of frustration would change the situation. This was clearly Harris at his usual, and as a teammate, Wallace had made peace with that a long time ago. "And the vampire next to him is Fred. He's going to be doing inventory for the next few days, so try not to do any big runs on the food supply until he finishes."

"What, you want me to cook for our guests with what's in the fridge? You ask me to shame my pride as a chef." Harris defiantly put his hands on his hips and stared Wallace down. Before either of them could dig in for a long fight, Arch stepped forward and broke the tension.

"So, it's a chef these days, huh?" Arch turned to me, something almost like a smile on his face. "When I left, Harris was training to be a top-tier mixologist, and before that, I believe it was a sculptor, and before that—"

"I will not apologize for searching tirelessly to find my true calling," Harris snapped. His expression turned sheepish when he realized who he'd been short with, and the next time he spoke, it was with a more subdued tone. "Sorry, I get a little testy when I'm mid-recipe. You all head on down, I'll call you when the food is ready and I can have a more even-tempered conversation."

Wallace took the cue, leading us past Harris and the floating food to a set of stone steps leading downward, ones I was positive hadn't been part of the home's initial construction. Once we were on the stairway, Arch leaned into me and whispered, "Harris is a great caster, a prodigy with the makings of an eventual archmage. But he says too much magic on the brain can make your mind stagnant, so he's always trying to master new hobbies as distractions. It's a pain, but it does seem to make him better at magic, so we all learned to put up with it.”

It hadn't escaped my notice that we were barely through the door and Arch was already lumping himself in with the rest of the group. I wondered how long he'd spent working with them, and why he'd been so ready to leave a place he clearly felt at home. Was Albert really important enough to have left somewhere like this behind?

The stairs went on for a while, as we passed several floors and still kept descending. When we finally stopped, it was because the stairs had as well. They went down no further than the floor we were on. Stone was all around us—I was certain that this area definitely wasn't on any permits at city hall—and more arcane symbols dotted the walls at regular intervals. Wallace took us down a short hallway to a large open area with several doorways.

“To the left is our makeshift jail. It isn't very nice, but we've got one cell without silver bars at least, so that's where you'll be staying, Fred. Up ahead are the training rooms, and one of our ammo storage areas. It seemed like a bad idea to store all the guns and ammo in one place, especially near the jail, so there's a few rooms through the house you'll need to visit to do a full inventory. On the right, however, is pretty much all of our goods that aren't dangerous. Food, toiletries, water, flea shampoo, all the essentials.”

Even if I hadn't already suspected Wallace's nature as a therian, his comment about flea shampoo being an essential would have clued me in. A vampire, a mage, and a therian—not a bad team, all things considered. But there was still one more person Wallace had mentioned that we'd yet to run into. As it turned out though, the door to the jail area opened right then, and a woman in jeans and an oversized sweater stepped out. I waited for an overt clue as to her nature, like I'd gotten from the others, but as she walked over, nothing jumped out at me. She seemed human to my senses, not that that really meant much. Krystal and Arch both read as human to me, and while I still had no idea what Arch was, I knew Krystal was anything but mundane.

“Arch, so good to see you again.” She was the first one since Wallace to greet Arch with a hug, and while it wasn't as strong or as enthusiastic, it was surprisingly tender. I was about to look away when they broke apart and she looked to me. “And you must be Fredrick Fletcher, the accountant who goes by Fred. I'm Marjorie, but everyone calls me Marj, and you should, too. It's a pleasure to meet you.”

We shook hands, and I studied her, trying to figure out what qualified her to be on a team of parahuman badasses. Still no hints, so I let the matter slide out of my mind. The parahuman world was a big one, and there were plenty of types I'd never even heard of, let alone met. No sense searching my mind for knowledge that wasn't there.

“Pleasure to meet you, as well,” I replied. “Do you all have a particular order you'd prefer I handle the job in? I'd like to cause as little disruption to your work as possible.”

“If you could start with the food so Harris doesn’t pitch a fit about not being able to cook, that would make everyone’s life easier,” Wallace said. “After that, go in whatever order you like. We’re stood down for anything except emergencies while you do inventory, so we shouldn’t need much in the way of ammo.”

“Closest thing we have to a vacation.” Marj sounded oddly cheerful about the fact that they rarely got time off, but perhaps she was just happy because they were spending the downtime with an old friend. “Arch, you want a rundown of what’s been going on since you left?”

“I’m here to watch over Fred,” Arch said. “So we’d need to be somewhere close to him.”

“Why don’t you all have a meeting right here?” I suggested. “Wallace, if you can show me to the storage area with the food, I’ll get to work so that Harris can have free rein of his kitchen once more.”

“Bless you, Fred. I was not looking forward to fighting him over the next meal.” Wallace brought me to the door on the right and led me through.

Behind us, Arch and Marj were already deep in discussion, and I worked hard to tune them out. Whatever they were talking about, I probably didn’t have the clearance for it, and even if I did, I was almost certainly happier not knowing. With any luck, I could just do my job, he could have a nice visit, and we’d be back on the plane soon.

Even as I told myself that, however, I didn’t really believe it. While it would be nice to dismiss such feelings as intuition, the truth of the matter was more straightforward: I was finally learning to prepare for the unexpected. Not that any amount of bracing could have truly prepared me for what was to come.

3.

The first day went surprisingly smoothly. For all the emphasis Arch had put on being alert and prepared for anything, ultimately, it was a quiet patch of hours spent taking stock of the group's food and sundries. No one bothered me, except for Harris popping in repeatedly to ask if he could have access to the pantry once more, and even that stopped once I gave him permission. Curiously, he didn't actually take anything to cook once he could; he just smiled, grew visibly more relaxed, and left me alone. With mages, I was slowly learning there was a certain amount of peculiarity cooked into their personalities. I had no idea if it was a side effect of using magic, or whatever enabled them to accomplish such a feat in the first place, and I didn't spare much time trying to figure it out.

I was all about the job, forgoing sleep even after my watch told me we were into the daytime once more. True, I was a little tired, especially after the outing with Amy, but Arch wasn't a man to use hyperbole. If he thought the less time spent here, the better, then I'd sleep when I was safe in Charlotte Manor again. Besides, I'd gone far longer than a few days without sleep during the crunch of tax season. We were still well within my comfort zone, and I planned to be done before the lack of sleep could wear on me.

As for Arch, he was staying true to his word. Every time I popped a head out the door of the storage room to ask something, he was there. Sometimes alone, more often talking with one of the members of the group. They were always polite and quiet enough that I could tune them out, but it was plain that they wanted to spend as much time with their former member as possible. He seemed to be enjoying it too, which made me feel a bit guilty about how quickly I was racing through the job. However, since he'd been the one encouraging me to get this over with, I kept up the pace. If Arch wanted to change the plan, he'd have told me about it. The man was never shy about giving orders.

By the time the sun set once more, I'd finished logging the storage room's contents and had moved on to inventorying the nearby ammunition stockpile. If you're surprised that it took me so long to complete one room while working nonstop through a day, then you are severely underestimating how much they actually had on hand. I'd thought Wallace was just using a simple phrase to convey meaning when he mentioned a siege, but the truth was that they really were set-up to withstand a prolonged attack for weeks, if they had to. There was even an impressive blood storage system that I suspected was magical and meant to sustain Paula.

Through all the counting and calculating, however, the same thought kept nagging at me: this was simple, basic work. While I'm not above doing menial labor when needed, that didn't change the fact that this was a strange use of my time. The Agency didn't own me outright—they could only force me to work so many hours in a given year, and this is how they were using a big chunk of them? It made no sense, which kept me searching for some other reason or explanation as I worked. Confidential materials they wouldn't trust to someone with less experience, or a convoluted tracking system that would take expertise to figure out, anything to explain why I'd been brought here. A whole day had passed though, and I'd come up empty, which should have made me more relaxed, but was instead only increasing my anxiety. Unseen complications were always more worrying than the ones you saw coming.

A polite knock on the door roused me from counting bullets, which is a chore that lends itself to taking any distraction possible, and I saw Paula step into the ammo room with a pair of coffee mugs. I didn't even need to sniff to know that they had blood inside them; the scent reached out and crammed itself into my senses instantly. Vampires were hardwired that way. I could tune out a lot of noise and smells when I put my mind to it, but blood cut past every line of mental defense I had and went right to the primal part of my brain.

"Evening, Fred," Paula greeted. "We thought you might want to take a break for some nourishment. Even Arch eats at least once a day." She extended one of the mugs to me, and I accepted. The blood was glorious—it always is, since the liquid lights up every part of a vampire's tongue and brain—and before I realized it, I'd drained half the cup. Apparently, I was hungrier than I'd realized.

"Thanks. Sometimes when I work, I tend to zone out and forget about basic necessities."

She snickered under her breath, explaining before I had a chance to ask about the laughter. "Sorry. It's just a little funny, you know? There's the old legend that if you throw seeds or small objects in front of a vampire, they'll compulsively count them without pause, and here I come down to find you so spaced out from counting bullets that you forgot to eat. Makes me wonder if maybe that's why they sent a vampire to do the inventory."

"Sadly, my tendencies toward tallying extended well back into my human life as well," I admitted. "Though I can't say I ever had occasion to count bullets. Unless you count bullet points, which you probably shouldn't."

Paula sipped from her mug and walked over, taking a look at the pages where I was keeping track. "You've gotten through a lot of stuff already. I'm impressed, but I guess I shouldn't be. Arch says this is your gig full time. I'd love to hear the story of how that happened."

"Not much to tell, I'm afraid." In retrospect, this sounds like I was being coy, but at the time, I really didn't feel like my story was particularly worth recounting. "My sire turned me because I was a socially anxious shut-in who was better with numbers than people, hoping that giving me this power would let my ‘dark side’ out and I’d go on a killing spree. But with no one to teach me about parahumans, I just stuck to my old life. By the time I met another parahuman, I was sort of set in my ways again, so I found a way to bring my old life and my new life together.”

“Abandoned, huh? That’s a tough start. A lot of abandoned vampires don’t survive their first year. They draw the attention of agents or piss off the wrong people, or go crazy because they can’t accept what’s happened to them. I’m glad you made it through.” Paula was looking at me curiously, studying my face. She was probably checking for falsehoods, and I didn’t begrudge her that. Given her job, and that I was in their safe haven, it was natural to make sure I wasn’t concealing some wicked intentions.

I took another, more measured drink from my mug as I debated how to respond. It felt like she was fishing for something, but I didn’t know what. Since I had nothing to hide, I decided to barrel on as if I hadn’t noticed the scrutiny. “It was hard for a while, but thankfully I made some friends who taught me how this world works. How about you? How did you become an agent?”

Paula shrugged. “Was turned a few decades back. Didn’t mind the clan I was in at first, but eventually I wanted more for myself. Took a few years to train, and then applied to the Agency. Once they decided I had the right ethics and brain for the work, I got started. That’s pretty much it.”

It didn’t escape my notice that her story was really a few short points with as little detail as possible in between, though I didn’t raise the issue. Despite us both being vampires, we’d only just met, and it wasn’t polite to pry. Besides, it wasn’t as though I hadn’t skipped over quite a bit myself.

“Sometimes I wish I’d gotten the experience of getting taken in by a proper clan, other days I’m glad for the way things worked out. If I’d been educated by a vampire clan, especially one that would have had my sire as a member, I’m sure I would have inherited the old biases and fears toward other types of parahumans that they held. Instead, I got to make up my own mind about things, and I have more friends for it. In a way, I guess Quinn did me a favor abandoning—”

My words halted as the mug in Paula’s hand went tumbling down toward the floor. It never made it though, as she dropped and snatched it out of the air without spilling so much as a single drop. Sometimes I forgot just how powerful our kind was when we applied ourselves. Still, she didn’t exactly look steady as she stood back up, mug clutched firmly in hand. “Fred . . . did you say Quinn? As in, Quinn the one-armed vampire and former necromancer? That’s your sire?”

“He didn’t used to be one-armed,” I said, unsure of how else to really respond. “But then he messed with Krystal. Anyway, yes, Quinn is, or was, my sire. Why?”

“Because Quinn is one of the major players in Northview, a rat we’ve been trying to smoke out for months.” Paula downed the rest of her blood in a single gulp, then set the mug down on a nearby table. “That seems like a bit too much of a coincidence. If you’ll excuse me, I need to go talk to Wallace.”

As if he’d been waiting for the cue, we both heard the pounding footsteps of the group’s largest member barreling down the stairs. Frantic whispering sounded outside, and then the door swung open to reveal Wallace, looking far less composed than he had the last time I’d seen him.

“Paula! Gear up. That Ghoul Lord we’ve been searching for just showed his face on the other side of town, and he’s got a small army of lesser ghouls with him. Orders are to suppress as quickly as possible before civilians get hurt.”

Paula looked between Wallace and me for several seconds, then her eyes darted to Arch in the doorway. “You’re staying behind, I assume?”

“Do you really need me for something like that?” Arch countered.

“No, but I wanted to make sure Fred would have some backup, just in case.” Paula dashed past the door, yelling over her shoulder. “Give me two minutes to gear up, and I’ll be ready.”

“Fred, Arch, you two just keep at it,” Wallace said. “We should have this done in an hour or so, and be right back. Harris will seal the place tight, so nothing can get in, but that means you can’t get out either.”

“I’m aware of lockdown protocol.” Arch was checking his guns again, and this time, I was thankful for the ritual. If anything went awry, he was the only trained agent around. “I’ll explain it to Fred. You go deal with the Ghoul Lord.”

Wallace followed orders, dashing out the doorway and back to the stairs. From the speed at which he was ascending, I estimated it would be a few minutes at most before he and everyone else was out the door. I turned to Arch, noting the wary expression on his face.

“Do you expect any trouble?”

“As a rule, always,” Arch said. “But something that big happening—big enough to draw the entire team out with you on hand—makes me suspicious. From now until they return, you don’t leave my side no matter what, Fred. Is that understood?”

I nodded quickly. There was no way I planned on disobeying that order.

“Good, then get back to counting.” Arch pulled out a folding chair and set it so he was facing the doorway with his gun drawn. “There’s still work to be done.”

4.

Despite what you might expect, and certainly what I was prepared for, the door Arch was watching didn't suddenly get knocked in by a crew of evil parahumans. Instead, nothing happened, save for me tracking the sounds of the team getting into their cars and driving off. With no other way to occupy my time, I took Arch's advice and went back to counting bullets. In a way, I was glad for the task, as otherwise, I would have spent my time dwelling on all the possibilities of what might happen. There was one thing, however, that nagged at me, and eventually it grew so bothersome I couldn't even focus on my work anymore.

"Arch, did you know that Quinn was in Northview?" It was blunt, I'll admit, but conversations with Arch tended to work best when one got right to the point. Besides, we'd been through enough that I felt like we were friends, or at least amiable enough to skip some niceties.

"Of course. Krystal and I both get daily briefings about any activity that even slightly smells of Quinn," Arch told me. "He's the type to hold a grudge, so we're always trying to be ready in case he finally musters up the courage to come back to Winslow. His presence is why I insisted on coming along."

"Oh. Why not just tell me that on the plane, then?"

"Because I wasn't sure it would come up, and I didn't want you spending three days with that dangling overhead if it wasn't necessary. There was always the chance that this was a coincidence, after all. They do happen, even to parahumans." Arch's eyes and gun never wavered from the door as he spoke; his focus was unbreakable.

"You don't think so anymore, I take it?"

There was a long stretch of silence this time before Arch responded. "I think the Agency sending a useful resource to get a job done is a coincidence. But a big attack happening within a day of our arrival, one that leaves us alone in the house, that's a step too far. My money says someone was trying to smoke Quinn out and decided that you'd be bait he wouldn't pass up. They just didn't count on him being organized enough to put together this big of a distraction."

I was about to protest that the complexity of such a plan felt far-fetched, but then I remembered the last time I'd seen Quinn, in a church surrounded by ghouls under his control. He liked using ghouls as pawns, so turning them into a massive distraction fit his usual pattern. Arch was right; this was too much coincidence to brush off. "At least we're locked up in a fortress."

You might think that was the moment the door was kicked down, or a mighty explosion interrupted us, but you'd be wrong. Nothing happened for several more minutes as I went back to work and kept counting bullets. When something did occur, it was more subtle than I'd been expecting, so much so that I almost didn't notice. Without warning, the lights in the room simply died, and as I strained my ears for the familiar hum of electricity, I heard nothing. Nothing except for faint footsteps from somewhere above us.

"They killed the power," I said. There was no point in pretending anymore; something was definitely going on, and given the number of footsteps, it was certainly a "they" situation. "I hear a lot of feet moving overhead, but I can't tell if they're in the house, or just on the property."

"If they aren't in now, they will be soon. Someone came here with a plan." To my surprise, Arch had left his chair and was digging through his coat. Rather than pulling out another gun, however, he produced a pair of glasses with runes along the rim and donned them. "Enchanted for night vision, plus I won't get blinded if someone throws a flash grenade. They're also next to impossible to knock off. This isn't my first time working in the dark."

It took me a second to realize that Arch was responding to the confusion on my face, which he could now see perfectly. In general, I considered myself a well-prepared person; however, I had nothing on Arch and his personal arsenal of weapons and tools. Just as I was preparing to grab some heavy equipment to bar the door, Arch walked over and carefully pulled it open.

"What are you doing?" My voice was barely above a hiss, yet it sounded so loud, too loud, in my vampiric ears.

"We can't stay down here. From what you said, it sounds like Quinn brought a whole team with him. They'll find us, and there's no way we could keep them out long enough to wait for our people to get back. Depending on the type of parahuman he brought, I might not be able to kill them all before they got to you. Better to stay on the move, give ourselves some options until the others return. But we're going to need a little help."

Arch dug into his coat once more, pulling out a dark leather bag. Reaching in, he scooped out a handful of dust and sprinkled it on himself before turning and blowing the rest of it around me. Some got up my nose, and I went to sneeze, but before I could, the sense of it had vanished. The bits around me were gone too, like they'd never been there. I took a test sniff and didn't smell anything. Anything. Not even the residual blood in the nearby mugs.

"Powder from the bones of a shadow-walker," Arch said, as if that somehow served as an explanation. "They won't be able to smell or hear us unless they're very close. It's how I sneak up on vampires, therians, and other parahumans with enhanced senses."

While I was a bit miffed at the sudden onset of anosmia, I did have to admit that having such a material on hand was pretty . . . well, cool. I'd seen Arch in his role of authoritative leader, and I'd heard other agents talk about how respected he was, but this was the first time I'd ever seen Arch really on the job. He was composed, quick-thinking, and seemingly had a plan and tool for any situation. I just hoped he continued to live up to the hype once we actually met our attackers.

Slipping out of the ammo storage room, I strained my ears to hear the sounds of movement, but apparently the shadow-walker dust cut both ways. I could still hear, mind you, it was just that the amount I could hear was highly diminished. For that matter, when I really tried, I could pick up occasional smells from around me, though nothing like what I could normally detect. It took a few moments for me to realize what Arch's dust had done: he'd dialed back my smell and hearing to human levels. Disconcerting as it was, things only seemed so silent when compared with my normal hearing capacity. I wondered if I could buy some of that powder for nights when I wanted to work and the neighbors were being loud.

"Wait," I told him, my eyes catching a door to another room. "What about the jail cells? They said most of the bars were silver, right? We could hide out in one of those. Even if Quinn finds us, he wouldn't be able to get through."

"It's not a terrible plan, and if everything goes to shit, use it, but you can still shoot a lot of things through bars. Better not to leave you at his mercy if we can avoid it. Now, come on. I can hear them working on the door."

"Really? How? You got hit with the dust, too," I pointed out.

"Fred, my hearing is always at a human level. I've just spent a lot of time learning how to get the most out of that. Now, do you want to stand here gabbing, or do you want to get a fucking move on?" Arch stood there, unmoving, waiting for me to respond.

"Sorry. Lead the way." I fell in directly behind him, and as soon as I did, Arch began moving forward once more.

We crept up the stairs, Arch stopping occasionally to cock his head and listen as we ascended. I had no idea where we were heading; however, Arch never hesitated. He knew this place, after all, and apparently, time away hadn't dulled his memory in the slightest. Bit by bit, we rose, until we were almost back at the top floor. It was there that I heard the first sound from our attackers since Arch had coated me in dust, and it wasn't because the effects were fading.

The loud bang that echoed through the house and into its subterranean catacombs was impossible to mistake for anything other than what it clearly was: the massive, metal front door being roughly broken through. Arch and I looked at each other, though we said nothing. There wasn't a point in speaking the words out loud; we both knew what had just happened.

Our attackers had broken through the front door. They were now officially in the house with us.

5.

Had I been on my own, I would have most likely frozen in panic until I was inevitably discovered by the intruders. Thankfully, Arch had no such reticence. No sooner had the noise started to fade than we were on the move again, past the kitchen and into the one of the bedrooms. It seemed counter-intuitive to me that we were moving closer to the people breaking in, but this wasn't really the time to question Arch's judgment. Especially since we were within earshot of the others, vampire hearing or not. I could make out the sounds of them scrabbling inside, and just before Arch eased the bedroom door shut, a familiar voice rang out—one that conjured terrible memories of a ghoulish church and Krystal with a bloody throat.

"All of you by the couch, go to the kitchen and head downstairs. Start at the bottom and search a floor at a time. If I know my spawn, he'll have holed up in the darkest corner he can find and be cowering in it. The rest of you, start working from the top down. Except you, Beauregard. You guard the front door." Quinn's voice was unmistakable, still as mad as it had been the last time. Except there was something different, even if I couldn't put my finger on what. His words seemed stronger, heavier, like there was an air of authority with every inflection.

Also . . . he'd just called someone Beauregard. That was a hell of a coincidence, seeing as Krystal had turned his old lackey with that name into sliced-up ashes. Did Quinn seek out underlings with that name? It was a weird detail, one I really didn't have time to dwell on, but it's amazing the things a mind will latch on to in a state of panic.

Through it all, Arch was silent, listening to the sounds of footsteps moving to various parts of the base. I could make out some, though not in much detail, but apparently he had a far better sense of their location than I did. Pulling out a dark gun in one hand and a gleaming silver dagger in the other, Arch tilted his head toward the door and whispered. "Four of them are still up here, not including the big one by the door. I can't tell which one is Quinn, but he might be among them, so be ready for anything if he pops up. Our best bet is to avoid the five up here, or kill them if they see us, and sneak out the front while the rest are searching below."

"Won't all of them come running the first time you shoot that?" I pointed to his gun, in case he'd missed the context.

Arch double-checked the weapon before shaking his head. "No, I pulled the enchanted one. Between the muffling spells and the shadow-walker powder, they shouldn't hear it. Trust me, Fred. I'm used to getting the drop on bigger, stronger enemies."

Not for the first time, I found myself wondering just what exactly Arch was. I knew he'd been alive for a long time, yet that was literally the only supernatural feature he'd demonstrated, unless one considered constant calm a parahuman power. Which, given how impossible such a skill was for me to grasp, it might as well have been.

"We're going to have to move now. I can't risk leaving you on your own," Arch continued. "No matter what happens out there, don't worry about me. If I get hurt, pay no mind. Unless someone manages to shoot or stab me in the brain. Then, run like hell and just survive until help arrives."

I realize I've just commented about Arch's calm demeanor, but I was still bowled over as he placidly discussed the idea of his being shot in the head. There was no time to ponder it though, as he pushed open the bedroom door and led us out into the hallway, gun first. Arch was methodical, checking every corner we encountered as we took a route that felt circuitous, but that was probably picked to maximize our chances of making it out while encountering as few intruders as possible.

It was a good method, until we were halfway down a hall and another vampire stepped into view. There was no question of what this man was; his fangs were bared already, and they only continued to stretch further as we stepped into view. Yet there was something off about him as well. He moved more like an animal than a person, and dark, pulsing red lines stretched across the sclera of his eyes and into the iris. That was all the detail I could take in before a soft pop came from Arch, and the vampire's head whipped back. He was right; the gun really didn't make much noise. I stood, ready for my fellow undead to rise up; bullets weren't the best method of stopping us, yet he stayed on the ground, a small pool of dark blood stretching out around what remained of the back of his head.

Much as I'd have loved to back away, this was still the direction we were heading, so I had to press on. As we made our way past the vampire's body, because that's all it was now, I saw that the back of his head looked like a cannonball had soared out of it, and I caught the distinct glimmer of silver. I'm not quite sure why I'd never realized that agents, especially ones as prepared as Arch, would have bullets specially made for vampires, but it was still disconcerting to see the results laid out upon the ground. So much destruction from one shot; it boggled the mind. And Arch hadn't even hesitated. He'd fired without pause directly into the skull. Moments like these showed me why so many parahumans were afraid of agents.

Eventually, we made it past the corpse, although I wasn't sure it was a sight that would ever entirely leave me. As of the writing of these pages, it still hasn't, but plenty more terrible images have been added to keep it company. Arch slunk down the halls, always listening and at the ready for another attack. Whether it was luck or his guidance, I don't know, but we managed to make it to the living room where the front door was located without encountering another attacker. That, however, was where our luck ran out.

Arch's elbow dug into my ribs as he pointed at a mirror on the wall, one that had clearly been placed to check the entryway covertly. The hulking monster in the doorway would have caused me to gasp audibly if I hadn't stopped breathing to stay quiet. It was a vampire—at least, I thought it was—but I couldn't even imagine the cocktail of blood it had been fed to assume such an appearance. Standing so tall his head brushed the doorway, the man was as wide as Bubba, but with a physique more akin to Richard's. His fangs were exposed, shining in the moonlight, as were the black claws on his hands and six horns lining his bare skull. Instead of the usual pale skin our kind had, this vampire—presumably the new Beauregard—had a complexion mottled with splotches of red, purple, and green. Beyond that, his skin's shape was wrong; it had odd lumps and dips, like poorly molded clay. The eyes, however, were similar to the ones we'd seen in our first fight, if one can even call it that—red lines across the sclera, just like the dead vampire in the hall. The rest of him was so bizarre that I wasn't even sure Beauregard counted as a vampire anymore. Quinn had done a real number on him, just like he'd do to me if given the chance.

Arch was stepping closer, getting ready to attack the behemoth blocking the door, when his eyes suddenly darted to a nearby doorway in the hall. Seconds later, a vampire woman with the same unnatural eyes—even by our standards—came bursting through. No sooner had she entered our view than Arch struck, slicing her with his blade. Unfortunately, she was quicker than the first guy, throwing up her arm to block and letting out a pained shriek as his dagger cleaved easily into her flesh. The pain caused her to pause, unsure of what to do next, and that was all Arch needed. Another pop, and she was down. Mercifully, the small hole in her forehead was all I could see this time. But dead or not, the damage was already done. Her yelp hadn't been muffled like our actions, and in the mirror, I could already see Beauregard rushing forward.

What I didn't see, however, was the vampire sneaking up behind me. No, Arch was the one who caught that, grabbing me by the arm and shoving me roughly to the side as he fired into its chest. The wounds were enough to slow it down, and Arch finished it off with another shot to the brain, but by the time he turned back, Beauregard had already arrived. One deft slap from Beauregard's massive paw of a hand sent Arch slamming into the wall. I suspect that if the whole place hadn't been reinforced, he'd have gone through it, but I could still hear the crunch of bone when Arch hit.

With him cleared out of the way, Beauregard advanced on me. There was no joy or surprise in his face; it was empty of any such higher brain functions. He was like a caged wolf being let loose on its prey, just a wild beast doing its master's bidding. God . . . what had Quinn done to these people?

Before Beauregard could snatch me up and rip me in two, however, more muffled gunshots rang out. The mighty vampire looked pained, but he didn't drop to the ground. Instead, he spun in place to face his attacker. Arch was standing there, popping in a fresh clip, looking annoyed that his bullets weren't doing their usual damage. This time, I was the one who saw someone creeping up behind him, a familiar form that I pointed to while trying to get my friend's attention. "Arch!"

He started to spin around, just as the blade cleaved through his neck, separating Arch's head from his body in a single smooth motion. The body fell to the ground, but the head seemed to float for a moment. It took me a second to realize that, just like Paula and the mug earlier, Arch's attacker had caught his head before it could drop. Even one-handed, Quinn still had exceptional reflexes.

"Silly little agent. Did you think I'd learned nothing from tangling with your kind? This Beauregard is testing implanted subdermal armor for me. Magic might not be able to stop silver, but humans are remarkably adept at finding ways to keep their pathetic flesh-vessels safe." Quinn stepped fully into view, his left—and only—hand holding a long saber in the palm, his fingers wrapped around Arch's hair. Aside from the missing arm, he looked just as I remembered him, with the exception of the black collar with glowing runes wrapped around his throat. He grinned at me briefly, that smile promising all manner of suffering, before turning his attention back to Arch's head. "Funny how we endure for a few moments even post-decapitation. You'll be dead in seconds, so if you have anything to say to my spawn, I'd do so now."

I looked into Arch's eyes, from which the light was fading quickly, and noticed that he moved his lips silently, squeezing out a single word before his face went slack.

"Run."

6.

I did as I was told. I'm not proud of it, by any means. I dearly wish I could tell you that I was filled with righteous anger and that I rose up to stop Quinn and Beauregard right there, but if I had, then I wouldn't be writing this. That would be where my story ended, because they'd have easily overpowered me and, if I was lucky, killed me on the spot. No, I didn't find some hidden reserve of senseless bravery. Instead, I did what all humans, undead or not, have been hardwired to do since the beginning of dawn. I tried to survive.

Bolting back down the hallway, I did some quick mental math. Arch had said there were five vampires on the top floor, counting Beauregard. Between the three he'd killed and Quinn, that meant there shouldn't be anyone standing between me and the kitchen. Granted, I'd be plunging into floors with unknown amounts of vampires waiting for me, but there was at least a chance I could lose Quinn. With the time Arch had bought us, and the shadow-walker dust making me hard to find, I might be able to last long enough for the other agents to get back. I couldn't bring Arch back; however, I could still testify and make sure Quinn paid for the murder. That thought almost slowed me down; the grief at seeing a friend slaughtered made me want to fall over and weep. Survival is a powerful instinct though, and it wouldn't let me process the loss until I was safe.

Making it to the kitchen was easy. So easy, I felt a bit suspicious, not that I'd had any other options in the first place. With a giant, bulletproof uber-vampire blocking the front door, it was going to take someone with real strength to break through. All I had was a knack for numbers and a sweater vest. I bolted down the stairs as fast as I dared, making a break for the bottom floor. If I was lucky, which seemed unlikely, the first team would have finished searching it already, and I could hide out there for a while. Maybe I'd even be able to get into one of the jail cells with the silver bars. That probably wouldn't stop Quinn, but it might slow him down. At this point, I was playing a game of minutes, perhaps even seconds, where every bit of time I bought could be the difference between survival and death.

I made it to the bottom floor so fast it was a blur, leaping off the stairs and racing toward the cells. I managed exactly three steps before the vampires fell upon me from the shadows. Their grips were incredible. If they hadn't been drinking therian blood, then I didn't want to know what gave them this strength. They yanked me to the center of the room. Four of them had been here, had been waiting for me, with one grabbing each limb. I tried to prepare myself to be quartered, by which I mean that panic gave way to momentary acceptance of my fate.

Curiously, my life didn't flash before my eyes, as I'd always heard it would. Instead, my mind filled with images of the people I loved. Krystal, Bubba, Amy, Neil, Albert, Charlotte, Richard, Sally, Lillian, and even curmudgeonly Arch. My clan. My family. I hoped they'd be okay when I was gone. I hoped the death of a leader didn't hurt the clan. I should have looked into that. I should have done a lot of things differently. It was oddly clear, here at the end. I could see now all the places where I'd been letting my fears and insecurities hold me back. One of life's cruel jokes, I suppose, that only in the moments before death do we see our lives plainly.

Except . . . they weren't ripping me apart. The other vampires, all with the same sclera-tainted eyes, had dragged me to the middle of the room and were holding me still. It didn't take me long to realize why, as footsteps came from the stairs. Slowly, Quinn stepped into view, sword in hand and evil smile on his face. He walked across the ground slowly, savoring the moment as he stared at my captured body.

"You are not an easy man to get to, Fredrick Fletcher. It seems the longer I leave you alone, the more connections you make. Once the dragon liked you, I nearly gave up hope of ever setting eyes on you again, but then you turn up here, in my backyard, staying in a house I was already preparing to infiltrate. Truly, the gods smiled upon me this day."

"If it was this hard for you to catch an accountant, you might be losing your touch." I would like to claim this defiance as bravery; however, in truth, it was simply terror worming its way out. With the certainty of death gone, I'd realized that Quinn was capable of doing far worse than ending me, and my panic had returned. All I could think was to buy time, keep him talking, wait for someone to arrive. It was a poor plan, admittedly, yet it was all I had to keep me going.

"I see your bitch's rudeness has been rubbing off on you." Quinn smirked as I struggled against the other vampires. If they'd let me go, I doubt I could have done anything, but something still compelled me to try after he spoke about Krystal like that. "Oh, Fredrick, defiant as always. Why couldn't you just do what you were supposed to and go on a murder spree? I had so many plans to put into place while you were drawing the agents' attention. Do you even know how many people like you I had to kill before one of you finally turned? And of course, it was you, the one who wanted to play nice."

"Wait . . . what do you mean, people like me? There were others?" It was not the most salient piece of the discussion, I'll own up to that, but it served the purpose of keeping him talking. Besides, I wanted to know what the hell he was talking about. It's human nature to be curious about our origins, after all.

Quinn laughed, and as he did, the other vampires seemed to shake, like they were chuckling as well, though no sound escaped their snarled lips. "Oh my, have none of your dear friends told you yet? Turning a human into a vampire is a difficult, imprecise process. No one is ever entirely sure why.

Some believe it to be a curse placed on our kind to keep us from growing our numbers too fast. Generally speaking, only about one in every hundred people will actually turn into a vampire when properly drained and fed. The rest simply die.”

I looked away from Quinn for the first time, glancing at the four vampires still holding me still. One in a hundred didn’t mean he’d had to kill four hundred to make them, I understood statistics well enough to know that, but it did mean he’d probably killed a lot of people to form this little army of his.

“You like them? I had to work my way through quite a few transients and drifters to shore up my ranks without catching the Agency’s attention. Although, I will say this, Fredrick, you were a lesson for me. I no longer trust my spawn to act properly on their own. That’s why I took some time off to acquire the lovely accessory around my neck.” Quinn stepped closer, and as he did, I could see red lines running between the runes on his necklace, just like the ones in the vampires’ eyes. “Sires naturally have some control over their creations, you see, but those with strong wills can fight it. While I hardly expected you to qualify, it was a lesson worth learning. No longer do I take chances. Instead, this useful tool exponentially increases my control over my spawn. They follow my orders perfectly, even if I’m not in earshot. That’s why they were waiting for you, by the way, and why they work as such a well-oiled machine.”

A few moment’s prior, I’d thought death was scary, but the idea of having my willpower stripped away and being forced to serve Quinn as a mindless puppet . . . that was a whole other level of terrifying. Quinn seemed to drink in my fear, grinning wider as he sheathed his sword and stepped closer.

“I’m sure you were hoping to stretch this talk indefinitely so that help would arrive, but I’m afraid I’m going to have to cut this short, Fredrick,” Quinn said. “For a long time, I dreamed about killing you as payback for what you cost me, but ultimately, I decided against it. That’s too quick for you and your little clan. No, I think instead, you’re going to be found, wounded yet alive, and brought home. Once there, you’ll be the one to start killing off those friends of yours. One by one, until eventually, the bitch who took my arm is forced to put you down. Now that feels like a more appropriate punishment, don’t you think?”

Quinn’s hand gripped my chin, pulling my gaze upward until our eyes locked. Too late, I realized what he was doing and tried to shut them, but the powerful hands from my captors lifted my eyelids. His gaze burned into mine, and the collar glowed brighter. “Don’t worry, I only need eye contact the first time. After this, you’ll do what I say whenever I say it. You, Fredrick, are finally going to be the obedient, useful spawn you were always meant to be.” The collar brightened even more, to the point where it was hurting my eyes to look upon it. I’d have blinked the pain away if I could have, but instead, I tried to ignore it. Whatever he was doing, I needed to fight it. I needed to stay in control. I couldn’t . . . couldn’t let myself be a puppet. Especially not one he might use to hurt my friends.

“Hear me well, Fredrick, spawn of Quinn,” he said, voice low and heavy. The collar flashed, so bright I couldn’t see anything else. It felt like my eyes were going to burn in their sockets. “Hear me, and obey.”

7.

**Author's Note: While I was running from Quinn, there were quite a few significant events going on overhead, so I'm going to pass things off to someone who was actually there to tell what happened.*****

Every time I die, I have the same dream. Maybe it's a memory, but so many years have passed that I can't recall what the moment was truly like anymore. All I have is the dream that haunts me in the fleeting instants of death. She's there, of course. Lying on the ground, body shriveled and weak. Still beautiful, though. No matter how much time passes, no matter what happens between us, I'll always remember her as she was then, a perfect vision of kind, gentle loveliness. Were it just her, it might be a nice dream, even in the context of that particular moment. But it's not just her. I'm there too, and so is it. Dark wings spreading like dusk, gleaming eyes staring down at me, the scent of cinders and sulfur filling the air. I reach out to take one of its clawed, yet surprisingly graceful hands. A handshake. Such a simple gesture, with so much power behind it. Just as I take grip of those slender fingers, she looks up at the two of us from the ground and starts to cry out.

"Don't! Please, don't do this Arch—"

And then, as they always have since that day, my eyes snap open. Decapitation is a son of a bitch. Most wounds, I can shake off, they've self-repaired before I can fully notice them, but losing connection to the brain is another matter. Headshots and decapitation take me out of the action for a full ten seconds. If that doesn't seem like a long time to you, then I'm guessing you've never squared off against violent parahumans out for blood. Ten seconds is a lifetime, sometimes quite literally.

I didn't move. That lesson took me longer than I'm proud to admit, but eventually, I figured out that people ignore corpses. If I leapt up unprepared, Beauregard would rush me again, and I'd probably end up losing another ten seconds and starting right back on the ground again. Instead, I listened. There's an art to listening, to shutting out the world and yourself, focusing only on the certain sounds you want to track. It took me years to master, studying with some monks who'd dedicated lifetimes to it, but it was worth the effort. Besides, time is the one thing I have plenty of.

Beauregard was still nearby; he'd gone back to guarding the door, and had left my body in the hall. That was good luck for me; even someone that out of it would have noticed a head rejoining to its neck. Quinn had obviously done something to these vampires; the exact method he'd used was a mystery, but I got the general gist: he'd traded their intellect for stalwart obedience. He was hardly the first tyrant to do so, but it was a strategy that came with a lot of faults. Followers like that weren't soldiers, they were fodder. Extra hands attached to one mind that couldn't properly control them all. The big vampire blocking the door was no exception. If he'd had access to his own brain, he might have swept the area occasionally instead of just standing in the open waiting for trouble to come to him.

Faintly, I could hear footsteps hurrying down the stairs, and another set going at a slower pace behind them. Good, if Fred was still running, then he wasn't dead yet. Had I dropped in a more covert place, I'd have taken off after him, but my legs sticking into the part of the hallway facing the remains of the front door meant that the moment I twitched, the brute would be on me again. Helping Fred meant taking Beauregard down first.

One of the few upsides of dying: people tend to talk more freely to someone they think is being swept off the game board. Quinn was nice enough to give away why my bullets didn't work: subdermal armor. I doubted it was anything sophisticated; given Beauregard's misshapen frame, it was probably just lumps of metal or other hard material surgically placed below the skin. The poor guy had clearly been the test subject for a lot of Quinn's "upgrades," so I needed to be ready for anything. I was going to have to kill him, and while I took no joy in offing someone under obvious mental control, some part of me suspected that if the real person in there could speak, they'd have begged me to end it for them. Maybe that was a fantasy I concocted to ease my conscience, but I doubt it. I've been an agent for loads of years, and I did other work before that. My conscience made peace with this sort of necessity a long time ago.

Carefully, I tested my hands and found my weapons still in them. The body naturally seizes up in death, so I'd long ago gotten into the habit of taking firm grips on my tools when I was slipping over. Habits were important, almost as important as training. I took a slow, steady breath as I lay on the floor, mentally picturing how the fight would go. I'd move, he'd charge again, and the next few seconds would be crucial. Beauregard was faster, stronger, and tougher than I was. But those were odds I was accustomed to facing. Fred's steps were getting fainter; he was probably near the bottom of the stairs. I needed to hurry.

In a single, near-silent maneuver, I rolled my legs overhead and flipped into a standing position. Some part of me hoped that maybe Beauregard would be looking away at that particular moment, but the sound of his lumbering stride said that my usual amount of luck (none) was holding strong. This time would be different, though. This time, I didn't have to try to protect a civilian and fight.

The walls snapped and cracked as Beauregard slammed into them, showing about as much grace as I expected from someone his size. He whirled around, reaching for my head, but I'd dropped into a crouch and darted forward. Pain was going to be my friend in this fight. My enemy was irrational and incapable of complex thought, so the first step was to injure him and make him even more erratic. Without knowing where Quinn had shoved armor into the skin, I had to gamble that since Beauregard wasn't moving slow, he hadn't picked any spots that compromised maneuverability.

I pressed my gun's muzzle into the back of Beauregard's right knee and fired twice. Unlike when I went for the torso, these rounds went right through, expanding as they flew and nearly severing everything below the shin. I expected a howl of pain, but he barely grunted, even as he began to slump over. I guess Quinn knew that pain was easy to exploit as well, and had turned down Beauregard's sense of it. Inconvenient, yes, although it did mean no screams to alert Quinn that he was under attack again. Plus, Beauregard had lost the ability to maneuver, and that was really all the advantage I needed.

I kept my movement going, racing between his legs to the other side. Beauregard kept after me, spinning in place and tearing off more pieces of the already destroyed knee. He probably planned to snare me and drain me to repair the damage, but when he finished the turn, I was right there waiting for him. The gun was aiming down at his other knee, and even in his primal state, he understood the threat. Beauregard lunged for my right hand just as I'd hoped, leaving my left completely unattended.

Throats are another piece of the body it's hard to armor. Too many delicate pieces in there, even for vampires. A zombie might be one thing, but vampires live by drinking. Maybe one day, Quinn would find a way to reinforce that part of the body; he certainly seemed adept at this sort of horrible work. This experiment, however, was still vulnerable there, and I took full advantage of it. Slitting a vampire's throat won't actually do much, mind you, aside from annoy and momentarily injure them. Jamming a silver-composite blade through the throat and up into their brain is another matter entirely. My left hand finished the work before Beauregard could even lay a claw on my right, and he fell to the ground, heavy and limp.

I'll spare you all the gory details. Suffice it to say I quickly recovered my weapon and made sure Beauregard wouldn't be getting back up, then moved for the stairs. I could hear Quinn's voice; he was monologuing, and I found myself entirely unsurprised by that fact. It did give me some hope, however. If all he had brought with him were puppets, then that meant the only person worth talking to was Fred. All Fred had to do was keep him talking for a little longer, and I could get there to even things up. Quinn had gotten the drop on me before, I'm man enough to admit when I've been bested, but he'd find me a much tougher challenge when I didn't have to worry about a brute clawing my friend to death.

As much of a hurry as I was in, I still kept my pace steady and silent. Tipping Quinn off that reinforcements were coming wouldn't help anyone; it might even get Fred killed. So I was quiet and careful as I descended, arriving at the bottom just in time to see Quinn grabbing Fred's chin while a pair of his flunkies yanked Fred's eyelids open. Whatever whammy he'd put on the others, he was about to put on Fred. I rushed forward, lifting my gun to aim just as Quinn was speaking.

“Hear me well, Fredrick, spawn of Quinn. Hear me, and obey.”

And just like that, I knew I was too late. See, it's like I told you. Sometimes, ten seconds is a lifetime.

8.

**Author's Note: Since Arch and I rejoined one another here, I'll resume the telling of the story from this point.*****

I felt the magic wash over me. It burned as it struck, not like standing in a fire, but like the soft, radiating pain of a sunburn. The sort of pain I'd never get to truly feel again. The sensation was quite unique, and hard to put into words. The best way I've found to describe it is that I could feel Quinn's will surrounding me, burning me, intent on replacing my own sense of agency. I readied myself to fight it, to mentally scratch and claw for all I was worth in order to retain my sense of self.

And then . . . it faded away. Whatever latch it was looking to unhook in my mind hadn't been there, and as the glow of the necklace faded, I noticed two things: a look of total shock on Quinn's face, and Arch running forward from the stairs with gun raised. Honestly, it was hard to say which was more surprising, since I'd left Arch as a headless corpse in the hallway, but it was an easy choice to see which one was more pertinent.

"Arch! The necklace! They're under Quinn's control, and he's using the necklace!" In hindsight, giving away Arch's approach wasn't the soundest tactical move, but since he'd somehow shrugged off a decapitation, I was far less worried about his health than that of the innocent vampires holding me.

Quinn whipped around, moving so fast even my enhanced vision failed to track him. I heard the dim pop of Arch's muffled shot, but instead of a sudden hole appearing in Quinn, there was a sound of metal hitting metal. In the span of a blink, he'd drawn his blade and deflected the bullet. What on earth had he been drinking?

"You survived? My, my, you are quite the resourceful one. I think I'll have to take a taste of you and see just what you're made of." Quinn didn't sound nearly as nervous as I'd have liked him to. And why would he? He had a vampire squadron at the ready to do his bidding; one word, and they'd drop me to swarm onto Arch. Which meant they'd die, and Quinn would either use the chance to murder me, or slip away again, killing four more innocent people in the process.

I couldn't let that happen. He'd already hurt so many, me included. What he'd taken from these people was something they could never get back, but it didn't have to be the end. I was proof that there could be life after Quinn—just not if he used Arch to off them. They'd already lost their lives once; they didn't deserve to have their second chance taken as well. I wished I could think of something to do. With my arms and legs held tightly, all I had to use was my mouth, and while I might be able to manage some light taunting, I'd never summon the wit to distract Quinn from an agent with a gun. He was standing so close, too. If only I had one limb, one piece of my body to work with, I might be able to slow him down.

And then a memory flashed unbidden through my head, a snippet from the last time I'd had my entire body locked down like this—back at the high school reunion, when I'd been held on the shoulder of a werewolf/asshole. Maybe I wasn't so helpless after all. Quinn might have taken care of every one of my limbs, but he'd left me a vampire's most basic, powerful tool. With no time to think, I let the primal part of my brain do what it always wanted to do, what my kind were quite literally designed to do.

I bit. Specifically, I lurched forward and sank my fangs into the flesh of Quinn's left calf. Truth be told, after the last time we fought, and I failed to so much as even scratch him, I'd been prepared for my teeth to bounce off his flesh. Maybe he was drinking different parahumans these days, or maybe the fangs of a vampire have more piercing power than I realized. Whatever the case, they slid in easily, and I locked my jaw as fiercely as I could. This was a terrible position to be in. With my head extended, one swipe of that sword would slice through my neck as easily as it had Arch's, and I was pretty sure I wouldn't be getting back up from it. But it was a distraction, damn it, and it was the most I had to offer. All I could do was put my faith in Arch and hang on for dear life.

A lot of noises came quickly after that. Quinn yowled in pain, more pops from Arch's gun rang out, metal clanged as some shots were knocked away, and then . . . how do I put this? "Explosion" isn't quite the right word. It was more akin to getting hit with a massive blast of wind, only instead of air, it was light that buffeted into us—a blast of red light that tore out from Quinn and slammed into me and the other vampires so hard that it sent us hurtling into the wall, me with a chunk of Quinn's leg still in my mouth.

Vampires can generally take a lot of punishment unless there's silver involved, but I'll admit that my ribcage was rather rattled as I slowly pulled myself up after hitting the wall. I spat the bite of Quinn out—it was disgusting, and I'll do you the kindness of not trying to describe the taste—as I wobbled to my feet. My ears were ringing, and there were spots in front of my eyes that I tried to ignore as I scanned the room. This wasn't over yet; it wouldn't be until Quinn was captured or killed. I had to stay on guard until then, in case he decided to finish off his flunkies.

"He's gone." The voice came from over by the door to the cells, where Arch was standing calmly, lighting a cigarette. "After the collar broke, he started for you and the others, but changed his mind when I put a bullet in his uninjured leg. Instead, he made for the stairs right when I had to reload."

"So why didn't you chase him?"

"Because I didn't come here to catch or kill Quinn," Arch snapped, taking a long draw from his cigarette. "I promised Krystal I'd protect you."

Also, to be honest, I was kind of blind at the time.”

Now that brought me up short on whatever I was about to say. “Blind?”

“Yeah. Caught the light show full-force when the collar broke, and it burned out my eyes. They’re better now, thanks for asking. Though I will need some new enchanted glasses.” He nodded to the set of frames on the ground, which were smoking and crumpled.

“But you said you shot him in the leg,” I pointed out.

Arch let out a breath of smoke, like a short, gun-toting dragon. “I said I was blind, not deaf. Being able to shoot without vision comes up more than you’d think. Anyway, why don’t you go ahead and step on over here, Fred. I’d like a little space between you and the others before they shake that explosion off.”

Moans and squirming were coming from near me, but I made no move to leave my fellow vampires. “They’re not bad people. Quinn was controlling them with the collar.”

“Maybe. Or maybe he told you that so you’d let your guard down around them. Or they were bad people who signed on and then got whammied. Heck, maybe they’re starved and will attack the first thing they see. Point is, without knowing their situation, I can’t risk you being too close.”

Arch was raising valid points, and I knew that, despite my addled senses. All the same, I willfully ignored those points and reached down to grab the shoulder of the nearest vampire. It was a young man, probably not much older than Neil, who let out a small yelp at my touch. “Hey, hey, don’t worry. It’s going to be okay. Quinn’s gone now. You’re safe.”

For a few seconds (which probably weren’t that long, but that, in the moment, seemed to stretch on indefinitely), there was no response. Then, slowly, he tilted his head up and stared me in the eyes. The red lines reaching across his sclera were gone, although it looked like there were dark scars where the lines had been. “He’s . . . gone? You’re sure? What if he comes back? What if he calls to us again?”

“Quinn isn’t coming back tonight,” I assured him. “Quinn runs when he can’t win, and he can’t beat my friend over there. The artifact he used to control you is broken, too. It’s okay. You’re safe. I promise.”

The discussion pretty much ended there. Not because the vampire grew silent, mind you, but because he collapsed back to the ground and started weeping. I lifted my eyes from him to Arch, who had nearly finished his cigarette.

“It’s possible I may have been more worried than necessary.” He reached into his coat, but instead of pulling out a gun, he produced cell phone. I was tempted to ask where that had been earlier, but then I realized: who would he have called? Even if they'd known about the trap, his old teammates would still have had to prioritize stopping a Ghoul Lord over protecting one vampire who already had an agent with him, and no one else would have been near enough to help. Arch clicked a few buttons, then held the receiver to his ear.

“Evening. I’m going to need a transport team with some counselors on board. We’ve got a batch of vampires that were turned and controlled. I imagine they’ll need a lot of therapy. Also, put me on Veronica’s books for a meeting next week. Someone just used my friend as bait, and I’m damn well going to know who.”

9.

Things happened quickly after Arch's phone call. The team came back, a few of them sporting small wounds and looking worn out, although that was nothing compared to the panic that hit them when they saw the state of their base. Arch calmed them down and explained things, though I wasn't around for the exact conversation. I kept myself planted on the lowest floor with the other vampires until help arrived. Part of me had been wondering what kind of counselors would show up; after all, the Agency seemed like a place where people were given a shot of whiskey and told to "walk it off" when trauma happened, but perhaps I'd underestimated them. It turned out that people being forcibly turned into different parahumans wasn't as uncommon as it should have been, and they had an entire department dedicated to helping people cope with the change.

None of the vampires had really recovered by the time the counselors came to take them somewhere more stable, and I didn't blame them. Being trapped under Quinn's control, having their bodies used like puppets . . . I couldn't even imagine what it would take to come back from that. One of them, however, did manage to tell me his name. Doug was the vampire I'd talked to earlier. He gave me his name just before leaving, and I handed him some of my business cards in case he or any of the others needed to talk. I didn't know if they'd call or not; maybe this was something they'd want to bury deep and never think about again. I just had to let them know I was around to listen if they needed it.

Once the vampires were gone and Arch was busy with his team, I did the only thing I could think to do: work. Well, that's not entirely true. First, I took an hour to do some research and reserve a few items online, then I got back to work. It was probably pointless—inventory didn't matter much for a base that might very well have to be abandoned, now that it was compromised—but I was determined to do my job. It was how I found peace in the chaos, and more importantly, I didn't want anyone at the Agency saying I'd shirked my duties. This was going to be a shitshow, I could see that already, and I wanted to offer little ammunition for whatever was coming.

Arch kept checking in on me regularly, and I had a long conversation with Krystal to let her know I was okay. She'd been shipped off to Seattle on assignment not long after we left—none of us thought that was a coincidence—but should be back by the time Arch and I wrapped things up. Wallace, Marj, Paula, and even Harris stopped by as well, each making small talk and checking on me without staying long. They meant well, and I knew it, but they'd lost touch with how to talk to people who didn't live in mortal peril constantly. They understood that the events had been hard for me, yet to them, it was really just any other workday. Aside from those visits, people mostly left me alone. I think they were glad I put myself out of the way, as there were bigger issues for them to tackle, anyway.

It was nearly a day later when the door to the room I was in—the last room I was inventorying, in fact—slowly opened. This time, my visitor wasn't Arch, or one of the team. Instead, I found myself looking at the bald, pale head of Roderick. It was the first time I'd seen my DVA contact in person since the interview, though we had done a few video chats to work through particularly complex files.

"Glad to see you're looking well, Fred."

"You too, Roderick." It was a little more curt than I might normally have been, but given my feelings toward the Agency at that moment, it felt justified. I kept on task, counting up the shotgun shells the team stored by the case.

Roderick took a seat in one of the hard metal folding chairs and set his briefcase on the ground. "For what it's worth, and I know that won't be much, I tried to push back on sending you here. The danger was obvious, anyone could see that, and I didn't want to subject you to it. I'm sorry this happened."

"It's . . . okay. I've been in a company before. I know how powerless you feel when your bosses make poor choices you can't change." Bothered as I was by what had happened, it didn't make sense to take it out on Roderick. He was a cog in a machine; all he could do was turn in the direction he was ordered.

"Thanks. And if it helps, I think it's safe to say you're not going to be getting any assignments that are even remotely dangerous for a while," Roderick said. "This whole thing was a pretty big clusterfuck. People are pissed, and I don't just mean Arch. Gideon has filed a formal complaint that we willfully endangered your life, and I know that sounds like nothing, but when the King of the West complains, trust me—people listen."

"Gideon filed a complaint for me?" I was shocked, and not just by the fact that Gideon was capable of playing by the rules enough to do anything formally. I didn't think he'd care enough about me to make the effort.

"Well, officially his complaint was that, since you save his host money on taxes every year, and that money is often spent housing Gideon, by endangering your life, we were effectively robbing him." Roderick let out a long, weary sigh. "And dragons do not take being robbed lightly. It's been a long day."

Now that sounded more like the Gideon I knew. I was still touched by the gesture though, even if I suspected that the real motivation was that Sally liked me, so my death would trouble her. It was a kind act, regardless, and I made a mental note to write him a thank you card once I was home and my bigger tasks were handled.

“Roderick, I don’t mean to be rude, I know you came a long way to have this meeting, but I’m nearly done with my job. Once it’s finished, I’m getting on a plane and going home, which I greatly look forward to. So if we could perhaps skip the small talk and pleasantries just this once, I’d really appreciate cutting to the heart of the matter.”

His egg-like head bobbed up and down in agreement as he lifted his briefcase and took some pages out. “You know the Agency has a reputation for being ruthless and scary, one I won’t deny is somewhat earned, but part of representing parahuman interests means owning up to and making amends for our failures when they happen. What happened here was a mistake, and no one is claiming differently. We put a useful freelance asset into an unstable field position knowing that a dangerous criminal would probably go after you. That’s wrong, and shitty, and someone is going to answer for it. But since we brought you back into the focus of a dangerous, wanted vampire, the least we can do is offer protection from here on out. You’re getting a bodyguard, Fred.”

“A bodyguard? Do you have enough agents that you can spare one to just follow me around? Also, and I think this is worth noting, I already spend most of my time in a magically fortified house with two other agents.”

“Bodyguarding is a different skill than being an agent, though sometimes our people retire into that job. We’ve got some sources we trust for this kind of work, and I’ve personally been selected to head the search. Krystal and Arch will both have to sign off on whoever I pick as well, just to make sure you get someone who can do the job.”

I finished counting the shotgun shells and made a brief notation on the paper. “I appreciate the gesture, but no thank you. I don’t think Quinn is going to come to Winslow anytime soon. Between the therians and Gideon, it’s not a safe place for him. If you want to give someone a bodyguard, give it to those four vampires he left behind. There’s no telling if he’ll come back for them.”

“The sentiment is noble, but it isn’t really up for discussion.” Roderick walked over and handed me the pages, none of which required a signature. I wasn’t being offered this; I was being told it was happening. “You’re important to several of our people, and you got handed a raw deal. Nobody is willing to risk that happening again anytime soon. Don’t worry about the other vampires, either. We’ve got programs for them, all Agency run. I promise, Quinn won’t get within a hundred miles of those four on our watch.”

I read over the documents Roderick had handed me. There wasn’t much to unpack; it was largely a breakdown of what my bodyguard would be accountable for and the tasks that could be assigned to them. Straightforward and simple, a peace offering, though one I wasn't entirely sure was really directed at me. This whole bit felt more like I was a valued possession of someone important rather than important myself. I could have probably fought it if I wanted to, surely there were avenues available, but the truth of the matter is that I simply didn't care enough at that point. There were bigger things on my mind than the Agency saying they'd work to keep me out of danger.

"Fine. If Krystal and Arch are making the final selection, I guess it's okay. Just don't rush or anything, okay? I'd like to preserve my privacy for a little while longer."

"The selection process takes time," Roderick assured me. "And even when you have a bodyguard, they'll be adept at discretion."

I wasn't sure how much I believed that, but it was something to worry about another day. So long as the guard never got access to my clients' accounts, there wouldn't be much to fret over. It wasn't like I did anything worth spreading about as gossip, anyway. However, since I was giving in on the point, I decided to use my small bit of leverage. "Look, Roderick, I won't fight you on this, but I want you to do something for me. Keep me updated on how the other four vampires are doing. Nothing private; they deserve their own lives. Just let me know how they're getting along overall from time to time. And if they need anything, let me know. We abandoned vampires have to look out for one another."

"I think I can swing that," Roderick agreed. "But you're not really an abandoned vampire anymore, Fred. You have a clan."

"Doesn't change the fact that we all share the same horrible sire," I countered. "Just keep me in the loop. That's all I want."

"Consider it done." Roderick picked up his briefcase once more, putting the chair away before heading toward the door. "We've got a plane waiting for you whenever you're done here, or whenever you just want to leave. There are other people who can do this kind of work."

"Maybe so, but Fletcher Accounting Services doesn't leave its job's half-finished. Thanks for coming out, Roderick. Hopefully next time, we'll see each other under better circumstances."

Roderick took his leave, and I went back to the task at hand. The truth was, pride in my work wasn't the thing keeping me there. I just had time to kill, and I preferred to spend it doing something. If I sat around, I'd get in my head and probably talk myself into chickening out on what I still had to do.

Because as scary as the last few days had been, they were nowhere near as terrifying as the task waiting for me back in Colorado.

10.

“So, has anyone figured out why Quinn’s magic necklace didn’t work on you?” Krystal was holding my arm as we strolled through the park, a night of cloudless stars twinkling overhead. She and I had been almost, though not quite, inseparable since our respective returns to town. It was only thanks to the fact that she needed sleep that I’d been able run a single covert errand.

“No one seems to be sure, but the best idea I’ve heard so far is that it’s like my silver-immunity. Whatever changed in me when I channeled Gideon’s power broke the connection between sire and spawn that Quinn would have exploited. It’s just a theory, mind you. We’re still in uncharted territory.”

Krystal pulled me in a little closer, nuzzling her head against my shoulder. “At this point, I’m so comfortable in that realm, I’m not sure I could deal with actually knowing what’s going on. I still wish I could have been there to cap Quinn for good, though.”

It wasn’t the first time she’d expressed such a sentiment, and I didn’t expect it would be the last. Krystal was among the most powerful people I knew, which probably made it all the more frustrating when she couldn’t use that strength to protect the people she cared for. I suspected that, deep down, she felt guilty for not finding a way to tag along, ridiculous as that was. Her job was a serious one, and disobeying orders wasn’t something to do lightly. Given the circumstances, she’d done the best she could. I not only knew that, I appreciated it.

“Quinn is slippery; getting away is what he does best. In the end, it worked out okay.” Well, okay except for the vampires Arch had killed during the attack. Even knowing that it was unavoidable, the thought of so many innocent lives lost turned my stomach. I was trying hard not to dwell on it, but I’d begun to see their faces in my dreams. I didn’t know how Arch could handle the guilt; probably practice.

Together, Krystal and I walked along the park’s concrete path, winding through its grassy expanse. Despite the nice weather, we had the place pretty much to ourselves. That was one of the perks of being nocturnal: at three in the morning, there were precious few instances where I had to deal with crowds. Our walk continued in silence, over a bridge that crossed a small pond, where I could see ducks sleeping on the shore. It was nice, peaceful, a fine contrast to the busy townhome where I’d spent the last few days. On any other night, I’d have reveled in the ambiance, but that evening, I barely noticed. I was so anxious, it was taking all my focus to keep my hands from shaking.

“Hey . . . wait a minute. I know those tables and benches.” Krystal let go of my arm, pointing to a picnic area not far off from where we were standing. “This is the park where we met Neil and Albert, isn’t it? Hoping to find another LARP group, Freddy?”

“No, having that experience once was more than enough,” I replied. “But I did realize that this was the park where we met them. It was our first real adventure-date, unless you count the high school reunion, which I decided not to for various reasons. Most important being that I didn’t think I could get you to go all the way back to Kent with me.”

Krystal turned from the benches, confusion and a touch of suspicion splashed across her face. “You’re not usually the overly nostalgic type, Freddy. Something going on?”

“Absolutely.” I stepped closer to her, absorbing every detail of the moment as best I could. Nearly being torn apart had made me realize how much I was taking for granted, and it was a lesson I was determined to learn from. “Krystal, during the attack, there was a moment where . . . where I was sure I was about to die. Not like the times when I’ve just been in danger. This was different. I knew, in the deepest part of my heart, that it was over, and I faced that truth because it was the only thing I could do. It was . . . well, not a pleasant moment, but an enlightening one. I saw things with a new clarity, especially where you were concerned.”

Her suspicion was quickly overtaking her confusion, her features starting to grow sharp and defensive. Given the way my words were coming out, I could hardly blame her. It was going about as smoothly as I’d expected, which was not very smooth at all. “Go on.”

“What I mean to say is that, for a long time, I’ve looked at this relationship with a short-term view. I figured that sooner or later, whatever attraction or need was keeping you with me would fade, and I’d go back to being on my own. You’re an agent, Krystal, and a great one at that. I’m just a guy who likes working with numbers. I could never see a real place for me in your life.” She was looking more and more bothered, so I kept going without pause. I had to get through all of this.

“Then, when I almost died, I realized how utterly idiotic that whole idea was. I’ve gotten to meet other agents, and I’ve finally realized that they aren’t mythical beings divorced from humanity. They’re just people. People with a lot of power, sure, but people trying to do their best, all the same. They have hobbies, and fears, and friends, and things they care about. Your job isn’t what’s going to end us. I am, if I keep letting my own insecurities and fears get in the way of what I know we both feel. And while I’ve made my peace with many forms of cowardice, that’s one that I cannot stand for.”

Krystal stared at me, the suspicion shifting back to confusion as she took my long, admittedly rambling, speech in. “I’m glad you’ve realized you’re not just some phase for me, Freddy, I really am, but I have to wonder where you’re going with this.”

In response, I took her wrist and slowly lowered one of my knees down to the concrete below us. My hand was fumbling, there was no stopping the shakes anymore, as it dug into my khakis and produced a small black box. Finding a ring had taken some care, but thankfully, most jewelry stores posted their wares online. Once I had one reserved, it had just been a matter of slipping out while she was asleep. I'd never been particularly adept at secrets or lying; however, some things were meant to be a surprise.

"Agent Krystal Jenkins, I love you with everything that I have, and everything that I am. You are the most amazing, exhilarating, terrifying, heroic, gentle, and loving creature, human or otherwise, that I've ever met. You're not just my best friend, you're my favorite person, and I want to spend however long our immortalities last at your side." I flipped the top of the box open, nearly dropping it, but somehow managing to hang on as the ring came into view. "Will you marry me?"

Krystal didn't answer so much as dive forward and tackle me the rest of the way to the ground, kissing me so hard it probably would have drawn blood from another person. We stayed like that for a time, embracing under the stars and the moon's soft spotlight. Finally, perhaps because it seemed like the time had come, or maybe because she needed air, Krystal pulled away long enough so speak.

"In case you couldn't tell, that was a yes."

"I was hoping, but I didn't want to make any assumptions." She grinned at my stupid joke and kissed me again, though this time, it was far more tender, which I enjoyed as well. When it ended, I continued. "Also, a fair warning: the others are putting together a party for us back at Charlotte Manor. I figured that if you said yes, we'd want to celebrate, and if you said no, then I'd want my friends and some cake."

"Bubba found out and insisted on throwing a shindig, didn't he?" Krystal asked.

"Very much so," I admitted. "But I didn't object as much you'd expect, so I'm counting that as partial credit for planning it."

"That seems fair."

Krystal got to her feet, and I followed her lead, pausing to lift the ring from its box. Carefully, my hands still a bit shaky, I slid the metal circle topped with a diamond onto her finger. It went on without issue, gleaming in the night's gentle light. She stared at it, tilting it to and fro as she admired her new accessory. "It's beautiful. You picked a good one."

"We both did." That earned me a laugh—the short kind that burst from her mouth when she was genuinely caught off guard. Those were my favorite.

"I should probably give you a little warning, though. Us getting hitched will come with some . . . unique paperwork issues," Krystal told me.

“But we can deal with those later. Tonight, let’s celebrate.”

While not generally one to put off paperwork, on this occasion, I was in full agreement. There would be time to deal with the inevitable hurdles and obstacles of such a union, but it wouldn’t be this evening. Tonight was about friends, and cheer, and the overwhelming joy of finding someone to share our lives with. The rest could wait until we were damn well ready for it.

My fiancé took my arm once more, and we began walking back the way we’d come. It was time to go home.

About the Author

Drew Hayes is an aspiring author from Texas who has written several books and found the gumption to publish a few (so far). He graduated from Texas Tech with a B.A. in English, because evidently he's not familiar with what the term "employable" means. Drew has been called one of the most profound, prolific, and talented authors of his generation, but a table full of drunks will say almost anything when offered a round of free shots. Drew feels kind of like a D-bag writing about himself in the third person like this. He does appreciate that you're still reading, though.

Drew would like to sit down and have a beer with you. Or a cocktail. He's not here to judge your preferences. Drew is terrible at being serious, and has no real idea what a snippet biography is meant to convey anyway. Drew thinks you are awesome just the way you are. That part, he meant. Drew is off to go high-five random people, because who doesn't love a good high-five? No one, that's who.

Connect with Drew

Thank you for reading my book. If you enjoyed it, won't you please take a moment to leave me a review at your favorite retailer? Or, connect with me below!

Follow my blog: <http://www.drewhayesnovels.com/>

Follow me on Twitter: <https://twitter.com/DrewHayesNovels>

Follow me on Goodreads:
https://www.goodreads.com/author/show/7077654.Drew\_Hayes

A hand is shown typing on a silver laptop keyboard. The laptop screen displays a document with a table and a pie chart. A yellow notepad with the name 'Drew Hayes' and bloodstains is on the desk. Two black banners with white text are overlaid on the keyboard.

BLOODY ACQUISITIONS

Drew Hayes

BLOODY ACQUISITIONS

Published by

COPYRIGHT

Bloody Acquisitions © Copyright 2016 by Drew Hayes. All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopy, or any information storage and retrieval system, without permission from the publisher, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews.

Cover design by Ashley Ruggirello
Cover art Copyright 2016
Interior formatting by Ashley Ruggirello
Edited by Kisa Whipkey and Rae Oestreich

Paperback ISBN: 978-1-942111-35-1
Electronic ISBN: 978-1-942111-36-8

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events or locals is entirely coincidental.

REUTS Publications
www.REUTS.com

Table of Contents

*Dedication*

Preface

A Hunter in the Streets

Book One – Chapter One

Book One – Chapter Two

Book One – Chapter Three

Book One – Chapter Four

Book One – Chapter Five

Book One – Chapter Six

Book One – Chapter Seven

A Sheriff in the Country

Book Two – Chapter One

Book Two – Chapter Two

Book Two – Chapter Three

Book Two – Chapter Four

Book Two – Chapter Five

Book Two – Chapter Six

Book Two – Chapter Seven

A Lawyer in the Mansion

Book Three – Chapter One

Book Three – Chapter Two

Book Three – Chapter Three

Book Three – Chapter Four

Book Three – Chapter Five

Book Three – Chapter Six

Book Three – Chapter Seven

Book Three – Chapter Eight

A Spy in the Company

Book Four – Chapter One

Book Four – Chapter Two

Book Four – Chapter Three

Book Four – Chapter Four

Book Four – Chapter Five

Book Four – Chapter Six

Book Four – Chapter Seven

Book Four – Chapter Eight

Book Four – Chapter Nine

Book Four – Chapter Ten

An Accountant in the City

Book Five – Chapter One

Book Five – Chapter Two

Book Five – Chapter Three

Book Five – Chapter Four

Book Five – Chapter Five

Book Five – Chapter Six

Book Five – Chapter Seven

Book Five – Chapter Eight

Book Five – Chapter Nine

Book Five – Chapter Ten

About Drew Hayes

Connect with Drew Hayes

Copyright

Dedication

This book, the third in a series I wasn't sure would get off the ground beyond the first, goes out to the wonderful readers who've made this possible. Thank you for taking a chance on the strange tales of a socially awkward vampire accountant, whose stories I hope to be telling for a long time to come.

Preface

I almost certainly do not know you; however, I shall assume you are a lovely person, and it is my loss for not having yet had the opportunity to meet you. Still, I must assume you and I are connected in some way, for the works you are about to read are selections from a journal of my memoirs. I compiled these not in the belief that the stories within are so compelling they must be told, but rather because I found my unexpected life transition to be so shockingly uneventful—at least initially. I place the blame for my aggrandized expectations squarely on contemporary media, filling my head with the belief that a ticket to the supernatural also put one on an express train toward coolness and suave charm.

This is simply not the case. Or, at least, it was not my case. I recorded my journeys in the hopes that, should another being find themselves utterly depressed at the humdrum personality still saddling their supernatural frame, they might find solace in knowing they are not the only one to have felt that way. Given the lengthy lifespan of many of the people with whom I associate, there is no guarantee they will have passed on by the time this is read. Therefore, names have been changed as I deemed necessary.

So, dear reader, whom I suspect is a wonderful person merely in need of a bit of reassurance, take comfort in my tales of uneventful blundering. One's nature is hard to change; sometimes even death is insufficient to accomplish such a task. But be assured that, while you might find yourself still more human than anticipated, you are far from the only one. You will eventually discover that under the movie stereotypes, imposed mystique, and overall inflated expectations, each and every one of us is at least a touch more boring than our images would indicate.

And that is not a bad thing.

—Fredrick Frankford Fletcher

A Hunter in the Streets

1.

“While I’m glad you don’t fall into the old female stereotype of having lots of shoes, part of me wishes you did. I’d much prefer to be lugging around high heels than yet another box full of guns.” As gently as I possibly could, I set the cardboard cube down on Krystal’s empty counter. Normally, there was nowhere near enough kitchen space cleaned off to fit even a single glass, let alone a whole box of armaments, but today was different. Today, her entire apartment was almost stripped bare, with much of the furniture going off into storage or being returned to the rental locations they’d been taken from.

Today was moving day, which was why I’d been roped into helping to haul the possessions she was keeping—including what had to be an illegal amount of firearms even for an agent—off to her new home.

“Don’t be such a baby. My collection is nothing. You should see the armory that Arch carts around everywhere.” Krystal emerged from her bedroom, a duffel bag packed with more of her knives, batons, and other melee gear rattling on her shoulder. “Plus, like I’ve been saying ever since the word came down, this is ultimately all your fault. Once the Agency found out what a deal you’d gotten for Arch, they didn’t see the sense in paying for me to have a more expensive, less defended apartment.”

While “fault” seemed like an aggressive term, there was no denying that I had set in motion the chain of events which resulted in Krystal’s fellow agent, Arch, moving into the animated house on the outskirts of Winslow, Colorado known as Charlotte Manor. On top of coming with three meals a day and all utilities included, Charlotte was also something of a magical fortress, built by a commune of insane mages and meant to repel all but the most powerful of attackers. Granted, not everyone would be thrilled by the idea of living in a home that was self-aware and always watching, but for people like Krystal and Arch, the loss of privacy was well worth it to be able to sleep with both eyes shut.

But perhaps I should step back briefly, in case those last few lines seem like the raving of a madman or incomprehensible gibberish. My name is Fredrick Frankford Fletcher, and I am a Certified Public Parahuman Accountant. Also, a vampire. Despite what film and television might have led to you believe, joining the undead does not inherently make one suave, cool, or even particularly more socially competent. What it does do, however, is thrust you into a community that lives in the normal world's shadow, a society comprised of parahumans. That very community has technically endangered my undead life several times, but it has also helped me meet a variety of friends I would never have run across in my mortal days, so it's not that bad of a trade. Krystal, my girlfriend, makes her living working for the agency that polices our kind, ensuring that all the laws and treaties of our various peoples are upheld. It keeps her on the road a lot, which is just one more reason why moving to Charlotte Manor made more sense than her previous arrangement.

We hauled our respective loads down the stairs, setting them into the back cab of Krystal's pickup truck, where she'd saved a space specifically for the weaponry. My hybrid was already filled with the more mundane objects like clothing and dishes, rather than firearms and blades. She had the security clearance to be walking around with half a riot squad's arsenal; I didn't, and even for vampires, traffic stops are still a possibility.

"And that . . . is it." Krystal slammed the door closed, causing me to jump as I waited to hear the guns go off, despite her assurances that they were all unloaded. She chuckled, but didn't call me out on being startled, likely because I was in the middle of doing her a favor. "Bubba and Amy should be about done with their load by now, so once we get the dangerous stuff inside, we can break for night-lunch."

Much as I wished she'd think of a new term for our customary meal around midnight, being my equivalent of a mid-day point, I was never going to object to enjoying Charlotte's cooking. While it's true that I primarily need blood to survive, I can still dine on human food. My body gains no nutrients from it, but that's never really the best part of eating a fine meal anyway, is it?

"I just have to swing by my place real quick to fire off an email," I told her. "Promised to have some acquisition forms sent out before morning."

"Can't Albert do that?" Krystal asked.

"You already dragged Albert and Neil into helping you move," I reminded her. "They took the first couple of boxes. And anyway, there's a bit of prep work to do, which puts it out of Albert's depth. Great assistant or not, some tasks require my personal touch."

Krystal leered at me for a few seconds—her way of letting me know I was on thin ice—before finally relenting with a sigh. “I’ll let it slide this time, but don’t take too long. These boxes aren’t going to unpack themselves.”

“I promise to be as quick as possible,” I assured her.

“I’d prefer you promise to hire some more help,” Krystal shot back. “Even vampires need rest, you know.”

She had me there. When I first got my CPPA license and began courting parahuman clients, I’d been fearful there wouldn’t be enough business to sustain the investment. What I discovered was that this was a hole in the market that desperately required filling, and over the past few months, it had been all I could do to keep up with the influx of new clients. Fletcher Accounting Services needed to expand, which was far easier said than done. Parahumans might be in ample supply, but precious few of them wanted to make their living as accountants.

“It would be nice,” I agreed. “My original plan was to get Albert trained up as he grew more familiar with the practice, and then pay for him to obtain the necessary accounting degrees. But with the sword training, that’s just not viable.” Several months prior, Albert had pulled the Blade of the Unlikely Champion from its sheath. Technically, that didn’t come with any built-in responsibilities; however, everyone had agreed it was best he get comfortable using it, just in case. Which, in fact, was why Arch had moved to Winslow and needed somewhere to stay in the first place. Despite seeming human, Arch was quite old, and renowned for his abilities as a trainer, among other things.

“I’ll keep an ear to the ground, just in case I come across any good candidates.” Krystal pulled open the door to her truck, then paused to lean in and give me a short, but forceful, kiss. “Don’t take too long with your work, or I’ll let them start night-lunch without you.”

“Only a few minutes, at most.” She let it be, getting into her truck and heading off before I’d so much as gotten my own car’s door unlocked.

The truth of the matter was that I knew exactly how long the work would take, and it would be seconds, at most. I’d purposely left it undone specifically so I’d have an excuse to split up from her when the last load was packed. I’m not a terrible liar, but Krystal is an agent for a reason, and telling the truth made it far less likely that the real reason I was going back to my apartment would be uncovered.

After all, it wouldn’t be much of a surprise housewarming party without the surprise part. Or a cake, specially ordered from a bakery back in Krystal’s and my hometown of Kent. It was a favorite of both of ours, and a nice way to ring in the new with the old. But I needed to hurry. The plan was for everyone to distract her with unpacking while I picked up the cake and brought it to Charlotte Manor.

Turning on my engine, I started to floor it, then remembered my car was full of Krystal's possessions—some of which were almost certain to be illegal for a non-agent to have, dishes or no—and resumed a far more moderate pace.

2.

It turned out to be a good thing that I was driving so carefully, because, if I'd come racing up to my building, the spiky metal balls hurled under my tires might have caused me to completely spin out of control. As it was, I held on to the wheel as three of my four tires blew out at once, foot pressing on the brake so hard that I worried I'd snap it off, until I came skidding to a merciful stop a few feet from the curb. Thankfully, the late hour and lack of nightlife in my neighborhood meant the streets were clear, so I didn't hurt anyone as I scrambled to get my automobile halted. That didn't last long, though. I'd barely begun to reach for the door, my fingers shaking from shock and fear, when a new figure stepped out from a nearby alley.

He was tall, with close-cut brown hair and a scar just below his left eye. A large brown coat concealed most of his body, but when he moved, I could catch a peek inside, which was not a comforting sight. Wooden stakes, bulbs of garlic, the telltale shine of guns, silver chains, and several other bulges I couldn't quite make out during my brief glimpse all sent my usually anxious mind into overdrive. His hands dipped inside, coming out with a pair of pistols. Krystal could have told me the make and model, but all I knew was that they were big, and would undoubtedly punch a bloody hole in any part of me they were aimed at.

I froze, fingers still wrapped around the handle, until he motioned for me to get out of the car. With only one good tire, escape was off the table, so I didn't have a lot of choice. Besides, I was sure this was some sort of misunderstanding. Maybe an agent had been given the wrong address for a rogue vampire, one who didn't adhere to the law as carefully as me. A simple call would sort it right out. At least, that's what I told myself as I climbed slowly out of my car.

"Don't move. Don't try anything." He barked more than spoke, gesturing with the guns. Now that I was out, I could catch a glimpse of his eyes for the first time, and I noticed how wild they seemed. Every agent I'd met was a bastion of control—even Krystal's chaotic attitude came with a carefully measured understanding of how much force was needed. But this man . . . I felt like he could begin firing at any moment. That certainty I'd had about the misunderstanding began to erode, ever so slightly.

"Empty your pockets on the ground." It struck me that I might just be getting mugged, which was an oddly comforting thought. Possessions could be replaced, and some crook was far less dangerous than a person actually keyed in to the parahuman world.

I did as I was told, dropping my wallet, car keys, and cell phone to the concrete. As soon as the last item hit the ground, he took quick aim and fired, causing me to jump back and turning my phone into nothing more than plastic debris. Undead or not, guns are scary things, especially when pointed at you, and I decided it was time to try and start extricating myself from this situation.

"I'm not sure what charges are being leveled at me, but I'm willing to go along peacefully," I told him. "If you could reach out to Agent Jenkins, I'll trust her to arrange proper representation. We do still get lawyers, right?" It had never occurred to me until this very moment, yet it suddenly seemed strikingly relevant. America's constitution did provide representation for all its citizens, but parahumans had a somewhat different set of rules. Since they helped form the country, they'd negotiated their own sets of laws to accommodate the need for things like hunting and magic. Sometimes it meant we could get away with more than normal humans, sometimes less. I imagined due process had to be factored in there somewhere, though.

"Representation?" He sneered at me, those wild eyes twitching irregularly. "You think I'm dumb enough to take you to the cops? I know what you are, and I know those cells couldn't hold you for long. Isn't that right, vampire?"

The way he said it, like it was a big reveal . . . I think I was supposed to react more. Like the silver chains and garlic didn't give away what he thought he was confronting. Although, now that I finally had a chance to think about it, why would an agent bring garlic? Vampires are allergic to it, but only in the sense that our lips get puffy and our throats sore. It's useless in any real capacity, and an agent would definitely know that.

"You're not affiliated with the Agency, are you?"

"Keep talking nonsense, and I'll do this right here in the street," he snapped. "No, I'm not part of whatever organization you use. Just a man who saw what was happening and couldn't stand for it any longer. Took me a long while to find this town's first vampire, until I thought to stake out the local hospital's blood supply. Your little flunky didn't want to talk, loyal one you've got there, but I got it out of him eventually."

“You didn’t . . . ?” Granted, what Dr. Huerta and I had was purely a business relationship—he sold me blood and I, in turn, worked the hospital’s books to keep them afloat come tax season—but I certainly didn’t want the man dead.

“No, I don’t kill humans. Just monsters.” Slowly lowering one of the guns, the other staying tight on my center of mass, he pulled out a length of silver chain from under his coat and tossed it onto the sidewalk in front of me.

“Wrap yourself.”

“And if I do, then what?” It wasn’t that I was suddenly feeling brave; it was more like the rational part of my brain was finally beginning to outpace my fearful reaction to the sudden surprise. Whoever this man was, he obviously wasn’t an agent. While that made him weaker, physically, it also made him more dangerous. Agents were part of something with rules; they were accountable. That seemed unlikely with my would-be kidnapper, which meant going along peacefully could be more dangerous than making a break for it. Well-prepared or not, there was no way he could keep up with the strength in my undead legs and lungs that didn’t need air.

“Then we go for a drive, and when we get somewhere more private, you’re telling me everything you know about all the other bloodsuckers in this area. If you do that, then I’ll make it quick. If not . . . well, I’ve got nowhere to be, and you monsters seem to be able to take a lot of punishment.”

If I’d had any lingering doubts about the value of running away versus trying to reason this out with him, those words killed them. This man was unhinged, and while someone obviously needed to deal with him, that . . . well, that was what agents were for. My best bet was to escape, contact Krystal, and let her know there was a madman who fancied himself a vampire hunter on the loose.

He was staring at me, and the longer I waited to touch the chains, the tighter his grip on the trigger grew. Getting out of here without any bloodshed seemed more or less impossible, but I could at least keep it minimized. Leaning forward, I started to reach for the chains. When I was a few inches away, I saw him relax just a bit. Little as it was, I still seized the opportunity, lunging to the side with balance precious few humans could hope to match and launching into a dead sprint down the sidewalk.

I felt the bullet hit at the same time I heard the gunshot, tearing through the back of my shoulder and wedging itself somewhere around my spine. If not for the natural toughness of my vampiric body, it likely would have carved straight through me. As it was, the bullet stung, and the shock of the impact caused me to stumble slightly.

“How’s that feel, monster? The silver burning you as it rips apart your flesh? I’m still learning about what works on you things, but I’ve seen firsthand just how potent silver is at putting you down.” He was walking toward me, no doubt expecting me to fall to the ground in a heap as the bullet did its work.

Truthfully, it was a pretty good stopping measure, as such things went. Silver acts a magical insulator and disruptor, weakening most parahumans just by touching them. Shoot us with a silver bullet, and the most we'll manage is a crawl. However, the problem with that strategy was that it only works on most parahumans. Some come from other realms and have reactions to different metals, like the Fey and their aversion to iron. Others, such as dragons, are either immune or so powerful that their magic can't be insulated—no one is entirely sure.

As for me, several months prior I'd allowed an ancient dragon of immeasurable power to use my body as a conduit to escape his prison. The process hadn't been a fun one, and I'd needed a lot of blood and rest when it was over, but overall, I'd come out more or less unscathed. Except for the one odd side effect that no one had been able to entirely explain: I was no longer bothered by silver.

For some vampires, that might have been a boon that made them incredible warriors, nigh unstoppable on the battlefield. I, however, used that immunity to recover from my stumble and kept on running away from the crazy man in the coat.

"Hey!" He let out a yelp of surprise as I dashed into the night, firing off a few more rounds. I felt one of them graze my back but not actually break the skin, and assumed he'd traded out for regular bullets.

Within seconds, I turned the corner, and after another minute of running, not even my enhanced ears could hear his chasing footsteps anymore.

3.

After a few minutes of racing through town, it began to occur to me that I had no real idea of where I was going. In the initial burst of panic, my plan had been simply to get away as fast as possible. Now that I was out of immediate danger, it was time to move on to step two, which I had in no way tried to come up with.

I slowed my run, taking in my surroundings. Winslow was a large city, not quite metropolitan but far from the farming town I'd grown up in. This area wasn't familiar, which was hardly surprising given that I'm an introvert who usually works from home, but there were well-lit street signs I could use to get my bearings. The comfort of that thought lasted exactly as long as it took me to dip my hand into my empty pocket and realize my phone was in pieces on a sidewalk. Inconvenient as that was already, it was made doubly worse by the fact that I, like most people in the modern age, also used the GPS function to guide me around. Without my phone, I had no idea how to get anywhere familiar.

Taking deep breathes to try and relax—some habits refused to die even though I already had—I fought down a rising wave of panic and forced myself to think. Paper maps still existed, not that I had the money to buy one, but if I found a gas station, I might be able to figure out where I was and a route to take me somewhere safe. Or, if they happened to have a phone book, there was a chance I could look up the number to Charlotte Manor and let everyone know I needed a lift. Granted, if I remembered their numbers, I could just call direct with any phone, but of course, I hadn't needed to dial them since putting the numbers in my phone the first time. I cursed myself for becoming so dependent on modern conveniences, even as I began to jog down the street looking for any open businesses.

With nothing else to do but think and search, my natural instinct to worry soon kicked in. The concern at the top of the heap was for Dr. Huerta, who it seemed was alive, but likely in rough shape. Given how quickly the vampire hunter had gone to the torture method with me, it seemed a good guess he wasn't shy about using pain to get information, even from humans. Once this was all over, I'd make a point to check in on Dr. Huerta, mostly to see if he was all right. In my truest heart, I knew there would be a selfish component to the visit as well. Being tortured by an insane man because he was stealing blood would quite likely put a strain on our working relationship. There was a very real possibility that, after tonight, I'd have to find a new source of blood, which would be far more problematic than just dealing with a crazy man.

Luckily, I didn't get too far into a building anxiety spiral before my eyes fell upon the familiar blue glow of a Slurp Stop gas station sign. It was a bit run down, but the lights were on and I could see a clerk standing at the counter, visibly bored as he tapped away at his phone's screen. I hurried across the street, stepping into the station and causing the small bell overhead to let out a shrill jingle.

The clerk glanced up from his phone. "Welcome to Slurp Stop, how can I—holy shit!" His eyes went wide and the phone fell from his hand, clattering to the floor. "Hang on, dude, I'll call an ambulance."

For a moment, I just stared at him, genuinely puzzled. What on earth was he talking about? Then it hit me: his vantage point let him see me from the side, which meant he was at least catching a glimpse of the blood-stained tears in the back of my shirt and sweater vest. The wounds had already closed—we vampires are known for our rapid healing—but the evidence of the shooting still remained. Add in that I have the tell-tale pale pallor of a vampire, and it probably looked like I'd been shot and was on the verge of bleeding out.

"Oh, oh no, no, no." I held up my hands, though I have no idea why. It just seemed like the right motion to try and reassure him. "I'm fine. Well, not fine fine, I do need to use your phone if it's okay, but this is . . . for a costume party." We were nowhere near Halloween, so I'm not certain what on earth made me feel like this was an acceptable excuse for wearing a torn and bloody shirt. Strangely enough, though, it worked, and he began to nod, looking less like he was on the verge of fainting.

"Are you going as a shooting victim?" Now that the emergency had passed, he sounded more annoyed than bothered. Guess he didn't enjoy being made to think that someone on death's door had just stumbled in during his shift.

"Sure. It was what I could throw together at the last minute." The rest of the tension finally left his body; evidently, that was a sentiment he could comprehend. A small bell, different from the one over the door, drew his eyes away from mine as a pair of headlights flashed through the window. A beat-up sedan was pulling into the nearest pump, no doubt refueling for its own late-night adventures.

“Hang on.” The clerk reached under the counter and hefted up a phone book that was at least three years old, a fact which would have been more concerning if Charlotte Manor hadn’t been a Bed and Breakfast for several decades. He spun a large phone with a curly cord over from behind the register and pushed it to the edge of the counter. “I think I’m supposed to make you buy something before you can use this.”

“That would be problematic,” I admitted. “I was . . . let’s say mugged, a few minutes ago. It’s why I don’t have my own phone in the first place.”

“Sort of figured.” The clerk sighed, then nodded to the phone and the book. “It’s cool, man. No one really cares about what happens on the night shift.”

“Thank you so much.” I rushed forward, picking up the massive tome of thin pages and flipping through them. The sooner I found Charlotte’s number, the sooner I could alert the others, and the sooner Krystal could get the proper authorities after that psycho. I was only inconvenienced by bullet wounds, but the next person he went after, parahuman or not, might not be so lucky.

This time, the bell I heard was the one for the door, though I didn’t find that particularly odd. Someone buying gas would have to pay for it, obviously. The sound of what movies had told me was a shotgun being pumped did prick my attention, however. Even then, I might have been able to convince myself it was just a robbery, if not for the scream of “Die, you monster!” that came just before the gunshot.

I didn’t bother glancing behind me; instead, I hurled myself over the counter, tackling the clerk to the ground in the process. Quick I was, I still felt some of the shotgun’s blast on my leg as we fell, but the more vulnerable flesh of the clerk remained mercifully unmarred.

“Shit! I’ll give you the money. You just had to ask!” Fundamentally misunderstanding what was happening (and really, who could blame him?), the clerk was yelling from our prone position even as he worked to get out from under me.

I took the opportunity to glance at one of the many anti-shoplifting mirrors that provided a comprehensive view of the store from the counter. Sure enough, it was my hunter, looking even more angry and deranged than when I’d given him the slip. He pumped the shotgun again, sending a spent casing tumbling to the ground, and I had to wonder how much he knew about forensic science. Leaving evidence all over like that, he’d soon have the regular police on him as well. And given that he’d just shown a willingness to bring down bystanders, that didn’t bode well for those who came to collect him.

“I thought you didn’t kill humans!” At this point, my mind was racing, trying to figure out how he'd located me and, more importantly, how to get away. At least if I could make him talk, I might buy a few seconds to work things out.

"I don't. Not intentionally." He wasn't yelling his replies, just stating them like cold facts, which only served to make me more worried. "But every war has casualties. Better one lost now than all the others you'd kill."

And now the clerk was staring at me, and my bloody shirt, in a whole new light. Hopefully, he'd write this all off as the insane screams of two mentally ill people who'd wandered into his gas station. That was the best case scenario for him, at least.

"You keep saying things like that, but I don't hurt anyone. I'm just an accountant!"

"I know what your kind does. I've seen it. Save your lies for the Devil, monster." Now I could hear the emotion in his voice—fury and loss twisted together like coiled serpents around his heart. That was when I knew, for sure and for certain, that no amount of talk would get through to him. Not from me, anyway. I needed to get him out of here and away from the clerk, lest he decide to torture someone for the sin of helping me.

"When I get up, you need to sneak out of here," I whispered to the clerk. "I'll buy you time, but you have to go. Understand?"

There must have been someone in the heavens looking out for me, because the clerk nodded his head and then flipped his position around, ready to move.

Moving slowly, because not even I was sure I could survive a shotgun blast to the head, I emerged from behind the counter with my hands held up. With one large step, I moved on top of the counter, then slid down the front, ending up with only a few feet between me and the hunter. He watched me with those same wild eyes, never letting a single one of my motions escape his gaze. That was exactly what I wanted, though, as it meant he wasn't watching as the clerk crawled along the floor, keeping below displays and making his way toward the back of the gas station.

"What's your name?" I'll be honest, even I'm not sure what I was hoping to accomplish, I just wanted to create noise in order to muffle the clerk's escape attempt. My ears were primed, tracking his every movement until he was safe, which would be my cue to run for it. That said, I wanted to be the only one aware of that movement, which is why I started up the small talk again.

"Trying to befriend me now? To weave a new set of lies?" His finger grew tighter on the trigger.

"Every man deserves to know the name of their executioner," I said, though, looking back, I'm almost certain I stole the line from an old noir film. Like I mentioned earlier, I was very much just running on whatever popped into mind.

“Maybe so, but you’re not a man, you’re—”

“A monster? You know, we don’t really like that word. Lot of connotation that purposely paints us in a negative light. Some consider it a very pointed insult.”

“I’ll be sure to keep that in mind. When I kill the next one.” He took a step closer to me, keeping the gun steady. “My name is Colin. If there’s an afterlife for you things, be sure to tell the others I sent you there.”

“Nice to meet you, Colin. I’m Fred.” Here, a mix of fear, worry, and habit convalesced into my defaulting to professionalism. I could hear the clerk getting to his feet from across the station; it was almost time to act.

“A real pleasure, Fred.” He began to lift the gun, no doubt lining up a shot with my skull. “Time for you to die.”

And just like that, everything suddenly went black.

4.

It took a moment for me to realize that my life hadn't ended for the second time, and that my head was still rightly attached to my shoulders. The clerk, that wondrous little slacker, hadn't just run out the back, he'd also killed the power on his way, plunging the entire gas station into darkness. For the hunter, that was a serious issue, but vampires are made to be nocturnal. If anything, our vision in darkness is better than in light. I seized on the moment of confusion and darted to the side, out of the area where he'd been preparing to open fire.

The report of the shotgun blast made it clear that I hadn't moved a moment too soon, as the hunter heard me racing through the station and realized his moment of hesitation had cost him the opportunity. Another shot, this one wild, obliterated a display of beef jerky twenty feet to my left. He was aiming blind, but eventually his eyes would adjust and I'd be in trouble again. Best to go while the going was good.

I burst through the front door, hitting it so hard I shattered the glass and knocked the metal frame out of the wall. Another shot and the sound of more breaking glass told me that he'd been able to follow at least the basics of my movement. I was about to start racing down the street again when my eyes fell upon the beat-up sedan that had pulled into the gas station. While I didn't know how he'd managed to find me, this was obviously how he'd been able to match my vampiric running speed. If I could disable his ride, I might be able to shake him for good.

It would have been a simple matter half a year earlier, when a drop of dragon's blood was augmenting my strength to incredible levels. Then, I likely could have flipped the whole thing over, or put a fist through the engine. Vampire strength on its own wasn't quite up to that level, however, so I was forced to take a far more unpleasant option.

Darting to the side, I raced up to one of his tires, opened wide, and sank my fangs into the rubber. While I usually considered keeping my sense of taste a true blessing, at that moment I'd have traded all the fine cooking and wine in the world to have a dead palette. I'd bitten into fire extinguishers that were less disgusting than the mouth full of tire I had to chew on. If I were able to throw up, I doubtlessly would have, but since vampires lack that reaction, I instead pulled back, ripping out a massive chunk of tire and then spitting it to the ground. Awful as it had been, my goal was accomplished; there was no way he was going anywhere until he got a new tire, and by then I'd be long gone.

The sound of footsteps on broken glass alerted me that he'd left the station, so I didn't waste any more time. Keeping clear of the pumps, because he definitely seemed like someone crazy enough to shoot at gasoline containers, I began another sprint, running as hard and as fast as I could away from Colin the hunter. I kept up the pace for a solid ten minutes, ignoring the strange stares of the few people out and about as I whipped by them at inhuman speeds. While I usually preferred discretion at all costs, it was definitely taking a back seat to survival.

Finally, I slowed down and tried to get my bearings. This section of Winslow at least looked a little familiar, and I realized that I'd run to a part of town not far off from Richard Alderson's office. Ordinarily, that would have been as good as salvation, since the local head of the therianthropes (the general term for all were-creatures) was a client and a friend who certainly would have offered me shelter. Unfortunately, he, along with his young daughter Sally, were also guests at Krystal's surprise party, which by now had likely kicked off, cake or no. I could try and approach the office anyway, but most therians had a bit of suspicion as far as vampires were concerned. My kind had a bad history of feeding off therians to increase our own power, so I was tolerated only due to my usefulness to Richard.

Of course, there was always the possibility that Gideon, the King of the West, was still in the office. I was never really sure where I stood with him, though. The ancient dragon who masqueraded as a child didn't appear to loathe me, but I wasn't certain he'd intervene on my behalf, either. And if I strolled up to the front doors with a madman on my tail, that could put the other therians in danger. There was no way they were going to look kindly on that kind of stunt. But I might be able to talk someone into letting me use a phone, which was still my best bet at salvation.

Eventually, I decided to start heading in that direction, keeping my eyes open for better options. I didn't want to endanger another innocent person, but I still had no idea how to get to Charlotte Manor outside of using the highways, and someone racing down the road in that public of a spot was bound to be noticed. Scary as Colin the crazed hunter was, I still preferred him to Krystal's Agency being pissed that I put parahumans in the public eye. They were not well known for their kind or forgiving nature.

As the sound of my loafers echoed through the empty street, I fell into something of a pensive state, my mind no doubt trying to find some solid ground after braving the tidal wave of crazy that was my night so far. I imagined how nice it would be to finally make it back to Charlotte Manor, where everything in the world I cared about currently was. It was strange to think that all of my friends and loved ones were gathered together right now, safe and happy and nowhere near the danger that was bloodying my clothes piece by piece. The oddness was not that I begrudged their being out of harm's way—it was a far cry better than seeing them in peril—but because it was usually those friends who got me into trouble in the first place. Tonight, however, was completely my own doing. My arrangement with a hospital had been the clue Colin used to find me. If I'd never gone to my high school reunion, never met Krystal and by extension everyone else, this still would have been happening. And part of me wondered, without those friends constantly exposing me to some measure of adventure, how would the old Fred have handled things?

Truth be told, I didn't think he would have survived that first encounter. Even if they weren't actually here at the moment, the experiences my odd little family had given me were what kept me alive. It made me long to be back with them all the more, and I finally noticed that I'd unconsciously quickened my step. I was hurrying toward Richard's building, carried by feet that were too ready to be done with the evening to fear being turned away at the door.

With no other real options, I decided that perhaps it was best just to roll the dice. I needed help, there was no shame in admitting that, and without his car, the odds of Colin tracking me were negligible. Even if he did somehow know where I went, at most he'd have cause to think I went to a big building full of offices, and one garish club, to try and use their phone. At least, that was the thought process I hoped he'd have.

I could see Richard's building when I was suddenly spotlighted in the headlights of a car pulling out from the road in front of me. My body tensed, ready for Colin to point a gun out the window or try to run me down, but then I noticed the bright yellow color of the vehicle and realized it was just a cab, probably taking someone home from a late night at the bar.

Unfortunately, my tense body turned out to be smarter than my logical brain as the tires beneath the cab began to spin and it lurched forward, trying to turn me into nothing more than a smear on the road. As it raced toward me, I caught a glimpse of the man behind the wheel.

Sure enough, there were the mad eyes of Colin as he floored the accelerator, trying with all he had to run me over.

5.

While in life my reaction speed was always somewhere between “abysmal” and “for the love of heaven don’t let Fred hold anything too valuable,” the turn to undead had sharpened my reflexes significantly. Granted, they were nowhere near as potent as they would have been if I were even remotely physically gifted when alive, but sometimes all you need is good enough. In this case, good enough was allowing me to leap out of the way of an oncoming taxi cab as it careened toward me, only dodging the bumper’s left corner by a few inches.

The screech of tires filled the air as Colin jerked the wheel around, trying to get another run at me, but now that the element of surprise was gone, he had no hope of outmaneuvering me. I began to race up the street again, when a sound unlike any gun I’d ever heard filled the air. Pain, dull and muted but still present, filled me as I looked over at my previously unshot shoulder. Now, the tip of a large metal claw was sticking out, smaller tines already dug into my flesh. Unbidden memories of watching nature documentaries filled my head as I recognized the iconic shape.

“Did you just harpoon me?”

“Modified it a little to cling on to you slippery bastards.” Colin was leaning out the window, spear gun in hand, and that was when I saw the length of metal cord running from the back of my shoulder to the butt of the gun. Not wasting any time, Colin jerked it in, bracing the gun against something unseen inside, and threw the taxi into reverse.

While I might have physically been able to react in time, I was mentally still processing the fact that someone had harpooned me in the middle of the street, which was why I didn’t understand what Colin was doing until the cord pulled taut and my feet went out from under me. I bounced off the road once, then twice, then finally got my feet under me and ran along rather than be dragged. Had Colin floored it again, not even I would have been able to keep pace, but he seemed content to keep the speed manageable. He was leading me, trying to get me to a place without as much room to run.

I tried to pull out the harpoon, but every time I reached for it Colin accelerated, knocking me off balance if not outright sending me sprawling. It still might have been manageable, even with the shifting speeds; however, my own regeneration was working against me. The wound around the spear had almost completely sealed up, meaning that instead of just pulling it back out through the same area, I had to try and rip apart my own resilient vampire flesh.

Much as I disliked Colin, I couldn't say he hadn't come up with an effective method for ensnaring vampires.

We didn't travel far, only a few blocks down the road. Colin backed the cab into an alley behind a closed noodle shop I'd loved to order from before they went out of business, and killed the engine. He stepped out from the cab, dark coat still flapping, showing off the wide array of weapons he had tucked about inside. The spear gun wasn't one of those, as he left it wedged in the cab even as he stepped away. I was still on a line, and unless I found a way to yank the harpoon out or drag an entire cab along with me, he'd finally managed to take running away off the table.

"You are a tricky one," Colin noted, pulling out his pistol again. "Silver has stopped every vampire I've dealt with, so why didn't it work on you?"

"Kind of a long story, and honestly, I doubt you'd believe me." My hands fumbled with the harpoon, tugging at it as I tried to get free. The hooks were made to keep me from pulling it back out, which meant forward was the only option. Of course, then I'd still have a metal rope running through me, and I wasn't sure my hands alone could snap something like that. There was the option of biting through it—I'd met very little a vampire's fangs couldn't pierce—but that was a lot of steps to freedom, and Colin wasn't going to wait patiently while I did them all.

"You're right, there; I'd never believe one of your lies." He reached into his coat with his free hand and pulled out a small squirt bottle, like the kind that go on bikes for long rides. "I've hunted a couple of your kind already, but you are far and away the worst of the lot. At least the others had the decency to own what they are. You, you burrowed into society like a tick, pretending to be normal, to be human. You tried to infiltrate us, and that makes you much too dangerous to live, even long enough to interrogate."

"There is another, far more logical explanation," I pointed out. "I lived in an apartment because it's my home, I bought my blood because I didn't want to hurt people, I kept working a normal job because I love what I do. This is just me. I'm not a monster, just a guy whose life took an unexpected turn."

"Whoever you might have been is dead. I know what lives inside you creatures, and there's no goodness there. Just death and blood." He popped the top off the bottle and took a sniff, his nose recoiling slightly.

"Funny, by my count, you're the one who shot at an unarmed clerk, tortured a doctor, and, I'm assuming, stole a cabbie's car at gunpoint." My hand rested on the top of the harpoon. Maybe I didn't need to bother with the rope; if I just popped the hooked part off, I could yank the rest out and get free. That was still no easy task, but it seemed more viable than biting through the metal rope. And, more importantly, it seemed faster, which was starting to feel like a very important element in this encounter.

"Sometimes, you have to be a monster to kill a monster." Colin stepped forward, gun at the ready, and squirted me with the contents of the bottle. Even if I didn't have an incredible sense of smell, I'd have recognized the scent immediately: gasoline. He squeezed the bottle until it only spit out droplets and empty wheezes, then dropped the plastic container to the ground.

"Have you ever noticed that not once, despite everything you've done tonight, have I attacked or even tried to make a threatening move toward you?" Panic was slipping back into my voice, and with good reason, because while I might be immune to silver, there was no reason I would have any such resistance to fire. I knew for a fact that vampires could burn to death; it was the one death I'd witnessed up close and personally. Though, at the time, Krystal had been the one doing the burning, and the vampire in question was not one I'd miss.

"You sell the lie well, but I'm not going to be fooled." Colin reached back into his coat and pulled out a silver lighter, the old-fashioned kind without safety measures to keep it from burning without a thumb on the plunger. Behind him, I noticed a shadow move beyond the taxi. It was difficult even for my eyes to see, though, and I wasn't sure it had even been real.

"Colin, please listen to me, you're making a big mistake. I get that you hate vampires, I really do, and I don't know what you've had to do to survive before this, but what you're doing right now is murder. Beyond that, it's stepping into a world you really don't want to be a part of. Please, go turn yourself into the cops, do your time for the car theft and the gas station shooting, and then go on to live a normal life."

"That's a unique way to plead for your life, I'll give you that," Colin replied. He flicked the lighter and a bright orange flame sputtered forth from the top. I took hold of the hook, feeling the sharp blades cut through my palms as I readied to try with all my might to snap it off. This move was a gamble, but it was the best one I could make. If I managed to get clear, there had to be a way to end this without anyone getting hurt. I just needed to think harder.

"You really don't get it," I told him. "It's not my life I'm pleading for. If you do this, there's no going back. And the people who'll be coming for you don't share my tendency to shy away from violence."

"Why would I want to go back? Especially with such a bright, warm future ahead of me." Colin reared back to toss the lighter, and I pushed down with all my might on the top of the hook. It bent down at a sharp angle, but refused to break, and in that instant, I knew I was dead.

As it turned out, however, Colin was no more successful with his toss than I with my escape attempt, as a sharp, sudden blow struck him across the back of the head. He crumpled to the ground, the lighter falling through the air for only a second before a pale, well-manicured hand snatched it up and snapped it shut.

"Wow, that guy seemed like a real asshole." The voice of my savior was soft, with undercurrents of an accent that had long since been worn away by time. She had dark hair trimmed to just above her shoulders, sported a pantsuit that would have fit right in at any office in America, and was as pale as a sheet. If that weren't enough, she flashed a small grin, just large enough for me to see an extended incisor at the top of her mouth.

For the first time since my own maker had tried to kill me, I was in the presence of another vampire.

6.

A slight groan broke the silent tension between this new vampire and me as Colin shifted on the ground. He was still unconscious, and given the amount of blood coming from his head, it would be some time before he was fully recovered. Actually, unless he had some sort of parahuman ability I hadn't noticed, an attack like that would leave him with neck, if not brain, damage. It's hard to understand just how fragile humans are until you stop technically being one.

"Sorry about that. Let's finish this jackass all the way off." The woman leaned down, mouth opening wider as her fangs began to extend even further.

"Stop!" I darted forward, spraying gasoline from my flailing limbs as I hurried to put myself between my savior and the hunter who had tried to kill me.

"Oh, my apologies. That was rude of me." She stopped, still bent halfway toward his unconscious form, then began to rise once more. "You're the one he attacked and stabbed, of course you should get to have the privilege. Not to mention, it looks like you could use the blood."

She had me there; the hooked head of the harpoon was bent but still lodged in my chest, tethering me to the car. What's more, my efforts to rip it off had re-opened the wound, which was slowly oozing a darker blood than normal. I mentioned before that vampires heal exceptionally well, but as I'd begun to learn, all magic came with a cost. For us, it was blood. Just like a human burned calories for energy, we burned blood, and the more strenuous the activity, the more it consumed. After racing around town and healing several gunshot wounds, I was feeling more than a bit peckish. A few nips from Colin's neck and I'd be topped off, able to easily free myself and heal up.

"Neither of us is drinking from him." The words were a little more forceful than I'd meant them to be, and the female vampire regarded me more carefully. I quickly tried to explain myself.

"I mean, we need to wait for the authorities. The agents. He's obviously suffering from trauma or mental illness, and much as I might like to return the favor for this harpoon in my shoulder, I think it's for the best all-around if we let due process handle this."

She chuckled a little, a slightly higher pitch than I was expecting from her speaking voice. "Mind if I ask your name?"

"It's Fredrick Fletcher. But most people call me Fred."

"Fredrick, a classic name. I rather like those. I am Lillian." Without warning, she dipped her head and did a small formal bow. From the way her eyes went wide and she quickly sprang back up, I had a feeling it was more out of habit than deference.

"Well, Fred," Lillian continued. "This is the due process. This man, this human, tried to kill you. Have you committed any crime against him or his kin?"

"I . . . I don't think so. Not that I'm at all aware of."

"That doesn't surprise me; I've heard tales of a lone hunter going after our ilk lately. It was on my to-do list, some ways after tonight's meeting with the therians. At any rate, he tried to take your life, and as an Undead American, that means his life is yours to end. No muss, no fuss, no need for any agents."

Lillian spat that last word out, which didn't come as much of a surprise. Since I'd come to the parahuman world as an outsider, and my first friend in it was an agent, I hadn't been given the indoctrination of fear that a lot of others had. Truthfully, at first, I hadn't understood why everyone was so afraid of someone like Krystal. Then I saw Quinn, my maker, try to kill her. That sole experience had taught me that, if anything, people weren't afraid enough of agents.

"So, Colin's life is mine to take, right?" I asked, making sure I understood the minutia of what was happening. That's the thing about living in a country partly founded by parahumans: we do have rules about how things go, and arbitrary as they often felt, I knew that they mattered. Because agents existed specifically to deal with those who broke those rules.

"Correct," Lillian assured me.

"Then I choose not to take it. I spare him. And since he never even saw you, let alone fired a shot, I don't see that you have any similar claim. If you kill him, it's murder."

Bathed in the glow from the taxi's headlights, swaddled in the sounds of its still barely running engine, Lillian and I stared at each other for a long while. If she made this violent, I was done for. Even if I was normally a match for other vampires, which I wasn't, an evening of getting the utter crap kicked out of me had left me battered and weary. Unless Lillian was somehow more averse to violence than myself, a notion which Colin's bleeding head easily dispelled, she'd take me down in seconds. Hell, she was still holding the lighter, which meant she didn't even really need to get her hands dirty.

"You surprise me," Lillian said, speaking at last. "Not with your softness—you are far from the first doe someone has tried to turn into a wolf—but that you noticed that detail. I'm impressed. Most in your state wouldn't be capable of keeping such a calm head. Unfortunately for you, and this hunter, there is one flaw in your argument. I am a vampire, and he is a criminal. That much I heard him confess myself. By the law, that means he is fair game for me to feed upon, and while I'll certainly try not to kill him, accidents do happen. So tell me, how will you save the hunter this time, Fredrick?"

I'm not proud of how long it took, but that was when it finally dawned on me that Lillian didn't actually care if Colin died or not. Somewhere in the discussion, he'd become inconsequential. What she was interested in was me, or rather, if I could stop her from killing him. This was a game to her. Brains or brawn, she wanted to see what I was made of. Knowing that, I realized I only had one move left. I needed to go for a high stakes gambit.

"I guess I can't stop you," I told her, but even as I spoke, I began to back away. "Just, give me a few seconds to get clear first. I really don't want to be close enough to see what happens to you."

Her brow creased. This was not a method she'd been anticipating, because why on earth would she? It didn't really make sense, but if I shuffled the facts around fast enough, she might not notice that.

"What do you expect to happen? The hunter is down. I would easily sense if he'd awakened."

"Oh yeah, Colin looks down for the count. In fact, I think he needs some serious medical attention. But see, nuts as that hunter is, he's also shown himself to be really smart. He found out what I was by staking out my blood supply. He took away my car and communication before anything else. When I ran, he kept finding me, and I still have no idea how he pulled that off. Not to mention his weapons. Silver, fire, all the classics, plus some ingenious stuff of his own." I tapped lightly on the hook sticking out of my chest to illustrate the point.

"I'm sure he was quite formidable, before I cracked him in the back of the head," Lillian said. Her brow was still creased, but she was starting to grow impatient. She thought I was stalling for time, instead of building up to something.

"Formidable, and suicidal," I corrected. "No concern for his own well-being what-so-ever. If I weren't . . . me . . . then there were several chances I could have used to kill him tonight. Tell me, someone like that—someone cunning and informed, with very little sense of self-preservation—doesn't that seem like the kind of man who would booby trap his own blood, just in case he lost? One last ‘screw you’ to the vampire that brought him down?”

That got her attention. She looked from me to Colin, to the blood slowly streaming from his forehead. “Silver is poisonous to humans as well.”

“Not right away. They can have a lot of it in their system before it does them in. There would be long-term side effects, but that only matters for someone who expects to live through the year. And it wouldn’t take much to hurt a vampire, especially from the inside.” It took everything I had not to fidget, or break our eye contact, or give any other indication of just how full of shit I was. I had no idea how long a human could last with silver in their body, or what amount of it would get to the blood, or how it would impact a vampire who drank it. This was all speculation and conjecture, which is a nicer way of saying a complete wild guess. It was all I had, though.

My only hope—actually, Colin’s only hope—was that Lillian didn’t know any more about the subject than I did. She contemplated him again for a while, then walked over to me, moving slowly until she was only inches away.

“Fredrick Fletcher, you are an interesting one.” Reaching out, she took the hook poking through my chest and snapped it clean off, almost effortlessly. I’d love to say the bend loosened it for her, but the implication was clear. She’d been partaking in more blood, probably even that of other parahumans, and was much stronger than I was. That’s the most dangerous thing about vampires—when we drink the blood of other parahumans, we absorb part of their ability. The strength and regeneration of therians is apparently a popular favorite, and the exact reason why so many of Richard’s staff look at me with distrust.

“Congratulations, Fredrick. You have saved this hunter’s life. I have no claim to kill him unless I am feeding, and you make the proposition of ingesting his blood a bit more than I’d like to gamble. That said, this sort of behavior cannot go unpunished.” Lillian walked back over to Colin, the hook of the harpoon clutched tightly in her hand. Her foot flipped him over, pointing his unconscious face toward the sky. Dragging the blade of the harpoon forcefully across her skin, she opened a small cut on her palm.

I realized what she was about to do only seconds before it happened, and by then, I was already too late. Lillian crouched down and pulled open Colin’s mouth, letting a few drops of her blood fall into his throat. That done, she carefully lowered his head back to the ground and looked up at me.

“Did . . . did you just make him a vampire?”

Lillian snorted, and as soon as she did, her eyes widened again. It was a brief moment, but it helped dispel a lot of the tension in the air. She’d slipped for a moment, letting me see that at least some of this “creature of the night” routine was for show. But the snort was gone, her face solemn again, and I chose to let the incident pass without comment.

“Fredrick, you really need to learn more about your own people. A vampire must drink a human’s blood, then give them some of their own in order for the change to occur. What I have offered is nothing more than a bit of magical booster, something to speed his healing along. Of course, if he does have silver in his system, that healing will be quite the painful experience. But he’ll survive, and be none the worse for wear. Eventually.”

Then she was up again, stepping over Colin and walking past me. From her pocket, she produced a small phone, one a bit sleeker than what I’d lost. Moving her thumb at exceptional speed, she clicked through several menus, tapped a few digital buttons, and offered the phone to me. “Something tells me you need this more than I do.”

“Thanks. Let me just look up the number and make a quick call—”

Lillian was already walking off though, shaking her head as she did. “Keep it; I’m due for an upgrade anyway. Plus, I wiped all the personal information. It’s yours now, for as long as you like.” She stopped, partway out of the alley, and looked out at the city of Winslow.

“You know, Fred, there are some interesting tales coming out of this city. Stories about one of our kind who’s like no other. They say he brokered a peace with the therians, courted an agent, and that even the King of the West calls him by name. Part of why my clan has come is to try and broker a meeting with him, if he even truly exists. Should we succeed, I’ll text that phone, perhaps even make an introduction. Someone like you could learn a lot from that sort of vampire.”

Then she was gone—well, from the alley at least—but her words lingered long after her, even as I looked up the number for Charlotte Manor and finally called my friends. People were telling stories about me? And not only that, they were getting all the details screwed up. My stomach twisted into a bundle of nerves, though I was technically out of harm’s way, and it wasn’t hard to figure out why.

After several years as a vampire, I was finally beginning to get a sense of when there was trouble on the horizon.

7.

“Well, the bad news is that your car is going to need some serious work. It looks like Colin punched out a window and shot the engine when you ran off, which isn’t surprising given the rage issues. Good news is that Bubba knows more than a few trustworthy mechanics, and the Agency is going to create an accident report where you aren’t at fault for your insurance company.” Krystal walked into the room, classically decorated and far from her style, not even pausing to kick off her boots before she dropped into bed next to me.

It hadn’t taken long after the call for Krystal to show up, along with Bubba, Richard, and Amy all packed into her truck. Arch drove his own car—a surprisingly well-maintained Cadillac that was easily older than anyone other than its driver. They’d managed to arrive quickly, but not quite before Colin had woken up screaming. As it turned out, my insane theory had actually panned out, and Colin had been putting silver in his bloodstream. Amy assured me that, with vampire blood in his system, he’d make a full recovery, but the next few hours would be tough. Not even she could lessen the pain, however, since silver would work against her magic as well.

After that, things sort of became a blur. Arch took Colin into custody, shoving him in the back of the Cadillac after cuffing him; though, with how much pain the hunter was in, the cuffs might have been unnecessary. The rest of the harpoon was yanked out of me, and I was brought back to Charlotte Manor, where Albert, Neil, and Sally were all waiting. Charlotte slipped a glass of wine into my hand the moment I entered, and I said a silent prayer of thanks for the hospitality of the possessed house. The rest of the gang went to my apartment, apparently sweeping it for traps, of which they found a few, and getting my car towed out of the street.

I don’t know how much time passed before Krystal returned, giving me a packet of blood from my fridge—silver free, she assured me—and escorting me up to her new room. There hadn't even been time to unpack yet, so it felt oddly foreign. Part of me wished for the familiarity of my own home, or even Krystal's old apartment, but that sentiment faded as soon as I remembered that I was probably in the safest spot in all of Winslow. Once that hit home, I sucked down my blood and simply took the news as it rolled in. The car was the latest bit, the last of the truly pragmatic stuff, and as Krystal sank deeper into the cushy mattress, I turned over to meet her gaze.

"What's going to happen to Colin?"

"Depends on Colin," Krystal said. "From what we've been able to dig up so far, the guy lost his family to a vampire attack a few weeks back. Watched everyone die, but managed to drive a silver knife into the head of his attacker when it was his turn to go. His prints matched the ones at a scene we'd been trying to figure out for a while. Anyway, seeing that kind of shit will drive most people off the edge, and he's no exception."

She reached over, gently touching the part of my shoulder where the harpoon had burst through. There was no scar to mark it; in fact, if not for the torn shirt and sweater vest, it would have been impossible to tell that anything had ever happened.

"He's not bad, though. Got a natural talent for this sort of stuff. Never seen someone try to *carpo*on a vampire before."

"How long you been waiting to use that?" I asked.

"Hours. Had to make sure you were okay first, or it would have been in bad taste." She grinned, but we'd been together long enough that I could see the worry behind her smile. I'd been in trouble tonight, and she wasn't there to protect me. I imagined that was a hard pill to swallow, especially for an agent.

"Anyway, if Colin can be reformed, taught to understand that not all parahumans are bad, then maybe he could work off some of his time with the Agency. If he can't, then the cops are going to easily locate the dude who shot up a gas station, carjacked a taxi, and I'm sure pulled off a lot of other illegal stuff on other nights."

"What if he tells people about vampires?" I asked.

"Let him. He's not the first, and he won't be the last. Prisons have psych wards too these days." Krystal let go of my shoulder, wrapped her hand around my torso, and tapped me gently on the back. "Have to put him in a good one though. He's crafty. Did you know there was a GPS tracker on your back? Stuck right into your sweater vest."

My mind drifted back to when I was first running away, after the silver bullet failed to stop me. I remembered those next few shots. Loud, but not nearly as powerful. I'd taken them to be normal bullets at the time, but a small tracker made a lot more sense.

"Guess that's one mystery solved. I was wondering how he kept finding me.” On the subject of being found, my brain lit up with a sudden rush of forgotten concern. “Oh crap, Dr. Huerta, is he okay?”

“He’s alive, and Amy is already talking with a few other local mages to get him fixed all the way up. They can even take away the memory, along with the rest of today, but so far he’s been refusing it. Also . . . I think Dr. Huerta is done with the blood trade,” Krystal said.

“Yeah. I sort of expected as much.” A white business card was suddenly a few inches from my nose, clutched in Krystal’s slender fingers. “What’s this?”

“You’re not the only vampire that prefers take-out. The Agency set up vendors centuries ago, ones who only buy blood at a fair rate. I never mentioned it, since they’re a bit pricier than what your guy was charging, but it seems pretty relevant as things stand. And they have a speedy delivery option.” She shook the card in front of me several more times, until I finally reached up and pulled it from her hand.

“They’re Agency-approved?”

“It’s better to say we keep an eye on them, and they know it,” Krystal replied. “They probably fudge a lot of paperwork here and there, but they’re smart enough not to try any big stuff. That one has a particularly good reputation. I asked around, in case it ever came up.”

“Thank you.” I slipped the card into my wallet, making a note to call them tomorrow. After I’d gotten a new phone. Much as I appreciated the assistance, I wasn’t sure I wanted to use a device that someone else had had such recent access to. It seemed senselessly dangerous. I put the wallet away and pulled out the phone, prompting a bit of throat-clearing from Krystal.

“So . . . about the vampire who helped you.”

“Lillian,” I said. “She said she was here for a meeting with the therians. I assume that means Richard.”

“Right. Well, we ran it down, and that part is mostly true. She’s part of a vampire clan that’s petitioning to meet with Richard. They want to move into town, but since Winslow is home to a lot of powerful therians, their badass leader, and the King of the West, coming in without at least an introduction would be a dicey proposal.”

“Let me guess, I only got away with it because I never hunted and kept my head down?”

“More or less,” Krystal said. “These things matter more with people who make a lot of waves, of which you are not one. Plus, you’re just one vampire. If therians see a whole clan suddenly appear without warning, they’re likely to think that the vampires are up to something. Maybe even an invasion to wrest control of the city. They tend to deal with those threats fast and hard.”

“Sort of encouraging that they want to go through proper channels, then,” I told her.

“We’ll see what we see.” Krystal shrugged, as if we were talking about whether our pizza would come with the proper toppings. It was hard to blame Krystal, though. While it seemed like a very dangerous situation to me, for her it likely wasn’t even a blip on the radar. I never dug too deep into what it was to be an agent, but the few glimpses I’d seen had left me with an appreciation for the scope of their duties, and their abilities.

“Lillian said there was another reason they wanted to talk with Richard.” I spoke carefully, not quite sure how best to broach this subject. In truth, I was still wrapping my own head around it, trying to convince myself that there was something I’d misunderstood. “She said they’d heard tales about a vampire who lived here. One who was on good terms with the therians, and dating an agent. Who was even not hated by the King of the West. I’m . . . I’m not crazy, am I? They’re talking about me.”

She looked at me for a long moment, then leaned in and kissed me gently on the forehead. “Yes and no, Freddy. Yes, parahumans love to talk—actually, who I am kidding, they love to gossip. But you know how those things go. Someone tells the story of catching a big fish, they leave out the hours of failure and trying different baits before the final success and cut right to the triumph. People chop the stories down to the interesting bits, pulling out the context. And without that context, some of the friendships you’ve made and things you’ve accomplished can seem almost inexplicable. So yes, the stories are about you in the sense that you have done those things, but no, they’re not about the Freddy that we all know and love. Did she even realize you were the one she wanted to meet?”

“Not in the slightest,” I replied. “In fact, she said someone like me could learn a lot from a vampire like that.”

“See, there you go. A few rumors flying around, but nothing to worry about. Kind of fun, in a way.” She reached up and poked my glasses, an affectation of familiarity and comfort rather than necessity. “You’re your own Clark Kent.”

“Except that my Superman is made up of gossip and mis-told stories,” I pointed out.

“And you don’t have the cape,” Krystal added.

“Whew, so you didn’t search my closet that carefully.” It was a joke, but Krystal’s smile faded a bit.

“About that, Freddy. You can’t go home for a few days,” she said. “Amy and I found more than a couple of booby traps in your apartment. Now, we’re both good, but given how resourceful Colin was, we decided it was safer to get the whole place professionally swept. Not to mention, anything we find might help us figure out who else Colin has attacked. Anyway, the long and short of it is that, for the next few days, your place is a crime scene.”

“That’s more than a little inconvenient.” I flipped back over, looking at the wallpapered ceiling. “At least I can get a room from Charlotte.”

“Ooooooor . . .” Krystal drew out the word as she laid her head on my shoulder, the one not stained with blood. “We could take a vacation. Sort of. Arch needs to borrow Albert and Neil for something, but I’ve got vacation time saved up. What do you say we tag along? Get out of town for a little bit, let everything get settled.”

“I have a sneaking suspicion that this ‘vacation’ will just end with more peril, if Arch is taking Neil and Albert somewhere,” I told her.

“It’s not like that. This is networking. Arch thinks they’d do well to meet someone else who wields a weapon of destiny. No crimes need solving, no monsters need slaying. And if they did, the sheriff is more than capable of handling it.”

“That’s reassure—wait, sheriff? Where, exactly, are we going?”

Krystal looked up at me, a mischievous twinkle in her eye that I knew all too well meant things were about to get chaotic. “I’m going to take that as a ‘yes.’”

A Sheriff in the Country

1.

The plane bounced a bit too enthusiastically upon landing and I reflexively grabbed Krystal's hand. While I am nervous about many things, flying isn't one of them. At least, normal flying isn't. The tiny little mechanism we sat in, supported only by a set of twin propellers, had proven to be a different story, though. I'd thought it would be quaint when I first laid eyes on it, something a little more classic than the monstrous jets that carry people around like cattle. What I didn't realize is that having a jet that big lessens the impact of turbulence, whereas in the small plane that brought me, Krystal, Arch, Albert, and Neil across the country, one could feel every single bump of turbulence along the way.

And there was a lot of turbulence between northern Colorado and east Texas. By the time the doors finally opened, showing me the beautiful freedom of a starlit night above, I nearly ripped my seatbelt in half vaulting out. Even if the sun had been shining, I might still have chanced it, preferring to burn to death in its deadly rays than risk another minute in those cramped, shaking quarters.

"Yeah, that's how most people react the first time they take this flight," Krystal noted, taking a much more sedate pace down the airplane's steep stairs, duffel bag slung over her shoulder. Albert was only a few steps behind, clad in his usual t-shirt and jeans, stringy hair pulled back tight. If not for the blade and gold hilt of a sword strapped to his back, there would be nothing to mark the passage of time since he first came to work for me. He was taking his time in the descent, helping Neil along. Of us all, the young mage was the only one without undead constitution or years of practice taking similar flights. He staggered down the stairs, still looking green in the face despite filling up no less than three “sanitation” bags during the flight. Though the two of us were rarely on good terms, my heart went out to him. If vampires could vomit, I almost certainly would have matched his record.

Arch was the last to leave, pausing to say a few quick words to the pilot. No sooner had he gotten outside than he reached into the pocket of his dark, functional slacks and pulled out a pack of cigarettes. I’d never known anyone who smoked more than Arch, or took less joy in it. It was an especially curious affectation given how crisp and precise everything else about him was, from his close-cut hair to the carefully concealed weapons all over his body. My best bet was that it had something to do with his parahuman nature. As far I could tell, Arch looked human—a young human, at that—but given his reputation and status with the Agency, I knew there was something I was missing.

“Been too long,” Arch said, making his way down the stairs. I wasn’t sure if he was talking about the cigarette or our destination, though the former seemed far more likely.

As near as I could tell, we’d landed in an abandoned field. At the far edge, I could see a shack made of sheet metal, and the runway the plane had used was well-kept, but nothing about our surroundings marked this as an airport. Which was probably why we’d had to take a special plane from the Agency in the first place.

From the edge of the clearing, I picked up a pair of lights moving toward us. A car, or maybe a truck; hard to tell from so far off, even with my eyes. It would be a while before it arrived, so I wheeled around on Krystal.

“We’re here.”

“Very good, Freddy. That is what the landing means.” She was being glib, knowing quite well what I was driving at and taking joy in stringing me along.

“I feel I’ve been a pretty good sport about this, especially when you told me that you wanted our vacation to take place in rural Texas, but we had a deal. Once we arrive, you’re supposed to tell me what’s so special about this place.” I conjured my very best “I mean business” face, which only managed to draw a few giggles from her and a half-hearted snicker from Neil, who immediately had to cover his mouth.

“All they told me was that there was someone else with a weapon, and I should meet them,” Albert offered. Unlike me, he didn’t mind being kept in the dark. Of course, he’d also come here with a purpose. As someone who had drawn a weapon of destiny, Albert was trying to learn how to use it, as well as figure out what he wanted to do with it. Speaking to someone who was on the same path could offer him a lot of insight. He, Arch, and Neil all had good reason to come out to the boonies. I just couldn’t fathom what was so special about this place that Krystal insisted I had to see it.

“My plan was to let you see the place for yourself, but fine, if you really want to be a spoilsport, I’ll tell you.” Krystal held up her hands and gestured to the empty fields. “Freddy, welcome to the edge of Boarback, Texas. One of only three openly parahuman settlements in all of the United States.”

“Excuse me, open settlements?” While I had a hunch at what she was saying, it seemed more prudent to get confirmation.

“It’s just what it sounds like,” Arch jumped in. “Boarback is a town where parahumans live in the open. All of the inhabitants are either parahuman or regular humans that have been brought here intentionally. We keep it off maps, the roads to get in are almost impassable unless you know the secret routes, and everything around here is wiped from satellite imagery. No one accidentally discovers this town. And because of that, there’s no hiding. Everyone can be exactly what they are.”

“That’s . . . incredible.” While I wish I’d come up with something a bit more eloquent, at that moment my mind was simply reeling too much for me to state anything other than the most obvious prattle. A whole town, a civilization of parahumans who weren’t trying to blend in with human society. Granted, I was a big fan of human society, and aside from the dietary restrictions and sunlight issues, considered myself very much a part of it. However, my time with Krystal had let me glimpse other sides of the parahuman world, beings who had to go to much greater extremes to blend in. I’d always assumed that was the only option presented to them, but now, I’d just taken a bumpy plane ride to one I’d never imagined.

“Incredible, and necessary,” Krystal said. “Try as we might to make them, there are some parahumans who just refuse to keep a low profile. They aren’t dangerous or anything; some do it by accident, others out of stubbornness. Point is, they don’t deserve jail, but we can’t let them wander around with humans, either. This was the compromise someone came up with in the early days. Boarback was the first, and when it worked, they added more.”

“Many choose to live here, now. Prefer it to spending a life among a species that can only fear them.” Arch finished his first cigarette, tucking it neatly into the box of ash and stubs he always carried, and immediately began another. In the distance, I could finally make out the shape of the approaching vehicle. Definitely a truck; though, given the terrain it was driving over, that seemed a practical choice.

“It’s pretty incredible. Everything is parahuman friendly. All the buildings have enchanted glass, just for the sun allergic, and there are underground tunnels to get around during the day. The library is full of ancient tomes for mages to study—along with a healthy romance section, from the invoices I’ve seen—and all the different dietary needs are accounted for. The Agency makes monthly drops to ensure food sources are on hand.” Krystal was actually rocking on her heels in excitement. I’d initially thought she was dragging me along just for kicks, but the longer she spoke, the more I realized how much she genuinely loved this place.

“If there are that many parahumans, it seems like it would be hard to keep the peace.” Neil slowly tried to let go of Albert and stand on his own. Despite a shaky start, he managed to stay on his feet. “Do you keep agents posted here all the time or something?”

Krystal shook her head, smiling so big I could almost see her back teeth. “No need. Boarback has its own police force; a sheriff and a couple of deputies. In fact, one of those deputies is who you’re here to meet, Albert. Those two alone are more than enough to handle most of the trouble that crops up in a town this size. But if there’s ever anything serious, the sheriff will step in and deal with it.”

“Is he a former agent or something?” I asked.

“He’s something, all right.” Arch’s words were muttered, not so soft that he was trying to conceal them, but soft enough to not be part of the conversation. Krystal reached over and punched her fellow agent in the shoulder before turning back to me.

“Don’t mind Arch. He just doesn’t like losing.”

“It was hardly a fair fight,” Arch said.

“When are any of your fights fair? Isn’t that the first thing you teach rookies to expect?” Krystal leered at him willfully, until Arch turned away and silently took another drag from his second cigarette. “To answer your question, Freddy, no, I don’t think Sheriff Thorgood was ever officially an agent, but he has a lot of ties to the Agency. We send our more problematic cases—people who’ve just turned and don’t know how to control their power yet—out here for him to look after.”

And with that, I finally realized why Krystal was so excited to show me this patch-of-nowhere town. “They sent you here, didn’t they? This is where you first trained.”

“Only until I got the hang of using my skills, and made peace with the whole ‘devil living inside me’ stuff. After that, they put me in the regular program. But I spent a while in Boarback, learning from the sheriff.”

With near perfect timing, the truck finished its forward journey, coming to a halt approximately twenty feet away from us. The passenger door popped open, and a man stepped out. He was big, by normal standards; though, after meeting men like Richard, my scale was somewhat skewed. Visually, he wasn’t terribly impressive, akin to a shorter, less muscular version of Bubba, and he wore a beige policeman’s uniform, complete with matching cowboy hat. His stomach hadn’t quite reached the point of lapping over his gun belt, but it was a battle that could be lost any day. Large hands spread out as he stretched his arms wide (revealing a gold sheriff’s badge on his chest) and motioned to Krystal.

“Is that Agent Jenkins? Get over here and give your old teacher a hug.”

That was all the prompting it took, as Krystal raced forward and the two embraced. It was surprisingly familial, a sentiment I didn’t see in my girlfriend very often. Rather than a teacher, it looked like she was being bear-hugged by an uncle. Finally, they released, and he began making his way around to the rest of us.

“Arch, you better finish that damn thing before you get in my truck, or I’ll hitch you to back and let you run for it.” He slapped Arch on the back as he spoke, nearly knocking the agent’s cigarette from his hand. “And you must be Albert, the zombie who pulled out the Blade of the Unlikely Champion. Pleasure to meet you, son.” He held out his big paw of a hand and Albert shook it, looking more like he was hanging on than participating.

“Which makes you Neil, the apprentice, sorry, journeyman learning from Mage Wells. That’s some big shoes to fill; I hope you’re working hard.” He grabbed Neil’s hand and gave it a shake as well, moving so fast that even the usually brooding necromancer didn’t have a chance to come up with something glib to say.

I watched all these exchanges in sheer wonder, marveled by what a touch the sheriff had with people. Despite being in what could be argued was literally Nowhere, he lacked the same southern twang I’d gotten so accustomed to with Bubba. Instead, his accent was neutral, and hard to even grasp beneath the warmth and volume of his words. Hard as I tried to pin it down, there was just some sort of charisma about him that made the sheriff seem inherently likeable. Now that was an ability I wouldn’t have minded getting when I went vampire.

“And that just leaves you, the vampire that I hear is dating one of my students.” He turned toward me and closed the distance between us in only a few steps. For having such an ambling gait, he moved surprisingly fast. “Anyone Krystal trusts enough to bring around is good people in my book. Pleasure to meet you; I’m the sheriff of Boarback, Leeroy Thorgood.”

“Fredrick Fletcher,” I replied, reaching for his hand. “But most people call me Fred.”

The moment Sheriff Thorgood took my hand, a whole new sensation washed over me. I’ve mentioned before about how a primal part of my vampire brain sees the world in terms of predators and prey, and how catatonic I went upon meeting Gideon, an apex predator, for the first time. This wasn’t quite the same, in that I didn’t start babbling or fall over. In fact, I don’t think my instincts saw the sheriff as predator or prey. They didn’t know what to make of him. He didn’t fit anywhere into my base vampire understanding of the world. The one thing I did know about him, that I could feel rippling off the man in physical waves, was that he was powerful. And I say that having glimpsed the true capabilities of an ancient dragon.

“Glad to meet you.” If Leeroy noticed my reaction, he didn’t let it show. Instead, he gave my hand a few pumps, then released it and nodded to the truck. “Suns up in a few hours. Let’s get your bags and head into town.”

2.

Despite the bleakness of their airport, I was pleasantly surprised to find the town of Boarback to be more than ten houses and a general store that doubled as a church and gas station. If that sounds ridiculous, allow me to remind you that Krystal and I grew up in a rural farming town. While ours wasn't quite that bad, there were others not too far off that dearly wished they could get up to ten houses. Such was not the case with Boarback, however.

Instead, Sheriff Thorgood pulled his truck along dusty, nearly invisible roads, one after the other, until we broke through a tree line and into a scene that looked like it was stolen from the mid-1900s. We were staring down what appeared to be an old-fashioned main street, complete with a worn, brick-paved road. Shops lined the block on both sides, which was curiously absent of cars. A few were about, but nowhere near as many as I saw in Winslow on any given block.

Other roads, leading to businesses that were too large to fit on the central street, branched off at regular intervals. But what struck me immediately was a fact that I should have expected: nothing was a chain store. Every business I could see, from "Grixxle's Repair" to "Uros Massage and Spa" to a squat yellow building that just said "Diner" was obviously independent. It was sort of funny, to me at least, that there were thousands of people all over the nation who wanted to go back to the "good ole days," and here it was, exactly as described. Except for the fact that almost everyone who lived here was pulled straight from the myths and nightmares of humanity.

The second thing to strike me was how busy the town was, in spite of the late hour. Now, I know vampires and other undead are all mostly nocturnal by nature, but I hadn't expected that trait to apply to every parahuman. Yet here they were, walking up and down the street, waving at the truck as Sheriff Thorgood drove by. Many of them were humanesque, perhaps with an odd horn here or animal eyes there, but some were so far removed from human that I wondered how they would have ever gotten along in the normal world.

Four small creatures with green skin, batlike ears, and overalls were walking past a centaur who was scribbling furiously in a worn notebook. Near the edge of the road, a small blonde woman and her daughter were both holding hands with a furry brown parahuman who was at least ten feet tall. His hands were so big, in fact, that I realized they were holding his thick fingers. And I say “he” because a pair of gray slacks covered the lower part of his body, so I was assuming that was where modesty kicked in. Not too far off from the trio was something I could barely wrap my head around, a being who seemed to be formed entirely out of molding clay with its face pressed up against the window of a shop. And yes, I mean literally pressed, which was what gave away the malleable consistency of its brown body.

“Holy hell.” For a rare change, Neil and I were in agreement, though he was the one who voiced the words. Albert seemed dumbstruck as well, all of us staring out the truck’s open windows in what I would later realize was incredibly impolite gawking.

“I never realized there were so many types of parahumans,” I said, finally marshalling some control of myself. “Even at CalcuCon, there wasn’t this much variety.”

“The cons are fun, but not everyone can travel easily.” It might have been my imagination, but Arch seemed a bit grumpier than usual, probably because he’d been forbidden from smoking in the sheriff’s truck. “Besides, those only attract parahumans looking to do business or meet up with others like them. They’re little islands of community in a sea of pretending to be human. These people don’t have that need. They’re always connected to the parahuman world.”

“Yeah, they are.” Albert hadn’t quite reached the point of hanging his head out the window, but I put a hand on his shoulder anyway, just in case. I understood the reaction. Even for beings like us, who could blend in with little effort, the strain of always pretending, always staying careful and aware, was like a weight we carried around.

As we drove up the road and pulled into the sheriff’s office, I felt that weight lift for the first time in years. This wasn’t a con where walls, tenuous and easily breached, had been erected to keep our secrets safe. Here, the world was truly kept at bay, and in this town, there was no need to pretend. We weren’t the oddities. We were just . . . people.

Sheriff Thorgood killed the engine and hauled himself out of the car, the rest of us following his lead. The office was a brick building, larger than I’d initially expected. Then I remembered the size of the furry man in gray slacks, and suddenly I could see why space might be important here. We walked inside to find a large central room with three desks, and a row of five cells at the back of the building. None were occupied, though they all had fresh blankets and a pillow resting on them just in case. Near the rear of the room, a small television was tuned into a baseball game on mute. Evidently, we'd caught someone relaxing before we pulled up.

There were two, and only two, candidates for who might be the baseball fan. Standing in the center of the office area, like they'd been waiting for us, were a man and a woman, both dressed in the same beige uniform as Sheriff Thorgood. The man had dark, spiky hair with what appeared to be red highlights, along with a lean frame and a sharp stare. The woman seemed entirely human, save for her eyes, which were bright yellow and a little too big for her face. Leeroy stepped forward and clapped his hands on both of their shoulders as he made introductions.

"Folks, I'd like you to meet the rest of the Boarback Sherriff's Department. The fellow who puts too much mousse in his hair is Deputy Ixen, though you can just call him Nax. And this bright-eyed young woman is Deputy Saunders, though she just goes by Sable. For that matter, I don't want to hear anyone calling me sheriff. I'm just Leeroy to friends. Nax, I think you're the only one who has met Agent Jenkins."

"Just Krystal, I get enough of that 'Agent Jenkins' shit in the field." Krystal nodded at Nax, who met her gaze for only a brief moment. "Good to see you again, kid. Uniform suits you better than cuffs."

"Joining Krystal today is her fellow agent, Arch; her boyfriend Fred; and the pair that came to meet Sable, Neil and Albert." Leeroy pointed at each of us as he went down the list of names, making sure Nax and Sable knew who was who.

"So, you've got one too." Sable started forward, coming close to Albert and then walking a bit past him to check out the sword strapped to his back. The black-and-gold scabbard that matched the hilt of his blade rested there, fixed in a harness that Arch had designed himself. Since moving to Winslow, the agent had been training my assistant on proper sword-wielding three evenings a week, and every other weekend. While no one was asking Albert to go out and start picking fights with his blade, it was agreed all around that him being at least somewhat proficient was in everyone's best interest.

"Blade of the Unlikely Champion," Albert told her, slowly drawing his sword from its sheath. The weapon almost hummed as it moved through the air, more magic than steel, or so we'd been told. Given that I'd seen him cut through the very enchantment that held a chimera together, turning it back into its base animals, I had no reason to doubt the assessment of Albert's blade.

"That is a pretty one." Sable walked across the room and reached behind one of the desks, pulling out a large single-bladed axe. It, too, was strapped into a harness, and she effortlessly pulled the weapon free from the straps and cover concealing its blade. “Mine is the Axe of the Forsaken Child. Obviously, it doesn’t have the gentlest of requirements to wield, but it packs a hell of a wallop.”

She spun the weapon easily, her years of training visible in the fluid grace of her movements. Bringing it to a stop, the bone-white blade extended outward, she moved the head of her axe closer, bit by bit, to the humming steel of Albert’s sword. Carefully, she tapped the edge of his blade against her own, and a soft, melodic tone echoed around us.

“Looks like these two get along.” Sable pulled back her axe and slipped it into its harness once more. “Sometimes they can be finicky, if the destiny of each wielder is in conflict. Good news, Albert. Looks like you and I aren’t meant to fight each other.”

“I didn’t even realize that was a possibility,” Albert said.

“All of these things are trying to drag their owners somewhere,” Sable replied. “How much we let them is on us, but there are many out there that are working toward different ends. When they touch, you don’t get a pretty chime, trust me.”

“Now that everyone, animated and otherwise, has been introduced, what’s say we go get some grub?” Leeroy suggested.

“Actually, I wouldn’t mind dropping off my bags and showering first,” Krystal interrupted. “I was sitting a little closer to Neil than the rest of us on that flight.”

The necromancer’s face went flush and he lowered his head. “Sorry.”

“Not a problem. I’ve gotten far worse on me in the line of duty. Still, wouldn’t say no to a good scrubbing.”

“All right, we’ll go to the inn, let everyone unwind and unpack, and then off to the diner,” Leeroy acquiesced. “Tonight’s special is chicken fried steak, and I’d have to arrest myself for the crime of letting you folks miss it if they run out.”

“It’s a CFS night? Hot damn, I’ll shower fast.” Krystal grabbed my hand and dragged me back out into the street, where she began shoveling the bags at me so fast that I didn’t get the chance to ask her why she was taking things out of the truck if we were about to leave the station.

3.

As it turned out, the reason Krystal had dragged all our bags out of Leeroy's truck was that there was no need to get back in the vehicle to reach the inn. The Bristle Inn, Boarback's one and only place of lodging, was within walking distance of the station. In fact, everything within the town square was walkable. While cars were needed to reach some of the neighborhoods and single homes further away, once a traveler was on the main street—which I learned was actually called Sunshine Lane—they needed only shoe leather to make it to any other destination.

The walk to the inn took around ten minutes, but it would have been five if Neil's slower gait hadn't caused everyone else to match his pace. Part of the comparative slowness was that he was one of the few humans in the group, magic-slinging skills notwithstanding, but it was also due to the fact that studying tomes of ancient magic wasn't an activity that did much for cardio.

I'd expected the Bristle Inn to be like Charlotte Manor, quaint and dated, but in fact, it turned out to be one of the more modern buildings in town. Once we got to our room, a spacious area with a king-sized bed and a flat-screen, Krystal had explained that since Boarback got more than a few visitors in the form of agents and general parahumans, they'd invested in a nice place for people to stay. That was all she could muster before slipping into the shower, the water running so hot I could see the edge of the mirror beginning to fog within minutes.

While she showered, I unpacked my own small suitcase and changed into what I considered my more outdoors-y attire: jeans, sneakers, and a short-sleeve button down paired with a robin's egg blue sweater-vest. My more formal clothes were quickly folded and carefully put away, which still left me with time to kill before Krystal finished her shower.

Pulling out my laptop, I was pleasantly surprised to find a Wi-Fi signal in our room, which I immediately jumped onto and began checking my e-mail. It had only been a day since the Colin incident, where I was hunted all over Winslow—a day which I’d spent hunkered down in Charlotte Manor with a laptop retrieved from my apartment, trying desperately to carve out a bit of breathing room in my work schedule. It helped that Krystal was busy setting up the trip, and that some of my parahuman clients understood that being hunted by an insane human can throw off a schedule. Still, I was barely treading water, so anything I could get done in the small bits of spare time I had would be a big help. Things were reaching a tipping point though, there was no getting around that. Either Fletcher Accounting Services would have to expand, or I’d have to start turning down work, a prospect which utterly galled me.

It’s impossible to say how long I was working before I heard Krystal’s voice making a “tsk” sound and saw a polished red fingernail begin to tip my screen forward, closing the laptop even as I hurriedly tried to save my progress.

“I did not book us this place so you could work.”

“You booked it because it’s the only hotel in town,” I countered, mercifully clicking the outdated icon of a floppy disk and shutting the laptop myself. “Good internet, too.”

“This place isn’t as podunk as you might expect.” Krystal grinned at me, and I noticed for the first time what outfit she’d changed into. A red flannel shirt tied off at the stomach, jean shorts that were far from Daisy-dukes but still quite higher than her usual sweats or slacks, all topped off with a beat-up straw hat perched atop her blonde head.

“You’re making such a clear case for that,” I replied.

“What, you’re the only one who gets to dress more comfortably?” Krystal asked.

“I was actually just wondering where you were going to hide your gun.” I nodded to the black belt and attached holster lying on the bed where she’d left them. Inside was her firearm, the one accessory Krystal never left home without. Earlier in the relationship, I’d considered the practice paranoid. After a few months, I wondered why she didn’t carry two.

“That thing will totally throw off my outfit. It can stay in the room. I’ll hang a ‘Do Not Disturb’ so no one will come in and fuck with it.” Krystal turned, picked up her firearm, and set it to the side, completely missing the look of shock on my face. Fortunately, it was still there by the time she turned back, or at least, I assume it was, because she gave me a world-class roll of the eyes. “What?”

“You never leave your gun behind. Bubba took us night fishing, and you wore that gun belt over a bikini. I’ve seen you take it with you when you run downstairs to get mail. Can you blame me for being a little surprised?”

“I suppose I do have a bit of an attachment,” Krystal admitted. “That’s just prudence in my line of work. But it’s not necessary here.”

“Why not?” There was something in her eyes, something she was hiding. When it came to her job, Krystal was probably a master deceiver, but in her personal life, she so rarely said anything other than the blunt truth that it became obvious when she was trying to choose her words.

“Because in this town, we’re safe.” Krystal walked back into the bathroom, pulling out her toiletries kit and grabbing a stick of deodorant. “Aside from the petty bullshit that any place has, there’s no real crime here. No outside threats, either. You probably got a hint of how strong Leeroy is, and his deputies are no joke. Boarback is peaceful. Fun, too. After the diner, if there’s time before sunrise, we’ll hike up to Cervain’s Lake. It’s so clear you can see the moon’s reflection like you’re looking into the sky.”

Nice as that sounded, I still couldn’t help but feel like she was changing the subject, though from what, I had no idea. There was just something defensive about her excitement, like she was trying extra hard to sell me on how much she loved this place.

“And during the day, we can take the tunnels around to check out the shops. They’ve got all kinds of unique items here, handmade, the stuff you’d have to special order in the outside world. Some of the craftsmen out here are incredible; we hire them as independent contractors for the Agency sometimes. Of course, given our reputation, not many take us up on it, even with all the perks doing contract work provides. Oh, and everything is parahuman owned, obviously. They get a pretty good deal on land and lodging out here, so it’s a big sell for starting local businesses.”

At last, it all fell into place. There were many things about which Krystal would happily talk with neither prompting nor explanation, but the viability of starting a small business was not one of them. That was for my benefit, and I could only see one reason why she would bother to give me such information.

“Krystal,” I said, walking over so that she could see me from the bathroom. “I do run my own company, you know. I’m perfectly aware of what a sales pitch sounds like.”

The deodorant paused, all the confirmation I needed, then she let out a sigh and finished applying. Putting the cap back on the white chalky stick, she faced me, a rare solemn expression on her face. “This is a good town, Fred. Lots of parahumans with businesses who could use a talented accountant. Internet to let you work with your old clients. Nice, quiet people who want what you’ve always wanted: a normal, peaceful life.”

“And no hunters suddenly showing up to try and kill me,” I added.

“You think that’s why I’m trying to sell you on Boarback? Fred, that guy was a chump. If you’d had to, you could have taken him apart. He’s not—”

Her words halted, and she looked away from me, just for a few seconds. “You know the vampire who made you, Quinn, was a real rat bastard, right?”

“Seeing as he tried to kill all of us and successfully ripped your throat out, I won’t be jumping to his aid anytime soon,” I said.

“Well, it turns out that he was also a real, territorial rat bastard. The reason we’ve seen so little vampire activity in Winslow is because it was considered Quinn’s, and he didn’t like to share. But word got out that he finally went too far and stepped against the Agency, so now he’s on the run. That means other vampires have begun moving back in, retaking the territory that Quinn used to hold. Places like Winslow.” Krystal walked over to the pants she’d traveled in and began digging through the pockets.

“I don’t understand, is that why you want me to relocate? Fear of other vampires? You’ve gone out of your way to tell me that we’re not all bad, that you work with several who are good people. Why does more vampires coming to town automatically make you want to hide me away?”

“Plenty of vampires are decent people,” Krystal replied, finally locating her phone and yanking it out from the pocket it was lodged in. “But you know who usually aren’t? The ones who go around seizing another vampire’s territory after he goes on the lamb. Those are the ambitious types, and they play by the belief that if you aren’t with them, you’re against them. The rumor mill worked its magic, and now lots of people know there’s another vampire in Winslow, Colorado, one who has pulled off a whole lot of impressive stuff. That’s the sort of situation where the new vamps either have to make you join, or get you out of the picture.”

“Wait, you think they’ll kill me just for living in my own town?” My voice may have leapt up a few degrees on that one. I’d gotten used to the idea that the parahuman world was a less restrained one than what humans dealt with, but offing someone just because they lived in a town you were moving to seemed a bit extreme.

“Most likely, they’d compel you to join, but you’re a smart guy. You can probably beat them at the strategy game. So then, they’ll wait for an opportunity to use a loophole in the treaties, one that lets them take offense with you. After that, they can challenge you for honor, and if you happen to die in the process, then so be it.” Krystal held her phone tightly, the edges of her fingers beginning to turn white from force. “I’ve seen it happen before. And if they do it, Freddy, then I can’t protect you. I’m an agent, and that means I have to work within the laws and treaties. I’ll have to stand there and just . . . watch.”

Moving slowly, I wrapped my arms around her and gave her a small kiss on the top of her head. Tough as Krystal was, powerful as the monster inside made her, I knew she’d said early goodbyes to too many loved ones in her life.

“That’s a lot of ‘ifs’ and ‘maybes,’” I told her. “While I’m not exactly thrilled about new vampires moving to town, we don’t know that I’ll be a target. What the vampire people are gossiping about might be something, but I’m just an accountant. There’s a good chance they won’t even care about me.”

“Not as good as you think.” Krystal turned on her phone, the glow lighting her face from below, and made a few swipes before finding what she was looking for. Stepping back from my embrace, she handed me the phone, which I picked up slowly. “That request was put in the night you met Lillian. Came less than an hour after we’d picked you up.”

Before me was an e-mail, from an address that was unrecognizable, alerting Agent Jenkins that her romantic partner, Fredrick Fletcher, had been named in a formal information request between the House of Turva and Richard Alderson. It mentioned a lot of things I didn’t understand, negotiation dates and reference numbers, but those details were irrelevant. What mattered was my name, and the people who wanted to know more about me.

“You’re on their radar,” Krystal said, likely reading the comprehension on my face. “And sooner or later, that’s a thing that will require dealing with. Richard’s a friend, and he’s not going to tell them anything you wouldn’t want known, but you run a public business, Freddy. It won’t take much to learn who you are and where you live. Maybe it’s idle curiosity, maybe they want some taxes done, but not everyone is as kind-hearted as you. I’ve seen these things turn before, and if they’re handled carefully enough, then we agents don’t have any recourse.”

I sat down on the bed, my own body suddenly feeling very heavy. “I can’t just leave town, though. What about our friends?”

“Albert and Neil can come with us.” Krystal sat down next to me, gently taking her phone out of my hands. “This is where Arch wanted to bring them in the first place. Plenty of space and time to train, plus a fellow weapon-wielder to spar with. Bubba and Amy would stay in Winslow—he’s been climbing the ladder with Richard, and she’s too deeply rooted to just up and leave—but they’d still be able to visit us. Amy’s wares alone could sell enough to justify the trip.”

“Us?” I stopped staring at my empty hand and faced Krystal, who was only a few inches away. “You said us. Does that mean you’d come, too?”

“You know how my job works; it doesn’t matter much where I call home. And I’m already packed up anyway. Plus, I love Boarback. I wouldn’t mind coming home to it at the end of my missions, especially if my boyfriend was already here waiting for me.” Krystal leaned in closer, wrapping her arms around my shoulders. “I was going to ease you into this, Freddy, not come on right away with the hard sell. We’ve got a day and a half left here, so just think it over. Take the town in; imagine what it would be like to live here.

That's all I'm asking."

"I'll keep an open mind." I kissed her, partly out of affection, partly because I genuinely had no idea what else to say. Krystal made good points, and if she thought there was reason to worry, then I had no doubt there was. Still, Winslow was my home, and while I've never been ashamed to admit that I am a coward by nature, the idea of being forced out of my town left a hard pit in my stomach.

But that feeling was nothing compared to the wave of nerves that washed over me when I imagined an entire clan of vampires, all of them Quinn in my head, discussing exactly how to deal with a vampire already operating on their turf.

4.

By the time we'd composed ourselves and made it downstairs, the others were already waiting, so we cut a quick pace to the diner. Though I asked, and everyone agreed it had once had a more formal name, the moniker had been lost somewhere in the sands of time. For as long as anyone could remember, it was just "the diner," and when we arrived, I found those simple words written at the top of the laminated menus. With the yellow-painted walls and overstuffed red booths, it could have easily fit in off any highway exit in America, save for the staff and clientele.

Since arriving at the sheriff's office, I'd somewhat forgotten the spectacle of driving down Sunshine Lane and seeing all the different parahumans out and about. But the realization of just how far out of normal bounds we were came rushing back the moment our waitress slithered over to us. That was not creative language, by the way. Our waitress, Yenny (as she introduced herself), was a fairly normal-looking woman with brown hair and eyes a pale shade of orange. She wore a yellow shirt with white trim that matched the restaurant's walls, and nothing else. I don't mean to imply anything lude, it's simply that Yenny's bottom half was that of a bright orange snake's tail.

Mercifully, I wasn't the only one who was a bit surprised, as Neil wouldn't quit staring and Albert dropped his menu to the floor as soon as he saw her. Yenny took it surprisingly well, glossing over their shock with warm greetings, and then getting down to the business of what we'd be eating.

Ordering was a quick affair. Leeroy declared that the chicken fried steak was the best thing to be had, and he was seconded by Krystal, Nax, and Sable. With no point of reference for anything else, and a keen eye that noticed some of the menu items were clearly designed for parahumans rather than mundane palettes (unless raw sparrow eggs and powdered coal were delicacies I'd somehow missed), it made sense to trust the group consensus.

In spite of the heavy burden weighing on my mind, dinner was an enjoyable affair. Periodically, new parahumans would get up from their seats or walk in, which gave us peeks at the creatures we'd never laid eyes on before. Leeroy entertained the whole table with stories of the town's history and the various incidents he'd been called on to help with over the years. I'd never considered the possibility that a troll could hibernate, grow, and end up stuck under a bridge, but as Leeroy recounted having to borrow farm equipment to get the fellow unstuck, it seemed like the most natural thing in the world. Even Arch chuckled a few times, when he wasn't outside taking his cigarettes.

I would also be remiss if I glossed over the food, which was incredible. Chicken fried steak was hardly a new cuisine for me—nor most anyone, I'd imagine—but sometimes the simplest dishes are the best when every element is handled perfectly. From the first bite of spiced meat, crisp crust, and decadent gravy, I understood why Leeroy had insisted we not miss this special. I would have bitten through a hundred dirty tires for a meal like that, and once again, I was grateful I had retained my taste buds despite being undead.

The experience as a whole was oddly serene, at least for me. Ever since reconnecting with Krystal at our high school reunion, I'd been drawn progressively deeper and deeper into the parahuman world. And while many of those experiences helped me meet important people in my life, they also all tended to be fraught with chaos, if not outright peril. So somewhere in my brain, I suppose I had made the connection that the more parahumans one was around, the more hectic and dangerous things would be. But here we were, eating chicken fried steak an hour before dawn, in a town filled almost exclusively with other parahumans, and it was one of the more peaceful moments of my last few years. It didn't even feel like we were all vampires and zombies and other inhuman species. It just felt like sitting around with a bunch of friends.

By the time the food was eaten and we were heading back to the inn to beat the sun, I'd begun to consider the possibility that living in Boarback could have its merits. True, one meal did not a happy life make, but I'd promised to keep an open mind, and it was hard to deny that the town did have a charm all its own. I was so lost in thought, and in observation of the people walking up and down Sunshine Lane, that I didn't even hear Arch speak. Krystal nudged me in the ribs, and I turned to find the vertically challenged agent staring at me, clearly waiting for a response.

"Sorry, what was that?"

Arch didn't roll his eyes, yet somehow, he still gave off the same feeling as if he had. "I was letting you know that I'm going to be borrowing Albert and Sable for a training session while those who need it grab a nap. Since you don't need sleep, I offered to let you come along and watch. Though, at the moment, I'm rethinking the wisdom of that decision."

"I'd love to, but . . ." I glanced up at the sky, which was already growing gray as the stars faded, declaring retreat against the overwhelming forces of daytime.

"This place is underground," Arch assured me. "Sunlight restrictions aside, it's more prudent to have a training facility away from prying eyes. Despite how Mayberry this place might look, it was founded as a sanctuary, and nobody knows the importance of a place to hide like parahumans."

Arch's reference to Mayberry caught me off guard, although it shouldn't have. I often forgot that though he looked comparable in age to Neil and Albert, he'd been alive for at least a century, or so I guessed from what I'd gotten through context. He never discussed his exact age, and I made a point not to pry where agents were concerned.

"I like to think of it more as a place to shelter while problems are handled," Leeroy added. "But it works just fine for sparring grounds and a gym these days."

After a moment's consideration, I nodded. "Sure, I'll tag along. I'd like to see as much of Boarback as possible. That's what I'm here for." I gave Krystal a quick kiss, which she used as an opportunity to show approval of my choice by squeezing my, um, rear, and then bid farewell as she and Neil began heading up to the Bristle Inn.

"I'll show you all down there." Leeroy headed toward the police station, while I marveled at the fact that he hadn't said "y'all," despite the rustic surroundings. The sheriff of Boarback might live here, but he definitely didn't hail from this region of the world. Then again, with how long some parahumans lived, it was entirely possible that the place he'd called home didn't exist anymore. Countries fell all the time, back in the older days of history.

Nax walked with us to the station, then peeled off as he proclaimed that "someone had to be on duty," and that, by process of elimination, that was him. Duty didn't seem that bad, though, as he immediately went to his desk in the middle of the room and kicked up his feet, eyes on the old television in the corner.

We were taken through one of the doors near the back of the station, which led to a staircase. This wasn't a small set that took us a basement, however. These were slick, worn, and went on for so long that not even I could see the bottom, which was not a common occurrence. All of us proceeded down, Leeroy in the lead, followed by Sable, then Albert, then me, with Arch bringing up the rear. While some neurotic part of me wondered if he was taking the back position in case we were threatened from behind, the more logical part of me had a hunch that it was because these steps were a little slippery, and if anyone went tumbling, they'd take his smaller frame down with them.

It was impossible to gauge how far down we'd gone by the time we reached the bottom. I only knew that I wasn't too worried about stray beams of sunlight getting in anymore. Leeroy yanked a lever near the bottom of the stairs, and a new set of bulbs flickered on, hung at irregular intervals through the rough corridors sprawled out before us. They seemed to twist and turn in all directions, but Leeroy didn't hesitate as he continued on, taking us through one turn after another until we arrived at our destination.

The cavern was vast—by underground measures, at any rate. It was roughly half the size of a football field, with a domed ceiling that rose twenty feet in the air. A small rack of weaponry—swords and maces and the like—was set up at the end furthest from the entrance. Halfway between the rack and the way in were what looked an awful lot like benches etched into the very stone of the cavern.

"No way this is natural." I didn't mean to say the words out loud, but the sound of Leeroy's chuckle informed me of my slip-up.

"You hit the nail on the head," he said, grabbing me by the shoulder and leading me over to the benches while Arch took Albert and Sable toward the middle of the cavern. "Artificially carved, save for a few of the tunnels near the entrances that were used as a starting point."

"Was this made for the town?"

Leeroy gave his large head a mighty shake. "Other way around. Part of why we picked this spot was because these tunnels were here. They were originally home to . . . well, maybe you're happier not knowing. Something that had to be rooted out. Anyway, the Agency doesn't forget about useful assets, especially when all they need is a few light bulbs and minor remodeling to be made livable."

"Prudent, and cost-efficient," I noted.

"Doesn't matter where you go in the world, governments are always looking to pinch their pennies as hard as possible," Leeroy said. We arrived at the stone bench and took our seats while Arch continued instructing Albert and Sable. I didn't entirely grasp what he was telling them; all I could discern was that he kept moving their arms and legs to slightly different angles than where they'd been. My best guess was that this was some sort of stance advice, though I confess that even that assumption was predicated on watching a cornucopia of action movies.

"This will be interesting." Leeroy was watching the same spectacle I was, but he didn't seem nearly as befuddled by what was going on. "Not even I've gotten to watch a sparring match between weapons of destiny in a long while. They always put on a good show."

I was going to ask what he meant, but before the words could form in my mouth, Arch had backed up and the match had commenced. After that moment, the question was no longer necessary. I understood exactly what made their tussle interesting.

5.

Neither Albert nor Sable were attempting to injure the other. Their movements were slow and deliberate. This seemed to be about control more than anything else, as their respective weapons would draw near to the other's flesh without ever touching it. The sword and axe did clash, however, as each used their respective tool to block the incoming strikes. It was those moments that made this different from any battle I'd ever seen, in cinema or reality.

When the blades of two weapons of destiny collided, they sent ripples out through the world. I realize that sounds as though I'm saying there were flashes of light and waves of sound, which there were, but please understand that there was also something more. At every clash, the very world around them seemed to warp and distort. It was for less than a second, and if not for my vampire eyes, I doubt I would have even seen it. Yet it was undeniably there. Like stones across a lake, these two weapons would ripple through everything around them as they made contact.

"As much as I would like to trust Arch not to put anyone in danger . . . is that safe?"

"Safe is a relative term in our world," Leeroy replied. "If you mean, 'are they guaranteed that nothing will go wrong,' then the answer is no. One of them could slip and lop the other's head off, or they could cause a tear that turns them into slugs. Neither is likely, mind you, just possible. But if you mean, 'is this safer than them never having the experience until they fight an unfriendly weapon and get caught off guard,' then I'd have to say yes. Education is always safer than ignorance."

He had me there, although I did scoot further back in my seat at the word "slug." We sat in silence for some while after that, watching his deputy and my assistant trade blows, halted occasionally by Arch scurrying in and moving someone's foot or elbow. It was strange to see Albert wielding a blade, all the more so because he actually seemed competent with it. If there was anyone less inclined to violence in the world than me, it was Albert. His avoidance wasn't from cowardice, however. The young man just genuinely seemed too soft-hearted to hurt anyone. I'd only seen him swing that sword one time with intent, and it was when Neil's life was on the line.

"Krystal tells me you two might be hunting for a house around here soon." I started at the voice, having grown so engrossed in the fight that I forgot Leeroy was sitting next to me. His eyes had turned away from the match. Now, they were taking me in with careful observation, which made my slight jump all the more embarrassing.

"It's in discussion," I told him. "She clearly loves it here, and my current home may not be as safe as it once was. Plus, your town does seem quite idyllic."

"Don't let her rose-colored glasses fool you. We get our share of problems same as anyone else," Leeroy replied. "The Agency likes to dump the more problematic potential recruits here for training. Sometimes it works out fine, like with Krystal and Nax, but not every parahuman with power and attitude problems ends up on the straight and narrow. I've got two deputies for a reason."

"Still seems safer than a town where hostile, territorial vampires are moving in." I hadn't actually intended to spill my problems to the sheriff, but if Krystal had told him that we might be moving, it seemed a fair bet she'd also let him know why. Since he didn't seem at all surprised by my statement, my hunch appeared to be right on the money.

"That does look a little worrying," Leeroy agreed. "But let me ask you this, Fred. As a businessman, if you were to move to Boarback, what is one of the very first things you'd do?"

While there was a laundry list of answers to that question, it was clear Leeroy was angling for something specific. I took my time, thinking through every step in moving my business, and almost immediately, I realized what he was trying to say. "I'd look into any other accounting firms in Boarback."

"Because you were planning to kill them?" Leeroy squinted at me in a way that only police seem to be capable of, like they're joking, but don't want to let on that they're joking in case you're willing to accidentally incriminate yourself. If you've ever been pulled over for speeding, then you know the exact look I'm talking about.

"Of course not. Because they would be my competition, and the more I understand about them, the better prepared I'll be. I'd need to know what services they offer, and more importantly, what they don't offer, as well as what failings they have that might entice their customers to look my way. It's the basics of business." His point was obvious; however, there was one glaring flaw in the comparison. "I don't think these vampires are trying to start their own accounting firms, though.”

“No, they’re trying to move into a territory with a strong therian presence, an ancient dragon, two agents, and a fellow vampire who’s allegedly made alliances with all those powerful people. That sound like a hospitable place to you? It’s a big country, you know. Plenty of spots with easier pickings. Why do you think these vampires are coming to your town, fully aware that they’ll be under the scrutiny of much more dangerous beings?” Leeroy turned back to the watch the fight; evidently, he didn’t expect me to come up with an answer anytime soon.

“Because it’s safe.” I caught a bit of surprise in his eyes as Leeroy glanced at me, but kept on going. Now that the pieces were starting to line up in my head, I couldn’t keep them from tumbling out. “Yes, Winslow is very dangerous if you’re the sort of parahuman who breaks the law, but the flip side is that all those therians, and agents, and Gideon mean that if you keep to the treaties, then you don’t have a lot to fear. A few months ago, a therian tribe tried to overthrow Richard, and they were crushed in a single night.” Actually, they’d been wiped out completely, but I preferred not to think about that part. Not that I, or anyone else, could have saved them. They attacked the King of the West directly, and no one stops Gideon when he’s moved to anger.

“A tribe tried to take over Richard’s spot, huh? Because they just wanted it so bad?”

“No, they were driven . . . out . . . of their home.” I’d forgotten about that detail, amidst all the kidnappings and overthrow attempts. “Are you saying these vampires are refugees fleeing from something?”

Leeroy leaned back, pressing his bulk against the stone wall. “I’m saying there are a lot of ways for a territory to get taken. Maybe you cut off a food source, or drive the locals into a frenzy, or compromise people’s safety at home. And if you’re smart, you can do it just legal enough to keep the law off you, be they agents or cops. Wouldn’t be the first time one group of parahumans has tried to expand their holdings by pushing all the others out. Course, shit like that won’t fly in a well-organized town like the one watched over by Gideon. Dragons are damn fine negotiators; the rules they play by are different than everyone else’s. He doesn’t need to wait for the law.”

It made sense, looking at it from that angle. But there was still one glaring flaw in the hypothesis that I couldn’t get past. “Krystal would know about that, if it were the case. She wouldn’t feel the need to worry about me.”

“Because every fear is always rooted in rational thought and logic?” Leeroy lifted an eyebrow at me and shook his head. “Krystal Jenkins is a good person, a tough lady, and one of the better agents I’ve gotten to train in a long time. That said, she is absolutely terrified of losing people once she lets them in. Can’t blame her, given her history, but it clouds her judgment sometimes. I’m not going to say these vampires have pure-hearted intentions; they might very well want to put you under the boot or leave your head out to meet the sun. But then again, they may just be trying to make sure you won't have them all slaughtered by your therian friends for stepping on your turf."

"I highly doubt Richard would kill a clan of vampires for me, no matter how much I saved him on his taxes," I said.

"But they don't know that," Leeroy countered. "All they know is that this is a town with a lot of powerful people, and some vampire is allegedly connected to most of them. It would be bad business for them not to try and figure out who that is before they get in too deep. Whether it's to kill him or ask him for help is up for discussion; either way, asking about every vampire they know of is the prudent move."

"Well, this certainly made the situation more complicated." I let my head fall back, feeling the impact against the hard stone even though there was no accompanying sense of pain. "I expected you to try and sell me on moving here, since it's what Krystal wants."

"Don't get me wrong, Boarback could use someone with your skills to help audit the books, and I'm sure you'd save my citizens a pretty penny come tax time. Not to mention, I'd love to have Krystal around again. But there's a reason she didn't settle down here before. The lady likes chaos, even on her downtime, and we've only got that in spurts around here. If she comes back, I'd rather it be because she's reached a point where this is the right town for her."

A loud clang filled the air, dragging our attention to the sparring match. Albert was on a knee with his sword held high, Sable's axe pressed against it. Apparently, he'd just stopped a strong blow, as evidenced both by their position on the ground and the fact that a small portion of the rock around them had suddenly turned to glass. Arch let out a whistle and they backed away from each other, seeming to notice for the first time the effect their attack had had on their surroundings.

"If you don't mind me asking, what would you do in my shoes?" I realized that Leeroy and I were in totally different leagues as far as our power went—just shaking his hand had driven that message home loud and clear—but he'd shown an adept mind and offered good perspective, so I was genuinely curious to get his opinion.

"Guess it depends," he said. "The old me would just crush them before they even got a foothold, kill off all the leaders and put the rest to work under my rule. New me would probably just let them be until they stepped out of line, at which point, I'd try to make an example of a few and hope the rest took the message. You're not me, though, even aside from the undead thing. You've got to figure out what the right move for you is."

It was sound, true advice, and I was about to thank Leeroy for it when he continued.

“I will say this, though: running away is almost always an option. It doesn’t vanish the moment you decide to stick around for a little while longer. There’s no shame in retreating from a bigger, stronger threat, but only you know if you’ll be okay with running from just the idea of danger.” Leeroy hefted himself off the bench then, and began to clap as he walked over to Albert and Sable. I didn’t know what he would say to them—probably encouragement, since Arch had combat advice on lockdown.

As for me, I stayed put, the sheriff’s words echoing through my head. I’d never had any issue with fleeing, as a human or a vampire. But he was right; there was a big difference in running away from a real, tangible threat, and just bolting from the possibility of danger. Whichever one I did, I needed to be sure about my choice, because being undead meant that I would have to live with it for a very long time.

6.

After a few hours of training, Sable headed back to the station and Leeroy led us through the underground tunnels to another set of stairs, this one emerging inside the Bristle Inn. By then, the others were awake, and we began touring the various shops accessible through the interwoven tunnel system. I had no idea how Leeroy, or the occasional other parahumans we encountered below the surface, navigated such a winding structure. Evidently they did, though, as we would take turn after turn, seemingly doubling back on ourselves, yet always arriving at the exact destination we'd set out for. The tunnels were nearly deserted, as going above ground was far more convenient unless one suffered a sunlight allergy, but the shops were always filled with at least a few patrons. Given the wares they had, I could hardly blame them, as each store was fascinating just to window-shop through.

Neil purchased a few crystals and a bag of powder from a one-eyed woman in a store full of books, scales, and bowls of ingredients that I couldn't identify. They were labeled, but it was a language I wasn't familiar with. In fact, Neil seemed to be the only one among us who could tell what was what, which led me to suspect that perhaps the signs were more magical than linguistic.

At a store with homemade flasks and barrels, I picked up a bottle of Boarback Merlot, along with a six-pack of local mead for Bubba. Krystal also bought some beers, though we'd barely made it out of the store before she cracked one open and guzzled it halfway down. I wasn't sure what the law was as far as open containers went, but seeing as we were walking with the sheriff, it seemed to be okay. Along with the wine and beer, I'd also picked up a new faux-silver flask, this one boasting exceptional thermal insulation and an equally exceptional storage capacity. The clerk made a lot of claims, at least some of which I hoped were true. There were few things worse than room-temperature blood.

Albert picked up a pair of wrist guards at Arch's suggestion—one of the more harmless purchases possible at a store full of armor and weaponry. It was disconcerting to walk into, actually, nestled as it was amidst the small-town craft stores. This one looked like it would be more at home in a renaissance fair, except that the weaponry there is dull and not suited for real battle. And before you wonder, no, I do not want to go into why I happen to have that knowledge.

No one else seemed bothered by the existence of an armory in the middle of town, so I just chalked it up to “one of those parahuman things” and busied myself examining shields while Albert found a set of wrist guards that fit his arms properly. Thankfully, they didn't take too long, or else I might have ended up buying one of the bucklers to hang over my mantle. Purely for the aesthetic, of course.

We spent the rest of the day browsing the shops, picking up knick-knacks and gifts for those back home. As we made our way through town, I kept my word to Krystal, surveying everything with a critical eye. If we made the move, these would be my only shopping options, and as much fun as they were to visit, I had to try and wrap my mind around not being able to buy anything from outside them. I also kept an eye on the stores we saw through the enchanted windows, making note of the services Boarback offered. There were plenty to be found, but no matter how much I looked, I didn't see so much as even a flyer for any accounting practices in the area. Whether that was good or bad, I still hadn't quite yet determined.

In the evening, Sable and Albert went down for more sparring, with Neil tagging along behind Arch this time. Krystal and I borrowed Leeroy's truck to take a drive into the nearby hills, eventually switching to foot and hiking our way up to a large lake that rested at the top of a steep path. There were no signs or boats to be seen; only a lone gazebo with a golden bell that Krystal informed me I was not to ring under any circumstances. Her promise of the lake's reflectivity had been spot on, as I could see the quarter moon hanging in the sky just by glancing at the smooth surface.

“I wouldn't have expected a place like this when we landed,” I said, transfixed by how undisturbed this natural body of water was. It was unsettling somehow. All the more because I realized the reflectivity meant I couldn't see what dwelled below the surface. Beautiful and still wasn't the same as peaceful; I'd learned that lesson long ago.

“There are plenty more like it.” Krystal leaned over, pressing her head to my shoulder like a cat trying to scratch its ear. “Boarback is bigger than just the town central. Lots of places and parahumans you'd never get a chance to see in the outside world. Most of them friendly, too, or at least not outright hostile. Pretty much the same thing.”

“You love this town quite a bit. If I can ask, why didn’t you settle here? It’s obvious that you get to pick where you call home between missions, and seeing how fond you are of Boarback, I’m shocked you didn’t build a life here.” Perhaps it was overstepping my bounds somewhat to ask such a question, but given what Krystal had asked of me, I felt the question was warranted. Something had kept her from this town before, and if we were considering making the move, then I wanted to know what it was, and why it was no longer an issue. If it was no longer an issue.

“Lots of reasons,” she said, not even flinching at the query. “Travel, for one. I don’t hate that plane as much as you, but I don’t want to fly on it that often, and it’s the fastest way in and out of here. Timing was also a factor. The missions I was getting back then were almost all time sensitive, so being somewhere central made it easier to respond. But the sad truth of the matter is that those were just things I used to convince myself that it was the right call. The real reason I didn’t come back was my fiancé, Tem. When training ended, we’d already become an item, so I decided to settle down where he was and see how things played out.”

As we were currently cuddling in front of a romantic lake, I knew quite well how that relationship had turned out, though I was fuzzy on the details of how and why. Krystal rarely talked about her ex-fiancé; in fact, this very well might have been the first time I’d ever heard his name. It certainly seemed like one that would have stuck in my memory. The experience had been a painful one for her, so I didn’t press the issue. What had come before didn’t matter to me; I only cared for our future.

“Once that went to shit, I threw myself into my work. There were stretches where I didn’t see my apartment for months on end. I just stopped caring where I hung my hat, and even after I eased off the gas at the Agency, where I lived didn’t matter much. Not until I had people worth coming back to, anyway.”

I’d always wondered why it was so easy for her to move to Winslow from wherever she’d been before, but the reasoning made sense. Even aside from our budding relationship, she’d had Albert to watch over, and then her old friend Bubba to visit with. Since then, the number of reasons to come home had only grown. And if we moved to Boarback, we’d lose almost all of them.

“Krystal, this town is beautiful, and I’m still struck with wonder at the idea of getting to live openly as a vampire instead of worrying every day about being discovered. We could be content here, I think.” Her head rose from my shoulder, affection evident in her eyes; however, I leaned back before she could make contact. I needed to finish this, while I still had the courage to do so.

“But I’m not okay with content. I would have been, a few years ago. If you’d promised me a town where I could be safe and have a reliable income stream, I'd have jumped at it, no questions asked. Things have changed, though. As appealing as contentment is, the price is simply too high. Being with you, having all our friends, it makes me happy. Happier than I ever thought I could be. That's not something I'm inclined to give up easily. Maybe if this threat becomes real, if we learn the new vampires definitely want me out of the picture, then it will be a different story. I just can't run yet. Winslow, and more importantly the people in it, are my home. I don't want to lose that unless it's absolutely necessary."

"This from the guy who ran away from a few werewolves at a high school reunion," Krystal said.

"To be fair, they were also total assholes," I replied. "Werewolves or no."

"That they were." She leaned in closer to me, and I didn't pull back this time. My piece was said. How she chose to respond was up to her. "I had a feeling it wouldn't be that easy of a sell. You're more willful than you think you are. We can go back and see where things lead, as long as you're willing to promise me one thing. If it comes time to run, you run."

"I can assure you that will not be a problem in the slightest," I told her.

"Yeah, you say that, but sometimes . . . never mind. Let's just enjoy the vacation while we can."

The gap between our faces disappeared as she leaned in, kissing me with more fury and need than her usual playful affection. It is neither possible nor prudent to say how long we stayed like that; I will simply say that when we parted, we turned our eyes skyward to the true moon and stars rather than their watery reflections.

"Fred," Krystal whispered, possibly in the softest tone I'd ever heard from her.

"Yes?"

"If you die on me, I'm going to kick the shit out of you. Fair warning."

I pulled her closer and ran my pale hand through her golden hair. "I am suitably intimidated, and will do my best to avoid the ass-kicking."

"See, that's why I like the smart ones. They know how to take a good threat."

We lay under the stars for several more hours before finally making our way back down the trail and driving to town. It was the most serene evening we'd had in a long time, even if unknown danger did lurk beneath the surface.

7.

After another day of shopping, delectable food from the diner, and training for Albert, Neil, and Sable, the time had come to head back out to the field and catch our plane home. Packing our bags was a quick affair, and after a brief hike from the Bristle Inn to the police station, we piled back into the sheriff's truck to head out. This time, however, Nax and Sable were coming along to see us off, so that put two of us riding in the truck's bed. I was almost entirely certain that such an act was technically illegal, but given everyone's respective hardiness, it didn't make sense to fret about being thrown from the rear.

To no one's surprise, Arch immediately volunteered to take a position in the bed, hand already on the cigarettes in his pocket. But before he could move, Sheriff Leeroy had grabbed me by the shoulder and started moving us both to the back.

"None of that, Arch. You've only got a little time left with my deputy. I want you imparting every bit of knowledge that you can before the plane arrives. Fred and I will ride in the bed." Leeroy caught the annoyed, frustrated look on Arch's face and met it with a wide grin. "Unless you'd like to tussle for it. I've told you before, I'm always up for a rematch."

There was a long moment where I genuinely thought Arch and Leeroy were going to have a sparring match over who had to ride on the hard, bouncy surface of a beat-up truck bed. After a lengthy stare, however, Arch slowly made his way back to the front of the vehicle, pausing before entering to throw one last line Leeroy's way.

"The next time we fight, it will be when I know I am going to beat you."

"Looking forward to it!" There was so much enthusiasm in Leeroy's voice that what was almost certainly a taunt came off sounding sincere. I still didn't know what Leeroy was—or Arch, for that matter—but I did know Arch's reputation according to Krystal, and he was considered one of the Agency's top people. For Leeroy to have beaten him, well, let's just say that the sheriff of Boarback was apparently packing more than just an aura of power.

I leapt into the back—literally, in my case—while Leeroy pulled himself up through the tailgate. His large hands smacked the side of the truck twice, and Nax started it up, pulling out of the driveway and onto Sunshine Lane.

Due to the speed with which everything had happened, and the interaction with Arch, it wasn't until we were driving away from town that I realized Leeroy had purposely pulled me away from the group so that it was just the two of us. Otherwise, he'd have just let Arch take the other side of the truck bed. Sure enough, Leeroy was watching me, his cheerful eyes peering out from under his beige hat. I waited for him to say something, to start the conversation, but the seconds ticked by into minutes and there was only silence. Finally, my own nerves got the best of me and I blurted out the first thing that came to mind.

"Am I about to get the 'don't hurt her' speech?"

"Beg pardon?" He tilted his head back a couple of inches, removing the hat's shadow from his face.

"You know, the speech where you tell me that I should make sure not to hurt Krystal, or you'll hurt me. It's a cliché classic, and when you pulled me back here, I sort of assumed . . . ." My voice trailed off as Leeroy began to loudly chuckle, small waves of laughter washing over him.

"Fred, I don't need to tell you not to hurt Krystal. For one thing, it's plain as day that you two are in love. And that means you're going to hurt each other; it's unavoidable. You'll make mistakes, say the wrong thing, pick the wrong action, and her feelings will get hurt. Same thing she'll do to you. The ones we love can hurt us the most easily, but we can also forgive them just as freely. Long as the hurt stays unintentional, I think you two will be fine for a while yet."

His laughter finally subsided, and he looked out at the woods the truck was winding through on a narrow path. "Besides, if you ever screwed up really bad, what could I do to you that's worse than what Krystal would? By now, you've probably figured out that she doesn't need anyone to fight her battles for her, especially not an old sheriff half a country away."

"I suppose you have me there," I admitted. "Then, what did you want to talk about?"

"Who said I wanted to talk about anything?" Leeroy replied.

"You pulled me into the back of the truck, and didn't let Arch take my place. I assumed there was a reason for that."

Leeroy nodded. "There was. I like riding in the back, and I'm not a fan of cigarette smoke. Ruins the scent of the outdoors. Arch is a good agent, but that habit of his drives me nuts. You don't smoke, and you seemed pleasant enough, so I decided to drag you along to keep him from joining. Sometimes a ride in a truck is just that.”

If that wasn’t a cue to shut up and enjoy the ride, I didn’t know what was, so I let the subject drop and looked out at the trees. The path we were driving on was so small that the vehicle barely fit. Branches stuck out from both sides, coming within inches of scratching me. Leeroy, with his wider frame, got smacked occasionally, though he didn’t seem bothered by it. I wasn’t entirely sure he even noticed. As the trees struck, he simply sat there with the same placid expression he’d been wearing since we met. I’d met several parahumans who were considered to be incredibly powerful, but none of them had been as relaxed and cheery as Sheriff Thorgood. In an odd way, that made me even more afraid of him than the others.

“You do remote work?” Leeroy’s voice stood out like a horn in the hypnotic rhythm of the truck’s engine. It caught me so off guard that I took a few moments to process the question, and several more to work out what exactly he was asking.

“Depends,” I told him. “I’ve learned that most parahumans keep paper records, so I have to be on-site to process those. If they’ve gone digital, then it’s another story. Those jobs, I can do anywhere. At a cheaper rate, too, since it doesn’t take me nearly as long.”

“Yeah, we’re still on paper,” Leeroy admitted. “Krystal says your company does a good job, though. Might be worth it to fly one of you out here come April. Dealing with the city finances is my least favorite part of this job.”

“Wouldn’t that be a job for the town mayor, or treasurer?” Even as I spoke, I realized that I’d never actually seen a city hall anywhere in Boarback, nor had there been any mention of a governmental system. It was just the sheriff and his deputies.

“It’s all on my plate,” Leeroy said, confirming my suspicion. “You make something, be it a kid or a town, it’s on you to look after it.”

“Wait, are you saying you founded Boarback?” It was more surprising than shocking. After all, the town couldn’t be more than a few centuries old, and there were certainly parahumans that measured their lives in millennia. With how powerful Leeroy seemed, it made sense that he’d been around for a long while. I just hadn’t expected the town’s founder to still be working as its sheriff.

“Seems like yesterday,” he told me. “Except for the paperwork. I’d swear I’ve done lifetimes’ worth of that. Makes me miss the old days, before there were so many forms and boxes. Someone showed up with a bill, and you either paid it or drove them off. Of course, that was before I held a respectable office, like sheriff.”

Despite not completely understanding what he was talking about, I did my best to conjure a sympathetic nod. “April is a tight time for me, and all other accountants, but since you’re a friend of Krystal’s, I can carve out a few days to come lend a hand.”

Leeroy waved me off. “We don’t need the boss down here; things aren’t that tough. One of your people will be fine.”

“The company is just me and Albert, and he isn’t properly trained to do a full accounting service on his own.”

“Oh.” For the first time, Leeroy looked a touch surprised. It didn’t last long, though. In seconds, he’d faded back to the warm, relaxed grin that was usually there. “Well then, sure, we’d gladly accept your help. I can even pay some in advance.”

I began to protest that it wasn’t necessary, but before I’d gotten more than a few syllables out, Leeroy had produced a small glass vial. Inside were a few drops of red liquid that my base instincts immediately recognized as blood. There was something off about it, though. A curious rainbow sheen seemed to shimmer on the edges, like gasoline spilled on a lake. He tossed it to me and I caught it on reflex, my arm moving without even bothering to check with my brain.

“Had a feeling that would come in handy,” he said. “Takes a hell of a lot to make me bleed, not even I can manage it without a proper weapon, but a few decades back, there was a rough dragon that tried to settle down in the hills. Sucker managed to get a few drops from me, so I put them away for a rainy day.”

“This is your blood?” Even through the glass, I could smell what was inside. It smelled delicious, and savory, and strong. Much as I loathe to admit it, my mouth had begun to salivate, acting completely on its own, with no regard for propriety.

“Sure is. Few drops will give you quite the pick-me-up. Might come in handy if those new vampires decide to cause trouble.” There was something in Leeroy’s eyes that I couldn’t quite place. Not aggression, and not judgment. Curiosity? Regardless, the vial had most of my attention. The few drops inside were so powerful I could feel them before they even hit my tongue. If I drank it, would I be safe? It was hard to imagine any other vampire being a threat, not unless they were feeding off a dragon.

With a last long, lingering look at the blood, I tossed it back to Leeroy, who easily snatched it from the air. “Thank you, but Fletcher Accounting Services only accepts payment by check, credit card, or direct deposit, and we don’t take advances for services not yet rendered.”

Slowly, he put the blood back in his shirt pocket, eyes never leaving me. “You have any idea what you just threw away?”

“Power, strength, the ability to live without fear of any who might do me harm. Like I said, thank you, but no, thank you. I got a taste of that last year when an ancient dragon gave me his blood. It was more inconvenience than anything. I'm fine with what I've got. Maybe it falls short for a conquering vampire, but for an accountant, it's more than enough." My fingers were still tingling from where I'd been holding the vial, though the feeling was finally fading.

The truck made a few more turns and had just burst into the clearing when Leeroy spoke again. The cheer had faded from his voice, and something else was there in its place. Experience, wisdom, some indefinable quality that only one who has lived far beyond mortal years is able to conjure.

"I've seen many things, long as I've been alive. The rise and fall of countries, the very earth shift beneath our feet, the birth and death of waves of human generations, gone so quickly it's like the flash of a firefly. Yet, in all that time, I've only encountered a handful of people, human or para, who had what it took to turn down power when it was before them. I think I might see what Krystal loves in you, Fredrick Fletcher."

Something shivered down my spine as he said my name, but by the time the willies had passed, so too had Leeroy's shift in mood. He was smiling again as the truck began to slow, our plane already in sight.

"Don't you go dying on me before April, now. If I have to deal with all those finances myself, I am going to be quite annoyed. Push comes to shove, I'll even lend a hand to keep you alive if needed. Just make sure it's really necessary. Like one of my favorite humans said: 'If you must hit, do not hit softly.' I don't pull my punches."

I nodded my understanding as the truck finally came to a stop and everyone began to hop out. All of a sudden, the vampires waiting back in Winslow didn't seem quite so scary; at least, not when compared to the man who watched over the town of Boarback. The weight of his offer slowed me even as we loaded our bags back into the plane's small cargo hold. Did he mean that I could call him in if things got too dangerous? This wasn't a quick trip. How would he get there in time? And if he did come, how much of Winslow would be left standing when he was finished?

Goodbyes were said, and hands were shaken. Albert and Sable exchanged e-mail addresses, while Neil stood awkwardly nearby. Leeroy pulled Krystal in for a long hug before finally releasing her, then slapped Arch heartily on the back as he snuck in one pre-flight smoke. Nax also gave Krystal an embrace, though his was more tentative than the bear hug Sheriff Thorgood had used.

Eventually, all the pleasantries were exchanged and we boarded the plane. Neil took a window seat, downed a glowing green potion he'd mixed up in a water bottle, and promptly passed out. I wasn't sure if he'd tried to make something to suppress nausea or to force him into sleep, but either way, given who Neil's instructor was, I knew that what he'd taken was bound to be potent. And possibly illegal, though I never quite understood where alchemical potions fell in terms of drug use. Albert took the seat next to Neil, three air-sick bags already in hand, just in case, and Arch sat down across the aisle from his pupil. They'd probably spend the flight reviewing Albert's matches with Sable and which techniques to polish, none of which interested me in the slightest. Listening to Arch talk about fighting made me understand how most people felt when I tried to explain the difference between an IRA and a Roth IRA.

I ended up with a window seat as well, since Krystal liked to stretch her legs into the aisle while she napped. This afforded me a view of Boarback as the plane began its wobbling rise upward. We started out so low that I could see the sheriff's truck's headlights in flashes as they moved through the woods. Further out, the lights of Boarback's town center glowed, a small oasis of light in a sea of dark trees. It looked peaceful, even from so far up. Maybe, one day, I would come back to this place for more than an accounting job. Maybe Krystal and I would move here when things were too dangerous, or we just wanted a more peaceful daily life.

This was not that day, though. As the plane rose higher and Boarback faded from sight, I felt an unexpected sense of relief in my stomach. Even after only a few days away, I'd gotten homesick for Winslow, Colorado, and the people who lived there. It had been a nice vacation, but I was glad that it was coming to an end.

Waiting vampire clans be damned, it was time for us to go home.

A Lawyer in the Mansion

1.

Despite the worry with which we returned to Winslow, relatively little happened in the weeks to follow. My home was released, having been officially cleaned and cleared of all the traps Colin, the rogue hunter, had left behind. I was also relatively certain that roughly half the beers I kept in my fridge for guests had vanished as well, but since Krystal was the largest consumer of those, that was her battle to fight. Apparently, none of the Agency's trap-detectors had much of a taste for red wine.

For the first few days, every time my new phone rang, I was sure it would be Krystal calling to let me know that more inquires had come down and she thought I was in danger. Eventually, though, the fear subsided, and I fell back into my regular routine. This process was helped along by the fact that I was positively swamped, fighting my way back to being on schedule after the short trip to Boarback. I even had to ask Albert to skip a few lessons, so great was my need for assistance. In the hectic rush of working overtime to hit my deadlines with every client, there was little room in my mind for the more abstract fears, like what a new vampire clan in town was up to.

Perhaps that was why I didn't bristle with suspicion when Amy and Bubba showed up at my apartment one evening, announcing themselves with a quick phone call five minutes prior to let me know they were on their way. My instincts finally whispered that something might be up when Amy walked through the door holding a fine bottle of pinot noir, with the cork still intact. While Amy Wells was a good friend and a talented mage, she wasn't the type to bring a bottle of wine just for a drop-in, and if she did, then she would almost always try to . . . augment it with some of her concoctions.

"This looks lovely," I told her, accepting the bottle because, suspicious or not, there are certain rules one is supposed to observe when playing host. “May I ask what the occasion is?”

“We need a favor.” Bubba, at least, was a man I could always count on to cut to the quick of things. Towering over both me and Amy, he wore his usual arrangement of flannel, denim, and a beat-up trucker’s hat. Compared to an alpha therian like Richard, Bubba wasn’t much, but outside of that anomalous group, he was easily one of the biggest people I’d ever met. Also one of the most loyal and kindest, which was perhaps why Richard had been tasking Bubba with more and more assignments in recent months. Loyalty was worth its weight in gold, even in the parahuman world.

“Way to ease him in,” Amy muttered, tossing an elbow to his ribs that I doubt he even registered. “But yeah, Bubba’s right. We need a favor. Well, actually, I need it. Well, actually, some friends of mine need it. Well, actually —”

“If possible, can we jump ahead to the details?” I asked. Amy had small green orbs rotating around her irises, which meant she, as usual, had tried one of her own potions. Without knowing how this one impacted her mind and thought pattern, it was best to try and corral the conversation toward productive ends.

“A mage died last week,” Bubba said. “Herbram Clover.”

“Oh, I’m sorry for your loss. Was he a friend?” I asked Amy.

“Met him a few times at the swap meets for spell-casters. Decent guy, but after a few beers, he could talk the ears off a sphynx.” Amy didn’t seem particularly broken up about it, though whether that was due to her own feelings or the magical concoction coursing through her blood was anyone’s guess.

“Herbram did some work for Richard at times, along with a lot of other folks. He was a talented enchanter, very respected, very pricey.” Bubba walked over to my fridge and pulled out one of the recently restocked silver beer cans. At this point, everyone knew they were there for guests, so there was little need for formality. “Thing is, he had two children, Ainsley and Zane. He also left behind a damned hefty estate, and he actually drafted somethin’ of a will.”

“The problem is that he didn’t get nearly specific enough,” Amy added. “All he said was that the estate was to be split evenly between his children. That’s it; that was the whole will.”

A year prior, I might not have grasped what she was saying, but after becoming a Certified Public Parahuman Accountant and working with all my new clients, I’d learned a great deal about how parahumans regarded paperwork. Turns out that, much like regular humans, they despised it. And since they had so many ways to avoid it, very little was ever actually done. Putting all that together, I could instantly see the issue with Herbram Clover’s estate.

“He never had any of it appraised or insured, did he? It was just a note saying to split things evenly, trusting his children to work the rest out themselves.” I knew I’d hit the nail on the head by the long draw Bubba took from his beer.

“Right between the eyes,” Bubba replied. “It’s been a fine mess ever since. They’re bickerin’ over who gets what, what’s worth what, and meanwhile, Herbram’s business is falling apart.”

Amy took a seat at my dining room table, although I noticed the chair seemed to move when she reached for it, rather than when contact was made. “Herbram was a friend of Richard’s, and I’ve worked with Ainsley a few times, so we got them to agree to use a lawyer who would settle the matter fairly. Problem is, she doesn’t have the numbers background to properly work through Herbram’s books, and said it would take weeks longer unless we got an accountant. Well, actually, she said it would take an extra four weeks. Well —”

“Got it. Estate in trouble, accountant needed, and I’m one of the few in town who actually knows how to do parahuman books.” My mind raced as I tried to do some hurried guesswork. The fact that Herbram had kept books and made a will were both quite promising facts. They’d be terrible, of course—I’d yet to meet a single parahuman aside from myself who kept fastidious records—but it was still more than I was accustomed to starting with. With a lawyer to help and a confined estate to work with, there was a good chance I could get the job done in only a few days. It would be a tight squeeze, schedule-wise, but I couldn’t turn down a request from friends. Especially Richard, who I suspected might be the only reason there had yet to be any unfamiliar vampires knocking on my door.

“If I pull a lot of overtime this weekend, I should be able to clear some space out for early next week. Assuming things are remotely in order, I’d require roughly three to six days,” I told them. “However, you’ll need to take on the job of explaining to Krystal why I’m canceling our weekend plans. That task is non-negotiable.”

I’d expected some sort of relief or happiness at my willingness to help. Instead, Bubba and Amy exchanged a long glance between themselves. While not the most astute reader of body language in the world, even I could tell that meant something was wrong.

“What? Is six days too long? If the books are somewhat in order, I might be able to do it faster, but I can’t make any promises yet.”

“No, that’s not the problem. Well, actually, it is, since they need it done soon. Well, actually, we need it done soon. Well—”

This time, it was Bubba who cut Amy off, which I was grateful for. “Ainsley and Zane ain’t exactly the most chummy of siblings. Things are gettin' heated the longer it goes on, and when mages get heated, that can cause trouble all around."

"I see. So, how soon were you hoping I'd be able to get started?"

Bubba's eyes darted down to the half-cracked watch on his wrist, which told me all I needed to know before he even spoke. "The lawyer was hopin' to meet us in about an hour."

"An hour?" While I'd technically finished all my work for the day, having stayed at my computer through the sunlight hours to keep at it, that didn't mean I relished the idea of zipping off into the night for a sudden job. There were still things that needed doing, and if the job took half as long as I was expecting, it would cause me to miss deadlines, something I considered an unforgivable sin for a fledgling business. "Look, you know I'm always happy to help out, but this is just too little notice. I can't abandon everything else at the drop of a hat."

"Lawyer said you might feel that way, so she got the Clover children to authorize an extra fee on top of what you usually charge, for the short notice," Bubba said.

"I can't imagine there's a number that would justify me tossing my entire schedule out the window for one unexpected client."

That sentiment lasted exactly as long as it took for Bubba to tell me the number.

"Then again, I suppose it couldn't hurt to at least take a look at the books," I said, backpedaling quickly. It wasn't greed that motivated me so much as pragmatism. With a sudden income influx that high, I might be able to lure in some other parahuman as an employee, whether they liked the work or not. Besides, I could always forgo my daily sleep for another week or so to rebuild the lost time. I didn't usually get loopy until it had been at least ten days without nodding off. Seriously loopy, anyway.

"Great, I'll drive," Amy said. A jolt of fear raced through me, but Bubba shook his head before she'd even gotten out of her chair.

"We took my truck, remember? I'll drive. Fred, get whatever you need." Bubba finished off his beer and tossed the can in the recycling. He didn't go the fridge for another, which I appreciated. Therian constitution or not, I preferred my guests limit their drinking to one an hour if they were getting behind the wheel. Given that he could probably polish off a keg on his own and not pass out, Bubba was a surprisingly good sport about it, and Amy always preferred her own work anyway. In fact, the resistance most parahumans had to mortal vices like alcohol was what fueled her business. Those who wanted a buzz needed something stronger, products that only a talented alchemist could provide.

As I stuffed my laptop into the bag already filled with other supplies, hefting my remote scanner under my arm, I heard Amy's voice from the kitchen. “Maybe we should warn him.”

“Warn me about what?” Despite my reluctance to admit accidental eavesdropping, I’d long ago learned that if there was a warning to be had, then it was something I wanted.

“Nothin’ dangerous,” Bubba said, a hair too quickly. “She just means we should let you know what to expect before we get there.”

“Is this place hidden in a dark forest that’s only accessible through magical means, or something?” I asked.

Bubba shook his head. “Pretty much the opposite. Just try to keep in mind, everybody mourns in their own way.”

2.

As it turned out, what Bubba meant was that some people mourned by surrounding themselves with people. While most of us might go the route of having loved ones nearby, evidently Zane Clover was one to prefer quantity over quality. I could see the people milling about on his yard even as we made our way up the long driveway, Bubba's truck an anomaly amidst the more ostentatious luxury vehicles already parked on the side of the drive. The valet booth at the front explained how so many cars were so neatly arranged, and we watched as a sleek black automobile pulled up, a pair of stunning people tossing over their keys without a second thought. If you're wondering how there was room for so many vehicles—and who could blame you?—it turned out that there was a reason Bubba and Amy had referred to the inheritance as an “estate.”

Herbram Clover's mansion was in the Cloudy Meadows community—easily the most expensive, exclusive area of Winslow, Colorado. Just to get in, Bubba had been forced to drive past two guard gates, where they checked his name and ID, along with another guard in front of Herbram's actual driveway. The grounds were sprawling, with large trees separating the property from their neighbors—not that the next house was in earshot, anyway. As for the house, it seemed more akin to a castle than a home, albeit one with modern lighting and a DJ booth set up out on the lawn. At least a hundred people were milling about in front of elegant tables with fine food and expensive liquor that had been set up at careful intervals. White-shirted wait staff made their way around, blending into the background as they cleared off finished plates and made sure drinks never got below half-empty.

“The good news is that if this is the rate they're blowing through the inheritance, I doubt it will take much time at all to figure out how much to split.”

“You'd think that, but the parties are all out of Zane's trust,” Amy said. Since leaving, she'd drunk a test tube of purple liquid that changed the orbs around her irises to long, shapeless blobs. It had also lifted the tone of her voice by several octaves, but since she'd stopped with the “well, actually” stuff, I considered it a more than fair trade.

“Parties? As in, he's done this more than once?” With just a cursory glance, I could see thousands upon thousands of dollars spent in every corner of the lawn. What it cost as a whole boggled the mind, let alone multiplied into multiple events. Part of me wondered if I'd gotten low-balled on the extra fee.

“Done one just about every night since his dad passed.” Bubba pulled behind a bright yellow sports car and killed the truck, popping the door open and tossing his key to the approaching valet. The red-vested man seemed a touch confused by the beat-up truck amidst a sea of luxury, but he didn’t let it stop him from doing his job.

“He took the loss hard,” Amy added.

“So I can see. What exactly did Herbram Clover do, again, that afforded such a lifestyle?”

“Enchanter,” Amy told me. “Brilliant work, passed down through the family for generations. The Clover name is synonymous with power and craftsmanship. And that’s the sort of thing you pay a premium for.”

There was no debating that part, as Amy and Bubba led me into a front hall filled with more staff, offering drinks and to take coats, along with a fresh wave of partiers. All around me, I saw designer labels and surgically perfected faces. The scent of plastic was practically overwhelming, at least for my vampiric nose. We got a few strange looks as Bubba politely cleared a way through the crowd, Amy’s flowing, simple dress and my professional attire likely costing less than anyone’s individual shoe. Thankfully, they did move, as a man Bubba’s size commands an instinctual respect, regardless of how much his clothes are worth.

Finally, we made it to a stairway with only a few partiers drifting about, climbing quickly past a velvet rope with a guard who’d have seemed intimidating if Bubba didn’t have at least half a foot on him. To my surprise, the guard greeted us with a genuine smile, pulling the rope aside and letting us pass as he and Bubba exchanged a few words. My best guess said that he was a fellow therian, as they were renowned for being good muscle, though he didn’t look at me with as much disdain as I’d have expected. Perhaps he was just a muscular human who appreciated dealing with regular folks instead of an endless stream of the wealthy.

After navigating several long hallways, we at last arrived in front of a pair of double doors, blocked by two more guards who nodded at Bubba and Amy on sight. They looked at me suspiciously, but Amy whispered a few words and they stepped aside without comment.

“We got Ainsley to hire the guards after the first few drunks wandered in and bothered the lawyer,” Bubba whispered as one of the guards unlocked the door. “Moved the work to a secure room, too. Used to be Herbram’s study; supposed to be warded six ways to Sunday.”

It occurred to me that I’d never asked for more information about this lawyer of theirs. Everything else had been so overwhelming it was a detail that slipped through the cracks. I was about to inquire when the door opened, and I saw a figure flipping through files, free hand dancing along the nearby notepad as it jotted down the bits deemed worth remembering.

“Asha?”

Sure enough, a familiar face looked up from the notepad, and there was Asha Patel. She looked a little different since I’d last seen her—hair cut shorter, clothes less formal. She also didn’t look half-terrified, most likely because this time, we weren’t trapped in Charlotte Manor under threat of death. In Charlotte’s defense, it had been an issue of self-preservation, and she’d apologized for the incident several times since.

“When they said they knew an accountant, I had a feeling it would be you.” She rose from her seat as I walked in the room, followed by Bubba and Amy. We exchanged a brief hug, more familiar than I’d be with most colleagues, but there’s nothing like a near-death experience to create a bond.

“Well, I had no idea I’d find you here. What happened? Last time we talked, you were heading home to try and drink until the previous few hours were nothing but a blurry memory.” Behind us, the doors shut once again, and I heard the lock being slid back into place.

“Damnedest thing, I was out of wine. Can you believe it?” Asha said. “That, and once I got away, I couldn’t stop thinking about everything you told me, and that I’d seen. I ended up going back to the site with the parahuman law books. I thought if I understood it all, maybe it wouldn’t be so scary.”

A sound idea, and one easily executed. Parahuman laws are hidden in plain sight in the form of a role-playing game. It allows them to be easily accessible by anyone, without humans realizing what they’re actually seeing. Most people think it’s just a very dry, boring game, though I’ve heard there are a few diehard fans scattered about the country.

“It sort of worked,” Asha continued. “After a few hours of reading, I was able to fall asleep. Then I did the same thing the next night, and the next, and eventually, I realized that I was forcing myself to learn. There was this whole other world of law and precedent I’d never seen before, and I wanted to know everything about it. You can probably fill in the details from there.”

“Once you had the knowledge, you wanted to use it, which you couldn’t do at Torvald & Torvald,” I surmised. “So you started freelancing in your off time.”

“Close, but not quite,” Asha replied. “I got a few certifications while still at the company, but once I was cleared to go, I made the jump whole hog. Turned in my resignation and started up my own company. Been going around two months now, and business is booming.”

“Glad to hear it. Though, honestly, I didn’t even know normal people could work with parahumans in such a capacity,” I said.

“It’s not exactly smiled upon, but there’s no law against it.” Amy’s voice came from my left; she had wandered over, running her hands along the files as she did. “While we’re not supposed to go around telling humans that we’re here, a few find out anyway. If someone knows, and they decide to fill a need in the parahuman market, there's not any real reason to stop them. Long as they exercise discretion and don't go blabbing, it's okay."

"Long story short, I had to fill out so many confidentiality agreements and secrecy clauses that I had a two-day long hand cramp." Asha shook her fingers, as if the ghost of the pain still lingered in her digits. "But I pushed through, and now I'm certified to work with parahumans. Good thing, too. For a culture that has real vampires as a part of it, there are shockingly few lawyers."

"Low blow," I told her.

"My job, I get to make the jokes." She patted the table, drawing my attention the large stack of files and ledgers spread out across it. "I assume Bubba and Amy filled you in on our situation?"

"They understated the scope, but I got the gist of things. Huge inheritance, the only directive is an even split, and our clients can't agree on a fair division. Did I miss anything?"

"Just the most problematic point." Asha sat back down, grabbing a nearby file, and I pulled up a chair next to her. Bubba and Amy also took seats, though they kept well away from where the paperwork was being discussed.

"The liquid assets, cash and gold, were kept mostly in bank accounts and treasure chests," Asha began, running her hand along a line of numbers so large I thought I might actually swoon. "Those, along with the house, were relatively easy to calculate a value for. Same for a lot of the antiques and collectibles. It'll take time, but I can get some appraisers in to assess a value. What's kept this procedure from moving forward is the tools."

"I have a suspicion you don't mean a belt sander," I muttered.

"What I wouldn't give," Asha replied. "No, these are enchanter's tools, passed down along the Clover line for centuries. Part of what makes their products so valuable. Very powerful stuff, or so I'm told. Apparently, it's a complete set, and it can't be split up without reducing the usefulness to a point where they might as well be generics. That's our biggest issue: whichever child gets the tools is essentially being handed the Clover business. The other can trade on the name, but without those tools, the odds of producing the same quality of goods are almost null."

"Interesting. So, in fair division of assets, we have to calculate the value of the tools in terms of potential income for an expected mage's life span, and offset the gain for one client by giving the other an equivalent amount of the other assets." Hesitant as I'd been to come along, I'd be lying if I said the challenge didn't intrigue me. The calculations needed to put everything together were going to be uniquely complex, and that was without planning for the usual hiccups one always encountered in this kind of work.

"They have weird ideas of interesting," I heard Bubba tell Amy from across the table.

“Do either of the children have a better claim to the business than the other?” I asked, ignoring my friend’s words of boredom. “If one lacks the talent to actually keep the business afloat, then that would give the tools a diminished value in their hands.”

Asha shook her head, flipping a few pages ahead to a small summary showing a pair of striking similar people. “Both were educated by their father, and are considered top-notch mages. Ainsley has a bit more technical know-how; some people think she’s already passed her father’s level of skill. Zane is a much better people-person, though; in case the party downstairs didn’t tip you off. He’s been handling a lot of the new client acquisition for several years.”

“I suppose that’s easier then. The tools are equal in value regardless of who gets them.” I looked at the mound of ledgers and papers lying on the table, most of which were of the same style as the one Asha was holding. “Did you do all of this?”

“Transcribed a lot of it; kept the original for some, though,” Asha replied. “I like to keep things organized.”

“On that point, we definitely agree. Do you have the records for what Clover earned off his tools for the past decade or so? I’ll need that as a starting point.”

“Way ahead of you.” Asha grabbed a particularly thick file and plopped it down in front of me as I pulled out my laptop.

“Then let’s get to work.” Looking back, perhaps it would have been more prudent to downplay my excitement, but in that moment, all I could see was the intriguing prospect of the challenge set before me.

3.

It's impossible to say how long we'd been working before the doors burst open. I was so absorbed in combing through the numbers that I'd completely lost all sense of time. The only thing that really betrayed the ticking of minutes was Bubba, who'd fallen asleep in his chair and was snoring softly. Amy had downed another potion not long after he nodded off, and every time I glanced at her, she was staring up at the ceiling. Truthfully, I had no idea if she was conscious or not, especially since her reaction to the doors slamming open was a quiet, bird-like cheep.

"Enough is enough!" The woman who came striding through, unhindered by either of the bulky guards standing at the door, was quite striking. Emerald robes hung from her body, complementing her dark skin while simultaneously giving her an air of wisdom and mystique. Clutched in her hand was a large wooden staff, intricate symbols carved up and down its length. As I looked at them, I thought I caught a few shifting, ever so slightly slithering about along the staff's surface. Her eyes took the whole room in with a glance, locking on Asha and promptly ignoring the rest of us.

"We brought you here to put an end to this impasse," she declared, crossing the room in several quick-stepped strides. Despite the aura of power she threw off, I realized that she was actually rather diminutive, no more than a couple of inches over five feet tall. "But still the matter remains unsettled, and meanwhile, my brother fills this house with revelry night after night. I just caught sight of someone . . . relieving themselves in my herb garden. Do you know what that does to nightshade?"

"Depends on what the person has eaten today," Amy said, her voice so soft and detached that I think I was the only one who heard it. In spite of the commotion, Bubba still snored in his chair. That, at least, wasn't much of surprise. As a former trucker, he'd gotten used to taking rest wherever he could, and it would take more than a little shouting to rouse him.

"Ainsley, please calm down. I promise, we're making progress." Asha motioned for me to come over, so I slowly made my forward, catching Ainsley Clover's attention for the first time. "This is Fredrick Fletcher, of Fletcher Accounting Services. He's here to help me calculate the fair distribution of assets for you and Zane."

Ainsley scrutinized me, slowly moving her eyes up and down, as if she were trying to pick apart every aspect of my being. "A vampire? Are you sure he isn't one of my brother's guests who wandered up from downstairs? I've never known a vampire to be good for more than decadence and betrayal.”

“With all due respect, Ms. Clover, Asha called me in to help with this case as a favor. If you don’t want me here, then I can take my leave. And if you’re going to continue to make those kinds of comments, I think I’d rather go, regardless.” Ainsley wasn’t the first client I’d met who had certain ideas about vampires, and honestly, it was hard to debate those people on many points. Since vampires could take the abilities of other parahumans by drinking their blood, my species had earned a reputation for feeding by any means necessary. However, that didn’t mean I had to work with people who couldn’t manage basic civility. Swamped as I was, there were plenty of clients out there who could at least mind their manners; I no longer bothered with the ones that lacked that skill.

Asha’s eyes went wide at my words, though I’m not sure if she was afraid for my safety or the fact she’d have to try and find another CPPA on such short notice. Ainsley just kept staring at me for another few seconds, then finally dipped her head.

“Forgive me, Mr. Fletcher. I’ve never been quite adept at interacting with others, and this business with my father’s estate has me out of sorts. You’re right. I’ve no place to judge you by your fangs, and if Asha has brought you in, then I trust that you have the skill to do the job.”

“It’s all right. This happens more than you’d think,” I assured her. “And please, call me Fred. Everyone else already does.”

“Then you may refer to me by my first name, as well.” Ainsley turned from me back to Asha, her tone much calmer than when she’d come bursting in the door. “I appreciate that this is not an easy task, but please tell me that we’re nearing completion. The sooner this is all settled, the sooner I can get back to work. Zane has his parties, but without the tools, all I can do is plan and research.”

“We’re making headway,” Asha said. “Fred coming on board is a big step in cutting down on our timetables. With a little luck and a lot of coffee, we might be able to get it down in a few days. Maybe a week more, at most.”

Ainsley didn’t exactly seem thrilled with the news, but she accepted it with a stalwart sigh. “Very well. I know that no delicate work is helped along by hurrying. If you’ll excuse me, I’m going to go have a word with my brother about his ‘guests’ and their understanding of where the bathrooms are.”

With a graceful twirl that sent her robes spinning, Ainsley strode back out of the room. Though no one touched them, the doors gently closed behind her, and I could hear the lock sliding back into place.

“Well, that was certainly something.” I sank back down into my chair and set about the task of finding the spot where I’d been interrupted in my work.

“Ainsley’s got a good heart. She’s just a little brash,” Asha told me. “It doesn't help that her method of dealing with stress seems to be work, and enchanting is off the table until we finish dividing the estate."

"Why is that, exactly? Are you trying to stop any new goods from being produced that might impact the figures?" I asked.

In response, Asha dug through a few files and pulled out a thick stack of papers. Unlike the pages all around us, these were yellow and weathered, the script scrawled across them a handwritten cursive. "This is Herbram's will. The actual instructions are just the top page, the rest is all spellcraft and enchantments that I can't make heads or tails of. As Ainsley and Zane explained it, the tools and the other really valuable stuff is being held in a sort of magical escrow. Not even they can get to those items, not until the estate is divided. Only when they're both satisfied will they sign the back page, and that's what undoes the spell."

Now that was an impressive escrow system. Carefully, I took the pages from Asha and read through them. The first one was indeed a will, or as little instruction as could be given and still constitute one, but the rest appeared to be nothing more than gibberish and runes. This time, I was certain the runes were moving, as I flipped a page and caught one in mid-slither. Amy might have been able to make sense of what everything was, but seeing as she'd mentally checked out and it didn't actually impact my job, I decided to just trust Asha.

"It's a smart system," I said, handing her back the stack of pages. "Though a bit inconvenient for his kids. Did he really think they were going to snatch everything up before it could be divided?"

"From the way Ainsley and Zane describe it, I get the feeling it was more concern about external threats," Asha replied. "In case the house didn't give it away, the Clovers are worth a lot of money. Keeping everything locked up until it has a rightful owner was Herbram's way of making sure nothing got lost, or taken, in the handover. You can add magic and vampires, but good old corporate espionage is still the same all over."

"Well, the old clients didn't challenge for blood when they got robbed," I pointed out.

"See, that statement is how I know you were in the office too much. If you'd been out schmoozing, you'd know just how many blood oaths people were swearing." Asha tucked the will back under her file of financial records and pulled a ledger forward. "I've actually been surprised by how mundane a lot of my work is. Aside from almost every parahuman species having their own treaties, laws, and exceptions, there's really no difference from working with humans."

"Except for the occasional outburst of chaos and danger," I said.

"Do you get a lot of that? My closest call was in Charlotte Manor, and once when I mixed up my dates for a meeting with a weretiger. She thought I was a trespasser, until she noticed the briefcase.”

“Give it time; soon, you’ll build up quite the stock of stories. Seems to come with the territory,” I told her.

Asha’s mouth was open to reply, but her words were lost as the sound of a thunderclap tore through the room, shaking everything around us like a three-second earthquake. It was so loud that it woke Bubba, who tried to sit up, got confused, and tumbled to the floor. Even Amy seemed to shake off her lingering stupor, turning her vacant gaze from the ceiling to a nearby window. I followed her eyes, looking out to see a red glow flickering through the glass.

Moving carefully, lest another blast shake the room, I carefully peered out to see what was causing the light show. I thought maybe one of the drunken guests had found a propane tank to set off, creating the explosion and setting the yard on fire. What met my eyes was not panicking guests and a blazing yard, however. The red glow was actually coming from the sky, which seemed too close for comfort, slicing down and parting the driveway less than a quarter of the way out, forming an opaque red wall that carried on in every visible direction.

What was more worrying was that everyone seemed to have vanished. No wait staff, no partygoers, no valets. Just empty buffet tables and glasses of fizzing champagne slowly going flat. Bubba, Asha, and Amy crowded around me as we took in the scene, trying to figure out exactly what had happened. From a few inches away, I heard Asha mutter darkly under her breath.

“You just had to go and tempt fate, didn’t you, Fred?”

4.

Amy pulled out a small bottle with several symbols etched on the side, popped the top, and took a long gulp. When she finished, the shapeless blobs around her eyes dissolved, although she had grown a small set of horns just below her hairline. I honestly couldn't have cared less about the new forehead accessories; all that mattered to me was that our resident alchemist was visibly more focused than before. As the only one of us who even remotely understood magic, we were all waiting for her to shed some light on what had just happened.

"Well, I'll be damned," Amy said, after looking at the scene with fresh focus. "I have no idea what the hell that is."

"I thought you were a mage." Asha's tone was strained; she was understandably a bit on edge given the circumstances.

"I'm an alchemist. That's like asking a dermatologist to fill in for an advanced brain surgeon. Sure, they're both doctors, but they've got specialties that the other wouldn't be as educated in, and this is some of high-level enchanter shit." Amy pointed to the red wall, as if we weren't already staring at it. "Best guess, this thing is a giant bubble that split us off into a pocket dimension."

"Seems like a big ass pocket," Bubba rumbled, having finally wiped the last of the sleep from his eyes.

"Just a phrase. It means we're not quite in the real world at the moment, sort of compacted into a magical space that's adjacent to it. I can explain if you really want me to, but the basic theory takes five heavy books and half a day to cover," Amy offered.

"We'll take your word for it." I scanned the area outside, still searching for any signs of life. "The bigger questions are: how did we get here, where is everyone, and what do we do to get home?"

"Look!" Asha grabbed my arm and pulled me a few inches over, shifting my perspective so that I caught sight of a suit-wearing figure just barely visible from our vantage point. Whoever they were, I could see them making broad gestures with their hands, either talking in an animated manner or perhaps casting a spell.

"Seems like we've got someone to question," Bubba said.

There was no discussion of the issue. He was right, and there was no getting around that. We needed to figure out what was happening, and there was at least a chance that the person down there might know. Amy fiddled with the lock, flinging the doors open to reveal an empty hallway. No guards, no sounds of guests from downstairs; just a whole lot more nothing, exactly like the lawn. Moving swiftly, but with our eyes peeled for any potential danger, we made our way down the stairs.

“Holy crap.” Asha’s voice was a whisper as she veered away from the group. We’d just hit the bottom floor, and while the rest of us were occupied with getting outside, something else had caught the lawyer’s eye. It didn’t take long to notice what, either. Directly before her, hovering in mid-air, was a glass filled halfway with scotch. A few feet away was a dish piled high with large shrimp, right next to a floating glass of wine.

All around us, bits of dishware and cutlery hung about, supported by some invisible force. Bubba stuck a finger in a flute of champagne and gave it a quick swirl, watching the bubbles fizz in reaction to his touch. Then he took hold of the glass and tried to move it. Not so much as even a budge, and I knew well that Bubba’s strength was nothing to turn a nose up at.

“Are these what the guests were holding?” Asha asked, picking up a shrimp and turning it around in her hand before dropping it to the floor. The crustacean tumbled unimpeded, hitting the fine marble below us with a moist squish.

“Must be,” I agreed. “But why just the glasses and dishes? If it’s what they were holding, there was bound to be other stuff.”

“These are part of the mansion.” Amy’s head was tilted backward, staring up at the underside of a plate. “They all bear the Clover crest. Whatever happened, it kept the mansion, and every piece of property inside, intact.”

“Somehow, I think that’s even creepier.” Asha shuddered and walked back over to us. With the mystery of the floating dishware solved, or as solved as it was likely to be, we continued on, heading down the long hallway and out into the night air.

The four of us stepped into an argument, but it took me several seconds to realize that a fight was even happening, I was so distracted by the feeling of the air around me. It was completely still, unnaturally so, and a part of my more primal mind reeled at the incongruity. Outside was meant to be alive, the air always moving, slight currents bringing in new smells and feelings. None of that was here, though. This air was flat. Empty.

Dead.

“Oh, fuck you, it’s my fault! Was I supposed to just let you hex me?” The voice snapped me out of my fixation with the air, turning my attention to the pair of people bickering nearby. One I knew right away—the large staff and green robes made Ainsley unmistakable, even if her back was turned to us. The other person was the one wearing the suit that I’d seen from the window. Without introduction, I instantly knew that this would be Zane, the other Clover sibling. He and Ainsley were nearly identical, only a few small facial differences between them, despite being of different genders. If that weren’t enough, though, I likely could have pieced it together from the foot-long wooden wand glowing a soft blue in his hand, runes just like the ones in Ainsley's staff scrawled across it.

"If you were half-decent, you'd have taken the spell. Stars know you deserve worse. Do you have any idea what I walked in on your guests doing in the restroom?" Ainsley yelled, waving her staff around as though she were debating taking it to her brother's head, which actually seemed quite in the realm of possibility from how heated things were.

"No, and I don't care. It's a party! That's why I pay people to clean up when these things are over."

"This is our home, you bastard, the Clover estate. Do you have no regard for the generations of our family that spent their lives in this mansion? What I am even asking, we both know the answer is no," Ainsley spat.

"Kiss my ass with the Clover estate shit. It's just a house! Quit trying to memorialize everything like it's so damned precious. Dad's gone; turning the home into a shrine won't bring him back!" Zane threw his hands about as he talked, which explained the erratic gestures I'd noticed from the window.

Ainsley opened and closed her mouth several times, but no words were coming out. I did notice that her grip on the staff had grown tighter, though, and suddenly, the inadvertent silence seemed like a good place to announce ourselves, before there was only one conscious mage to talk to.

"Excuse us, but I'm hoping you two have some idea of what's going on?" I tried to keep my voice calm and easygoing, but both of the Clover siblings easily jumped half a foot off the ground at the sound of my words. They spun around, staff and wand leveled at our group, before Ainsley finally seemed to recognize us.

"What . . . Fred? How did you four get here?" She threw a look to Zane, who merely shrugged, their feud momentarily forgotten amidst the mystery of our appearance.

"Sort of what we were hoping you could tell us," Asha replied. "We were up in the study, working on the will, when there was a loud boom and suddenly, this red bubble is everywhere and we're in some sort of purse dimension."

"Pocket dimension," Amy, Zane, and Ainsley all corrected simultaneously.

"Whatever," Asha snapped. "Point is, we're here, there are plates and glasses floating around, and it's not a great work environment. Can you fix this?"

While I didn't know much about the history between Ainsley and Zane, or their personalities, I easily recognized the sheepish, guilty look that flashed between them at Asha's question. We weren't going to like the answer, and they were probably going to be embarrassed by it.

“Here’s the issue,” Zane said, taking over the conversation with a smooth delicacy that I immediately envied. “This whole thing was our doing, sort of, but in a much bigger way, it’s the work of our father. Raising a pair of mages in the city can be troublesome, especially twins, since, like all kids, we would quarrel. And since he was the one who enchanted our staff and wand respectively, he added a little something extra. Every time spells from our tools clashed, the magical implements would trigger a spell that stuck us in our own pocket dimension. He did it partly to make sure we couldn’t go around using our magic in front of humans before we understood the consequences, but also as a punishment. This is the equivalent of our time-out room, and my dear sister activated it when she came storming downstairs in a tizzy and tried to launch a hex at me.”

“That ain’t much of an explanation on why we got dragged along,” Bubba said.

“Yeah, that I don’t know about,” Zane admitted. “Usually, the only things that come with us are our tools and possessions. Dad could walk in and out, since he created it, but he was the only one.”

“I’ve got a theory.” Ainsley stepped forward, though I noticed she kept several feet between herself and Zane at all times. “They were locked in the study when you callously blocked a spell you deserved and trapped us here. Father placed more than a tome’s worth of enchantments and wards on that room, so it’s possible that one of those spells tethered everything in it to our location, people included.”

“It’s as good a bet as any,” Zane agreed. “Dad loved to test new spells around the house. I wouldn’t put it past him to have thrown a pointless one on the study and forget about it.”

“He did not cast pointless spells.” Ainsley whirled around on Zane, a new head of steam already building for a fresh fight. But it was Amy, thankfully, who stepped forward and retook control of the situation.

“Look, we get that you two have shit to work out, and that’s great, but maybe we could focus on how to get out of your time-out space? I’m pretty sure the party guests have noticed that all their plates vanished, and eventually, someone will realize that the homeowner is gone, too.”

“No, Dad made this place to keep us from exposing our magic,” Zane said. “Just like space, the time is compressed. We’d have to spend months here before any measurable time slipped by on the outside.”

“He’d leave us in the bubble for weeks sometimes,” Ainsley added. “Bringing by food and water if needed, but otherwise, we’d be on our own.”

“Wow, and I thought my dad was strict,” Asha muttered.

“To the old man’s credit, we could get out anytime we wanted to.” Zane tilted his head toward Ainsley and rolled his eyes. “All we ever had to do was apologize to each other. Since we always went in here for fighting, he didn’t let us out until we made up. But someone never learned to lie well enough to sell him on the fake ones, so it took much longer than needed.”

“Excuse me for not wanting to deceive our father,” Ainsley shot back.

“Okay, look, your dad’s not here to judge the authenticity of an apology, so why don’t you both just say you’re sorry and get us out of here,” Amy suggested.

Another look flashed between them. It wasn’t much, but it was enough that I knew, even before Zane spoke, that things wouldn’t be quite so simple.

“Yeah, see, the apology was what he demanded before letting us out, but it didn’t end the spell on its own,” Zane admitted. “For that, we need the chime of a clearing bell; the same one he used when creating the enchantment.”

“So, where’s the damn bell?” Bubba asked. Now it was my and Asha’s turn to exchange looks, as we both had the exact same hunch on what the answer would be. And unfortunately, we were dead-on right.

“We don’t have the exact location.” Ainsley’s eyes were suddenly very preoccupied with the grass down by her feet. “All we know is that it’s with the rest of his enchanting tools, locked away in magical escrow.”

5.

Fierce as my own initial rising panic was, I was far more concerned with how Asha would take the news. Bubba, Amy, and I were all accustomed to a certain level of chaos popping up at unexpected times. Asha, however, was new to the parahuman world, only being acquainted with it for a few months. There was a very real chance that the terror of such an impossible magical predicament could overwhelm her, and we needed everyone functional if we hoped to break out of this pocket bubble.

To my shock, Asha looked cheerier than she had in the foyer of floating plates. If anything, she seemed relieved by the news, which only served to make me wonder if I'd misheard Ainsley's explanation.

"Asha, are you okay?"

"Huh?" She looked over at me, more perplexed by the question than the issue of how we were going to escape. "Sure. I mean, I was worried for a while there, but it looks like this will be an easy fix, after all."

Zane and Ainsley were shooting expressions at Asha that perfectly mirrored my own. "Perhaps being locked in the study made you forget, but escrow means there's no getting at the tools until we've decided who the owner is," Zane told her.

"Right, which is exactly what Fred is here to help me do," Asha agreed, still unbothered by our dour dispositions. "And this is better in a lot of ways. We've got however long we need to do the work, since time doesn't matter, and according to you, no one will even notice that we're gone. All we have to do is iron out the will, and whoever gets the tools can pop us out of here."

"Don't mean to be a party pooper, but there's the issue of food and water to think about." Bubba spoke between bites of shrimp; evidently, he'd taken a handful from the plates in the foyer. I'd have been worried about someone noticing the absent crustaceans when the time bubble vanished, but with the amount of alcohol I'd seen flowing, I sincerely doubted anyone would assume missing shrimp were stolen by a giant therian.

Ainsley lifted her head slightly higher. Now that the situation wasn't so hopeless, it seemed she didn't feel quite as ashamed for getting us into it. "We've got enough bottled water and food in the panty to last for months. Father always used to say that a mage's home should be a fortress unto itself, impregnable and self-sufficient."

It seemed Herbram Clover shared the same thoughts on home-safety as the mages who had built Charlotte Manor. I could only wonder what his children would think of my friend, the animated house.

“And do you also have a stock of blood on hand?” In the silence that fell after Amy’s words, every eye slowly turned to me. Asha was scared, and trying not to show it, having no doubt only just remembered that, as a vampire, I needed blood to survive. Ainsley and Zane both looked more concerned than fearful, regarding me as a potential threat that might need dealing with. Bubba and Amy were worried, but there was no terror in their anxiety. They knew the situation from my vantage point, and understood that the biggest potential issue was me starving myself, as I had no desire to take anyone’s blood, especially unwillingly.

“Never let it be said that I am unprepared.” Reaching into my back pocket, I pulled out the enchanted flask I’d purchased in Boarback. “Had a run-in with an unfriendly fellow several weeks ago, and ever since, I’ve made a point of always keeping some emergency blood on hand. Just in case.”

A wave of relief washed over the rest of the room. With my own meals handled, there was nothing to stop us from buckling down and pushing through the paperwork. If anything, this might be a blessing in disguise. Instead of having to carve days out of my schedule to work in, Asha and I could handle the whole thing in one marathon of number crunching.

“Seems as though you’ve got work to do,” Zane said, nicely summing up the situation. It might have been that easy, too, if only he hadn’t kept talking. “But after tonight’s attack, it can no longer be denied that my sister lacks the temperament to run this business. Divide the resources fairly, just make sure that I get the enchanting tools, regardless of how much else you have to give her.”

“You? Your skills aren’t even up to what Father could do, yet you want to take over his business?” Ainsley whirled on her brother, staff trembling in her angry grip.

“My work won’t be as good as what you can manage.” There was no bitterness or bite in Zane’s voice; it was like he’d accepted the truth of the statement so long ago that it no longer hurt him to utter it. “But all the skillful enchanting in the world doesn’t matter if you yell at the clients and scare them away. I can build the Clover business beyond where Dad left it. Meanwhile, you’d be lucky to still get any jobs after a year.”

“The Clover name is about quality. Our enchanting is some of the highest caliber on the market!” Ainsley yelled. “People pay for that, not because you buy them a few rounds of champagne and tell them what they want to hear.”

“We’re not the only high-level enchanters out there. Without that champagne and ass-kissing, they’ll take their business elsewhere.” Zane was a curious contrast to Ainsley. As she was getting more worked up, he seemed to be getting calmer and more detached. It was like watching an ocean smash against a boulder; there was plenty of movement and action, but ultimately, nothing was changed in the end.

“That’s why our work has to get better, so there’s no one out there who can compete with what we do.” Ainsley turned from her brother to Asha, though she needn’t have bothered. All of us, even Bubba and Amy, already knew what Ainsley was going to say.

“Unless I get the tools in the split, I’m not going to sign.”

“For once, my sister and I see eye-to-eye on something,” Zane said. “I, too, am going to have to hold firm on the condition that I be the one to carry on Dad’s business. It’s the enchanter tools, or no signature.”

“Oh, come on.” Asha threw her hands up in the air, a motion I’d thought existed only in expressions, until I actually saw her get so frustrated she didn’t know how else to show it. “You realize how impossible that is, don’t you? We can’t give you both the tools, and we need the damn things to get out of here. You’re literally holding us all hostage by being too petty to compromise.”

“You have my sincere apologies,” Zane said, and admittedly, he did sound pretty darn sincere. “I don’t take any joy in dragging you into this; however, I can’t let my sister undo generations of family achievement by driving off all of our customers. Maybe this seems petty to you, and you might not be wrong, but this business was Dad’s pride and joy. I have to protect it, and if that means inconveniencing you, then so be it. There’s plenty of food and water to live on, and I’ll pay your respective rates until we break free. Consider it a working sabbatical.”

“Do we have rates?” Bubba whispered to Amy, who shrugged her shoulders. It was unlikely either of them had thought about billing, since they were just pitching in as a favor to Richard, but I’d make sure to calculate one for each of them before the matter was settled. I’d be damned if I’d see my friends get nothing for the trouble of living in a pocket dimension.

“Zane’s right,” Ainsley added. “This is more than just a business. It’s the Clover legacy. I’ll do whatever it takes to make sure it’s carried on properly, by me.”

“Again, you’re handing us an impossible task.” Asha looked between the stone-faced twins, trying to appeal to their sense of reason. “We can’t give you both the tools. One of you has to cave on this.”

“Then I suggest you make a compelling proposal,” Zane said. “Convince one of us that what you’re offering in the split is a better deal. Otherwise, it’s a matter of seeing who breaks first.”

“Oh, I think we already know who that will be. You love your precious parties too much to be away from them for long. All I need is a workspace and a library to be happy. In fact, I’ve got some experiments to check on. Let me know when the papers are ready to be signed.” With that, Ainsley stomped off into the mansion, nearly knocking over several champagne flutes with the wide swings of her wooden staff.

As she vanished, Zane seemed to deflate, the confidence and surety he'd used to hold back her anger falling away. It wasn't that he seemed less charismatic, just more weary. He watched his sister go before turning to the rest of us.

"Again, I am genuinely sorry for all of this. How about, for now, you focus on getting the assets fairly divided, like you already were. I'll try and think of a way to make Ainsley come around by then. For now, though, I think I need a little time to recuperate." Zane slipped into the foyer then as well, moving carefully between the plates so that nothing would be disturbed. He didn't climb the stairs, however. Instead, he grabbed an unopened bottle of champagne off the table and headed to the left, toward a part of mansion I'd yet to lay eyes on.

"Might as well make myself useful," Bubba declared. "I'm gonna go take stock of the pantry, see what we've got in terms of food. Got a hunch that neither of those two is much for cookin', so I'll earn my keep by makin' sure we all stay fed."

"I'll try and see if anything I've got can break us out of here." Amy swung her bag around and began to rummage through it. While it only looked large enough to hold a few books and perhaps a water bottle, I'd seen, more than once, just how much bigger it was on the inside. "Don't think I have any potions that can break dimensional walls, but there's nothing like necessity to spur innovation."

"Let's call that Plan Z." Bubba tilted his head toward me and Asha. "Best case is these two gettin' the twins to settle their differences."

Asha threw a look of hope in my direction, but the best I could muster was a weak grin that was supposed to be reassuring. This was a family matter, and I'd done enough estate work to know those were always more complicated. As much as they claimed it was about the business, there were also decades of fighting, disagreements, and other troubles to contend with, all compacted by the sense of loss at their father's passing. I wasn't sure anything we said or did was going to move them before they were ready.

But even if that was the case, we still had to get the estate division done. Until that part was handled, it was impossible to proceed. So, with no other options, I motioned to Asha, and we headed back to the study.

6.

Time was functionally meaningless inside the bubble. Sure, the clocks moved, but with no day or night cycle, only the ever-present red glow of the wall cutting us off from reality, it all just blurred together. The moment we'd been trapped in was nighttime, though, which mattered only in that I never felt the familiar wave of weariness crash over me, signaling that the sun had risen. I wasn't sure if that was a good thing or not, as I'd already gone far longer than usual without the cathartic release of a long day's rest. Still, I didn't feel too loopy or out of it yet, so I pushed on. It wasn't as if I could change the situation, even if I wanted to. My best bet would be asking Amy for a potion, and there was no way something that specific wouldn't be experimental. As I've said before, Amy's alchemy skills are highly praised and impressive, but even she has to break a few eggs in the process of creation.

Instead of fretting about how long a vampire could retain their sanity without sleep, I focused on getting the work done. Asha and I holed up in the study with her files, working tirelessly to account for every asset, owning, and piece of property in the Clover estate. When she slept, I worked on calculating the value for the tools, poring through old receipts for work done, trying to quantify what the trends in the enchanting market were and extrapolating how much they could earn over the next several decades. It's not my place to speak about a client's finances, but suffice to it say that when I finally finished assigning those items a value, there were a lot of zeroes behind it. More impressively, though, there was enough of the estate to make up for the split, assuring each of the siblings an even cut of the inheritance.

Of course, the real problem was that neither of them would accept the half without tools, and that didn't seem to be changing anytime soon. Bubba gave us reports when he came in with meals for Asha. Ainsley only let him in to deliver food, having locked herself away in her workshop, and Zane was in the wine cellar, slowly carving his way through the offerings of every region in France. Neither was talking, except to say that they weren't going to budge.

"We have to do something." The words came out of nowhere, Asha and I having fallen into what had become our usual silence as we worked on organizing the assets. She broke that silence, looking up from her work with a pinched, tired expression on her face. "Judging by how often I've slept, it's been three days in here, and I'm going to lose it pretty soon." Evidently, I was wrong about time being meaningless, at least for those who still had mortal bodies to keep track of.

"We're almost done," I said. It was meant to be a hopeful statement, but the words only highlighted the larger issue at hand. We'd been focusing on the work because it was what we could do. Once that was over, we'd have nothing else. It became a waiting game to see which of the twins would break first.

"That's the problem." Asha laid her hand on the thick stack of parchment that was Herbram's enchanted will. "A few more hours of ironing out the detail work, tops, and we're finished. Unless we can think of a way to find another set of enchanting tools passed through their family, we're going to be stuck here."

"Is that an option? Not inherited tools, I mean, but this set has a value. Could we get a set that's comparable in terms of power?"

"Doesn't seem likely," Asha replied. "You've seen how important these are to the family; my understanding is that most mages treat the really potent stuff the same way. Even if there was an open market for them, it doesn't help us in here. That's the sort of deal we'd have to have in place before one of them was willing to sign."

"And splitting the items up is off the table?" I'd gone through the history of every piece in Herbram's enchanting tool kit as I assessed their cumulative value; there were six, in total. If only the twins were willing to divvy them up, then perhaps we could get out of here.

"Doing that would mean they either both get a weakened set, or have to agree to work together." Asha jerked a thumb toward the window, where that familiar red glow still lingered in place. "These really seem like the kind of people who are willing to work together?"

"Sadly, no," I admitted. "Though they'd clearly be better off if they were willing to do so. I can't imagine what's stirred up so much animosity between them."

"I've got a guess," Asha said. "We both know this stuff is newer to me than it is to you, but I did a little research when I got offered the job. From what I can tell, Herbram telling his kids to split the inheritance however they saw fit is an oddity in the mage world. Normally, Herbram would have bequeathed the tools specifically to one of his children, essentially choosing which of them he trusted to continue his work. When he didn't do that, he left them both out of sorts. Neither knows who he wanted to have take over, which makes it all the more important to prove themselves by doing so."

"Huh. I am beginning to suspect that Herbram Clover might have been something of an asshole."

"Or just didn't understand how things are between siblings." Asha stood from the desk, taking a long stretch that produced audible pops from her back. "I think I'm going to ask Ainsley for a shower to use. Living in these clothes for the past three days hasn't been my idea of fun, and I'm sure it's no treat for you either."

I hadn't mentioned it, for obvious reasons, but there are precious few humans that can go unwashed for three days and not be picked up by vampiric nostrils. Thankfully, my selective attention was excellent, so I'd put the inevitable scent of sweat and time out of mind, right up until she mentioned it.

"While I'm up there, I'll see if I can make any headway with her, competitive sister to competitive sister. Maybe you can drum up a conversation with Zane," Asha suggested.

"I'm afraid I don't have any siblings to use as common ground," I said.

"No, but if memory serves, you know your way around a bottle of wine. Seems like common enough ground to start with." She finished her stretch, laid a pen between the pages of a ledger to mark her spot, and made her way out into the hall.

I worked for a while longer, both to find a good stopping point and to try to plan out what on earth I could say to Zane that would move things forward. Not surprisingly, nothing sprang to mind. Aside from us being trapped in a dimension cut off from the real world, it was hard to argue with either his or Ainsley's points. Alone, either of them would falter, Ainsley's temper driving off customers while Zane's skill lowered their reputation for quality. With enough work and training, one of them might be able to grow and overcome the limitation, but there would still be lost ground to recover.

Eventually, I faced the fact that no brilliant bolt of insight was going to strike me and rose from the desk to head downstairs. Brooding wasn't productive, and if I talked to Zane, there was a chance I might uncover something that could get us free. The trip down was quick, though I got a bit turned around near the kitchen, as I'd only seen bits of the massive estate. Fortunately, I finally remembered that people who spend their days in wine cellars don't tend to take shower breaks, so I sniffed around until I located Zane's pungent scent. From there, it was just a matter of tracking it through an empty house and down into a wine cellar bigger than my apartment.

I'll admit, for as much as I like to think myself wise enough to be content with my own earnings, I was filled with jealousy at the sight of their cellar. Climate-controlled, gently lit, and filled with rows upon rows of gleaming bottles. The ones I recognized, which were fewer than I'd expected, were the sort of vintage that sat near the top of wine lists in fancy restaurants, serving as conversation fodder for what kind of person would spend so much money on a single bottle of alcohol. Red, white, even the odd rosé, all lined up in rows upon rows of carefully sorted bottles. It was like walking into a wine library, or museum, and I idly wondered how big my business would have to grow to justify this level of extravagance.

The sound of clinking glass drew my attention to one of the rows at the far end of the room, where I discovered Zane leaning against a wall, a bottle of merlot in one hand and a burrito in the other. At least Bubba had been making sure the mage didn't wallow on an empty stomach. Slowly, I made my way over, though it wasn't until I was less than a few feet away that Zane bothered looking up.

"Ah, there's my undead worker. How's the will coming?" His voice was a little slurred, though not nearly as bad as I'd expected from the number of empty bottles rolling around near him. Perhaps he'd been going slower than the rest of us realized, or maybe mages had a higher tolerance than I knew. Neil was too young to drink, and Amy tended to prefer her own work, so I didn't have a great example to work from.

"It's almost done," I told him. "We've found a way to split it all up evenly. The last part is determining which of you gets the tools."

"Those damned things." Zane lifted the bottle to his lips and found it nearly empty, so he set it aside and began to search for another.

"Here." I grabbed one of the few wines I recognized from the shelf, a cabernet sauvignon that I'd always wanted to try, and handed it to him. "You may as well stick to red, since you've made the commitment."

"An excellent idea." Instead of reaching for a wine opener, he pulled out his wand and mumbled what sounded like gibberish under his breath before tapping it to the top of the bottle. To my surprise, the cork began to worm its way upward, eventually dislodging and falling to the ground with a small pop. He took a long draw from the bottle, then offered it to me. "Care for a sip?"

"You should really decant something like this first." I took the bottle anyway and slid down to the ground next to him, taking a deep whiff of the wine before allowing it to actually hit my tongue.

"It's just the cheap stuff." He leaned back, letting his head rest on the cool stone wall behind us. "Always assumed they'd go to Ainsley, you know." It was a bit of a topic jump, but with how little we'd both talked, I had no problem sussing out his meaning.

"The tools?"

"Of course, the tools. She's a better enchanter than me. Better than Dad, too, and he had over a century of experience on her."

It was a good thing I'd yet to sip the wine, because I would have snorted it out at his words. I knew that mages lived longer than most people, though I'd never thought to ask why, but over a century . . . that was more than I'd been expecting.

"It just seemed like a lock, you know," Zane continued, either unaware or unbothered by the surprise in my face. "Ainsley was the one who could do the best enchanting, so she would be the one who got the tools. I was just the guy who did the talking, worked the deals, and got us a few extra percents on the bottom line."

"That's nothing to undersell," I told him. "Businesses live and die by their profit margins.” Now that the wine’s scent had fully been appreciated, I allowed myself to take a small swallow from the bottle. It was so heavenly that for a moment I actually forgot the situation and just allowed myself to revel in the joy dancing along my tongue.

“Do we particularly look like we need the extra margins?” Zane gestured to the cellar, but he just as easily could have been pointing to the house, the estate, as a whole. “No one cared that I brought in more money; there was always so much of it. At least, that’s what I thought.”

I handed him back the bottle, which he took a glugging drink from, spilling more than a few drops down his neck to an already stained shirt. “What changed your mind?”

“Well, he didn’t leave the tools to Ainsley, did he? He left it up to us to figure out who should get them. Sort of felt like Dad was giving me a chance. Saying that I could get them, if I proved myself worthy.” He sighed and took another drink, then handed me back the bottle. “Instead, I’ve gotten into a pissing match with my sister just like when we were kids, dragged a lot of innocent people along for the ride, and hid away in the cellar. Truly, a son to be proud of.”

“In all fairness, Ainsley is being just as stubborn, and she’s locked herself in her workshop.” I’m not sure why I felt bad for Zane. He was part of the reason we were stuck, and none of things he just said were untrue. Even more, he seemed like the kind of person I should have despised. Wealthy, charismatic, and handsome, he’d been handed all the advantages in life that I hadn’t, yet I couldn’t bring myself to hold that against him. I guess I just knew a little too well what it was like to not be what your parents were hoping for.

“For her, this probably feels like a robbery. The tools were supposed to be hers, and now she’s scared of losing them to her screw-up of a brother. Can’t say I blame her for digging in. Truth is, Ainsley should get the tools. I understand it, you know, deep in my gut, but I just can’t bring myself to let go.” He pulled out his wand once more, rolling it gently between his fingers. “I’m a lot of things, and I’ve made peace with most of them. I just don’t want to be a quitter. I want to fight. I want to prove that I can make the old man proud, too.”

It was hard to think of a way to fault him, or to argue with that sentiment, so, instead, I just took another sip from the bottle of wine. Somehow, it wasn’t quite as magical as the first time around. Maybe I’d already gotten used to it, or, more likely, Zane’s sadness just made it impossible to find such joy in a fermented liquid.

I could see that he was nearing the breaking point, guilt slowly gaining on pride and determination. He’d break in a day or so on his own, and if I pushed him carefully, we might be free in the next few hours. Yet, to my own surprise, now that the key to our escape was within reach, part of me didn't want it. Not like this. Zane was right; he deserved the chance to prove himself, just as Ainsley did.

And I was beginning to have an inkling of an idea of how to give them just that.

7.

Based on Bubba's meals and Asha's need for rest, it took another day to do the fresh contracts. We probably could have pounded them out in half the time if we'd raced through it, but the one good thing about being trapped in a timeless pocket dimension is that there's no compulsion to rush. Instead, Asha and I took our time, crossing every "t" and dotting every "i" to make sure our work was airtight. Given that we were dealing with mages and an enchanted will, it seemed prudent to leave no wiggle room anywhere in our documents. That was the sort of thing that would just open up more trouble down the line.

Finally, when we were sure the language was word-perfect, we waited until Bubba made a food delivery, and then asked him to bring everyone to the study. Less than ten minutes later, Ainsley, Bubba, Amy, and Zane entered the room, in that order. No words passed between the siblings as everyone took their seats, though Amy filled the silence by asking Bubba about his recipe for the omelets he'd made that "morning." When everyone was seated, I looked to Asha to start things off. She was the lawyer and main employee, after all. I was just the numbers guy.

"Before we get going, let me double check. Are either of you willing to let the other have the enchanting tools in exchange for the lion's share of the rest of the estate?" Asha's eyes darted between Zane and Ainsley, neither of whom spoke, though both looked far less stalwart than they had when first making their ultimatums. I had a hunch that, now that they had both cooled down, it was as much a matter of pride as it was actually wanting the inheritance.

"About what we expected," Asha continued. "Fine, then. You've forced Fred and me to really think outside the box on this one, since none of us want to spend the next forty years stuck in here. So, here is what we're proposing as a compromise."

That was my cue. I rose from the desk, contracts in hand, and made my way around the large table, now almost completely cleared off of all the clutter we'd needed to work with. I laid a stack of documents in front of Ainsley, then Zane, before returning to my seat, where an identical packet was already waiting. They began flipping through the pages the moment they got them, and before I was even settled, I heard Ainsley's voice echo through the room.

"Joint custody?"

"Temporary joint custody," Asha corrected. "Since neither of you is willing to give up your claim on the tools, it seemed like this was the best way to determine who should get them. For the next year, you'll alternate days where the enchanting tools are yours to use. In that time, you will both work to build the Clover business as best you can. You'll find and book your own clients, do your own work, and make your own money. After a year's time, Fred and I will sit down to look at the numbers. Whoever does the best business will get the tools. Couldn't be more fair."

"Why should I have to compete for my rightful inheritance?" Ainsley demanded.

"Because it's not yours yet." I actually hadn't planned on speaking, but sometimes poor social skills means blurting out the things you didn't want to say as much as losing the chance to say the ones you did. Still, I'd stepped in it, so it seemed the best course of action was to press on. "Your father's will left you both equal claim to these tools. Maybe he did want you to have them; everyone seems to agree you're the better enchanter. But maybe he wanted you to earn them, rather than just be given them. This way, neither of you ever has to wonder if Herbram chose the right person to carry on the legacy. The winner will be the one who proves themselves most worthy."

My eyes may have flicked to Zane at that, and I caught sight of a small grin on the corner of his lips. To my surprise, Ainsley actually seemed to calm down as well. Maybe she and Zane weren't so different, after all; they both wanted the chance to show that they were the rightful heir.

"Now, obviously, there is always the chance that in the coming year you might need to work together on something," Asha said, bringing us back to the technical arrangements she and I had planned out. "The Clover name is a prestigious one, and Zane might find a client who needs an enchantment that even Herbram would have struggled with. In those cases, rather than doing a slipshod job or turning the client down altogether, there is a provision allowing him to work with Ainsley. You both get equal credit for the job, and the payment is split evenly into both your ledgers. Much as we want to see who the best is, I think we can all agree that preserving the Clover reputation is equally important."

Zane and Ainsley both nodded, almost in unison. It was possibly the first thing I'd seen them agree on since arriving at the mansion. Asha was visibly relieved; getting this far along meant that they weren't dismissing the idea outright. Truth be told, we didn't have a Plan B if this failed, aside from waiting for one of them to crack. For their sakes, I hoped they went along with our idea. It seemed a good bet that either one actually winning sole ownership of the tools would drive a wedge between them that would not be easily broken. And nothing, not even a generations-long legacy, was worth losing their family over.

"There is one more provision to discuss." Asha turned a page in her own packet, a signal for them to do the same, which neither twin picked up on.

“Should the year end and you decide that more time is needed, perhaps because there are joint projects to finish or business to wrap up, you can elect to not call us back for the review. In which case, the agreement rolls over for another year. However, and I cannot stress this enough, should that happen, then the rules change slightly.”

Zane and Ainsley leaned in closer, as did Bubba and Amy for some reason. I guess after being cooped up for so long, even contract discussion was exciting for them to watch.

“The first year is an impartial timeframe. You both start from the same place and get the same amount of time to work in,” Asha explained. “After that, it’s a little different. One of you could backend your business, destroy in the second year, and then call us in to review what looks like a successful business when it is really an emptied out pipeline. So, in the interest of fairness, if you collectively choose not to call us in at the end of the first year, the contract stays in effect until you both agree to have us make the determination. Neither of you gets to pull a fast one on the other. Any objections?”

“My sister and I sometimes have . . . issues . . . seeing eye-to-eye,” Zane said. “It might take a while before we can agree on a year when we both feel like we’ve got a shot at winning.”

Which, in truth, was exactly what Asha and I were counting on. These two were skillful in their own right, but neither would be as strong alone as they were together. If they could never agree on a year to bring us back, then they’d be stuck with each other, building the family business bigger and more respected than it ever was before. And, more importantly, neither had to lose or resent the other over their father’s legacy.

“Then just have us come in at the end of the first year,” Asha replied, keeping a far better poker face than I would have managed. “We added that stipulation for your benefit, not ours, in case you decide one year isn’t long enough. Either of you can call us to make the determination at the end of that first year. Of course, since this is a competition, I’d have to advise you to keep your books secret from one another. But honestly, they’re your records, do what you want with them.”

“About that . . .” Ainsley’s voice had cooled; quick as she was to anger, she was just as fast at letting it go—at least when not being continually provoked. “Zane and I aren’t really the best record keepers, and this seems like it requires a lot of that.”

“I’d recommend you both hire personal assistants, then,” Asha suggested. “You’ve got the cash for it, and I’m sure there are countless younger mages that would jump at the chance to work for the Clover family. Just to ensure accuracy though, Fred has agreed to do a quarterly review of both sets of books. For a fair rate, of course.”

Neither had an immediate argument for that; I was about as independent a party as they were going to get. Instead, they looked at each other across the table, for what might very well have been the first time they'd made eye contact since their initial fight.

"I'm okay with this if you are," Zane said, breaking the silence first. "We both get a fair shot at Dad's tools, and it's not the best enchanter or schmoozer that wins. It's whoever does the best business."

"My quality versus your quantity." Ainsley actually smiled as she spoke, nodding her head just a bit. "At least we can put the argument to bed. And I want you to know that, when I win, there will still be a place for you in the company. Those valets need supervising."

"I was about to say the same to you, though I was going to let you know that your new office will be in the corner of the basement," Zane teased back.

Just like that, the tension that had been filling the mansion since that red bubble first appeared began to dissipate. Asha pulled out several pens and slid them down to where the twins were sitting.

"Let's get you to sign those documents, and when you're happy with that, we can have you autograph Herbram's will and get the hell out of here."

"Sounds good to me," Zane agreed, reaching for a pen. "And, Ainsley, I'm sorry. Not just about this fight, but about all the partying lately. It's just that the mansion feels kind of . . . empty since Dad passed. I guess I was trying to avoid that as much as possible."

"I know," Ainsley said, picking up her own pen as well. "I always knew that was why you were doing it, but instead of leaving my workshop, I just shut the doors tighter. That's where he and I used to do most of our work, and if I got deep enough in a project, I could sort of forget that he was gone for a little while. But I should have come out to check on how you were doing, instead of leaving you alone. So, I'm sorry, too."

The loud pop that filled the air rattled the table, along with everything else in the room that was not bolted down. Right on the heels of the burst was the screech of music that I'd managed to forget was playing, along with the chatter of hundreds of people out on the lawn, moving about like nothing had happened. Which, for them, it hadn't.

We all stared at each other, momentarily shocked by the sudden change. All save for Amy, whose now glowing orange eyes merely swept the room before she gave a half-hearted shrug.

"Guess you just needed to apologize, after all."

8.

To my incredible relief, no longer being trapped inside a pocket dimension didn't dampen Ainsley and Zane's enthusiasm for the agreement. Asha and I walked them through the contracts, while Bubba and Amy helped the rest of the guards shut down the party. This was done half because we wanted less noise while working, and half because he and Amy had done a lot of cooking and alchemy experiments downstairs, which meant that the longer people were down there, the greater the chance of them noticing the sudden changes. Thankfully, the fight had come after the party was in full swing, which meant most of the guests were too liquored up to notice anything more than a few inches in front of them. Cars were pulled up, drivers taken off break, and one by one, the wealthy and well-dressed guests were hustled off the Clover property.

Meanwhile, we spent an hour and a half walking the twins through every page before they signed, making certain they understood what they were agreeing to. Anyone could see their eyes glaze over after the first fifteen minutes, but Asha and I were professionals, and as such, we were accustomed to that, just as we knew it didn't change our duty to explain it all anyway. Better bored for an hour than feeling swindled for a lifetime.

Finally, the guests were gone and the last signatures on our contracts were drying. Each got an equal share of the estate—which had been a much easier task after we'd pulled the tools out of the equation—and now, there was only one document left to sign, but it was by far the most important.

Herbram's will was as thick and largely illegible as ever. Asha set it down at the far end of the table, forcing both Zane and Ainsley to walk over to it. I'll confess that, up to this point, I'd been worried that there was some other aspect to signing that we weren't privy to. A magical quill, ink from their own blood, really anything along those lines. As it turned out, a cheap plastic pen and regular ink did the job, as each of the twins leaned over and scratched their signatures onto the bottom of the page. Unimpressive as the signing was, what came next was a sight to behold.

Just as Zane finished scrawling out his name, the pages began to glow a faint red, not unlike the bubble that had held us prisoner for so long. They began to twitch before he'd even fully backed away, quickly escalating to a full flutter, like the wind was rustling only the pages and nothing else in the room. The movements grew more and more violent, until the pages flew up from the table, swirling around the room in an intangible tornado. They danced all around us, always coming close but never quite making contact, before they began to head back to the end of the table. Rather than landing in a pile, however, each page seemed to fold as it drew closer, pressing into the others that had already taken shapes of their own. In less than a minute, they'd all landed, folding and connecting to form a large red box. Slowly, the glow began to fade, and I could see that the object was no longer made of paper. No, now it was a smooth metal covered in rapidly fading runes, zero seams or signs that it had ever been formed from dozens of separate pages.

Ainsley and Zane both reached forward, touching the front of the box. The moment they made contact, a door formed, swinging open to reveal several gems, a pile of scrolls, and one black bag with a single silver buckle in the center. Stylized on the front of the buckle's shiny surface was an ornate "C." The Clover family enchanting tools had finally been recovered, it seemed.

"Smaller than I expected," Asha said, tilting her head to get a good view into the box.

"Trust me, there's more to it than meets the eye." Ainsley reached forward and tenderly picked up the bag, cradling it like one would an infant. "The bag alone is enchanted with the work of countless ancestors, and it's easily the least magical part of the set." Slowly, she extended her arms, holding out the black bag to her brother. "It's past midnight, so today is the fourteenth. You get the tools on even days. Part of the contract."

"I guess it was." Zane accepted the handoff, though he was visibly uncomfortable pulling them from his sister's hands. For several long seconds, there was silence as he held the prize they'd dragged us through time and space to claim for themselves. "You know, we're pretty backed up on orders that came in before Dad died. Maybe we should work together to clear those out before the competition officially begins. Keep the clients happy and give ourselves an even start."

"Is that allowed?" Ainsley looked at Asha, who managed little more than a shrug.

"Your business. Run it how you want. We just get called in to check the results."

"Then I think that's a good idea," Ainsley told Zane. He offered her back the bag, which she accepted. "Let's go move everything somewhere safe, first."

Zane nodded, reaching into the box that was once a will and scooping up the remainder of the contents. The two of them left the study then, discussing which project to start with, not that I really understood the minutia of what they were talking about. Numbers, I got. Magic was a whole other animal.

As the sound of their voices faded up the stairs, Asha and I looked at each other as we finally gave in to the sense of relief. The job was done, we were out of the pocket dimension, and we'd managed to make both our clients happy. Plus, we were going to be able to bill for several days of working hours at an overtime rate, which always made a hard job more palatable.

“Are you thinking what I’m thinking?” Asha asked.

“Get out of here as quickly as possible, before they get into another fight and we’re stuck in the bubble again?” I ventured.

“Damn, I was going to say a stiff glass of scotch, but that idea makes a lot more sense. Let’s pack it up.” Asha headed back over to the table, unplugging her laptop and stuffing the copies of the contracts into her bag. “You did good work, by the way, Fred. I’ll keep you in mind if I ever need an accounting consult again.”

“In this town, there aren’t many other options,” I warned her. “But I’d still appreciate the call. Hopefully, I’ll be able to take whatever you throw my way. Though, to be honest, my schedule is uncomfortably full these days.”

“Lot of demand and very little supply. Part of why I made the jump over to parahuman work,” Asha said. “But you know how business works, if you’re in that high of demand, just increase your rates. The smaller clients will fall away and you’ll be able to get more for your time.”

“I guess.” Asha was right, that was how any introductory business class would advise me to handle being so overworked. Then again, those classes hadn’t gotten to meet and interact with all the parahumans I’d helped. Most of them didn’t have money like the Clovers or Richard. They were just working-class people trying to get by, and I was able to help them do that. I wasn’t cheap, by any means, but I also didn’t price myself out of affordability. If I upped my rates significantly, I’d have more money and free time. All it would mean was turning my back on the less-wealthy parahumans.

“I remember that look.” Asha’s voice pulled me out of the reverie I didn’t know I’d fallen into. She was staring at me, an unexpected expression of concern on her face. “You used to get that way when word came down from the Torvalds to drop a client so we could move resources to someone more profitable. I think that’s why I remembered you even after you quit. A whole department of accountants, and you were one of the few who saw the clients as more than numbers.”

“More of us do than you’d think,” I told her. “Torvald & Torvald just had a knack for recruiting the more ruthless among my profession.”

“Sort of missed the mark with you, didn’t they?”

“Well, I’m not ruthless, but my accuracy rates certainly looked like I was trying to shame everyone.” I tucked away my laptop and the few papers needed to log the hours I’d put in. “And if I can, I’d rather expand the client-base than shrink it. That’s also good business sense.”

“Good luck with that.” Asha zipped up her bag and threw it over her shoulder. “I’ll keep an ear to the ground, just in case I run across a therian looking to do an internship.”

“With my luck, they’ll think my company is a front for something more impressive and get bored as soon as they realize it really is just accounting.” We headed out of the study and began walking down the stairs. Asha and I were in the foyer when I heard Zane calling our names.

We turned to see him rushing over with a bottle in each hand. “Glad I caught you two. Ainsley and I wanted to say thank you for all your help. And, obviously, apologize for the inconvenience. We’ll process your bills as soon as they come, but for now, this is a token of our gratitude.”

He held out each bottle, one of scotch for Asha and a merlot for me. I didn’t even remotely recognize the label or brand, but from the way Asha’s eyes went wide, I had a feeling she knew what hers was, and my wine was probably just as rare and valuable.

“This is a bit much as a thank you,” Asha protested.

“Agreed, the rates cover our work,” I added.

“Sorry, I think you’ll find these bonuses non-negotiable.” Zane held up his hands and backed away, cutting off all attempts to return the bottles. “You two went above and beyond what anyone could ask of you. Here in the Clover family, we believe in saying thanks for that kind of dedication. And if either of you ever need any enchanting done, I think we can manage a sharp discount. Friends and family price, if you will.”

Asha merely nodded, but I responded. “Thank you very much. I may take you up on that one day.” Having glimpsed the tip of what magic could do, I wasn’t going to turn down such an offer out of hand. One never knew what sort of needs might arise in the future.

“I hope you do, because I really mean it.” Zane snapped his fingers and pointed at me, nearly causing me to drop the bottle of probably priceless wine. “Speaking of, Fred, are you associated with the House of Turva? I checked over the pending orders, and we’ve got a large request for sunlight-proof glass from them. I don’t want to haggle too hard if they’re your people.”

“N-no,” I stammered out, trying to keep my cool as best as possible. “No relation. They’re new in town, from what I hear.”

“Guess they’re planning on staying awhile; they’ve ordered enough glass to retrofit a whole building. But if they’re not your clan, then they’ll be paying full price for it.” Zane wandered off, seemingly unaware of the sudden cloud of worry that had formed over my head. Perhaps it was because, as a vampire, the blood didn’t rush from my face in times of terror.

“You okay?” Asha asked as we began exiting once again, now with bottles in hand. “You seemed to go pretty stiff when he mentioned the other vampires.”

“I’ll be all right,” I said, probably with more hope than I felt. It had been so long since the Turvas came up that I'd managed to forget about them, but one mention from Zane brought it all rushing back. What's worse, they were apparently setting up shop, so the moving-in process was going smoothly.

"Let me know if you need a lawyer," Asha offered. "But maybe wait a few days first. After this, I'm taking a long weekend."

"Not a bad idea," I agreed. We parted at the door, she heading to her sedan and me to the truck where Bubba and Amy were already waiting.

I climbed in and rested my head against the window, watching the moon sink slowly from the sky. How long had it been stuck there, while we scrambled about inside the mansion to try and broker a peace between two siblings? I could feel the familiar fuzziness at the edge of my thoughts that came when I'd stayed awake for too long. Maybe Asha was on the right track. I couldn't afford to take a whole vacation, but this time when the sun rose, perhaps I'd let sleep claim me. One day of solid, uninterrupted rest.

It wasn't much of a splurge, but by God, I'd earned it.

A Lawyer in the Manor

1.

“They want a meeting.”

Those words had hung heavy in my mind since Richard uttered them, not three seconds into a phone call with me. While details had followed, I’d barely listened, as such words weren’t truly necessary. There was only one “they” who would seek a meeting with me through Richard, only one group that would put such gravity in his voice. The House of Turva, Winslow’s newest vampire clan, was finally beginning to move. What that meant for me was anyone’s guess, as they’d done little interacting beyond the basics of making peace. My only way to find out if they were friend, foe, or apathetic neighbor was to take the meeting.

Of course, that didn’t mean I had to be stupid about how I did it. My car eased into the parking lot in front of Charlotte Manor, a new night’s stars twinkling overhead. A massive Jeep that looked like it had been driven over straight from war was already parked nearby, and was obviously Richard’s ride. I couldn’t begrudge him the extra room; there was no sedan on the market that had the space to comfortably contain a man of his size. Pausing to lock my doors and double check that I had, in fact, remembered my briefcase, I headed up the front steps, where Charlotte was already waiting for me.

I realize that this can be a bit confusing, so allow me a moment to clarify the difference between Charlotte and Charlotte Manor. Charlotte Manor is the proper, given name of the structure that served as half B&B, half rented-out home to a pair of agents. Charlotte, on the other hand, was the house’s personality, its physical representation that usually took the form of a young woman who favored dresses so large and complex it was rare to see them outside of a period play. Neil had once said it best: Charlotte was the house’s avatar, the way it interacted with us.

That was who was waiting for me as I stepped onto the porch. She offered me a glass of wine—materializing food and drink was one of her less spectacular but more useful abilities—which I had to refuse.

“Working tonight,” I informed her. “Wouldn’t be appropriate.”

“Really? Because the big guy inside has already downed five glasses of ale. And my mugs are well above normal pint size.” There was a touch of pride in Charlotte’s voice; she took great satisfaction in her hospitality skills.

“Richard isn’t the one who needs to worry.”

“You wouldn’t know that from the way he’s pacing about,” Charlotte replied. “When are the other guests arriving?”

I headed for the door, and she followed along beside me, matching my steps perfectly. “Soon. We set it for two hours after sunset, but there’s no guarantee they won’t be early. Richard briefed you on what to do?”

“He’s been here for hours; he won’t shut up about it.” Charlotte made a small gesture with her hand and the front door opened to reveal another, identical Charlotte waiting patiently. “I’m supposed to look like the little old lady and wait staff, do nothing to draw attention, and keep up the normal appearances. Unless they try anything.”

This was why I’d chosen Charlotte Manor as the meeting spot between myself and the Turva clan. If things took a turn for the aggressive, Charlotte could easily keep them captive long enough for me to escape. She was technically built to keep people out more than in, so holding a pair of vampires indefinitely would be a tall order even for her, but she could buy me time. That would be enough.

“Yes, but wait for my signal,” I reminded her. “Let’s not make a move unless it’s necessary.”

Whatever Charlotte would have said next was drowned out by the stampeding footsteps of Richard Alderson barreling down the front hall. No matter how times I met the man, it was impossible not to be taken aback by his size. He was enormous, tall enough to make NBA players feel threatened, and his wide body was completely packed with muscle. Add in the shaggy blond hair and teeth that were just a little too white and sharp, and I considered it one of my greatest personal accomplishments not to have collapsed in fear the first time we met. Then again, he’d been in leader mode then, which was far more outwardly intimidating than the man behind the curtain.

“Fred, I’m sorry. I tried to stall this for as long as I could.”

The apology didn’t surprise me; Richard had been giving them ever since he dropped the bomb that a meeting was formally requested. Evidently, he’d kept a lot of people between himself and the new vampires, ducking them at every chance for a lot of reasons. However, the thing about parahumans is that, while they might have little respect for the rules of humanity, they would, at least publicly, adhere to the letter of their own laws and treaties. A formal request sent through the proper channels was impossible to ignore without causing trouble, even for someone of Richard’s status.

“I’ve told you, it’s fine. If they wanted to talk with me, it was going to happen sooner or later. At least this way, we control the terms,” I assured him. “Maybe they just want me to go over their books.”

“Seems like the sort of thing an e-mail could convey. You’re never shy about handing out those business cards.” This voice belonged to neither me, Richard, nor Charlotte. Instead, it came from the blonde woman currently descending the stairs. For a moment, I almost didn’t recognize my own girlfriend.

Krystal's usually free-flowing hair was pulled tight into a ponytail, a set of ill-fitting glasses perched on the bridge of her nose and an oversized sweatshirt swallowing up her torso. While her jeans were the same as usual, she'd traded her standard boots for a set of sensible sneakers. There was also something off about her face, though I had to really stare to realize that, while she seemed to be wearing less makeup than usual, she was actually wearing more. She'd used it to contour her features and somehow appear less striking than normal. All of this was enhanced by the way she moved, meticulously, with a slight slouch in her spine and her head always tilted a touch downward. Normal Krystal barreled through a room like a panther with the excitement of a Labrador. This version inched along as though she wasn't even sure she wanted to be there.

"That's a . . . new look." I racked my mind for something positive to say. It was obvious she was trying to dull herself down, but not even I was so inexperienced at love that I would say such a thing without prompting. There's being willing to meet with potentially aggressive vampires, and then there's just plain suicidal.

"You like? I saw the latest fashions from Milan and just had to get my hands on it." She stuck her tongue out and made a sound not unlike someone passing gas, and, for a moment, I could see the real Krystal shining through, clothes and makeup be damned. "There's no way I'm letting you take this meeting without me nearby, but I didn't want to raise too much suspicion."

"Do you think they'd assume you were an agent just from your normal style of dress?" I asked.

"Doubtful, but the more I blend into the background, the better," she replied. "And plus, if it comes out that I'm your lady, no one will bat an eye."

"You think they would normally?" I looked to Richard and Charlotte, both of whom had suddenly found things on the wall and ceiling to stare at with unwavering interest.

Krystal released her false walk, bounding the rest of the way down the stairs and over to me. "Freddy, I love you dearly, you know that. But the people who don't know you as well as we do might think you come off a little . . . dull. I just thought this version of me might be easier to swallow for those who make the wrong assumptions about you."

"Well then, I have to say you've failed." Before she could reply, I leaned forward and kissed her, a very rare show of public affection spurred on by a combination of gratitude and fear. "You're still much too lovely for the likes of me. I'm afraid there is just no amount of makeup or frumpy clothing that will ever conceal how beautiful you are."

It was one of the precious few times in our relationship that I'd managed to be the one to take her by surprise, and I savored the slight blush in her cheeks as she hurriedly recovered.

“After a line like that, I’m damn sure not letting you get killed,” Krystal said at last. “Richard, tell me you’ve got a plan.”

Having finished staring at the wall, Richard swung back around and led us to the dining room. “The Turvas contacted me, saying they wanted to discuss business with Fred. I told them to call him themselves, he’s not hard to find, and they countered by saying it was business outside the normal spectrum and that they’d greatly appreciate an introduction. A gesture of friendship, they called it.”

The nerves faded from Richard’s voice, replaced by something far heavier. The man had an entire clan that depended on him, and he took that job seriously. While many would have seen it as a license to do as they pleased, Richard understood it was a duty, a burden, one he had to be strong enough to bear.

“Present company excluded, vampires can be a real pain in the ass to deal with. Their treaties give them a lot of freedom when it comes to hunting, as long they don’t kill their victims, and since therians in human form are allegedly hard to distinguish from regular mortals, it’s hard to go after them for taking blood from my people. So far, the Turvas have been playing very nice, keeping a wide berth from any parahumans and being discreet in their feeding. If I can, I’d prefer to have them keep that up. Violence would come with costs to both our sides, ones I don’t want to pay.”

“Again, Richard, it’s fine. You couldn’t very well refuse such a simple request without reason,” I reminded him. “And it might be all around better that you didn’t. That could have betrayed that we’re friends. As far as the Turvas know, I’m just someone you hired to save you money on your taxes. The more mundanely they see me, the less reason they have to show fear or be interested.”

“Still doesn’t sit right in my gut.” Richard opened the door to the dining room, where Charlotte was already waiting. She was surrounded by waiters—all of them also her, just in another form—that were holding serving dishes waiting to be opened. The table was currently cleared off, except for two pairs of place settings on opposite sides.

“As requested, a fine meal is waiting to be served at your leisure,” Charlotte informed us.

“Wait, what?” This wasn’t part of the plan; it was supposed to be a quick meeting. I certainly didn’t want to spend a whole dinner with these people.

“My idea, Freddy,” Krystal said, walking calmly over to one of the place settings. “Give me your briefcase.”

I complied, and she set the case down in a chair before one of the settings. Wordlessly, she picked up the utensils and handed them to a waiter, where they vanished into thin air. Reaching into a compartment on her sweatshirt, Krystal pulled out identical utensils, setting them down carefully in the same spots the original ones had been.

“A little bit of insurance, just in case,” she explained. “Having dinner justifies the place settings, and no vampire is afraid of a butter knife. But you aren’t going to be eating with the same tools as everyone else, Freddy. You’re going to have silver utensils. Specially made too, just like agent-issue tools, so that they won’t be easily detectable by scent.”

It was an odd kind of brilliant; silver was the ultimate double-edged sword in the parahuman world. The material hurt almost all of us, which made it both effective to use and dangerous to handle. As a result, very few parahumans messed with the stuff, and certainly none would think to suspect that a vampire’s utensils were made of it. Silver immunity was nigh unheard of among the undead.

“When, exactly, did you have silver duplicates of Charlotte’s utensils made?” Richard asked, bringing up an excellent point that I was a little ashamed about not noticing.

Krystal shrugged, barely visible through her oversized shirt. “Around the same time I moved in. Always pays to be prepared. I told her I was doing it, though she’s the one who gave me the molds.”

“Just be sure to pick those up when this is done.” Charlotte had moved several feet away from the table. As a being composed almost entirely of magic, silver was more painful for her than most parahumans. It meant a lot to me that she was tolerating it on her table.

“Agent’s honor,” Krystal promised. “And Freddy, I know I don’t really need to tell you this, but these are for defensive purposes only. Try to resist the urge to pretend you’re an action hero.”

“Somehow, I think I’ll find the self-control.” I hadn’t realized how on edge I was until I heard the squeal of tires from the parking lot. Evidently, I’d let my usual shutting out of the vampire senses lapse, because that noise was far too quiet to be heard with human ears. Still, I did appreciate the warning.

“Looks like our guests have arrived,” I told them. “Everybody into position.”

2.

I wasn't surprised to see Lillian as one of the vampires who'd come out to meet me, though I was taken a bit back by her choice of wearing a pantsuit, as I'd assumed the last time she'd worn one was solely out of deference to their meeting with therians. She hadn't really seemed like the type to embrace professional attire as habit, but I suppose I, of anyone, should have known better than to judge a book by its cover.

The man with her wore a lovely pinstriped number that I knew on sight had been hand-tailored. He was also one of the oldest-looking vampires I'd encountered, which, admittedly, was a sample size of three before him. A few wrinkles hung around his eyes, and his dark hair had gone silver in streaks along the side. His face was handsome, but approachable, the sort you'd find as a department head or neighbor that ran the HOA.

"Mr. Alderson, thank you for making the time to meet with us." He bowed to Richard, not very deeply, but enough to show respect. For his part, Richard had his game face on, which consisted of being stiff, detached, and more than a bit terrifying. Unless these two had been drinking some incredibly potent blood, Richard could probably take them apart by himself. Unfortunately, that would also cause quite the incident between vampires and therians, which is why he was around more for show and friendship than backup.

"And you must be Mr. Fletcher." The man turned to me, giving another bow. I rose from my seat and stuck out a hand. Bowing might be the way vampires did it, but accountants were taught the art of the handshake to show our respect.

"Yes, sir, Fredrick Fletcher of Fletcher Accounting Services."

He looked at my hand for a few moments before taking it and offering a firm shake. "I am Petre, of the House of Turva." The shake continued; he was waiting for something, though I had no idea what. It might have gone on forever if Lillian hadn't stepped forward.

"Fredrick, it is common courtesy to announce the name of your clan in meetings such as this."

"It is?" This time, I did bow, a little. I'd made the mistake, so it seemed like meeting him halfway on tradition was a good form of apology. "I'm terribly sorry. I don't have a clan, as far as I know."

"Your clan is your sire's clan, unless you've been cast out," Petre told me.

"My sire never taught me anything about that. He turned me and left me on my own. The only other time I saw him was when he beat me senseless and threatened to kill me." Both Petre and Lillian seemed to shrink back at that news, the former finally allowing our handshake to come to an end.

“Then it is I who am sorry,” Petre said, quickly recovering himself. “The bond between a sire and their child is meant to be a sacred one. For you to have survived on your own, learning the way of the night without an instructor, is no small feat.”

“Well, movies helped a lot.” I appreciated the praise, but I really didn’t want them thinking more of me than was strictly necessary. “I knew to avoid silver and sunlight right off the bat, and since I didn’t plan on driving any stakes through my heart, that was already off the table.”

Petre regarded me with a long stare. There was a lot going on in those cool, pale blue eyes, most of which I was probably happier not knowing. “I suppose that is one benefit to our culture being absorbed and spread throughout the humans’ consciousness.”

“It’s nice to see you again, Fredrick,” Lillian butted in, offering a much needed respite from the intensity of Petre’s gaze. “And you’re not even hooked to a taxi this time. Makes you look more composed.”

“I appreciate your help that night,” I replied, choosing my words carefully. Anything that signified a debt between us could be dangerous, especially if this turned to negotiations. “You look well, yourself.”

“It’s only proper.” Lillian smiled like she knew something I didn’t, which was completely unnecessary. We were all keenly aware that she and Petre had things hidden up their sleeves, just as they no doubt assumed I had a few tricks, as well.

“If you’re done with introductions, can we get this moving? I have other tasks to see to tonight.” Richard’s voice was edging on an animal’s growl, his inner lion poking through. Rough as his tone was, I was glad for it, since it helped to keep things speeding along.

We all took our seats at the table as the kitchen door opened and a waiter breezed in, carrying a tray of crab cakes. Petre and Lillian both looked momentarily distressed by the appearance of staff, so I spat my words out as quickly as I could.

“It’s fine, this whole place is parahuman friendly,” I told them. “There’s a presence in the house, so everyone here is already in on the secret. We can speak freely.”

“What an intriguing establishment.” Petre watched the waiters closely, but Charlotte was doubling down on her avatar. Every step they made squeaked, each motion was clumsy enough to be human, and she was even replicating the sound of blood pumping through a heart. Unless either of the vampires tried to take a bite, they’d have no idea their waiter wasn’t real. “How ever did you find such a place?”

“I was called in to help settle some ownership issues and account discrepancies. Things went well, so they put my services on retainer.” Now that the conversation was finally steering toward business, I jumped on the opportunity to pop open my briefcase and pull out two identical sheets of paper.

“Since Richard called me here for a meeting, I took the liberty of putting together some information about exactly which services I offer, and the general estimations of hours needed for each task. As you’ll note, I have different projections for digital records versus physical ones, since that adds a lot of time, but the hourly rate stays consistent throughout.”

Petre and Lillian both examined their documents, looking them over dutifully despite the fact that I doubted either of them had needed such services in a very long time. As I’ve said before, parahumans are not the best at record-keeping in any capacity. Finally, Petre lowered his back to the table.

“You have quite the list of services, Mr. Fletcher. It’s not often one sees a member of our species take on such . . . thankless tasks. Those who are turned tend to lean toward grander spectacles, using their new abilities to reach heights unattainable by mortality.”

“I like to think I did the same. After all, becoming a vampire was what gave me the push to start my own company.” My smile was placid, as though I hadn’t even noticed that he’d tried to tactfully call me boring. If Petre thought I was going to take offense to something like that, he clearly hadn’t done much homework.

“Indeed.” His fingers ran along the edge of the page, crinkling it ever so slightly as it rested on the wooden surface of the table. “May I ask why you wished to share this with us? Perhaps you were looking for insight on what options need to be added?”

“A generous offer, but I’ve got it well in hand. I was showing you the price list because I have a policy of being upfront on cost with all potential clients. You called the meeting, so there’s obviously something you’re looking to book an accountant for, but it’s important to me that you have a fair sense of the price going in. All part of running an upstanding business.”

While that truly was my philosophy when meeting new clients, the odds of that being applicable here were slim. I’d decided that my best bet for making it through this encounter was to play it dumb. As an abandoned vampire with no clan and minimal knowledge of vampire society, it took very little acting to pull off. My hope was that if I could convince them I was a non-threat, that I was just an undead guy who was good with numbers, they’d see there was nothing to gain from dealing with me. Except maybe a reliable person to call during tax season.

“The honesty is appreciated,” Petre replied. “However, we did not call this meeting to request your accounting services. Rather, I requested it to get to know you on a more informal level. There are very few vampires in the area; Quinn, the traitor, made it quite inhospitable for any that tried to make a home here. I was surprised to learn that he'd tolerated the presence of another. Tell me, was he kept at bay by the need for your services?"

"No." The word came out with an edge I was only mildly aware of, prickling my tongue as it fell away. "No, it's safe to say Quinn did anything but leave me alone. But I already told you that my sire abandoned me."

Now that got a reaction. Petre's lip twitched for the barest of moments, a snarl he forcibly kept from forming. "I wish I could say I was surprised that even he would do such a thing, but the truth is that among Quinn's crimes, such an action is hardly notable. It is still awful, though, and I'm sorry you had to endure it. Trust me when I say there is no love lost between the House of Turva and Quinn, the traitor."

"Nor do I hold any affection for my sire." That part required no fudging whatsoever. Quinn had tried to kill me, along with my friends. I never considered myself a hateful person, but I wished all the ill the world could muster on the man who turned me.

"Quinn is a real dick," Lillian chimed in. "And I don't think anyone is sad that he's gone into hiding. But tell us, Fredrick, how did you survive? You mentioned he threatened to kill you, and Quinn had a reputation for making good on such promises."

"I was lucky," I told her, no shame in my voice at the admittance. "Before he could get to me, Quinn picked a fight with someone else. An agent. That went about the way you'd expect it to, and as far as I know, he's been running ever since."

Petre made a noise halfway between a harrumph and snort. "Agents. They do have their uses, I suppose. Quinn was always more ambitious than smart. I can't say I'm shocked that his brashness finally caught up with him."

I couldn't think of anything to say that would close the topic without inviting further questions, so instead, I picked up my silver fork and scooped out a piece of the crab cake cooling before me. Like everything Charlotte made, it was scrumptious. It took me three more bites before I noticed that Lillian and Petre were watching me eat.

"Did you need a lemon sauce?" I asked.

"We do not partake in the food of humans." Petre didn't even try to mask the disdain in his voice. Lillian nodded in agreement, though I noticed her eyes lingering on the crab cake in front of her. "Blood is the only delicacy a vampire need taste. It is the perfect, the ultimate, the unequivocal joy. Everything else is but ash in the mouth by comparison."

Carefully considering his point, I waited a few moments more, then took another bite. Nope, definitely not ash. "Blood is quite delicious, but I've yet to lose my taste for the more familiar dishes of life. Maybe it's something that comes with time."

Petre kept looking at me as I scooped up another few morsels before finally responding. "Perhaps so. It is not entirely your fault for not knowing such truths, either. As an Abandoned, there was no one to teach you the proper ways of our kind."

"All things considered, I think I got off lucky being abandoned, if my other option was being taught by Quinn," I pointed out.

"Did you really call this damn meeting just for small talk?" Richard, who had been busying himself tucking away his own crab cake with enormous bites, dropped his fork to the empty plate below with a loud clatter. "I've got better things to do than listen to the vampires in town get to know some guy who does my taxes. Petre, if you pulled me into a useless meeting as an attempted show of power, I should warn you now that I won't take it well."

The whole room seemed to grow still at Richard's words. What he'd said was no idle threat. Power and authority were so important they verged on holy in the parahuman world, even more so with therians. A man in Richard's position couldn't afford to let himself be made an errand boy by some new vampires in town. Asking for a favor was one thing. Asking for a pointless favor to show they could make him do it was something different altogether. Depending on Petre's answer, they might soon have much more serious matters to deal with than some lowly accountant in their town.

"Our apologies, Mr. Alderson," Lillian said at last. Her subdued tone was a pleasant contrast to Petre's haughty nature; it was no wonder he kept her around. "Petre merely wished to get to know Fredrick before broaching our true business. Such is the traditional method to show respect and build a relationship. By all means, please feel free to leave if you like. We will certainly take no offense. Your gesture has been fulfilled merely by making the introduction."

Fear boiled in my stomach, tossing the crab cake to-and-fro. I knew Richard wouldn't want to leave me, but what if he couldn't think of a way to stay nearby without betraying that he saw me as more than a contracted employee? Giving away our friendship meant handing these people a bit of information, and I already knew that the less we gave them, the better.

"Much as I would like to, the fact remains that you asked me to make this meeting happen," Richard replied. "The accountant was barely ever in my service, but I did have to use him. It wouldn't look very well if I introduced you to one of my employees and then you went off and killed him. I have a reputation to uphold."

A bit hurtful, but it was hard to argue with the route Richard had taken. Making it about him and his reputation gave him adequate cause to stay nearby as a witness, without letting on that we were friends. If anything, Richard sounded like he detested me, which, I suppose, did fit the usual vampire-therian dynamic. Dealing with Petre and Lillian, I was beginning to think that perhaps I really had gotten a blessing in disguise by not knowing my sire for long. It had allowed me to shape my own relationships with other parahumans, rather than having them dictated to me.

“Very well, then. In respect to Mr. Alderson, we will move past the customary small talk, assuming that is all right with you, Mr. Fletcher,” Petre said. I nodded my agreement, and he immediately continued.

“I called this meeting because I wished to know more about the vampire who survived in the same town that Quinn, the traitor, oversaw. The House of Turva needed to assess if you managed such a feat by wit or might. Now, I see that you had no hand in it. You were simply one of Quinn’s experiments. What he intended for you, we may never know, but it seems you’ve made something of your life regardless. Since I do not deem you to be a threat, my clan has authorized me to make a gesture of friendship.”

“That’s appreciated, but unnecessary,” I said, doing my best to head off this line of talk. One thing I’d learned from watching Richard, these sorts of gestures never came without strings. Whatever they offered, it would make me indebted to them, and that was the last place I wanted to be.

“Mr. Fletcher, as an Abandoned, I understand you might not know this, but to refuse a gesture of friendship is akin to declaring us your enemy.” Petre didn’t make it sound like a threat, which was exactly what told me how serious it was. When people moved past the bluster, it meant they weren’t worried about your reaction. Things just were what they were.

“Oh? Then I do ask that you please forgive me. As you said, I have not been properly educated.” I’d been backed into a corner; my only hope was that it would be something small and easily repaid.

“It is to be expected from an Abandoned,” Petre replied. “As I was saying, the House of Turva wishes to make a gesture of friendship. After some inquiring, we heard that you were looking for a helper to swell the ranks of your growing company. Thus, it is my pleasure to present to you the newest employee of Fletcher Accounting Services.”

He gracefully opened his hand, gesturing to Lillian, who gave me a small wave paired with a wide smile.

“Looks like you’re my new boss, Fredrick.”

3.

“I don’t like her.” Krystal didn’t bother keeping her voice low; Charlotte could block the sound between walls so well that not even vampire ears managed to hear through them. My girlfriend was leaning back in her chair, arms crossed and a scowl etched into her face. “A little too nice, a little too charming. And what’s with that ‘Fredrick’ shit? Getting pretty familiar pretty fast, if you ask me.”

“Well, that is my actual name,” I tried to point out, but the glare I received shut me down quickly.

“Missing the point, Freddy.”

Dinner had wrapped up not long after Petre dropped the bomb named Lillian on me; he’d excused himself and drove off, leaving his fellow vampire behind. Under the pretense of handling some private business regarding his books, Richard and I had left Lillian in the dining room to have a quick consultation with Krystal. I’d hoped she could shed some insight on how to deal with the situation, but her ideas were . . . less than productive.

“I’m just saying, accidents happen all the time, and it’s not like Freddy doesn’t have a reputation for ending up in trouble. Maybe he goes on a call that runs a little long, and she gets stuck out in the sunlight while he barely survives.”

“I know you’re kidding, but just that joke made my blood pressure go up,” Richard told her. “Petre is the number two in that clan, and he showed up to personally deliver Lillian as a token of friendship. If anything happens to her that smells even remotely suspicious, I’m going to have a ton of trouble on my hands.”

“Think the Turva clan will get violent?” I asked.

“Worse. They’ll drag me through meeting after meeting in diplomatic hearings.” Richard shuddered, which made the chair he was seated on wobble violently. “I can handle a brawl or two, and my people vastly outnumber theirs. But when they invoke the treaties and pull me into that mind-numbing diplomatic bullshit, that’s the real torture.”

Krystal snorted, then looked up to the ceiling. “Charlotte, is she doing anything weird? Anything we could use as grounds for her being here under malicious intent?”

“She is sitting quietly at the dinner table, eating the cold crab cake left in front of her.” Charlotte appeared between me and the doorway, wearing her usual antique dress. While Krystal and Richard seemed disappointed by the news, I found it a bit intriguing. It seemed Lillian didn’t entirely agree with the Turvas' stance on blood being the only acceptable food for vampires to touch. Maybe there were other things they didn't see eye-to-eye on, as well.

"Charlotte, please book a room for Lillian," I instructed.

"Excuse me?" Krystal whipped her head around so fast that the fake glasses ended up cockeyed on her head.

"Like it or not, we're stuck with her for now," I explained. "Petre drove off in the car they came in, so I get the feeling she's not heading home anytime soon. I don't want to bring her to my apartment, so getting a room here is the best place to house her. Plus, if she does do anything suspicious, Charlotte will know about it and give us warning. We just have to make sure to tell Arch before he gets back from whatever assignment he's on; I doubt it would do well for her to realize she's bunking with agents."

"I can send a message to him," Krystal said. "And while I'm not crazy about sharing a house with that girl, I like it a lot better than having her try to crash with you. Not that I don't trust you, Freddy, but it would probably get awkward. This situation has "honeypot" written all over it."

Despite what you may expect, that term did not go over my head. I had taken in more than enough cinema about spies and subterfuge to know that a honeypot was when a covert operative attempted to seduce a target in order to gain information or trust. Unfortunately, knowing what Krystal meant just made it all the more awkward, as I considered that possibility for why Lillian was being handed to me as an assistant. It was a small mercy that vampires couldn't blush; I suspect I would have ended up on the receiving end of Krystal's wrath if my cheeks had suddenly gone red.

"Her plans are irrelevant. I intend to keep this relationship as detached and professional as I can manage." Krystal still looked a bit wary, though my words seemed to somewhat mollify her. "If anything, this might be a blessing in disguise. We all agree that she's most likely here as a spy, but knowing that means that we can control what she sees. After a week or so of working on accounts and doing filings, she'll realize that I truly am nothing more than an accountant, and can report her findings up the chain of command. I'll bore the House of Turva out of any interest in me."

Richard, Krystal, and Charlotte all exchanged a look. It was a brief one, but volumes seemed to pass between them in the span of that glance. After a moment, Richard rose from his chair to address me. "I'm not saying that's a bad idea, because it's not. But . . . come on, Fred. You have to know as well as we do that dealing with parahumans means a certain element of the unexpected. It wasn't even a couple of weeks ago you were trapped inside a pocket dimension with a pair of mages."

"Those . . . incidents, while unavoidable, happen few and far between," I replied. "How long do we really expect Lillian to hang in with me doing accounting work? A week, maybe two or three, at the most? Even if we do hit a chaotic incident, at most she'll see that the services come with a certain amount of risk, but that doesn't make me into a threat."

"No, but she might realize you're the vampire all those rumors are about." Krystal looked worried, which was all the stranger to see in her frumpy get-up. "They are still looking for that guy, too. The exploits got so exaggerated by the rumor mill that no one suspects it's you; however, if that vamp gets to see up close and personal what your job entails, she might put two and two together."

"So I stick to simple, easy accounts with minimal chance of things going nuts," I replied. "I think I've even still got some human clients I can check in on. This can work; we just have to bore her into submission."

"It's a better idea than refusing the offer and starting a feud with the House of Turva," Richard agreed. "Quinn really screwed you good, Fred. If you were actually part of a clan, they could intercede for you, keep others like the Turvas from just deciding that you were going to hire one of their people."

"From what I've seen, I actually think I prefer being on my own," I told him.

"Hey now, these people might be dicks, but there's something to be said for clans and tribes." Richard stood a little taller, which caused his sizable head to scrape against the bottom of the bedroom ceiling. "A lot of the ones who get turned lose their old lives, their old families, and end up alone in the world. Clans and tribes give them new people to turn to, and help in rebuilding their suddenly broken worlds. When done right, we're something of a surrogate family, and a lot of people need that."

"My apologies, Richard. I know how deeply you care for your people, and maybe if I'd been turned into a therian, things would be different. I just meant that, based on the vampires I've encountered, I think I'm a lot happier with how being abandoned turned out."

"And I think we can all agree that Fred has done an oddly good job at constructing his own makeshift family," Krystal added.

"Just to let you all know, Lillian has finished her food and is currently sitting at the table, looking bored," Charlotte reported. "Shall I bring her the next course?"

"No, we should probably head back to the table, anyway." I looked over at Richard, who'd ducked back down after bumping his head on the ceiling. "Will you be joining us?"

"Officially, I still need to make sure she isn't going to kill you," Richard replied. "Unofficially, if you think for one hot second I'm skipping out on Charlotte's cooking, you've got another thing coming."

I could hardly fault the man there, but as we headed for the door, I noticed we weren't alone. Krystal had fallen in behind us, only a few steps behind Richard, whose bulk blocked out the door frame.

“Um, Krystal? What are you doing?”

“Isn’t it obvious? Since the official meeting is over, the other tenant in Charlotte Manor is going to head down and get some food.” She adjusted her glasses and tugged on the oversized sweatshirt. “Besides, if Lillian is going to be crashing here, then she should probably meet your girlfriend sooner rather than later. If she asks, my place is being fumigated and that’s why I’m living in a B&B.”

“A supposedly haunted B&B,” I pointed out. “And dating a vampire. Crap. What sort of parahuman are we going to say you are?”

“My grandparents were a quarter Fey.” There was no hesitation in her explanation; clearly, Krystal had already thought this story through. “Still connected enough to the parahuman world that I’d have been raised around it, but my blood is so diluted that there’s no longer much sign of magic. While I’d like to claim I’m a full human who found out about the world by chance, it’s just too risky without knowing what she’s been feeding on. If it’s something that can perceive magic, then I’m sure to trip her senses, so putting in a little Fey ancestry will cover my ass on that front.”

That was news to me; I didn’t realize there were creatures out there that could sense Krystal’s true nature. It really shouldn’t have been, though. I’d learned time after time that the parahuman world was bigger and more complex than I could imagine. There were bound to be all sorts of different creatures with various talents out there, almost all of which a vampire could copy abilities from. That’s what made us so dangerous, and so feared, even among other parahumans. Every time I met a new client, they were always a bit wary of me, never quite sure what I was capable of, and if I was looking at them as a source of income, or blood.

We made our way back down the hall, and Krystal grabbed my hand just outside the dining room door. She said nothing, though. With the doorway open, not even Charlotte could muffle the words away from Lillian’s hearing. Instead, she just held me there as we watched Richard make his way into the dining room and roughly greet Lillian. It occurred to me for the first time that as long as my new employee was around, we were going to have to keep up the facade of Richard, of pretty much all my friends, not caring for me. The ruse would be for my protection, as I couldn’t very well be marked as best buddies with a therian, or a mage, or a wielder of a weapon of destiny. All the same, even the idea of it felt lonely, and I found myself hoping Lillian would give up quickly so that things could get back to normal.

A tight squeeze on my hand reminded me that Krystal was still there, that she’d found a way to stay with me even with Lillian hovering around us. I felt a surge of love and gratitude for her, leaning in for a quick kiss while we were momentarily alone. She reciprocated warmly, then pulled away and carefully mouthed a single soundless word.

“Showtime.”

With that, Krystal slouched her way into the dining room and let out a squeal of mock surprise. “Oh my goodness, Freddy didn’t mention that his guests were still here. I’m so sorry to interrupt your dinner.”

Awkward, deferential, and apologetic; this version of Krystal was about as far from the real one as she could get. Whether I liked it or not, the pageant had begun.

4.

“Are you sure I can’t come along?” Albert stood in the doorway as I packed up my computer bag for the night ahead. Having managed to make it through dinner without anyone getting killed, I’d retired back to my apartment and spent the entire day working out a plan for the coming week. I’d gone through all my accounts, choosing the safest, least likely jobs to turn into anything exciting. Lillian was going to accompany me on boring client visits and assessments until she either quit or I ran out of dull situations to shove her in.

By this point, you’re no doubt wondering why I didn’t just stick my unwanted employee in front of a mound of paperwork and be done with her. The idea did occur to me—it was an obvious solution to the problem—however, it came with a serious drawback: if I let her handle any aspect of the real accounting, I’d be trusting her with my clients’ confidential information. Since I didn’t even trust her to know things about me, I certainly wasn’t going to allow her access to any of my clients’ private fiscal records. Better to drag her around town and risk my own exposure than allow her clan to get its hooks into the people who trusted me.

“No, Albert. I’m afraid it’s too dangerous. Besides, I need you handling the more delicate work while I’m saddled with Lillian.” Much as I might have enjoyed Albert’s company, he was too high profile to bring along. The Blade of the Unlikely Champion took serious issue with being left behind, and Albert always seemed out of sorts when it wasn’t close by, but one look at the ornate weapon and she might be able to figure out that he was the town’s resident destiny-weapon wielder. And I really was leaning on him to handle a fair amount of tasks while I was busy. Parahumans didn’t often go in for digital delivery, and there were several clients expecting contracts, budget projections, and filing receipts to be delivered in the very near future. Some of those, Lillian and I would be handling, but all the ones with the potential to get more . . . exciting . . . had to be entrusted to Albert. Neil would also be tagging along, in case he needed backup.

“You can count on me, boss.” Albert saluted, then lowered his hand slowly as his cheerful expression became tinged with concern. “Is this lady really that dangerous?”

“She’s probably stronger than me, whatever little that says, but it’s not actually her I’m worried about,” I told him. “It’s her clan as a whole. If I can fall off their radar, be just an anomaly they know about but have no regard for, then that’s our optimum situation.”

“What’s the bad situation?” Albert asked.

I jammed the charging cord, portable Wi-Fi hotspot, and array of flash drives into the top pocket of my briefcase. “Honestly, I’m not sure. Maybe they try to drag me into their clan. Maybe they do a hostile takeover of the business. Maybe they . . . encourage me to leave town.” That actually wasn’t what I wanted to say, but there was no sense in worrying Albert with the least likely option. Even if I struck their interest, the chances of them deciding to kill me were slim. I hoped.

“All I know is that I’d prefer not to deal with them at all, if possible, and that’s what this week is about.”

“Got it.” Albert walked over to my desk, where I had neatly arranged all his assignments for the night. “But it’s too bad.”

“What do you mean?”

“You’ve been saying for a while that you needed more help. I just mean, it’s too bad that this Lillian lady can’t actually lend us a hand.” It was hard to argue with Albert as we both stared at the mound of assignments I’d set aside for him. Had Arch been in town, I’d have never been able to lay such a heavy burden on my assistant’s shoulders, but while the agent was gone, their training was on break. And he was right; the company did need to grow if I was going to keep up with demands. Just not like this.

“I’d far rather keep working overtime than accept any help the House of Turva wants to give,” I told him. “This business might not be much, but at least no one else can lay claim to it. That’s worth something to me.”

“To me, too,” Albert agreed, beginning to carefully scoop up his assignments and pile them into his backpack.

With my own accessories stowed, I said a quick goodbye, and then headed out into the crisp new night. The last of the sunset had only just fallen away, so the sky was still a bit lighter than usual. I did miss seeing the blue skies and sun, even if I was now able to glimpse them through enchanted windows. It wasn’t the same, though. I’d never really cared much for standing in sunlight during my living days; mostly, I’d considered it an inconvenience. Now, I’d have paid an obscene amount for the experience. But that was life; everything was a transaction. Nothing came free. Ageless existence and mystical powers were a comparatively small price to pay for giving up the ability to tan. I just still missed the sun, occasionally.

By the time I arrived at Charlotte Manor, Lillian was already waiting on the porch. She wore yet another pantsuit, probably delivered by someone in her clan, and had a large purse with a yellow legal pad sticking out the top. Before I could so much as pop open my door to greet her, she rushed forward, opening the passenger side of my hybrid and climbing gracefully in.

“Something wrong?” I asked.

“Just excited to get started on my first day of work.” Her smile was wide and infectious, but something in the way her eyes were twitching betrayed

Lillian's anxiety.

"You sure that's all? Did something happen? Did Krystal say anything?"

"Krystal? Hell no. That girl barely even speaks; she's quiet as a barn mouse." Lillian glanced back at Charlotte Manor through the window. "It's just . . . I don't want to sound ungrateful—I really appreciate you putting me up somewhere parahuman friendly and with such good food. But you mentioned that place has a presence, and the longer I've been staying there, the more I can feel it. It's hard to describe, like everywhere I go, I know someone is aware of my movements and what I'm doing. It's kind of unnerving."

"Sorry you had to go through that." I shifted the car into drive and began heading back toward Winslow's proper city area. It was probably of note that she could tell Charlotte was paying special attention to her; it meant her senses were either exceptional or she'd been dining on something with high awareness. Either way, I'd have to ask the house to be more discreet in keeping watch. "When we get back, I'll have a sit down with the presence; see if I can get it to offer you a little breathing room. We've had dealings before, so I should be able to talk it into backing off."

"I would greatly appreciate that." Lillian leaned back in the seat, seeming to finally relax now that the manor was fading into the rear view mirror. "So, what's on the docket for my first day on the job?"

"Listening," I told her. "And taking notes. Right now, you don't have any of the training or certifications to actually do accounting work, so I'm going to teach you the customer service portion of the job. In a normal firm, there are reps to deal with most of that, but this is a small operation, so every employee has to be able to handle multiple jobs."

"Can do," Lillian replied. "I like to think I've got a way with people. I used to get compliments on my bedside manner, way back when I had a heartbeat."

"You were a doctor?" I asked.

Lillian chuckled, hard laughter tainted with something darker than mirth. "A nurse. They didn't let women be doctors back then. No matter how much we might have wanted it."

I looked at Lillian once more, realizing for the first time just how great the difference in our ages was. I didn't know much about the history of physicians—the best I could recall was that the first female doctor had been sometime in the mid-eighteen hundreds, which put Lillian's human life somewhere before that. She was at least a hundred and fifty years old, yet she looked not a day past twenty-five. As someone who was undead, you might have expected me to be more prepared for these things, but there is a huge gap between knowing you'll live without aging and actually confronting it while driving toward a highway.

“Sorry to hear that,” I said finally, realizing I’d let the silence drag on a little too long. “Did you try going back into the field? Times have certainly changed since . . . whenever you were turned.” I tried to steer around the subject of when exactly she was made into a vampire. Part of it was out of politeness, and the rest was because I couldn’t shake the old adage of never asking a woman for her age from my head. I didn’t know if it applied to the undead, but this was not the occasion to find out.

“Times have changed out here, but some clans are a little more stuck in their ways.” Her eyes went wide at that, and she began speaking again so quickly she nearly stumbled over her words. “I mean, I’ve been busy helping my people. Not even the House of Turva runs itself. We all do our part to protect and watch over each other. It’s truly rewarding, knowing that my work helps my family.”

“And what kind of work might that be?” I asked. “I didn’t get a resume from you, so it might help to know your strengths and weaknesses when deciding how to train you.”

“Let’s just say I’m a quick learner, and I’ve been around long enough to do almost every sort of job you can picture. Although, accounting will be a new one for me,” Lillian admitted.

“Maybe that’s why they lent you out. They want someone on hand who can balance the books.” I carefully pulled through a green light and onto the ramp for the highway. Much as I loved Charlotte Manor, it was out in the boonies of Winslow and required more of a commute than I generally preferred.

“I’m not ‘lent out,’ Fredrick. I work for you now. No one is going to call me back and leave you high and dry. My clan takes its gestures of friendship seriously.” She patted her legal pad gently. “You don’t have to worry; I’m in for the long haul.”

“How lovely to hear.” I did my best to keep some cheer in my tone as I accelerated toward the city, hoping against hope that Lillian was lying her ass off.

5.

The first few appointments went as well as I'd hoped, if not better. I introduced Lillian as my trainee to the clients, then got right to business. The curtness wasn't malicious; I simply didn't want her to have any chance to let them know about her affiliation with the House of Turva. Presumed alliances could be problematic down the line, and I liked to keep my business meetings on track. After all, the client was paying for my time, so the discussion should be centered around their needs. With two drop-offs and one potential client meeting under my belt, I began to feel more confident as I drove us out of downtown Winslow to the pleasant housing area where my next appointment was waiting.

This one was to be the softest of softballs, as I was supposed to meet with Amy to do a quarterly update on her supply receipts. We went through her logs, marking which materials were for jobs and which were for personal use or testing so that everything could be written off properly come tax time. It didn't really need to be done quarterly, but that was about as long as we could manage without Amy forgetting and tossing the receipts out or setting them on fire. While the actual meeting hadn't been due for another few weeks, I moved it up especially for my new employee's first night. The whole task was glorified inventory work; dull, methodical, and perfect to bore Lillian out of her skull.

We pulled into the driveway of Amy's modest, quaint-looking home. She lived with ample space and fences between her house and the neighbors, and none of them were aware that she had a top-end alchemical laboratory tucked away in the rear of the property. From the front, it appeared to be a totally normal, somewhat unremarkable dwelling.

Except, that was, for the frantic woman darting toward my car. Amy's face was smeared with soot, and her hair was flying in all directions. She began waving at me, then noticed the passenger staring in aghast confusion and quickly tried to tone down her panic. That, in itself, was worrying enough; Amy was usually on so many self-crafted potions that she tended to be the mellowest person I knew. If she was panicking, something must have really gone awry.

"Hey there, Fred," Amy said as I opened the door and climbed from the car. "So great to see you, really looking forward to the meeting, just one small thing that maybe we can chat about first? In private?"

As she finished speaking, the sound of something crashing behind the house rang through the yard.

“Now,” Amy added, motioning for me to follow.

“Um . . . Lillian, the client has some confidential information to discuss. Please wait in the car, and do your best not to listen,” I said. To her credit, Lillian shut the door and turned on the radio without a word of disagreement, which was a small comfort as Amy began dragging me around to the back of her house.

We’d just turned the corner when she dug through her pockets, pulled out a small blue vial, and threw it to the ground. The air seemed to warp around us, as if we were standing on the inside of a bubble.

“That should block her from eavesdropping,” Amy said. “Soooo, we may have a bit of a problem.”

“You don’t say,” I replied, offering her a handkerchief to wipe the soot from her face.

“I know it’s not the best timing, but since you weren’t coming by until late, I figured I had a little window of time to get some work done tonight,” Amy explained, twisting the handkerchief around in knots on her fingers, the soot remaining uncleaned. “And Bubba has been up my ass about the enlarging potion, so when I finally had a breakthrough, I wanted to—”

“Hang on,” I interrupted. “What’s this about Bubba and a potion? He doesn’t touch anything stronger than beer.”

“This wasn’t the recreational stuff. He was looking for real alchemy, the kind with the power to create change. You know how sensitive he is about his size,” Amy said.

We all knew; it wasn’t something Bubba hid particularly well. Despite his pride in being a therian and a weresteed, Bubba had insecurity issues about the fact that he was considered something of a runt. While Richard easily dwarfed most other therians in his lion form, Bubba was at the opposite end of the spectrum—he got smaller when he shifted. In fact, he was so small that he wasn’t even technically a horse. He was a pony.

“He asked you to try and make a potion to fix that?”

“He’s been asking me for months. Ever since Gideon got captured,” Amy corrected, twisting the handkerchief even more. “And it’s been slow going. I can craft a potion to make him bigger, no problem, but it’s when you get into the permanent aspect that things become a lot more complicated. Anyway, I had an idea about distilling the essence from a Night Mare down and concentrating—”

“I’m sorry, a nightmare?” Much as I loathed to keep cutting Amy off, I wanted at least some clear idea of exactly what it was I was about to walk into.

Amy shook her head. “Two words. Legendary monster horse. Anyway, I got my supplies today, and decided to whip up a trial batch. I had Bubba take a drop, just a drop, to measure the effects. Good news: it sort of worked.

Better than I'd hoped, actually."

Another round of crashing, this time accompanied by what sounded like hoof beats, tore through the night. Apparently, Amy's bubble only kept sound in, not out. Or maybe it turned us into ghosts, for all I knew; it wasn't as though her experiments were predictable.

"Okay." I pinched the bridge of my nose, trying to think of how I was going to explain this to Lillian. Just a casualty of dealing with mages? Maybe that would sell; magic users did have a reputation for being unpredictable. "Okay, what do you need from me?"

"I put together a second potion to neutralize the first one before I ever gave it to him, just in case, but Bubba's not in his right mind. He's tearing about, making it impossible for me to get to the antidote. Plus, even if I grab it, I might need some help getting it in."

"So, keep him distracted, then?" I asked.

"Pretty much. And maybe hold him down if I can't get a syringe through his skin." With that, Amy began dragging me again, out of the bubble (which popped at her touch) and around the back of the house to where her lab stood. She yanked me along, through the door, and into a scene of complete chaos.

Tables, beakers, and general supplies were on the floor, mostly smashed. In the middle of the room, crushing a table beneath his sizable hooves, was what I could only assume was Bubba Emerson, though not like I'd ever seen him before. No longer was he a runt; instead, the top of his body stood above my shoulders, and while I'm far from the tallest in the world, I'm not short, either. His normal sandy coat had been replaced by one of ash-black, like a burned-out log, and orange flames flickered along his mane and hooves.

Well, that explained the soot on Amy's face. Sort of.

"What did you try to splice him with?"

"Really not the important issue right now," Amy replied.

"How about the fact that your lab looks completely smashed, and I'm guessing that includes the antidote, too," I countered.

"Please, you think I kept that in the upstairs lab?" Amy nodded to a small wooden door that I was positive hadn't been there the last time I visited her, or on any of the previous occasions. "I need to get past him and down to where the dangerous stuff is stored."

"Lovely. And what if he breaks through the walls?" I asked.

Amy shook her head. "Not possible. I've had enough experiments go wrong to know the value of sound construction. This house is warded up, down, and sideways. He's not busting out anytime soon."

I began stepping away from Amy—there was no sense in even trying this ridiculous idea unless I kept his attention solely on me. When I was across the room, I pressed my fingers to my lips and released the loudest whistle I could manage. Truthfully, it was pretty unimpressive, but evidently it was enough to get the massive horse that was Bubba to look at me.

He stopped smashing up the table beneath his feet and turned to me, letting me see for the first time that his eyes were a dull red instead of a horse's usual glassy black. A snort came from his lips—mercifully not accompanied by a bout of flame—and his ears twitched as he stared at me.

“Hey, Bubba,” I said, keeping my voice as calm as was manageable in the face of a giant, burning horse. Amy began to slink silently toward the wooden door. “Do you know who I am? It's Fred. Your friend. The guy who stocks your favorite beer in his fridge.”

Another snort, but nothing aggressive. At least, not so far. Through my peripheral vision—I didn't dare risk a real glance—I saw Amy making progress, step by step, getting closer to the door. She was also getting closer to Bubba with every movement, so I kept talking, doing all I could to keep his attention rapt on me.

“It's okay. I'm here to help. We just need you to calm down a little. When this is over, we'll crack open a few beers and watch . . . whatever sport is on right now.” I'd like to blame panic for making me blank on which sport was in season at that moment in time, but truth be told, I couldn't have named it even without my friend being turned into a monster horse.

“We'll find something on. Maybe a nice action movie, or a western. Amy has the fancy cable; there's bound to be options.” At this point, I was mostly just saying whatever inane nonsense popped into my head. All that mattered was that I kept the sound going. As long as his attention was on me, Amy would be okay, and that was the important part. It almost worked, too. Unfortunately, Bubba wasn't the only one failing to pay attention to his environment.

The sound of crunching glass may as well have been a gunshot with how quiet the room was. Bubba let out a screeching whinny and reared onto his hind legs, twisting his head to see Amy, frozen in mid-sneak, her shoes lifting from the remains of a test tube. Faced with the split-second decision of how to handle the situation, she defaulted to the pair of options hardwired into every creature on the planet: fight or flight. Since her opponent was both an angry horse and a dear friend, Amy wisely chose the latter option, bolting the rest of the way to the wooden door before Bubba could get his bearings.

She barely made it, jerking the door open and slamming it shut an instant before Bubba careened into it. I expected the wood to buckle and splinter under the power of his charge, but it was Bubba who buckled instead, bouncing off the doorway like it was a block of steel. He shook his head, therian regeneration no doubt already patching up what little wounds he'd inflicted on himself, and then reared back again, trying to pound the entire wall with his hooves. It worked about as well as the charge, which was to say, not at all. Amy hadn't been kidding about the warding on her lab, and it was all paying off at that moment.

Finally giving up on the wall, Bubba turned back around to face me. The red in his eyes didn't seem quite as dull this time around, and before I could muster so much as a comforting word, he charged. There are few things in life quite like watching a sizable steed partially covered in flames come barreling down at you while inside a closed room, and for those wondering, I would highly recommend against experiencing it. Especially if you don't have vampire reaction speeds.

I leapt to the side, scarcely getting out of Bubba's way in time, even with my superior dexterity. He was so damn fast now, his natural speed having been upgraded along with his size, that it was all I could do to avoid his stampeding bulk. Whatever remaining tables and supplies had been behind me weren't so lucky; I heard him crunching them into debris as he turned back around. Amy's lab was big, but not so large that it left me many places to go when facing off against a burning horse. Another change from Bubba, and again, I was able to jump to the side. He bounced off the wooden door again, coming away from the encounter with even more anger in his eyes.

This couldn't go on much longer; I was barely surviving each attack as it was. My eyes flicked to the doorway, but I immediately realized I couldn't escape. If Bubba followed me through an open door, I'd be setting him free on the world, which would make catching and curing him far more difficult. If he didn't, then I'd be leaving Amy as a sitting duck the minute she returned from her lab. I had to stick it out if we wanted to help Bubba, but I couldn't keep running around like I was.

As I dodged Bubba for the third time, nearly catching the leg of my slacks on fire, an idea finally struck me. He might be faster and stronger than me, but he wasn't as lithe. Stretching my fingers out, wishing dearly that I didn't keep my nails so trim, I leapt upward, all the way to Amy's ceiling. The moment I made contact, I jammed my hands through the soft drywall, groping about for a beam to hang on to. For a second, I thought all was lost as my hands closed around nothing, but then I felt the wonderful sensation of something solid and grabbed on for all I was worth. Using my abs to lift my legs, I pinned myself to the ceiling like a fly.

It wasn't a great long-term solution—I'd have to come down when Amy emerged so I could do distraction duty again—but for the moment, it meant I was safe from Bubba's assault. He trotted about beneath me, staring up at me with those relentless eyes.

"Sorry, buddy, I just needed time—" It was my turn to be interrupted, as Bubba leapt up from the ground, far higher than a normal horse could, on a direct track for me. There was no chance of dodging; I was far too taken by surprise.

All I could do was gasp in shock as Bubba's hooves smashed into me, knocking me from the ceiling to the floor, where it would only be seconds until he started trampling me.

6.

Of all the things I was expecting to come next—stampeding hooves, lots of pain, perhaps even the smell of burning vampire flesh—what I did not count on was a blur in a pantsuit whipping through the doorway and slamming Bubba in the side. It wasn't enough force to knock him over—he was too strong for that—but it did push him off course, allowing me the precious necessary seconds to get back on my feet. Once I did, I was overwhelmed with equal parts gratitude and distress.

Lillian was backing slowly away from Bubba, never taking her eyes off the mighty steed as he gathered his bearings for another charge. “Sorry, boss, I got tired of waiting in the car.”

“I'm not usually one for insubordination, but I suppose I'll have to look past it this time.” While I'd have far rather recounted this tale to Lillian, which would have allowed me to glaze over the more dangerous parts and omit certain details entirely, her intervention had kept me from being trampled on the floor. Out of the two options, perhaps having to put a little more effort into my lies wasn't such a bad result.

“What's the plan? One of us distracts this thing while the other drains it dry?” Lillian asked.

“No!” I spat the word without thinking, my mind flashing back to that night with Colin. Lillian wasn't the type to hesitate, and if I didn't stop her right away, then Bubba might be in danger. “This is a client; he's just had a bad reaction to a potion. Right now, the alchemist is fetching an antidote, so all we need to do is keep him distracted until she arrives.”

It didn't take any manner of expert to see the doubt and, worse, curiosity in Lillian's eyes. She voiced none of it, though, merely nodding her head stiffly and replying, “You're the boss.”

After that, there was little time for talk, as Bubba tore after us once again. It was still hellish to try and dodge his assaults, but having Lillian in the room helped a great deal. We spread out instinctively, and even in the limited confines of the lab, he could only go after one of us at a time. That allowed the other to regroup and prepare for when his attention invariably waned—sometimes helped along by yelling when one of us was getting backed into a corner. Together, we managed to keep him smashing about without being trampled until the wooden door opened a small sliver and Amy's voice slunk out from behind it.

“How are we looking?”

“We're going to have to write off everything in here as collateral damage from a testing procedure, but otherwise, not bad,” I replied. “My new employee stepped in to lend a hand, making the task far more manageable.” While it sounded like (and technically was) praise, my real goal was to make sure Amy knew that we weren’t alone before she let anything too important slip. Granted, there was little chance of that with Bubba as a far more eminent threat; however, I’d found it never hurt to be overly cautious. Especially not with my group of friends.

“Well, I brought the calm-down juice. Loaded it up and got it ready for injection, too.”

“Do I want to know why you have that sort of equipment on hand?” I asked, keeping a careful eye on Lillian as she gracefully darted out of Bubba’s path.

“Not every parahuman has a mouth, Fred. I have to cater to all sorts of clients,” Amy replied, a bit more sharply than usual. Evidently, the experience of accidentally morphing her friend and seeing her lab torn to shambles had left her in a less-than-stellar mood, which I could scarcely fault her for.

“I didn’t consider that,” I admitted. “To the matter at hand, though . . . how do we administer the cure? Bubba doesn’t seem too keen on letting anyone get close to him at the moment. At least, not unless he’s trying to mow them down.”

“Seeing as I’m just an alchemist and you’re two strapping vampires, I’d say one of you is going to have to get the drop on him and jam it in. Catch.” With no more warning than that, Amy flung open the door and tossed a metal syringe at me. My hand moved on its own, which was a great mercy, because if I’d had time to think, I surely would have let it clatter to the ground, rather snatching the cure out of mid-air. The moment my hand closed around it, the sharp scent hit my nose and caused it to wrinkle.

Silver. Not the whole device, but at least the needle. It made sense; therians were just as weak to the stuff as vampires—well, most vampires, anyway—and without knowing how tough his skin currently was, this was the only method to ensure the syringe broke through. All the same, I tried to look ill-at-ease holding such a thing, in case Lillian had picked up on the scent, as well. Since I wasn’t technically touching it, I shouldn’t be weakened; yet, all the same, it seemed prudent to show some discomfort. The absolute last thing I needed was for her to realize I’d found a way to shake off one of our kind’s biggest vulnerabilities.

“Lillian! Can you manage to make him hold still for a second or so? Without hurting him.”

“Is this thing a therian?” Lillian yelled at me, bolting out of the way and whirling around so that Bubba would be charging past her into a corner.

“In normal form, yes,” I replied.

“Stopping it without hurting it is probably impossible, but I can at least limit the damage to what their kind can heal. Will that work?" She couldn't turn toward me to ask; her eyes were unwaveringly on Bubba as he lined up his next attack. While I wasn't particularly fond of the idea, it seemed we were going to have to make the best of a bad situation. Better Bubba recover from a few bruises than any of us get serious injuries.

"Keep it as limited as you can," I instructed.

That was all the permission she needed. Bubba charged at her again, but rather than jump to the side, Lillian ran forward, meeting the challenge head on. Her posture dropped as she went into a slide, purposely putting herself down between those trampling legs. With movements so fast and precise I could barely follow them, Lillian threw a kick directly into one of Bubba's legs, just as his weight settled on top of it. I heard the snap and pop before I saw the knee bend, collapsing and bringing several hundred pounds of horse down with it.

Bubba's screech was awful, and I did my best to ignore it as I raced forward. He could heal fast—I'd seen that firsthand many a time—and if this version of my friend managed to get back on his feet, it would have a vendetta to settle. Wasting no time, I drove the syringe deep into his flank, the silver easily piercing his usually durable skin. Jamming the plunger down with my thumb, I didn't so much as wiggle the device until I was sure every drop of antidote had made it into Bubba's system.

The effects were visible almost instantly; a wave of brown washed out from the spot where I'd stuck him, overtaking the ashy black color of his altered form. As it spread, I noticed that Bubba was getting smaller, the terrifying horse turning back to my friend's true, diminutive form. His breathing was labored, however, and I could still see the broken angle of his leg even as his body morphed. Carefully, being sure not to antagonize him, I laid my hand on Bubba's neck.

"It's okay. I'm here. Amy's here, and you're going to be fine." The sound of plodding footsteps on shattered debris drew my attention, and I saw Amy walking over.

"Sorry about that, Bubba. Next time, I promise to filter out the aggressive tendencies inherent in their magic."

"How about we just not have a next time?" I proposed.

"Fred, do you know where the world would be if people gave up every time they had one little failure?" Amy countered.

"I'm okay with a lack of progress if the failures involve my friends being in danger." I could feel Bubba's racing pulse through his neck, but thankfully, it was beginning to calm down as his returned to his usual pony form.

"He would have been fine, eventually," Amy said. "It was a test potion, so none of the ingredients could have lasted longer than a day. I just didn't want him to get himself into trouble before it wore off."

“Excuse me . . . are you Amy Wells? Student to Gideon, King of the West?” Lillian had circled around behind us, and was standing by Amy with her hands clasped together in what was either real or very well-done mock excitement.

“‘Student’ might be a bit of a strong term. He just showed me a few things, mostly so I could make better products for him,” Amy replied. After a second, her brow furrowed. “Wait, how do you know about that?”

“Oh, the House of Turva makes a point of researching everyone of significant status and power when we move to a new area, and as an associate of the King of the West, you, of course, caught their attention.” I didn’t know much about vampire culture, but this seemed like the sort of thing someone should probably be embarrassed to admit, and yet, it didn’t leave even so much as a dent in Lillian’s excitement. “I have to say, it’s a real honor to meet you. People talk about how powerful your potions are for states around.”

They did? I knew Amy was talented—the mere fact that Gideon was a client spoke to that fact—but I had never realized she was quite that well-regarded. It didn’t seem to shock Amy much, though, as she shrugged off the praise in her usual blasé manner.

“Thanks, I guess. Sorry our friend almost smashed you.”

“It was well worth it to meet such an icon,” Lillian replied. If she took note of the fact that Amy referred to us all as friends, rather than business acquaintances, she didn’t show it. Maybe I’d get lucky and she’d simply chalk it up to Amy being lazy with titles, or overly friendly.

Bubba, in the meantime, had fully transformed back to his usual weresteed shape and size, not so much as a speck of black or fire left on him. The glassy black eyes stared up at us, saying the apology that his mouth wasn’t currently able to convey. For a moment, he began to warp, heading back to his human form, but before he could do more than start the shift, Amy whacked him hard on the nose.

“None of that, now. You know you heal faster when transformed, and that leg needs to patch itself up,” Amy chided. She took a good look at the wound, which was already better than it had been moments prior. “Damn, your new assistant really got a piece of him.”

“I’m actually a trainee, not an assistant,” Lillian corrected. “But I do believe in fulfilling orders to the best of my ability.”

Before I could tell her that some orders could be handled a little more gently, the sound of Albert’s ringtone began blaring from my phone. Slipping the sleek device out of my pocket, I accepted the call and pulled the phone to my ear.

“What’s going on, Albert?”

“Um . . . hey, Fred. I know this—” Albert was cut off by the sound of screaming in the background, at least one of the voices belonging to Neil.

“Sorry, I know this isn’t the best night for it, but I think I need your help on something. I was dropping off the packets, just like you ordered; only, when I got to the fifth one, instead of signing the receipt, the couple just started yelling at each other. Things . . . sort of got worse from there.” Another bout of screaming, followed by what sounded like the thud of something dense hitting a wall.

“Neil and I are kind of stuck here,” Albert continued. “And I could call the authorities, but I thought, since the papers got them fighting, maybe there was a non-agent way to fix this. ‘Cause . . . well . . . you know.”

I did know, all too well. He was smart enough not to say Krystal’s name, but she was the authority he would turn to. And if Albert called in an agent, the situation was getting resolved. It just might not be in the most peaceful of methods. Aside from concern for my clients, I also had to worry about the reputation of my company. Being too closely linked with agents could be bad for business—a lot of parahumans tried to keep themselves as far away from the treaty-enforcers as possible.

Of course, even on the best of nights, I’d be hesitant to head into such a situation. With Lillian in tow, it was all the more problematic. Still, Albert was right. If I could figure out what in the documents had caused the issue and find a resolution, then it would be the best ending for everyone involved.

Except, possibly, me.

“Give me the address, Albert,” I said, noting the interest in Lillian’s expression. “We’ll head there right away.”

7.

It took us nearly twenty minutes to arrive at the destination, even with me breaking my usual fastidious adherence to the speed limits (I went up to ten miles over in some spots). I'd recognized the address as soon as Albert gave it to me; even in my line of work, the number of ranches I called on was minimal. The Capra Ranch was to the north of Winslow, in one of the most rustic sections. Unlike where Charlotte Manor had been located, this piece of land was never attempted to be industrialized, and in fact hosted a lovely farmer's market on weekends that I would have happily attended, if it weren't held during the day.

Gerda and Oskar were the kindly couple who ran and owned the Capra Ranch—a satyress and satyr, respectively. I remembered driving out to meet them a few months back, their goat legs carefully hidden under thick overalls and custom boots. They had served me delicious cheese and asked me to carefully go through their costs and incomes to see why business was up, but profits were down. It had been a relatively simple job. All I had uncovered was that they were overpaying a few suppliers, hardly the sort of thing I expected to cause a ruckus. Yet, as I pulled my car around to the rear, I could clearly hear heated voices yelling at each other from inside the farmhouse.

"Please don't tell me to stay put again." Lillian's request came before I'd even gotten my seat belt off. It was prescient as well, because the next words out of my mouth were indeed going to be orders to sit tight while I handled this. "I'm here to learn about customer service, remember?"

"What's happening in there is hardly a standard part of the job," I told her.

"You do remember that we just came from subduing a rampaging therian, right? Seems to me it comes up often enough to be worth learning." Lillian took off her own seat belt and slung her bag over her arm. "Besides, you might need backup. Once satyrs get going on a tear, it's hard to calm them down."

"Lillian, I know the last stop set something of a bad precedent, but at Fletcher Accounting Services, we do not go into meetings planning on physically engaging our clients."

"No, but there's something to be said for self-defense," Lillian replied. "I promise not to lay a hand on anyone unless you tell me to, though. And don't act like you don't need the help. I know your assistant is stuck in there."

This, at least, didn't come as a surprise. I knew my own hearing well enough to expect that she'd been able to hear Albert's side of the call. I still scowled at her nonetheless. "Privacy and confidentiality are important aspects of the work I do. From now on, I expect you to tune out my business calls.”

“Will do.” Lillian looked as if she meant to say more, but a loud thud from inside the farmhouse made us both jump. “Sounds like we should really get in there.”

Much as I tried to think of one, I didn’t have a good reason to offer up for why she should stay in the car. I could hardly pretend to be worried for her safety—the way she’d brought down an augmented Bubba made it clear that, of the two of us, she would be more capable in dangerous situations. Not to mention the fact that, with no idea what I was walking into, having the help might actually make a difference again. Most compelling of all, though, was the fact that Albert and Neil were stuck in the middle of whatever was happening, and that meant getting them extricated came before anything else.

With a begrudging sigh, I nodded, and the two of us stepped out of my eco-consciously sized car. Moving quickly, I knocked once on the front door, which caused it to drift open, as it had evidently not been closed in the first place. This gave us an excellent view into the living room, and a sight so strange we were both struck by a momentary pause.

Gerda and Oskar, the two lovely people I remembered from our original meeting, were literally locking horns (which I was certain they didn’t have when last I saw them) in the middle of the room. The furniture had been thrown about, and the dents on the wooden walls answered the question of what had been making the loud thuds. Backed in a corner, tucked behind what looked like the remains of a coffee table, were Albert and Neil. Albert had planted his sword, still sheathed, between the battling couple and them, while Neil was scratching some sort of rune into the coffee table and muttering under his breath. All of this came with the soundtrack of Gerda and Oskar both trying to yell over the other, so deep in anger and insults that I could barely piece together more than a few words of their dialogue, none of which I’d feel comfortable repeating in my retelling of the incident. I mean, there’s swearing, and then there’s two satyrs cursing at one another.

“Fred!” Albert popped his head up as he caught sight of me and Lillian in the doorway. Somehow, his one innocent exclamation got the attention of the battling couple, who yanked their horns apart and turned to face me.

“There he is!” Gerda yelled, voice nothing like the one she’d had when offering me glass after glass of sweet tea. “Tell this lying old bastard that the jig is up!”

“Fred, it’s about damn time,” Oskar hollered. “I’ve been trying to make your assistant explain to her that the truth is right there on the page.”

“They’ve been screaming a lot, don’t want us to leave, and I can’t figure out what any of it is about!” Albert yelled.

“This accounting stuff is a lot more interesting than I was expecting,” Lillian muttered, which was the exact opposite of what I wanted to hear from her.

All the voices were swirling around, trying to top the others and clamoring for attention. Rather than try and engage with any of them, I stormed into the room, grabbed the tattered (but not torn) packet I'd given Albert for delivery, and slapped it crisply against my hand.

"Gerda. Oskar. I want to help you, I do—"

My words were drowned out under a fresh tidal wave of yelling from each half of the couple, both trying to make their points so enthusiastically that they weren't even bothering with an explanation. In spite of their aggression, I remained calm, waiting until there was a lull and trying again.

"I can't offer any perspective on this unless—"

Another fresh wave of screaming. I continued to be patient, ready to wait for as long as it took to get them calmed down enough to explain the situation.

This time, however, they were the ones cut off. Not by words, but by the sudden audible crack of wood being fiercely splintered. We all turned to find that Lillian, still dutifully standing by the entrance, had driven her fist completely through the door with a single punch, and was now carefully brushing the splinters away from her unmarked hand.

"I believe Fred was trying to say something, before you interrupted him." There was no threat in her words, yet the hole in the door spoke volumes. Gerda and Oskar both seemed to shrink back, looking at her, and me, with an expression I'd encountered more than once since my transformation, and loathed more with every occurrence.

Fear. She'd reminded them that we were stronger, and now they were scared of her. Of us.

"Lillian, go wait in the car."

"But—"

"You are done here. Unless you want to be fired outright, go wait in the car. Now." It wasn't often that I found the nerve to be so forceful, but this was something I absolutely couldn't tolerate. My business, my very life, was built upon other parahumans looking past the reputation that other vampires had cultivated. I couldn't allow anyone to associate Fletcher Accounting Services with that kind of aggression, not unless it was a matter of life and death. Yelling didn't qualify. Sooner or later, voices got tired.

Lillian stared at me for several seconds, then spun around and left, presumably heading back toward the car. I looked at Gerda and Oskar, suitably cowed for the moment, and decided to capitalize on their silence.

"I am very, deeply sorry for that. Lillian is a new employee; though, one more stunt like that, and that won't be the case any longer. Fletcher Accounting Services is going to replace your door, and I'll be doing the next six months of budgetary maintenance for free as an apology. If you no longer wish to do business with us, I understand, and will happily get whatever new accountant you choose up to speed on your situation.”

Some of the color that had drained from each of their cheeks began to return, and Oskar even took a step toward me. “Nah, Fred, you can’t control what someone else does. We accept the apology.”

“Thank you, very much,” I replied. “Now, can we please, in calm and rational voices, discuss what in my findings led you to suddenly begin fighting with one another?”

“A fight? This ain’t much of a fight. Barely even an argument,” Gerda informed me. “Guess it might seem that way from the outside, though. We satyrs and satyresses are just passionate. And a bit stubborn.”

“What caused the ‘discussion’ was that I looked through your pages and found out she’s been double paying for the cow’s feed,” Oskar told me, his tone beginning to heat up a bit more. “Now, I know that’s her cousin’s company, so she’s probably been paying twice just to squirrel a little money away from me. And the only reason she’d do that is if she was gambling again.”

“Like hell that’s what started it,” Gerda shot back. “We started a row because you’re paying three times what the fencing costs to your old drinking buddy who runs the company. And so help me god, Oskar, if you’re back on the bottle, I’ll break it over your thick skull. Again.” From the way she was flexing her hands, something told me she didn’t mean it as a figure of speech.

They were beginning to fume again, which was actually a relief, since it meant they weren’t afraid I’d forcefully shut them down. Plus, now that I knew what the actual issues were, it allowed me to dig through the report and see how much truth there was to the claims. As the satyr couple started squabbling once again, I sat down in the sole remaining chair to dig through my compiled report.

Even as I worked, though, my mind was out in the car with Lillian. I didn’t regret the choice I’d made in sending her away, but that didn’t mean there wouldn’t be consequences to it.

My night might very well end with a fight that would put the owners of the Capra Ranch to shame.

8.

It took a while, but I was eventually able to piece together what had caused the errors. Double paying for feed was an innocent mistake—both Gerda and Oskar had thought they were supposed to set up the automatic withdrawals from their bank account and neither had checked with the other, causing the same amount to go out twice per month. As for the fencing, while the cost was exorbitant, it also matched the receipts provided by the company. I recommended that they find a new vendor, as this one was clearly gouging them. It was technically possible that Oskar was funneling cash through a friend to feed a secret drinking habit, but judging from the anger at hearing his friend was ripping them off, it seemed unlikely. That, or Oskar was a far better actor than I could have imagined. Either way, my work was done, and I liberated Neil and Albert, who were both handed cartons of baked goods from Gerda as apology for what she called “the slight inconvenience.”

I saw both of them back to Neil’s car—an old sedan most likely inherited from a family member who’d purchased cars back when they were made of thick metal frames and came with ashtrays in the armrests. It occurred to me as I watched their taillights fade down the road that I’d never actually met any of Neil’s family. Albert’s either, but that was understandable, as they all believed him to be dead. I knew I was stalling, avoiding heading back to my own car and facing the fuming vampire waiting inside. There was no getting around it, though. Not unless I was willing to abandon my car and run back to town—which was tempting, I will admit, but would leave Lillian for Oskar and Gerda to deal with. And that seemed like bad customer service no matter how I sliced it.

I rounded the farm house to see my hybrid still in one piece, which I hoped was a good sign. Lillian was sitting inside, staring out her window and away from my approaching form. She was still aware of me, her senses were too good for her not to be, but she was pretending not to notice. That was fine by me, as I would take frustrated silence over fury any day of the week. Popping open the door, I slid into my seat and started the car’s engine. I said nothing as I put on my seat belt, giving Lillian ample time to open the conversation with an explanation or an apology if she so desired. When my silence was echoed, it became obvious that I was going to have to start things off.

“I’m sorry if my tone was too harsh in there. The situation was chaotic, and I had to try and salvage things as quickly as possible, which meant you had to leave. Still, I do wish I’d found a gentler way to voice that.”

“Salvage things?” Lillian turned from the window, surprise overtaking the pinched annoyance she’d been wearing seconds before. “Fredrick, I had the situation perfectly in hand. They were silent, willing to listen, and ready to sign whatever you put in front of them. I fixed everything, and you cast me out for it.”

“You didn’t ‘fix’ anything,” I told her. “You just made my clients afraid.”

“They should be afraid.” Her surprise was morphing to puzzlement before my eyes. “You are a vampire, one of the most feared and powerful types of parahumans out there. The very fact that they continued speaking when you entered the room was a slap in the face. All I did was restore the natural order. And without touching a single person, I might add.”

I think I would have preferred it if Lillian had been at least a little miffed as she spoke. If she were angry, then I could have pretended the words came without thought and forgiven them as such. But Lillian wasn’t mad. She didn’t even seem overly prideful as she spoke of the natural order. The only emotion that came across was confusion, like I was the weird one. Which, when viewed objectively, I suppose I was.

“Is that what it’s like inside your clan?” I asked. “Vampires are seen as the best, and the other parahumans are lesser?”

“Not the best, just among the top. We’re aware of our abilities, and our limitations,” Lillian countered. “As for the others, the satyrs and mages and therians, they are our food, Fredrick, just like the humans. A bit more difficult to hunt, but the nutrition is far superior. Or are you honestly saying that you don’t use this job as a way to get in close to other parahumans so you can feed on them?”

Slowly, I lowered my head until the rims of my glasses were pressed against the steering wheel’s leather. That was what she, what her clan, thought I was doing? Running an elaborate ruse to take blood from unsuspecting parahumans? Everything came into sharper focus now. Lillian wasn’t here to learn about me, she was here to learn about my business. How it worked, and likely how it could be replicated. A blood-stealing venture that flew under the nose of a man like Richard was the sort of thing any worthwhile clan would be interested in.

“Lillian, I am going to say this once, and only once, so please listen carefully. I do not feed on other parahumans. Or regular humans, for that matter. I buy my blood through the Agency’s supply system. My accounting business is not a way for me to drink from anyone. It’s just an accounting business. Parahumans run businesses, and they sometimes need as much help as anyone else.”

“I’m sure they do, but if you’re not drinking from them, then why would you actually do this job?” Lillian asked.

“Because I like it. Because I’m good at it. Because it fills a very needed role in the parahuman community. Why do you think I was looking for new employees in the first place? There are so many of our kind out there who need the help I offer that there's more business than I can handle," I told her.

"Really? I mean . . . we just assumed you were either going to feed on the new employee or you wanted an accomplice to help make disposal easier," Lillian said.

"I assure you, that is not the case. What I need is another accountant, someone who can help with the workload." I raised my head from the steering wheel and looked at Lillian, who seemed oddly at peace with discovering she'd been lent to a real accountant rather than an ingenious blood thief. "There's nothing hidden about me or my business. What you see is what you get."

"That a fact?" Lillian leaned back, taking in my full profile. "While I'll admit it doesn't seem like you're eating people, you can't tell me there isn't something going on here. You happen to know one of the preeminent mages in the state, are good enough friends with a therian to care about his health even as he's attacking, and have what I'm pretty sure was a zombie on the payroll as your assistant. That's not normal for a vampire, accountant or not."

"What can I say? I was left without a clan." Putting the car into drive, I swung us around, heading away from Gerda and Oskar's ranch. "I didn't get a ready-made family, or a template for who I was supposed to hate, so I ended up making friends with anyone I got along with, regardless of their parahuman traits."

"So it seems. I am curious, though, since you've worked for Richard Alderson, have you ever had occasion to meet the King of the West?" She wasn't even trying to hide how closely she was watching my face for a lie. The other things were small coincidences, nothing that linked me to the vampire of rumor. If I had a good relationship with a dragon, though . . . well, very few vampires could honestly claim such a thing.

"I met him on the first night I met Richard, actually," I told her. "It was one of the absolute scariest experiences of my life, before and after undeath."

"He wasn't nice?" Lillian asked.

"He was Gideon." I shuddered involuntarily at just the memory of that night. "Have you ever been near a dragon? Had their attention focused fully on you? That aura of theirs is like nothing else. Your body begins to spasm as your brain loses all cohesive thought, filling only with animalistic screams of panic and terror. It left me so catatonic that I had to be carried from the building. When I went back to work on Richard's taxes, it was only something I could manage because Gideon wasn't there."

My words, carefully chosen, were all completely true. I just left out the part where Gideon came back to rescue Sally, giving me a drop of his blood so I could bring her home, and eventually filling me with more of it to later break him out of a magical cage. Disclosing all of that would pretty much mean the jig was up.

"I've met lesser dragons," Lillian said, after soaking in my story. "And even they were impossible to function around. I can't even imagine what the King of the West's aura would be like." She paused, watching the street signs go by as we drove back into a more developed neighborhood. "Do you really think there's a vampire out there who was able to withstand it? The rumors people have been passing along, about a vampire who won the dragon's respect . . . they must have a will of absolute iron, if they exist."

"I can't say I've ever met a vampire I thought was strong-willed enough to pull such a thing off." A bit self-deprecating, if honest assessment of my own abilities, but still not a lie. "All I have learned since I became undead is that this is a much bigger, stranger world than I ever realized when I was alive. Maybe there is a vampire out there who can stand up to a dragon's aura. If one of us can be happy as an accountant, that doesn't seem any less unreasonable."

"Still wrapping my head around that one," Lillian said. "This is really it? You just . . . do people's budgets and taxes and stuff? No intimidation, or forced feedings, or any of it?"

"I'm not sure how you think a business works, but I rely heavily on word of mouth for my clients. If I tried scaring them into doing what I wanted, or, heaven forbid, assaulted them, my reputation would fall apart within the span of a week. Which is why I had to come down so hard on you with Gerda and Oskar." I pulled onto the small loop that circled Winslow, heading back to Charlotte Manor. After that last stop, it seemed prudent to call it an early night before more could go wrong.

"No, I get it now. I'm sorry. What I did was out of line. It's just . . ." She tilted her head back, her dark hair bunching up on the headrest. "I've been with the Turva clan for so long. More years by far than I was alive for. They're all about intimidation and power plays, the dominance of the vampire species. You live with that, surrounded by it all the time, and it's easy to forget that there are other ways to get by."

"Maybe it's a good thing that I won't be much help to them," I said.

"Yeah." A shadow that had nothing to do with the passing street lamps fell over Lillian's face. "Someone who could get them parahuman blood under the table would have been a lot more useful than just an accountant."

"Do I . . . should I be worried about not being useful?" My words hung in the air between us, the unspoken topic that had been present all night finally beginning to tear its way into reality. Lillian's gaze wandered out the window again, watching the few other cars out so late zip by as we puttered along at the speed limit.

"Probably," she said at last. "The House of Turva is moving into Winslow full force. They'll play nice with the therians and stick to the treaties, since the King of the West is here, but they've never been much for competition. If you had the backing of a clan, that would be one thing; there's a lot of politics involved when dealing with fellow clans. As an abandoned vampire, though . . .” Lillian let her voice trail off. There wasn't anything more that needed to be said. I wasn't one of them, and without a clan to protect me, I had limited options. Be absorbed or be destroyed; those were my most likely scenarios. Absorption might not even be on the table.

We rode in silence the rest of the way back to Charlotte Manor. I wanted to press her for more, to ask about exactly what they might do. Part of me even wanted to ask her to lie, but that piece of me was foolish. Sooner or later, they'd realize the truth. Unless I actually started assaulting clients, it was an impossible façade to keep up. There was no sense in dragging Lillian down with me. She, at least, had given me a bit of warning.

Thanks to Lillian, if I wanted to, there was still time to book a ticket to Boarback.

That thought was heavy on my mind as I pulled into Charlotte Manor's parking lot. I was so lost in my musings that I almost didn't notice the unfamiliar gray minivan parked a few spaces up. It had government plates, and no windows aside from those in the front. Part of me wondered if the Turva clan was moving already, somehow getting the word that I was useless to them. Then, before my eyes, the back of the van was ripped off from the inside, revealing three white creatures with snapping jaws. If I lived a thousand years, I would never forget that sound. It haunted my nightmares, was tied to one of my worst memories. Dozens of those things had surrounded us the night Quinn kidnapped Krystal, the night he almost killed me.

The night I saw him tear out her throat, before I knew such wounds only made her stronger. Ghouls, that's what was leaping out of the van. Mindless appetites given physical form, they knew only hunger. And, before I could so much as yell, they were racing right toward my car.

9.

A whole lot happened in a very short span of time. I screamed at the ghouls' approach, while Lillian's hand dipped into her pantsuit and came out with a knife that looked like it was built to carve bone. The ghouls raced toward my car, their jaws clacking and eyes empty as they endeavored to lock those crooked teeth around our flesh. Gunshots rang through the night, turning two of the ghouls' skulls to mist and shattering my windshield. Because of the cracks, I could only barely see someone bolt around from the other side of the van, tackling the third ghoul and pressing a weapon to its temple. Another shot, and the monster went limp.

Lillian was out the door before I could say a word, so I forced my hands to grab the handle and yank it open, determined not to let her face whatever lurked out there alone. As it turned out, the well-meaning gesture was wasted. Not a single ghoul was left moving, or even with their skulls intact. What did greet us, however, was Krystal sitting atop the third ghoul's back, blood all over her sweatshirt as she removed her gun from the chunky mess that used to be its head. She glanced up, noticing Lillian and me for the first time.

"You're . . . uh . . . you're home early, Freddy. Kind of thought we had another hour or so before you showed up."

"We?" I'd barely gotten the question out when it was answered; Arch came walking around from the other side of the van, his own gun still out and ready to fire. I had a pretty good idea who'd taken out the first two ghouls with those perfect headshots; Krystal was good, but not flawless.

"You just smoked those things." Lillian was gazing at Krystal and Arch with a new expression, one I'd yet to see on her serene, always-certain face. Fear. Even if it hadn't been said out loud, she knew what she was looking at. The pieces were falling into place in her subconscious, and her sense of vampire superiority was crumbling quickly. "I thought you did software design."

"Would you believe I also play a lot of first-person shooters?" Krystal asked. Her glasses were gone, left off since she hadn't been planning on playing her part so soon, and the deferential attitude was just as absent. She was on the clock, which meant the real Krystal had resurfaced, and there didn't seem to be much purpose in pretending otherwise.

"Fredrick, your girlfriend is an agent!" For a moment, I thought it was an accusation, which I was more than braced for. Then I caught sight of the panic in her eyes and the frantic gestures she was making. Lillian was trying to warn me, to give me a chance to escape. Even if I'd wanted to move, though,

I couldn't. The sudden crushing boulder of guilt over deceiving her was weighing me down far too much to manage even a shuffle.

"Lillian . . . I know." Had I shot her, I don't think she could have looked more surprised. It seemed like we might get to find out, though, as Arch turned his weapon toward Lillian.

"It seems like this is the sort of conversation best had inside, wouldn't we all agree?" Arch's tone wasn't exactly what I would call cordial—he was still Arch, after all—but it was calm, which meant a lot since there were three ghoulish corpses bleeding on the ground and he was holding a gun on one of us.

"Is that a threat, or a request?" Lillian spat, eyes never wavering from his weapon.

"Mandatory debriefing. You just witnessed three captured parahumans try to escape custody. We need get your account of how it went down for the record, and to make sure it doesn't happen again." Arch kept his weapon aimed, but nodded his head toward Charlotte Manor. "I can cite the treaty precedent, if you need it."

"How about everybody chills the fuck out for a second," Krystal suggested. "Lil, I know there's some explaining to do, so why don't you come inside and ask us whatever questions you've got. I'll get the manor staff to whip up some grub. Arch, put the damn gun down; she's not going to bolt into the night."

"What makes you so sure?" Arch asked.

"Because she's the one who really wants an explanation, which I'm offering to give her," Krystal said. "Plus, she knows we've got her name and clan, so running wouldn't do much good. If we told them we wanted to question her about something, the Turvas would likely hand over her head and say she broke an internal law. They're not big on their people talking to agents."

If any part of me had wondered about the idea of being pulled into the Turva clan, that perhaps it wouldn't be so bad, the fact that Lillian didn't dispute Krystal's theory quickly put those notions to bed. Instead of arguing, my fellow vampire simply turned and walked into Charlotte Manor wordlessly, leaving the three of us behind.

"Why in the hell didn't you give me a heads up you were coming home early?" Krystal asked.

"I didn't think about it," I said. "Tonight has been kind of . . . hectic."

With that, I launched into the story of what we'd dealt with so far: Bubba's transformation, the satyr couple's fight, Lillian's revelation of what the Turvas thought of my business. By the time I was done, Krystal and Arch had thrown the three ghoulish corpses into the back of the van and jerry-rigged the door to stay shut.

"Guess the jig is officially up. No need to stay uncomfortable." Krystal yanked the blood-ruined sweatshirt off to reveal a black tank-top underneath. She popped open the barely working rear door and hurled the soaked garment into the back with the corpses. "What's the play now, Freddy?"

"I honestly don't know." The night had started with a plan. Maybe not a great one, but it had been there, an idea of how to handle things that might get me out unscathed. Now, though, all of it was in shambles. Lillian knew everything and would report it back to the Turva clan. There was always the chance that me dating an agent could buy some protection, but Krystal herself had said she was limited by the law. If they found a way to come after me without breaking the treaties that bound them, she'd either have to stand by or violate the law herself. Running seemed more and more like the only real option we had. And yet, part of me was still resisting. I didn't want to leave Winslow, even if every rational part of me screamed that it was the smart thing to do. If there was even a chance of staying, I wanted to try and uncover it.

"Let's just talk to her," I said at last. "Maybe we can find common ground, or reach an understanding, or something."

"Even if you can, she doesn't speak for the clan as a whole." Arch obviously noticed the surprised look on my face, since he continued with an explanation. "Krystal brought me up to speed on your situation."

"Arch, do I even want to know why you have a van full of ghouls parked outside Charlotte Manor?" I asked, realizing for the first time just how insane that really was.

"You might want to, but you aren't going to find out. It's confidential," he told me.

"In the future, if you could avoid bringing dangerous creatures to suburban areas, I'd really appreciate it." I didn't even try to temper the sarcasm in my voice; my patience for the day had worn almost completely through.

"Can't make that promise," Arch replied, unbothered by my tone. That was about par for the course with him, though; I'd been the silly one for expecting to make a dent in his stoic countenance.

"Let's just go get this done." I walked up the drive to the manor, Krystal arriving at my side seconds later. She said nothing, just took my hand and squeezed it tight, reminding me once again that she was there. If I hadn't already told her that I loved her, it would have burst from my lips in that moment. Curiously, having said those words to one another already, there wasn't any need to speak them as we made our way into the house. We both knew, just as we knew that however this all went down, we would face it together. Rain or shine, we were in it, side by side.

Lillian was waiting for us in the dining room, a slice of apple pie sitting untouched in front of her. One of the waiter versions of Charlotte stood quietly nearby, awaiting any order or request that Lillian might make. We took our seats, and seconds later another waiter arrived, setting pie down in front of both Krystal and me.

“Coffee, too, if you don’t mind,” Krystal requested. Our waiter nodded and headed into the kitchen, where he would wait as long as coffee normally took to brew before returning with the magically conjured cup. We didn’t really need to pretend at this point, but I held my tongue. Charlotte’s secret had no relation to mine, and it wasn’t my place to give hers away without cause.

“You’re him.” Lillian’s arms were crossed, and the stare in her eyes could have shamed a sociopath as she glared at me from across the table. “I can’t believe I didn’t see it earlier. That zombie had a freaking sword in his hands, but I thought he’d just picked it up from the junk tossed about. Friends with mages, therians, and dating an agent, plus your assistant had a weapon of destiny in his possession. You’re the vampire everyone is talking about.”

“I am.” It felt oddly good to admit that. Even with things crumbling around me, stepping out of the shadow of deceit was freeing. “And I’m not. The things you’ve heard about me, some of them are true, but only in the most technical sense of the term. I didn’t pretend to be someone I’m not, or lie about what I do for a living. I really am just a Certified Public Parahuman Accountant. Nothing more.”

“Except that you’ve consorted with dragons, and brokered a peace with the leader of the therians,” Lillian snapped.

“Like I said, technically true, but there were extenuating circumstances.”

“Well, I’m listening,” Lillian told us. “Explain the circumstances to me. Let’s hear the truth behind the rumors.”

My eyes darted to Krystal, who met them with a slight shrug. This was my choice to make, and while I knew she would back me in whatever I decided, she couldn’t make the call for me. Giving Lillian information was dangerous. Everything I said, every weakness I revealed, all of it could be used against me. If that happened, though, was I really any worse off? Right now, fleeing was far and away the best option before me. Talking to Lillian wouldn’t take that off the table, not with Arch and Krystal on my side. But it might open up a new path, one I couldn’t see on my own. I was already on the brink of losing everything, why not roll the dice one more time?

“I’d say it all really started when I decided to go to my high school reunion . . . .”

10.

By the time I was done, the pie, along with a few cups of coffee and glasses of wine, had all long been put away. I didn't tell Lillian everything, the personal information and secrets of others never touched my tongue, but I did give her a good overview of what the last few years had been like. She was skeptical at first; however, after one story led to the next, she slowly began to come around and see how it was possible for me to have technically pulled off so many seemingly impressive achievements without actually being the vampire rumors made me out to be.

The one secret of my own that I skipped over was my immunity to silver. Showing her some trust, seeing if she might be willing to help me find a path to peaceful coexistence with her people, that was all well and good, but it wouldn't hurt to have a secret ace in the hole. The House of Turva not knowing silver didn't affect me could easily be the difference between escape and capture in a dire situation. I skimmed past it, wrapping up my tale with the events of the night Colin the vampire hunter had appeared.

"This was really not what I expected when Petre put me on the assignment." Lillian took a long sip from her glass of wine—a chardonnay that, while certainly of high quality, was far too sweet for my liking. "I figured a week or so to learn your operation, plus a few days for the seduction —"

"Pardon me?" Krystal didn't reach for her gun, but she did grip her coffee mug a bit tighter.

"I didn't know he had a girlfriend when they told me to come work for him," Lillian explained. "And do you think I really wanted to do that in the first place? No offense, Fredrick. You're a nice enough guy, but it's not like I'm keen on being ordered to seduce people I'm not even into."

"Then why do it?" I asked. My familiarity with the treaties and laws of parahuman kind was lacking in anything aside from the fiscal department, yet I couldn't imagine being part of a clan meant completely surrendering one's freedom.

"It's just the way things are done." Another sip, this time enough to nearly drain the glass. Seconds later, the kitchen door opened and one of Charlotte's many waiter forms appeared with a fresh chardonnay in hand. She might not have name-brand, but there was never a need to go thirsty while staying at Charlotte Manor.

"Do you know why I got turned in the first place?" Lillian continued. "It's because they were trying to get at a local politician of the time, collecting dirt to use so they could leverage control over him. And he supposedly had a thing for dark-haired women. That's it. I was given eternal life just so they could try and tempt some mayor into cheating on his wife."

"That is . . . really shitty," I said.

"Funniest part: it didn't even work. Turns out, he was gay. But of course, in those days, no one could actually admit to such a thing, especially not while in public office. The whole 'dark hair' thing was just a rumor; as far as I know, he never touched a woman, which suited his wife fine. They were what we used to call a 'good fit,' for the times."

"Speculation?" Arch asked.

"Very much confirmed." A bit of a smile appeared on Lillian's face—the first time since we'd been attacked by ghouls.

"Wait . . . ." Understanding set in at the sight of her grin, followed immediately by a fresh bout of confusion. "Then, why would they ask you to try and seduce me? I'll admit I'm not the most impressive of them, but I am still male."

"There's a lot of room between zero and six, Fredrick." Lillian chuckled to herself, polishing off the last of her glass and pulling over the new one the waiter had dropped off. "That Kinsey fellow had more sense than most of the others from his time."

"Steering the conversation away from how you were supposed to fuck my boyfriend, what, exactly, did your clan expect to come out of this?" Krystal asked.

Lillian paused, seemingly considering her options. "I suppose, since it's all a bust, there's no harm in telling you. We figured that you were probably running a successful blood-harvesting business, so the goal was to learn how that worked. On the off chance that you were on the up-and-up, though, I was supposed to charm my way into your client files to get account information for all the wealthy parahumans you'd worked with. Ideally, that would have been enough to scam or outright steal from them. Funding an entire clan's relocation isn't cheap."

"Don't suppose you'd be willing to say that to a judge in the Agency." From the grim frown on Arch's face, he already knew it was going to be a no, and was asking purely out of formality.

"Even if I did, I'm just a grunt on the ladder," Lillian said. "Everyone worth holding accountable would say they had no idea I was warping a gesture of friendship with such awful intentions. The most I could accomplish would be to incriminate myself."

"Which, seeing as you just confessed in front of a pair of agents, you technically already did," Krystal pointed out.

The table fell silent as we all nursed our respective drinks and tried to figure out where to go from here with the conversation. Arch and Krystal could haul Lillian in, but I couldn't see a way that would benefit any of us, especially Lillian. She was offering us information; repaying her with incarceration seemed like a poor trade. Finally, I spoke, determined to try and make some headway with the opportunity we'd been presented.

"Is there any chance of peace between me and the House of Turva?" I asked. "Knowing that I'm just some schmuck, with no blood business or real resources to offer, would they be willing to leave me alone?"

"No resources?" Lillian looked at me with incredulity, and Krystal's own gaze wasn't far behind. "Fredrick, you are quite possibly the most connected parahuman in the state, to say nothing of Winslow. Your lover is an agent, the powerful leader of the local therians calls you friend, you clearly have close ties to a renowned mage and the wielder of a weapon of destiny—who, apparently, is also best buds with a necromancer, of all things—and as the cherry on the sundae, you've earned the respect of an ancient dragon. If you called in enough favors, you could wipe out our entire clan."

"But I don't have those favors to call in," I protested. "And even if I did, I would never use my friends like that. They aren't assets to be tapped when I need something handled; they're people I care about."

"Oddly enough, I actually believe you," Lillian said. "Maybe it's because I've always been a bit of a softy compared to the others, or maybe you're just easy to read. Whatever it is, I honestly believe that you wouldn't try to use your friends, especially not to attack people. The problem is that almost no one else in my clan will buy that, and even if they did, they would still want to wipe you out before a century passed and you changed your mind. Time does funny things to us all, eventually."

"If I'm so connected and scary, wouldn't it make more sense to not attack me?" I was, admittedly, grasping at straws here, but with every word she said, Lillian seemed to seal my fate tighter. I was groping for anything that potentially offered hope.

"You're an abandoned vampire, Fredrick. There are at least a dozen or so ways the clan can annex you into it, at which point your life is more or less theirs, or they can just claim you've dishonored them and demand satisfaction. If they come through the treaties, then your friends can't help, not without calling down the Agency upon themselves."

Scary as Lillian's words were, they were made all the worse by the fact that I'd heard them before. That was almost exactly how Krystal had said it would go down, back when we were in Boarback and she'd first voiced her fears. I looked over at her and saw the sad resignation in her eyes. It was all coming true, just as she'd predicted.

"I've got a question," Arch interrupted, his hands twirling a cigarette between his fingers. Charlotte let him smoke in his room, but had banned it in public areas, especially where food was served. "Why are you telling us all this? Shouldn't you be scampering back to your leaders and letting them know the skinny on Fred?"

The . . . skinny? Sometimes I forgot how old Arch really was. But before I could comment on his word choice, Lillian gave her reply.

"If that's what you really want, I can. Or I can pretend things are going fine. Doesn't matter; sooner or later, they're going to find out the truth. Petre is nothing if not thorough. He won't stop digging until he finds the source of those amazing vampire rumors, and from the sound of things, there are certainly enough dots to connect him to Fredrick." She halted, running a pale finger along the rim of her glass, creating a high-pitched whine. "As for why I'm giving you the heads up, I suppose I sort of like the idea that one of our kind can actually form relationships based on genuine affection. In the House of Turva, the only worth you have is how useful you are. After over a century of dealing with that bullshit, I wouldn't mind seeing them take a failure or two."

"Are all clans like that?" I asked. Though my question was directed at Lillian, it was Arch who answered.

"Vampire clans are organizations, and they work in different ways, but most of them have some form of hierarchy and need to keep people productive. Inter-clan conflict is almost a staple in the vampire world, so those who don't shore up resources and numbers are leaving themselves open to takeover. The only thing that keeps them from building an army are the clan-size limits in the treaties, and, obviously, the conversion rate issue."

While I wanted to ask about what the heck Arch meant by "conversion rate issue," Krystal added on to his speech and steered my mind quickly away from the topic.

"Some clans are better than others. The Turvas are just especially aggressive, dickish specimens," she explained. "All of them come with strings and rules, though. That's why we built a condition into the treaties that exempts all vampire agents from their clan's authority. If we didn't, there would be no end to the special treatment and favors they'd be obligated to provide."

"Bad or not, they do offer protection," Lillian added. "Protection that you don't have, Fredrick. My advice would be to abandon Colorado now, before anyone else puts this all together. We'll be here for a long while, so as long as you leave the region, you should be fine. They might send a runner or two after you, but with an agent at your side, I hardly expect that to be an issue."

"Damn right, it won't be," Krystal concurred. She turned in her chair, laying a hand on my shoulder. "Freddy, you said that if you needed to run, you would. I hate to be the voice of caution, but it sure seems like if there was any time to skip town, this would be it. I can have the jet prepped within a few hours."

“Albert, Neil, and I would only be a half-day or so behind you,” Arch added. “And I assure you, they would be well protected until they reached Boarback.”

“What about Bubba and Amy?” I asked. “And Charlotte?”

“Amy Wells is a respected mage and student of the King of the West,” Lillian told us. “The clan has no way to come at her that would not invoke retribution. Same for Bubba Emerson, employee of Richard Alderson, whom we must keep in our good graces to survive.”

“As for me, I’m a fortress,” the waiter spoke up, earning a sideways stare from Lillian, who still didn’t know the true nature of the home she occupied. “I could easily keep a whole clan of vampires at bay, if they even decided to attack me. Which, honestly, seems unlikely. You already saved me, Fred. It’s time to save yourself.”

“From the mouths of magical houses,” Krystal muttered. “We have to go, Freddy. You heard Lillian. There’s no way they won’t come for you.”

No, actually, that wasn’t quite right. What she’d said, what lay at the core of all of this wasn’t the fact that I was a vampire. It was my being an unprotected vampire. Quinn the traitor, my sire, had screwed me once again by creating me as an abandoned vampire. But there might still be a way to keep myself—and my friends—safe, while staying in the town I considered home.

“What if . . . what if I joined a vampire clan?”

An Accountant in the City

1.

There were, admittedly, flaws in my plan, issues that Krystal was quick and vocal to make clear. Aligning myself with a different clan of vampires might solve my current problem, but it would undoubtedly open me up to a whole slew of new ones. No clan came without costs, and to throw in with one would mean owing allegiance to people whose goals and ideals didn't always line up with my own.

Arch was the one who pointed out the more pragmatic issue: vampire clans weren't often keen on taking outsiders, and we would be working with a limited time frame. Even if Lillian hid what she'd learned from her people, sooner or later there would be a target on my head, and if I hadn't negotiated protection by then, I would be out of luck.

Lillian, who I'd expected to be at least a little supportive of the idea, turned out to be my staunchest opponent, insisting that it was better to run as a free vampire than seek shelter in the cage of a clan. Her metaphor, not mine. The fact that she was the only one of us who was actually part of a vampire clan wasn't lost on me; yet, all the same, I couldn't bear to let the idea go entirely. Once I did, all that remained was running, and while I'd never had any issue with fleeing from danger before, something about this occasion just stuck in my gut. I couldn't explain it, but the idea of abandoning Winslow, of starting a new life in Boarback, seemed intolerable. Which was strange, all things considered, because I'd really liked our vacation there.

Eventually, the bickering wore down as dawn approached. It seemed prudent to get some rest and think things over. Arch and Lillian went to their own rooms, while I followed Krystal up the stairs to hers. We dressed for bed in silence, slipping out of our night's clothes—stained with blood and soot, respectively—and into comfortable pajamas. Keeping a small stash of clothes in her room had begun as a precaution and was quickly turning into a frequently needed asset. Sliding under the covers, I reached for her, but found she'd taken a perch near the edge of the mattress.

"Why are you doing this?" Her tone wasn't one of gentle concern, or frustration, like I'd been expecting. No, I'd heard Krystal pissed off enough to know what her anger sounded like, and there was quite a bit of it in her demand for explanation.

"I just don't want to leave town if I don't have to," I said.

"It's just a place. Buildings and streets and shitty, overpriced restaurants. Our families don't live nearby. Neither of us is even from here. I know you'll miss the friends who stay, but life means starting over sometimes. I've had to do it a lot, and no one was trying to kill me. So tell me, really, why the hell are you being so stubborn on this?"

"Honestly . . . I'm not even sure I know." Despite the fact that the room was dark, I could still see the ceiling perfectly as I stared up at it from the soft bed.

"Do you think it's brave? That refusing to budge is manly? Because it's not. It's self-destructive, and pig-headed, and damn it, that's my job in this relationship. I don't need someone who is unwilling to bend. You're supposed to be the sane one, Freddy. The one who makes the calls that are actually good for us." Despite the fact that her fury seemed to be growing, she scooted a bit closer to me, away from the bed's edge.

"I don't think it's brave at all. I know it's stupid, that I'm being stupid, but I just . . . you were wrong a few seconds ago," I said. "About us not having family nearby. We have Bubba, and Amy, and Charlotte, and Richard and Sally, and even Gideon, if you count him as the scary cousin with tattoos and a rap sheet. Yes, Albert and Neil would come with us, but we'd have to leave so much behind. Resetting our lives for a good cause or each other is one thing; I don't want you to think for a moment that I wouldn't be willing to do that. But I've never had something like this before. A community. A family that genuinely cared about each other. The idea of leaving it all behind is more than I can stand."

Krystal moved closer, wrapping her arm over my chest. "It's harder to run away when you have to actually leave something behind."

"Guess I never had anything worth missing before." I pulled her in close, holding her in the darkness that never seemed dark to my altered eyes. "Am I totally off base with this idea? Be brutal with me. If it's just going to cause everyone more pain, if it will leave us worse off, if you say it's a lost cause, then I'll let it go."

"You will?"

"I trust you, Krystal. With my life. And no one knows more about this stuff than you do—at least, no one in my social circle. Well, except maybe Arch, but he's got his own desires to look after. The point is, if you tell me there's no hope in coming out ahead on this, then I'll believe you. We can catch the plane to Boarback after dusk."

Instead of the expected and immediate barrage of reasons why that idea was idiotic, Krystal greeted my request with a long pause of silence. Most who knew Krystal Jenkins operated under the impression that she was impulsive, and that was a very accurate impression indeed. What many people missed, however, was that when a decision truly mattered, she showed more care with it than anyone else I'd ever encountered. That was why I didn't object to the silence as she thought the problem through; I merely listened to the sound of her breathing from a few inches away.

“Joining a clan just to stay in Winslow is an overreaction,” she finally began. “You’re taking way too big of a jump to handle a problem that could be solved with just a sidestep of location. But the truth is that you’re ageless now, Freddy. There will be more problems in the future, and running might not solve all of them. Belonging to a clan of vampires actually would be helpful in a lot of ways down the line. You understand that the act of joining opens up a myriad of problems all its own, but the clans thrive for a reason. At least as a member, you’d only have to deal with one clan’s bullshit, instead of every House of Whatever that wants to hassle you.”

“So, joining up now might not be worth it for dodging the Turvas, but it could pay off overall in the long run,” I summarized.

“Maybe. You don’t age, but I think we’ve both been around the block enough times to know that that doesn’t mean something else couldn’t knock you off the mortal plane.” Krystal laid her hand on my chest, just above where my undead heart lay. “Though I’d make sure whoever took you regretted it, I’ve seen too much death to think even I could prevent it. No one is promised an eternity, Freddy. No one knows how long they get. You might be trading some wonderful years down in Boarback with me for kissing the ass of some vampire house’s leader and scampering about at their every order.”

“You do know how to make a compelling case for Boarback,” I admitted. “But that seems like a worst-case scenario. We have a little time, here; Lillian said she’d keep the truth a secret for now if I asked. How about I at least do a little research into the vampire clans and see if there’s one who aligns with my own general sentiments?”

A hot wash of air splashed over my chest as Krystal snorted. “Freddy, vampire clans are notoriously tight-lipped about what they do and what their long-term goals are. They file exactly the paperwork the treaties demand each year, and no more. Everything they can conceal, they do, from the Agency and from other clans. You can’t just look that kind of shit up on the internet.”

“Oh. I guess I just assumed someone would know something. I mean, Arch always seems to have the inside track on everything.”

“When you’ve been around as long as him, you’ll seem that way too,” Krystal said. “But he’s still an agent, which means he has way too much on his plate to keep up with the scheming and regime changes of every vampire clan out there. We have some analysts who do monitor what they can in that area, but pretty much all of that is confidential.”

“Well, crud. There goes my brilliant idea of doing research.” I gazed into the depths of the ceiling’s tilework, wondering if I’d be able to get Charlotte a contractor to do updates from Boarback. With no way of knowing who I’d be throwing in with, my idea seemed dead in the water. I was willing to take some risk to stay near my friends and business, but blindly joining up with a vampire organization was a step too far. I might just as easily throw in with someone as bad as the House of Turva, if not worse.

“There might be one person who can fill you in, but you won’t like it.” Krystal muttered the words slowly, like she was pulling them out of her mouth by sheer force of will. “Someone who was around when the treaties were created, and got a sense of every clan’s leader at the time. Someone who keeps an ear to the ground for schemes and rumors, and isn’t beholden to any sort of confidentiality agreement. If he’s willing, he could probably give you at least a basic understanding of most vampire clans.”

Dense as I could sometimes be in regards to all things parahuman, the dots of this suggestion were large enough that even I could connect them. So far as I was aware, I only knew one person who was alive when the treaties were signed, which is to say, when America itself was founded. And he certainly would have been a part of the process, given the title he still held. Plus, since he was watching over a therian child, he would assuredly keep his ears perked for any sudden ambition or regime changes, lest they find their way to Winslow, Colorado.

“I have to go talk to Gideon,” I said, trying to think of another option and failing miserably.

“Told you, you wouldn’t like it.”

2.

To say that Gideon and I had a complicated relationship would probably imply a familiarity that wasn't actually there. The first time we met, I'd fallen under the sway of his draconic aura, as all vampires did, and become a terrified, catatonic mess on the floor who'd had to be physically hauled out. The second time, I'd been kidnapped along with Sally Alderson, and he'd given me a single drop of his blood so I could withstand the aura and get her to safety. Our third meeting was the strangest, though, in which I'd slipped into a magical cage surrounding him and become a vessel for his magic so he could break free, all in order to stop the dragon who'd taken his place. That last one had actually been the most awkward of our encounters, and not just because it left me with the silver immunity as a side effect.

No, what had made that experience so strange was that, in conducting Gideon's power, I'd gotten a sense of just how strong he really was. If the draconic aura had conveyed how scared I actually should have been in our first meeting, I probably would have never recovered and instead just spent my undead life as a weeping mess on the floor. Knowing that power like Gideon's even existed terrified me in a way that went beyond fear of death. It was the first time that I'd understood just how great the divide between myself and the King of the West truly was. Powerful as vampires might be, we were still just augmented humans. Gideon was a living force of nature.

Some part of me suspected he knew what I'd seen, which was why Gideon had been absent every time I visited Richards in the months that followed. Perhaps it was out of deference to the fact that he didn't want me to give in to fear, or maybe he just didn't feel like dealing with me clumsily trying to kiss up lest he smite me with a thought. Whatever the reason, when I dialed Richard that afternoon and asked for a meeting with Gideon, I fully expected to be rebuffed. Even if he wasn't avoiding me, Gideon was still the King of the West; he had every right to tell me his time was worth more than my petty requests.

Which made it all the more surprising when Richard told me that Gideon would see me at ten, after Sally went to bed. I should have been relieved—this meant my plan still had a bit of traction—and a small part of me was. It was just dwarfed by the far vaster side that was terrified at the realization I'd booked a meeting with an ancient dragon to ask his advice on which vampire clan I should try to join. My best hope was that he found it amusing and didn't take offense. Otherwise, the whole issue of my safety could become very moot, very quickly.

As the sun was nearing the edge of the horizon, Krystal and Arch came downstairs for our nocturnal version of breakfast, followed by Lillian a few minutes later.

“What’s on the docket for tonight, boss?” she asked. She wore the same outfit as before, though it had been cleaned and pressed since she went to bed. Charlotte’s laundering skills were like the rest of her hospitality abilities: flawless.

“Don’t you need to head back to Petre and report on me?” I asked.

Lillian rolled her eyes while helping herself to the plate of eggs one of the Charlotte-waiters had set down in front of her. “I’m supposed to be covertly investigating you, remember? Wouldn’t make much sense for me to run back to the clan every night. They’ll be expecting me to hang around for at least a few days, worming my way in and getting the account details. I’ve probably got three more nights, this one included, before I need to report back and make sure things look like they’re on track.”

“Lillian, I wanted to ask you this last night, but there wasn’t quite the opportunity,” Arch said, exercising a lot more diplomacy than I usually saw from him. “If you cover for Fred, pretend you didn’t realize he was the vampire Petre’s hunting for, will there be consequences for you?”

“Oh yeah, Petre’s going to be mad as hell,” Lillian confirmed. “Even if he believes me that it was an accident, that’s the same as failure in the House of Turva. They’ll probably keep me off blood for a week or so as punishment.”

It took her three bites of eggs before she realized we were all staring at her in silence. Lowering her fork, she let her practiced smile shrink by several degrees, if not fall away entirely. “It’s okay. This isn’t the first time I’ve disappointed my sire, and it won’t be the last. I’ve had to go a month without blood in the past, so a few weeks is nothing. Sometimes, they punish me for things way beyond my scope of control. I’d much prefer to take this one for something I decide is worthwhile.”

Though I heard her words, my mind was still reeling. A month without blood? More than two or three days and I would feel the thirst, and within hours, my body would begin to ache as the cravings grew stronger by the minute. During those first days, before I’d lined up my supplier, the most I’d made it was four days, and I could already feel the beginnings of my sanity fraying at the edges from the endless thirst and pain. I didn’t want to imagine how much worse it got from there. Two weeks would have been a living hell. A month was more than I even wanted to wrap my mind around.

“Is there any way we can help you? Make it seem like this wasn’t your fault?” I asked.

“Fault doesn’t really matter. They just have to punish someone when there’s a failure,” Lillian replied, clearing off the last of her eggs moments before the waiter came through the door with a fresh plate for her. “Make an example for the rest of the clan. The House of Turva hasn't exactly kept up with the times in terms of motivational strategies. Like I said, though, it's fine. Far from my first time dealing with this."

"Maybe that's true, but it's certainly not fine." I did some mental math, thinking through what I was trying to accomplish, and how much time I'd need. Probably weeks, if I were to do things properly. Though, if properly meant someone else being punished for my longshot idea, it seemed I would have to cut a few corners. "In three nights, when it's time to report back, I want you to tell them the truth. That I'm the vampire Petre is looking for, that my accounting service is just an accounting service, all of it."

"You're giving up on the joining a clan thing?" Lillian asked.

"Not quite yet. I've got a meeting tonight that might shed some light on the viability of it. Regardless, I won't let you take the punishment for helping us. If I can't make it work in time, then that's on me, not you. Go back to the Turvas as a successful infiltrator. That's the very least I can do to thank you for all of your help."

"Freddy," Krystal said softly, "you do remember that trying to join a clan is already really hard for an outsider, right? Even if it were doable, you'd probably need weeks to convince them to take you on, jumping through hoops to prove you were worth a slot."

"If it's already nearly impossible, then trying to do it in three days instead of a few weeks probably won't alter the odds that much," I told her. "Chances are we'll still end up on a jet to Boarback. I just want to see this through."

I realized that Lillian was the one who'd fallen into silence this time, examining me carefully from her spot at the other end of the breakfast table. She'd even stopped eating, and was just pointlessly poking her eggs with her fork as she mulled over my words.

"If that's really how you want it, Fredrick, then I'll give them the rundown in three nights. But if you change your mind before then, just let me know. I made the offer, and I meant it; I can buy you more time."

"I greatly appreciate the sentiment, but I'm afraid the price on that offer is simply too high." Chancing a look at my watch, I realized that with the sun setting, I'd need to head out soon to make my meeting. While there was plenty of time until ten, Charlotte Manor was located some ways from town, and getting through the ceremony and security at Richard's office always took longer than I expected. Even after all my visits, they were still wary of letting a vampire into the heart of a therian stronghold.

"Beg everyone's pardon, but if you'll excuse me, I need to go get ready to head out," I announced, rising from the table, my own food barely touched. Even Charlotte's cooking couldn't settle the case of nerves I was dealing with.

"Just let me finish off this plate and I'll be ready to go." Lillian bent down closer to the table, fork in prime egg-shoveling position.

“No need, take your time and enjoy the meal,” I advised her. “I’m going to have to leave you behind for this meeting.”

“That’s probably not going to fly,” Lillian said. “Remember, I’m supposed to be your new assistant, your shadow, following you at every turn. What do I tell Petre if one of the clan sees you out on the town without me?”

“The truth,” I replied. “That I was going to have a meeting with the King of the West. By now, they know enough about Gideon to be aware that he wouldn’t tolerate a tag-a-long in one of his meetings.”

“And if they ask how you’re able to meet with him despite the fact that vampires can’t handle their draconic aura?” Lillian pressed.

“Right . . . I forgot they knew about that.” With everything on my plate, it was getting hard to keep track of how well-informed my opponents were.

“We just moved to a town with an ancient dragon; it came up in conversation,” Lillian said. From across the table, I saw Krystal chuckle, and for a moment, I even thought I caught a smirk on Arch’s face.

“Tell them Freddy dealt with a proxy.” With her giggles dying down, Krystal had apparently decided to be helpful. “That’s how the dragons dealt with vampires in the old days; they had a representative come stand in their place and have the conversation via telepathy enchantments with the proxy. Nowadays, most just use Bluetooth and a cell phone, but the tradition remains for the rare times when a dragon meets with a vampire. And since the proxy is essentially the dragon, you’d still have to show it the same respect by not bringing an intern along.”

“Trainee,” Lillian corrected.

“Spy, if you want to be a dick about it,” Krystal shot back.

“Right then, let’s just say I dealt with a proxy.” Something told me that if I didn’t right the conversation to a more productive path quickly, it might spiral beyond saving. “Lillian, will that sell upstream?”

“Don’t see why not, though maybe it’s best if you just try not to get spotted by any other vampires,” she suggested. “The less I have to talk to Petre before it’s decision time, the better off you are.”

“Well, I’ve managed to spend most of my life slipping around unnoticed,” I said. “Maybe just this once, it can be an asset.”

“Personally, I think it’s the sweater vest. Who pays attention to someone wearing a sweater vest?” Though Krystal was the one to speak the words, it didn’t escape my notice as I left the dining room that everyone else at the table seemed to be nodding along in agreement.

3.

To my surprise, when I arrived at Richard's building, I wasn't shown up to his penthouse/throne room at the top like usual. Instead, I was frisked by therian security, who glared at me stonily while checking to ensure I hadn't brought any weapons with me. This pat-down was far less extensive than usual, I noticed, probably because while a firearm might be an issue for Richard, all it would do to Gideon was annoy. When security was finally done, I was taken up a different elevator than the one I normally used, to a floor that looked familiar—though all the generic office floors seemed that way. I was escorted down a hallway, coming to an office near a corner, and I suddenly realized exactly where I was before the door had even opened.

This was the room where Gideon had been held captive several months earlier. Where Bubba, Amy, and I had hunted him down, breaking into the magical cage while therians from another tribe slammed on the door, trying to kill us before we could free him. Even if I hadn't been able to place the dull gray carpet and open layout, I certainly recognized the broken remains of the cube where Gideon had been trapped. They were there, just as I'd last seen them when fleeing the building. All that was different was that now a desk and a few chairs were set up in front of the twisted metallic remnants of a trap strong enough to ensnare a dragon.

Sitting behind the desk, drawing in a coloring book, was Gideon, whose child-like appearance belied the tremendous power and knowledge resting inside him. The door whispered shut behind me, and I realized that the therians had left me alone in the room. Not even they liked to be around Gideon any more than was strictly necessary. Since I didn't have the luxury of fleeing, I decided to say something and start things off. Given how nervous I was, I hardly think I can be blamed for grasping the easiest conversational option available.

"I thought you'd have cleared that out by now." I nodded to the massive remains of his cage, as if he didn't know what I was talking about already.

Setting down his crayon, Gideon looked up from the coloring book with a stare meant to scrutinize. It was unsettling to see on a child's face, though I was slowly getting used to that effect when dealing with Gideon. It beat his aura any day of the year.

"Interesting." Slowly, Gideon hopped off the chair, raised to its highest so he could see over the desk, and approached me. Every step was tentative, as if he thought I might bolt should he move too fast. Eventually, he got within a few feet, close enough that I could reach out and rumple his hair, were I so suicidally inclined. “This has already proven to be a fascinating meeting. I wasn’t sure you’d be able to withstand my aura anymore.”

“Why wouldn’t I? You gave me your blood,” I reminded him.

“Indeed, and far more than a drop on that night.” He gestured absentmindedly to the cage’s remains, never taking his eyes off me. “But from the reports I received, all that power had been used up, burned through in my escape. The effects of such gifts are temporary, as you must know by now. Even the drop I gave you would never have lasted so long, were you the sort to actually use your abilities. When the draconic power in your veins is tapped out, so too should go your immunity to my aura. Yet here you stand, unbothered by my presence.”

“I do still find you very intimidating,” I said, not sure if I was trying to reassure Gideon that I was still meek and cowardly or that he had more than enough mojo to be terrifying.

“That is because you are a being of logic,” Gideon replied. “Of course you fear what is stronger. Nonetheless, this makes for a fascinating study. Never has a blood-eater tasted so much of a dragon before—at least, not a dragon of my power—nor have they been used to wield their magic. It seems there are some lingering aftereffects, aside from just the ability to dine with proper silver.”

“You knew about that?”

Gideon turned and walked back to his desk, motioning for me to follow. “You saved me that night, Fred. Not my life, no, but certainly my pride. And, more importantly, perhaps you even aided Sally by freeing me. True, I am not the kindest or most cuddly of creatures in the world, yet even I see fit to look in on those who have done me a good turn. I even agree to take their meetings, if I’m curious enough.”

“And I appreciate that,” I said, taking a seat in one of the open chairs in front of the desk. Again, my gaze slipped to the cage, and I could see Gideon’s violet eyes tracking my own.

“I keep it here to remind anyone I meet with how futile it is to try and go against me,” Gideon said, offering the explanation to my opening question. “Almost none know of your part in my escape that night, which makes it all the easier to build my reputation. Defeating another elder dragon’s carefully constructed trap is no small feat, and the name of Gideon has only grown more feared since I accomplished it.”

“Do you really need intimidation tactics? I mean . . . you’re you.” That was, sadly, the best way I could think to phrase my thoughts in the moment. I didn’t want to fall over myself and gush; besides, we both knew I’d seen how deep his well of power went. The idea of using intimidation tricks felt like ridiculous overkill.

“Strong as I am, there are others out there who are my equal, if not my better,” Gideon said. “Though these methods are not for them. Should we ever clash, the very landscape of the Earth would be changed, which is why we all tend to avoid each other as much as possible. No, I keep it here for the smaller threats, the nuisances. So many that would waste my time and their lives never do, simply because I show them the futility of such actions. Power is useful, Fred, never doubt that, but far more useful is the perception of power. I’ve lived a very long time, and I can say with certainty that the easiest fights to win are those that never start.”

Since Gideon had just offered me the perfect segue, I hurriedly leapt for it, determined to make the most of my time with him. Curiosity had gotten me in the door; there was no telling how long it would keep me there.

“It’s interesting that you bring that up, because I asked to meet you for essentially that purpose. I’m sure you know about the arrival of the House of Turva in Winslow—”

Gideon’s mouth pinched into a visible sneer, so I raced forward before he could cut me off.

“—and they’ve become interested in me as either a subject or a rival. Since I’m an abandoned vampire, there are many ways for them to come at me through the treaties, so I thought it would be worthwhile to look into joining a clan of my own. But no one knows a lot about them and their inner workings, except perhaps you, so I came here seeking counsel about what you knew of the various clans.”

The sneer had faded as I got further along, turning back to the same scrutinizing expression I’d seen when first walking in. He was searching me for something; though, what it was, I had no idea.

“Fred, do you believe that you and I are equal?”

“Absolutely not, sir.” My eyes widened, and I momentarily faced the very serious possibility that this might be my last few seconds of life, undead or otherwise. Offending a dragon like Gideon was not the sort of thing many lived to tell about. “I am keenly aware of how much more powerful and important you are, and I’m so sorry for wasting your time with my request. It was a move of pure desperation, and—”

“I think, perhaps, that something was lost in translation here.” Gideon was still calm, which wasn’t as reassuring as it should have been. I had no doubt he could kill me without any emotional fluctuation whatsoever; the only thing I’d ever seen rile Gideon up was Sally’s safety being threatened. But he also hadn’t made any aggressive movements, and that was somewhat more heartening. “What I mean is, do you believe we are equal for the turn you did for me in this very room? That my debt to you is paid in full?”

“Oh . . . then yes, I do. Our bargain was fulfilled. You asked for freedom, and I asked you to save my friends. We both honored the agreement, so I didn’t think there was any debt between us.”

Gideon's eyes, for the first time since I'd met him, fell a few inches toward the ground, almost like he was a bit embarrassed by something. "You are incorrect, both on what I swore and on the topic of our equality. Though I accepted it in the heat of the moment due to limited time, the truth is that, that deal was not a fair one. I asked more than I gave, and while dracolings may take pleasure in such slights, we dragons hold ourselves to a higher code. Stealing, pillaging, ransacking, all of that is fair game, but in our bargains, we always seek to find equilibrium. There is still some debt between us, Fred, and that is the real reason why I took your meeting. I despise inequality, and I would like to remedy it as quickly as possible. So then, would you like me to take care of your problem?"

"That's why I came here," I said, no doubt visibly relieved. Gideon wanted to pay me back and I wanted to pump him for information, so this would work great for both of us.

"No, you came here for a temporary measure that would only incur more trouble for you. I'm not offering to tell you about the blood-eater clans. I'm offering to solve your problem. These creatures stepped foot in my town, and no doubt, they are scheming all manner of mischief. It will be little more than a slap on the wrist for me if I wipe them out."

And that was when I finally realized what Gideon was actually offering. He would purge the entire House of Turva, kill every last one of them, just because he felt some debt to me. That was possibly the most terrifying prospect I'd ever heard, all the more so because I knew too well just how easily Gideon could do it. One word from me and by the morning sunrise, there would be no issues. No House of Turva. Likely, no other vampires would come to Winslow for a century or so after such a display. And, ashamed as I am to admit it, there was a fleeting moment where I wanted to let him do it. Take away all the fear, and worry, and stress these invaders had caused. Mercifully, it lasted no longer than a moment before reality came crashing back in. Even if I believed that this would really be the end of it—which I didn't—the guilt I'd feel over all those lives would utterly dwarf whatever issue I was dealing with currently.

"I'm grateful for the offer, really I am, but I think that might be a touch extreme. I'm sure the House of Turva has plenty of good people in it who don't deserve to die just because I was scared. Besides, there are only so many vampire clans, right? The Agency is bound to be a little miffed if you wipe one off the map," I said.

"It would get replaced eventually; every half-century or so, one ballsy blood-eater founds a new clan that actually manages to stick around. But it is not my place to dictate how I repay my debt," Gideon said. "If information is what you want, then I'll give it. Just know that this does not fully settle things between us. Perhaps you'd care for another few drops of blood?"

“Thanks, but no thanks. Your power is way too potent for me to handle. I kept snapping things in half for a week last time I got a drop.” I hadn’t meant it as a joke, but I caught sight of Gideon snickering anyway.

“Very well, then just information for now. Though I doubt it will give you what you need, I shall tell you all I can remember of the various blood-eater clans dotting this county’s landscape,” Gideon said.

I yanked out a pen and pad of paper from my briefcase as Gideon started talking, jotting down every detail I could as quickly as he laid them out. There would be more questions later, when I knew enough to have an idea of what to ask about, but for the moment, I was content with simply absorbing a small bit of the ancient dragon’s expansive memory.

4.

“Twenty-eight active vampire clans in America, four of which were founded after the actual creation of the country and treaties. Of those, twelve have some pretty repugnant ideas about humanity as a whole and are kept in check only by the laws, which rules them out right off the bat. Two are pro human and vampire relations, but have a lot of bad history with therians. Three are openly about vampire superiority over other parahumans. And the other eleven are either too secretive or small to make waves in any direction, though there’s always a bit of scuttlebutt around them.”

I finished running down the list, pages of more detailed notes summarized into these simple bullet points. I’d spent all night and halfway through the morning talking to Gideon, cooped up in that windowless office as he went through exhaustive explanations of every vampire clan he could remember. It had been a disheartening affair, yet I pressed on regardless, sure that it would be the next clan he mentioned that would finally fit my needs. Eventually, he ran out of things to share, and I had Krystal come pick me up, since her truck was fitted with enchanted windows to block out the sunshine. Back at Charlotte Manor, I’d taken a big meal and spent hours reviewing the notes, looking for something, anything that I’d managed to miss.

“To be fair to all the respective houses of vampires out there, it looks like the core of Gideon’s knowledge came from when the treaties were being drawn up, and that was over two hundred years ago,” Krystal said. “There were a lot of unpopular opinions held by humans back then too, which have changed with the times. I’m sure some of these have grown at least a little.”

“Enough to where it’s safe to petition them for membership?” I asked.

“Oh hell no, are you kidding me? Jumping in bed with a clan you know next to nothing about is freaking crazy. Even if they’d make room in the quota for you.” Krystal, unlike me, was still eating, having decided that since she might be leaving Charlotte for some time, it was a good excuse to avail herself of as much cooking as possible. Currently, she was working on a half-devoured piece of chocolate pie, though I had no doubt it would fully vanish within the next few minutes.

“Right, the quota. You and Arch mentioned that last night. What’s the deal with quotas?” Even as I asked, I remembered another term they’d used, one which stuck in my head. “And for that matter, what does ‘conversion rate issue’ mean?”

Krystal set the fork she had partially raised to the side of her plate, my first clue that I’d touched on something more serious than I realized. “Quotas are straightforward. The treaty limits how many vampires a clan is allowed to have at any given time. This is based mostly on how long a clan has existed, though it does cap out at a certain point. It's part of how we ensure that the need for blood never outpaces the supply. Conversion rate . . . well, that's the reason vampires didn't manage to take over the world before the treaties. The truth is, being turned into a vampire is far from a foolproof thing. Of the humans that vampires attempt to turn, a shockingly small amount actually make it over."

"Do I want to know?"

"Since actually testing it clinically would require killing a lot of people, the Agency has never done formal research, but based on what we've learned from the older clans, our best guesses put it at a little less than one in every ten," Krystal told me. "No one knows what makes the difference; it goes across all genetic markers that we can find, and seems to hit male and female equally. Just a lottery that gets played with someone's life on the line."

"Wait . . . that can't be accurate." Already my memory was whirling, back to when Lillian had told us a small bit of her history with the House of Turva. "Lillian said she was turned just to seduce some politician. Why would they do that if there was a good chance she'd die?"

"Because they didn't care." Krystal's tone was so blunt it could have fallen from her mouth and cracked a wineglass. "Vampires are allowed to try and turn a certain amount of people each year—that's how they reproduce, so it was well worked into the treaties—but that comes with knowing about the failure rate. And back then, things were messier, less organized, so not everyone kept to their numbers like they should have."

I sat in silence for a long moment, staring at my stack of notes, waiting for some solution to pop out at me. "Just when I think I couldn't possibly want to be affiliated with these people less, I learn more about them, and suddenly, it's all I can do not to run screaming into the night."

To her immeasurable credit, Krystal resisted the urge to say that she'd told me so, picking up her fork and turning her attention back to the pie instead. I let her eat as I perused the notes, slowly realizing with each turned page that my hopes were growing dimmer. Logically, my best bets were the four newer clans, formed after the treaty, but if membership was limited by seniority, then my odds of getting in with them were all the slimmer. Not to mention, I was assuming they would be more akin to my way of thinking, since they were newer, but I also had the smallest amount of information about them, which increased the risk of me choosing poor allies.

"What's the quota for new clans?" I asked. It was a pointless question that would lead nowhere, yet I asked it all the same. Some part of me, it seemed, was determined to examine every avenue of this idea, regardless of how fruitless I already knew it to be.

“Not a hundred percent sure,” Krystal said. “I’m pretty sure it’s ten to start, then ramps up for the first few decades, and after a century, the rate slows down a lot. You can always check the books, though. That would definitely be in them.”

She had me there. I was just being lazy with my desperation. Slipping my laptop out of my briefcase, I woke it from hibernation mode and pulled up one of several saved PDFs on the hard drive. Though Charlotte Manor now had excellent Wi-Fi, I’d been left without signal one too many times not to keep these tomes saved locally. To a layman, these documents merely looked like material for the most boring role-playing game on earth. Spells, Swords, & Stealth: Modern Justice was ostensibly a court-like tabletop game notorious for its insanely complex rules about parahumans living in the modern world. In truth, it was the actual bible of treaties, laws, and revisions which governed the parahuman part of our country. Hidden in plain sight, where anyone was free to see it, in what I always considered to be one of the Agency’s more cunning moves.

Though I usually occupied myself with the books regarding accounting law, a close call—in fact, one inside Charlotte Manor—had shown that it was worthwhile to keep all of the books on hand, just in case. After a few wrong files and a quick search, I finally found what I was looking for. The actual laws about founding new clans were surprisingly lean, and it took no time to skim down and find the information about quotas.

“Looks like new clans get capped at ten parahumans—wait, that can’t be right. It should say ‘vampires.’”

“They tried to keep the language as generic as possible, just in case we ever hit a snag,” Krystal explained. “There have been a few vampire offshoots over the centuries—mages experimenting and creating things that were close, but not quite, vampires. Since ‘parahuman’ is a word that covers everything, most of the treaty uses it wherever possible, just in case we get some surprises down the line.”

“That is an impressive amount of foresight,” I said. “Anyway, they get ten spots at their founding, then they get another five slots after twenty-five years, another five at fifty, then five more at seventy-five years, and one last group of five at a hundred. From there, they gain ten new slots every fifty years for the next two centuries, and then ten every hundred for a millennia.” My brain quickly did the math before I even noticed I was adding the numbers up. “So, the most any clan can have is a hundred and seventy vampires?”

“Sounds about right,” Krystal confirmed. “Though, of course, we’ve got the clanless ones to account for too, like those in the Agency, or abandoned ones like you. Still, you can see how precious those slots are, especially for the younger houses.”

“No kidding. A clan with only ten vampires would be crushed by the ones with a full roster,” I said.

“There are some checks and balances for two houses dealing with one another, but yeah, not many of those last too long,” Krystal confirmed. “Starting a new clan generally means you either have real ass-kickers with a lot of connections and mojo, or you’re aligned with someone powerful enough to give you protection.”

“Seems to be the case.” I read through the document again, noting that although the limits on how big a clan could get were well defined, down to the parahuman, actually starting one was relatively easy. A new idea, built on the ashes of my old one, started to bloom. This was insane, obviously. Completely so. Even worse than my first idea. But . . . it couldn’t hurt to do a little research. Could it?

“If Lillian wakes up, let her know I’m on the phone,” I said, rising from the table.

“Calling the Sheriff to tell him we’re heading down?” Krystal asked.

“Not quite yet.” My fingers were already flipping through my phonebook as I sought out the familiar name of an old friend. “First, I need to talk to a lawyer.”

5.

**Note: As I was not present for what occurred next (I was busy in a meeting with Asha to further my own plans), I must allow another to momentarily take up the tale. In this case, Charlotte was chosen, as she has both an excellent memory and a knack for seeing more than most.****

Strictly speaking, it is not the place of a house to interfere. We exist to offer shelter from the storm, warmth from the cold, and a sense of security to those staying within our walls. That is the philosophy of all proper houses, even if some aren't as keenly aware of it as I. And that is the directive I was created with, when those mages empowered and enlightened me all those decades ago. So I said nothing as they drove themselves deeper into madness and greed, courting an inevitable death at the hands of angry agents. I merely did my duty, filling their bellies with food and wine, keeping the beds neatly made, and stopping any who might intrude.

Then the agents came, with cunning plans and stronger magic. And I sat alone for a very long time, ensnaring any stray guest I could just for a small semblance of company, something that could remind me of when I'd been more than just a house, I'd been a home. It was a lonely stretch that I can scarcely look back on without my windows growing foggy. But on the day when someone proposed my very destruction—what should have been the worst, possibly even final, evening of my life—salvation arrived. Fred protected me, gave me the rights to my own property, and for that alone, I was grateful. But then he went and did something I'd long given up hope of ever feeling again: he gave me purpose. First Arch, then Krystal, and, bit-by-bit, laughter and conversation filled my empty halls for the first time in so long I could barely withstand it, I was so happy. There was a reason to burn the candles again, as he and his friends routinely came for dinner or lodging.

It is not the place of a proper house to interfere. But I am not just any house, and I have had my rooms emptied before. That is not something I wanted to experience ever again. So perhaps that is why, when Fred ran out the door with Lillian in tow and Krystal called my name, I came to her, ready. That shrewd look on her face left no doubt of what she would want from me, and despite all the notions of decorum and privacy I knew I should maintain, I put up no resistance as she asked for it. I materialized in the form they thought of as the real me, a lovely young woman in a gown I'd seen and fancied on one of my residents. It was as good a form as any, and I somewhat enjoyed the sense of familiarity in her eyes as I appeared at her summons.

True to form, she wasted no time in getting down to business.

“What was Fred talking to his lawyer about?”

“Based on what I could overhear, it seems he’s decided to take a new approach. Rather than just joining an existing clan, I believe he intends to found one of his own.” Though I couldn’t make out Asha’s words through the small phone—so much tinier than the rotary versions we once possessed—Fred had been the one doing most of the explaining.

Krystal sucked in a sharp breath through her teeth and let it out as an equally sharp whistle. “Fuck me, that’s what I was afraid of. He had that look in his eye, you know? The one where he thinks he’s cracked the problem. I was hoping it meant he’d given up, but with what he just finished reading . . . shit. Shitty shit, shit, shit. This isn’t good.”

“It does seem like it would remedy the issue, does it not?” I’d dealt mainly with mages and elderly couples between my creation and bed-and-breakfast days, so vampire society was not something I had extensive knowledge of.

“Only in the most technical of senses. A clan with one member is no better than an abandoned vampire in practicality. He’s far from the first of his kind to get this idea, and there’s a reason so few new clans survive. There are plenty of ways within the treaties for the houses to squabble with each other.” She stared down at the empty plate in front of her, and for a moment, I considered having another part of me bring out more pie. I hesitated, though, as Krystal was generally one to make it clear when she wanted something.

“There’s probably no stopping him, either. When he gets these ideas, it’s like all the smart parts of his brain just shut down.” Krystal reached into her pocket and yanked out her own phone, thumb racing across the flashing screen. “Charlotte, I hate to impose, but would you mind putting together some dinner and coffee? You’re going to get an influx of guests in the next hour, and I’d like to soften them up with some good food, at the very least.”

“Of course. Let me know when you’re ready for the meal to be served.” I vanished then, though that was merely for her benefit. Though they rationally knew that I was everywhere at once within these walls, the act of seeing some specter or other tends to unnerve people. Perhaps they felt they weren’t being watched if they couldn’t see the eyes. Not that they had anything to worry about; a proper house knows the value of silence and decorum. With forgivable exceptions where the safety of one’s guests are involved.

Over the next hour, I opened my doors several times to many familiar faces. Neil and Albert were the first to arrive, the latter courteously wiping off his shoes and urging the former to do the same. Then came Amy, who stared up at me as she entered, no doubt examining the spell work that wove through every beam and stud of my being. Bubba was next, and along with him, I was surprised to see the massive Richard ducking down to fit through my door frame. I wondered if I had any rooms big enough to accommodate him, should the meeting run long, and then resolved to fix that lack of hospitality as soon as possible. Arch made his way down from his room eventually, having finished the paperwork he'd been dealing with for several hours.

With the last of the guests present, I began serving the soup course, as Krystal brought everyone up to speed on Fred's predicament. Most knew the basics, but between clarifying questions and recaps, I was putting down the fish course before she was done telling them about the latest twist, that it seemed Fred was trying to form his own vampire clan.

"Well, that's surprisingly stupid," Arch noted, as one of my waiter selves filled up his water glass. A cigarette was being rolled between his fingers as usual, but though I kept watch, I never caught him breaking our lease agreement. Once I had the time, I was hoping to add a smoking lounge for those with small nicotine sticks or old-fashioned pipes like my creators had smoked.

"I'm sure he thinks he's got some angle on it; Fred's rarely one to overestimate himself," Krystal snapped defensively. "But, this time, he's biting off more than he can chew. If he tries to meet the House of Turva on even ground, they'll tear him apart. Worse, they'll see it as a sign of aggression, and that makes our plan to disappear more complicated."

"Sheriff Thorgood can more than handle one clan of vampires," Bubba pointed out.

"True, but he shares the same weakness we do—come through the treaties, and he may have to back down," Arch countered.

"If you think Leeroy Thorgood is backing down from anyone trying to hurt his residents, you don't know him that well," Krystal said. "No, my concern is that eventually Fred will want to leave Boarback. Maybe for a trip; maybe for somewhere new to live. Whatever it might be, if Fred creates a grudge between himself and the House of Turva, then they'll lie in wait until opportunity strikes. Boarback is supposed to be our refuge, not our prison."

Slowly, Albert raised his hand in the air, waiting to be called on. Eventually, Krystal noticed and gave him a small nod. "Maybe he won't be able to pull it off so soon. If I've learned anything working for Fred, it's that paperwork can take a long time to go through. You said he has only two nights left, so time might fix the problem for us."

"Much I wish I could believe that, having seen Asha and Fred work together up close, I've got no doubt in my bones that they'll find a loophole or expedition clause or somethin'. Nobody knows paperwork like those two," Bubba said, shaking his head gently.

"I could petition to block it, since he'd be founding in my town," Richard volunteered. "That might slow them down enough to force the issue. I hate to do it, but if it's for Fred's own good, then it would be the right call."

Krystal drummed her hands on the table, considering the proposal. "Too risky,” she said at last. “Even if you can block him, the Turvas might still find out he tried to form a clan. At that point, he’s in just as much shit, but without even the thin veneer of being part of a clan to protect him.”

“It is possible to render the discussion moot.” Neil had been uncharacteristically silent as he listened to the issue’s discussion, his eyes glancing over to Albert on occasion, and Amy more frequently. “Fred and I haven’t always gotten along well, but I don’t want to see him killed. So, what if I were to bind him like that night at the LARP? Grab him as soon as he comes back in, leave him catatonic, and then put him on a plane.”

“I don’t think Fred would care much for that,” Amy told him.

“Oh, no question about it, he’d likely despise whoever did it to him, which is why I volunteered,” Neil said. “We’re already on poor terms; it doesn’t really matter as much if Fred hates me. I can even pull it off alone, so that the rest of you have deniability.”

Though I said nothing, Neil’s plan did seem to have some merit to me. It kept Fred safe, minimized risk, and kept the backlash limited to one person. Those thoughts stayed with me as I cleared plates and readied the steak, however. It was not my place to intrude.

“I am not proud of how tempting that offer sounds.” Krystal pushed her empty fish plate away and reached down, pulling up a thin device that I’d learned was a tablet, which essentially seemed like a big version of those new phones, except that it didn’t make any calls. “The truth is, I do have something of an idea on how to help Fred. Not to stop his gambit, to make it actually work. But, and this is the part that I know makes me a shitty person, I can’t be a part of it. I have to ask something huge of you all, while I can’t do the same.” She pressed a button on the side and the tablet’s screen began to glow as my waiters made their way to the back.

“Charlotte, can you send one of the staff over here or just show up yourself?” Krystal called, looking around the ceiling like I was going to suddenly pop out. “This concerns you, too.”

My dress-clad form appeared near her, ready to serve my guests as always. “What can I do for you?”

“Pull up or create a chair, I guess.” Krystal tapped her screen gently. “I want to get your feedback on the plan, even if you don’t choose to join in.”

My form shuffled uncomfortably, a bit of my feelings accidentally leaking through. “Respectfully, I’m not one to usually give feedback. I make contracts with guests and fulfill them. I keep my residents safe and comfortable. That is the duty of a house.”

“Well, this time, I’m going to ask you to make a choice,” Krystal replied. “This won’t be a request, or a contract, or any of that. But depending on how things go, this might change a lot of stuff. For you, and for your current guests. You deserve the right to have some say in it.”

I said nothing, merely nodding slowly while, in the kitchen, my waiter selves materialized food. I should have been in there, shapelessly watching over them, not out here dealing with matters that I likely had no real right to involve myself in. A proper house was silent, stoic, and took no action in its residents' lives.

But, as I was slowly discovering, I was not such a proper house as I might once have thought myself. And if it meant my halls were not forcibly emptied again, I could find a way to deal with that. So I sat and listened as Krystal outlined her idea, which seemed, by all accounts, just as—if not more—crazy than Fred's. I didn't say that at the time, of course.

After all, that would have been impolite. Besides which, I was far too busy falling in love with the half-mad idea.

6.

**Note: As this chapter starts after both my own meeting and the one I was, at the time, unaware of, I will resume the telling from this point. Suffice it to say that unless you have a deep and abiding fascination for the complexities of paperwork, there is little being skipped over that would be worth recounting. ****

Lillian and I made it back to Charlotte Manor less than an hour before sunrise, having pushed our time with Asha to the utmost limit. The hours flew by as she and I worked to make something impossible into a reality, all while Lillian pitched in with her experience from being part of a clan. We made our way in through the door hurriedly, noting that the sky was already growing light, only to find the elderly version of Charlotte—the one I considered the greeter—waiting for us.

“Hello, Fred, Lillian. Can I prepare anything for you?”

“I wouldn’t say no to some steak and coffee,” Lillian replied, without a moment’s consideration. “After watching Fred and his lawyer go through paperwork all night, it’s going to take a little caffeine to keep me perky past sunrise.”

“I’m on it. And for you, Fred?”

“Some light fish, if you have it,” I told her. “And wine. I’d very much like a nice glass of red. Are Krystal and Arch around?”

Charlotte shook her head, her hair not swaying in the slightest as she did. “They were both called away shortly before you arrived. Neither offered their destination, and I find it best not to pry into the business of agents.”

“Can’t say I disagree with that policy.” Lillian let out a long yawn and stretched, putting her arms overhead like a pale cat reaching for the ceiling. It was a gesture I’d grown quite used to during the past several hours, as she’d had no qualms about demonstrating how bored she was while Asha and I poured through stacks of laws and documents. That said, her help had also been invaluable, as the only one among us with practical knowledge of vampire clans.

The old woman lifted an ancient phone, ostensibly to put a call into the kitchen, and I knew that the moment we sat down in the dining room, dinner would be served. I tried very hard not to think of it as a last meal while Lillian and I made our way down the hallway. It wasn’t, after all, even by the most pessimistic of standards. There was still one more meal to eat, regardless of how things played out afterward. It would be, without question, the most uncomfortable dinner party I'd ever hosted, but by necessity, there would be food. What came after that, however, was completely up in the air. I'd done my very best, and chosen to take a gamble that at least had the potential to see me through.

While Charlotte's waiters brought out our drinks and dishes, I found myself wishing Krystal was there. There hadn't been time to consult her while Asha and I tried to determine what was even possible, and then how to accomplish it, but now that things were settled, I'd have preferred to get her up to speed. True, most of the dice were already cast, though a few could perhaps still be altered with a fast enough call to Asha. Honestly, though—and I feel awful admitting this—part of me was also glad that Krystal had been called away. Despite it being my best odds for survival, I knew she wouldn't entirely agree with the path I'd taken. When it mattered, she would support me, just as I would her, but that didn't mean I wouldn't get a long chewing out when everything was on the table.

For the moment, at least, the only table I had to concern myself with was Charlotte's, and that one was currently hosting our entrees, along with a cavalcade of sides neither of us had shown the presence of mind to request.

"You know, even with this place being haunted, the service is freaking incredible," Lillian commented, as she dug heartily into her rare steak. The need for blood in her beef wasn't vampiric in origin; Lillian simply appreciated a quality meat cooked only enough to add flavor, not steal it away.

"Charlotte Manor is the best kept secret in Winslow," I said, knowing full well that Charlotte was listening. "My only complaint is that the prices are too low. For food and service this excellent, I really wish she would charge a fair amount."

"Money is useful, but it's not the goal of our establishment," one of the waiters, usually silent as a church at midnight, said politely as he topped off my wine glass. "We see our rewards in other ways."

Which was the same argument Charlotte had used before when I encouraged her to increase her prices. It was a long-running discussion we'd had many times since I took up the role of her business manager. One day, I hoped to break through to her, but she could be surprisingly stubborn on certain issues. Then again, houses weren't exactly known for being easy on the budget, so perhaps I was at fault for being surprised she had dug in so hard.

"Would you please let everyone know that there will be a dinner party tonight?" I told the waiter. At this point, keeping Lillian in the dark about Charlotte's true nature was a matter of time rather than secret-keeping—the explanation just took too long. "We'll invite guests to join us at eleven, so please have refreshments on hand for . . . ?" I stopped, looking across the table to Lillian, who began doing quick math on her fingers.

“For a meeting like this, Petre will come, and he’ll want to bring some muscle under the guise that they’re assistants and lawyers, but he won’t want to seem like he’s walking in ready for war, just in case. With Petre included, no more than four would be my guess. Add in you and me, that makes six. Then there’s Krystal—”

“No more than six,” I told the waiter. “Much as I would like to have her around, I’m almost certain that bringing an agent to a meeting like this comes with all manner of implications. Krystal is my girlfriend, but she is also her job. It’s not my place to drag her into this situation. Plus, having an agent at the meeting would be a bit like showing up at a negotiation and setting a loaded handgun on the table. It lends an air of inauthenticity to any advocacy of peace.”

“Not even going to invite your other friends?” Lillian asked.

I picked at my fish, moving my fork slowly from side to side. “More of the same. It pulls them into a problem that isn’t theirs. Like I said before, my friends aren’t assets, and I won’t treat them that way.”

“Then you better really hope this gambit goes well,” Lillian replied. “It’s a new one, I’ll give you that, but Petre doesn’t usually care for surprises. For what it’s worth, I’m pulling for you, even if I won’t be able to actually help if it all turns to shit. It probably won’t, though. Petre prefers to be more methodical than just murdering someone at dinner.”

“Thank you. It’s worth quite a bit, actually. I never would have made it this far without your help.” Lifting my glass, I exchanged a brief clink with Lillian’s coffee cup. It was strange, knowing that someone I was quickly growing to consider a friend would stand idly by if I was being torn to shreds, but I understood. My research into the world of clans had done nothing if not show me just how dangerous vampire society could be. I’d barely managed on my own for a few years, and that was only through the help of my amazing friends. To face that world completely alone, without any sort of aid or clan backing her, would be akin to a death sentence.

“So, just to be clear, you’re sure you want me to put in the call during the day?” Lillian asked. “If we wait until nighttime, Petre can still make it over easily. During the day, though, there’s the slim chance that he might hire some non-vampire goons to come try and solve the problem.”

“Despite the quaint looks, Charlotte Manor is extremely difficult to break into,” I assured her. “And it’s a small risk. I’m just asking for a meeting, after all. Petre seems like the business-minded type. I think he’ll want to show up and see what I’m offering before he decides to try and kill me.”

Since the time for Lillian to check-in was almost at hand, we’d decided that she should come clean about what she’d uncovered. Today, while the sun hung overhead, she was going to call in and report all about how she’d realized I was the vampire from the rumors, though the rumors had been exceedingly misleading. She'd also let Petre know that I was requesting a formal meeting with the House of Turva, though I ostensibly wouldn't tell her the exact details of what it concerned. At that meeting, I would lay everything out for Petre. If it worked—which I was pinning all my hopes on the prayer that it would—the night would end peacefully and I'd be able to remain in Winslow.

If I failed, then I might get killed, and even assuming I survived, running would be the only recourse left. Albeit, not in the way that Krystal had initially proposed.

Lillian finished off her meal and coffee, and then rose from the table. "All right, I'm going to go try and yank all the paperwork discussion out of my head before making the call. If anything goes off-plan, I'll knock on your door and let you know."

"I'd greatly appreciate that." As Lillian left the dining room, I polished off the remainder of my fish and picked up the wine. Though the sun would be rising soon, and I should get as much rest as possible for the coming night ahead, I found myself with no inclination to close my eyes just yet.

Charlotte emerged from the dining room in the form I considered to be her true one, even though it was no more real than the waiters she had scuttling about. Moving delicately, she took a seat at the head of the dining table and turned her attention to me. "Going to bed?"

"Not quite ready," I told her. "I think I'll try to wait for Krystal to get back."

"She might be gone for some time," Charlotte cautioned me.

"That's all right. I have almost nothing else to do. All the pieces are in motion now; until tonight, I have no real part to play. Oh, except . . ." I reached down for my briefcase, popped it open, and pulled a business card from its depths. Sliding it across the table, I waited until Charlotte had picked it up to continue.

"In the event of my death, whenever that may come, I've made arrangements for Asha to manage your business until such time as a suitable replacement is found. She would come by to explain everything if the occasion arose, but I felt like you should hear it from me, just so you knew she was on the up-and-up. You can trust her."

"Didn't I hold this woman hostage and threaten to kill her?" Charlotte asked.

"Water under the bridge. Well, mostly under, anyway. Regardless, she agreed to take on the responsibility, and that means she'll see it through," I assured Charlotte.

"Thank you." In a motion, the card vanished, though I had no doubt it was tucked away safely somewhere inside the expansive estate. "You didn't need to worry about me, you know. There's already a lot on your plate."

“It’s really nothing, something I should have gotten done ages ago. Most of my clients can find new accountants, but I’d be doing you a disservice if I left you in the lurch.” I took a long drink from my wine, and behind Charlotte, a waiter appeared with a fresh glass in hand.

“Please do your best to survive this dinner party,” Charlotte told me. “I’ve got no desire to get accustomed to working with someone new. Plus, cleaning all the blood off my floor would be a real pain, even for me.”

“Have no fear, I plan on doing everything I can to survive the night.”

That seemed to satisfy her, and we sat in silence for some while afterward. I went through three more glasses of wine while I waited for Krystal to come bursting through the door, yelling about some out of control parahuman she and Arch had brought down. She would be loud, and messy, and total chaos, and I wanted to see her like that again. Just once more, before it all came to a head.

Eventually though, I gave up, heading upstairs and climbing into bed alone.

7.

The paperwork was sitting on the bed, messengered over midway through the day. The dinner was being prepped, not that most of the diners would be touching it, and the clock was ticking down, with less than half an hour left until my guests arrived. And yet, I was stuck, fumbling with a tie I'd knotted countless times, my fingers so dumb with nerves that I couldn't manage to get the cursed thing properly around my neck. All I could think of was the impending meeting, the clan of vampires on their way to Charlotte Manor, and with every passing second, my longshot seemed less and less likely to succeed. It was like my hands knew it, and were purposely refusing to finish the knot, keeping me from going downstairs and facing my own execution squad.

At least the rest of my suit was pressed and ready; the delivery service Asha recommended had really been top-notch. I didn't own a lot of suits; they were mostly used when I went to formal occasions or courted more professional clients. Still, like any good entrepreneur, I had a few, and I'd been wearing ties for the vast majority of my adult life, which made it all the more frustrating as I sat in the bedroom, still alone after a day of waiting, trying to figure out where I kept going wrong.

"Someone is feeling fancy tonight."

I jerked my head around. In my preoccupation with the tie, I hadn't even noticed the door slip open, let alone the familiar face it had revealed. Krystal stood there, in the same clothes I'd last seen her in, bloodshot eyes betraying the fact that her assignment had kept her up all day. I didn't care in the slightest as I rushed forward and embraced her. Deep down, I'd begun to grow truly afraid that I might not get to see her again before the dinner. While I didn't actually think Petre would kill me outright this evening, it was a risk, and if it happened, then my greatest regret—aside from getting murdered—would have been not getting to tell Krystal goodbye.

"Yeah, I missed you, too," she said, from deep within my tight hug. "Sorry, day's activities took a lot longer than I thought they would."

"It's more than fine." Pulling her through the door, I closed it, and then allowed our bodies to part. Much as I wanted to hold her, getting her up to speed was the first priority. "There's so much to tell you, and not much time to do it. Firstly, the House of Turva is sending—"

"Petre, who Lillian told all about you, and you boys are having a formal sit-down to discuss the new situation." Krystal grinned—that wildcat smile that spoke of danger and secrets not yet seen. "Who do you think you're dating? I've got my ear to the ground about everything that even thinks it might have fangs right now. And yes, that includes your Hail Mary with Asha, too. I'm fucking air, Freddy. I'm everywhere."

"So . . . you already know everything?" I plopped onto the bed, a sudden rush of anxiety leaving my body. I'd been bracing for this all day, nearly as much as the meeting itself, and she'd already found out everything on her own.

"You, my little overreaching boyfriend, decided to found your own vampire clan. Thanks to a lot of loopholes and paperwork, you even managed to gain temporary authorization until a full review can be conducted. Still, it's enough to give you some treaty protection for now, and you're hoping that will be enough to keep the House of Turva at bay."

"Actually, there's a bit more to it than that," I said.

"Geez, Freddy, I told you I'm in the loop. Do we need to sit here and hash out every freaking detail? By my count, you've only got a little bit until your guests show up, and you should be ready to meet them when they arrive. Don't start something this important off by slighting another clan." She leaned down and poked my poorly knotted tie gently. "And what's with all this get-up?"

"You've seen me in a suit before," I reminded her.

"Yeah, for the job, or when we went somewhere swanky. Why are you dressing up for these shitbags?" Her hands moved quickly, pulling apart the tie's interwoven areas until it hung limply on both sides of my neck once more.

"I thought it would be only proper. I want to show them respect."

"This isn't a business meeting, Freddy. It's a pissing contest. Don't try to impress them, make them try to impress you. Dress in a way that's comfortable, familiar, and lets these bastards know exactly who you are." Krystal yanked the tie off, crumpled it up, and tossed it into the corner.

"You think I should stick with the khakis and sweater vest?"

"If it ain't broke, don't fix it." She leaned in, kissing me firmly and running her hands through the hair I'd just recently finished combing. "Go meet these people as yourself. That's my advice. And I hope you'll take it, since we both know you're about to insist I not join you for dinner."

"Did Charlotte tell you?" I rose from the bed as I spoke, beginning to unbutton the crisp white shirt and eyeing my closet for something with a bit more life to it. I'd long ago brought a small stash of clothes, given how often I slept over at the manor, and it was preparation that paid off as I surveyed my choices.

"She offered to serve Arch and I meals in the sitting room, so that was a bit of a tip-off," Krystal replied. "By the way, I accepted the offer, but he didn't. If this is a formal meeting between the representatives of two vampire houses, an agent has the right to sit in and bear witness. That should make sure things stay peaceful, and Arch has a long-standing reputation for remaining fair and unbiased, so they won't have any room to bitch."

"Will Petre be okay with that?" I found a light blue cotton button-down and tossed it over my torso.

"Who gives a shit? Part of the fun of being an agent is getting to swing our dicks around when the occasion strikes. It's all in the treaties, so Arch is allowed to be there. Which means if Petre has an issue, he'll take it up with Arch, and no vampire lives to be that old by being stupid enough to pick that kind of fight."

With the shirt on, I swapped out my dark suit pants for khakis, and then topped it all with a gray sweater vest. I did feel more comfortable, more like myself, and it seemed to have helped with the nerves. Turning to face Krystal, I held out my arms and did a quick spin. "How do I look?"

"Like Freddy. Like the man I love. Like someone who's going to make it work tonight." Just like that, she was across the room and kissing me once more, though this time, she left my hair alone.

"You're really okay with all of this?" I asked once more, just to be certain. "It's going to change things, you know."

"Aren't you the one who told Albert about how everything changes, and sometimes, it makes our lives a lot better?" Krystal reminded me. "I'm not super thrilled with the plan overall, and I've got a plane on standby if it's needed, but I'd be lying if I said I wasn't a little impressed. You went to all this trouble, just to avoid running."

"It wasn't that I didn't want to run," I told her. "I just didn't want to leave so much behind."

"Well, then, get your cute ass down there and go fight for your town." She smacked me on the butt and pointed me toward the door. "Oh! And Charlotte is doing place settings; make sure you get the seat designated for you. I left you the extra special cutlery, just in case."

"You realize this is supposed to be a peaceful discussion, right?" I asked.

"Freddy, if you don't come ready for war, then you'll never manage to bargain your way to peace. Now scoot, I've had a long day, and I need a shower. When it's all wrapped up, I'll come join you, and we can go from there." With that, she disappeared into the attached bathroom, shutting the door firmly behind her.

I took the cue and headed downstairs, two envelopes of documents tucked securely under my arm. With a brief detour to the dining room to drop the papers off at the seat with a white placard bearing my name, I headed to the front hall, where my guests would soon be arriving. Lillian was already there, as was the old woman version of Charlotte. The former was wearing a new outfit, and she gave me a discerning glance as I walked in.

“Didn’t feel like dressing up?”

“This is a business meeting, and you’ve seen that this is how I dress for business.” Though I expected to feel a wave of self-doubt over the fact that I’d gone too casual, I actually weathered the comment decently. Krystal was right, feeling centered with myself and who I was mattered more than impressing these people.

Arch stepped in from outside, the lingering wisps of cigarette smoke still clinging to his form. “Looks like your guests are here. Three in the car that’s pulling up, no idea if more are lying in wait on the road.”

Though, from most people, such thoughts might have seemed paranoid, with Arch, I knew it was just him thinking tactically. He strode past us, on track for the dining room, where he’d no doubt be waiting to oversee the meeting. It was quite comforting, actually, to know he’d be there. I’d never really expected the night to devolve into violence—Petre seemed the type to be more cunning than that—but having Arch on hand made it all the less likely.

I stood as straight as possible while the three figures made their way up the porch stairs, finally pushing through the front door. Petre was flanked on either side by thick-necked vampires dressed in impeccably tailored dark suits. They were tall and strong, likely nurtured by a healthy diet of therian blood. Despite the size difference, Petre himself still stood out the most, his pale blue eyes taking in every detail, like he was deciding which nearby knick-knack would be best suited for killing us all.

“Mr. Fletcher, a pleasure to see you once more. I trust your new employee is working out well?”

“Quite well. She’s been a tremendous help, and I think she’ll only grow more useful as she’s trained.” We exchanged bows, and I looked to the hulking slabs of undead muscle near him. “And may I ask your friends’ names?”

“They are unimportant, only here to assist me with details. Please, ignore them. I try to whenever possible.” Petre smiled, his fangs just the slightest bit extended. He was enjoying this, and didn’t mind letting me know. I hoped he kept his good humor when the situation changed. “I must say, Mr. Fletcher, I’ve been doing my research, and you are quite the interesting character. Tell me, what do you consider a higher honor, having won the esteem of a dragon, or having bedded an agent?”

“Ah, right, the rumors. Those do come up on occasion. That’s part of why I called you here for a meeting. But how rude of me, let’s head to the dining room. No point in standing about the hall when there’s comfort and drink to be had.” I motioned down the hallway, hoping I’d kept the temptation to sneer at him off my face when he talked about bedding Krystal. This was the game I had to play if I wanted to win the right to stay in my town. I wouldn’t let him beat me so soon.

The night was just beginning, and I had a few cards of my own to surprise him with.

8.

To his credit, Petre waited until the drinks were poured and a plate of appetizers was set on the table before getting down to business. Somehow, a part of me doubted he'd have shown such courtesy if Arch hadn't been sitting there, helping himself to the bruschetta while the rest of us stewed in anticipation for what was to come. Once the agent was eating, however, Petre clearly felt the time had come.

"I'll be brief, Mr. Fletcher, as I'm sure you have much to do with your evening. Having learned what we did about your incredible achievements over the past few years, the House of Turva has decided to do something we'd previously ruled out: offer you membership in our clan." Petre held out a hand, and one of the nameless goons sitting to either side of him slipped a large piece of paper into his fingers. He set it down and slid it expertly across the smooth wooden table, where it halted inches from my plate.

"Feel free to look things over—and that goes for you as well, good agent—the pertinent information is all there. We extend this as an olive branch to one who has been left alone for too long. However, as an abandoned vampire, you have little means to refuse the invitation. We wouldn't want fear of something new to make you miss out on such a wondrous opportunity." Petre smirked, a small gesture that wasn't even properly suited for the amount of gloating he obviously wanted to do. No doubt, he expected this to be an easy win. Maybe he even hoped to walk out tonight with his new pet accountant—taken right out from under an agent, no less.

"It is a very kind, generous offer," I replied, careful to keep civil. I was pushing my luck more than enough without adding a personal grudge to the mix. "Unfortunately, I must refuse it. Renowned as the House of Turva is, I'm afraid the invitation comes a bit too late. You see, I am no longer an abandoned vampire. I've already joined a clan."

Petre's small smile receded back into his sour expression as I reached under my chair and pulled out my first envelope of documents. Rather than slide it like Petre had, I merely held it up, allowing one of the waiters to take it from my hand and walk it over to the other side of the dinner table. Petre snatched it and ripped open the top, eyes darting down the pages as he took the information in. I used the brief moment of silence to take a deep gulp of wine from my glass. This next part was going to require all the fortification I could muster.

"Surely this is some poor attempt at humor." Petre dropped the documents carelessly, as though he could no longer bear them sully his fingers, and several slipped from the table to the floor below. “A temporary authorization for a one-person clan? That is what you would choose over the millennia-old House of Turva?”

“I’m really more of a modern vampire anyway, not much for older styles,” I replied. Not exactly the most neutral way to decline, but it was hard to tell someone you didn’t want to join their club without hurting their feelings in one way or another.

“This is preposterous.” Petre’s eyes danced to his muscle, who stirred at his gaze, but then his attention turned to Arch and the activity came to a standstill. He calmed himself, looking back at me and speaking with forceful intention in every word. “Let me tell you something, Mr. Fletcher, as I’m sure you didn’t truly understand what you were doing. Founding a clan is not something to be done lightly. Even assuming you correctly jump through all the hoops to be recognized under the treaties, what you have done is form a new a clan in territory currently being controlled by another, much larger house. The agent here can attest that such situations are very rarely amicable, and there are no shortage of treaty-sanctioned ways for us to deal with a rival on our territory.”

Petre paused, waiting for Arch to say something, either in agreement or disapproval. Instead, Arch merely nodded to a waiter for more water, staying devoted to his role as overseer and refusing to get unnecessarily involved.

“I’ll give you one more chance, Mr. Fletcher.” Petre wasn’t even hiding behind the veil of civility anymore. He leaned forward halfway from his chair, and as he spoke, I caught sight of his fangs, further extended than they had been in the hallway. “Throw off these ridiculous notions. Submit to the House of Turva now, while the doors are still open to you. Or is it truly your intention to fend off an entire house of real vampires with a clan consisting solely of yourself?”

And here it was, time to hit him with the sucker punch that would determine whether or not this plan was a total bust. “As a matter of fact—”

“As a matter of fact, you’re bad at counting, fuckface.” Krystal’s voice rang through the dining room, cutting me off and causing Petre’s goons to start in their chairs. She was no longer dirty or tired; in fact, she seemed to blaze with a light all her own as she strode into the room. Her rough boots stomped on Charlotte’s wooden floors, and the gun belt strapped to her hip jingled slightly with every step. I’d seen this Krystal before, only in fleeting glimpses, but it was unmistakable for any other version of her. This was Krystal in full-on, ass-kicking-agent mode.

“Who in the nine hells do you think you are, interrupting a private meeting?” Petre motioned to the goon on his right, who started to stand. A very audible click filled the air, and all eyes turned to Arch, who’d produced a gun and had it expertly trained on the vampire halfway out of his chair.

“I’m going to have to insist that you not make any aggressive moves toward an agent. For everyone’s safety.” With his free hand, Arch helped himself to the last of the bruschetta, and a waiter whisked away the plate as if there wasn’t a gun suddenly out at the table.

“Sit down,” Petre hissed to his muscle, glaring at Krystal with a sudden influx of fear. A few seats over, Lillian grinned, taking a sip of her wine for the first time. She obviously couldn’t meddle or show me support, but the sudden appearance of Krystal had caused all our controls to slip a bit.

“I see, so you’re Mr. Fletcher’s lover.” Petre seemed to be regaining his self-control. He did know how to roll with the punches; I had to give him that. “Then, as an agent, you’d know that you are not permitted to interfere in conflicts that adhere to treaty conditions. Bluster about all you want, but if you so much as put a toe out of line in defending this one-vampire clan, I’ll have your badge.”

“First off, there’s a lot of shades of gray in those treaties, and you shitbags aren’t the only ones that can use them.” Krystal leaned forward, stopping inches from Petre’s face. Whatever aura of confidence and intimidation he’d spent centuries perfecting was wasted on her as she met his sneer with a grin. “And secondly, I just told you that you counted wrong. Freddy’s not the only member of his clan.”

“Ahem. Um. Is that my cue?” We all turned to find Albert, standing in the dining room doorway, talking to someone out of sight further down the hall. Evidently, he received an affirmative answer, because he stepped forward and looked the entire dinner party in the eye, one by one. “Fred—I mean, Mr. Fred, also has me.”

“Am I expected not to notice that’s a zombie?” Petre asked. At this point, I think he was temporarily more confused than anything else, which made two of us. While I’d certainly come to the meeting with a crazy, long-shot plan, this hadn’t been part of it. So when Krystal began to explain, I was paying just as much, if not more, attention than my adversary.

“Notice all damn day if you want. We checked the treaties up, down, and sideways. Any newly founded vampire clan has ten parahuman spots. It’s just that none of you ever bothered using them for anything besides vampires.”

“Why would we?” Petre turned from her to me, clearly under the misimpression that I was in on this spectacle. “Is that the best you can do? Padding your ranks with a mere zombie?”

Two heavy footsteps were the only warning we got as a new figure arrived in the doorway, this one far less concerned with protocol. Neil was decked out in a full set of robes, similar to the ones I’d seen the mages wear during Albert’s fight with the chimera—though his were darker, and he clutched a black tome in his thin hands. From how tightly he gripped the book, it was clear he was annoyed, even before he began to bark at Petre. “Watch your mouth, or I'll make you rip your own tongue out."

In a few steps, he'd joined Albert by my chair, resting his free hand on my assistant's shoulder, near where the top of Albert's sword poked up. "This 'mere zombie' happens to wield the Blade of the Unlikely Champion. Show some damn respect." He paused, apparently remembering that he was supposed to do something other than just stick up for Albert. "Oh yeah, and I'm a member of the new clan as well. And no, I'm not a vampire, either. I'm a necromancer. I'm the puppet master who can pull all your undead strings."

"You align yourself with the ones who can control us. How desperate are you, Mr. Fletcher?" Petre asked.

"I mean . . . honestly, right now, I'm a lot more confused than I am desperate," I admitted. My eyes turned to Krystal, even I as heard heavy footsteps making their way to the doorway. "What is going on here?"

"I told you I was in the loop," she said, unabashedly savoring the surprise on my face. "It was easy to figure out. And when I talked it over with everyone, they agreed that this was doomed to fail if it was just you. So we decided that if you were willing to go to this much trouble to stay with us, then the least we could do was have your back. Officially. Well, they can. I'm an agent, so we're not really allowed to belong to any organization."

"But . . . but I didn't want any of you to be drawn into this." Now that I finally understood what was going down, my mind was reeling, so forgive me if perhaps my word choice wasn't quite as keen as it should have been.

"We know you didn't. And we know you'd never ask us to do somethin' like this. Which is prolly the exact reason we all agreed to." Bubba's thick, deep voice resonated from the doorway as he walked into the room. "And for y'all in here who don't know me, I'm Bubba Emerson. Therianthrope and currently a member of the tribe led by Richard Alderson."

"This is getting beyond ridiculous," Petre snapped. "A therian cannot belong to a clan and a tribe at the same time."

This time, when the footsteps echoed, there was no mistaking their owner. Bubba might leave a hefty boot print, but no one in the room, or probably the city, carried the same kind of bulk as Richard Alderson. He ducked his head to step through the doorframe, and suddenly, the entire atmosphere seemed to change. Up until then, I'd have guessed that Petre considered himself to be dealing with annoyances, something he'd have to pick apart later. Richard, however, was a peer. This man wielded most of the power in Winslow, power the House of Turva very much didn't want turned against it.

"As it turns out, parahumans can belong to multiple organizations, assuming the leaders of each permit it," Richard told the room. "I personally signed my agreement to Bubba's dual status this afternoon. Fred, you have any objections?"

"I'm just trying to keep up at this point," I replied. "But since it seems like this happening with or without me, Bubba is free to be in both organizations, if it's what he really wants."

"Didn't think you'd mind," Richard said. "Also, Petre, though I obviously cannot join Fred with the others, you should know that my tribe has submitted an official mutual cohabitation and alliance agreement to Fred's new clan. I'm sure I don't need to tell you what that means if you decided to declare war on my friends."

"I also wouldn't count on the mage community for much support, unless you're playing nice." Amy had wandered in, practically unnoticed by any of us amidst the sea of vast personalities already present. "Since I joined the clan too, I reached out to a few friends in the spellcasting community. As of now, anyone on unfriendly grounds with my people can go elsewhere for all their magical needs."

Petre was fuming, unsure of who to stare more angrily at, though I was certainly getting the most frequent bout of his attention. "And who the hell is this woman?"

"That would be Amy Wells, sir. I mentioned her in my report." It was the first time Lillian had spoken since we sat down, and from the barely suppressed mirth on her face, I could only imagine how long she'd been waiting to slip a few words in, twisting the knife as she watched her superior lose control.

The rage on Petre's face seemed to dim. He glared at us, more sullen than furious now, bathing us in unmasked hatred. "This is quite the coup, Mr. Fletcher. You present yourself as such a caring, innocuous man, but when the moment arrives, it seems you have no trouble throwing the might of your allies around."

"Yo, dumbass, have you really not caught on yet?" Krystal snapped her fingers in front of his face, forcing him to look up at her. "Freddy didn't ask us for this. We snuck around behind his back, meeting with his lawyer as soon as he left, getting the paperwork sorted and everyone officially registered. He would never use us to scare you. We made that choice all on our own, and it's because we're not his allies. We're his friends."

"Technically speaking, as of now, we're also his family," Amy added. I noticed that tonight, in one of the few occasions I could recall, Amy had no strange auras, glows, or magical effects around her. She'd shown up stone-cold sober, which meant more than words would ever convey about how important she considered this evening.

"Fine, you're all friends, you're all family. It doesn't matter. The oldest of you is what? Perhaps a few decades old? I've been playing politics for centuries upon centuries." Petre rose from the table, his goons following suite. Only Lillian hesitated. "You think an alliance with a therian will protect you? Or a little inconvenience from the mages? I am beyond patient, and I will find a way to gain retribution for this slight. And what will you do, Mr. Fletcher, when I strip away the protection of your precious family? How will fend for yourself when there is no one else to stand for you?"

"You know, I was actually getting to that, before my friends came charging in and did the most amazing, caring thing I've ever seen." It was my turn to stand, because, with the momentum on our side, I had a new idea, one I'd have never dared try before. But the night was going well, and all of a sudden, pressing that luck didn't seem quite so foolish. First things first, though, it was time to get my last card, what I'd thought would be my trump, down on the table.

"Feel free to come after me any way you see fit, Petre." I reached back under the chair and grabbed one last document, this one kept apart from the others for good reason. "Just know that, when you do, you're attacking more than just me. As of last night, Fletcher Accounting Services has officially signed on to do freelance budget auditing for the Agency."

9.

It was my turn to smile as everyone else in the room stared with unexpected shock at the revelation, which I actually found quite confusing. Some had wide eyes, others gasped, and Krystal was opening and closing her mouth repeatedly, as though she kept deciding what to say and then changing her mind at the last moment.

“What? You said you were filled in all the way. You’re the ‘fucking air,’ remember?”

“I meant I knew about you starting a vampire clan,” Krystal snapped, my prompt finally giving her a set of words to start with. “But you signed on as an Agency contractor? How did you even know that was possible?”

“You mentioned it when we were in Boarback,” I reminded her. “Said it came with a lot of perks. I did some digging and found out that that included a certain level of protection. That was my plan tonight. You didn’t all really think I was planning to keep a whole gang of vampires at bay just by starting my own clan, did you?”

“Did Asha know about this?” Krystal demanded.

“Sure, she’s the one who helped me put it through.” From the look on everyone’s faces, ranging from uncertainty to betrayal, I gathered it was something she hadn’t mentioned during their meeting. While she technically shouldn’t have, and given that she had let them all join my new clan in secret, I had a hunch that she’d have given them a heads up on the contractor thing if they’d asked. “Wait, did you all barge in declaring that you already knew everything and wanted to help?”

“Well, we let Krystal do most of the talkin’,” Bubba admitted.

“Still, even if I told her we were up to speed, you’d think she would have mentioned it,” Krystal mumbled. “Freddy, do you have any idea what you’ve done? Being connected to the Agency is not exactly all smiles and tickle-fights, even if they just want you to crunch numbers. The reason the job comes with protection is because a lot of parahumans hate us, and aren’t shy about taking it out on the people who work with us.”

“Indeed we do,” Petre agreed. Truthfully, in the moment, I think we’d all nearly forgotten he was even there. “Mr. Fletcher, when I believed you had turned your allies into pawns to stave off being absorbed into our clan, I thought you a manipulative, cunning bastard, but at least I respected that. Throwing in with the Agency, however, is an unforgivable decision. You would scamper under the protection of those that murder our kind, all for little more than accepting the nature we were born with.”

“We only kill the ones who break the law.” Arch hadn’t completely put his gun away; instead, it was resting near his dinner fork, one motion away from being swept up again.

“Petty, pathetic laws that we were strong-armed into agreeing with,” Petre replied. All the anger was gone from him now; in its place was cold, empty hatred. There was no question about it, I’d definitely made myself an enemy this evening. It was a terrifying thought that I would dwell on endlessly later. For the moment, however, I tried to focus on the fact that he probably couldn’t hate me anymore when I made my big move.

“Tonight, you have done more than slight the House of Turva,” Petre continued. “You have betrayed your own kind. To take the sacred tradition of a clan and allow the common parahuman riffraff within its ranks was bad enough, but to then cast your lot with the Agency just for a small modicum of protection . . . Fredrick Fletcher, you are no vampire to me.”

“You know, I think I’m okay with that,” I replied. “If being a ‘real’ vampire means being like you and your clan, then I’m fine being considered something else. Hell, I’ll take it as a compliment. Because here’s the thing, Petre: your kind of vampire might have a giant clan with lots of people to take orders, but as Amy pointed out, my kind has a family. If that’s the deal, then I’d rather be a failure of a vampire any day of the week.”

“Let’s see if you can hang on to that sentiment when the House of Turva begins picking you all apart.” Petre turned to the last seated member of his party and called to her. “The work is done, Lillian. Let us return home for the night. There is no longer any need to serve such a useless man.”

“Lillian, stay right there.” I spoke before she even had a chance to pull her chair back, keeping Petre’s attention on me. This was the part I’d been trying to build toward, the thing I’d wished for, but never would have had the courage to try without my friends filling the room behind me. “Not to be rude, but I believe Lillian was given to me as a gift of friendship. Or does the House of Turva often rescind its gifts when it suits them to do so?”

“We do when we no longer wish for any sort of friendship with those we were dealing with,” Petre snapped. “I am willing to leave here tonight peacefully, Mr. Fletcher. Do not test my generosity any further than that.”

Krystal actually laughed at that point, short and harsh and so emasculating that even I felt wounded by it, despite the fact that it was aimed at Petre. “Are you really trying to pretend that you’re the one who is choosing to resolve things peacefully tonight? Freddy might be naïve, but the rest of us can do the math. If you throw so much as a sharp look at someone in this room, the three of you would get beaten halfway to your final coffins. As for Lillian . . . hey, Arch, you know protocol better than me: what’s the deal with taking back an official gift of friendship?”

“Legally complex, and often varies case by case,” Arch replied calmly.

“It’s a tedious ordeal, usually more trouble than it’s worth for both parties. Still, if you both want to go down that route, I can make some calls to start the paperwork.”

“Or . . .” The idea poured from my mouth as fast as it formed, my eyes on the untouched place setting only a few feet in front of me. “We can settle it here and now, like real vampires. How about a test of strength, Petre? That should appeal to your proper ways.”

“You wish to fight one of us?” Though I’d expected him to be annoyed, Petre instead seemed cautiously intrigued. He was probably imagining getting to snap me in half while my friends looked on, but I had something different in mind.

“Oh no, nothing that barbaric. Besides, with the amount of parahuman blood in you, I know I wouldn’t stand a chance. I meant a much more personal, ego-driven strength. Strength of will. Krystal, do you or Arch happen to have any silver daggers on you?” I asked.

Without pause, Arch reached into his jacket and produced a gleaming silver blade. Everyone in the room (except Krystal and the mages) shrank back visibly, though my reaction was purely for show. Catching Petre’s eye, I nodded to the dagger resting in Arch’s hand.

“It’s a simple game. We take turns holding the dagger, and whoever can bear it the longest is the winner. No amount of blood either of us might have in our system is going to help with that.” Technically, my words were true, as the blood in my system had absolutely nothing to do with how this could play out.

“Let me guess, if I win, Lillian comes home, and if you win, she stays?” Petre asked.

“No,” I said, looking at Lillian past Petre’s glowering countenance. “If you win, Lillian goes with you. If I win, Lillian gets to choose what she wants to do. Maybe she’ll still go home to the House of Turva. Maybe she’ll ask to join my clan, which she’s welcome to do. Maybe she’ll want to be an abandoned vampire for a while and see how she likes it. But the decision will be hers to make.”

Petre chuckled under his breath, turning to meet Lillian’s uncertain eyes. “I think you ensnared this one too deeply, my child. He thinks to win you a freedom you don’t want. Very well, Mr. Fletcher, I will play your game. But I have a condition: we will need two silver daggers, and we shall hold them at the same time. This way, there is no dispute about who drops first, and neither of us has the advantage of a goal to beat. You might think me foolishly prideful, but I’m not so dumb that I think you’d choose a contest you didn’t have a good chance at winning. Perhaps your pain tolerance is abnormally high, or you simply believe in your heart that you can do it. Regardless, I will not give you any needless advantages.”

“I’d say that’s more than fair,” I agreed. “Arch, do you have another?”

The blade was in his hand before I’d even finished the question. Rising from his seat, Arch walked toward Petre, and I made my way over to join them. The rest of the room backed up, giving us ample space. This was as much because we were near silver as out of desire to let the contest occur uninterrupted.

“These blades are both silver,” Arch announced. “I’d like you both to briefly touch, smell, or do whatever you need to confirm that, just so there are no accusations later on.” Petre carefully touched his thumb to both daggers, showing no outward sign of pain, but keeping the contact brief. I did the same, though I made myself appear to be hiding a wince each time.

“I will lay these in your bare palms simultaneously. You cannot touch, bump, or in any way physically interfere with the other. The first person to release their grip on a blade is the loser. Any objections or questions?”

Petre and I both shook our heads and held out our hands. Arch didn’t bother repeating himself; instead, he laid the blades across our flesh, releasing his hands once we’d gotten a firm grip. The silver still tingled a bit as I clutched it, unlike a normal metal, but I wasn’t flooded with pain and weakness the way it had once affected me. Even being near the stuff had worn me down to near human levels; chains of silver over my clothes had held me more than once. Actual skin-to-metal contact had burned, like touching something that was just a bit too hot at first, but with every passing second, the pain had grown steadily worse. Silver-insulated magic interrupted it, and for a vampire, that meant being brought back to the corpses we truly were.

At least, that’s how it was affecting Petre. For me, it was just the tingle, nothing more. It was possible Petre hadn’t been wrong when he said I wasn’t a real vampire anymore. Whatever Gideon’s magic had done to me, it must have changed my body in a pretty fundamental way for silver to leave me unbothered. Being different wasn’t so bad, though. Especially not when it gave me the opportunity to help my friends.

To his credit, Petre held out for a full minute before his composure began to slip. The steady hand holding his blade wobbled first, by only a few degrees, then progressively more and more as his placid expression melted to one of focus and pain. His gaze wavered between his own hand, mine, and my face, where he found an utterly untroubled expression. If I was going to go to all the trouble to make an impression, I felt like it should at least be a strong one.

“You have . . . good . . . pain tolerance.” His teeth were clamped together as his hand shook violently. All of his instincts were undoubtedly screaming at him to throw away the dagger, yet he was halting them through sheer force of will. In that moment, I dearly hoped I never had to face off against Petre in a genuine contest. The way silver used to hurt, I couldn’t have managed what he was doing for even ten seconds.

"I just have a really good reason not to let go," I replied, voice steady and calm.

"Even if you . . . win . . . she'll . . . come home."

"You think so? Maybe you're right. Why don't you drop the dagger, and we'll find out." The truth of the matter was that I didn't know if Petre was wrong or not. Lillian had certainly voiced frustration with her clan and the desire to not take their orders, but ours was still a motley lot to throw in with. She very well might choose to stick with what was familiar and at least relatively safe. But . . . they'd kept her from blood for a month before. That wasn't punishment, it was torture. If there was even a chance she'd grasp for freedom, I owed it to her. Without Lillian, I never would have gotten the time and intel to create my own clan in the first place.

Despite my words, Petre kept hanging on to his blade. Another minute passed, and then another. At long last, as his whole arm was shaking, Petre let the dagger clatter to the floor. He'd made it three minutes and change, judging by the antique clock hanging on the dining room wall. Honestly, I was incredibly impressed at such a feat of willpower, even if I couldn't afford to show it. For good measure, I waited several more seconds, making sure that Petre's fallen knife was completely still, before releasing my own to join it.

"And Fred is the winner," Arch declared, not so much as even one bit of enthusiasm or showmanship in his voice.

Petre was staring at me with a new look, something between respect and doubt, as he reached down and pushed his finger against my dagger. Instantly, he jerked his hand away, all his tolerance for pain used up on the amazing display he'd just put on.

"This is a trick," he said. "Are you wearing some sort of enchantment?"

"Everyone knows you can't enchant against silver," Amy supplied helpfully from over my shoulder.

"Then a plastic, or a coating of some sort." He grabbed my hand, and even though my friends all seemed to move closer, I made no motion to stop him as he examined my palm for some method of defeating the dagger.

"Like I told you before, I just had a really good reason to not let go." With that, I pulled my hand away and walked over to Lillian, still seated as she patiently watched the contest unfold.

She smiled, taking a moment to look over my hand herself before speaking. "That was pretty impressive, Fredrick."

"I like to put on a good show," I replied. "And hey, I won. Which means that what happens next is up to you. Go with Petre, stay with us weirdos, or strike out on your own."

"Before I decide, can I ask you something? Why go to all this trouble for someone who was sent to spy on you?" Lillian asked.

Turning slowly, I pointed to my group of friends. “The first time I met Neil, he tried to sacrifice me and a bunch of LARPers for more power, and Albert helped. Amy had accidentally created a bunch of monsters that nearly killed me more than once. Bubba got us drawn into a gambling debt that could have had us working for slave wages in Vegas. Charlotte threatened to kill a whole house of guests if one of the people didn’t off themselves. And Krystal is the catalyst that dragged me into all of those dangers, along with a whole lot of others. Honestly, as far as first impressions go, you made one of the best of the lot. You saved me from a vampire hunter, and spying doesn’t really stack up to attempted murder. As for why I’m doing it, well, I think we’re friends. And if you haven’t noticed, this is a group of friends that tends to stick together.”

“You are, without question, one of the oddest vampires I’ve ever met.” Lillian sighed. “But damn if this doesn’t seem like a lot more fun than doing yet another honeypot in a few weeks.” She stood from her chair at last, walking over to Petre and looking him square in the eyes.

“It would shame the House of Turva to rescind a gift of friendship, especially to a clan with such power and connections. Your pride has blinded you to this, Petre, but I can still see what is best for our people over my ego. I will stay with Fredrick Fletcher, and continue working for him as a member of his new clan. Thus, the friendship between our two houses shall remain intact.”

Petre’s eyes narrowed further with every word Lillian spoke. “Our leader —”

“Our leader will see that I made the right decision, when you tell him of everything that has happened here tonight,” Lillian said, cutting Petre off. “The alliance with Alderson’s therians and Wells’s mages is too much to have turned against us in this fragile time. Go make your report, Petre. And when they side with me, I hope you learn some humility during your fasting.”

Though he was barely repressing a snarl, Petre turned from Lillian, motioning to his cronies to follow. Krystal, Arch, and I walked after them, making certain they found their way to the exit. None of the three tried to stray, but after his goons had walked through the door, Petre turned back to face me.

“No doubt you consider this evening a victory, Mr. Fletcher. You’ve gotten everything you wanted, and we are being sent slinking away. Allow me to offer some advice, though, as one with far more experience: a single win can easily be nullified further on. Do not consider this matter settled just because of one well-played maneuver.”

“Petre, I thank you kindly for the advice. Now allow me to return some of my own,” I told him. “Winslow, Colorado is not a place for malicious threats and blood-soaked takeovers. This is a good place, where good people, human and parahuman alike, try to make their homes. And I welcome you to it, because that's what you do when new neighbors arrive. Just remember that if you want to make trouble, you're better off looking somewhere else to do it. This is our town, and we won't just sit around if someone tries to ruin it. So be good neighbors. It'll make things easier on everyone."

Petre opened his mouth to reply, but before a word came out, the front door slammed closed in his face. A moment later, Charlotte was standing there, her usual formal gown ditched for something that looked like a party dress from the flapper era.

"If you're all about done, I have a giant feast prepared, and it seems like we've all got quite a bit to celebrate."

10.

“Be honest with me, are you a little bit sad that we didn’t have to move to Boarback?” I set the new laptop atop a modern desk, sleek and vastly more stylish than I would have ever chosen for myself. But this wasn’t about me, and it sort of fit with the room Charlotte had provided. This sizable chunk of space on the manor’s third floor was so bare that I half-suspected she’d created it just to fill our needs. I’d never gotten a good grasp of exactly how much control Charlotte had regarding what existed within her walls, and this was no occasion for me to look a gift horse in the mouth.

“Sad isn’t really the right word,” Krystal replied, pulled a stack of files from the cardboard box and setting them carefully down next to the filing cabinets. If she knocked them over, then everything would have to be re-sorted, and that was a task neither of us wanted to undertake. “Part of me would have enjoyed it, and I think you’d have learned to love it there too, but this is what’s best for everyone, us included.”

“Best” might have been an optimistic term, but I didn’t raise any objections. Over the last few days, we’d seen all the paperwork continue making its way through the system, and as of yesterday, most of my temporary authorizations had been approved. Though the House of Turva had raised a few objections here and there, they lacked our passion and gift for paperwork, which made clearing their minor obstacles hardly any challenge. Things were settling down now, and with the threat of immediate, looming death momentarily pushed away, I’d had to turn my attention to more pragmatic issues. The largest of which was my office.

While I’d greatly enjoyed working from home for a long while, the truth was that I could no longer justify such a system. Between Quinn and Colin, too many people had broken into my apartment over the years, no matter how many security measures I implemented. Now that I knew the House of Turva had been interested in my client’s records, it would be bad faith for me to store them in a place so easily accessible through force. Thus, Krystal and I were handling part four of the Fletcher Accounting Services home office move. As of two days prior, I was leasing office space through Charlotte, meaning that my files—both digital and hard copy—would be stored in the safest location I had access to. Truth be told, Krystal was on me to let the apartment go altogether and move in myself, but I wasn’t quite ready to make that jump yet.

However, it had made sense to change the housing situation of someone else in the company. Much as I enjoyed having Albert around, renting him a room at Charlotte Manor made things easier, as he split his time between Arch and me. Now, he wouldn't have to come to my apartment to handle any filing; everything he needed would be under the same roof. And the same held true for my company's newest employee.

"Knock, knock. I've got a lawyer with a hefty briefcase, boss." Lillian pushed open the door, clad in a long skirt and strikingly green blouse. Though I'd told her she was free to do as she wished, the elder vampire seemed oddly taken with my line of work. Perhaps it was some debt she felt compelled to pay off, or maybe she merely wanted something a little more humdrum after the hecticness of her previous tasks. Either way, I needed the help, so I didn't object.

"Fred, you're lucky we go back so far. I would not put in these kinds of hours at the drop of a hat for just anyone." Asha barreled past Lillian at the doorway, dropping her own briefcase down next to the laptop and popping the latches to reveal three large stacks of documents. She yanked all of them out, setting them carefully on the desk before shutting her case and moving it onto the floor. "These are the newest pages for review, not that you can change much at this point in the process, but rules are rules. Check them over and have the signature pages back to me by tomorrow night."

"That's a tight deadline," I said. In my line of work, I was no stranger to loads of tedious paperwork, but this was quite the task even by those standards.

"Yeah, well, when you say 'put the fastest rush possible on everything,' you're going to get some tight deadlines. And some heavy briefcases." Asha was glaring, all but daring me to complain after the endless barrage of work I'd put her through.

In what I considered a wise decision, I let the issue of the deadline pass, taking a peek at the documents on top of each stack instead. These were to be the last in a long line of smaller batches, making my new clan finally official. Idly, I flipped through several pages, letting my eyes skim the hundreds of lines of inky text. One piece, bigger than the others, caught my attention, and I yanked the page free from the stack.

"Asha, please don't hurt me for saying this, but I think there's been a mistake." Carefully turning the document around so that she could see it, I pointed to the bold letters that were at least three fonts larger than anything else on the page. "Right here, where it lists the official title of the new clan. This is supposed to read House of Fletcher."

"Oh, yeah. I changed that," Krystal called from the other side of the room. "Cashed in a few favors, said there was a mix-up, and got the name updated. House of Fletcher seemed way too stuffy for this crowd, you know?"

In a smooth motion, Asha snatched the page away from me and read the new name, her grip tightening on the pages. "House of Fred? That's what you had the clan's name changed to?"

“Fits much better, don’t you think?” She finished unloading her box and kicked the empty cardboard across the room, where it joined many of its already unpacked brethren. That done, she strolled over to where the rest of us were standing, giving me a quick peck on the cheek. “I can have it changed back if you really want. I mean, you’re the one who has to live under the name. But come on, House of Fletcher? Bleh. Lillian, is that the clan you want to be associated with?”

“Hey, I came from Turva, so pretty much anything is an improvement after that,” Lillian replied. “Although, for what it’s worth, I do sort of agree with Krystal. House of Fred seems like a better fit.”

Two against one was hardly insurmountable odds, but when half of that equation was Krystal Jenkins, I knew better than to fight without cause. “Asha, could you run it by the others and see what they think? Whatever the majority wants, that’s the name we’ll use.”

“Feel free to double check, but I shopped the idea around before I made the calls. Everyone either didn’t care or agreed with me,” Krystal said.

“Is there any reason why I wasn’t one of the people you shopped it to?” I asked.

“Because then it wouldn’t be a surprise. Geez, Freddy, you’re supposed to be smart, try and keep up here.” Given the sort of mischief Krystal often liked to cause, I decided to consider it a boon that she hadn’t altered the name to House of Freddy.

“If I have to run down opinions, I’m at least going to help myself to some food first,” Asha declared. “Charlotte, set a place for me, please. And put this one on Fred’s tab; it’s the least he can do.”

“I still can’t believe this is a living house,” Lillian muttered as she watched Asha head out the door. In the time since dinner with Petre, we’d brought her up to speed on almost everything about our group that she’d missed, the true nature of Charlotte Manor included. I’d even let her in on my silver immunity, though she’d been disappointed when all her questions of how such a thing was possible were met with honest ignorance. “Charlotte, would you set a place for me, too?”

“Hold on a minute,” I said, holding up my hand. “Have you done your studying for the day?”

“Like . . . all of it? ‘Cause you gave me a shitload to work through each day,” Lillian pointed out. “And that’s on top of all the online classes I’m taking.”

“You’re the one who wanted to get your accounting certifications as fast as possible. That workload will allow you to handle the basic exams in just a few months, but only if you stick with it,” I told her. It was, admittedly, a very aggressive timetable, far more ambitious than something I’d have undertaken when just starting out. Lillian, however, had little patience, despite what one might expect from a vampire as old as she was, and had insisted on racing ahead to become a full accountant.

“Fine, fine, you win. Charlotte, can you have someone bring me a meal up here? And some blood from the fridge. I’m going to need actual sustenance to get through this workload.” Lillian glared at me, but I took no offense. We both knew she was the one actually keeping herself on track. I just served as a convenient reminder and occasional foil.

As Krystal and I left the office, heading downstairs for night-lunch before another round of unpacking, I wrapped my arm around her shoulders and pulled her close. She matched my affection, squeezing my torso so hard that a living me might have gotten bruised ribs.

“Any word on how long it’ll be before I’m contacted to start work?” I asked. Thus far, the Agency had accepted my contractor application and said they would be in touch. Other than that, I was left completely in the dark as to what the cost of aligning myself with them would be.

“Still nothing so far; at least, that’s what I’ve been told,” Krystal replied. “We don’t always have work for our contractors, and I don’t know that we’ve ever brought in an outside finance person before, at least not for a long time. They’re probably trying to figure out what to do with you. Maybe they’ll never think of anything, and you won’t have to take any jobs.”

“My luck isn’t that good,” I said. “But when the jobs come, they’ll just be accounting. I triple checked everything before applying as a freelance contractor; they can only offer me work in the specified field. Plus, I doubt even the Agency has found a way to turn number crunching into hazardous employment.”

“Let’s not put too much faith in that theory.” Krystal squeezed me once more, just before we reached the bottom of the stairs. “You may have really stepped in it this time, Freddy. You are damn fortunate that I’m always around to keep you safe.”

“You’ve got a point. Maybe my luck isn’t so bad, after all.” I kissed her there, at the bottom of the stairs, before we went to join the ruckus of a dining room I could already hear from down the hall. I’d taken a big gamble, binding myself to the Agency, and while it seemed like the right call for the moment, there was no way to know if it would work out okay in the end.

All I knew was that, no matter what came next, we’d be facing it together. Me, Krystal, and the small family of misfits we’d been blessed enough to gather together.

ABOUT DREW

Drew Hayes is an aspiring author from Texas who has written several books and found the gumption to publish a few (so far). He graduated from Texas Tech with a B.A. in English, because evidently he's not familiar with what the term "employable" means. Drew has been called one of the most profound, prolific, and talented authors of his generation, but a table full of drunks will say almost anything when offered a round of free shots. Drew feels kind of like a D-bag writing about himself in the third person like this. He does appreciate that you're still reading, though.

Drew would like to sit down and have a beer with you. Or a cocktail. He's not here to judge your preferences. Drew is terrible at being serious, and has no real idea what a snippet biography is meant to convey anyway. Drew thinks you are awesome just the way you are. That part, he meant. Drew is off to go high-five random people, because who doesn't love a good high-five? No one, that's who.

CONNECT WITH DREW

Thank you for reading my book. If you enjoyed it, won't you please take a moment to leave me a review at your favorite retailer? Or, connect with me below!

Follow my blog: <http://www.drewhayesnovels.com/>

Follow me on Twitter: <https://twitter.com/DrewHayesNovels>

Follow me on Goodreads:
https://www.goodreads.com/author/show/7077654.Drew\_Hayes